De l'É. Be but sincere, it will. Go on.

Dup. The very evening we reached Paris, your father, pointing to a small trunk, sternly ordered me to dress his nephew in those clothes; it contained a beggar's wretched covering.

[ST. ALME starts back, and turns away a moment, hiding his face.

Mad. F. The very rags they brought him to you in.

Dup. Muffled in these tatters, shrouded by midnight darkness, my master hurried him away; and, till this moment, I never saw him more.

St. A. Strike me with deafness, heaven!

Mad. F. Why didn't you immediately accuse him? He might have murdered the poor child for aught you knew.

Dup. At first, I feared it. Pressed and overpowered by my suspicions on his return alone, he owned that he had put in execution the design which brought him to Paris, and under shelter of the night, had lost the disguised and helpless innocent beyond recovery, in the inextricable mazes of that wide city.

Mad. F. Thank heaven, he'll find himself disappointed and detected.

De l'É. Madam—Well, sir—

Dup. In order to possess himself of the estates of the young Count, it still was necessary that he should prove his death. Two witnesses were wanting; seduced by gold, one, since dead, was the poor wretch we lodged with.

Fran. The other—was yourself; and by this dark and perjured attestation—

St. A. His name annihilated, his rich inheritance purloined, his death a forgery, and my own father the perpetrator! Saints of heaven, guard my soul from desperation! Already the licentious rabble point at me as I pass; I hear them cry,—“There goes the monster, the unnatural villain, who conspired to rob his noble kinsman, the friend of his youth, the saviour of his life, and turned him forth, naked and speechless, on a desert and unpeopled world.”

De l'É. Listen, sir, listen for a moment to a stranger, who views the dignity of your sorrow with reverence, and the severity of your fate with compassion; be just to yourself: you are not guilty.

St. A. Compassion? O heaven! Am I not his son? Not guilty? I'll hear of no compassion. Proclaim our crimes; clothe us in the same infamy; overwhelm us in one common ruin; raise monuments to perpetuate the villainy of the house of Darlemont; let the name be recorded as pestilential to virtue, and the race exterminated from the world for ever.

[St. ALME throws himself in an agony on a chair.

THEODORE, to whom DE L'EPÉE has explained DUPRÉ's confession, endeavours by every means to console him.]

Dup. Since that fatal deed, my horror and remorse have never given me one moment's peace. But heaven is just; it has preserved this noble youth, and sends me to unload my conscience at the tribunal of the laws. Deliver me this moment to them. I know the punishment that awaits me, and am resigned to it; too blest at last, if in confessing and expiating the crimes to which I have been an accomplice, I can repair the evils they have caused.

St. A. [Starting up, as if with a sudden thought, and rushing forward between DE L'EPÉE and FRANVAL.] Yes, yes—they must be repaired. Follow me, wretched old man.

Fran. St. Alme, where are you going?

St. A. Where despair calls me.

De l'E. Look on your Julio.

St. A. The sight of him drives me to madness.

Fran. What is your design?

St. A. To avenge him, or die.—Come, villain.

[Exit St. ALME, dragging DUPRÉ away with him—DUPRÉ looking back on THEODORE.

Fran. I must follow and detain him; or, in this madness of conflicting passions, he may publish his father's crimes, and defeat our very hope to save him from such dishonour. [Exit.

Mad. F. We follow you. Well, this St. Alme is a very good young man, upon my word; and, though he is Darlemont's son, I can't help being concerned for him, I protest.

De l'E. Franval speaks highly of his virtues and his honour. Ah! thou poor reed, shaken so long by storms! How this eventful day may end for thee, heaven knows! But come, my Theodore, should an unfeeling uncle persist in renouncing thee, should the laws reject thy appeal, thou shalt still find a warm, though humble, asylum, in the affection of De l'Epée. [Exeunt.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—The Room in the palace of Harancour. The picture having been removed.

Enter PHILIPPE, PIERRE, CHARLES, and ETIENNE.

Pie. Nay, nay, don't be in such a hurry. Friends! fellow servants! what have I done? what have I done?

Phil. Nay, nay, no hanging back—you must come to my master.

Cha. Come along, come along.

Pie. Let me go, I say. I am coming along; but you have a mind to strangle me before I get there. Hands off, gentlemen! [Disengages himself from them.] I won't be dragged in this manner, like a lamb to a slaughter-house. What's the meaning of this? What's the matter, I say?

Phil. O, poor innocent creature; you'll know what the matter is, sooner than you desire, I fancy. You must always act the great man; you must affect to be in all your young master's secrets.

Pie. I! I wish I may be hanged if I know any of his secrets.

Eti. Ay, ay; so you say. You call us wretched plodders, you know. What do you think of us now? My master has been in a fine rage about you and Dupré; you must be tattling.

Pie. Tattling?

Eti. Ay, you have been telling Dupré something or other.

Pie. Me! upon my soul, I—

Phil. Well, well, it doesn't signify; whatever it was, it drove Dupré into the square, raving like a madman, and my master has been raving ever since. He has almost murdered the porter, I can tell you, for letting Dupré out,—against his express orders, it seems.

Pie. Letting him out! and why not? where is he gone?

Eti. I fancy, that's the very thing my master wishes to know.

Pie. Is it? I'm sure then he wishes to know more than I can tell him.

Phil. Ay, ay, that's your business; but he'll find a way to make you tell him, I believe.

Pie. Make me tell! None of your impertinence, if you please, sir.

Eti. Don't make a fool of yourself, but come quietly with us; we shall all be finely handled for staying so long.

Pie. Handled, indeed! Come, I like that, too: handled!

Phil. Don't be too flippant, friend Pierre; he's in a most unmerciful humour, I promise you. Come.

Pie. This is all about that confounded picture, I suppose. My cursed curiosity will be the ruin of me at last.

Phil. Eti. Cha. Come away! come away!

Pie. Well, well; friends, fellow-servants, gentlemen! [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—A Saloon in the palace of Harancour, in which the picture is now placed.

Enter DARLEMONT.

Dar. Doubt, horror, and distraction! Where now can I look for support? my son estranged from me! Dupré a fugitive! All torments that disobedience, treachery, and self-condemnation can conjure up, beleaguer and confound me! [A noise without.]

Enter PHILIPPE.

Now, sir.

Phil. We have brought him, sir: Pierre is at the door.

Dar. So! he's in the plot, too. Bring him in. [Exit PHILIPPE.] Down, thronging apprehensions, down! I shall betray myself.

Enter PIERRE, PHILIPPE, ETIENNE, and CHARLES.

Tell me, sirrah! whether is he fled?

Pie. Fled, sir! Who, sir?

Dar. No prevarication, rascal!—the hypocritical comploter of your schemes. Speak! Dupré,—where is he?

Pie. If you'll believe me, sir, I can't tell.

Dar. I'll not believe you, villain! I'll have the truth, though I tear it out of your heart. I know you went to him into his room: deny that too.

Pie. Went to him in his—yes, yes, I did, I believe,—I did, sir.

Dar. [Seizing him.] What was your business with him, then?

Pie. [Very much frightened.] As I hope for mercy, sir, I only went, after you ordered me to take away the young Court's picture, just to—

Dar. [Perceiving the other servants, he recovers himself.] Go; I'll call you, when I have done with him.

[Exit PHILIPPE, ETIENNE, and CHARLES; DARLEMONT pulls the door very violently.]

Pie. Sir, I see I have done something that alarms you.

Dar. Alarms me!

Pie. That displeases you; I read it in your looks: but what it is, I protest I know no more than I do what is become of Dupré.

Dar. [Having composed himself.] I'm not displeased; you are mistaken. Come, tell me honestly what passed between you.

Pie. Why, nothing, sir; only, at first, when I said something about your bidding me remove the picture, he shook his head, with a deep groan. So, to spirit him up a little, I told him,—as I told you, sir,—that I had seen a young gentleman in the morning, a stranger, who seemed deaf, and dumb too, as like that picture, as if he had sat for it.

Dar. [Very eagerly.] What did he say to that?

Pie. Not one single word, sir; but all the blood flew into his face in a moment, and he sunk on the table, weeping bitterly; then he waved his hand so, and I left him.

Dar. [Aside.] Ha! he has revealed nothing yet. You have seen nothing of him since, then?

Pie. No, sir.

Dar. Nor of the strangers?

Pie. Nothing, sir.

Dar. Leave me.

Pie. [Aside.] And glad to be so cheaply quit, too. What is the meaning of all this rout? I durst not own that I told Dupré the strangers were at Franval's. [Going.]

Dar. And—stay within call. [Exit PIERRE.] I know not what to think, nor what course to take. Is this fellow's account true, or false? am I betrayed, or not?—nor dare I tax him too closely; that would excite suspicion. Horrible uncertainty! O, let no man ever trust himself into the path of guilt! it is a labyrinth beset with dismay and remorse, and not to be retord without a miracle! Yet I think, for his own sake, I think, Dupré will not divulge me. No, no, this sudden start is but the restlessness of his sickly conscience.

Re-enter PIERRE.

Pie. Sir, the Advocate Franval begs the favour of a few moments' private conversation with you.

Dar. Franval! With me, or with my son?

Pie. With you he said, sir.

Dar. Tell him, I beg his pardon: I'm particularly engaged. [Exit PIERRE.] He comes to torture me on his side; to prattle to me of his sister, and the match they have so craftily settled with St. Alme: but I shall counterwork their project. My son is good and dutiful, and loves me; and, though he could withstand my commands, I know he cannot long be proof to my intreaties; and the alliance I have provided, is the only imaginable means of securing me and himself against all turns of fortune.

Re-enter PIERRE.

Pie. I beg pardon, sir; the Advocate Franval has sent me back to inform you, that he has immediate business of the first importance, and that the Abbé De l'Epée, from Paris, is with him.

Dar. [Starts.] Who?

Pie. The Abbé De l'Epée.

Dar. What! the instructor of the deaf and dumb?

Pie. I don't know, sir; but I dare say it is; for it's the very gentleman that stopped me with the young stranger in the square this morning.

Dar. [Having paced once or twice across the room in great agitation.] Desire them to walk up. [Exit PIERRE.] He in Toulouse! accompanied by a youth, speaking by signs, pointing out this house, and like the picture! I'll not believe it. What! after so many years? Yet, wherefore should this very man address himself to me? I must command myself; and by a firm and calm exterior, baffle the keenest scrutiny of suspicion. I hear them. Be their errand what it may, my resolution's fixed. Defiance is a champion whose vigour may be dreaded; but Fear, a recreant destined to fall by the very sword which he surrenders. They come; I must withdraw one moment. [Exit.]

Re-enter PIERRE, introducing FRANVAL and DE L'EPEE. Pierre places chairs, and exit.

Fran. Pray, sir, remember; not one word of Dupré. I know him well; to find his servant his accuser, would rouse his pride to fury, and render all our endeavours to serve him, and in him my friend, ineffectual. No hint of Dupré's evidence, unless he absolutely drives us to desperate measures, I beg.

De l'E. I shall observe.

Re-enter DARLEMONT—DARLEMONT and DE L'EPEE eye each other stedfastly. FRANVAL presents DE L'EPEE.

De l'E. Your servant, sir.

[DARLEMONT bows to them, points to the chairs, and they all sit; DARLEMONT in the centre, evidently struggling with his alarm.]

Dar. You desire, I am told, to speak with me in private. May I ask what motive—

De l'E. The deep interest we both take in the honour of the father of St. Alme, and the solemn obligation we are at the same time under to fulfil an act of justice; these, sir, are the motives on which we judged it proper to request this interview in private.

Dar. [Embarrassed.] Does any man suppose my honour, then, in question?

Fran. A moment's patience, sir.

De l'E. You are the uncle, and were left the guardian of Julio, Count of Harancour.

Dar. [Shocked.] Well, sir!

De l'E. Of that unhappy youth, who was deprived by death of the watchful affection of his parents, and by nature left destitute of that distinctive prerogative of man, the power of appealing against injustice and oppression!

Dar. [Haughtily.] Oppression, sir?

De l'E. Ha! then you conceive my meaning?

Dar. [Checking himself.] If you have business, state it plainly.

De l'E. Do you desire it?

Dar. What means—

De l'E. Are you prepared for plain and honest speaking?

Dar. I'm not prepared for rude interrogation.— [Rises to go away.]

Fran. [Rises and stops him.] Listen one instant, and, perhaps, what he has spoken will hardly be construed thus.

Dar. Damnation! [Aside.] To the point at once.

De l'E. [Rises.] With all my soul. In one plain word then, learn, that chance, or rather that good Power that governs chance and the destiny of man, first placed your nephew, Julio, in my hands. This defrauded orphan, whose misfortunes should have doubled the tenderness of his natural protector towards him; this outcast, deaf and dumb, is still alive; and by our mouths now demands of you the restitution of his name and fortune.

Dar. [After a convulsion of his whole frame.] Lives, do you say? still lives? You will not wonder if I am astonished, while I listen to fables such as these.

De l'E. No, sir; struck as I see you are by this discovery, my only wonder is, that your emotions are not more terrible.

Dar. And who are you, who arrogantly presume to interpret looks? You, who attribute the crimes you first invent for sordid, selfish ends, and dare pronounce men guilty in the face of proof?

Fran. Not so; the proofs are ours.

Dar. Away! my nephew died in Paris.

Fran. Are you sure of that?

De l'E. Recollect, sir, that he is your nephew, and let your conscience answer. Were you present in his expiring moments? dare you deliberately affirm you saw him dead?

Dar. And do you know the man to whom you put these dishonourable and malignant questions?

Fran. Far otherwise:—we come not with malignity, but with sincere solicitude to save the father of St. Alme, the uncle of Julio, from public ignominy, and inevitable impending ruin.

Dar. Begone! And if you are vain enough to think your brawling eloquence has power to overthrow the credit and character of Darlemont, to annul a legal act, a formal register of death, exert that power: I hurl defiance at you.

Fran. Rush not on your destruction. Confide in us; and believe that, next to those just claims of which I am the assertor, nothing, no nothing, can be more sacred to me than the honour of the father of my friend.

Dar. My heart throws back the imputation. I dare your malice to produce one proof, that this supposititious founding is the descendant of the house of Harancour.

De l'E. A thousand! The time when he was found; his transport on re-entering this the loved place of his nativity; his emotion on first seeing this house,—

Fran. His infirmity; his striking likeness to the late President, his father; the declaration of poor Claudine;—

De l'E. His own declarations.

Dar. His declarations!

De l'E. His,—Be not too obstinately incredulous.

Fran. Yes; fostered by his humanity, and guided by his lessons, Julio has found in De l'Epée a more than father: genius has compensated the wrongs that nature did him, and made him, even in dumbness, eloquently intelligible.

Dar. Concerted fraud and artifice! I know my holds of safety, and despise your menace. His death is registered.

De l'E. Suppose that register a forgery.

Dar. [Aside.] So; then the villain has betrayed me!

De l'E. It staggers him; we triumph. [Aside to FRANVAL.] I see, your lips are ready to avow the secret of your heart. O, for your own sake, listen to the charities of nature.

Fran. Free yourself at once from the torments that too long have burrowed in your bosom.

Dar. Why do I submit to the ascendancy these men assume over me?

Fran. [Taking his hand.] Yield to our friendship.

De l'E. [Taking his other hand.] Yield to our prayers.

Dar. Leave me, I say—begone! Never will I acknowledge this impostor! [Going.]

Enter St. Alme.

St. A. O, my father, have compassion on me!—on yourself! my cousin Julio—

Dar. What, you conspire against me! St. Alme! St. Alme!

St. A. If I was ever dear to you—

Dar. Peace, fool! Join to calumniate your father, and defraud yourself!

[DE l'EPÉE sends FRANVAL out; he returns immediately.]

St. A. Do not, do not aggravate our dishonour! Relent, relent! Let me not hate myself by knowing that your affection for me led you into crimes, at which your soul revolts. Have I not witnessed the agonies of your despair—the horrors of your self-accusation? O, sir, do not make it believed that you justify the deeds, which I know you abhor.

Dar. Hence! for ever leave me! I can maintain my rights, though I am deserted by an unnatural son.

St. A. Since you will drive me from you, sir, I go—Enjoy your riches; but enjoy them in cheerless solitude: no child, no friend to share them. Where I shall hide this dishonoured head, I know not. But to haunt with savages, or dwell with lepers, will be paradise to that board, where a son and father must daily meet, blackened with mutual guilt, and consciously living under each other's contempt. [Going.]

Dar. Stay, ruffian! monster!—No, begone—league with the assassins of your father, and of your own hopes; I shall find means to confront you all. [Going.]

Enter Madame FRANVAL, THEODORE, and MARIANNE.

St. A. Confront this witness, too.

[Points to THEODORE.]

Dar. [Turns round and sees THEODORE.] Horror! madness! Hide me from his sight!

St. A. Turn to him—take him to you: his looks speak blessings and forgiveness.

Dar. To be disgraced—never! This is the very crisis of my fate, and I will stand the event. I do look on him. Is this your instrument? I know him not. And you at once decide your choice—Him, or me, you must renounce this instant.

[To St. ALME.]

St. A. Put me not to so severe a trial.

Dar. Enough—'Tis past—Farewell for ever.

[Going.]

St. A. [Falls on his knees, and catches DARLEMONT.] In the name of all that's sacred, my father! You heed me not!—You fly me!—Look on me, father!—For all our sakes—relent, relent!

Dar. Never, never.

St. A. O! sir! sir—I must be heard.

[Exit DARLEMONT in the greatest agony, dragging St. ALME on his knees. THEODORE all this while in the greatest agitation.]

De l'E. Obdurate man! Be still, be still, poor boy, you shall have justice yet.

Mad. F. Now, son; can you any longer hesitate? Fran. No; I should become criminal myself, if I delayed the execution of the trust reposed in me; this dreadful memorial must instantly be preferred.

[Takes the accusation from his pocket.]

Mar. Then we are lost for ever.

Enter DOMINIQUE and CLAUDEINE.

Mad. F. Well, Dominique: well, Claudine! Heyday! where are your companions?—What, have you brought none of the old servants with you?

Dom. It isn't for want of searching for them, madam. First, we called at Denys, the groom's;—he and his old wife went out early in the morning, nobody knows where.

Clau. Then we went to the coachman's widow.

Dom. She was gone to pass the day at her cousin's in the country. However, we told all the neighbours to be sure to tell them they were wanted, the moment they came back.

Fran. You took care to conceal the motive of our sending for them?

Dom. O, to be sure. You'll never catch me blabbing, when I'm trusted with a secret.

Fran. 'Tis well; wait without.

[Exeunt DOMINIQUE and CLAUDINE.]

The facts this paper contains will, I doubt not, excite the immediate attention and zeal of the magistrates. We must be gone. If St. Alme returns in our absence, calm and console him, I beseech you! You, Marianne, particularly—you, my sister, tell him what I undergo. But, come; a single moment of delay may—

[A noise within.]

Mar. Hark! hark! What noise?

De l'E. It is St. Alme.—Good heaven! in what agitation! in what alarm!

[Enter ST. ALME.]

St. A. O, sir!—My friend!—[Falls on FRANVAL.]

Fran. St. Alme!—Speak—speak—

St. A. My father—

Fran. Heavens!

St. A. My father—

De l'E. Go on.

St. A. Distracted by Julio's wrongs—I ran, I burst into the chamber with my father—Dupré followed, and at once owned he had revealed all to you; and was resolved (unless he did the young Count justice) by a public confession to make him the partner of his punishment. My father shuddered—maddening and agonized I drew my sword, and vowed, if he persisted to refuse his acknowledgment of Julio, that moment to expire on its point before his eyes. The dread of indelible disgrace—the cry of my despair—the horror of my death, prevailed—nature triumphed—my father relented—and with a trembling hand—there, there—

[Gives DE L'ÉPÉE a paper.]

De l'E. [Reads.] “I do acknowledge Theodore, the pupil of De l'Épée, to be Julio, the lawful Count of Harancour; and am prepared immediately to reinstate him in all his rights. Darlemont.” To thee, all-gracious heaven, be endless praise and thanks!

[Gives the paper to THEODORE.]

Fran. [Tearing the accusation to pieces.] From what a load is my heart relieved!

[THEODORE, having read the paper, throws himself at DE L'ÉPÉE's feet, and kisses him; rises transported, and embraces FRANVAL: then running towards ST. ALME, pauses, as if struck by some sudden thought; looks stead- fastly at him, and runs to the table, where he writes something under DARLEMONT's declaration.]

Fran. What would he do? What is his design?

De l'E. I know not.

Mad. F. He seems extremely moved.

Mar. How the tears stream from his eyes!

[THEODORE returns to ST. ALME, takes one of his hands and places it on his heart, then gives what he has been writing into his other hand, and makes signs to him to read it.]

St. A. [Reads.] “Half of my fortune must be yours, St. Alme—if you refuse me, I here vow again to disappear, and never more be heard of. From our cradles we were accustomed to share every good, like brothers—and I can never be happy at the expense of my friend.” Still the same noble Julio!

[Embraces THEODORE.]

De l'E. This single act overpays all I have done for him.

Mad. F. The very spirit of the old count.—He's his father's own son.

St. A. O, that I could efface the memory of thy wrongs! How shall I ever bear the weight of that recollection?

De l'E. [Looking at MARIANNE.] If this young lady would but kindly condescend to take a title to assist you, you might, perhaps—

Mad. F. Nay, nay; reflect, sir, that such an union would—

De l'E. Bless, for ever bless, two virtuous hearts, that heaven formed for each other, and make the happiness of this fortunate day complete.

Mad. F. I protest, I can't—really I don't know—

Fran. I am sure, madam—

Mad. F. Upon my word, son, you seem to persuade me to anything. [To ST. ALME.] You need not speak, sir; [To MARIANNE.] no, nor you, Marianne. The matter has been settled among you, I see, and now you pretend to ask my approbation: though, after that letter, I assure you, if you had not found a friend to whose intercession nothing can be refused, I should not have been prevailed with to give my consent.

[THEODORE, after a sign from DE L'ÉPÉE, kisses MARIANNE, and gives her hand to ST. ALME.]

St. A. O, joy unutterable!—

Mar. How are we all beholden to your goodness!

De l'E. 'Tis to the prudence of your brother, and to the fortitude of St. Alme, we owe our final triumph. [To ST. ALME.] Consoled by love, by friendship, and a father's return to virtue, all cause of regret may well be forgotten, sir; and let us hope, that the example of this protected orphan, may terrify the unjust man from the abuse of trust, and confirm the benevolent in the discharge of all the gentle duties of humanity.

[Exeunt.]

THE PADLOCK;

A COMIC OPERA, IN TWO ACTS,

BY ISAAC BICKERSTAFF.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

DON DIEGO
LEANDER
MUNGO
Two Scholars.

LEONORA
URSULA.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Garden belonging to Don Diego's House.

Enter DON DIEGO, musing.

AIR.—DIEGO.

Thoughts to council—let me see—

Hum—to be, or not to be

A husband, is the question.

A cuckold! must that follow?

Say what men will,

Wedlock's a pill,

Bitter to swallow,

And hard of digestion.

But fear makes the danger seem double:

Say, Hymen, what mischief can trouble

My peace, should I venture to try you?

My doors shall be lock'd,

My windows be block'd;

No male in my house,

Not so much as a mouse;

Then horns, horns, I defy you.

Enter URSULA.

Dieg. Ursula!

Urs. Here, an't please your worship.

Dieg. Where is Leonora?

Urs. In her chamber, sir.

Dieg. There is the key of it; there the key of the best hall; there the key of the door upon the first flight of stairs; there the key of the door upon the second; this double locks the hatch below; and this the door that opens into the entry.

Urs. I am acquainted with every ward of them.

Dieg. You know, Ursula, when I took Leonora from her father and mother, she was to live in the house with me three months; at the expiration of which time, I entered into a bond of four thousand pistoles, either to return her to them spotless, with half that sum for a dowry, or make her my true and lawful wife.

Urs. And, I warrant you, they came secretly to inquire of me, whether they might venture to trust your worship. Lord! said I, I have lived with the gentleman nine years and three quarters, come Lammas, and never saw anything uncivil by him in my life; nor no more I ever did; and to let your worship know, if I had, you would have mistaken your person; for I bless heaven, though I'm poor, I'm honest, and would not live with any man alive that should want to handle me unlawfully.

Dieg. Ursula, I do believe it; and you are particularly happy, that both your age and your person exempt you from any such temptation. But, be this as it will, Leonora's parents, after some little difficulty, consented to comply with my proposal; and, being fully satisfied with their daughter's temper and conduct, which I wanted to be acquainted with, this day being the expiration of the term, I am resolved to fulfil my bond, by marrying her to-morrow.

Urs. Heaven bless you together.

Dieg. During the time she has lived with me, she has never been a moment out of my sight: and now tell me, Ursula, what you have observed in her?

Urs. All meekness and gentleness, your worship; and yet, I warrant you, shrewd and sensible; egad! when she pleases, she can be as sharp as a needle.

Dieg. You have not been able to discover any particular attachments?

Urs. Why, sir, of late I have observed—

Dieg. Eh! how! what!

Urs. That she has taken greatly to the young kitten.

Dieg. O! is that all?

Urs. Ay, by my faith! I don't think she is fond of anything else.

Dieg. Of me, Ursula?

Urs. Ay, ay, of the kitten, and your worship, and her birds, and going to mass. I have taken notice of late, that she is mighty fond of going to mass, as your worship lets her, early of a morning.

Dieg. Well! I am now going to her parents, to let them know my resolution. I will not take her with me, because, having been used to confinement, and it being the life I am determined she shall lead, it will be only giving her a bad habit. I shall return with the good folks to-morrow morning; in the meantime, Ursula, I confide in your attention; and take care, as you would merit my favour.

Urs. I will, indeed, your worship; there is not a widow gentlewoman in all Salamanca fitter to look after a young maiden.

Dieg. Go, and send Leonora to me. [Exit URSULA.] I dreamt last night that I was going to church with Leonora to be married, and that we were met on the road by a drove of oxen. Oxen; I don't like oxen! I wish it had been a flock of sheep. [Exit.]

Enter LEONORA, with a bird on her finger, which she holds in the other hand by a string.

AIR.—LEONORA.

*Say, little foolish, fluttering thing,
Whither, ah! whither would you wing
Your airy flight?*

*Stay here, and sing,
Your mistress to delight.*

*No, no, no,
Sweet robin, you shall not go:
Where, you wanton, could you be Half so happy as with me?*

Re-enter DIEGO.

Dieg. Leonora!

Leon. Here I am.

Dieg. Look me in the face, and listen to me attentively.

Leon. There.

Dieg. I am going this evening to your father and mother, and I suppose you are not ignorant of the cause of my journey. Are you willing to be my wife?

Leon. I am willing to do whatever you and my father and mother please.

Dieg. But that's not the thing: do you like me?

Leon. Y—es.

Dieg. What do you sigh for?

Leon. I don't know.

Dieg. When you came hither, you were taken from a mean, little house, ill situated, and worse furnished; you had no servants, and were obliged, with your mother, to do the work yourself.

Leon. Yes, but when we had done, I could look out at the window, or go a walking in the fields.

Dieg. Perhaps you dislike confinement?

Leon. No, I don't, I am sure.

Dieg. I say, then, I took you from that mean habitation, and hard labour, to a noble building, and this fine garden; where, so far from being a slave, you are absolute mistress; and instead of wearing a mean stuff gown, look at yourself, I beseech you; the dress you have on is fit for a princess.

Leon. It's very fine, indeed.

Dieg. Well, Leonora, you know in what manner you have been treated since you have been my companion; ask yourself again now, whether you can be content to lead a life with me according to the specimen you have had.

Leon. Specimen!

Dieg. Ay, according to the manner I have treated you—according—

Leon. I'll do whatever you please.

Dieg. Then, my dear, give me a kiss.

Leon. Good bye to you.

Dieg. Here, Ursula!

SONG.—DIEGO.

*By some I am told
That I'm wrinkled and old;
But I will not believe what they say:
I feel my blood mounting,*

*Like streams in a fountain,
That merrily sparkle and play.*

For love I have will,

And ability still;

Odsbobs, I can scarcely refrain!

My diamond, my pearl,

Well, be a good girl,

Until I come to you again.

[Exit.]

Leon. Heigho! I think I am sick. He's very good to me, to be sure, and it's my duty to love him, because we ought not to be ungrateful; but I wish I was not to marry him for all that, though I'm afraid to tell him so. Fine feathers, they say, make fine birds; but I am sure they don't make happy ones; a sparrow is happier in the fields than a goldfinch in a cage. There is something makes me mighty uneasy. While he was talking to me, I thought I never saw anything look so ugly in my life. O dear now, why did I forget to ask leave to go to mass to-morrow? I suppose, because he's abroad, Ursula won't take me. I wish I had asked leave to go to mass.

SONG.—LEONORA.

*Were I a shepherd's maid, to keep
On yonder plains a flock of sheep,
Well pleas'd I'd watch the live-long day,
My ewes at feed, my lambs at play.
Or, would some bird, that pity brings,
But for a moment lend its wings,
My parents then might rave and scold,
My guardian strive my will to hold:
Their words are harsh, his walls are high,
But, spite of all, away I'd fly.* [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Street in Salamanca

Enter LEANDER and two Scholars, in their university gowns.

Leand. His name is Don Diego. There's his house, like another monastery, or rather prison; his servants are an ancient duenna, and a negro slave—

1 Schol. And after having lived fifty years a bachelor, this old fellow has picked up a young thing of sixteen, whom he by chance saw in a balcony!

2 Schol. And you are in love with the girl?

Leand. To desperation; and I believe I am not indifferent to her; for finding that her jealous guardian took her to the chapel of a neighbouring convent every morning before it was light, I went there in the habit of a pilgrim, planting myself as near as I could; I then varied my appearance, continuing to do so, from time to time, 'till I was convinced she had sufficiently remarked and understood my meaning.

1 Schol. Well, Leander, I'll say that for you, there is not a more industrious lad in the university of Salamanca, when a wench is to be ferreted.

2 Schol. But pr'ythee, tell us now, how did you get information?

Leand. First, from report, which raised my curiosity; and afterwards from the negro I just now mentioned. I observed that when the family were gone to bed, he often came to air himself at yonder grate. You know I am no bad chanter, nor a very scurvy minstrel; so taking a guitar, clapping a black patch on my eye, and a swathe upon one of my legs, I soon scraped acquaintance with my friend Mungo. He adores my songs and sarabands, and taking me for a poor cripple, often repays me with a share of his allowance, which I accept, to avoid suspicion.

1 Schol. And so—

Leand. And so, sir, he has told me all the secrets of his family; and one worth knowing: for he informed me last night, that his master will this evening take a short journey into the country, whence he proposes not to return 'till to-morrow, leaving his young wife, that is to be, behind him.

2 Schol. Zounds! let's scale the wall.

Leand. Fair and softly. I will this moment go and put on my disguise, watch for the Don's going out, attack my negro afresh, and try if, by his means, I cannot get into the house; or, at least, obtain a sight of my charming angel.

1 Schol. Angel! is she then so handsome?

Leand. It is time for us to withdraw: come to my chambers, and there you shall know all you can desire. [Exeunt two Scholars.]

SONG.—LEANDER.

*Hither, Venus, with your doves,
Hither, all ye little loves;
Round me light your wings display,
And bear a lover on his way.
Oh, could I but, like Jove of old,
Transform myself to show'ry go'd;
Or in a swan my passion shroud,
Or wrap it in an orient cloud;
What locks, what bars should then impede,
Or keep me from my charming maid?* [Exit.]

SCENE III.—The outside of Don Diego's house, which appears with windows barred up, and an iron grate before an entry.

Enter DON DIEGO from the house, having first unlocked the door, and removed two or three bars which assisted in fastening it.

Dieg. With the precautions I have taken, I think I run no risk in quitting my house for a short time. Leonora has never shewn the least inclination to deceive me; besides, my old woman is prudent and faithful, she has all the keys, and will not part with them from herself: but suppose—suppose—by the rood and St. Francis, I will not leave it in her power to do mischief. A woman's not having it in her power to deceive you is the best security for her fidelity, and the only one a wise man will confide in; fast bind, safe find, is an excellent proverb. I'll e'en lock her up with the rest; there is a hasp to the door, and I have a padlock within which shall be my guarantee; I will wait 'till the negro returns with the provisions he has gone to purchase; and clapping them all up together, make my mind easy by having the key they are under in my pocket. [Exit.]

Enter MUNGO, singing, with a hamper.

Mungo. [Sits down upon the hamper.] Go, get you down, you d—n hamper, you carry me now. Curse my old massa, sending me always here and dere for one something to make me tire like a mule—curse him impurance—and him d—n insuraunce.

Re-enter DON DIEGO.

Dieg. How now!

Mungo. [Rising.] Ah, massa, bless your heart.

Dieg. What's that you are muttering, sirrah?

Mungo. Nothing, massa, only me say, you very good massa.

Dieg. What do you leave your load there for?

Mungo. Massa, me lila tire.

Dieg. Take it up, rascal.

Mungo. Yes, bless your heart, massa.

Dieg. No, lay it down: now I think on't, come hither.

Mungo. What you say, massa?

Dieg. Can you be honest?

Mungo. Me no savee, massa, you never ax me before.

Dieg. Can you tell truth?

Mungo. What you give me, massa?

Dieg. There's a pistorren for you; now tell me, do you know of any ill going on in my house?

Mungo. Ah, massa, a d—n deal.

Dieg. How! that I'm a stranger to?

Mungo. No, massa, you lick me every day with your rattan; I'm sure, massa, that's mischief enough for poor neger-man.

Dieg. So, so.

Mungo. La! massa, how could you have a heart to lick poor neger-man, as you lick me last Thursday?

Dieg. If you have not a mind I should chastise you now, hold your tongue.

Mungo. Yes, massa, if you no lick me again.

Dieg. Listen to me, I say.

Mungo. You know, massa, me very good servant.

Dieg. Then you will go on?

Mungo. And ought to be use kine—

Dieg. If you utter another syllable—

Mungo. And I'm sure, massa, you can't deny but I worky worky. I dress a victuals, and run a errands, and wash a house, and make a beds, and scrub a shoes, and wait a table.

Dieg. [Beats him.] Take that. Now will you listen to me?

Mungo. La! massa, if ever I saw—

Dieg. I am going abroad, and shall not return 'till to-morrow morning. During this night I charge you not to sleep a wink, but be watchful as a lynx, and keep walking up and down the entry, that if you hear the least noise, you may alarm the family. Stay here, perverse animal, and take care that nobody approaches the door; I am going in, and shall be out again in a moment. [Exit into the house.]

Mungo. So I must be stay in a cold all night, and have no sleep, and get no tanks neither; den him call me tief, and rogue, and rascal, to tempt me.

SONG.—MUNGO.

Dear heart, what a terrible life am I led!

A dog has a better, that's shelter'd and fed:

Night and day 'tis de same,

My pains is dere game:

Me wish to de lord me was dead.

Whate'er's to be done,

Poor blacky must run;

Mungo here, Mungo dere,

Mungo every where;

Sirrah come, sirrah go;

Do so, and do so,

Oh! oh!

Me wish to de lord me was dead.

[Dieg having entered from the house during the song, MUNGO goes in, and appears to bolt the door on the inside.]

Dieg. [Unseen, puts on a large padlock.] That must do till I get a larger. [Exit.]

Enter LEANDER disguised.

Leand. So,—my old Argus is departed, and the evening is as favourable for my design as I could wish. Now to attract my friend Mungo; if he is within hearing of my guitar, I am sure he will quickly make his appearance.

Mungo appears at the grate.

Mungo. Who goes dere? Hip, hollo!

Leand. Heaven bless you, my worthy master, will your worship's honour have a little music this evening? and I have got a bottle of delicious cordial here, given me by a charitable monk of a convent hard by, if your grace will please to taste it.

Mungo. Give me a sup tro a grate: come closee, man; don't be fear; old massa gone out, as I say last night, and he no come back before to-morrow; come, try moosic, and give us song.

Leand. I'll give your worship a song I learned in Barbary when I was a slave among the Moors.

Mungo. Ay, do.

Leand. There was a cruel and malicious Turk, who was called Heli Abdalah Mahomet Schah; now this wicked Turk had a fair Christian slave named Jezabel, who not consenting to his beastly desires, he draws out his sabre, and is going to cut off her head; here's what he says to her.—[Sings and plays.] Now you shall hear the slave's answer.—[Sings and plays again.—Now you shall hear how the wicked Turk, being greatly enraged, is again going to cut off the fair slave's head. Now you shall hear—

Mungo. What signify me hear? Me no understand.

Leand. Oh, you want something you understand? If your honour had said that—

Enter URSULA at the window.

Urs. Mungo! Mungo!

Mungo. Some one call dere—

Urs. Mungo! I say.

Mungo. What devil you want?

Urs. What lewd noise is that?

Mungo. Lewd you self, no lewd here; play away, never mind her.

Urs. I shall come down if you go on.

Mungo. Ay, come along, more merrier; nothing here but poor man, he sing for bit of bread.

Urs. I'll have no poor man near our door; barkye, fellow, can you play the "Forsaken Maid's Delight," or "Black Bess of Castile?" Ah, Mungo, if you had heard me sing when I was young.

Mungo. Gad! I'm sure, I hear your voice often enough now you old.

Urs. I could quaver like any blackbird.

Mungo. And now you grunt like an old sow. Come, throw a poor soul a penny, he play a tune for you.

Urs. How did you lose the use of your leg?

Leand. In the wars, my good dame: I was taken by a Barbary corsair, and carried into Sallee, where I lived eleven years and three quarters upon cold water and the roots of the earth, without having a coat on my back, or laying my head on a pillow: an infidel bought me for a slave: he gave me the strappado on my shoulders, and the bastinado on the soles of my feet: now this infidel Turk had fifty-three wives, and one hundred and twelve concubines.

Urs. Then he was an unreasonable villain.

Mungo. How many wives had he?

Leand. Fifty-three wives, and one hundred and twelve concubines.

Mungo. Poor man! what de devil did he do wid dem all?

Enter LEONORA at the window.

Leon. Ursula!

Urs. Od's my life, what's here to do! Go back, go back; fine work we shall have indeed; good man, good bye.

Leon. I could not stay any longer by myself; pray let me take a little air at the grate.

Leand. Do, worthy madam, let the young gentlewoman stay; I'll play her a love song for nothing.

Urs. No, no, none of your love songs here; if you could play a saraband indeed, and there was room for one's motion—

Leand. I am but a poor man; but if your ladyship will let me in as far as the hall or the kitchen, you may all dance, and I sha'n't ask any thing.

Urs. Why, if it was not on my master's account, I should think no harm in a little innocent recreation.

Mungo. Do, and let us dance.

Leand. Has madam the keys then?

Urs. Yes, yes, I have the keys.

Leand. Have you the key of this padlock too, madam? Here's a padlock upon the door, heaven help us! large enough for a state prison.

Urs. Eh,—how,—what! a padlock!

Mungo. Here it is, I feel it; adod! it's a tumper.

Urs. He was afraid to trust me then.

Mungo. And if de house was a fire, we none of us get out to save ourselves.

Leand. Well, madam, not to disappoint you and the young lady, I know the back of your garden-wall, and I'll undertake to get up at the outside of it, if you can let me down on the other.

Urs. Do you think you could with your lame leg?

Leand. O yes, madam, I'm very sure.

Urs. Then, by my faith, you shall; for now I am set on't!—A padlock! Mungo, come with me into the garden. [Exit with MUNGO.]

Leon. Pray let me go with you.

Leand. Stay, charming creature; why will you fly the youth that adores you?

Leon. O, lord! I'm frightened out of my wits!

Leand. Have you not taken notice, beautous Leonora, of the pilgrim who has so often met you at church? I am that pilgrim; one who would change shapes as often as Proteus, to be blessed with a sight of you.

Re-enter MUNGO and URSULA.

QUARTETTO.

LEANDER, LEONORA, URSULA, and MUNGO.

Leand. O thou whose charms enslave my heart,
In pity hear a youth complain.

Leon. I must not hear—dear youth, depart—
I'm certain I have no desert
A gentleman like you to gain.

Leand. Then do I seek your love in vain?

Leon. It is another's right;

Leand. And he,
Distracting thought! must happy be,
While I am doom'd to pain.

Urs. Come round, young man, I've been to try
Mung. And so have I.

All. I'm sure the wall is not too high.
If you please,

Leand. You'll mount with ease,
Can you to aid my bliss deny?
Shall it be so?

Urs. If you say no,
I will not go.

Leon. I must consent, however loath;
But, whenever we desire,
Make him promise to retire.

Urs. Nay, marry, he shall take his oath.

Leand. By your eyes of heavenly blue;
By your lips' ambrosial dew;
Your cheeks, where rose and lily blend;
Your voice, the music of the spheres—

Mung. *Lord a' mercy, how he swears !
He makes my hairs
All stand on end !*

Urs. Come, that's enough ; ascend, ascend.

All. *Let's be happy while we may ;
Now the old one's far away ;
Laugh, and sing, and dance, and play ;
Harmless pleasure why delay ?*

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Hall in Don Diego's house, with folding-doors, which open in the back scene. On one side a stair-case, leading to an apartment ; on the other, a door leading to a cellar. A table with a bottle and glass, two candles, a guitar, and LEANDER'S disguise, placed upon it.

Enter LEANDER in a rich habit, following URSULA.

Urs. Oh ! shame ; out upon't, sir ; talk to me no more. I, that have been famed throughout all Spain, as I may say, for virtue and discretion ; the very flower and quintessence of duennas ;—you have cast a blot upon me ; a blot upon my reputation, that was as fair as a piece of white paper ; and now I shall be reviled, pointed at, nay, men will call me filthy names upon your account.

Leand. What filthy names will they call you ?

Urs. They'll say I'm an old procuress.

Leand. Fie ! fie ! men know better things. Besides, though I have got admittance into your house, be assured I shall commit no outrage here ; and if I have been guilty of any indiscretion, let love be my excuse.

Urs. Well, as I live, he's a pretty young fellow.

Leand. You, my sweet Ursula, have known what it is to be in love ; and, I warrant, have had admirers often at your feet ; your eyes still retain fire enough to tell me that.

Urs. They tell you no lie ; for, to be sure, when I was a young woman, I was greatly sought after ; nay, it was reported that a youth died for love of me ; one Joseph Perez, a tailor by trade ; of the greyhound make, lank, and if my memory fail me not, his right shoulder about the breadth of my hand higher than his left ; but he was as upright as an arrow ; and, by all accounts, one of the finest workmen at a button-hole !—

Leand. But where is Leonora ?

Urs. Where is she ? By my troth, I have shut her up in her chamber, under three bolts and a double lock.

Leand. And will you not bring us together ?

Urs. Who, I ? How can you ask me such a question ? Really, sir, I take it extremely unkind.

Leand. Well, but you misapprehend—

Urs. I told you just now, that if you mentioned that to me again, it would make me sick ; and so it has, turned me upside down as it were.

Leand. Ursula, take this gold.

Urs. For what, sir ?

Leand. Only for the love of me.

Urs. Nay, if that be all, I won't refuse it, for I love you, I assure you ; you put me so much in mind of my poor dear husband ; he was a handsome man ; I remember he had a mole between his eye-brows, about the bigness of a hazel-nut ; but, I must say, you have the advantage in the lower part of the countenance.

Leand. The old beldam grows amorous. [Aside.]

Urs. Lord love you ! you're a well-looking young man.

Leand. But Leonora—

Urs. Ha, ha, ha ! but to pretend you were lame. —I never saw a finer leg in my life.

Leand. Leonora—

Urs. Well, sir, I'm going.

Leand. I shall never get rid of her. [Aside.]

Urs. Sir !

Leand. How now ?

Urs. Would you be so kind, sir, as to indulge me with the favour of a salute ?

Leand. Ugh !

Urs. Gad-a-mercy, your cheek ! Well, well. I have seen the day—but no matter, my wine's upon the lees now ; however, sir, you might have had the politeness when a gentlewoman made the offer.—But heaven bless you ! [Exit.]

Enter MUNGO.

Mungo. Ah ! massa ! You brave massa, now ; what you do here wid de old woman ?

Leand. Where is your young mistress, Mungo ?

Mungo. By gog, she lock her up. But why you no tell me before time, you a gentleman ?

Leand. Sure I have not given the purse for nothing.

Mungo. Purse ! what, you giving her money den ? Curse her imperance ; why you no give it me ? You give me something, as well as she. You know, massa, you see me first.

Leand. There, there, are you content ? [Giving him money.]

Mungo. Me get supper ready, and now me go to de cellar. But I say, massa, ax de old man now, what good him watching do, him bolts, and him bars, him walls, and him padlock ?

Leand. Hist ! Leonora comes. [Exit.]

Mungo. But, massa, you say you teach me play.

SONG.—MUNGO.

*Let me, when my heart a sinking,
Hear de sweet guitar a clinking ;
When a string speak,
Such moosic he make,
Me soon am cur'd of tinkling.
Wid de toot, toot, toot,
Of a merry flute,
And cymbalo,
And tymbalo
To toot,
We dance and we sing,
Till we make a house ring,
And, tied in his garters, old massa may swing.
[Exit at cellar door.]*

SCENE II.—Interior of Don Diego's house.

Enter LEANDER, LEONORA, and URSULA.

Leand. Oh, charming Leonora ! how shall I express the rapture of my heart upon this occasion ? I almost doubt the kindness of that chance which has brought me thus happily to see, to speak to you, without restraint.

Urs. Well, but it must not be without restraint ; it can't be without restraint ; it can't, by my faith ; now you are going to make me sick again.

Leon. La ! Ursula, I dare say the gentleman doesn't want to do me any harm—Do you, sir ? I'm sure, I would not hurt a hair of his head, nor nobody's else, for the lucre of the whole world.

Urs. Come, sir, where's your lute? You shall see me dance a saraband; or if you'd rather have a song—or the child and I will move a minuet, if you choose grace before agility.

Leand. This fulsome harriard—

Leon. I don't know what's come over her, sir; I never saw the like of her since I was born.

Leand. I wish she was at the devil.

Leon. Ursula, what's the matter with you?

Urs. What's the matter with me! Marry come up! what's the matter with you? Signor Diego can't shew such a shape as that; well, there is nothing I like better than to see a young fellow with a well-made leg.

Leand. Pr'ythee let us go away from her.

Leon. I don't know how to do it, sir.

Leand. Nothing more easy; I will go with my guitar into the garden; 'tis moonlight: take an opportunity to follow me there; I swear to you, beautiful and innocent creature, you have nothing to apprehend.

Leon. No, sir, I am certain of that, with a gentleman such as you are: and that have taken so much pains to come after me; and I should hold myself very ungrateful, if I did not do anything to oblige you, in a civil way.

Leand. Then you'll come?

Leon. I'll do my best endeavours, sir.

Leand. And may I hope that you love me?

Leon. I don't know; as to that I can't say.

Urs. Come, come, what colloquing's here; I must see how things are going forward; besides, sir, you ought to know that it is not manners to be getting into corners, and whispering, before company.

Leand. Psha!

Urs. Ay, you may say your pleasure, sir, but I'm sure what I say is the right thing; I should hardly choose to venture in a corner with you myself; nay, I would not do it, I protest and vow.

Leand. Beautiful Leonora, I find my being depends upon the blessing of your good opinion; do you desire to put an end to my days?

Leon. No, indeed; indeed, I don't.

Leand. But then—

SONG.—LEANDER.

*In vain you bid your captive live,
While you the means of life deny;
Give me your smiles, your wishes give
To him who must without you die.*

*Shut from the sun's enlivening beam,
Bid flow'rs retain their scent and hue;
Its source dry'd up, bid flow the stream,
And me exist, depriv'd of you.* [Exit.

Urs. Come hither, child, I am going to give you good advice, therefore listen to me, for I have more years over my head than you.

Leon. Well, and what then?

Urs. What then! Marry, then you must mind what I say to you. As I said before—but I say—what was I saying?

Leon. I'm sure I don't know.

Urs. You see the young man that is gone out there; he has been telling me, that he's dying for love of you; can you find in your heart to let him expire?

Leon. I'm sure I won't do anything bad.

Urs. Why that's right; you learned that from me; have I not said to you a thousand times, never do anything bad? Have I not said it? Answer me that.

Leon. Well, and what then?

Urs. Very well, listen to me: your guardian is old, and ugly, and jealous, and yet he may live longer than a better man.

Leon. He has been very kind to me, for all that, Ursula! and I ought to strive to please him.

Urs. There again: have I not said to you a thousand times, that he was very kind to you, and you ought to strive to please him? It would be a hard thing to be preaching from morning 'till night without any profit.

Leon. Well, Ursula, after all, I wish this gentleman had never got into the house; heaven send no ill comes of it!

Urs. Ay, I say so too; heaven send it! but I'm cruelly afraid: for how shall we get rid of him? he'll never be able to crawl up the inside of the wall, whatever he did the out.

Leon. O lord! won't he?

Urs. No, by my conscience, won't he; and when your guardian comes in, if we had fifty necks a-piece, he'd twist them every one, if he finds him here; for my part, the best I expect is, to end my old days in a prison.

Leon. You don't say so?

Urs. I do, indeed; and it kills me to think of it; but every one has their evil day, and this has been mine.

Leon. I have promised to go to him in the garden.

Urs. Nay, you may do any thing now, for we are undone; though I think, if you could persuade him to get up the chimney, and stay on the roof of the house until to-morrow night, we might then steal the keys from your guardian; but I am afraid you won't be able to persuade him.

Leon. I'll go down upon my knees.

Urs. Find him out, while I step up stairs.

Leon. Pray for us, dear Ursula.

Urs. I will, if I possibly can.

SONG.—LEONORA.

*Oh me! oh me! what shall we do?
The fault is all along of you;
You brought him in, why did you so?
'Twas not by my desire, you know.
We have but too much cause to fear;
My guardian, when he comes to hear
We've had a man with us, will kill
Me, you, and all; indeed he will.
No penitence will pard'n procure,
He'll kill us ev'ry soul, I'm sure.*

[Re-enter LEONORA and URSULA.]

Enter DON DIEGO, groping his way, with a padlock in his hand.

Dieg. All dark, all quiet; gone to bed and fast asleep, I warrant them; however, I am not sorry that I altered my first intention of staying out the whole night; and meeting Leonora's father on the road was, at any rate, a lucky incident. I will not disturb them; but, since I have let myself in with my own master-key, go softly to bed; I shall be able to strike a light; and then I think I may say, my cares are over. Good heavens! what a wonderful deal of uneasiness may mortals avoid by a little prudence! I doubt not now, there are some men who would have gone out in my situation, and, trusting to the goodness of fortune, left their house and their honour in the care of an unexperienced girl, or the discretion of a mercenary servant. But what do I do to—I put a padlock on my door, and all is safe.

Enter MUNGO from a cellar, with a flask in one hand, and a candle in the other.

Mungo. Tol, lol, lol, lol.

Dieg. Hold, didn't I hear a noise?
Mungo. Hola!
Dieg. Heaven and earth! what do I see?
Mungo. Where are you, young massa and missy: here wine for supper.
Dieg. I'm thunder struck!
Mungo. My old massa little tink we be so merry—hic—hic—what's the matter wid me? the room turn round.
Dieg. Wretch, do you know me?
Mungo. Know you? D—n you.
Dieg. Horrid creature! what makes you here at this time of night? Is it with a design to surprise the innocents in their beds, and murder them sleeping?
Mungo. Hush, hush! make no noise—hic—hic.
Dieg. The slave is intoxicated.
Mungo. Make no noise, I say; dere's young gentleman wid young lady; he play on guitar, and she like him better dan she like you. Fal, lal, lal.
Dieg. Monster, I'll make an example of you.
Mungo. What you call me names for, you old dog?
Dieg. Does the villain dare to lift his hand against me?
Mungo. Will you fight?
Dieg. He's mad.
Mungo. Dere's one in de house you little tink. Gad! he do you business.
Diego. Go, lie down in your sty, and sleep.
Mungo. Sleep, sleep yourself; you drunk—ha, ha, ha! Look, a padlock: you put a padlock on a door again, will you? Ha, ha, ha!
Dieg. Didn't I hear music?
Mungo. Hic—hic—
Dieg. Was it not the sound of a guitar?
Mungo. Yes; he play on de guitar rarely. Give me hand; you're old rascal, a'n't you?
Dieg. What dreadful shock affects me? I'm in a cold sweat; a mist comes over my eyes; and my knees knock together as if I had got a fit of the shaking palsy.
Mungo. I tell you a word in your ear.
Dieg. Has any stranger broken into my house?
Mungo. Yes, by—hic—a fine young gentleman; he now in a next room with missy.
Dieg. Holy Saint Francis! is it possible?
Mungo. Go you round softly: you catch them together.
Dieg. Confusion! Distraction! I shall run mad!

SONG.—DIEGO.

*Oh, wherefore this terrible flurry?
 My spirits are all in a hurry!
 And above and below,
 From my top to my toe,
 Are running about hurry scurry.
 My heart in my bosom a bumping,
 Goes lumping,
 And jumping,
 And thumping;
 Is't a spectre I see?
 Hence! vanish!—Ah me!
 My senses deceive me;
 Soon reason will leave me;
 What a wretch am I destin'd to be!* [Exit.

Enter URSULA.

Urs. O shame! monstrous! you drunken swab, you have been in the cellar, with a plague to you.
Mungo. Let me put my hands about your neck—
Urs. Oh, I shall be ruined! Help, help! ruin, ruin!—

Enter LEANDER and LEONORA.

Leon. Goodness me! what's the matter?
Urs. O dear child, this black villain has frightened me out of my wits; he has wanted—
Mungo. Me! curse a heart! I want nothing wid her. What she say I want for—Leon. Ursula, the gentleman says he has some friends waiting for him at the other side of the garden-wall, that will throw him over a ladder made of ropes, which he got up by.

DUET.

Leand. Then must I go?
Leon. Yes, good sir, yes.
Leand. A parting kiss?
Leon. No, good sir, no.
Leand. It must be so.
*By this, and this,
 Here I could for ever grow.
 'Tis more than mortal bliss.*
Leon. Well, now good night:
*Pray ease our fright,
 You're very bold, sir;
 Let loose your hold, sir;
 I think you want to scare me quite.*
Leand. Oh, fortune's spite!
Leon. Good night, good night.

Enter DON DIEGO.

Dieg. Stay, sir; let nobody go out of the room.
Urs. [Falling down.] Ah! ah! a ghost! a ghost!
Dieg. Woman, stand up. Leonora, what am I to think of this?
Leon. Oh, dear sir! don't kill me.
Dieg. Young man, who are you, who have thus clandestinely, at an unseasonable hour, broken into my house? Am I to consider you as a robber, or how?
Leand. As one whom love has made indiscreet; as one whom love taught industry and art to compass his designs. I love the beautiful Leonora, and she me; but, further than what you hear and see, neither one nor the other have been culpable.
Mungo. Hear him, hear him.
Leand. Don Diego, you know my father well,—Don Alphonso de Luna; I am a scholar of this university, and am willing to submit to whatever punishment he, through your means, shall inflict; but break not your vengeance here. [Pointing to LEONORA.]
Dieg. Thus, then, my hopes and cares are at once frustrated. Possessed of what I thought a jewel, I was desirous to keep it for myself; I left my watch for one little moment, and in that moment—
Leon. Pray, pray, guardian, let me tell you the story, and you'll find I am not to blame.
Dieg. No, child, I only am to blame, who should have considered that sixteen and sixty agree ill together. But, though I was too old to be wise, I am not too old to learn; and so, I say, send for a smith directly; beat all the grates from my windows, take the locks from my doors, and let egress and regress be given freely.
Leon. And will you be my husband, sir?
Dieg. No, child, I will give you to one that will make you a better husband. Here, young man, take her: if your parents consent, to-morrow shall see you joined in the face of the church; and the dowry which I promised her, in case of failure on my side of the contract, shall now go with her as a marriage portion.

Leand. Signor, this is so generous—

Dieg. No thanks. Perhaps I owe acknowledgments to you ! but you, Ursula, have no excuse, no passion to plead, and your age should have taught you better. I'll give you five hundred crowns, but never let me see you more.

Mungo. And what you give me, massa ?

Dieg. Bastinadoes for your drunkenness and infidelity. Oh, man ! man ! how short is your foresight ; how ineffectual your prudence ; while the very means you use are destructive of your ends !

FINALE.

Dieg. Go, forge me fetters that shall bind
The rage of the tempestuous wind ;
Sound with a needle-full of thread
The depth of ocean's steepy bed ;
Snap like a twig the oak's tough tree :
Quench Etna with a cup of tea ;

*In these manœuvres shew your skill,
Then hold a woman if you will.*

Mung. And massa, be not angry, pray,
If neger man a word should say ;
Me have a fable pat as she,
Which wid dis matter will agree :
An owl once took it in his head,
Wid some young, pretty birds to wed ;
But when his worship came to woo,
He could get none but de cuckoo.

Leon. Ye youth select, who wish to taste
The joys of wedlock pure and chaste,
Ne'er let the mistress and the friend
In abject slave, and tyrant, end.
While each with tender passion burns,
Ascend the throne of rule by turns :
And place, to love, to virtue just Security in mutual trust.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Garden, with statues, fountains, and flower-pots.

Several arbours appear in the side-scenes; ROSETTA and LUCINDA are discovered at work, seated on two garden chairs.

DUET.

Ros. *Hope! thou nurse of young desire,
Fairy promiser of joy,
Painted vapour, glow-worm fire,
Temperate sweet, that ne'er can cloy.*

Luc. *Hope! thou earnest of delight,
Safest soother of the mind,
Balmy cordial, prospect bright,
Surest friend the wretched find.*

Both. *Kind deceiver, flatter still,
Deal out pleasures unpossest;
With thy dreams my fancy fill,
And in wishes make me blest.*

Luc. Heigho! Rosetta!

Ros. Well, child, what do you say?

Luc. 'Tis a cruel thing to live in a village a hundred miles from the capital, with a preposterous gouty father, and a superannuated maiden aunt. I am heartily sick of my situation.

Ros. And with reason; but 'tis in a great measure your own fault. Here is this Mr. Eustace, a man of character and family: he likes you, you like him; you know one another's minds, and yet you'll not resolve to make yourself happy with him.

AIR.

*Whence can you inherit
So slavish a spirit?
Confin'd thus, and chain'd to a log?
Now fondled, now chid,
Permitted, forbid:
'Tis leading the life of a dog.
For shame! you a lover!
More firmness discover;
Take courage, nor here longer mope:
Resist and be free,
Run riot, like me,
And, to perfect the picture, elope.*

Luc. And is this your advice?

Ros. Positively.

Luc. Here's my hand; positively, I'll follow it. I have already sent to my gentleman, who is now in the country, to let him know he may come hither this day; we will make use of the opportunity to settle all preliminaries, and then—but take notice, whenever we decamp, you march off along with us.

Ros. Oh! madam, your servant; I have no inclination to be left behind, I assure you. But you say you got acquainted with this spark, while you were with your mother during her last illness at Bath, so that your father has never seen him.

Luc. Never in his life, my dear; and, I am confident, he entertains not the least suspicion of my having any such connexion: my aunt, indeed, has her doubts and surmises; but, besides that my father will not allow any one to be wiser than himself it is an established maxim between these affectionate relations, never to agree in any thing.

Ros. Except being absurd; you must allow they sympathize perfectly in that. But, now we are on the subject, I desire to know what I am to do with this wicked old justice of peace, this father of yours? He follows me about the house like a tame goat.

Luc. Nay, I'll assure you he hath been a wag in his time; you must have a care of yourself.

Ros. Wretched me! to fall into such hands, who have been just forced to run away from my parents to avoid an odious marriage. You smile at that now; and I know you think me whimsical, as you have often told me; but you must excuse my being a little over-delicate in this particular.

AIR.

*My heart's my own, my will is free,
And so shall be my voice;
No mortal man shall wed with me,
Till first he's made my choice.*

*Let parents rule, cry nature's laws,
And children still obey;
And is there then no saving clause,
Against tyrannic sway?*

Luc. Well, but my dear, mad girl—

Ros. Lucinda, don't talk to me. Were your father to go to London, meet there by accident with an old fellow as wrong-headed as himself, and in a fit of absurd friendship, agree to marry you to that old fellow's son, whom you had never seen, without consulting your inclinations or allowing you a negative, in case he should not prove agreeable—

Luc. Why, I should think it a little hard, I confess; yet, when I see you in the character of a chambermaid—

Ros. It is the only character, my dear, in which I could hope to lie concealed; and, I can tell you, I was reduced to the last extremity, when in consequence of our old boarding-school friendship, I applied to you to receive me in this capacity; for we expected the parties the very next week.

Luc. But had not you a message from your intended spouse, to let you know he was as little inclined to such ill-concerted nuptials as you were?

Ros. More than so; he wrote to advise me, by all means, to contrive some method of breaking them off; for he had rather return to his dear studies at Oxford: and after that, what hopes could I have of being happy with him?

Luc. Then you are not at all uneasy at the strange rout you must have occasioned at home? I warrant, during this month you have been absent—

Ros. Oh! don't mention it, my dear; I have had so many admirers, since I commenced Abigail, that I am quite charmed with my situation. But hold; who stalks yonder in the yard, that the dogs are so glad to see?

Luc. Daddy Hawthorn, as I live! He is come to pay my father a visit; and never more luckily, for he always forces him abroad. By the way, what will you do with yourself while I step into the house to see after my trusty messenger, Hodge?

Ros. No matter; I'll sit down in that arbour, and listen to the singing of the birds: you know I am fond of melancholy amusements.

Luc. So it seems, indeed: sure, Rosetta, none of your admirers had power to touch your heart; you are not in love, I hope?

Ros. In love! that's pleasant: who do you suppose I should be in love with, pray?

Luc. Why, let me see; what do you think of Thomas, our gardener? There he is at the other end of the walk. He's a pretty young man, and the servants say, he's always writing verses on you.

Ros. Indeed, Lucinda, you are very silly.

Luc. Indeed, Rosetta, that blush makes you look very handsome.

Ros. Blush! I am sure I don't blush.

Luc. Ha, ha, ha!

Ros. Psha! Lucinda, how can you be so ridiculous?

Luc. Well, don't be angry, and I have done. But suppose you did like him, how could you help yourself?

[Exeunt into arbour.]

Enter Young MEADOWS.

Young M. Let me see; on the fifteenth of June, at half an hour past five in the morning, [Taking out a pocket-book.] I left my father's house unknown to any one, having made free with a coat and jacket of our gardener's that fitted me, by way of a disguise; so says my pocket-book: and chance directing me to this village, on the twentieth of the same month I procured a recommendation to the worshipful justice Woodcock, to be the superintendent of his pumpkins and cabbages, because I would let my father see, I chose to run any lengths, rather than submit to what his obstinacy would have forced me to, a marriage against my inclination with a woman I never saw. [Puts up the book, and takes up a watering-pot.] Here I have been three weeks, and in that time I am as much altered as if I had changed my nature with my habit. 'Sdeath! to fall in love with a chambermaid! And yet, if I could forget that I am the son and heir of sir William Meadows—But that's impossible.

AIR.

*O! had I been by fate decreed
Some humble cottage swain,
In fair Rosetta's sight to feed
My sheep upon the plain!
What bliss had I been born to taste,
Which now I ne'er must know!
Ye envious powers! why have ye plac'd
My fair one's lot so low?*

Ha! who was it I had a glimpse of as I passed by that arbour? Was it not she sat reading there? The trembling of my heart tells me my eyes were not mistaken. Here she comes.

Enter ROSETTA, from the arbour.

Ros. Lucinda was certainly in the right of it; and yet I blush to own my weakness, even to myself. Marry, hang the fellow for not being a gentleman.

Young M. I am determined not to speak to her. [Turning to a rose-tree, and plucking the flowers.] Now or never is the time to conquer myself; besides, I have some reason to suppose the girl has no aversion to me; and, as I wish not to do her an injury, it would be cruel to fill her head with notions of what can never happen. [Hums a tune.] Psha! rot these roses, how they prick one's fingers!

Ros. He takes no notice of me, but so much the better; I'll be as indifferent as he is. I am sure the poor lad likes me; and, if I were to give him any encouragement, I suppose the next thing he talked of would be buying a ring, and being asked in church. Oh, dear pride! I thank you for that thought.

Young M. Ha! going without a word—a look! I can't bear that. Mrs. Rosetta, I am gathering a few roses here, if you please to take them in with you.

Ros. Thank you, Mr. Thomas, but all my lady's flower-pots are full.

Young M. Will you accept of them yourself, then? [Catching hold of her.] What's the matter? you look as if you were angry with me.

Ros. Pray let go my hand.

Young M. Nay, pr'ythee, why is this? you sha'n't go, I have something to say to you.

Ros. Well, but I must go—I will go; I desire, Mr. Thomas—

AIR.

*Gentle youth, ah, tell me why
Still you force me thus to fly?*

*Cease, Oh! cease to persevere!
 Speak not what I must not hear:
 To my heart its ease restore;
 Go, and never see me more.* [Exit.

Young M. This girl is a riddle. That she loves me I think there is no room to doubt; she takes a thousand opportunities to let me see it: and yet, when I speak to her, she will hardly give me an answer; and, if I attempt the smallest familiarity, she is gone in an instant. I feel my passion grow for her every day more and more violent. Well; would I marry her? would I make a mistress of her, if I could? Two things, called prudence and honour, forbid either. What am I pursuing, then? A shadow. Sure my evil genius laid this snare in my way. However, there is one comfort: it is in my power to fly from it; if so, why do I hesitate? I am distracted—unable to determine anything.

AIR.

*Still in hopes to get the better
 Of my stubborn flame I try;
 Swear this moment to forget her,
 And the next my oath deny.
 Now, prepared with scorn to treat her,
 Ev'ry charm in thought I brave;
 Boast my freedom, fly to meet her,
 And confess myself a slave.* [Exit.

SCENE II.—A Hall in Justice Woodcock's house.

Enter HAWTHORN, with a fowling-piece in his hand, and a net with birds at his girdle.

AIR.

*There was a jolly miller once,
 Liv'd on the river Dee;
 He work'd and sung from morn till night;
 No lark more blithe than he:
 And this the burthen of his song
 For ever used to be:—
 I care for nobody, no, not I,
 If nobody cares for me.*

House! Here, house! What, all gadding, all abroad! House, I say! hilli-ho, ho!

Justice W. [Without.] Here's a noise, here's a racket! William, Robert, Hodge! why does not somebody answer? Ods-my-life, I believe the fellows have lost their hearing!

Enter JUSTICE WOODCOCK.

Oh, master Hawthorn! I guessed it was some such mad cap. Are you there?

Haw. Am I here? Yes: and, if you had been where I was three hours ago, you would have found the good effects of it by this time: but you have got the lazy, unwholesome London fashion of lying a-bed in a morning, and there's gout for you. Why, sir, I have not been in bed five minutes after sunrise these thirty years: am generally up before it; and I never took a dose of physic but once in my life, and that was in compliment to a cousin of mine, an apothecary, that had just set up business.

Jus. W. Well but, master Hawthorn, let me tell you, you know nothing of the matter; for, I say, sleep is necessary for a man; ay, and I'll maintain it.

Haw. What, when I maintain the contrary?—Look you, neighbour Woodcock, you are a rich man, a man of worship, a justice of peace, and all that; but learn to know the respect that is due to the sound from the infirm; and allow me that superiority, a good constitution gives me over you.—Health is the greatest of all possessions; and, 'tis a maxim with me, that a hale cobbler is a better man than a sick king.

Jus. W. Well, well, you are a sportsman.

Haw. And so would you be too, if you would take my advice. A sportsman! why, there is nothing like it. I would not exchange the satisfaction I feel, while I am beating the lawns and thickets about my little farm, for all the entertainment and pageantry in Christendom.

AIR.

*Let gay ones and great
 Make the most of their fate,
 From pleasure to pleasure they run;
 Well, who cares a jot?
 I envy them not,
 While I have my dog and my gun.
 For exercise, air,
 To the fields I repair,
 With spirits unclouded and light;
 The blisses I find
 No stings leave behind,
 But health and diversion unite.*

Enter HODGE.

Hodge. Did your worship call, sir?

Jus. W. Call, sir! Where have you and the rest of the rascals been? but I suppose I need not ask. You must know there is a statute, a fair for hiring servants, held upon my green to-day; we have it usually at this season of the year, and it never fails to put all the folks hereabout out of their senses.

Hodge. Lord, your honour, look out, and see what a nice show they make yonder: they had got pipers, and fiddlers, and were dancing as I came along, for dear life.—I never saw such a mortal throng in our village in all my born days again.

Haw. Why, I like this now; this is as it should be.

Jus. W. No, no, 'tis a very foolish piece of business; good for nothing but to promote idleness, and the getting of bastards; but I shall take measures for preventing it another year, and I doubt whether I am not sufficiently authorized already; for, by an act passed Anno undecimo Caroli primi, which empowers a justice of peace, who is lord of the manor—

Haw. Come, come, never mind the act; let me tell you, this is a very proper, a very useful meeting. I want a servant or two myself: I must go see what your market affords; and you shall go, and the girls, my little Lucy and the other young rogue, and we'll make a day on't as well as the rest.

Jus. W. I wish, master Hawthorn, I could teach you to be a little more sedate: why won't you take pattern by me, and consider your dignity? Ods heart, I don't wonder you are not a rich man; you laugh too much ever to be rich.

Haw. Right, neighbour Woodcock! health, good humour, and competence, is my motto: and, if my executors have a mind, they are welcome to make it my epitaph.

AIR.

*The honest heart, whose thoughts are clear
 From fraud, disguise, and guile,
 Need neither fortune's frowning fear,
 Nor court the harlot's smile.
 The greatness that would make us grace
 Is but an empty thing;
 What more than mirth would mortals have?
 The cheerful man's a king.* [Exeunt.

Enter LUCINDA, HODGE going off.

Luc. Hist, hist, Hodge!

Hodge. Who calls? Here am I.

Luc. Well, have you been?

Hodge. Been? ay, I ha' been far enough, an that be all: you never knew anything fall out so crossly in your born days.

Luc. Why, what's the matter?

Hodge. Why, you know, I dare not take a horse out of his worship's stables this morning, for fear it should be missed, and breed questions; and our old nag at home was so cruelly beat i' the hoofs, that, poor beast, it had not a foot to set to ground; so I was fain to go to farmer Ploughshare's, at the Grange, to borrow the loan of his bald filly; and, would you think it? after walking all that way, de'el from me, if the cross-grained toad did not deny me the favour.

Luc. Unlucky!

Hodge. Well, then I went my ways to the King's-head in the village, but all their cattle were at plough; and I was as far to seek below at the turnpike: so, at last, for want of a better, I was forced to take up with dame Quickset's blind mare.

Luc. Oh, then you have been?

Hodge. Yes, yes, I ha' been.

Luc. Psha! why did you not say so at once?

Hodge. Ay, but I have had a main tiresome jaunt on't, for she is a sorry jade at best.

Luc. Well, well, did you see Mr. Eustace, and what did he say to you? Come, quick; have you e'er a letter?

Hodge. Yes, he gave me a letter, if I ha'na' lost it.

Luc. Lost it, man!

Hodge. Nay, nay, have a bit of patience: ad-wawns! you are always in such a hurry. [Rummaging his pockets.] I put it somewhere in this waistcoat pocket. Oh, here it is.

Luc. So; give it me. [Reads the letter to herself.]

Hodge. Lord a mercy! how my arm aches with beating that plaguy beast! I'll be hang'd if I won't na' rather ha' thrash'd half a day, than ha' ridden her.

Luc. Well, Hodge, you have done your business very well.

Hodge. Well, have not I now?

Luc. Yes; Mr. Eustace tells me in this letter, that he will be in the green lane, at the other end of the village, by twelve o'clock; you know where he came before?

Hodge. Ay, ay.

Luc. Well, you must go there, and wait till he arrives! and watch your opportunity to introduce him, across the fields, into the little summer-house, on the left side of the garden.

Hodge. That's enough.

Luc. But take particular care that nobody sees you.

Hodge. I warrant you.

Luc. Not for your life, drop a word of it to any mortal.

Hodge. Never fear me.

Luc. And, Hodge—

AIR.—HODGE.

Well, well, say no more;

Sure, you told me before;

I see the full length of my tether:

Do you think I'm a fool,

That I need go to school?

I can spell you and put you together.

A word to the wise,

Will always suffice:

Adsniggers! go talk to your parrot;

I'm not such an elf,

Though I say it myself,

But I know a sheep's head from a carrot.

[Exit.]

Luc. How severe is my case! Here I am obliged to carry on a clandestine correspondence with a man in all respects my equal, because the oddity of my father's temper is such, that I dare not tell him I have ever yet seen the person I should like to marry: but perhaps he has quality in his eye; and hopes, one day or other, as I am his only child, to match me with a title: vain imagination!

AIR.

Cupid, god of soft persuasion,

Take the helpless lover's part:

Seize, oh seize some kind occasion

To reward a faithful heart.

Justly those we tyrants call,

Who the body would enthrall;

Tyrants of more cruel kind,

Those, who would enslave the mind.

What is grandeur? foe to rest,

Childish mummery at best.

Happy I, in humble state;

Catch, ye fools, the glittering bait. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—A Field, with a stile.

Enter HODGE, followed by MADGE.

Hodge. What does the wench follow me for? Ods flesh! folk may well talk, to see you dangling after me everywhere, like a tantony pig: find some other road, can't you: and don't keep wherreting me with your nonsense.

Madge. Nay, pray you, Hodge, stay, and let me speak to you a bit.

Hodge. Well; what say'n you?

Madge. Dear heart, how can you be so barbarous? and is this the way you serve me after all; and won't you keep your word, Hodge?

Hodge. Why, no, I won't, I tell you; I have chang'd my mind.

Madge. Nay, but surely, surely—consider, Hodge, you are obligated in conscience to make me an honest woman.

Hodge. Obligated in conscience! How am I obligated?

Madge. Because you are; and none but the basest of rogues would bring a poor girl to shame, and afterwards leave her to the wide world.

Hodge. Bring you to shame! Don't make me speak, Madge; don't make me speak.

Madge. Yes, do; speak your worst.

Hodge. Why, then, if you go to that, you were fain to leave your own village down in the west, for a bastard you had by the clerk of the parish; and I'll bring the man shall say it to your face.

Madge. No, no, Hodge, 'tis no such thing; 'tis a base lie of farmer Ploughshare's. But I know what makes you false-hearted to me; that you may keep company with young madam's waiting-woman; and I am sure she's no fit body for a poor man's wife.

Hodge. How should you know what she's fit for? She's fit for as much as you, mayhap; don't find fault with your betters, Madge.

Enter YOUNG MEADOWS.

Oh! Master Thomas, I have a word or two to say to you; pray, did not you go down the village one day last week, with a basket of something upon your shoulder?

Young M. Well, and what then?

Hodge. Nay, not much; only the hostler at the Green-man was saying, as how there was a passenger at their house as seed you go by, and said he know'd you; and axt a mort of questions. So, I thought I'd tell you.

Young M. The devil! ask questions about me? I know nobody in this part of the country: there must be some mistake in it. Come hither, Hodge.

[Exit HODGE and Young MRADOWS.]

Madge. A nasty, ungrateful fellow, to use me at this rate, after being to him as I have. Well, well; I wish all poor girls would take warning by my mishap, and never have anything to say to none of them.

AIR.

How happy were my days till now!

I ne'er did sorrow feel;

I rose with joy to milk my cow,

Or turn my spinning-wheel.

My heart was lighter than a fly,

Like any bird I sung;

Till he pretended love, and I

Believ'd his flattery tongue.

Oh, the fool, the silly, silly fool,

Who trusts what man may be;

I wish I was a maid again,

And in my own country.

Exit.

SCENE IV.—A Green, with a prospect of a village, and the representation of a statue, or fair.

Enter Justice WOODCOCK, HAWTHORN, Mrs. DEBORAH WOODCOCK, LUCINDA, ROSETTA, Young MEADOWS, HODGE, and several country people.

Hodge. This way, your worship, this way. Why don't you stand aside there? Here's his worship a-coming.

Countryman. His worship!

Jus. W. Fie, fie, what a crowd's this! Od! I'll put some of them in the stocks. [Striking a fellow.] Stand out of the way, sirrah.

Haw. For shame, neighbour. Well, my lad, are you willing to serve the king?

Countryman. Why, can you list ma? Serve the king, measter? No, no; I pay the king, that's enough for me. Ho, ho, ho!

Haw. Well said, Sturdy-boots.

Jus. W. Nay, if you talk to them, they'll answer you.

Haw. I would have them do so; I like they should. Well, madam, is not this a fine sight? I did not know my neighbour's estate had been so well peopled. Are all these his own tenants?

Mrs. D. More than are good of them, Mr. Hawthorn. I don't like to see such a parcel of young hussies fleering with the fellows.

Haw. There's a lass. [Beckoning to a country girl.] Come hither, my pretty maid. What brings you here? [Chuckling her under the chin.] Do you come to look for a service?

C. Girl. Yes, an't please you.

Haw. Well, and what place are you for?

C. Girl. All work, an't please you.

Jus. W. Ay, ay, I don't doubt it; any work you'll put her to.

Mrs. D. She looks like a brazen one; go, hussy.

Haw. Here's another. [Catching a girl that goes by.] What health, what bloom! This is nature's work; no art, no daubing. Don't be ashamed, child; those cheeks of thine are enough to put a whole drawing-room out of countenance.

Hodge. Now, your honour, now the sport will come: the gut-scrapers are here, and some among them are going to sing and dance. Why there's not the like of our statute, mun, in five counties; others are but fools to it.

Serv. Man. Come, good people, make a ring; and stand out, fellow-servants, as many of you as are willing and able to bear a bob. We'll let our masters and mistresses see we can do something at least; if they won't hire us, it sha'n't be our fault. Strike up the servants' medley.

MEDLEY and CHORUS.

Housem. I pray ye, gentles, list to me:

I'm young, and strong, and clean, you see:

I'll not turn tail to any she,

For work that's in the country.

Of all your house the charge I take,

I wash, I scrub, I brew, I bake;

And more can do than here I'll speak,

Depending on your bounty.

Footm. Behold a blade, who knows his trade,

In chamber, hall, and entry:

And what though here I now appear,

I've serv'd the best of gentry.

A footman would you have,

I can dress, and comb, and shave;

For I a handy lad am:

On a message I can go,

And slip a billet-doux,

With "your humble servant, nadam."

Cookm. Who wants a good cook, my hand they must cross;

For plain wholesome dishes I'm ne'er at a loss;

And what are your soups, your ragouts, and your sauce,

Compar'd to the beef of old England,

Compar'd to old English roast beef?

Cart. If you want a young man, with a true honest heart,

Who knows how to manage a plough and a cart,

Here's one for your purpose, come take me and try;

You'll say you ne'er met with a better nor I.

Gee ho, Dobbin, &c.

Chorus. My masters and mistresses, hither repair;

What servants you want, you will find in our fair;

Men and maids fit for all sorts of stations there be;

And, as for the wages, we sha'n't disagree. [Dance.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Parlour in Justice Woodcock's House.

Enter LUCINDA and EUSTACE.

Luc. Well, am I not a bold adventurer, to bring you into my father's house at noon-day? Though, to say the truth, we are safer here than in the garden; for there is not a human creature under the roof besides ourselves.

Eust. Then why not put our scheme into execution this moment? I have a post-chaise ready.

Luc. Fie: how can you talk so lightly? I protest I am half afraid to have anything to do with you; and my aunt Deborah says—

Eust. What! by all the rapture my heart now feels—

Luc. Oh, to be sure, promise and vow; it sounds prettily, and never fails to impose upon a fond female.

Eust. Well, I see you've a mind to divert yourself with me; but I wish I could prevail on you to be a little serious.

Luc. Seriously, then, what would you desire me to say? I have promised to run away with you:

which is as great a concession as any reasonable lover can expect from his mistress.

Eust. Yes; but my dear, provoking angel, you have not told me when you will run away with me.

Luc. Why, that, I confess, requires some consideration.

Eust. Yet, remember, while you are deliberating, the season, now so favourable to us, may elapse, never to return.

Enter Justice WOODCOCK, and Mrs. DEBORAH WOODCOCK.

Jus. W. Hoity-toity! who have we here?

Luc. My father, and my aunt!

Eust. The devil! what shall we do?

Luc. Take no notice of them, only observe me.—[Speaks aloud to EUSTACE.] Upon my word, sir, I don't know what to say to it, unless the justice was at home; he is just stepp'd into the village with some company; but, if you'll sit down a moment, I dare swear, he will return—[Pretends to see the Justice.] O! sir, here is my papa!

Jus. W. Here is your papa, hussy! Who's this you have got with you? Hark you, sirrah, who are you, ye dog? and what's your business here?

Eust. Sir, this is a language I am not used to.

Jus. W. Don't answer me, you rascal; I am a justice of the peace; and if I hear a word out of your mouth, I'll send you to jail.

Mrs. D. Send him to jail, brother, that's right.

Jus. W. And how do you know it's right? How should you know anything's right? Sister Deborah, you are never in the right.

Mrs. D. Brother, this is the man I have been telling you about so long.

Jus. W. What man, goody Wiseacre?

Mrs. D. Why the man your daughter has an intrigue with: but I hope you will not believe it now, though you see it with your own eyes. Come, hussy, confess, and don't let your father make a fool of himself any longer.

Luc. Confess what, aunt? This gentleman is a music-master: he goes about the country, teaching ladies to play and sing; and has been recommended to instruct me; I could not turn him out when he came to offer his service; and did not know what answer to give him till I saw my papa.

Jus. W. A music-master?

Eust. Yes, sir, that's my profession.

Mrs. D. It's a lie, young man; it's a lie. Brother, he is no more a music-master than I am a music-master.

Jus. W. What then, you know better than the fellow himself, do you? and you will be wiser than all the world?

Mrs. D. Brother, he does not look like a music-master.

Jus. W. He does not look! ha, ha, ha! Was ever such a poor stupe? Well, and what does he look like, then? But I suppose you mean he is not dressed like a music-master. Why, you silly wretch, these whipper-snappers set up for gentlemen now-a-days, and give themselves as many airs as if they were people of quality.—Hark you, friend, I suppose you don't come within the vagrant act; you have some etitled habitation. Where do you live?

Mrs. D. It's an easy matter for him to tell you a wrong place.

Jus. W. Sister Deborah, don't provoke me.

Mrs. D. I wish, brother, you would let me examine him a little.

Jus. W. You sha'n't say a word to him; you sha'n't say a word to him.

Mrs. D. She says he was recommended here, brother; ask him by whom.

Jus. W. No, I won't now, because you desire it.

Luc. If my papa did ask the question, aunt, it would be very easily resolved.

Mrs. D. Who bid you speak, Mrs. Nimble-chops? I suppose the man has a tongue in his head, to answer for himself.

Jus. W. Will nobody stop that prating old woman's mouth for me? Get out of the room.

Mrs. D. Well, so I can, brother; I don't want to stay; but remember, I tell you, you will make yourself ridiculous in this affair: for through your own obstinacy, you will have your daughter run away with, before your face.

Jus. W. My daughter! who will run away with my daughter?

Mrs. D. That fellow will.

Jus. W. Go, go, you are a wicked, censorious woman.

Luc. Why, sure, madam, you must think me very forward, indeed.

Jus. W. Ay, she judges of others by herself; I remember when she was a girl, her mother dared not trust her the length of her apron-string; she was clambering upon every fellow's back.

Mrs. D. I was not.

Jus. W. You were.

Luc. Well, but why so violent?

AIR.—LUCINDA.

*Believe me, dear aunt,
If you rave thus and rant,
You'll never a lover persuade;
The men will all fly,
And leave you to die,
Oh, terrible chance! an old maid.*

*How happy the lass,
Must she come to this pass,
Who ancient virginity 'scapes!
'Twere better on earth
Have five brats at a birth,
Than in hell be a leader of apes.*

[Exit Mrs. D.]

Jus. W. Well done, Lucy, send her about her business; a troublesome, foolish creature. Does she think I want to be directed by her?—Come hither, my lad, you look tolerably honest. [LUCY retires.]

Eust. I hope, sir, I shall never give you cause to alter your opinion.

Jus. W. No, no; I am not easily deceived; I am generally pretty right in my conjectures.—You must know, I had once a little notion of music myself, and learned upon the fiddle. I could play the Trumpet Minuet, and Buttered Peas, and two or three tunes. I remember, when I was in London about thirty years ago, there was a song, a great favourite at our club at Nando's Coffee-house; Jack Pickle used to sing it for us—a droll fish! but 'tis an old thing: I dare swear you have heard of it often.

AIR.

*When I follow'd a lass that was froward and shy,
Oh! I stuck to her stuff, till I made her comply;
Oh! I took her so lovingly round the waist,
And I smack'd her lips and held her fast:*

*When hugg'd and haul'd,
She squeal'd and squall'd;
But though she wou'd all I did was in vain,
Yet I pleased her so well that she bore it again:*

*Then hoity-toity,
Whisking, fisking,
Green was her gown upon the grass:
Oh! suck were the joys of our dancing days.*

Eust. Very well, sir, upon my word.

Just. W. No, no, I forget all those things now; but I could do a little at them once.—Well, stay and eat your dinner, and we'll talk about your teaching the girl:—Lucy, take your master to your spinnet, and show him what you can do—I must go and give some orders. Then hoity-toity, &c.

[Erit, singing.

Luc. My sweet, pretty papa, your most obedient, humble servant; ha, ha, ha! was ever so whimsical an accident? Well, sir, what do you think of this?

Eust. Think of it! I am in a maze.

Luc. O your awkwardness! I was frightened out of my wits, lest you should not take the hint; and, if I had not turned matters so cleverly, we should have been utterly undone.

Eust. 'Sdeath! why would you bring me into the house? We could expect nothing else: besides, since they did surprise us, it would have been better to have discovered the truth.

Luc. Yes, and never have seen one another afterwards. I know my father better than you do; he has taken it into his head I have no inclination for a husband; and let me tell you, that is our best security; for if once he has said a thing, he will not be easily persuaded to the contrary.

Eust. And pray what am I to do now?

Luc. Why, as I think all danger is pretty well over, since he has invited you to dinner with him, stay; only be cautious of your behaviour; and, in the mean time, I will consider what is next to be done.

Eust. Had not I better go to your father?

Luc. Do so, while I endeavour to recover myself a little out of the flurry this affair has put me in.

[Ereunt.

SCENE II.—A Garden.

Enter ROSETTA.

Ros. If ever poor creature was in a pitiable condition, surely I am. The deuce take this fellow! I cannot get him out of my head; and yet I would fain persuade myself I don't care for him: well, but surely I am not in love; let me examine my heart a little: I saw him kissing one of the maids the other day; I could have boxed his ears for it, and have done nothing but find fault and quarrel with the girl ever since. Why was I uneasy at his toying with another woman? What was it to me? Then I dream of him almost every night—but that may proceed from his being generally uppermost in my thoughts all day:—Oh! worse and worse!—Well, he is certainly a pretty lad; he has something very uncommon about him, considering his rank. And now, let me only put the case: if he were not a servant, would I or would I not prefer him to all the men I ever saw? Why, to be sure, if he were not a servant.—In short, I'll ask myself no more questions, for the further I examine, the less reason I shall have to be satisfied.

AIR.

*How blest the maid whose bosom
No headstrong passion knows:
Her days in joy she passes,
Her nights in calm repose.
Where'er her fancy leads her,
No pain, no fear invades her;
But pleasure,
Without measure,
From every object flows.*

Enter Young MEADOWS.

Young M. Do you come into the garden, Mrs. Rosetta, to put my lilies and roses out of countenance; or, to save me the trouble of watering my flowers, by reviving them? The sun seems to have hid himself a little, to give you an opportunity of supplying his place.

Ros. Where could he get that now? he never read it in the Academy of Compliments. [Aside.

Young M. Come, don't affect to treat me with contempt; I can suffer anything better than that. In short, I love you; there is no more to be said: I am angry with myself for it, and strive all I can against it; but in spite of myself, I love you.

Ros. Really, Mr. Thomas, this is very improper language; it is what I don't understand; I can't suffer it, and, in short, I don't like it.

Young M. Perhaps you don't like me.

Ros. Well, perhaps I don't.

Young M. Nay, but 'tis not so; come, confess you love me.

Ros. Confess! Indeed, I shall confess no such thing: besides, to what purpose should I confess it?

Young M. Why, as you say, I don't know to what purpose; only, it would be a satisfaction to me to hear you say so; that's all.

Ros. Why, if I did love you, I can assure you, you would never be the better for it: women are apt enough to be weak; we cannot always answer for our inclinations, but it is in our power not to give way to them; and if I were so silly, I say if I were so indiscreet, which I hope I am not, as to entertain an improper regard, when people's circumstances are quite unsuitable, and there are obstacles in the way that cannot be surmounted—

Young M. Oh! to be sure, Mrs. Rosetta; to be sure: you are entirely in the right of it:—I know very well you and I can never come together.

Ros. Well, then, since that is the case, as I assure you it is, I think we had better behave accordingly.

Young M. Suppose we make a bargain, then, never to speak to one another any more.

Ros. With all my heart.

Young M. Nor look at, nor, if possible, think of, one another?

Ros. I am very willing.

Young M. And as long as we stay in the house together, never to take any notice?

Ros. It is the best way.

Young M. Why, I believe it is. Well, Mrs. Rosetta—

DUET

Ros. *Be gone—I agree;
From this moment we're free;
Already, the matter I've sworn:*

Young M. *Yet let me complain
Of the fates that ordain
A trial so hard to be borne.*

Ros. *When things are not fit,
We should calmly submit;
No cure in reluctance we find:*

Young M. *Then, thus I obey,
Tear your image away,
And banish you quite from my mind.*

Ros. Well, now I think I am somewhat easier: I am glad I have come to this explanation with him, because it puts an end to things at once.

Young M. Hold, Mrs. Rosetta, pray stay a moment. The airs this girl gives herself are intolerable: I find now the cause of her behaviour; she despises the meanness of my condition, thinking a gardener below the notice of a lady's waiting-woman: 'sdeath, I have a good mind to discover myself to her. [Aside.

Ros. Poor wretch! he does not know what to make of it: I believe he is heartily mortified, but I must not pity him. [Aside.]

Young M. It shall be so: I will discover myself to her, and leave the house directly.—Mrs. Rosetta—Plague on it, yonder's the justice come into the garden.

Ros. O lord! he will walk round this way: pray go about your business; I would not for the world he should see us together.

Young M. The devil take him; he's gone across the parterre, and can't hobble here this half-hour: I must and will have a little conversation with you.

Ros. Some other time.

Young M. This evening, in the greenhouse, at the lower end of the canal; I have something to communicate to you of importance. Will you meet me there?

Ros. Meet you!

Young M. Ay; I have a secret to tell you; and I swear, from that moment, there shall be an end of everything betwixt us.

Ros. Well, well, pray leave me now.

Young M. You'll come, then?

Ros. I don't know; perhaps I may.

Young M. Nay, but promise.

Ros. What signifies promising? I may break my promise—but I tell you, I will.

Young M. Enough; yet, before I leave you, let me desire you to believe, I love you more than ever man loved woman; and that when I relinquish you, I give up all that can make my life supportable.

AIR.

Oh! how shall I, in language weak,

My ardent passion tell;

Or form my falt'ring tongue to speak

That cruel word, farewell?

Farewell—but know, though thus we part,

My thoughts can never stray:

Go where I will, my constant heart

Must with my charmer stay. [Exit.

Enter Justice Woodcock.

Ros. What can this be that he wants to tell me? I have a strange curiosity to hear it, methinks. Well—

Jus. W. Hem! hem! Rosetta!

Ros. So, I thought the devil would throw him in my way; now for a courtship of a different kind; but I'll give him a surfeit. [Aside.] Did you call me, sir?

Jus. W. Ay, where are you running so fast?

Ros. I was only going into the house, sir.

Jus. W. Well, but come here; come here, I say.

[Looking about.] How do you do, Rosetta?

Ros. Thank you, sir, pretty well.

Jus. W. Why, you look as fresh and bloomy to-day—Adad, you little slut, I believe you are painted.

Ros. O, sir! you are pleased to compliment.

Jus. W. Adad, I believe you are—let me try—

Ros. Lord, sir!

Jus. W. What brings you into this garden so often, Rosetta? I hope you don't get eating green fruit and trash; or have you a hankering after some lover in dowlas, who spoils my trees by engraving true-lovers' knots on them, with your horn and buck-handled knives? I see your name written upon the ceiling of the servants'-hall, with the smoke of a candle; and I suspect—

Ros. Not me, I hope, sir. No, sir, I am of another-guess mind, I assure you; for I have heard say, men are false and fickle.

Jus. W. Ay, that's your flaunting, idle, young fellows; so they are—and they are so d—d impudent,

I wonder a woman will have anything to say to them; besides, all that they want is something to brag of, and tell again.

Ros. Why, I own, sir, if ever I were to make a slip, it should be with an elderly gentleman; about seventy, or seventy-five years of age.

Jus. W. No, child, that's out of reason; though I have known many a man turned of three-score with a hale constitution.

Ros. Then, sir, he should be troubled with the gout, have a good, strong, substantial, winter cough; and I should not like him the worse, if he had a small touch of the rheumatism.

Jus. W. Pho, pho! Rosetta, this is jesting.

Ros. No, sir; everybody has a taste, and I have mine.

Jus. W. Well but, Rosetta, have you thought of what I was saying to you?

Ros. What was it, sir?

Jus. W. Ah, you know; you know well enough, hussy.

Ros. Dear sir, consider what has a poor servant to depend on but her character? and I have heard you gentlemen will talk one thing before, and another after.

Jus. W. I tell you again, these are the idle, flashy, young dogs: but when you have to do with a staid, sober man—

Ros. And a magistrate, sir!

Jus. W. Right; it's quite a different thing. Well, shall we, Rosetta; shall we?

Ros. Really, sir, I don't know what to say to it.

AIR.

Young I am, and sore afraid;

Would you hurt a harmless maid?

Lead an innocent astray?

Tempt me not, kind sir, I pray.

Men too often we believe;

And, should you my faith deceive,

Ruin first, and then forsake,

Sure my tender heart would break.

Jus. W. Why, you silly girl, I won't do you any

Ros. Won't you, sir? [harm.]

Jus. W. Not I.

Ros. But won't you, indeed, sir?

Jus. W. Why, I tell you I won't.

Ros. Ha, ha, ha!

Jus. W. Hussy, hussy!

Ros. Ha, ha, ha! Your servant, sir, your servant!

[Exit.]

Jus. W. Why, you impudent, audacious—

Enter HAWTHORN.

Haw. So, so, justice at odds with gravity! his worship playing at romps! [Aside.] Your servant, sir!

Jus. W. Ha! friend Hawthorn!

Haw. I hope I don't spoil sport, neighbour; I thought I had the glimpse of a petticoat as I came in here?

Jus. W. Oh! the maid. Ay, she has been gathering a salad: but come hither, Master Hawthorn, and I'll shew you some alterations I intend to make in my garden.

Haw. No, no, I am no judge of it; besides, I want to talk to you a little more about this. Tell me, Sir Justice, were you helping your maid to gather a salad here, or consulting her taste in your improvements, eh? ha, ha, ha! Let me see, all among the roses: 'egad! I like your notion; but you look a little blank upon it; you are ashamed of the business then, are you?

AIR.

*Oon'-! neighbour, ne'er blush for a trifle like this;
What harm with a fair one to toy and to kiss?
The greatest and gravest—a truce with grimace—
Would do the same thing, were they in the same place.
No age, no profession, no station is free;
To sovereign beauty mankind bends the knee;
That power, resistless, no strength can oppose,
We all love a pretty girl—under the rose.*

Jus. W. I profess, master Hawthorn, this is all Indian, all Cherokee language to me; I don't understand a word of it.

Haw. No, may be not; well, sir, will you read this letter, and try whether you can understand that? It is just brought by a servant, who stays for an answer.

Jus. W. A letter! and to me? [Taking the letter.] Yes, it is to me; and yet I am sure it comes from no correspondent that I know of. Where are my spectacles? not but I can see very well without them, master Hawthorn; but this seems to be a sort of crabbed hand. [Reads.] Sir,—I am ashamed of giving you this trouble: but I am informed there is an unthinking boy, a son of mine, now disguised and in your service, in the capacity of a gardener. Tom is a little wild, but an honest lad; and no fool either, though I am his father that say it. Tom! oh, this is Thomas, our gardener; I always thought that he was a better man's child than he appeared to be, though I never mentioned it.

Haw. Well, well, sir, pray let's hear the rest of the letter.

Jus. W. Stay, where is the place? Oh, here. I am come in quest of my runaway, and write this at an inn in your village, while I am swallowing a morsel of dinner: because, not having the pleasure of your acquaintance, I did not care to intrude, without giving you notice. Whoever this person is, he understands good manners. I beg leave to wait on you sir; but desire you would keep my arrival a secret, particularly from the young man.

WILLIAM MEADOWS.

I'll assure you, a very well worded, civil letter. Do you know anything of the person who writes it, neighbour?

Haw. Let me consider; Meadows. By dad! I believe it is Sir William Meadows of Northamptonshire; and, now I remember, I heard some time ago that the heir of that family had absconded, on account of a marriage that was disagreeable to him. It is a good many years since I have seen Sir William, but we were once well acquainted; and, if you please, sir, I will go and conduct him to the house.

Jus. W. Do so, master Hawthorn, do so. But pray, what sort of a man is this Sir William Meadows? Is he a wise man?

Haw. There is no occasion for a man that has five thousand pounds a year to be a conjuror; but I suppose you ask that question because of this story about his son; taking it for granted, that wise parents make wise children.

Jus. W. No doubt of it, master Hawthorn; no doubt of it. I warrant we shall find now, that this young rascal has fallen in love with some minx, against his father's consent. Why, sir, if I had as many children as king Priam had, that we read of at school, in the destruction of Troy, not one of them should serve me so.

Haw. Well, well, neighbour, perhaps not; but we should remember when we were young ourselves; and I was as likely to play an old don such a trick in my day, as e'er a spark in the hundred; nay, between you and me, I had done it once, had the wench been as willing as I.

AIR.

*My Dolly was the fairest thing!
Her breath disclos'd the sweets of spring;
And if for summer you would seek,
'Twas painted in her eye, her cheek;
Her swelling bosom, tempting ripe,
Of fruitful autumn was the type
But, when my tender tale I told,
I found her heart was winter cold.*

Jus. W. Ah! you were always a scape-grace rattle-cap.

Haw. Ods heart! neighbour Woodcock, don't tell me; young fellows will be young fellows, though we preach till we're hoarse again; and so there's an end on't. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—Justice Woodcock's Hall.

Enter HODGE and MADGE.

Hodge. So, mistress, who let you in?

Madge. Why, I let myself in.

Hodge. Indeed! Marry come up! why then, pray let yourself out again. Times are come to a pretty pass; I think you might have had the manners to knock at the door first. What does the wench stand there for?

Madge. I want to know if his worship's at home?
Hodge. Well, what's your business with his worship?

Madge. Perhaps you will hear that. Lookye, Hodge, it does not signify talking; I am come, once for all, to know what you intends to do? for I won't be made a fool of any longer.

Hodge. You won't?

Madge. No, that's what I won't, by the best man that ever wore a head; I am the make-game of the whole village upon your account; and I'll try whether your master gives you toleration in your doings.

Hodge. You will?

Madge. Yes, that's what I will; his worship shall be acquainted with all your pranks, and see how you will like to be sent for a soldier.

Hodge. There's the door: take a friend's advice, and go about your business.

Madge. My business is with his worship; and I won't go till I sees him.

Hodge. Look you, Madge, if you make any of your orations here, never stir, if I don't set the dogs at you. Will you be gone?

Madge. I won't.

Hodge. Here, Towser; [whistling.] whu, whu, whu!

AIR.

*Was ever poor fellow so plag'd with a rizen?
Zawns! Madge, don't provoke me, but mind what I say;
You've chose a wrong parson for playing your tricks on,
So, pack up your alls, and be trudging away;
You'd better be quiet,
And not breed a riot;
'Shlood! must I stand prating with you here all day?
I've got other matters to mind;
Mayhap, you may think me an ass,
But to the contrary you'll find;
A fine piece of work, by the mass!*

Enter ROSETTA.

Ros. Sure, I heard the voice of discord here. As I live, an admirer of mine; and, if I mistake not, a rival. I'll have some sport with them. How now, fellow servant, what's the matter?

Hodge. Nothing, Mrs. Rosetta, only this young woman wants to speak with his worship; Madge, follow me.

Madge. No, Hodge, this is your fine madam! but I am as good flesh and blood as she, and have as clear a skin too, tho' I mayn't go so gay; and now she's here, I'll tell her a piece of my mind.

Hodge. Hold your tongue, will you?

Madge. No; I'll speak, if I die for it.

Ros. What's the matter, I say?

Hodge. Why, nothing, I tell you; Madge—

Madge. Yes, but it is something; it's all along of she, and she may be ashamed of herself.

Ros. Bless me, child! do you direct your discourse to me?

Madge. Yes, I do, and to nobody else; there was not a kinder soul breathing than he was till of late; I had never a cross word with him till he kept you company; but all the girls about say, there is no such thing as keeping a sweetheart for you.

Ros. Do you hear this, friend Hodge?

Hodge. Why, you don't mind she, I hope? but if that vexes her, I do like you, I do; my mind runs upon nothing else: and if so be as you was agreeable to it, I would marry you to-night, before to-morrow.

Madge. You're a nasty monkey! you are parjur'd, you know you are; and you deserve to have your eyes tore out.

Hodge. Let me come at her; I'll teach you to call names, and abuse folk.

Madge. Do; strike me! You a man!

Ros. Hold, hold! we shall have a battle here presently, and I may chance to get my cap tore off. Never exasperate a jealous woman, 'tis taking a mad bull by the horns; leave me to manage her.

Hodge. You manage her! I'll kick her.

Ros. No, no; it will be more for my credit, to get the better of her by fair means; I warrant I'll bring her to reason.

Hodge. Well, do so then; but may I depend upon you? when shall I speak to the parson?

Ros. We'll talk of it another time. Go!

Hodge. Madge, good bye! [Exit.]

Ros. The brutality of this fellow shocks me! Oh, man! man! you are all alike. A bumpkin here, bred at the barn door—had he been brought up in a court, could he have been more fashionably vicious? Shew me the lord, squire, colonel, or captain of them all, that could outdo him!

Madge. I am ready to burst; I can't stay in the place any longer.

Ros. Hold, child! come hither.

Madge. Don't speak to me, don't you.

Ros. Well, but I have something to say to you of consequence, and that will be for your good; I suppose this fellow promised you marriage?

Madge. Ay; or he never should have prevail'd upon me.

Ros. Well, now you see the ill consequence of trusting to such promises; when once a man hath cheated a woman of her virtue, she has no longer hold of him; he despises her for wanting that which he has robb'd her of; and, like a lawless conqueror, triumphs in the ruin he has occasioned.

Madge. Anan!

Ros. However, I hope the experience you have got, though somewhat dearly purchased, will be of use to you for the future; and, as to any designs I have upon the heart of your lover, you may make yourself easy; for I assure you, I shall be no dangerous rival; so go your ways, and be a good girl.

[Exit.]

Madge. Yes; I don't very well understand her talk, but I suppose that's as much as to say she'll keep him all to herself; well, let her; who cares? I don't fear getting better nor he is any day of the year, for the matter of that: and I have a thought come into my head, that, may be, will be more to my advantage.

AIR.

*Since Hodge proves ungrateful, no further I'll seek;
But go up to town in the waggon next week;
A service in London is no such disgrace,
And Register's office will get me a place:
Bet Blossom went there, and soon met with a friend;
Folks say, in her silks, she's now standing an end!
Then, why should not I the same maxim pursue,
And better my fortune, as other girls do?* [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—A Chamber.

Enter ROSETTA and LUCINDA

Ros. Ha, ha, ha! Oh, admirable; most delectably ridiculous! And so, your father is content he should be a music-master, and will have him such, in spite of all your aunt can say to the contrary?

Luc. My father and he, child, are the best companions you ever saw; and have been singing together the most hideous duets! Bobbing Joan, and old Sir Simon the King: heaven knows where Eustace could pick them up.

Ros. And have you resolved to take wing to-night?

Luc. This very night, my dear: my swain will go from hence this evening, but no further than the inn, where he has left his horses; and, at twelve precisely, he will be with a post-chaise at the little gate that opens from the lawn into the road, where I have promised to meet him.

Ros. Then depend upon't, I'll bear you company.

Luc. We shall slip out when the family are asleep, and I have prepared Hodge already. Well, I hope we shall be happy.

Ros. Never doubt it.

AIR.

*In love should there meet a fond pair,
Untutor'd by fashion or art;
Whose wishes are warm and sincere,
Whose words are th' excess of the heart:
If aught of substantial delight,
On this side the stars can be found,
'Tis sure when that couple unite,
And Cupid by Hymen is crown'd.*

Enter HAWTHORN.

Haw. Lucy, where are you?

Luc. Your pleasure, sir.

Ros. Mr. Hawthorn, your servant.

Haw. What, my little water-wagtail! The very couple I wished to meet: come hither, both of you.

Ros. Now, sir, what would you say to both of us?

Haw. Why, let me look at you a little; have you got on your best gowns, and your best faces? If not, go and trick yourselves out directly; for I'll tell you a secret: there will be a young bachelor in the house within these three hours, that may fall to the share of one of you, if you look sharp; but whether mistress or maid—

Ros. Ay, marry, this is something; but how do you know whether either mistress or maid will think him worth acceptance?

Haw. Follow me, follow me; I warrant you.

Luc. I can assure you, Mr. Hawthorn, I am very difficult to please.

Ros. And so am I, sir.

Haw. Indeed!

TRIO.

*Well, come, let us hear what the swain must possess,
Who may hope at your feet to implore with success?*

Ros. He must be, first of all,

Straight, comely, and tall:

Luc. Neither awkward,

Ros. Nor foolish,

Luc. Nor apish,

Ros. Nor mulish;

Luc. } Nor yet should his fortune be small.

Haw. What think'st of a captain?

Luc. All bluster and wounds.

Haw. What think'st of a squire?

Ros. To be left for his hounds.

Luc. } *The youth that is form'd to my mind,
Must be gentle, obliging, and kind;*

Ros. } *Of all things in nature love me;
Have sense both to speak and to see,
Yet sometimes be silent and blind.*

Haw. } 'Fore George, a most rare matrimonial receipt;

Ros. } Observe it, ye fair, in the choice of a mate;

Luc. } Remember, 'tis wedlock determines your fate. [Exeunt.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Parlour in Justice Woodcock's House.

Enter Sir WILLIAM MEADOWS, followed by HAWTHORN.

Sir W. Well, this is excellent, this is mighty good, this is mighty merry, faith; ha, ha, ha! Was ever the like heard of? That my boy, Tom, should run away from me, for fear of being forced to marry a girl he never saw; that she should scamper from her father, for fear of being forced to marry him; and that they should run into each other's arms this way in disguise, by mere accident; against their consents, and without knowing it, as a body may say? May I never do an ill turn, Master Hawthorn, if it is not one of the oddest adventures partly—

Haw. Why, sir William, it is a romance, a novel, a pleasanter history by half than the loves of Dorastus and Faunia: we shall have ballads made of it within these two months, setting forth how a young squire became a serving-man of low degree; and it will be stuck up with Margaret's Ghost, and the Spanish Lady, against the walls of every cottage in the country.

Sir W. But what pleases me best of all, Master Hawthorn, is the ingenuity of the girl. May I never do an ill turn, when I was called out of the room, and the servant said she wanted to speak to me, if I knew what to make on't; but when the little gipsy took me aside, and told me her name, and how matters stood, I was quite astonished, as a body may say; and could not believe it partly, till her young friend that she is with here, assured me of the truth on't:—Indeed, at last, I began to recollect her face, though I have not set eyes on her before, since she was the height of a full-grown greyhound.

Haw. Well, sir William, your son as yet knows nothing of what has happened, nor of your being come hither; and, if you'll follow my counsel, we'll have some sport with him. He and his mistress were to meet in the garden this evening by appointment; she's gone to dress herself in all her airs; will you let me direct your proceedings in this affair?

Sir W. With all my heart, master Hawthorn, with all my heart; do what you will with me, say what you please for me; I am so overjoyed, and so happy; and may I never do an ill turn, but I am very glad to see you too; ay, and partly as much pleased at that as anything else, for we have been merry together before now, when we were some years younger: well, and how has the world gone with you, master Hawthorn, since we saw one another last?

Haw. Why, pretty well, sir William; I have no reason to complain; every one has a mixture of sour with his sweets: but, in the main, I believe, I have done in a degree as tolerably as my neighbours.

AIR.

*The world is a well-furnish'd table,
Where guests are promiscuously set;
We all fare as well as we are able,
And scramble for what we can get.*

*My simile holds to a tittle,
Some gorge, while some scarce have a taste;
But if I'm content with a little,
Enough is as good as a feast.*

Enter ROSETTA.

Ros. Sir William, I beg pardon for detaining you, but I have had so much difficulty in adjusting my borrowed plumes.

Sir W. May I never do an ill turn, but they fit you to a T, and you look very well, so you do: Cocksbones, how your father will chuckle when he comes to hear this! Her father, master Hawthorn, is as worthy a man as lives by bread, and has been almost out of his senses for the loss of her. But tell me, hussy, has not this been all a scheme, a piece of conjuration between you and my son? Faith, I am half persuaded it has, it looks so like hocus-pocus, as a body may say.

Ros. Upon my honour, sir William, what has happened has been the mere effect of chance; I came hither unknown to your son, and he unknown to me: I never in the least suspected that Thomas the gardener was other than his appearance spoke him; and least of all, that he was a person with whom I had so close a connexion. Mr. Hawthorn can testify the astonishment I was in when he first informed me of it; but I thought it was my duty to come to an immediate explanation with you.

Sir W. Is not she a neat wench, master Hawthorn? May I never do an ill turn, but she is—but you little, plaguy devil, how came this love affair between you?

Ros. I have told you the whole truth very ingeniously, sir; since your son and I have been fellow-servants, as I may call it, in this house, I have had more than reason to suspect he has taken a liking to me; and I will own, with equal frankness, had I not looked upon him as a person so much below me, I should have had no objection to receive his courtship.

Haw. Well said, by the lord Harry, all above board, fair and open.

Ros. Perhaps I may be censured by some for this candid declaration; but I love to speak my sentiments; and I assure you, Sir William, in my opinion, I should prefer a gardener with your son's good qualities, to a knight of the shire without them.

Haw. Well but, sir, we lose time; is not this about the hour appointed to meet in the garden?

Ros. Pretty near it.

Haw. Oons then, what do we stay for? Come, my old friend, come along; and by the way we will consult how to manage your interview.

Sir W. Ay, but I must speak a word or two to my man about the horses first.

[Exeunt Sir W. and Haw.]

Enter Hodge.

Ros. Well, what's the business?

Hodge. Madam! mercy on us, I crave pardon!

Ros. Why, Hodge, don't you know me?

Hodge. Mrs. Rosetta!

Ros. Ay.

Hodge. Know you! ecod, I don't know whether I do or not; never stir, if I did not think it was some lady belonging to the strange gentlefolks: why, you ben't dizen'd this way to go to the statute dance presently, be you?

Ros. Have patience and you'll see; but is there any thing amiss, that you came in so abruptly?

Hodge. Amiss! why there's ruination.

Ros. How? where?

Hodge. Why, with Miss Lucinda: her aunt has catch'd she and the gentleman above stairs, and overheard all their love discourse.

Ros. You don't say so!

Hodge. Ecod, I had like to have popp'd in among them this instant; but, by good luck, I heard Mrs. Deborah's voice, and ran down again as fast as ever my legs would carry me.

Ros. Is your master in the house?

Hodge. What, his worship? no, no, he is gone into the fields to talk with the reapers and people.

Ros. Poor Lucinda! I wish I could go up to her; but I am so engaged with my own affairs.

Hodge. Mistress Rosetta!

Ros. Well.

Hodge. Odds bobs, I must have one smack of your sweet lips.

Ros. Oh, stand off; you know I never allow liberties.

Hodge. Nay, but why so coy? there's reason in roasting of eggs; I would not deny you such a thing.

Ros. That's kind; ha, ha, ha! but what will become of Lucinda? Sir William waits for me, I must be gone. Friendship, a moment by your leave; yet, as our sufferings have been mutual, so shall our joys; I already lose remembrance of all former pains and anxieties.

AIR.

*The traveller benighted,
And led through weary ways,
The lamp of day new lighted,
With joy the dawn surveys.
The rising prospects viewing,
Each look is forward cast;
He smiles, his course pursuing,
Nor thinks on what is past.*

[Exit.]

Hodge. Hist! stay! don't I hear a noise?

Luc. [Without.] Well, but dear, dear aunt—

Mrs. D. [Without.] You need not speak to me, for it does not signify.

Hodge. Adwawns, they are coming here! ecod, I'll get out of the way; Murraim take it, this door is bolted now—so, so.

Enter Mrs. DEBORAH WOODCOCK, driving in LUCINDA before her.

Mrs. D. Get along, get along; you are a scandal to the name of Woodcock; but I was resolved to find you out; for I have suspected you a great while, though your father, silly man, will have you such a poor innocent.

Luc. [Aside.] What shall I do?

Mrs. D. I was determined to discover what you and your pretended music-master were about, and lay in wait on purpose: I believe he thought to escape me, by slipping into the closet when I knocked at the door; but I was even with him; for now I have him under lock and key; and please the fates there he shall remain till your father comes in: I will convince him of his error, whether he will or not.

Luc. You won't be so cruel, I'm sure you won't: I thought I had made you my friend by telling you the truth.

Mrs. D. Telling me the truth, quotha! did I not overhear your scheme of running away to-night, through the partition? did I not find the very bundles pack'd up in the room with you, ready for going off? No, brazen-face, I found out the truth by my own sagacity, though your father says I am a fool, but now we'll be judged who is the greatest; and you, Mr. Rascal; my brother shall know what an honest servant he has got.

Hodge. Madam!

Mrs. D. You were to have been aiding and assisting them in their escape, and have been the go-between, it seems; the letter-carrier!

Hodge. Who? me, madam!

Mrs. D. Yes, you, sirrah.

Hodge. Miss Lucinda, did I ever carry a letter for you? I'll make my affidavit before his worship—

Mrs. D. Go, go, you are a villain; hold your tongue.

Luc. I own, aunt, I have been very faulty in this affair; I don't pretend to excuse myself; but we are all subject to frailties; consider that, and judge of me by yourself; you were once young and inexperienced as I am.

Mrs. D. This is mighty pretty, romantic stuff! but you learn it out of your play-books and novels. Girls in my time had other employments. we worked at our needles, and kept ourselves from idle thoughts; before I was your age, I had finished, with my own fingers, a complete set of chairs and a fire-screen in tent-stitch, four counterpanes in Mar-seilles quilting, and the Creed and the Ten Commandments in the hair of our family; it was framed and glaz'd, and hung over the parlour chimney-piece, and your poor, dear grandfather was prouder of it than e'er a picture in his house. I never looked into a book, but when I said my prayers, except it was the Complete Housewife, or the great Family Receipt Book: whereas, you are always at your studies! Ah! I never knew a woman come to good, that was fond of reading.

Luc. Well pray, madam, let me prevail on you to give me the key to let Mr. Eustace out, and I promise I never will proceed a step further in this business without your advice and approbation.

Mrs. D. Have not I told you already my resolution? Where are my clogs and my bonnet? I'll go out to my brother in the fields; I'm a fool, you know, child; now let's see what the wits will think of themselves. Don't hold me. [Exit.]

Luc. I'm not going; I have thought of a way to be even with you, so you may do as you please.

[Exit.]

Hodge. Well, I thought it would come to this, I'll be shot if I didn't; so, here's a fine job: but what can they do to me? They can't send me to gaol for carrying a letter, seeing, there was no treason in it; and how was I obliged to know my master did not allow of their meetings? The worst they can do, is to turn me off, and I am sure the place is no such great purchase; indeed, I should be sorry to leave Mrs. Rosetta, seeing as how matters are so near being brought to an end betwixt us; but she and I may keep company all as one: and I find Madge has been speaking with Gaffer Broadwheels, the waggoner, about her carriage up to London; so that I have got rid of she, and I am sure I have reason to be main glad of it, for she led me a wearisome life; but that's the way with them all.

AIR.

*A plague o' these wenches, they make such a pother,
When once they have let'n a man have his will;
They're always a whining for something or other,
And cry he's unkind in his carriage.*

What tho' she speaks them ne'er so fairly,

Still they keep teasing, teasing on:

You cannot persuade 'em,

Till promise you've made 'em;

And after they've got it,

They tell you, od rot it!

Their character's blasted, they're ruin'd, undone;

Then to be sure, sir,

There is but one cure, sir,

And all their discourse is of marriage. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Greenhouse.

Enter Young MEADOWS.

Young M. I am glad I had the precaution to bring this suit of clothes in my bundle, though I hardly know myself in them again. However, my gardener's jacket goes on no more. I wonder this girl does not come. [Looking at his watch.] Perhaps she won't come. Why, then I'll go into the village, take a post-chaise, and depart without any further ceremony.

AIR.

*How much superior beauty aces,
The coldest bosoms find;
But with resistless force it draws,
To sense and sweetness join'd.
The casket, where, to outward show,
The workman's art is seen,
Is doubly valu'd when we know
It holds a gem within.*

Hark! she comes.

Enter Sir WILLIAM MEADOWS and HAWTHORN.

Young M. Confusion! my father! What can this mean?

Sir W. Tom, are not you a sad boy, Tom, to bring me a hundred and forty miles here? May I never do an ill turn, but you deserve to have your head broke; and I have a good mind, partly. What, sirrah, don't you think it worth your while to speak to me?

Young M. Forgive me, sir; I own I have been in fault.

Sir W. In fault! to run away from me because I was going to do you good. May I never do an ill turn, Mr. Hawthorn, if I did not pick out as fine a girl for him, partly, as any in England! and the rascal ran away from me, and came here and turn'd gardener. And pray what did you propose to yourself, Tom? I know you were always fond of botany, as they call it: did you intend to keep the trade going, and advertise fruit trees and flower-shrubs, to be had at Meadows' nursery?

Haw. No, sir William. I apprehend the young gentleman designed to lay by the profession; for he has quitted the habit already.

Young M. I am so astonished to see you here, sir, that I don't know what to say: but I assure you, if you had not come, I should have returned home directly. Pray, sir, how did you find me out?

Sir W. No matter, Tom, no matter: it was partly by accident as a body may say; but what does that signify? Tell me, boy, how stands your stomach towards matrimony: do you think you could digest a wife now?

Young M. Pray, sir, don't mention it: I shall always behave myself as a dutiful son ought: I will never marry without your consent, and I hope you won't force me to do it against my own

Sir W. Is not this highly provoking, master Hawthorn? Why, sirrah, did you ever see the lady I designed for you?

Young M. Sir, I don't doubt the lady's merit; but, at present, I am not disposed—

Haw. Nay, but, young gentleman, fair and softly; you should pay some respect to your father in this matter.

Sir W. Respect, master Hawthorn! I tell you he shall marry her, or I'll disinherit him! there's once. Look you, Tom; not to make any more words of the matter, I have brought the lady here with me, and I'll see you contracted before we part: or you shall delve and plant cucumbers as long as you live.

Young M. Have you brought the lady here, sir? I am sorry for it.

Sir W. Why sorry? What, then, you won't marry her? We'll see that! Pray, master Hawthorn, conduct the fair one in. [Exit HAWTHORN.] Ay, sir, you may fret and dance about; trot at the rate of fifteen miles an hour, if you please; but, marry whip me, I'm resolved.

Enter HAWTHORN and ROSETTA.

Haw. Here is the lady, sir William.

Sir W. Come in, madam; but turn your face from him; he would not marry you because he had not seen you: but I'll let him know my choice shall be his, and he shall consent to marry you before he sees you, or not an acre of estate. Pray, sir, walk this way.

Young M. Sir, I cannot help thinking your conduct a little extraordinary; but since you urge me so closely, I must tell you my affections are engaged.

Sir W. How, Tom, how? And pray sir, who are your affections engaged to? Let me know that.

Young M. To a person, sir, whose rank and fortune may be no recommendation to her, but whose charms and accomplishments entitle her to a monarch. I am sorry, sir, it's impossible for me to comply with your commands, and I hope you will not be offended if I quit your presence.

Sir W. Not I, not in the least: go about your business.

Young M. Sir, I obey.

Haw. Now, madam, is the time.

[ROSETTA advances. Young MEADOWS turns round, and sees her.]

AIR.—ROSETTA.

*When we see a lover languish,
And his truth and honour prove,*

*Ah! how sweet to heal his anguish,
And repay him love for love.*

Sir W. Well, Tom, will you go away from me now?
Haw. Perhaps, sir William, your son does not like the lady; and, if so, pray don't put a force upon his inclination.

Young M. You need not have taken this method, sir, to let me see you are acquainted with my folly, whatever my inclinations are.

Sir W. Well but, Tom, suppose I give my consent to your marrying this young woman?

Young M. Your consent, sir?

Sir W. May I never do an ill turn, Tom, if it is not truth! this is my friend's daughter.

Young M. Sir!

Ros. Even so, 'tis very true, indeed. In short, you have not been a more whimsical gentleman, than I have a gentlewoman; but you see we are designed for one another; 'tis plain.

Young M. I know not, madam, what I either hear or see; a thousand things are crowding on my imagination, while, like one just awakened from a dream, I doubt which is reality, which delusion.

Sir W. Well then, Tom, come into the air a bit, and recover yourself.

Young M. Nay, dear sir, have a little patience; do you give her to me?

Sir W. Give her to you! ay, that I do, and my blessing into the bargain.

Young M. Then, sir, I am the happiest man in the world! I inquire no further; here I fix the utmost limits of my hopes and happiness.

DUET.

Young M. *All I wish, in her obtaining,
Fortune can no more impart;*

Ros. *Let my eyes, my thoughts explaining,
Speak the feelings of my heart.*

Young M. *Joy and pleasure never ceasing,
Love with length of years increasing.*

Ros. *Together. Thus my heart and hand surrender,
Here my faith and truth I plight;
Constant still, and kind, and tender,
May our flames burn ever bright!*

Haw. Give you joy, sir; and you, fair lady. And, under favour, I'll salute you too, if there's no fear of jealousy.

Young M. And may I believe this? Pr'ythee tell me, dear Rosetta!

Ros. Step into the house, and I'll tell you everything; I must entreat the good offices of sir William and Mr. Hawthorn immediately: for I am in the utmost uneasiness about my poor friend, Lucinda.

Haw. Why, what's the matter?

Ros. I don't know; but I have reason to fear I left her just now in very disagreeable circumstances; however, I hope if there's any mischief fallen out between her father and her lover—

Haw. The music-master! I thought so.

Sir W. What, is there a lover in the case? May I never do an ill turn, but I am glad, so I am! for we'll make a double wedding; and, by way of celebrating it, take a trip to London, to show the brides some of the pleasures of the town. Come, child, go before us. [Ereunt Young M. and Ros.] And, master Hawthorn, you shall be of the party.

Haw. Thank you, sir William; I'll go into the house with you, and to church, to see the young folks married; but as to London, I beg to be excused.

AIR.

*If ever I'm catch'd in those regions of smoke,
That seat of confusion and noise,
May I ne'er know the sweets of a slumber unbroke,
Nor the pleasure the country enjoys.
Nay more, let them take me, to punish my sin,
Where, gaping, the cocknies they fleece;
Clap me up with their monsters, cry, masters walk in,
And show me for two pence a-piece.* [Ereunt.

SCENE III.—Justice Woodcock's Hall.

Enter Justice WOODCOCK, Mrs. DEBORAH WOODCOCK, LUCINDA, EUSTACE, and HODGE.

Mrs. D. Why, brother, do you think I can't hear, or see, or make use of my senses? I tell you, I left that fellow locked up in her closet; and, while I have been with you, they have broke open the door, and got him out again.

Jus. W. Well, you hear what they say.

Mrs. D. I care not what they say; it's you encourage them in their impudence. Harkye, hussy, will you face me down that I did not lock the fellow up?

Luc. Really, aunt, I don't know what you mean; when you talk intelligibly, I'll answer you.

Eust. Seriously, madam, this is carrying the jest a little too far.

Mrs. D. What, then, I did not catch you together in her chamber, nor overhear your design of going off to-night, nor find the bundles packed up—

Eust. Ha, ha, ha!

Luc. Why, aunt, you rave.

Mrs. D. Brother, as I am a Christian woman, she confessed the whole affair to me from first to last; and in this very place was down upon her marrow-bones for half an hour together, to beg I would conceal it from you.

Hodge. Oh Lord! Oh Lord!

Mrs. D. What, sirrah, would you brazen me too? Take that. [Boxes his ears.]

Hodge. I wish you would keep your hands to yourself! You strike me, because you have been telling his worship stories.

Jus. W. Why, sister, you are tipsy!

Mrs. D. I tipsy, brother! I—that never touch a drop of any thing strong from year's end to year's end; but now and then, a little anniseed water, when I have got the cholic.

Luc. Well, aunt, you have been complaining of the stomach-ache all day; and may have taken too powerful a dose of your cordial.

Jus. W. Come, come, I see well enough how it is: this is a lie of her own invention, to make herself appear wise: but, you simpleton, did you not know I must find you out?

Enter Sir WILLIAM MEADOWS, HAWTHORN, ROSETTA, and Young MEADOWS.

Young M. Bless me, sir! look who is yonder.

Sir W. Cocksbones! Jack, honest Jack, are you there?

Eust. Plague on't, this rencounter is unlucky; sir William, your servant.

Sir W. Your servant, again and again, heartily your servant; may I never do an ill turn, but I am glad to meet you.

Jus. W. Pray, sir William, are you acquainted with this person?

Sir W. What, with Jack Eustace? why he's my kinsman: his mother and I were cousin-germans once removed, and Jack's a very worthy young fellow; may I never do an ill turn, if I tell a word of a lie.

Jus. W. Well but, sir William, let me tell you, you know nothing of the matter; this man is a music-master; a thrumner of wire, and a scraper of catgut, and teaches my daughter to sing.

Sir W. What, Jack Eustace a music master! no, no: I know him better.

Eust. 'Sdeath, why should I attempt to carry on this absurd farce any longer? what that gentleman tells you is very true, sir; I am no music-master, indeed.

Jus. W. You are not? you own it then?

Eust. Nay more, sir, I am, as this lady has represented me, [Pointing to Mrs. DEBORAH.—your daughter's lover: whom, with her own consent, I did intend to have carried off this night; but now that sir William Meadows is here, to tell you who and what I am, I throw myself upon your generosity; from which I expect greater advantages than I could reap from any imposition on your unsuspicious nature.

Mrs. D. Well, brother, what have you to say for yourself now? You have made a precious day's work of it! Had my advice been taken—Oh, I am ashamed of you; but you are a weak man, and it can't be help'd; however, you should let wiser heads direct you.

Luc. Dear papa, pardon me.

Sir W. Ay, do, sir, forgive her; my cousin Jack will make her a good husband, I'll answer for it.

Ros. Stand out of the way, and let me speak two or three words to his worship. Come, my dear sir, though you refuse all the world, I am sure you can deny me nothing. Love is a venial fault. You know what I mean. Be reconciled to your daughter, I conjure you, by the memory of our past affections. What, not a word?

AIR.

*Go, naughty man, I can't abide you;
Are then your vows so soon forgot?
Ah! now I see if I had tried you,
What would have been my hopeful lot.*

*But here I charge you,—make them happy;
Bless the fond pair, and crown their bliss:*

*Come, be a dear, good-natured pappy,
And I'll reward you with a kiss.*

Mrs. D. Come, turn out of the house, and be thankful that my brother does not hang you, for he could do it: he's a justice of peace; turn out of the house, I say:—

Jus. W. Who gave you authority to turn him out of the house? he shall stay where he is.

Mrs. D. He shan't marry my niece.

Jus. W. Shan't he? but I'll show you the difference now; I say he shall marry her, and what will you do about it?

Mrs. D. And you will give him your estate too, will you?

Jus. W. Yes, I will.

Mrs. D. Why I'm sure he's a vagabond.

Jus. W. I like him the better; I would have him a vagabond.

Mrs. D. Brother, brother!

Haw. Come, come, madam, all's very well; and I see my neighbour is what I always thought him, a man of sense and prudence.

Sir W. May I never do an ill turn, but I say so too.

Jus. W. Here, young fellow, take my daughter, and bless you both together; but hark you, no money till I die. Sister Deborah, you're a fool.

Mrs. D. Ah, brother, brother, you're a silly old man. [Exit.]

Haw. Adds me, sir, here are some of your neighbours come to visit you, and I suppose, to make up the company of your statute ball; yonder's music too, I see; shall we enjoy ourselves?

Enter Villagers, &c.

If so, give me your hand.

Jus. W. Why here's my hand, and we will enjoy ourselves. Heaven bless you both, children, I say.

FINALE.

*Hence with cares, complaints, and frowning,
Welcome jollity and joy;
Every grief in pleasure drowning,
Mirth this happy night employ.
Let's to friendship do our duty,
Laugh and sing some good old strain;
Drink a health to love and beauty—
May they long in triumph reign.*

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Chamber in Colonel Oldboy's house

Colonel OLDBOY is discovered at breakfast, reading a newspaper; at a little distance from the tea-table, sits JENKINS; and on the opposite side, DIANA, who appears playing upon a harpsichord. A Girl attending.

TRIO.

*Ah! how delightful the morning,
How sweet are the prospects it yields;
Summer luxuriant adorning
The gardens, the groves, and the fields.*

*Be grateful to the season,
Its pleasures let's enjoy;
Kind nature gives, and reason
Permits us to enjoy.*

[Exit Maid.

Col. Well said Dy, thank you Dy. This, master Jenkins, is the way I make my daughter entertain me every morning at breakfast. Come here and kiss me, you slut; come here and kiss me, you baggage.

Dia. Lord, papa, you call one such names—

Col. A fine girl, master Jenkins; a devilish fine girl! she has got my eye to a twinkle. There's fire for you—spirit!—I design to marry her to a duke: how much money do you think a duke would expect with such a wench?

Jenk. Why, Colonel, with submission, I think there is no occasion to go out of our own country here; we have never a duke in it, I believe, but we have many an honest gentleman, who, in my opinion, might deserve the young lady.

Col. So, you would have me marry Dy to a country 'squire, eh! How say you to this, Dy? would not you rather be married to a duke?

Dia. So my husband's a rake, papa, I don't care what he is.

Col. A rake! you d—d confounded little baggage; why you would not wish to marry a rake, would you? So her husband is a rake, she does not care what he is! Ha, ha, ha, ha!

Dia. Well, but listen to me, papa: when you go out with your gun, do you take any pleasure in shooting the poor tame ducks and chickens in your yard? No, the partridge, the pheasant, the woodcock, are the game; there is some sport in bringing them down, because they are wild; and it is just the same with an husband or a lover. I would not waste powder and shot, to wound one of your sober, pretty-behaved gentlemen; but to hit a libertine, extravagant, madcap fellow, to take him upon the wing—

Col. Do you hear her, master Jenkins? Ha, ha, ha!

Jenk. Well, but, good Colonel, what do you say to my worthy and honourable patron here, Sir John Flowerdale? He has an estate of eight thousand pounds a year, as well paid rents as any in the kingdom, and but one only daughter to enjoy it; and yet he is willing, you see, to give this daughter to your son.

Dia. Pray, Mr. Jenkins, how does Miss Clarissa and our university friend, Mr. Lionel? That is the only grave young man I ever liked, and the only handsome one I ever was acquainted with, that did not make love to me.

Col. Ay, master Jenkins, who is this Lionel? They say he is a d—d witty, knowing fellow; and egad, I think him well enough for one brought up in a college.

Jenk. His father was a general officer, a particular friend of Sir John's; who, like many more brave men, that live and die in defending their country, left little else than honour behind him. Sir John sent this young man, at his own expense, to Oxford; during the vacation, he is come to pay us a visit, and Sir John intends that he shall shortly take orders for a very considerable benefice in the gift of the family, the present incumbent of which is an aged man.

Dia. The last time I was at your house, he was teaching Miss Clarissa mathematics and philosophy. Lord, what a strange brain I have! If I was to sit down to distract myself with such studies—

Col. Go, hussy, let some of your brother's rascals inform their master that he has been long enough at his toilet; here is a message from Sir John Flowerdale. You a brain for mathematics indeed! We shall have women waiting to head our regiments to-morrow or next day.

Dia. Well, papa, and suppose we did. I believe, in a battle of the sexes, you men would hardly get the better of us.

SONG.

*To rob them of strength, when wise nature thought fit
By women to still do her duty,
Instead of a sword she endu'd them with wit,
And gave them a shield in their beauty.*

*Sound, sound, then, the trumpet, both sexes to arms,
Our tyrants at once and protectors!
We quickly shall see, whether courage or charms,
Decide for the Helens or Hector.* [Exit.

Col. Well, master Jenkins, don't you think now that a nobleman, a duke, an earl, or a marquis, might be content to share his title? I say, you understand me—with a sweetener of thirty or forty thousand pounds, to pay off mortgages? Besides, there is a prospect of my whole estate; for I dare swear, her brother will never have any children.

Jenk. I should be concerned at that, Colonel, when there are two such fortunes to descend to his heirs, as your's and Sir John Flowerdale's.

Col. Why look you, master Jenkins; Sir John Flowerdale is an honest gentleman; our families are nearly related; we have been neighbours time out of mind; and if he and I have an odd dispute now and then, it is not for want of a cordial esteem at bottom. He is going to marry his daughter to my son; she is a beautiful girl, an elegant girl, a sensible girl, a worthy girl; and—a word in your ear—don't me if I can't very sorry for her.

Jenk. Sorry, Colonel!

Col. Ay—between ourselves, master Jenkins, my son won't do.

Jenk. How do you mean?

Col. I tell you, master Jenkins, he won't do—he is not the thing—a prig. At sixteen years old, or thereabouts, he was a bold, sprightly boy, as you should see in a thousand; could drink his pint of port, or his bottle of claret—now he mixes all his wine with water.

Jenk. Oh! if that be his only fault, Colonel, he will ne'er make the worse husband, I'll answer for it.

Col. You know my wife is a woman of quality—I was prevailed upon to send him to be brought up by her brother, lord Jessamy, who had no children of his own, and promised to leave him an estate: he has got the estate indeed, but the fellow has taken his lordship's name for it. Now, master Jenkins, I would be glad to know, how the name of Jessamy is better than that of Oldboy?

Jenk. Well! but, Colonel, it is allowed on all hands, that his lordship has given your son an excellent education.

Col. Psha! he sent him to the university, and to travel, forsooth; but what of that? I was abroad, and at the university myself, and never a rush the better for either. I quarrelled with his lordship about six years before his death, and so had not an opportunity of seeing how the youth went on; if I had, master Jenkins, I would no more have suffered him to be made such a monkey of! He has been in my house but three days, and it is all turned topsyturvy by him and his rascally servants; then his chamber is like a perfumer's shop, with wash-balls, pastes, and pomatum—and, do you know, he had the impudence to tell me yesterday, at my own table, that I did not know how to behave myself!

Jenk. Pray, Colonel, how does my lady Mary?

Col. What, my wife? in the old way, master Jenkins; always complaining; ever something the matter with her head, or her back, or her legs: but we have had the devil to pay lately—she and I did not speak to one another for three weeks.

Jen. How so, sir?

Col. A little affair of jealousy. You must know my game-keeper's daughter has had a child, and the plaguy baggage takes it into her head to lay it to me. Upon my soul, it is a fine fat, chubby infant as ever I set my eyes on: I have sent it to nurse; and, between you and me, I believe I shall leave it a fortune.

Jenk. Ah, Colonel, you will never give over.

Col. You know my lady has a pretty vein of poetry: she writ me an heroic epistle upon it, where she calls me her dear, false Damon; so I let her cry a little, promised to do so no more, and now we are as good friends as ever.

Jenk. Well, Colonel, I must take my leave; I have delivered my message, and Sir John may expect the pleasure of your company to dinner.

Col. Ay, ay, we'll come—plague o' ceremony among friends. But won't you stay to see my son? I have sent to him, and suppose he will be here as soon as his valet-de-chambre will give him leave.

Jenk. There is no occasion, good sir: present my humble respects, that's all.

Col. Well but, zounds! Jenkins, you must not go till you drink something; let you and I have a bottle of hock.

Jenk. Not for the world, Colonel; I never touch any thing strong in the morning.

Col. Never touch any thing strong! Why one bottle won't hurt you, man; this is old, and as mild as milk.

Jenk. Well, but, Colonel, pray excuse me.

SONG.

*To tell you the truth,
In the days of my youth,
As mirth and nature bid,
I lik'd a glass,
And I lov'd a lass,
And I did as youngers did.
But now I am old,
With grief be it told,
I must those freaks forbear;
At sixty-three,
'Twixt you and me,
A man grows wiser for wear.* [Exit.

Enter Mr. JESSAMY, Lady MARY OLDBOY, and Maid.

Lady M. Shut the door; why don't you shut the door there? Have you a mind I should catch my death? This house is absolutely the cave of Æolus; one had as good live on the eddy-stone, or in a windmill.

Mr. Jes. I thought they told your ladyship that there was a messenger here from Sir John Flowerdale.

Col. Well, sir, and so there was; but he had not patience to wait upon your curling-irons. Mr. Jenkins was here, Sir John Flowerdale's steward, who has lived in the family these forty years.

Mr. Jes. And pray, sir, might not Sir John Flowerdale have come himself? if he had been acquainted with the rules of good breeding, he would have known that I ought to have been visited.

Lady M. Upon my word, Colonel, this is a solecism.

Col. 'Sblood, my lady, it's none. Sir John Flowerdale came but last night from his sister's seat in the west, and is a little out of order. But I suppose he thinks he ought to appear before him with his daughter in one hand, and his rent-roll in the other, and cry, "Sir, pray do me the favour to accept them."

Lady M. Nay, but Mr. Oldboy, permit me to say—

Col. He need not give himself so many affected airs; I think it's very well if he gets such a girl for going for: she's one of the handsomest and richest in this country, and more than he deserves.

Mr. Jes. That's an exceeding fine china jar your ladyship has got in the next room; I saw the fellow of it the other day at Williams's, and will send to my agent to purchase it: it is the true matchless old blue and white. Lady Betty Barebones has a couple that she gave an hundred guineas for, on board an Indianman; but she reckons them at a hundred and twenty five, on account of half a dozen plates, four nankeen beakers, and a couple of shaking mandarins, that the custom-house officer took from under her petticoats.

Col. Did you ever hear the like of this? He's chattering about old china, while I am talking to him of a fine girl. I tell you what, Mr. Jessamy, since that's the name you choose to be called by, I have a good mind to knock you down.

Mr. Jes. Knock me down, Colonel! What do you mean? I must tell you, sir, this is language to which I have not been accustomed; and, if you think proper to continue to repeat it, I shall be under the necessity of quitting your house.

Col. Quitting my house?

Mr. Jes. Yes, sir, inconceivably.

Col. Why, sir, am not I your father, sir? and have I not a right to talk to you as I like? I will, sirrah. But, perhaps, I mayn't be your father, and I hope not.

Lady M. Heavens and earth, Mr. Oldboy!

Col. What's the matter, madam; I mean, madam, that he might have been changed at nurse, madam—and I believe he was.

Mr. Jes. Huh! huh! huh!

Col. Do you laugh at me, you saucy jackanapes!

Lady M. Who's there?—Somebody bring me a chair. Really, Mr. Oldboy, you throw my weakly frame into such repeated convulsions. But I see your aim: you want to lay me in my grave, and you will very soon have that satisfaction.

Col. I can't bear the sight of him.

Lady M. Open that window, give me air, or I shall faint.

Mr. Jes. Hold, hold, let me tie a handkerchief about my neck first. This cursed sharp north-wind—Antoine, bring down my muff.

Col. Ay, do, and his great coat.

Enter ANTOINE, with great coat and muff.

Lady M. Marg'ret, some hartshorn. [Exit Antoine.] My dear Mr. Oldboy, why will you fly out in this way, when you know how it shocks my tender nerves?

Col. 'Sblood, madam, its enough to make a man mad.

Lady M. Hartshorn! hartshorn!

Enter Maid.

Mr. Jes. Colonel

Col. Do you hear the puppy? [question?]

Mr. Jes. Will you give me leave to ask one

Col. I don't know whether I will or not.

Mr. Jes. I should be glad to know, that's all, what single circumstance in my conduct, carriage, or figure, you can possibly find fault with—perhaps I may be brought to reform. Pr'ythee let me hear from your own mouth; then, seriously, what it is you do like, and what it is you do not like.

Col. Hum!

Mr. Jes. Be ingenuous; speak, and spare not.

Col. You would know?

SONG.

*Zounds, sir! then I'll tell you without any jest,
The thing of all things, which I hate and detest;*

A corcomb, a fop,

A dainty milk-sop,

Who, essenc'd and dizen'd from bottom to top,

Looks just like a doll for a milliner's shop:

A thing full of prate,

And pride and conceit;

All fashion, no weight;

Who shrugs and takes snuff,

And carries a muff;

A minikin,

Finicking,

French powder'd-puff;

And now, sir, I fancy, I've told you enough. [Exit.

Mr. Jes. What's the matter with the Colonel, madam; does your ladyship know?

Lady M. Heigho! don't be surprised, my dear; it was the same thing with my late dear brother, Lord Jessamy; they never could agree: that good-natured, friendly soul, knowing the delicacy of my constitution, has often said, "sister Mary, I pity you." Not but your father has good qualities, and I assure you I remember him a very fine gentleman himself. When he first paid his addresses to me, he was called agreeable Jack Oldboy, though I married him without the consent of your noble grandfather.

Mr. Jes. I think he ought to be proud of me; I believe there's many a duke, nay prince, who would esteem themselves happy in having such a son.

Lady M. Yes, my dear; but your sister was always your father's favourite: he intends to give her a prodigious fortune, and sets his heart upon seeing her a woman of quality.

Mr. Jes. He should wish to see her look a little like a gentlewoman first. When she was in London, last winter, I am told she was taken notice of by a few men; but she wants air, manner—

Lady M. And has not a bit of the genius of our family; and I never knew a woman of it but herself without. I have tried her; about three years ago I set her to translate a little French song; I found she had not even an idea of versification, and she put down love and joy for rhyme, so I gave her over.

Mr. Jes. Why, indeed, she appears to have more of the Thalestris than the Sappho about her.

Lady M. Well, my dear, I must go and dress myself; though, I protest, I am fitter for my bed than my coach. And condescend to the Colonel a little; do, my dear, if it be only to oblige your mamma. [Exit.]

Mr. Jes. Let me consider; I am going to visit a country baronet here, who would fain prevail upon me to marry his daughter; the old gentleman has heard of my parts and understanding, miss of my figure and address. But, suppose I should not like her when I see her? Why, positively, then I will not have her; the treaty's at an end, and sans compliment, we break up the congress. But, won't that be cruel, after having suffered her to flatter herself with hopes, and shewing myself to her? She's a strange dowdy, I dare believe; however, she brings provision with her for a separate maintenance. Antoine, appez la toilette. I am going to spend a cursed day; that I perceive already; I wish it was over, I dread it as much as a general election. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Study in Sir John Flowerdale's house.

Enter CLARISSA.

SONG.

*Immortal powers protect me,
Assist, support, direct me;
Relieve a heart oppress.
Ah! why this palpitation?
Cease busy perturbation,
And let me, let me rest.*

Enter JENNY.

Jen. My dear lady, what ails you?

Cla. Nothing, Jenny, nothing.

Jen. Pardon me, madam, there is something ails you indeed. Lord, what signifies all the grandeur and riches in this world, if they can't procure one content? I am sure it vexes me to the heart, so it does, to see such a dear, sweet, worthy young lady as you are pining yourself to death.

Cla. Jenny, you are a good girl, and I am very much obliged to you for feeling so much on my account; but, in a little time, I hope I shall be easier.

Jen. Why, now, here to-day, madam, for certain you ought to be merry to-day, when there's a fine gentleman coming to court you; but, if you like any one else better, I am sure I wish you had him, with all my soul.

Cla. Suppose, Jenny, I was so unfortunate as to like a man without my father's approbation, would you wish me married to him?

Jen. I wish you married to any one, madam, that could make you happy.

Cla. Heigho!

Jen. Madam, madam! yonder's Sir John and Mr. Lionel on the terrace; I believe they are coming up here. Poor, dear Mr. Lionel, he does not seem to be in over-great spirits either. To be sure, madam, it's no business of mine; but, I believe, if the truth was known, there are those in the house who would give more than ever I shall be worth, or any the likes of me, to prevent the marriage of a certain person that shall be nameless.

Cla. What do you mean? I don't understand you.

Jen. I hope you are not angry, madam?

Cla. Ah! Jenny—

Jen. Lauk, madam, do you think, when Mr. Lionel's a clergyman, he'll be obliged to cut off his hair? I'm sure, it will be a thousand pities; and your great pudding-sleeves! Lord! they'll quite spoil his shape, and the fall of his shoulders. Well, madam, if I was a lady of large fortune, I'll be hanged if Mr. Lionel should be a parson, if I could help it.

Cla. I'm going into my dressing-room. It seems, then, Mr. Lionel is a great favourite of your's; but pray, Jenny, have a care how you talk in this manner to any one else.

Jen. Me talk, madam! I thought you knew me better; and, my dear lady, keep up your spirits.

I'm sure I have dressed you to day as nice as hands and pins can make you.

SONG.

*I'm but a poor servant, 'tis true, ma'am;
But was I a lady, like you, ma'am,
In grief would I sit? the dickens a bit;
No, faith, I would search the world thro', ma'am,
To find what my liking could hit.
Set in case a young man,
In my fancy there ran;
It might anger my friends and relations:
But, if I had regard,
It should go very hard,
Or I'd follow my own inclinations.* [Exeunt.]

Enter SIR JOHN FLOWERDALE and LIONEL.

Sir J. Indeed, Lionel, I will not hear of it. What! to run from us all of a sudden, this way; and at such a time too; the eve of my daughter's wedding, as I may call it; when your company must be doubly agreeable, as well as necessary to us? I am sure you have no studies at present that require your attendance at Oxford; I must, therefore, insist on your putting such thoughts out of your head.

Lio. Upon my word, sir, I have been so long from the university, that it is time for me to think of returning. It is true, I have no absolute studies; but really, sir, I shall be obliged to you, if you will give me leave to go.

Sir J. Come, come, my dear Lionel, I have for some time observed a more than ordinary gravity growing upon you, and I am not to learn the reason of it; I know, to minds serious, and well inclined, like your's, the sacred functions you are about to embrace—

Lio. Dear sir, your goodness to me, of every kind, is so unmerited! Your condescension, your friendly attentions; in short, sir, I want words to express my sense of obligations.

Sir J. Fie, fie! no more of them. By my last letters, I find that my old friend, the rector, still continues in good health, considering his advanced years. You may imagine I am far from desiring the death of so worthy and pious a man; yet, I must own, at this time, I could wish you were in orders, as you might then perform the ceremony of my daughter's marriage, which would give me a secret satisfaction.

Lio. No doubt, sir; any office in my power, that could be instrumental to the happiness of any in your family, I should perform with pleasure.

Sir J. Why, really, Lionel, from the character of her intended husband, I have no room to doubt, but this match will make Clarissa perfectly happy; to be sure, the alliance is the most eligible for both families.

Lio. If the gentleman is sensible of his happiness in the alliance, sir.

Sir J. The fondness of a father is always suspected of partiality; yet, I believe, I may venture to say, that few young women will be found more unexceptionable than my daughter: her person is agreeable, her temper sweet, her understanding good, and, with the obligations she has to your instructions—

Lio. You do my endeavours too much honour, sir. I have been able to add nothing to Miss Flowerdale's accomplishments, but a little knowledge in matters of small importance to a mind already so well improved.

Sir J. I don't think so; a little knowledge, even in those matters, is necessary for a woman, in whom I am far from considering ignorance as a desirable characteristic; when intelligence is not attended with impertinent affectation, it teaches them to judge with precision, and gives them a degree of solidity necessary for the companion of a sensible man.

Lio. Yonder's Mr. Jenkins; I fancy he's looking for you, sir.

Sir J. I see him; he's come back from Colonel Oldboy's: I have a few words to say to him; and will return to you again in a minute. [Exit.]

Lio. To be a burthen to one's self, to wage continual war with one's own passions, forced to combat, unable to overcome! But see, she appears whose presence turns all my sufferings into transport, and makes even misery itself delightful.

Enter CLARISSA.

Perhaps, madam, you are not at leisure now; otherwise, if you thought proper, we would resume the subject we were upon yesterday.

Cla. I am sure, sir, I give you a great deal of trouble.

Lio. Madam, you give me no trouble: I should think every hour of my life happily employed in your service; and as this is probably the last time I shall have the satisfaction of attending you upon the same occasion—

Cla. Upon my word, Mr. Lionel, I think myself extremely obliged to you; and shall ever consider the enjoyment of your friendship—

Lio. My friendship, madam, can be of little moment to you; but if the most perfect adoration, if the warmest wishes for your felicity, though I should never be witness of it; if these, madam, can have any merit to continue in your remembrance a man once honoured with a share of your esteem—

Cla. Hold, sir—I think I hear somebody.

Lio. If you please, madam, we will resume our studies. [They sit.] Have you looked at the book I left you yesterday?

Cla. Really, sir, I have been so much disturbed in my thoughts for these two or three days past, that I have not been able to look at any thing.

Lio. I am sorry to hear that, madam; I hope there was nothing particular to disturb you. The care sir John takes to dispose of your hand in a manner suitable to your birth and fortune?

Cla. I don't know, sir; I own I am disturbed; I own I am uneasy; there is something weighs upon my heart, which I would fain disclose.

Lio. Upon your heart, madam? did you say your heart?

Cla. I did, sir—I—

Enter JENNY.

Jen. Madam! madam! here's a coach and six driving up the avenue: it's Colonel Oldboy's family; and, I believe, the gentleman is in it that's coming to court you. Lord, I must run and have a peep at him out of the window. [Exit.]

Lio. Madam, I'll take my leave.

Cla. Why so, sir? Bless me, Mr. Lionel! what's the matter? You turn pale.

Lio. Madam!

Cla. Pray speak to me, sir; you tremble. Tell me the cause of this sudden change. How are you? Where's your disorder?

Lio. Oh, fortune! fortune!

SONG.

*You ask me in vain,
Of what ills I complain,
Where harbours the torment I find;
In my head, in my heart,
It invades ev'ry part,
And subdues both my body and mind.*

*Each effort I try,
Ev'ry med'cine apply,
The pangs of my soul to appease;
But doom'd to endure,
What I mean for a cure,
Turns poison, and feeds the disease.* [Exit.]

Enter DIANA.

Dia. My dear Clarissa, I'm glad I have found you alone. For heaven's sake, don't let any one break in upon us; and give me leave to sit down with you a little. I am in such a tremour, such a panic—

Cla. Mercy on us, what has happened?

Dia. You may remember I told you, that when I was last winter in London, I was followed by an odious fellow, one Harman: I can't say but the wretch pleased me, though he is but a younger brother, and not worth sixpence; and, in short, when I was leaving town, I promised to correspond with him.

Cla. Do you think that was prudent?

Dia. Madness! But this is not the worst; for what do you think? the creature had the assurance to write to me about three weeks ago, desiring permission to come down and spend the summer at my father's.

Cla. At your father's?

Dia. Ay, who never saw him, knows nothing of him, and would as soon consent to my marrying a horse-jockey. He told me a long story of some tale he intended to invent, to make my father receive him as an indifferent person; and some gentleman in London, he said, would procure him a letter that should give it a face; and he longed to see me so, he said he could not live without it; and if he could be permitted but to spend a week with me—

Cla. Well, and what answer did you make?

Dia. Oh! abused him, and refused to listen to any such thing; but—I vow I tremble while I tell it you—just before we left our house, the impudent monster arrived there, attended by a couple of servants, and is now actually coming here with my father.

Cla. Upon my word, this is a dreadful thing.

Dia. Dreadful, my dear! I happened to be at the window as he came into the court, and I declare I had like to have fainted away.

Cla. Well, Diana, with regard to your affair, I think you must find some method of immediately informing this gentleman, that you consider the outrage he has committed against you in the most heinous light, and insist upon his going away directly.

Dia. Why, I believe that will be the best way; but then he'll be begging my pardon, and asking to stay.

Cla. Why then you must tell him positively you won't consent to it; and if he persists in so extravagant a design, tell him you'll never see him again as long as you live.

Dia. Must I tell him so?

SONG.

*For my heart beats so pit-pa! throbbing,
For my heart beats whene'er he's nigh;
Then when he sues,
Can I refuse
To hear him plead?—
Not I indeed,
For my heart, &c.
When he softly sighs,
And I meet his eyes,
So well their meaning's understood;
Could I bid him go?
Ah! no, no, no,*

I'm sure I could not if I would.

For my heart, &c.

How oft have I try'd,

With our sex's pride,

And scorn, his love to treat;

But again and again,

I have found 'twas in vain,

He talks so when we meet.

Tho' my heart, &c.

[Exit.

Cl. How easy to direct the conduct of others; how hard to regulate our own. I can give my friend advice, while I am conscious of the same indiscretions in myself. Yet is it criminal to know the most worthy, most amiable man in the world, and not to be insensible to his merit? But my father, the kindest, best of fathers—will he approve the choice I have made? Nay, has he not made another choice for me? And, after all, how can I be sure that the man I love, loves me again? He never told me so; but his looks, his actions, his present anxiety, sufficiently declare what his delicacy, his generosity, will not suffer him to utter.

SONG.

Ye gloomy thoughts, ye fears perverse,

Like sullen vapours all disperse,

And scatter in the wind!

Delusive phantoms, brood of night,

No more my sickly fancy fright,

No more my reason blind.

'Tis done; I feel my soul releas'd;

The visions fly, the mists are chas'd,

Nor leave a cloud behind.

[Exit.

SCENE III.—A side View of Sir John Flowerdale's house.

HARMAN enters with COLONEL OLDROY.

Col. Well, and how does my old friend, Dick Rantum, do? I have not seen him these twelve years: he was an honest, worthy fellow as ever breathed; I remember he kept a girl in London, and was cursedly plagued by his wife's relations.

Har. Sir Richard was always a man of spirit, colonel.

Col. But as to this business of your's, which he tells me of in his letter—I don't see much in it: an affair with a citizen's daughter—pinked her brother in a duel—Is the fellow likely to die?

Har. Why, sir, we hope not; but as the matter is dubious, and will probably make some noise, I thought it was better to be for a little time out of the way; when hearing my case, Sir Richard Rantum mentioned you; he said, he was sure you would permit me to remain at your house for a few days, and offered me a recommendation.

Col. And there's likely to be a brat in the case; and the girl's friends are in business.—I'll tell you what will be the consequence, then; they will be for going to law with you for a maintenance; but no matter, I'll take the affair in hand for you; make me your solicitor; and, if you are obliged to pay for a single spoonful of pap, I'll be content to father all the children in the Foundling Hospital.

Har. You are very kind, sir.

Col. But hold;—hark you! you say there's money to be had;—suppose you were to marry the wench?

Har. Do you think, sir, that would be so right after what has happened? Besides, there's a strong objection;—to tell you the truth, I am honourably in love in another place.

Col. Oh! you are.

Har. Yes, sir, but there are obstacles—a father: in short, sir, the mistress of my heart lives in this very county, which makes even my present situation a little irksome.

Col. In this county? Zounds! then I am sure I am acquainted with her, and the first letter of her name is—

Har. Excuse me, sir, I have some particular reasons—

Col. But look who comes yonder;—ha, ha, ha! my son, picking his steps like a dancing-master. Pr'ythee, Harman, go into the house, and let my wife and daughter know we are come, while I go and have some sport with him; they will introduce you to sir John Flowerdale.

Har. Then, sir, I'll take the liberty—

Col. But, d'y'e hear, I must have a little more discourse with you about this girl; perhaps she's a neighbour of mine, and I may be of service to you.

Har. Well, remember, Colonel, I shall try your friendship.

SONG.

Indulgent pow'rs, if ever

You mark'd a tender vow,

O bend in kind compassion,

And hear a lover now.

For titles, wealth, and honours,

While others crowd your shrine;

I ask this only blessing,

Let her I love be mine.

[Exit Har.

Enter MR. JESSAMY and several Servants.

Col. Why, zounds! one would think you had never put your feet to the ground before; you make as much work about walking a quarter of a mile, as if you had gone a pilgrimage to Jerusalem.

Mr. Jes. Colonel, you have used me extremely ill, to drag me through the dirty roads in this manner; you told me the way was all over a bowling-green; only see what a condition I am in.

Col. Why, how did I know the roads were dirty? Is that my fault? Besides, we mistook the way. Zounds! man, your legs will be never the worse when they are brushed a little.

Mr. Jes. Antoine! have you sent La Roque for the shoes and stockings? Give me the glass out of your pocket—not a dust of powder left in my hair, and the frisure as flat as the fore-top of an attorney's clerk: get your comb and pomatum; you must borrow some powder. I suppose there's such a thing as a dressing-room in the house?

Col. Ay, and a cellar too, I hope, for I want a glass of wine cursedly. But hold! hold! Frank; where are you going? Stay, and pay your devoirs here, if you please; I see there's somebody coming out to welcome us.

Enter LIONEL, DIANA, and CLARISSA.

Lio. Colonel, your most obedient. Sir John is walking with my lady in the garden, and has commissioned me to receive you.

Col. Mr. Lionel, I am heartily glad to see you; come here, Frank;—this is my son, sir.

Lio. Sir, I am exceedingly proud to—

Mr. Jes. Can't you get the powder, then?

Col. Miss Clary, my little Miss Clary, give me a kiss my dear—as handsome as an angel, by heavens. Frank, why don't you come here? this is Miss Flowerdale.

Dia. Oh heavens, Clarissa! just as I said, that impudent devil is come here with my father.

Mr. Jes. Hadn't we better go into the house ?

QUINTETTO.

Mr. Jes. To be made in such a pickle !

Will you please to lead the way, sir ?

Col. No, but, if you please, you may, sir.

For precedence none will stickle.

Dia. Brother, no politeness ? bless me !

Will you not your hand bestow ?

Lead the lady.

Clia. Don't distress me ;

Dear Diana, let him go.

Mr. Jes. Ma'am, permit me.

Col. Smoke the beau.

Cruel must I, can I bear ?

Oh adverse stars !

Oh fate severe !

Lio. } Beset, tormented,

and } Each hope prevented.

Clia. } None but the brave deserve the fair.

Col. Come, ma'am, let me lead you :

Now, sir, I precede you.

All. Lovers must ill usage bear ;

Oh adverse stars ! oh fate severe !

None but the brave deserve the fair.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Hall in Sir John Flowerdale's house, with the view of a grand stair-case, through an arch.

Enter LIONEL, followed by JENNY.

Jen. Well, but, Mr. Lionel, consider ; pray consider now ; how can you be so prodigious indiscreet as you are, walking about the hall here, while the gentlefolks are within in the parlour. Don't you think they'll wonder at your getting up so soon after dinner, and before any of the rest of the company ?

Lio. For heaven's sake, Jenny, don't speak to me : I neither know where I am, nor what I am doing ; I am the most wretched and miserable of mankind.

Jen. Poor dear soul, I pity you. Yes, yes, I believe you are miserable enough, indeed ; and I assure you I have pitied you a great while, and spoke many a word in your favour, when you little thought you had such a friend in a corner.

Lio. But, good Jenny, since, by some accident or other, you have been able to discover what I would willingly hide from all the world, I conjure you, as you regard my interest, as you value your lady's peace and honour, never let the most distant hint of it escape you ; for it is a secret of that importance—

Jen. And, perhaps, you think I can't keep a secret. Ah ! Mr. Lionel, it must be hear, see, and say nothing, in this world, or one has no business to live in it ; besides, who would not be in love with my lady ? There's never a man this day alive but might be proud of it ; for she is the handsomest, sweetest temperdest, and I am sure one of the best mistresses, ever poor girl had.

Lio. Oh, Jenny, she's an angel !

Jen. And so she is indeed. Do you know that she gave me her blue silk gown to-day, and it is every crum as good as new ; and, go things as they will, don't you be fretting and vexing yourself, for I am mortally sartin she would liverer see a toad than this Jessamy. Though, I must say, to my thinking, he's a very likely man ; and a finer pair of eye-brows, and a more delicate nose, I never saw on a face.

Lio. By heavens I shall run mad.

Jen. And why so ? It is not beauty that always takes the fancy ; moreover, to let you know, if it was, I don't think him any more to compare to you, than a thistle is to a carnation, and so's a sign ; for, mark my words, my lady loves you as much as she hates him.

Lio. What you tell me, Jenny, is a thing I neither merit nor expect. No, I am unhappy, and let me continue so ; my most presumptuous thoughts shall never carry me to a wish that may affect her quiet, or give her cause to repent.

Jen. That's very honourable of you, I must needs say ; but for all that, liking's liking, and one can't help it ; and if it should be my lady's case, it is no fault of yours. I am sure when she called me into her dressing-room, before she went down to dinner, there she stood with her eyes brim-full of tears ; and so I fell a crying for company ; and then she could not abide the chap in the parlour ; and, at the same time, she bid me take an opportunity to speak to you, and desire you to meet her in the garden this evening, after tea, for she has something to say to you.

Lio. Jenny, I see you are my friend ; for which I thank you, though I know it is impossible to do me any service : take this ring and wear it for my sake.

Jen. I am very much obliged to your honour ; I am your friend indeed. But, I say, you won't forget to be in the garden now ; and in the mean time, keep as little in the house as you can, for walls have eyes and ears ; and I can tell you the servants take notice of your uneasiness, though I am always desiring them to mind their own business.

Lio. Pray have a care, Jenny ; have a care, my dear girl ; a word may breed suspicion.

Jen. Psha ! have a care yourself ; it is you that breeds suspicion, sighing and pining about ; you look for all the world like a ghost ; and if you don't pluck up your spirits you will be a ghost soon ; letting things get the better of you. Though to be sure, when I think with myself, being crossed in love is a terrible thing. There was a young man in the town where I was born, made away with himself upon the account of it.

Lio. Things shan't get the better of me, Jenny.

Jen. No more they don't ought. And once again I say, fortune is thrown in your dish, and you are not to fling it out ; my lady's estate will be better than three livings, if Sir John could give them to you : think of that Mr. Lionel, think of that.

Lio. Think of what ?

SONG.

*Oh talk not to me of the wealth she possesses,
My hopes and my views to herself I confine ;
The splendour of riches but slightly impresses
A heart that is fraught with a passion like mine.*

*By love, only love, should our souls be cemented ;
No in'rest, no motive, but that would I own ;
With her in a cottage be blest and contented ;
And wretched without her, tho' plac'd on a throne.*

[Exit.]

Enter COLONEL OLDBOY.

Col. Very well, my lady ; I'll come again to you presently ; I am only going into the garden for a mouthful of air. Aha ! my little abigail ! Here Molly, Jenny, Betty ! What's your name ? Why don't you answer me, hussy, when I call you ?

Jen. If you want any thing, sir, I'll call one of the footmen.

Col. The footmen! the footmen! D—n me, I never knew one of them, in my life, that wouldn't prefer a rascal to a gentleman. Come here, you slut, put your hands about my neck and kiss me.

Jen. Who, I sir?

Col. Ay, here's money for you; what the devil are you afraid of? I'll take you into keeping: you shall go and live at one of my tenant's houses.

Jen. I wonder you a'n't ashamed, sir, to make an honest girl any such proposal; you that have a worthy gentlewoman, nay, a lady of your own.—To be sure she's a little stricken in years; but why shouldn't she grow elderly as well as yourself?

Col. Burn a lady; I love a pretty girl.

Jen. Well, then, you may go look for one, sir; I have no pretensions to the title.

Col. Why, you pert baggage! you don't know me.

Jen. What do you pinch my fingers for? yes, yes, I know you well enough, and your charekter's well known all over the country, running after poor young creatures as you do, to ruinate them.

Col. What, then people say—

Jen. Indeed, they talk very bad of you; and whatever you may think, sir, though I'm in a menial station, I'm come of people that wouldn't see me put upon; there are those that would take my part against the proudest he in the land, that should offer anything univil.

Col. Well, let me know, how does your young lady like my son?

Jen. You want to pump me, do you? I suppose you would know whether I can keep my tongue within my teeth?

Col. She doesn't like him then?

Jen. I don't say so, sir. Isn't this a shame now? I suppose to-morrow or next day it will be reported that Jenny has been talking; Jenny said that, and t'other. But here, sir, I ax you, did I tell you any such thing?

Col. Why yes, you did.

Jen. I!—Lord bless me, how can you—

Col. Ad I'll mouzie you.

Jen. Ah! ah!

Col. What do you bawl for?

Jen. Ah! ah! ah!

SONG.

*Indeed, forsooth, a pretty youth,
To play the am'rous fool;
At such an age, methinks your rage
Might be a little cool.*

*Fie, let me go, sir,
Kiss me!—No, no, sir.
You pull me and shake me,
For what do you take me,
This figure to make me?*

*I'd have you to know
I'm not for your game, sir;
Nor will I be tame, sir;
Lord! have you no shame, sir,
To tumble one so?*

[Exit.

Enter LADY MARY, DIANA, and HARMAN.

Lady M. Mr. Oldbey, won't you give me your hand to lead me up stairs, my dear? Sir, I am prodigiously obliged to you: I protest I have not been so well, I don't know when: I have had no return of my bilious complaint after dinner to-day; and eat so voraciously. Did you observe, miss? Doctor Arsenic will be quite astonished when he hears it; surely, his new invented medicine has done me a prodigious deal of service.

Col. Ah! you'll always be taking one slop or other, till you poison yourself. Give me a pinch of your ladyship's snuff.

Lady M. This is a mighty pretty sort of man, Colonel; who is he?

Col. A young fellow, my lady, recommended to me.

Lady M. I protest he has the sweetest taste for poetry!—He has repeated to me two or three of his own things; and I have been telling him of the poem my late brother. Lord Jessamy, made on the mouse that was drowned.

Col. Ay, a fine subject for a poem; a mouse that was drowned in a—

Lady M. Hush, my dear Colonel; don't mention it; to be sure the circumstance was vastly indelicate; but for the number of lines, the poem was as charming a morsel—Pray, sir, was there any news when you left London; anything about the East Indies, the ministry, or politics of any kind? I am strangely fond of politics; but I hear nothing since my Lord Jessamy's death: he used to write to me all the affairs of the nation, for he was a very great politician himself. I have a manuscript speech of his in my cabinet; he never spoke it, but it is as fine a thing as ever came from man.

Col. What is that crawling on your ladyship's petticoat?

Lady M. Where? where?

Col. Zounds! a spider with legs as long as my arm.

Lady M. Oh, heavens! ah don't let me look at it; I sha'! faint, I shall faint! A spider! a spider! a spider! (Runs off; Har. attempts to follow her, the Col. prevents him.)

Col. Hold! zounds, let her go. I knew the spider would set her a galloping, with her d—d fuss about my brother, my Lord Jessamy. Harman, come here. How do you like my daughter? Is the girl you are in love with as handsome as this?

Har. In my opinion, sir.

Col. What, as handsome as Dy!—I'll lay you twenty pounds she has not such a pair of eyes. He tells me he's in love, Dy; raging mad for love; and, by his talk, I begin to believe him.

Dia. Now, for my part, papa, I doubt it very much; though, by what I heard the gentleman say just now within, I find he imagines the lady has a violent partiality for him; and yet he may be mistaken there, too.

Col. For shame, Dy; what the mischief do you mean? How can you talk so tartly to a poor young fellow under misfortunes? Give him your hand, and ask his pardon. Don't mind her, sir: for all this, she is as good-natured a little devil as ever was born.

Har. You may remember, sir, I told you before dinner, that I had for some time carried on a private correspondence with my lovely girl; and that her father, whose consent we despair of obtaining, is the great obstacle to our happiness.

Col. Why don't you carry her off in spite of him, then? I ran away with my wife—ask my Lady Mary, she'll tell you the thing herself. Her old, conceited lord of a father thought I was not good enough; but I mounted a garden-wall, notwithstanding their chevaux-de-frize of broken glass bottles, took her out of a three-pair of stairs window, and brought her down a ladder in my arms—by the way, she would have squeezed through a cat-hole to get at me; and I would have taken her out of the tower of London, d—me, if it had been surrounded with the three regiments of guards.

SONG.

*'Twas on a dismal night,
When scarce a star gave light,*

*And that hail came rattling down,
With peppering on my crown,
That I resolv'd upon a matter.
The matter was of love,
And I as fierce as Jove;
But my charmer was lock'd up,
At a castle's very top;
Yet I had fix'd to be at her.
A whistle then was mine,
My fair one knew the sign—
And directly to my hopes,
Threw a ladder down of ropes;
When I mount without delay, sir:
And when I got on high,
And did my charmer spy,
I took her in my arm,
And descended without harm,
And carried off, ouray, sir.*

Dia. But, surely, papa, you would not persuade the gentleman to such a proceeding as this is: consider the noise it will make in the country; and if you are known to be the adviser and abettor—

Col. Why, what do I care? I say, if he takes my advice, he'll run away with her, and I'll give him all the assistance I can.

Har. I am sure, sir, you are very kind: and, to tell you the truth, I have more than once had the very scheme in my head, if I thought it was feasible, and knew how to go about it.

Col. Feasible, and knew how to go about it! The thing's feasible enough, if the girl's willing to go off with you, and you have spirit sufficient to undertake it.

Har. O, as for that, sir, I can answer.

Dia. What, sir, that the lady will be willing to go off with you?

Har. No, ma'am, that I have spirit enough to take her, if she is willing to go; and thus far I dare venture to promise, that between this and to-morrow morning, I will find out whether she is or not.

Col. So he may; she lives but in this county; and tell her, Harman, you have met with a friend who is inclined to serve you. You shall have my post-chaise at a minute's warning; and if a hundred pieces will be of any use to you, you may command them.

Har. Are you really serious, sir?

Col. Serious! d—me if I a'n't. I have put twenty young fellows in the way of getting girls that they never would have thought of! and bring her to my house: whenever you come you shall have a supper and a bed; but you must marry her first, because my lady will be squeamish.

Dia. Well, but, my dear papa, upon my word you have a great deal to answer for: suppose it was your own case to have a daughter in such circumstances, would you be obliged to any one—

Col. Hold your tongue, hussy! who bid you put in your oar? However, Harman, I don't want to set you upon anything: 'tis no affair of mine, to be sure; I only give you advice, and tell you how I would act if I was in your place.

Har. I assure you, sir, I am quite charmed with the advice; and since you are ready to stand my friend, I am determined to follow it.

Col. You are?

Har. Positively.

Col. Say no more, then; here's my hand:—you understand me—no occasion to talk any further of it at present. When we are alone—Dy, take Mr. Harman into the drawing-room, and give him some tea. I say, Harman, mum.

Dia. You had better not give this advice.

Col. Hold your tongue, hussy.—Harman, if you don't carry her off, you dog, I'll never forgive you. [Exit.]

SONG.—LIONEL.

*O never doubt, my love, thy sorrows I'll banish,
And sweetly I'll sing while the night flies away,
And e'er the wild gloom o'er the mountain shall vanish,
Thou'lt sink on my pillow and sleep till the day.*

O never doubt, my love, &c.

*O never doubt, my love, its fondness shall bless thee,
'Twill soothe thee whene'er by this rude world oppress'd;*

*And should the cold hand of misfortune e'er press thee,
The angel of pity thou'lt find in my breast.*

O never doubt, my love, &c. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A handsome Dressing Room.

Enter DIANA, followed by JESSAMY.

Dia. Come, brother, I undertake to be mistress of the ceremony upon this occasion, and introduce you to your first audience. Miss Flowerdale is not here, I perceive; but no matter.

Mr. Jes. Upon my word, a pretty, elegant dressing-room this; but confound our builders, or architects, as they call themselves, they are all errant stone-masons: not one of them know the situation of doors, windows, or chimnies; which are as essential to a room as eyes, nose, and mouth, to a countenance. Now, if the eyes are where the mouth should be, and the nose out of proportion and its place, quel horrible physiognomie.

Dia. My dear brother, you are not come here as a virtuoso to admire the temple; but as a votary to address the deity to whom it belongs. Shew, I beseech you, a little more devotion, and tell me, how do you like Miss Flowerdale? Don't you think her very handsome?

Mr. Jes. Pale:—but that I am determined she shall remedy; for, as soon as we are married, I will make her put on rouge. Let me see: has she got any in her boxes here? Véritable toilet à la Anglaise. Nothing but a bottle of Hungary-water, two or three rows of pins, a paper of patches, and a little bole-ammoniac by way of tooth-powder.

Dia. Brother, I would fain give you some advice upon this occasion, which may be of service to you. You are now going to entertain a young lady; let me prevail upon you to lay aside those airs, on account of which some people are impertinent enough to call you a coxcomb; for, I am afraid, she may be apt to think you a coxcomb too, as I assure you she is very capable of distinguishing.

Mr. Jes. So much the worse for me. If she is capable of distinguishing, I shall meet with a terrible repulse. I don't believe she'll have me.

Dia. I don't believe she will, indeed.

Mr. Jes. Go on, sister. Ha, ha, ha!

Dia. I protest I am serious: though, I perceive, you have more faith in the counsellor before you there, the looking-glass. But give me leave to tell you, it is not a powdered head, a laced coat, a grimace, a shrug, a bow, or a few pert phrases, learned by rote, that constitute the power of pleasing all women.

Mr. Jes. You had better return to the gentleman, and give him his tea, my dear.

Dia. These qualifications we find in our parrots and monkeys. I would undertake to teach Poll, in three weeks, the fashionable jargon of half the fine men about town; and I am sure it must be allowed, that pug, in a scarlet coat, is a gentleman as degagé and alluring as most of them.

SONG.

*Good folks would you know,
How to make up a beau,
Here's one ready made to your view;
His hair he must crop,
And to finish the fop,
Waistcoat, red, yellow, or blue.
To use an eye-glass, is a very good plan,
For it makes a beau almost as big as a man.
Then his opera hat,
Like this must be flat;
On me 'twould look well, I declare;
In martial attire
Who would not admire
Diana dress'd en militaire?
Oh, then with the fiercest I'll strut and I'll scold;
Dear brother, forgive me; perhaps, I'm too bold.* [Exit.

Enter CLARISSA.

Cla. Sir, I took the liberty to desire a few moments' private conversation with you: I hope you will excuse it. [Jes. brings down chairs.] I am really greatly embarrassed. But, in an affair of such immediate consequence to us both—

Mr. Jes. My dear creature, don't be embarrassed before me; I should be extremely sorry to strike you with any awe; but this is a species of mauvaise honte, which the company I shall introduce you to will soon cure you of.

Cla. Upon my word, sir, I don't understand you.

Mr. Jes. Perhaps you may be under some uneasiness lest I should not be quite so warm in the prosecution of this affair as you could wish: it is true, with regard to quality, I might do better: and with regard to fortune full as well:—but you please me. Upon my soul, I have not met with anything more agreeable to me a great while.

Cla. Pray, sir, keep your seat.

Mr. Jes. Mauvaise honte again. My dear, there is nothing in these little familiarities between you and me. When we are married, I shall do everything to render your life happy.

Cla. Ah! sir, pardon me. The happiness of my life depends upon a circumstance—

Mr. Jes. Oh, I understand you. You have been told, I suppose, of the Italian opera girl. Rat people's tongues! However, 'tis true, I had an affair with her at Naples, and she is now here. But, be satisfied. I'll give her a thousand pounds, and send her about her business.

Cla. Me, sir! I protest, nobody told me. Lord! I never heard any such thing, or inquired about it.

Mr. Jes. Nor have they not been chattering to you of my affair at Pisa, with the Principessa del—

Cla. No, indeed, sir.

Mr. Jes. Well, I was afraid they might; because, in this rude country—but why silent on a sudden? Don't be afraid to speak.

Cla. No, sir; I will come to the subject on which I took the liberty to trouble you. Indeed, I have great reliance on your generosity.

Mr. Jes. You'll find me as generous as a prince, depend on't.

Cla. I am blessed, sir, with one of the best of fathers: I never yet disobeyed him; in which I have had little merit, for his commands hitherto have only been to secure my own felicity.

ACT. DRAMA.—NOS. 53 & 54.

Mr. Jes. Apres ma chere.

Cla. But now, sir, I am under the shocking necessity of disobeying him, or being wretched for ever.

Mr. Jes. Hem!

Cla. Our union is impossible: therefore, sir, since I cannot be your wife, let me entreat permission to make you my friend. [Exit.

Mr. Jes. Who's there?

Enter JENKINS.

Jenk. Do you call, sir?

Mr. Jes. Hark you, old gentleman; who are you?

Jenk. Sir, my name is Jenkins.

Mr. Jes. Oh! you are Sir John Flowerdale's steward; a servant he puts confidence in.

Jenk. Sir, I have served Sir John Flowerdale many years.

Mr. Jes. Then, Mr. Jenkins, I shall condescend to speak to you. Does your master know who I am? Does he know, sir, that I am likely to be a peer of Great Britain; that I have ten thousand pounds a year; that I have passed through all Europe with distinguished eclat; that I refused the daughter of Mynheer Van Slokenfolk, the great Dutch burgo-master; and that, if I had not had the misfortune of being bred a protestant, I might have married the niece of his present holiness the Pope, with a fortune of two hundred thousand piastres?

Jenk. I am sure, sir, my master has all the respect imaginable—

Mr. Jes. Then, sir, how comes he, after my shewing an inclination to be allied to his family; how comes he, I say, to bring me to his house to be affronted? I have let his daughter go; but I think I was in the wrong; for a woman that insults me, is no more safe than a man. I have brought a lady to reason before now, for giving me saucy language; and left her male friends to revenge it.

Jenk. Pray, good sir, what's the matter?

Mr. Jes. Why, sir, this is the matter, sir: your master's daughter, sir, has behaved to me with d—d insolence and impertinence; and you may tell Sir John Flowerdale, first with regard to her, that I think she is a silly, ignorant, awkward, ill-bred, country puss.

Jenk. Oh! sir, for heaven's sake—

Mr. Jes. And that, with regard to himself, he is, in my opinion, an old doating, ridiculous, country 'squire; without the knowledge of either men or things; and that he is below my notice, if it were not to despise him.

Jenk. Good lord! good lord!

Mr. Jes. And advise him and his daughter to keep out of my way; for, by gad, I will affront them, in the first place I meet them. And if your master is for carrying things further; tell him, I fence better than any man in Europe.

SONG.

*In Italy, Germany, France, have I been; [seen;
Where princes I've liv'd with, where monarchs I've
The great have caress'd me,
The fair have address'd me,
Nay, smiles I have had from a queen.*

*And, now, shall a pert
Insignificant flirt,
With insolence use me,
Presume to refuse me!
She fancies my pride will be hurt.
But tout au contraire,
I'm pleas'd I declare,*

*Quite happy to think I escape from the snare—
 Serviteur, Mam'selle; my claim I withdraw.
 Hey! where are my people? Fal, la, la, la, la.*
 [Exit.]

Jenk. I must go and inform Sir John of what has happened; but, I will not tell him of the outrageous behaviour of this young spark; for he is a man of spirit, and would resent it. Egad, my own fingers itched to be at him, once or twice; and, as stout as he is, I fancy these old fists would give him a bellyful. He complains of Miss Clarissa; but she is incapable of treating him in the manner he says. Perhaps she may have behaved with some coldness towards him; and yet that is a mystery to me too.
 [Exit.]

SCENE III.—Sir John Flowerdale's Garden.

Enter LIONEL, leading CLARISSA.

Lio. Hist! methought I heard a noise: should we be surprised together, at a juncture so critical, what might be the consequence? I know not how it is; but, at this, the happiest moment of my life, I feel a damp, a tremour at my heart—

Cl. Then, what should I do? If you tremble, I ought to be terrified indeed, who have discovered sentiments, which perhaps I should have hid, with a frankness that, by a man less generous, less noble-minded than yourself, might be construed to my disadvantage.

Lio. Oh! wound me not with so cruel an expression. You love me, and have condescended to confess it. You have seen my torments, and been kind enough to pity them. The world, indeed, may blame you—

Cl. And yet, was it proclaimed to the world, what could the most malicious suggest? They could but say, that truth and sincerity got the better of forms; that the tongue dared to speak the honest sensation of the mind; that while you aimed at improving my understanding, you engaged and conquered my heart.

Lio. And is it—is it possible?

Cl. Be calm, and listen to me: what I have done has not been lightly imagined, nor rashly undertaken: it is the work of reflection, or conviction; my love is not a sacrifice to my own fancy, but a tribute to your worth; did I think there was a more deserving man in the world—

Lio. If to doat on you more than life be to deserve you, so far I have merit; if to have no wish, no hope, no thought but you, can entitle me to the envied distinction of a moment's regard, so far I dare pretend.

Cl. That I have this day refused a man, with whom I could not be happy, I make no merit: born for quiet and simplicity, the crowds of the world, the noise attending pomp and distinction have no charms for me: I wish to pass my life in rational tranquillity, with a friend, whose virtues I can respect, whose talents I can admire; who will make my esteem the basis of my affection.

Lio. O charming creature! Yes, let me indulge the flattering idea; formed with the same sentiments, the same feelings, the same tender passion for each other—nature designed us to compose that sacred union, which nothing but death can annul.

Cl. One only thing remember. Secure in each other's affections, here we must rest; I would not give my father a moment's pain, to purchase the empire of the world.

Lio. Command, dispose of me as you please:

angels take cognizance of the vows of innocence and virtue; and I will believe that our's are already registered in heaven.

Cl. I will believe so too.

SONG.

*Go, and on my truth relying,
 Comfort to your cares applying,
 Bid each doubt and sorrow flying,
 Leave to peace and love your reason.*

*Go, and may the Pow'rs that hear us,
 Still, as kind protectors near us,
 Through our troubles safely steer us,
 To a port of joy and rest.* [Exit.]

Enter Sir JOHN FLOWERDALE.

Sir J. Who's there? Lionel?

Lio. Heavens! 'tis Sir John Flowerdale.

Sir J. Who's there?

Lio. 'Tis I, sir; I am here, Lionel.

Sir J. My dear lad, I have been searching for you this half-hour, and was at last told that you had come into the garden. I have a piece of news, which I dare swear will shock and surprise you; my daughter has refused Colonel Oldboy's son, who is this minute departed the house in violent resentment of her ill-treatment.

Lio. Perhaps, sir, the gentleman may have been too impetuous, and offended Miss Flowerdale's delicacy; certainly nothing else could occasion—

Sir J. Heaven only knows. I think, indeed, there can be no settled aversion; and surely her affections are not engaged elsewhere.

Lio. Engaged, sir! No, sir.

Sir J. I think not, Lionel.

Lio. You may be positive, sir. I'm sure—

Sir J. O worthy young man! whose integrity, openness, and every good quality, have rendered dear to me as my own child; I see this affair troubles you as much as it does me.

Lio. It troubles me, indeed, sir.

Sir J. However, my particular disappointment ought not to be detrimental to you, nor shall it. I well know how irksome it is to a generous mind to live in a state of dependence, and have long had it in my thoughts to make you easy for life.

Lio. Sir John, the situation of my mind at present is a little disturbed. Spare me—I beseech you, spare me; why will you persist in a goodness that makes me ashamed of myself?

Sir J. There is an estate in this county which I purchased some years ago; by me it will never be missed, and whoever marries my daughter will have little reason to complain of my disposing of such a trifle for my own gratification. On the present marriage, I intended to perfect a deed of gift in your favour, which has been for some time prepared; my lawyer has this day completed it, and it is your's, my dear Lionel, with every good wish that the warmest friend can bestow.

Lio. Sir, if you presented a pistol with a design to shoot me, I would submit to it: but you must excuse me, I cannot lay myself under more obligations.

Sir J. Your delicacy carries you too far. In this I confer a favour on myself: however, we'll talk no more on the subject at present; let us walk towards the house, our friends will depart else without my bidding them adieu. [Eeunt.]

Enter DIANA and CLARISSA.

Dia. So, then, my dear Clarissa, you really give credit to the ravings of that French wretch, with regard to a plurality of worlds?

Cl. I don't make it an absolute article of belief; but I think it an ingenious conjecture, with great probability on its side.

Dia. And we are a moon to the moon! Nay, child, I know something of astronomy; but that—that little shining thing there, which seems not much larger than a silver plate, should, perhaps, contain great cities like London;—and who can tell but they may have kings there, and parliaments, and plays, and operas, and people of fashion! Lord, the people of fashion in the moon must be strange creatures.

Cl. Methinks Venus shines very bright in yonder corner.

Dia. Venus! O pray let me look at Venus; I suppose, if there are any inhabitants there, they must be all lovers.

Enter LIONEL.

Lio. Was ever such a wretch? I can't stay a moment in a place. Where is my repose? Fled with my virtue. Was I then born for falsehood and dissimulation? I was, I was! and I live to be conscious of it. To impose upon my friend! to betray my benefactor, and lie, to hide my ingratitude!—a monster in a moment. No, I may be the most unfortunate of men, but I will not be the most odious; while my heart is yet capable of dictating what is honest, I will obey its voice. [Aside.]

Enter Colonel Oldboy and HARMAN.

Col. Dy, where are you? What the mischief, is this a time to be walking in the garden? The coach has been ready this half hour, and your mama is waiting for you.

Dia. I am learning astronomy, sir. Do you know, papa, the moon is inhabited?

Col. Hussy, you are half a lunatic yourself: come here, things have gone just as I imagined they would; the girl has refused your brother; I knew he must disgust her.

Dia. Women will want taste now and then, sir.

Col. But I must talk to the young lady a little.

Har. [To DIA.] Well, I have had a long conference with your father about the elopement, and he continues firm in his opinion that I ought to attempt it: in short, all the necessary operations are settled between us, and I am to leave his house to-morrow evening, if I can but persuade the young lady—

Dia. Ay, but I hope the young lady will have more sense. Lord, how can you tease me with your nonsense! Come, sir, isn't it time for us to go in? Her ladyship will be impatient.

Col. Friend Lionel, good night to you. Miss Clarissa, my dear, though I am father to the puppy who has displeased you, give me a kiss; you served him right, and I thank you for it.

QUARTETTO.

Col. O what a night is here for love!
Cynthia brightly shining above;
Among the trees,
To the sighing breeze,
Fountains tinkling,
Stars a twinkling;

Dia. O what a night is here for love!
So may the morn propitious prove;

Har. And so it will, if right I guess;
For sometimes light,
As well as night,
A lover's hopes may bless.

Cl. Farewell, my friend,
May gentle rest
Dia. Cal'm each tumult in your breast,
Every pain and fear remove.

Lio. What have I done?
Where shall I run?
With grief and shame at once oppress,
How my own upbraiding shun,
Or meet my friend's distress?

Cl. Hark to Philonel, how sweet,
Dia. From yonder elm,

Har. Tweet, tweet, tweet, tweet.

All. O what a night is here for love!
But vainly nature strives to move;
Nor nightingale among the trees,
Nor twinkling stars, nor sighing breeze,
Nor murm'ring streams,
Nor Phoebe's beams,
Can charm unless the heart's at ease.

[Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Room in Colonel Oldboy's house.

Enter HARMAN, with his hat, boots, and whip, followed by DIANA.

Dia. Pr'ythee, hear me.

Har. My dear, what would you say?

Dia. I am afraid of the step we are going to take; indeed, I am. 'Tis true, my father is the contriver of it; but, really, on consideration, I think I should appear less culpable if he was not so; I am at once criminal myself, and rendering him ridiculous.

Har. Do you love me?

Dia. Suppose I do, you give me a very ill proof of your love for me, when you would take advantage of my tenderness, to blind my reason: how can you have so little regard for my honour as to sacrifice it to a vain triumph?—for it is in that light I see the rash action you are forcing me to commit; nay, methinks my consenting to it should injure me in your own esteem. When a woman forgets what she owes herself, a lover should set little value upon any thing she gives to him.

Har. Can you suppose, then, can you imagine, that my passion will ever make me forget my veneration? and an elopement is nothing, when it is on the road to matrimony.

Dia. At best, I shall incur the censure of disobedience and indiscretion; and, is it nothing to a young woman, what the world says of her? Ah! my good friend, be assured, such a disregard of the world is the first step towards deserving its reproaches.

Har. But, the necessity we are under. Mankind has too much good sense, too much good-nature—

Dia. Every one has good sense enough to see other people's faults, and good nature enough to overlook their own. Besides, the most sacred things may be made an ill use of; and even marriage itself, if indecently and improperly—

Har. Come, get yourself ready: where is your band-box, hat, and cloak? Slip into the garden; be there at the iron-gate, which you shewed me just now; and, as the post-chaise comes round, I will step and take you in.

Dia. Dear Harman, let me beg of you to desist.

Har. Dear Diana, let me beg of you to go on.

Dia. I shall never have resolution to carry me through it.

Har. We shall have four horses, my dear, and they will assist us.

Dia. In short—I—cannot go with you.

Har. But before me—into the garden. Won't you?

Dia. Ha! ha! ha!

[Exit.]

Enter Colonel Oldboy.

Col. Heyday! what's the meaning of this? Who is it went out of the room there? Have you and my daughter been in conference, Mr. Harman?

Har. Yes, faith, sir; she has been taking me to task here very severely, with regard to this affair; and she has said so much against it, and put it into such a strange light—

Col. A busy, impertinent baggage! Egad I wish I had caught her meddling, and after I ordered her not: but you have sent to the girl, and you say she is ready to go with you; you must not disappoint her now.

Har. No, no, Colonel; I always have politeness enough to hear a lady's reasons; but constancy enough to keep a will of my own.

Col. Very well; now let me ask you: don't you think it would be proper, upon this occasion, to have a letter ready writ for the father, to let him know who has got his daughter, and so forth?

Har. Certainly, sir, and I'll write it directly.

Col. You write it! you be d—d! I won't trust you with it. I tell you, Harman, you'll commit some cursed blunder, if you don't leave the management of this whole affair to me. I have writ the letter for you myself.

Har. Have you, sir?

Col. Ay; here, read it: I think it's the thing. However, you are welcome to make any alteration.

Har. "Sir, I have loved your daughter a great while, secretly; she assures me there is no hopes of your consenting to our marriage; I therefore take her without it. I am a gentleman who will use her well: and, when you consider the matter, I dare swear you will be willing to give her a fortune; if not, you shall find, I dare behave myself like a man. A word to the wise. You must expect to hear from me in another style."

Col. Now, sir, I will tell you what you must do with this letter. As soon as you have got off with the girl, sir, send your servant back to leave it at the house, with orders to have it delivered to the old gentleman.

Har. Upon my honour, I will, Colonel.

Col. But, upon my honour, I don't believe you'll get the girl. Come, Harman, I'll bet you a buck, and six dozen of Burgundy, that you won't have spirit enough to bring this affair to a crisis.

Har. And, I say done first, Colonel.

Col. Then look into the court there, sir; a chaise, with four of the prettiest bay geldings in England, with two boys in scarlet and silver jackets, that will whisk you along.

Har. Boys, Colonel! Little cupids, to transport me to the summit of my desires.

Col. Ay, but for all that, it mayn't be amiss for me to talk to them a little out of the window for you. Dick, come hither: you are to go with this gentleman, and do whatever he bids you; and take into the chaise whoever he pleases; and drive like devils, do you hear? but be kind to the dumb beasts.

Har. Leave that to me, sir. And so, my dear Colonel—

SONG.

To fear a stranger,

Behold the soldier arm;

He knows no danger,

When honour sounds the alarm;

But dauntless goes,

Among his foes.

In Cupid's militia,

So, fearless I issue;

And, as you see,

Arm'd cap-a-pie,

Resolve on death or victory.

[Exit.]

Enter Lady MARY, and then JENNY.

Lady M. Mr. Oldboy, here is a note from Sir John Flowerdale; it is addressed to me, entreating my son to come over there again this morning. A maid brought it: she is in the ante-chamber. We had better speak to her. Child, child, why don't you come in?

Jen. I choose to stay where I am, if your ladyship pleases.

Lady M. Stay where you are! why so?

Jen. I am afraid of the old gentleman there.

Col. Afraid of me, hussy?

Lady M. Pray, Colonel, have patience. Afraid! Here is something at the bottom of this. What did you mean by that expression, child?

Jen. Why the Colonel knows very well, madam; he wanted to be rude with me yesterday.

Lady M. Oh, Mr. Oldboy!

Col. Lady Mary, don't provoke me, but let me talk to the girl about her business. How come you to bring this note here?

Jen. Why, Sir John gave it to me, to deliver to my uncle Jenkins, and I took it down to his house; but while we were talking together, he remembered that he had some business with Sir John, so he desired me to bring it, because he said it was not proper to be sent by any of the common servants.

Lady M. Colonel, look in my face, and help blushing, if you can.

Col. What the plague's the matter, my lady? I have not been wronging you now, as you call it.

Jen. Indeed, madam, he offered to make me his kept madam. I am sure his usage of me put me into such a twitter, that I did not know what I was doing all the day after.

Lady M. I don't doubt it, though I so lately forgave him; but, as the poet says, his sex is all deceit. Read Pamela, child, and resist temptation.

Jen. Yes, madam, I will.

Col. Why, I tell you, my lady, it was all a joke.

Jen. No, sir, it was no joke; you made me a proffer of money, so you did, whereby I told you, you had a lady of your own, and that though she was old, you had no right to despise her.

Lady M. And how dare you, mistress, make use of my name? Is it for such trollops as you to talk of persons of distinction behind their backs?

Jen. Why, madam, I only said you was in years.

Lady M. Sir John Flowerdale shall be informed of your impertinence, and you shall be turned out of the family. I see you are a confident creature, and I believe you are no better than you should be.

Jen. I scorn your words, madam.

Lady M. Get out of the room; how dare you stay in this room to talk impudently to me?

Jen. Very well, madam, I shall let my lady know how you have used me; but I shan't be turned out of my place, madam, nor at a loss, if I am; and if you are angry with every one that won't say you are young, I believe there is very few you will keep friends with.

SONG.

*I wonder, I'm sure, why this fuss should be made;
For my part I'm neither ashamed nor afraid
Of what I have done, nor of what I have said,
A servant, I hope, is no slave;
And tho', to their shames,
Some ladies call names,
I know better how to behave.
Times are not so bad,
If occasion I had,
Nor my character such I need starve on't;
And for going away,
I don't want to stay,
And so I'm your ladyship's servant.*

[Exit.

Enter MR. JESSAMY.

Mr. Jes. What is the matter here?

Lady M. I will have a separate maintenance; I will indeed. Only a new instance of your father's infidelity, my dear. Then with such low wretches, farmers' daughters, and servant wenches: but anything with a cap on, 'tis all the same to him.

Mr. Jes. Upon my word, sir, I am sorry to tell you, that these practices very ill suit the character which you ought to endeavour to support in the world.

Lady M. Is this a recompense for my love and regard; I, who have been tender and faithful as a turtle dove?

Mr. Jes. A man of your birth and distinction should, methinks, have views of a higher nature, than such low and vulgar libertinism.

Lady M. Consider my birth and family too: Lady Mary Jessamy might have had the best matches in England.

Mr. Jes. Then, sir, your grey hairs.

Lady M. I, that have brought you so many lovely, sweet babes!

Mr. Jes. Nay, sir, it is a reflection on me.

Lady M. The heinous sin too—

Mr. Jes. Indeed, sir, I blush for you.

Col. S'death and fire, you little effeminate puppy! do you know who you talk to? And you, madam, do you know who I am? Get up to your chamber, or rounds I'll make such a—

Lady M. Ah! my dear come away from him.

[Exit.

Enter a Servant.

Col. Am I to be tortured and called to account? How now, you scoundrel, what do you want?

Serv. A letter, sir.

Col. A letter, from whom, sirrah?

Serv. The gentleman's servant, an't please your honour, that left this just now in the post-chaise; the gentleman my young lady went away with.

Col. Your young lady, sirrah? Your young lady went away with no gentleman, you dog. What gentleman? What young lady, sirrah?

Mr. Jes. There is some mystery in this. With your leave, sir, I'll open the letter: I believe it contains no secrets.

Col. What are you going to do, you jackanapes? You shan't open a letter of mine. Dy—Diana! Somebody call my daughter to me there. To John Oldboy, Esq. Sir, I have loved your daughter a great while, secretly—consenting to our marriage—

Mr. Jes. So, so.

Col. You villain! you dog! what is it you have brought me here?

Serv. Please your honour, if you'll have patience, I'll tell your honour. As I told your honour before, the gentleman's servant that went off just now in the post-chaise, came to the gate, and left it after his master was gone. I saw my young lady go into the chaise with the gentleman.

Mr. Jes. Why, this is your own hand.

Col. Call all the servants in the house, let horses be saddled directly; every one take a different road.

Serv. Why, your honour, Dick said it was by your own orders.

Col. My orders! you rascal? I thought he was going to run away with another gentleman's daughter.

Dy—Diana Oldboy! [Exit Servant.

Mr. Jes. Don't waste your lungs to no purpose, sir; your daughter is half a dozen miles off by this time.

Col. Sirrah, you have been bribed to further the scheme of a pickpocket here.

Mr. Jes. Besides, the matter is entirely of your own contriving, as well as the letter and spirit of this elegant epistle.

Col. You are a coxcomb, and I'll disinherit you; the letter is none of my writing, it was writ by the devil, and the devil contrived it. Diana, Margaret, my Lady Mary, William, John— [Exit.

Mr. Jes. I am very glad of this; prodigiously glad of it, upon my honour. He! he! he! It will be a jest this hundred years. (Bells ring violently, on both sides.) What's the matter now? O! her ladyship has heard of it, and is at her bell; and the Colonel answers her. A pretty duet; but a little too much upon the forte methinks: it would be a diverting thing now, to stand unseen at the old gentleman's elbow. [Exit.

Enter COLONEL OLDBOY, with one boot, a great-coat on his arm, &c. followed by several Servants.

Col. She's gone, by the lord! fairly stole away, with that poaching, coney-catching rascal! However, I won't follow her; no, d—e; take my whip, and my cap, and my coat, and order the groom to unsaddle the horses; I won't follow her the length of a spur-leather. Come here, you sir, and pull off my boot; (whistles) she has made a fool of me once, she shan't do it a second time. Not but I'll be revenged too, for I'll never give her sumpence; the disappointment will put the scoundrel out of temper, and he'll thrash her half a dozen times a day: the thought pleases me, I hope he'll do it. What do you stand gaping and staring at, you impudent dogs? are you laughing at me? I'll teach you to be merry at my expense—

SONG.

*A rascal, a hussy; zounds! she that I counted
In temper so mild, so unpractis'd in evil:*

I set her a horse-back, and no sooner mounted,

Than, crack, whip and spur, she rides post to the devil.

But there let her run,

Be ruin'd, undone;

If I go to catch her,

Or back again fetch her,

I'm worse than the son of a gun.

A mischief possess'd me to marry;

And further my folly to carry,

To be still more a sot,

Sons and daughter I got,

And pretty ones, by the lord Harry.

[Exeunt.

SCENE II.—Clarissa's Dressing-room.

Enter CLARISSA, melancholy, with a book in her hand, meeting JENNY.

Cla. Where have you been, Jenny? I was inquiring for you; why will you go out without letting me know?

Jen. Dear madam, never anything happened so unlucky; I am sorry you wanted me. But I was sent to Colonel Oldboy's with a letter; where I have been so used! Lord have mercy upon me; quality indeed! I say quality! Pray, madam, do you think that I look anyways like an immodest parson? To be sure I have a gay air, and I can't help it, and I loves to appear a little genteelish, that's what I do.

Cla. Jenny, take away this book.

Jen. Heaven preserve me, madam, you are crying.

Cla. O my dear Jenny!

Jen. My dear mistress, what's the matter?

Cla. I am undone.

Jen. No, madam; no, lord forbid.

Cla. I am indeed. I have been rash enough to discover my weakness for a man who treats me with contempt.

Jen. Is Mr. Lionel ungrateful, then?

Cla. I have lost his esteem for ever, Jenny. Since last night, that I fatally confessed what I should have kept a secret from all the world, he has scarce condescended to cast a look at me, nor give me an answer when I spoke to him, but with coldness and reserve.

Jen. Then he is a nasty, barbarous, inhuman brute.

Cla. Hold, Jenny, hold! it is all my fault.

Jen. Your fault, madam? I wish I was to hear such a word come out of his mouth; if he was a minister to-morrow, and to say such a thing from his pulpit, and I by, I'd tell him it was false upon the spot. (A knock.)

Cla. Somebody's at the door; see who it is.

Jen. You in fault indeed; that I know to be the most virtuous, nicest, most delicate—(Goes to the door.)

Cla. How now?

Jen. Madam, it's a message from Mr. Lionel. If you are alone, and at leisure, he would be glad to wait upon you; I'll tell him, madam, that you are busy.

Cla. Where is he, Jenny?

Jen. In the study, the man says.

Cla. Then go to him, and tell him I should be glad to see him; but do not bring him up immediately, because I will stand in the balcony a few minutes for a little air.

Jen. Do so, dear madam; for your eyes are as red as ferrets; you are ready to faint too. Mercy on us, for what do you grieve and vex yourself? If I was as you—

Cla. Oh!

[Exit.]

SONG.

Why with sighs my heart is swelling,

Why with tears my eyes o'erflow;

Ask me not, 'tis past the telling,

Mute, involuntary woe.

Who, to winds and waves a stranger,

Vent'rous tempts the inconstant seas,

In each billow fancies danger,

Shrinks at every rising breeze.

[Exit.]

Enter SIR JOHN FLOWERDALE and JENKINS.

Sir J. So, then, the mystery is discovered; but is it possible that my daughter's refusal of Colonel Oldboy's son should proceed from a clandestine engagement, and that engagement with Lionel?

Jenk. Yes, sir; and it is my duty to tell you; else I would rather die than be the means of wounding the heart of my dear young lady; for if there is one upon earth of truly noble and delicate sentiments—

Sir J. I thought so once, Jenkins.

Jenk. And think so still: O good Sir John, now is the time for you to exert that character of worth and gentleness which the world so deservedly has given you. You have indeed cause to be offended; but consider, sir, your daughter is young, beautiful, and amiable; the poor youth unexperienced, sensible, and at a time of life when such temptations are hard to be resisted; their opportunities were many, their cast of thinking the same.

Sir J. Jenkins, I can allow for all these things; but the young hypocrites, there's the thing, Jenkins; their hypocrisy, their hypocrisy wounds me.

Jenk. Call it by a gentler name, sir; modesty on her part, apprehension on his.

Sir J. Then what opportunity have they had? They never were together but when my sister or myself made one of the company; besides, I had so firm a reliance on Lionel's honour and gratitude.

Jenk. Sir, I can never think that nature stamp'd that gracious countenance of his, to mask a corrupt heart.

Sir J. How! at the very time that he was conscious of being himself the cause of it, did he not shew more concern at this affair than I did? Nay, don't I tell you that last night, of his own accord, he offered to be a mediator in the affair, and desired my leave to speak to my daughter? I thought myself obliged to him, consented; and, in consequence of his assurance of success, wrote that letter to Colonel Oldboy, to desire the family would come here again to-day.

Jenk. Sir, as we were standing in the next room, I heard a message delivered from Mr. Lionel, desiring leave to wait upon your daughter. I dare swear they will be here presently; suppose we were to step into the closet, and overhear their conversation?

Sir J. What, Jenkins, after having lived so many years in confidence with my child, shall I become an eaves-dropper to detect her?

Jenk. It is necessary at present. Come in, my dear master; let us only consider that we are once young like them; subject to the same passions, the same indiscretions; and it is the duty of every man to pardon errors incident to his kind. [Exeunt.]

Enter CLARISSA and LIONEL, meeting.

Cla. Sir, you desired to speak to me; I need not tell you the present situation of my heart; it is full. Whatever you have to say, I beg you will explain yourself; and, if possible, rid me of the anxiety under which I have laboured for some hours.

Lio. Madam, your anxiety cannot be greater than mine. I come, indeed, to speak to you; and yet, I know not how; I came to advise you, shall I say as a friend? yes, as a friend to your glory, your felicity; dearer to me than life.

Cla. Go on, sir.

Lio. Sir John Flowerdale, madam, is such a father as few are blest with; his care, his prudence, has provided for you a match; your refusal renders him inconsolable. Listen to no suggestions that would pervert you from your duty, but make the worst of men happy by submitting to his will.

Cla. How, sir, after what passed between us yesterday evening, can you advise me to marry Mr. Jessamy?

Lio. I would advise you to marry any one, madam, rather than a villain.

Cl. A villain, sir!

Lio. I should be the worst of villains, madam, was I to talk to you in any other strain; nay, am I not a villain, at once treacherous and ungrateful? Received into this house as an asylum, what have I done? Betrayed the confidence of the friend that trusted me; endeavoured to sacrifice his peace, and the honour of his family, to my own unwarrantable desires.

Cl. Say no more, sir; say no more; I see my error too late. I have parted from the rules prescribed to my sex; I have mistaken indecorum for a laudable sincerity; and it is just I should meet with the treatment my imprudence deserves.

Lio. 'Tis I, and only I, am to blame. While I took advantage of the father's security, I practised upon the tenderness and ingenuousness of the daughter: my own imagination gone astray, I artfully laboured to lead your's after it; but here, madam, I give you back those vows which I insidiously extorted from you; keep them for some happier man, who may receive them without wounding his honour, or his peace.

Cl. For heaven's sake—

Lio. Oh! my Clarissa, my heart is broke; I am hateful to myself for loving you: yet, before I leave you for ever, I will once more touch that lovely hand—indulge my fondness with a last look—pray for your health and prosperity.

Cl. Can you forsake me? Have I then given my affections to a man who rejects and disregards them? Let me throw myself at my father's feet; he is generous and compassionate:—he knows your worth—

Lio. Mention it not; were you stript of fortune, reduced to the meanest station, and I monarch of the globe, I should glory in raising you to universal empire; but as it is,—farewell! farewell!

SONG.

*O dry those tears! like melted ore,
Fast dropping on my heart they fall:
Think, think, no more of me; no more
The mem'ry of past scenes recall.*

*On a wild sea of passion toss'd,
I split upon the fatal shelf;
Friendship and love at once are lost,
And now I wish to lose myself.* [Exit.

Enter JENNY.

Jen. O madam! I have betray'd you. I have gone and said something I should not have said to my uncle Jenkins; and, as sure as day, he has gone and told it all to Sir John.

Enter Sir JOHN and JENKINS.

Cl. My father!

Sir J. Go, Jenkins, and desire that young gentleman to come back. Stay where you are. But what have I done to my child? How have I deserved that you should treat me like an enemy? Has there been any undesigned rigour in my conduct, or terror in my looks?

Cl. Oh sir!

Enter LIONEL.

Jen. Here is Mr. Lionel.

Sir J. Come in.—When I tell you that I am instructed in all your proceedings, and that I have been ear-witness to your conversation in this place, you will, perhaps, imagine what my thoughts are of you, and the measures which justice prescribes me to follow.

Lio. Sir, I have nothing to say in my own defence; I stand before you self-convicted, self-condemned,—and shall submit, without murmuring, to the sentence of my judge.

Sir J. As for you, Clarissa, since your earliest infancy you have known no parent but me: I have been to you, at once, both father and mother; and that I might the better fulfil those united duties, though left a widower in the prime of my days, I would never enter into a second marriage.—I loved you for your likeness to your dear mother; but that mother never deceived me, and there the likeness fails; you have repaid my affection with dissimulation—Clarissa, you should have trusted me. As for you, Mr. Lionel, what terms can I find strong enough to paint the excess of my friendship!—I loved, I esteemed, I honoured your father; he was a brave, a generous, and a sincere man; I thought you inherited his good qualities. You were left an orphan, I adopted you; put you upon the footing of my own son; educated you like a gentleman; and designed you for a profession, to which, I thought, your virtues would have been an ornament. What return you have made me, you seem to be acquainted with yourself; and, therefore, I shall not repeat it; yet, remember, as an aggravation of your guilt, that the last mark of my bounty was conferred upon you in the very instant when you were undermining my designs. Now, sir, I have but one thing more to say to you: take my daughter: was she worth a million, she is at your service.

Lio. To me, sir?—your daughter? do you give her to me? Without fortune, without friend—without—

Sir J. You have them all in your heart; him whom virtue raises, fortune cannot abase.

Cl. O, sir, let me on my knees kiss that dear hand, acknowledge my error, and entreat forgiveness and blessing.

Sir J. You have not erred, my dear daughter; you have distinguished. It is I should ask pardon for this little trial of you; for I am happier in the son-in-law you have given me, than if you had married a prince.

Lio. My patron—my friend—my father; I would fain say something; but, as your goodness exceeds all bounds—

Sir J. I think I hear a coach drive into the court: it is Colonel Oldboy's family; I will go and receive them. Don't make yourself uneasy at this, we must endeavour to pacify them as well as we can. My dear Lionel, if I have made you happy, you have made me so; heaven bless you, my children, and make you deserving of one another.

[Exeunt Sir JOHN and JENKINS.

Jen. O dear, madam, upon my knees, I humbly beg your forgiveness. Dear Mr. Lionel, forgive me; I did not design to discover it, indeed—and you won't turn me off, madam, will you? I'll serve you for nothing.

Cl. Get up, my good Jenny; I freely forgive you if there is anything to be forgiven: I know you love me; and I am sure here is one who will join with me in rewarding your services.

Jen. Well, if I did not know, as sure as could be, that some good would happen, by my left eye itching this morning! [Exit.

DUET.

Lio. O bliss unexpected! my joys overpower me!
My love, my Clarissa, what words shall I find!
Remorse, desperation, no longer devour me—
He bless'd us, and peace is restor'd to my mind.

Cl. *He bless'd us! O rapture! Like one I recover, Whom death had appall'd without hope, without aid;
A moment depriv'd me of father and lover;
A moment restores, and my pangs are repaid.*

Lio. Forsaken, abandoned,

Cl. What folly! what blindness!

Lio. We fortune accus'd;

Cl. And the fates that decreed:

Both. *But pain was inflicted by heaven, out of kindness,
To heighten the joys that were doom'd to
Our day was o'ercast; [succeed.
But brighter the scene is,
The sky more serene is,
And softer the calm for the hurricane past.*

[Ereunt.]

Enter Mr. JESSAMY, leading Lady MARY OLDBOY; JENNY, and Sir JOHN FLOWERDALE with Colonel OLDBOY.

Lady M. 'Tis all in vain, my dear: set me down anywhere; I can't go a step further. I knew, when Mr. Oldboy insisted upon my coming, that I should be seized with a megrim by the way; and it's well I did not die in the coach.

Mr. Jes. But, pr'ythee, why will you let yourself be affected with such trifles? Nothing more common than for young women of fashion to go off with low fellows.

Lady M. Only feel, my dear, how I tremble! Not a nerve but what is in agitation; and my blood runs cold! cold!

Mr. Jes. Well, but Lady Mary, don't let us expose ourselves to those people; I see there is not one of the rascals about us, that has not a grin upon his countenance.

Lady M. Expose ourselves, my dear! Your father will be as ridiculous as Hudibras, or Don Quixote.

Mr. Jes. Yes, he will be very ridiculous indeed.

Enter JENKINS.

Sir J. I give you my word, my good friend and neighbour, the joy I feel upon this occasion is greatly allayed by the disappointment of an alliance with your family; but I have explained to you how things have happened. You see my situation; and, as you are kind enough to consider it yourself, I hope you will excuse it to your son.

Lady M. Sir John Flowerdale, how do you do? You see we have obey'd your summons; and I have the pleasure to assure you, that my son yielded to my entreaties with very little disagreement; in short, if I may speak metaphorically, he is content to stand candidate again, notwithstanding his late repulse,—when he hopes for an unanimous election.

Col. Well, but, my lady, you may save your rhetoric; for the borough is disposed of to a worthier member.

Mr. Jes. What do you say, sir?

Enter LIONEL, CLARISSA, and JENNY.

Sir J. Here are my son and daughter.

Lady M. Is this pretty, Sir John?

Sir J. Believe me, madam, it is not for want of a just sense of Mr. Jessamy's merit, that this affair has gone off on my side: but the heart is a delicate thing; and after it has once felt, if the object is meritorious, the impression is not easily effaced; it would, therefore, have been an injury to him, to have given him in appearance what another in reality possessed.

Mr. Jes. Upon my honour, upon my soul, Sir John, I am not in the least offended at this contre temps.—Pray, Lady Mary, say no more about it.

Col. Tol, lol, lol, lol.

Sir J. But, my dear Colonel, I am afraid, after all, this affair is taken amiss by you: yes, I see you are angry on your son's account; but let me repeat it, I have a very high opinion of his merit.

Col. Ay! that's more than I have. Taken amiss! I don't take anything amiss; I never was in better spirits, or more pleased in my life.

Sir J. Come, you are uneasy at something, Colonel.

Col. Me! Gad, I am not uneasy. Are you a justice of peace? Then you could give me a warrant, couldn't you? You must know, Sir John, a little accident has happen'd in my family since I saw you last, and you and I may shake hands.—Daughters, sir, daughters! Your's has snap'd at a young fellow without your approbation; and how do you think mine has serv'd me this morning?—Only run away with the scoundrel I brought to dinner here yesterday.

Sir J. I am excessively concerned.

Col. Now I'm not a bit concern'd. No, d—n me, I am glad it has happened; yet, thus far, I'll confess, I should be sorry that either of them would come in my way, because a man's temper may sometimes get the better of him; and I believe I should be tempted to break her neck, and blow his brains out.

Cl. But pray, sir, explain this affair.

Col. I can explain it no further;—Dy, my daughter Dy, has run away from us.

Enter DIANA and HARMAN.

Dia. No, my dear papa, I am not run away; and, upon my knees, I entreat your pardon for the folly I have committed: but, let it be some alleviation, that duty and affection were too strong to suffer me to carry it to extremity; and, if you knew the agony I have been in, since I saw you last—

Lady M. How's this?

Har. Sir, I restore your daughter to you; whose fault, as far as it goes, I must also take upon myself. We have been known to each other for some time; as Lady Richly, your sister, in London, can acquaint you.

Col. Dy, come here. Now, you rascal, where's your sword? If you are a gentleman, you shall fight me; if you are a scrub, I'll horsewhip you. Shut the door there, don't let him escape.

Har. Sir, don't imagine I want to escape; I am extremely sorry for what has happened, but am ready to give you any satisfaction you think proper.

Col. Follow me into the garden, then. Zounds! I have no sword about me. Sir John Flowerdale, lend us a case of pistols, or a couple of guns; and, come and see fair play.

Cl. My dear papa!

Lady M. Mr. Oldboy, if you attempt to fight, I shall expire.

Sir J. Pray Colonel, let me speak a word to you in private.

Col. Slugs and a saw-pit.

Mr. Jes. What business are you of, friend?

Har. My chief trade, sir, is plain dealing; and as that is a commodity you have no reason to be very fond of, I would not advise you to purchase any of it by impertinence.

Col. And is this what you would advise me to?

Sir J. It is, indeed, my dear old friend; as things are situated, there is, in my opinion, no other prudent method of proceeding; and it is the method I would adopt myself, was I in your case.

Col. Why, I believe you are in the right of it; say what you will for me, then.

Sir J. Well, young people, I have been able to use a few arguments which have softened my neighbour here; and, in some measure, pacified his resentment. I find, sir, you are a gentleman by your connections?

Har. Sir, till it is found that my character and family will bear the strictest scrutiny, I desire no favour; and for fortune—

Col. Oh! rot your fortune, I don't mind that; I know you are a gentleman, or Dick Rantum would not have recommended you. And so, Dy, kiss and be friends.

Mr. Jes. What, sir, have you no more to say to the man who has used you so ill?

Col. Us'd me ill! That's as I take it; he has done a mettled thing; and, perhaps, I like him the better for it: it's long before you would have spirit enough to run away with a wench. Harman, give me your hand; let's hear no more of this now. Sir John Flowerdale, what say you? shall we spend the day together, and dedicate it to love and harmony?

Sir J. With all my heart.

Col. Then take off my great coat.

QUARTETTO.

Lio. Come then, all ye social pow'rs,
Shed your influence o'er us,
Crown with bliss the present hours,
And lighten those before us.
May the just, the generous, kind,
Still see that you regard 'em;
And Lionels for ever find
Clarissas to reward 'em.

Cl. Love, thy godhead I adore,
Source of sacred passion;
But will never bow before
Those idols—wealth, or fashion.
May, like me, each maiden wise,
From the fop defend her;
Learning, sense, and virtue prize,
And scorn the vain pretender.

Har. Why the plague should men be sad,
While in time we moulder?
Grave or gay, or vex'd or glad,
We ev'ry day grow older.
Bring the flask, the music bring,
Joy will quickly find us;
Drink, and laugh, and dance, and sing,
And cast our cares behind us.

Dia. How shall I escape—so naught,
On filial laws to trample?
I'll e'en curtsy, own my fault,
And plead papa's example.
Parents, 'tis a hint to you,
Children oft are shameless;
Oft transgress—the thing's too true,
But are you always blameless?

Sir J. { One word more before we go;
& { Girls and boys, have patience;
Col. { You to friends must something owe,
{ As well as to relations.
{ These kind gentlemen address—
{ What, though we forgave 'em,
{ Still they must be lost, unless
{ You lend a hand to save 'em. [Exeunt.

THE END.

THE HYPOCRITE;

A COMEDY, IN FIVE ACTS,

BY ISAAC BICKERSTAFF.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

SIR JOHN LAMBERT
COLONEL LAMBERT
DOCTOR CANTWELL
DARNLEY
MAWORM
SEYWARD

OLD LADY LAMBERT
CHARLOTTE
BETTY

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A hall in Sir John Lambert's house.

Enter Sir JOHN LAMBERT, followed by Colonel LAMBERT.

Col. Lamb. Pray consider, sir.

Sir J. Lamb. So I do, sir, that I am her father, and will bestow her as I please.

Col. Lamb. I do not dispute your authority, sir; but as I am your son, too, I think it my duty to be concerned for your honour. Have not you countenanced his addresses to my sister? Has not she received them? Mr. Darnley's birth and fortune are well known to you; and I dare swear, he may defy the world to lay a blemish on his character.

Sir J. Lamb. Why then, sir, since I am to be catechised, I must tell you, I do not like his character; he is a world-server, a libertine, and has no more religion than you have.

Col. Lamb. Sir, we neither of us think it proper to make a boast of our religion; but, if you will please to inquire, you will find that we go to church as orderly as the rest of our neighbours.

Sir J. Lamb. Oh! you go to church; you go to church. Wonderful! wonderful! to bow, and grin, and cough, and sleep: a fine act of devotion, indeed!

Col. Lamb. Well, but, dear sir—

Sir J. Lamb. Colonel, you are an atheist.

Col. Lamb. Pardon me, sir, I am none. It is a character I abhor; and next to that, I abhor the character of an enthusiast.

Sir J. Lamb. Oh! you do so? An enthusiast!

this is the fashionable phrase, the by-word, the nickname that our pleasure-loving generation give to those few who have a sense of true sanctity.

Col. Lamb. Say canting, sir.

Sir J. Lamb. I tell you what, son, as I have told you more than once, you will draw some heavy judgment on your head some day or other.

Col. Lamb. So says the charitable Doctor Cantwell; you have taken him into your house, and, in return, he gives over half your family to the devil.

Sir J. Lamb. Do not abuse the Doctor, Colonel; it is not the way to my favour. I know you cannot bear him, because he is not one of your mincing preachers: he holds up the glass to your enormities, shews you to yourselves in your genuine colours.

Col. Lamb. I always respect piety and virtue, sir; but there are pretenders to religion, as well as to courage; and as we never find the truly brave to be such as make much noise about their valour, so, I apprehend, the truly good seldom or never deal much in grimace.

Sir J. Lamb. Very well, sir; this is very well.

Col. Lamb. Besides, sir, I would be glad to know, by what authority the Doctor pretends to exercise the clerical function? It does not appear clearly to me that he ever was in orders.

Sir J. Lamb. That is no business of your's, sir. But I am better informed. However, he has the call of zeal.

Col. Lamb. Zeal!

Sir J. Lamb. Why, Colonel, you are in a passion.

Col. Lamb. I own I cannot see with temper, sir, so many religious mountebanks impose on the unwary multitude; wretches, who make a trade of religion, and show an uncommon concern for the next world, only to raise their fortunes with greater security in this.

Sir J. Lamb. Colonel, let me hear no more; I see you are too hardened to be converted now; but since you think it your duty, as a son, to be concerned for my errors, I think it is as much mine, as a father, to be concerned for your's. If you think fit to amend them, so; if not, take the consequence.

Col. Lamb. Well, sir, may I ask you without offence, if the reasons you have given me are your only reasons for discountenancing Mr. Darnley's addresses to my sister?

Sir J. Lamb. Are they not flagrant? Would you have me marry my daughter to a pagan?

Col. Lamb. He intends this morning paying his respects to you, in hopes to obtain your final consent; and desired me to be present as a mediator of articles between you.

Sir J. Lamb. I am glad to hear it.

Col. Lamb. That's kind, indeed, sir.

Sir J. Lamb. May be not, sir; for I will not be at home when he comes; and because I will not tell a lie for the matter, I will go out this moment.

Col. Lamb. Nay, dear sir—

Sir J. Lamb. And, do you hear? because I will not deceive him either, tell him I would not have him lose his time in fooling after your sister,—in short, I have another man in my head for her. [Exit.]

Col. Lamb. Another man! It would be worth one's while to know him. Pray, heaven, this canting hypocrite have not got some beggarly rascal in his eye for her. I must rid the house of him at any rate, or all the settlement I can hope for, from my father, is a castle in the air. My sister may be ruined, too. [CHARLOTTE sings without.] Here she comes. If there be another man in the case, she, no doubt, can let me into the secret.

Enter CHARLOTTE.

Sister, good morrow; I want to speak with you.

Charl. Pr'ythee, then, dear brother, don't put on that wise, politic face, as if your regiment were going to be disbanded, or sent to the West Indies, and you obliged to follow it.

Col. Lamb. Come, come; a truce with your railery; what I have to ask of you is serious; and I beg you would be so in your answer.

Charl. Well, then, provided it be not upon the subject of love, I will be so: but make haste too, for I have not had my tea yet.

Col. Lamb. Why, it is, and it is not, on that subject.

Charl. Oh! I love a riddle, dearly. Let's hear it.

Col. Lamb. Nay, psha! if you'll be serious, say so.

Charl. Oh lord! sir, I beg your pardon—there's my whole form and features totally disengaged and lifeless, at your service; now, put them in what posture of attention you may think fit. [Leaning against him awkwardly.]

Col. Lamb. Was there ever such a giddy devil? Pr'ythee, stand up. I have been talking with my father, and he declares, positively, you shall not receive any further addresses from Mr. Darnley.

Charl. Are you serious?

Col. Lamb. He said so this minute, and with some warmth.

Charl. I'm glad on't, with all my heart.

Col. Lamb. How! glad!

Charl. To a degree. Do you think a man has any more charms for me for my father's liking him? No, sir; if Mr. Darnley can make his way to me now, he is obliged to me, and to me only. Besides, now, it may have the face of an amour indeed; now one has something to struggle for; there's difficulty, there's danger, there's the dear spirit of contradiction in it, too. Oh! I like it mightily!

Col. Lamb. I am glad this does not make you think the worse of Darnley; but a father's consent might have clapped a pair of horses more to your coach, perhaps, and the want of it may pinch your fortune.

Charl. Burn fortune! Am not I a fine woman? and have not I twenty thousand pounds in my own hands?

Col. Lamb. Yes, sister, but with all your charms, you have had them in your possession almost these four years.

Charl. Psha! and have not I had the full swing of my own airs and humours these four years? But if I humour my father, I warrant he'll make it three or four thousand more, with some unlick'd lout; a comfortable equivalent, truly! No, no; let him light his pipe with his consent, if he please. Wilful against wise, for a wager.

Col. Lamb. But pray, sister, has my father ever proposed any other man to you?

Charl. Another man! let me know why you ask, and I'll tell you.

Col. Lamb. Why, the last words he said to me were, that he had another man in his head for you.

Charl. And who is it? who is it, dear brother?

Col. Lamb. Why, you don't so much as seem surprised!

Charl. No, but I'm impatient, and that's as well.

Col. Lamb. Why, how now, sister?

Charl. Why sure, brother, you know very little of female happiness, if you suppose the surprise of a new lover ought to shock a woman of my temper. Don't you know that I'm a coquette?

Col. Lamb. If you are, you'll be the first that ever was sincere enough to own her being so.

Charl. To a lover, I grant you; but not to you; I make no more of you than a sister; I can say any thing to you.

Col. Lamb. I should have been better pleased, if you had not owned it to me; it is a hateful character.

Charl. Ay, it's no matter for that; it's violently pleasant, and there's no law against it, that I know of.

Col. Lamb. Darnley's likely to have a hopeful time with you.

Charl. Well, but don't you really know who it is my father intends me?

Col. Lamb. Not I really; but I imagined you might, and therefore thought to advise with you about it.

Charl. Nay, he has not opened his lips to me yet. Are you sure he's gone out?

Col. Lamb. You are very impatient to know, methinks; what have you to do to concern yourself about any man but Darnley?

Char. Oh, lud! Oh, lud! Pr'ythee, brother, don't be so wise; if you had an empty house to let, would you be displeased to hear there were two people about it? Besides, to be a little serious, Darnley has a tincture of jealousy in his temper, which nothing but a substantial rival can cure.

Col. Lamb. Oh! your servant, madam! now you talk reason. I am glad you are concerned enough for Darnley's faults, to think them worth your mending—ha, ha!

Charl. Concerned! why, did I say that? Look you, I'll deny it all to him; well, if I ever be serious with him again—

Col. Lamb. Here he comes; be as merry with him as you please.

Charl. Psha! [CHARLOTTE sits down, takes a book, and reads.]

Enter DARNLEY.

Darn. My dear Colonel, your servant.

Col. Lamb. I am glad you did not come sooner; for, in the humour my father left me, 'twould not have been a proper time for you to have pressed your affair. I touched upon it, but, I'll tell you more presently; in the meantime, lose no ground with my sister.

Darn. I shall always think myself obliged to your friendship, let my success be what it may. Madam, your most obedient. What have you got there, pray?

Charl. [Reading.] Her lively looks a sprightly mind disclose;

Quick as her eyes, and as unfixed as those.

Darn. Pray, madam, what is it?

Charl. Favours to none, to all she smiles extends;—

Darn. Nay, I will see.

Char. Ofi she rejects, but never once offends.

Col. Lamb. Have a care; she has dipped into her own character, and she'll never forgive you, if you don't let her go through with it.

Darn. I beg your pardon, madam.

Charl. Bright as the sun, her eyes the gazers strike,

And, like the sun, they shine on all alike. Um!—

Darn. That is something like, indeed.

Col. Lamb. You would say so, if you knew all.

Darn. All what? Pray what do you mean?

Col. Lamb. Have a little patience; I'll tell you immediately.

Char. If to her share some female errors fall,

Look on her face, and you'll forget them all.

Is not that natural, Mr. Darnley?

Darn. For a woman to expect, it is indeed.

Charl. And can you blame her, when 'tis at the same time a proof of the poor man's passion, and her power?

Darn. So then, you think the greatest compliment a lover can make his mistress is to give up his reason to her.

Charl. (Rises.) Certainly; for what have your lordly sex to boast of but your understanding? and till that's entirely surrendered to her discretion, while the least sentiment holds out against her, a woman must be downright vain to think her conquest completed.

Darn. There we differ, madam; for, in my opinion, nothing but the most excessive vanity could value or desire such a conquest.

Charl. Oh! d'ye hear him, brother? The creature reasons with me! Nay, has the effrontery to think me in the wrong, too! Oh, lud! he'd make a horrid tyrant: positively, I won't have him.

Darn. Well, my comfort is, no other man will easily know whether you'll have him or not.

Charl. Am not I a horrid vain, silly creature, Mr. Darnley?

Darn. A little bordering on the baby, I must own.

Charl. Lud! how can you love a body so, then? but I don't think you love me, though, do you?

Darn. Yes, 'faith, I do; and so shamefully, that I'm in hopes you doubt it.

Charl. Poor man! he'd fain bring me to reason.

Darn. I would, indeed. Nay, were it but possible to make you serious only when you should be so, I should think you the most amiable—

Charl. Oh, lud! he's civil—

Darn. Come, come, be generous, and swear at least you'll never marry another.

Charl. Ah, lud! now you have spoiled all again; besides, how can I be sure of that, before I have seen the other man my brother spoke to me of?

Darn. What riddle's this?

Col. Lamb. I told you, you did not know all. To be serious, my father went out but now, on purpose to avoid you. In short, he absolutely retracts his promises; says he would not have you fool away your time after my sister; and in plain terms told me he had another man in his head for her.

Darn. Another man! who? what is he? did not he name him?

Col. Lamb. No; nor has he yet spoken of him to my sister.

Darn. This is unaccountable! What can have given him this sudden turn?

Col. Lamb. Some whim our conscientious Doctor has put into his head, I'll lay my life.

Darn. He! He can't be such a villain; he professes a friendship for me.

Col. Lamb. So much the worse.

Darn. But on what pretence, what grounds, what reason? What interest can he have to oppose me?

Col. Lamb. Are you really now as unconcerned as you seem to be?

Charl. You are a strange dunce, brother; you know no more of love than I do of a regiment. You shall see now how I'll comfort him. Poor Darnley. Ha, ha, ha!

Darn. I don't wonder at your good humour, madam, when you have so substantial an opportunity to make me uneasy for life.

Charl. Oh, lud! how sententious he is! Well, his reproaches have that greatness of soul, the confusion they give is insupportable. Betty! is the tea ready?

Enter BETTY.

Betty. Yes, madam.

Charl. Mr. Darnley, your servant.

[Exit with Betty.]

Col. Lamb. So! you have made a fine piece of work on't indeed?

Darn. Dear Tom, pardon me if I speak a little freely; I own, the levity of her behaviour, at this time, gives me harder thoughts than I once believed it possible to have of her.

Col. Lamb. Indeed, my friend, you mistake her.

Darn. Nay, nay; had she any real concern for me, the apprehension of a man's addresses, whom yet she never saw, must have alarmed her to some degree of seriousness.

Col. Lamb. Not at all; for let this man be whom he will, I take her levity as a proof of her resolution to have nothing to do with him.

Darn. And pray, sir, may I not as well suspect, that this artful delay of her good nature to me now is meant as a provisional defence against my reproaches, in case, when she has seen this man, she should think it convenient to prefer him?

Col. Lamb. No, no; she's giddy, but not capable of so studied a falsehood.

Darn. But still, what could she mean by going away so abruptly?

Col. Lamb. You grew too grave for her.

Darn. Why, who could bear such trifling?

Col. Lamb. You should have laughed at her.

Darn. I can't love at that easy rate.

Col. Lamb. No; if you could, the uneasiness would lie on her side.

Darn. Do you, then, really think she has anything in her heart for me?

Col. Lamb. Ay, marry, sir. Ah! if you could but get her to own that seriously now, lud! how you could love her!

Darn. And so I could by heaven!

Col. Lamb. Well, well; I'll undertake for her; if my father don't stand in the way, we are well enough.

Darn. What says my lady? You don't think she's against us?

Col. Lamb. I dare say she is not; she's of so soft, so sweet a disposition.

Darn. Pray, how came so fine a woman to marry your father, with such a vast inequality of years?

Col. Lamb. Want of fortune, Frank: she was poor and beautiful, he rich and amorous; she made him happy, and he made her—

Darn. A lady.

Col. Lamb. And a jointure: now she's the only one in the family that has power with our precise Doctor; and I dare engage, she'll use it with him to persuade my father from anything that is against your interest. By the way, you must know, I have some shrewd suspicion, that this sanctified rogue is in love with her.

Darn. In love!

Col. Lamb. You shall judge by the symptoms; but hush! here he comes, with my grandmother: step this way, and I'll tell you. [Ereunt.]

Enter Doctor CANTWELL and Old Lady LAMBERT, followed by SEYWARD.

Dr. Cant. Charles, step up into my study; bring down a dozen more of those manuals of devotion, with the last hymn I composed; and when he calls, give them to Mr. Mawworm: and, harkye! if any one inquire after me, say I am gone to Newgate and the Marshalsea, to distribute alms. [Exit Seyward.]

Old Lady Lamb. Well, but worthy Doctor, why will you go to the prisons yourself? Cannot you send the money? Ugly distempers are often caught there; have a care of your health; let us keep one good man, at least, among us.

Dr. Cant. Alas! madam, I am not a good man; I am a guilty, wicked sinner, full of iniquity; the greatest villain that ever breathed; every instant of my life is crowded with stains; it is one continued series of crimes and defilements: you do not know what I am capable of: you indeed take me for a good man; but the truth is, I am a worthless creature.

Old Lady Lamb. Have you, then, stumbled? Alas! if it be so, who shall walk upright? What horrid crime have you been hurried into, that calls for this severe self-crimination?

Dr. Cant. None, madam, that perhaps humanity may call very enormous; yet am I sure that my thoughts never stray a moment from celestial contemplations? Do they not sometimes, before I am aware, turn to things of this earth? Am I not often awary, and surprised into wrath? Nay, the instance is recent; for, last night, being snarled at and bit by Minxy, your daughter-in-law's lap-dog, I am conscious I struck the little beast with a degree of passion, for which I have never been able to forgive myself since.

Old Lady Lamb. Oh! worthy, humble soul! this is a slight offence, which your suffering and mortifications may well atone for.

Dr. Cant. No, madam, no; I want to suffer; I ought to be mortified; and I am obliged now to tell you, that, for my soul's sake, I must quit your good son's family: I am pampered too much here; live too much at my ease.

Old Lady Lamb. Good Doctor!

Dr. Cant. Alas! madam, it is not you that should shed tears; it is I that ought to weep; you are a pure woman.

Old Lady Lamb. I pure! Who? I! No, no: sinful, sinful; but do not talk of quitting our family; what will become of us? for friendship, for charity—

Dr. Cant. Enough; say no more, madam; I submit; while I can do good it is my duty.

Enter Colonel LAMBERT and DARNLEY.

Col. Lamb. Your ladyship's most humble servant.

Old Lady Lamb. Grandson, how do you do?

Darn. Good day to you, Doctor.

Dr. Cant. Mr. Darnley, I am your most humble servant; I hope you and the good Colonel will stay and join in the private duties of the family.

Old Lady Lamb. No, Doctor, no; it is too early, the sun has not risen upon them; but I doubt not, the day will come.

Dr. Cant. I warrant they will go to a play now!

Old Lady Lamb. Would they? I am afraid they would.

Darn. Why, I hope it is no sin, madam; if I be not mistaken, I have seen your ladyship at a play.

Old Lady Lamb. Me, sir! see me at a play! You may have seen the prince of darkness, or some of his imps, in my likeness, perhaps.

Darn. Well, but, madam—

Old Lady Lamb. Mr. Darnley, do you think I would commit a murder?

Dr. Cant. No, sir, no; these are not the plants usually to be met with in that rank soil; the seeds of wickedness indeed sprout up every where too fast; but a play-house is the devil's hot-bed.

Col. Lamb. And yet, Doctor, I have known some of the leaders of your tribe, as scrupulous as they are, who have been willing to gather fruit there for the use of the brethren, as in case of a benefit.

Dr. Cant. The charity covereth the sin; and it may be lawful to turn the wages of abomination to the comfort of the righteous.

Col. Lamb. Ha, ha, ha!

Dr. Cant. Reprobate! reprobate!

Col. Lamb. What is that you mutter, sirrah?

Old Lady Lamb. Oh, heavens!

Darn. Let him go, Colonel.

Col. Lamb. A canting hypocrite!

Dr. Cant. Very well, sir; your father shall know my treatment. [Exit.]

Old Lady Lamb. Let me run out of the house; I shall have it fall upon my head, if I stay among such wicked wretches. Oh! grandson, grandson! [Exit.]

Darn. Was there ever so insolent a rascal?

Col. Lamb. The dog will one day provoke me to beat his brains out.

Darn. But what the devil is he? Whence comes he? What is his original? How has he so ingratiated himself with your father, as to get footing in your house?

Col. Lamb. Oh! sir, he is here in quality of chaplain; he was first introduced by the good old lady that's just gone out. You know, she has been a long time a frequenter of our modern conventicles; where, it seems, she got acquainted with this sanctified pastor. His disciples believe him a saint; and my poor father, who has been for some time tainted with their pernicious principles, has been led into the same snare.

Darn. Ha! here's your sister again.

Enter CHARLOTTE and Doctor CANTWELL.

Charl. You'll find, sir, I will not be used thus; nor shall your credit with my father protect your insolence to me.

Col. Lamb. What's the matter?

Charl. Nothing. Pray, be quiet; I don't want you; stand out of the way. How durst you bolt with such authority into my chamber, without giving me notice?

Darn. Confusion!

Col. Lamb. Hold! if my father don't resent this, 'tis then time enough for me to do it.

Dr. Cant. Compose yourself, madam; I came by your father's desire, who being informed that you were entertaining Mr. Darnley, grew impatient, and gave his positive commands that you attend him instantly, or he himself, he says, will fetch you.

Darn. Ay, now the storm is rising.

Dr. Cant. So, for what I have done, madam, I had his authority, and shall leave him to answer you.

Charl. 'Tis false! He gave you no authority to insult me; or if he had, did you suppose I would bear it from you? What is it you presume upon? your function? Does that exempt you from the manners of a gentleman?

Dr. Cant. Shall I have an answer to your father, lady?

Charl. I'll send him none by you.

Dr. Cant. I shall inform him so. [Exit.]

Charl. A saucy puppy!

Col. Lamb. Pray, sister, what has the fellow done to you?

Charl. Nothing.

Darn. I beg you would tell us, madam.

Charl. Nay, no great matter; but I was sitting carelessly in my dressing-room, a—a fastening my garter, and this impudent cur comes bounce in upon me.

Darn. The rogue must be corrected.

Col. Lamb. Yet, egad! I cannot help laughing at the accident! what a ridiculous figure must she make! Ha, ha!

Charl. Ah! you are as impudent as he, I think.

Darn. Dear Tom, speak to her before she goes.

Charl. What does he say, brother?

Col. Lamb. Why, he wants to have me speak to you, and I would have him do it himself.

Charl. Ay; come, do, Darnley; I am in a good humour now.

Darn. Oh! Charlotte, my heart is bursting!

Charl. Well, well; out with it, then.

Darn. Your father now, I see, is bent on parting us; nay, what's worse, perhaps will give you to another. I cannot speak; imagine what I want from you.

Charl. Well, Oh, lud! one looks so silly tho' when one is serious. Oh, gad! in short, I cannot get it out.

Col. Lamb. I warrant you; try again.

Charl. Oh, lud! well, if one must be teased, then, why he must hope, I think.

Darn. Is it possible! thus—

Col. Lamb. Buz! not a syllable; she has done very well. I bar all heroics; if you press it too far, I'll hold six to four she's off again in a moment.

Darn. I'm silenced.

Charl. Now am I on tip-toe to know what old fellow my father has found out for me.

Darn. I'll give something to know him.

Charl. He's in a terrible fuss at your being here, I find.

Col. Lamb. 'Sdeath! here he comes!

Charl. Now we are all in a fine pickle!

[Enter Sir JOHN LAMBERT hastily; looks sternly at DARNLEY; takes CHARLOTTE under his arm, and carries her off. Col. LAMBERT and DARNLEY exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Ante-chamber in Sir John Lambert's House.

Enter SEYWARD, with a writing in his hand, from the folding doors.

Seyw. 'Tis so: I have long suspected where his zeal would end—in the making of his private fortune. But, then, to found it on the ruin of his patron's children! I shudder at the villainy! What desperation may a son be driven to, so barbarously disinherited! Besides, his daughter, fair Charlotte, too, is wronged; wronged in the tenderest point: for so extravagant is this settlement, that it leaves her not a shilling unless she marry with the Doctor's consent, which is intended, by what I have heard, as an expedient to oblige her to marry the Doctor himself. Now, 'twere but an honest part, to let Charlotte know the snare that is laid for her. This deed's not signed, and may yet be prevented. It shall be so. Yes, charming creature, I adore you; and, though I am sensible my passion is without hope, I may indulge it thus far at least,—I may have the merit of serving you, and perhaps the pleasure to know you think yourself obliged by me.

Enter Sir JOHN LAMBERT, Lady LAMBERT, and CHARLOTTE.

Sir J. Lamb. Oh! Seyward, your uncle wants you to transcribe some hymns.

Seyw. Sir, I'll wait on him.

Charl. A pretty well-bred fellow, that.

Sir J. Lamb. Ay, ay; but he has better qualities than his good-breeding.

Charl. He's always clean, too.

Sir J. Lamb. I wonder, daughter, when you will take notice of a man's real merit. Humph! well-bred and clean, forsooth! Would not one think, now, she was describing a coxcomb? When do you hear my wife talk at this rate? and yet she is as young as your fantastical ladyship.

Lady Lamb. Charlotte is of a cheerful temper, my dear; but I know you don't think she wants discretion.

Sir J. Lamb. I shall try that presently; and you, my dear, shall judge between us. In short, daughter, your course of life is but one continued round of playing the fool to no purpose; and therefore I am resolved to make you think seriously, and marry.

Charl. That I shall do before I marry, sir, you may depend upon it.

Sir J. Lamb. Humph! that I am not so sure of; but you may depend upon my having thought seriously, and that's as well: for the person I intend you is, of all the world, the only man who can make you truly happy.

Charl. And of all the world, sir, that's the only man I'll positively marry.

Lady Lamb. You have rare courage, Charlotte; if I had such a game to play, I should be frightened out of my wits.

Charl. Lud! madam, he'll make nothing of it, depend upon it.

Sir J. Lamb. Mind what I say to you. This wonderful man, I say, first, in his public character, is religious, zealous and charitable.

Charl. Very well, sir.

Sir J. Lamb. In his private character, sober.

Charl. I should hate a sot.

Sir J. Lamb. Chaste.

Charl. A-hem!

[Stifling a laugh.]

Sir J. Lamb. What is it you sneer at, madam? You want one of your fine gentlemen rakes, I suppose, that are snapping at every woman they meet with.

Charl. No, no, sir; I am very well satisfied. I—I should not care for such a sort of a man, no more than I should for one that every woman was ready to snap at.

Sir J. Lamb. No; you'll be secure from jealousy; he has experience, ripeness of years; he is almost forty-nine. Your sex's vanity will have no charms for him.

Charl. But all this while, sir, I don't find that he has charms for our sex's vanity. How does he look? Is he tall, well made? Does he dress, sing, talk, laugh, and dance well? Has he good hair, good teeth, fine eyes? Does he keep a chaise, coach, and ris-a-vis? Has he six prancing ponies? Does he wear the prince's uniform, and subscribe to Brookes's?

Sir J. Lamb. Was there ever so profligate a creature! What will this age come to?

Lady Lamb. Nay, Charlotte, here I must be against you. Now you are blind, indeed. A woman's happiness has little to do with the pleasure her husband takes in his own person.

Sir J. Lamb. Right!

Lady Lamb. It is not how he looks, but how he loves, is the point.

Sir J. Lamb. Good again!

Lady Lamb. And a wife is much more secure that has charms for her husband, than when the husband has only charms for her.

Sir J. Lamb. Admirable! go on, my dear.

Lady Lamb. Do you think a woman of five-and-twenty may not be much happier with an honest man of fifty, than the finest woman of fifty with a young fellow of five-and-twenty?

Sir J. Lamb. Mark that!

Charl. Ay; but when two five-and-twenties come together, dear papa, you must allow they've a chance to be fifty times as pleasant and frolicsome.

Sir J. Lamb. Frolicsome! Why, you sensual idiot, what have frolics to do with solid happiness? I am ashamed of you. Go; you talk worse than a girl at a boarding-school. Frolicsome! as if marriage were only a license for two people to play the fool according to law. Methinks, madam, you have a better example of happiness before your face. Here's one has ten times your understanding, and she, you find, has made a different choice.

Charl. Lud! sir, how you talk! you don't consider people's tempers. I don't say my lady is not in the right; but then, you know, papa, she's a prude, and I am a coquette: she becomes her character very well, I don't deny it; and I hope everything I do is as consistent with mine. Your wise people may talk what they will, but 'tis constitution governs us all; and be assured, you will no more be able to bring me to endure a man of forty-nine, than you can persuade my lady to dance in church to the organ.

Sir J. Lamb. Why, you wicked wretch! could anything persuade you to do that?

Charl. Lud! sir, I won't answer for what I might do, if the whim were in my head; besides, you know I always loved a little flirtation.

Sir J. Lamb. Oh, horrible! flirtation! My poor sister has ruined her; leaving her fortune in her own hands has turned her brain. In short, Charlotte, your sentiments of life are shameful, and I am resolved upon your instant reformation; therefore, as an earnest of your obedience, I shall first insist that you never see young Darnley more; for, in one word, the good and pious Doctor Cantwell's the man that I have decreed for your husband.

Charl. Ho, ho, ho!

Sir J. Lamb. 'Tis very well; this laugh you think becomes you, but I shall spoil your mirth. No more; give me a serious answer.

Charl. I ask your pardon, sir: I should not have smiled, indeed, could I have supposed it possible that you were serious.

Sir J. Lamb. You'll find me so.

Charl. I'm sorry for it; but I have an objection to the Doctor, sir, that most fathers think a substantial one.

Sir J. Lamb. Name it.

Charl. Why, sir, we know nothing of his fortune: he's not worth a groat.

Sir J. Lamb. That's more than you know, madam; I am able to give him a better estate than I am afraid you'll deserve.

Charl. How?—Sir!

Sir J. Lamb. I have told you what's my will, and shall leave you to think on't.

Enter SEYWARD.

Seyw. Sir, if you be at leisure, the Doctor desires to speak with you upon business of importance.

Sir J. Lamb. I will come to him immediately. [Exit SEYWARD.] Daughter, I am called away, and therefore have only time to tell you, as my last resolution, Doctor Cantwell is your husband, or I'm no more your father. [Exit.]

Charl. Oh! madam, I am at my wits' end; not for the little fortune I may lose in disobeying my father, but it startles me to find what a dangerous influence this fellow has over all his actions.

Lady Lamb. Here's your brother.

Enter Colonel LAMBERT.

Col. Lamb. Madam, your most obedient. Well, sister, is the secret out? Who is this pretty fellow my father has picked up for you?

Charl. Even our agreeable Doctor.

Col. Lamb. You are not serious?

Lady Lamb. He's the very man, I can assure you, sir.

Col. Lamb. Confusion! What! would the cormorant devour the whole family? Your ladyship knows he is secretly in love with you, too.

Lady Lamb. Fie, fie, Colonel!

Col. Lamb. I ask your pardon, madam, if I speak too freely; but I am sure, by what I have seen, your ladyship must suspect something of it.

Lady Lamb. I am sorry anybody else should see it: but I must own, his behaviour to me of late, both in private and before company, has been something warmer than I thought became him.

Col. Lamb. How are these opposites to be reconciled? Can the rascal have the assurance to think both points are to be carried?

Charl. Truly, one would not suspect the gentleman to be so tergagant.

Col. Lamb. Especially while he pretends to be so shocked at all indecent amours. In the country, he used to make the maids lock up the turkey-cocks every Saturday night, for fear they should gallant the hens on a Sunday.

Lady Lamb. Oh! ridiculous!

Col. Lamb. Upon my life, madam, my sister told me so.

Charl. I tell you so! You impudent—

Lady Lamb. Fie, Charlotte! he only jests with you.

Charl. How can you be such a monster to stay playing the fool here, when you have more reason to be frightened out of your wits? You don't know, perhaps, that my father declares he'll settle a fortune upon this fellow, too.

Col. Lamb. What do you mean?

Lady Lamb. 'Tis too true; 'tis not three minutes since he said so.

Col. Lamb. Nay, then, it is time indeed his eyes were opened; and give me leave to say, madam, 'tis only in your power.

Lady Lamb. What is't you propose?

Col. Lamb. Why, if this fellow, which I'm sure of, be really in love with you, give him a fair opportunity to declare himself, and leave me to make my advantage of it.

Lady Lamb. I should be loth to do a wrong thing.

Charl. Dear madam, it is the only way in the world to expose him to my father.

Lady Lamb. I'll think of it.

Col. Lamb. Pray do, madam; but, in the meantime, I must leave you: poor Darnley stays for me at the Smyrna, and will sit upon thorns till I bring him an account of his new rival.

Charl. Well, well, get you gone, then; here is my grandmother. [Exit Col. LAMB.]

Enter Old Lady LAMBERT.

Lady Lamb. This is kind, madam; I hope your ladyship's come to dine with us.

Old Lady Lamb. No: don't be afraid: only in my way from Tottenham Court, I just called to see whether any dreadful accident had happened to the family since I was here last.

Lady Lamb. Accident, did your ladyship say?

Old Lady Lamb. I shall be sorry, daughter, but not surprised, when I hear it; for there are goings on under this roof, that will bring temporal punishments along with them.

Lady Lamb. Indeed, madam, you astonish me!

Old Lady Lamb. We'll drop this subject; and I beg leave to address myself to you, Miss Charlotte; I see you have a bit of lace upon your neck; I desire to know what you wear it for?

Charl. Wear it for, madam? It is the fashion.

Old Lady Lamb. In short, I have been at my linen-drawer's to-day, and have brought you some thick muslin, which I desire you will make handkerchiefs of; for I must tell you that slight covering is indecent, and gives much offence.

Lady Lamb. Indecent, did your ladyship say?

Old Lady Lamb. Yes, daughter-in-law. Doctor Cantwell complains to me that he cannot sit at table, the sight of her bare neck disturbs him so; and he's a good man, and knows what indecency is.

Charl. Yes, indeed; I believe he does, better than any one in this house. But you may tell the Doctor from me, madam, that he is an impudent coxcomb—a puppy—and deserves to have his bones broken.

Old Lady Lamb. Fie, Charlotte, fie! He speaks but for your good, and this is the grateful return you make.

Charl. Grateful return, madam! how can you be so partial to that hypocrite? The Doctor is one of those who start at a feather. Poor good man! yet he has his vices of a graver sort.

Old Lady Lamb. Come, come; I wish you would follow his precepts, whose practice is conformable to what he teaches. Virtuous man! Above all sensual regards, he considers the world merely as a collection of dirt and pebble-stones. How has he weaned me from temporal connexions! My heart is now set upon nothing sublunary; and, I thank heaven! I am so insensible to everything in this vain world, that I could see you, my son, my daughters, my brothers, my grand-children, all expire before me; and mind it no more than the going out of so many snuffs of candle.

Charl. Upon my word, madam, it is a very humane disposition you have been able to arrive at; and your family is much obliged to the Doctor for his instructions.

Old Lady Lamb. Well, child, I have nothing more to say to you at present; heaven mend you, that's all.

Lady Lamb. Pray, madam, stay and dine with us.

Old Lady Lamb. No, daughter; I have said it, and you know I never tell a lie; but here's my son, if you'll give me leave, I'll stay and speak to him.

Lady Lamb. Your ladyship's time is your own.

Charl. Ay, and here's that abominable Doctor. This fellow puts me beyond my patience.

[Exit with Lady LAMBERT.]

Enter Sir JOHN LAMBERT and Dr. CANTWELL.

Sir J. Lamb. Oh, madam, madam! I'm glad you're here to join me in solicitations to the Doctor. Here is my mother, friend, my mother! a pious woman; you will hear her, more worthy to advise you than I am.

Dr. Cant. Alas! the dear good lady, I will kiss her hand. But what advice can she give me? The riches of this world, sir, have no charms for me; I am not dazzled with their false glare; and were I, I repeat it, to accept of the trust you want to repose in me, heaven knows, it would only be lest the means should fall into wicked hands, who would not lay it out as I should do, for the glory of heaven, and the good of my neighbour.

Old Lady Lamb. What is the matter, son?

Dr. Cant. Nothing, madam, nothing. But you were witness how the worthy Colonel treated me this morning. Not that I speak it on my own account; for to be reviled is my portion.

Sir J. Lamb. Oh! the villain! the villain!

Dr. Cant. Indeed, I did not think he had so hard a nature.

Old Lady Lamb. Ah! your charitable heart knows not the rancour that is in his. His wicked sister, too, has been here this moment abusing this good man.

Dr. Cant. Oh! sir, 'tis plain, 'tis plain; your whole family are in a combination against me; your son and daughter hate me: they think I stand between them and your favour; and indeed it is not fit I should do so; for, fallen as they are, they are still your children, and I an alien, an intruder, who ought in conscience to retire and heal these unhappy breaches.

Old Lady Lamb. See, if the good man does not wipe his eyes!

Dr. Cant. Oh, heavens! the thought of their ingratitude wounds me to the quick; but I'll remove this eye-sore. Here, Charles!

Enter SEYWARD.

Sir J. Lamb. For goodness sake—

Dr. Cantwell. Bring me that writing I gave you to lay up this morning.

Sir J. Lamb. Make haste, good Charles; it shall be signed this moment. [Exit SEYWARD.]

Dr. Cant. Not for the world, Sir John: every minute tends to corroborate my last intentions; I must not, will not take it, with the curses of your children.

Sir J. Lamb. But, consider, Doctor; shall my wicked son then be heir to my lands, before repentance has entitled him to favour? No, let him depend upon you whom he has wronged; perhaps, in time, he may reflect on his father's justice, and be reconciled to your rewarded virtues. If heaven should at last reclaim him, in you, I know, he still would find a fond forgiving father.

Dr. Cant. The imagination of so blessed an hour softens me to a tenderness I cannot support!

Old Lady Lamb. Oh! the dear good man!

Sir J. Lamb. With regard to my daughter, Doctor, you know she is not wronged by it; because, if she prove not obstinate, she may still be happy.

Old Lady Lamb. Yes; but the perverse wretch slights the blessing you propose for her.

Dr. Cant. We must allow, madam, female modesty a time, which often takes the likeness of distaste; the commands of your good son might too suddenly surprise her. Maids must be gently dealt with, and might I humbly advise—

Sir J. Lamb. Any thing you will; you shall govern me and her.

Dr. Cant. Then, sir, abate of your authority, and let the matter rest awhile.

Sir J. Lamb. Suppose we were to get my wife to speak to her; women will often hear from their own sex what, sometimes, even from the man they like, will startle them.

Dr. Cant. Then, with your permission, sir, I will take an opportunity of talking to my lady.

Sir J. Lamb. She's now in her dressing room; I'll go and prepare her for it. [Exit.]

Dr. Cant. You are too good to me, sir; too bountiful.

Enter SEYWARD.

Seyw. Sir, Mr. Mawworm is without, and would be glad to be permitted to speak with you.

Old Lady Lamb. Oh! pray, Doctor, admit him; I have not seen Mr. Mawworm this great while; he's a pious man, though in an humble estate. Desire the worthy creature to walk in. [Exit SEYWARD.]

Enter MAWORM.

How do you do, Mr. Mawworm?

Maw. Thank your ladyship's axing, I'm but deadly poorish, indeed; the world and I can't agree.—I have got the books, Doctor; and Mrs. Grunt bid me give her sarvice to you, and thanks you for the eighteen-pence.

Dr. Cant. Hush! friend Mawworm, not a word more; you know I hate to have my little charities blazed about: a poor widow, madam, to whom I sent my nite.

Old Lady Lamb. Give her this. (Offering a purse to Mawworm.)

Dr. Cant. I'll take care it shall be given to her. (Takes the purse.)

Old Lady Lamb. But what is the matter with you, Mr. Mawworm?

Maw. I don't know what's the matter with me; I'm a breaking my heart: I think it's a sin to keep a shop.

Old Lady Lamb. Why, if you think it is a sin, indeed—Pray, what's your business?

Maw. We deals in grocery, tea, small-beer, charcoal, butter, brick-dust, and the like.

Old Lady Lamb. Well; you must consult with your friendly director here:

Maw. I want's to go a-preaching.

Old Lady Lamb. Do you?

Maw. I'm almost sure I have had a call.

Old Lady Lamb. Ay!

Maw. I have made several sermons already. I does them extrumperry, because I can't write; and now the devils in our alley says as how my head's turned.

Old Lady Lamb. Ay, devils, indeed; but don't you mind them.

Maw. No, I don't; I rebukes them, and preaches to them, whether they will or not. We lets our house in lodgings to single men; and, sometimes, I gets them together, with one or two of the neighbours, and makes them all cry.

Old Lady Lamb. Did you ever preach in public?

Maw. I got up on Kennington Common, the last review day; but the boys threw brick-bracks at me, and pinned crackers to my tail; and I have been afraid to mount, your ladyship, ever since.

ACT. DRAMA.—NOS. 55 & 56.

Old Lady Lamb. Do you hear this, Doctor? throw brick-bats at him, and pin crackers to his tail! Can these things be stood by?

Maw. I told them so; says I, "I does nothing clandestinely; I stands here contagious to his majesty's guards, and I charges you upon your appeals not to mislist me."

Old Lady Lamb. And it had no effect?

Maw. No more than if I spoke to so many post-esses; but if he advises me to go a-preaching, and quit my shop, I'll make an excessance farther into the country.

Old Lady Lamb. An excursion you would say.

Maw. I am but a sheep, but my bleatings shall be heard afar off, and that sheep shall become a shepherd; nay, if it be only, as it were, a shepherd's dog, to bark the stray lambs into the fold.

Old Lady Lamb. He wants method, Doctor.

Dr. Cant. Yes, madam, but there is matter; and I despise not the ignorant.

Maw. He's a saint.

Dr. Cant. Oh!

Old Lady Lamb. Oh!

Maw. If ever there was a saint, he's one. Till I went after him, I was little better than the devil; my conscience was tanned with sin, like a piece of neat's leather, and had no more feeling than the sole of my shoe; always a roving after fantastical delights. I used to go, every Sunday evening, to the Three Hats, at Islington; it's a public-house; mayhap your ladyship may know it: I was a great lover of skittles, too, but now I can't bear them.

Old Lady Lamb. What a blessed reformation!

Maw. I believe, Doctor, you never knowed as how I was instigated one of the stewards of the reforming society. I convicted a man of five oaths, on last Thursday was a se'nnight, at the Pewter-platter, in the Borough; and another of three, while he was playing trap-ball in St. George's Fields: I bought this waistcoat out of my share of the money.

Old Lady Lamb. But how do you mind your business?

Maw. We have lost almost all our customers; because I keeps extorting them whenever they come into the shop.

Old Lady Lamb. And how do you live?

Maw. Better than ever we did: while we were worldly-minded, my wife and I (for I am married to as likely a woman as you shall see in a thousand) could hardly make things do at all; but since this good man has brought us into the road of the righteous, we have always plenty of every thing; and my wife goes as well dressed as a gentlewoman. We have had a child, too.

Old Lady Lamb. Merciful!

Maw. And between you and me, Doctor, I believe Susy's breeding again.

Dr. Cant. Thus it is, madam: I am constantly told, though I can hardly believe it, a blessing follows wherever I come.

Maw. And yet, if you would hear how the neighbours reviles my wife; saying as how she sets no store by me, because we have words now and then; but, as I says, if such was the case, would she ever have out me down that there time as I was moloncholy, and she found me hanging behind the door? I don't believe there's a wife in the parish would have done so by her husband.

Dr. Cant. I believe 'tis near dinner-time; and Sir John will require my attendance.

Maw. Oh! I am troublesome: nay, I only come to you, Doctor, with a message from Mrs. Grunt.

3 C

I wish your ladyship heartily and heartily farewell; Doctor, a good day to you.

Old Lady Lamb. Mr. Mawworm, call on me some time this afternoon : I want to have a little private discourse with you ; and pray, my service to your spouse.

Maw. I will, madam ; you are a malefactor to all goodness ; I'll wait upon your ladyship ; I will, indeed. (Going, returns.) Oh ! Doctor, that's true ; Susy desired me to give her kind love and respects to you. [Exit.]

Dr. Cant. Madam, if you please, I will lead you into the parlour.

Old Lady Lamb. No, Doctor ; my coach waits at the door.

Enter SEYWARD.

Dr. Cant. Charles, you may lay those papers by again, but in some place where you'll easily find them ; for I believe we shall have occasion for them some time this afternoon.

Seyw. I'll take care, sir. [Ereunt Doctor and Old Lady Lamb.] Occasion for them this afternoon ! Then there's no time to be lost ; the coast is clear, and this is her chamber. What's the matter with me ? The thought of speaking to her throws me into a disorder. There's nobody within, I believe ; I'll knock again.

Enter BETTY.

Is your lady busy ?

Betty. I believe she's only reading, sir.

Seyw. Will you do me the favour to let her know, if she be at leisure, I beg to speak with her upon some earnest business ?

Enter CHARLOTTE.

Charl. Who's that ?

Betty. She's here. Mr. Seyward, madam, desires to speak with you.

Charl. Oh ! your servant, Mr. Seyward. Here, take this odious Homer, and lay him up again ; he tires me. [Exit Betty.] How could the blind wretch make such a horrid fuss about a fine woman, for so many volumes together, and give us no account of her amours ! You have read him, I suppose, in the Greek, Mr. Seyward ?

Seyw. Not lately, madam.

Charl. But do you violently admire him now ?

Seyw. The critics say he has his beauties, madam ; but Ovid has always been my favourite.

Charl. Ovid ! oh ! he is ravishing !

Seyw. So art thou, to madness. (Aside.)

Charl. Lud ! how could one do to learn Greek ? Were you a great while about it ?

Seyw. It has been half the business of my life, madam.

Charl. That's cruel now ; then you think one could not be mistress of it in a month or two ?

Seyw. Not easily, madam.

Charl. They tell me it has the softest tone for love of any language in the world. I fancy I could soon learn it. I know three words of it already.

Seyw. Pray, madam, what are they ?

Charl. Stay, let me see—oh, ay ! Zoe kai psuche. Seyw. I hope you know the English of them, madam.

Charl. Oh, lud ! I hope there is no harm in them. I'm sure I heard the Doctor say it to my lady. Pray, what is it ?

Seyw. You must first imagine, madam, a tender lover, gazing on his mistress ; and then, indeed, they have a softness in them ; as thus, Zoe kai psuche ! My life, my soul !

Charl. Oh ! the impudent young rogue ! how his eyes spoke, too ! What the deuce can he want with me ? It always ran in my head that this fellow had something in him above his condition ; I'll know immediately. (Aside.) Well, but your business with me, Mr. Seyward ? You have something of love in your head, I'll lay my life on't.

Seyw. I never yet durst own it, madam.

Charl. Why, what's the matter ?

Seyw. My story is too melancholy to entertain a mind so much at ease as your's.

Charl. Oh ! I love melancholy stories, of all things. Pray, how long have you lived with your uncle, Mr. Seyward ?

Seyw. With Doctor Cantwell, I suppose you mean, madam ?

Charl. Ay.

Seyw. He's no uncle of mine, madam.

Charl. You surprise me ! not your uncle ?

Seyw. No, madam ; but that's not the only character the Doctor assumes, to which he has no right.

Charl. Lud ! I am concerned for you.

Seyw. So you would, madam, if you knew all.

Charl. I am already ; but if there be any further particulars of your story, pray, let me hear them ; and should any services be in my power, I am sure you may command them.

Seyw. You treat me with so kind, so gentle a hand, that I will unbosom myself to you. My father, madam, was the younger branch of a genteel family in the north ; his name, Trueman ; but dying while I was yet in my infancy, I was left wholly dependant on my mother ; a woman really pious and well-meaning, but—in short, madam, Doctor Cantwell fatally got acquainted with her, and as he is now your father's bosom counsellor, soon became her's. She died, madam, when I was but eight years old ; and then, I was, indeed, left an orphan.

Charl. Poor creature ! Lud ! I cannot bear it.

Seyw. She left Doctor Cantwell her sole heir and executor ; but I must do her the justice to say, I believe it was in the confirmation that he would take care of, and do justice to me ; and, indeed, he has so far taken care of me, that he sent me to a seminary abroad, and for these three years last past has kept me with him.

Charl. A seminary ! Oh, heavens ! But why have you not striven to do yourself justice ?

Seyw. Thrown so young into his power as I was, unknown and friendless, to whom could I apply for succour ? Nay, madam, I will confess that, on my return to England, I was at first tainted with his enthusiastic notions myself ; and, for some time, as much imposed upon by him, as others ; till, by degrees, as he found it necessary to make use of, or totally discard me, (which last he did not think prudent to do,) he was obliged to unveil himself to me in his proper colours ; and I believe I can inform you of some parts of his private character, that may be the means of detecting one of the wickedest impostors that ever practised upon credulity.

Charl. But how has the wretch dared to treat you ?

Seyw. In his ill and insolent humours, madam, he has sometimes the presumption to tell me, that I am the object of his charity ; and I own, madam, that I am humbled in my opinion, by his having drawn me into a connivance at some actions, which I can't look back on without horror.

Charl. Indeed, you can't tell how I pity you ; and, depend upon it, if it be possible to serve you, by getting you out of the hands of this monster, I will. Seyw. Once more, madam, let me assure you, that your generous inclination would be a consolation to me in the worst misfortunes; and, even in the last moment of painful death, would give my poor heart a joy.

Charl. Lud! the poor unfortunate boy loves me, too! What shall I do with him? Pray, Mr. Seyward, what paper is that you have in your hand? Is it relative to—

Seyw. Another instance of the conscience and gratitude which animate our worthy Doctor.

Charl. You frighten me! Pray, what is the purport of it? Is it neither signed nor sealed?

Seyw. No, madam; therefore, to prevent it, by this timely notice, was my business here with you. Your father gave it to the Doctor first, to shew his counsel; who having approved it, I understand this evening it will be executed.

Charl. But what is it?

Seyw. It grants to Doctor Cantwell, in present, four hundred pounds per annum, of which this very house is part; and, at your father's death, invests him in the whole remainder of his freehold estate. For you, indeed, there is a charge of four thousand pounds upon it, provided you marry with the Doctor's consent; if not, 'tis added to my lady's jointure; but your brother, madam, is, without conditions, utterly disinherited.

Charl. I am confounded! What will become of us? My father, now I find, was serious. Oh! this insinuating hypocrite! Let me see—ay, I will go this minute. Sir, dare you trust this in my hands for an hour only?

Seyw. Anything to serve you. [Bell rings.]

Charl. Hark! they ring to dinner: pray, sir, step in: say I am obliged to dine abroad; and whisper one of the footmen to get a chair immediately; then do you take a proper occasion to slip out after me to Mr. Double's chambers in the Temple; there I shall have time to talk further with you. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Dressing-room.

Enter CHARLOTTE and BETTY.

Charl. Has any one been to speak with me, Betty?

Betty. Only Mr. Darnley, madam; he said he would call again, and bade his servant stay below, to give him notice when you came home.

Charl. You don't know what he wanted?

Betty. No, madam; he seemed very uneasy at your being abroad.

Charl. Well, go; I'll see him. [Exit BETTY.]
Ten to one but his wise head has found out something to be jealous of: if he let me see it, I shall be sure to make him infinitely easy. Here he comes.

Enter DARNLEY.

Darn. Your humble servant, madam.

Charl. Your servant, sir.

Darn. You have been abroad, I hear?

Charl. Yes, and now I am come home, you see.

Darn. You seem to turn upon my words, madam. Is there anything particular in them?

Charl. As much as there is in my being abroad, I believe.

Darn. Might I not say you have been abroad, without giving offence?

Charl. And might I not as well say, I was come home, without your being so grave upon it?

Darn. Do you know anything that should make me grave?

Charl. I know, if you be so, I am the worst person in the world you can possibly shew it to.

Darn. Nay, I don't suppose you do anything you won't justify.

Charl. Oh! then, I find I have done something you think I can't justify.

Darn. I don't say that neither. Perhaps I am wrong in what I have said; but I have so often been used to ask pardon for your being in the wrong, that I am resolved henceforth never to rely on the insolent evidence of my own senses.

Charl. You don't know, now, perhaps, that I think this pretty smart speech of your's is very dull; but, since that's a fault you can't help, I will not take it ill. Come now, be as sincere on your side, and tell me seriously, is not what real business I had abroad the very thing you want to be made easy in?

Darn. If I thought you would make me easy, I would own it.

Charl. Now do we come to the point. To-morrow morning, then, I give you my word, to let you know it all; till then, there is a necessity for its being a secret; and I insist upon your believing it.

Darn. But pray, madam, what am I to do with private imagination in the meantime? That is not in my power to confine; and sure, you won't be offended if, to avoid the tortures that may give me, I beg you'll trust me with the secret now.

Charl. Don't press me; for positively, I will not.

Darn. Will not! Cannot have been a kinder term. Is my disquiet of so little moment to you?

Charl. Of none, while your disquiet dares not trust the assurances I have given you. If you expect I should confide in you for life, don't let me see you dare not take my word for a day; and, if you be wise, you'll think so fair a trial a favour. Come, come; there's nothing shews so low a mind, as those grave and insolent jealousies.

Darn. However, madam, mine you won't find so low as you imagine; and since I see your tyranny arises from your mean opinion of me, 'tis time to be myself, and disavow your power. You use it now beyond my bearing; not only impose on me to disbelieve my senses, but do it with such an imperious air, as if my manly reason were your slave—and this despicable frame, that follows you, durst shew no signs of life but what you vouchsafe to give it.

Charl. You are in the right. Go on; suspect me still; believe the worst you can; 'tis all true; I don't justify myself. Why do you trouble me with your complaints? If you be master of that manly reason you have boasted, give a manly proof of it; at once resume your liberty; despise me; go off in triumph now, like a king in a tragedy.

Darn. Is this the end of all, then? And are those tender protestations you have made me, (for such I thought them,) when, with a kind of reluctance, you gave me something more than hope—what, all—oh, Charlotte!—all come to this?

Charl. Oh, lud! I am growing silly; if I hear on, I shall tell him everything; 'tis but another struggle, and I shall conquer it. [Aside.] So, you are not gone, I see.

Darn. Do you, then, wish me gone, madam?

Charl. Your manly reason will direct you.

Darn. This is too much; my heart can bear no more. What, am I rooted here?

Enter SEYWARD.

Charl. At last, I am relieved. Well, Mr. Seyward, is it done?

Seyw. I did not stir from the desk till it was entirely finished.

Charl. Where's the original?

Seyw. This is it, madam.

Charl. Very well; that, you know, you must keep; but come, we must lose no time; we will examine this in the next room. Now I feel for him. [Exit.]

Darn. This is not to be borne. Pray, Mr. Charles, what private business have you with that lady?

Seyw. Sir!

Darn. I must know, young man.

Seyw. Not quite so young, but I can keep a secret, and a lady's, too. You'll excuse me, sir. [Exit.]

Darn. 'Sdeath! I shall be laughed at by everybody; I shall be distracted. This young fellow should repent his pertness, did not this house protect him. This is Charlotte's contrivance to distract me; but—but what? Oh! I have love enough to bear this, and ten times as much.

Enter Colonel LAMBERT.

Col. Lamb. What, in raptures?

Darn. Pr'ythee—I am unfit to talk with you.

Col. Lamb. What, is Charlotte in her airs again?

Darn. I know not what she is.

Col. Lamb. Do you know where she is?

Darn. Retired this moment to her chamber with the young fellow there, the Doctor's nephew.

Col. Lamb. Why, you are not jealous of the Doctor, I hope?

Darn. Perhaps she'll be less reserved to you, and tell you wherein I have mistaken her.

Col. Lamb. Poor Frank! Every plot I lay upon my sister's inclination for you, you are sure to ruin by your own conduct.

Darn. I own I have too little temper, and too much real passion, for a modish lover.

Col. Lamb. Come, come; make yourself easy once more; I'll undertake for you. If you'll fetch a cool turn in the park, upon Constitution-hill, in less than half an hour I'll come to you, and make you perfectly easy.

Darn. Dear Tom, you are a friend, indeed! I have a thousand things—but you shall find me there. [Exit.]

Enter CHARLOTTE and SEYWARD.

Col. Lamb. How now, sister! what have you done to Darnley? The poor fellow looks as if he had killed your parrot.

Charl. Psha! you know him well enough; I've only been setting him a love-lesson; it a little puzzles him to get through it at first, but he'll know it all by to-morrow. You will be sure to be in the way, Mr. Seyward.

Seyw. Madam, you may depend upon me; I have my full instructions. [Exit.]

Col. Lamb. Oh, ho! here's the business, then; and it seems that Darnley was not to be trusted with it. Ha, ha! And, pr'ythee, what is the mighty secret that is transacted between Seyward and you?

Charl. That's what he would have known, indeed; but you must know, I don't think it proper to let you tell him either, for all your sly manner of asking.

Col. Lamb. Pray, take your own time, dear madam; I am not in haste to know, I assure you.

Charl. Well, but, hold! on second thoughts, you shall know part of this affair between Seyward and me; nay, I give you leave to tell Darnley, too, on some conditions: 'tis true, I did design to have surprised you; but now my mind's altered, that's enough.

Col. Lamb. Ay, for any mortal's satisfaction: but here comes my lady.

Enter Lady LAMBERT.

Lady Lamb. Away, away, Colonel and Charlotte, both of you away this instant.

Charl. What's the matter, madam?

Lady Lamb. I am going to put the Doctor to his trial, that's all. I have considered the proposal you have made me to-day, Colonel, and am convinced it ought not to be delayed an instant; so, just now, I told the Doctor, in a half-whisper, that I should be glad to have a word in private with him here; and he said he would wait upon me presently. But must I play a traitorous part now, and, instead of persuading you to the Doctor, persuade the Doctor against you?

Charl. Dear madam, why not? One moment's truce with the prude, I beg of you; don't startle at his first declaration, but let him go on, till he shews the very bottom of his ugly heart.

Lady Lamb. I warrant you, I'll give a good account of him; but, as I live, here he comes!

Charl. Come, then, brother, you and I will be comrade, and steal off. [Exit with Col. LAMB.]

Enter Doctor CANTWELL.—Col. LAMB. listening.

Dr. Cant. Here I am, madam, at your ladyship's command; how happy am I that you think me worthy.

Lady Lamb. Please to sit, sir. [They sit.]

Dr. Cant. Well, but, dear lady—Ah! you can't conceive the joyousness I feel at this so much desired interview. Ah, ah! I have a thousand friendly things to say to you. And how stands your precious health? Is your naughty cold abated yet? I have scarce closed my eyes these two nights with my concern for you.

Lady Lamb. Your charity is too far concerned for me.

Dr. Cant. Ah! don't say so; don't say so: you merit more than mortal man can do for you.

Lady Lamb. Indeed you overrate me.

Dr. Cant. I speak it from my heart: indeed, indeed, indeed I do. [Pressing her hand.]

Lady Lamb. Oh, dear! you hurt my hand, sir.

Dr. Cant. Impute it to my zeal, and want of words for expression: precious soul! I would not harm you for the world; no, it would be the whole business of my life—

Lady Lamb. But to the affair I would speak to you about.

Dr. Cant. Ah! thou heavenly woman!

[Placing his hand on her knee.]

Lady Lamb. Your hand need not be there, sir.

Dr. Cant. I was admiring the softness of this silk. They are, indeed, come to prodigious perfection in all manufactures: how wonderful is human art! here it disputes the prize with nature. That all this soft and gaudy lustre should be brought from the labours of a poor worm!

Lady Lamb. But our business, sir, is upon another subject. Sir John informs me, that he thinks himself under no obligations to Mr. Darnley, and, therefore, resolves to give his daughter to you.

Dr. Cant. Such a thing has been mentioned, madam; but to deal sincerely with you, that is not the happiness I sigh after; there is a soft and serious excellence for me, very different from what your step-daughter possesses.

Lady Lamb. Well, sir, pray be sincere, and open your heart to me.

Dr. Cant. Open my heart! Can you, then, sweet lady, be yet a stranger to it? Has no action of my life been able to inform you of my real thoughts?

Lady Lamb. Well, sir; I take all this, as I suppose you intend it, for my good and spiritual welfare.

Dr. Cant. Indeed I mean you cordial service.

Lady Lamb. I dare say you do: you are above the low momentary views of this world.

Dr. Cant. Why, I should be so: and yet, alas! I find this mortal clothing of my soul is made like other men's, of sensual flesh and blood, and has its frailties.

Lady Lamb. We all have those; but your's are well corrected by your divine and virtuous contemplations.

Dr. Cant. Alas! madam, my heart is not of stone. I may resist; call all my prayers, my fastings, tears, and penance, to my aid; but yet I am not an angel. I am still but a man; and virtue may strive, but nature will be uppermost. I love you, then, madam.

Lady Lamb. (They rise.) Hold, sir! Suppose I now should let my husband, your benefactor, know the favour you design him.

Dr. Cant. You cannot be so cruel!

Lady Lamb. Nor will, on this condition; that you instantly renounce all claim and title to Charlotte, and use your utmost interest with Sir John, to give her, with her full fortune, to Mr. Darnley.

Colonel LAMBERT advances between them.

Col. Lamb. Villain, monster, perfidious and ungrateful traitor! Your hypocrisy, your false zeal is discovered; and I am sent here, by the hand of insulted heaven, to lay you open to my father, and expose you to the world.

Dr. Cant. Ah!

Lady Lamb. Oh! unthinking Colonel!

Col. Lamb. Well, sir, what have you to say for yourself?

Dr. Cant. I have nothing to say to you, Colonel, nor for you; but you shall have my prayers.

Col. Lamb. Why, you profligate hypocrite! Do you think to carry off your villainy with that sanctified air?

Dr. Cant. I know not what you mean, sir. I have been in discourse here with my good lady, by permission of your worthy father.

Col. Lamb. Dog! did my father desire you to talk of love to my lady?

Dr. Cant. Call me not dog, Colonel. I hope we are both brother Christians. Yes, I will own I did beg leave to talk to her of love; for, alas! I am but a man; yet, if my passion for your dear sister, which I cannot control, be sinful—

Lady Lamb. (Aside to the Colonel.) Your noise, I perceive, is bringing up Sir John. Manage with him as you will, at present; I will withdraw; for I have an after-game to play, which may yet put this wretch effectually into our power. [Erit.]

Enter Sir JOHN LAMBERT.

Sir J. Lamb. What uproar is this?

Col. Lamb. Nothing, sir, nothing; only a little broil of the good Doctor's here. You are well rewarded for your kindness; and he would fain pay it back, with triple interest, to your wife: in short, sir, I took him here in the very fact of making a criminal declaration of love to my lady.

Dr. Cant. Why, why, Sir John, would you not let me leave your house? I knew some dreadful method would be taken to drive me hence. Oh! be not angry, good Colonel; but, indeed, and indeed, you use me cruelly.

Sir J. Lamb. Horrible, wicked creature! Doctor, let me hear it from you.

Dr. Cant. Alas! sir, I am in the dark as much as you; but it should seem, for what purpose he best knows, your son hid himself somewhere hereabouts; and while I was talking to my lady, rushed in upon us. You know the subject, sir, on which I was to entertain her; and I might speak of my love to your daughter with more warmth than, perhaps, I ought; which the Colonel overhearing, might possibly imagine I was addressing my lady herself; for I will not suspect—no, heaven forbid! I will not suspect that he would intentionally forge a falsehood to dishonour me.

Sir J. Lamb. Now, vile detractor of all virtue! is your outrageous malice confounded? What he tells you is true; and has been talking to my lady by my consent; and what he said, he said by my orders. Good man! be not concerned, for I see through their vile designs. Here, thou curse of my life, if thou art not lost to conscience, and all sense of honour, repair the injury you have attempted, by confessing your rancour, and throwing yourself at his feet.

Dr. Cant. Oh! Sir John—for my sake—I will throw myself at the Colonel's feet; nay, if that will please him, he shall tread on my neck.

Sir J. Lamb. What! mute, defenceless, hardened in thy malice?

Col. Lamb. I scorn the imputation, sir; and with the same repeated honesty avow (however cunningly he may have devised this gloss) that you are deceived. What I tell you, sir, is true; these eyes, these ears, were witnesses of his audacious love, without the mention of my sister's name: directly, plainly, grossly tending to abuse the honour of your bed.

Sir J. Lamb. Villain! this instant leave my sight, my house, my family, for ever!

Dr. Cant. Hold, good Sir John! I am now recovered from my surprise; let me, then, be an humble mediator. On my account, this must not be. I grant it possible, your son loves me not, but you must grant it, too, as possible he might mistake me; to accuse me, then, was but the error of his virtue: you ought to love him, and thank him for his watchful care.

Sir J. Lamb. Hear this, perverse and reprobate! Couldst thou wrong such more than mortal virtue?

Col. Lamb. Wrong him! The hardened impudence of this painted charity—

Sir J. Lamb. Peace, graceless infidel!

Col. Lamb. No, sir; though I would hazard life to gain you from the clutches of that wretch, I could die to reconcile my duty to your favour; yet on the terms his villainy offers, it is merit to refuse it: but, sir, I'll trouble you no more; to-day is his, to-morrow may be mine. [Erit.]

Sir J. Lamb. Come, my friend; we'll go this instant, and sign the settlement; for that wretch ought to be punished, who, I now see, is incorrigible, and given over to perdition.

Dr. Cant. And do you think I take your estate with such views? No, sir, I receive it, that I may have an opportunity to rouse his mind to virtue, by shewing him an instance of the forgiveness of injuries; the return of good for evil.

Sir J. Lamb. Oh! my dear friend! my stay and my guide! I am impatient till the affair be concluded.

Dr. Cant. The will of heaven be done in all things.

Sir J. Lamb. Poor dear man! [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Parlour in Sir John Lambert's house.

Enter CHARLOTTE and SEYWARD.

Charl. You were witness, then?

Seyw. I saw it signed, sealed, and delivered, madam.

Charl. And all passed without the least suspicion? Seyw. Sir John signed it with such earnestness, and the Doctor received it with such seeming reluctance, that neither had the curiosity to examine a line of it.

Charl. Well, Mr. Seyward, whether it succeeds to our ends or not, we have still the same obligation to you. You saw with what friendly warmth my brother heard your story; and I don't in the least doubt his being able to do something for you.

Seyw. What I have done, my duty bound me to; but, pray, madam, give me leave, without offence, to ask you one innocent question.

Charl. Freely.

Seyw. Have you never suspected, that in all this affair, I have had some secret, stronger motive than barely duty?

Charl. Yes: but have you been in no apprehension I should discover that motive?

Seyw. Pray, pardon me; I see already I have gone too far.

Charl. Not at all; it loses you no merit with me; nor is it in my power to use any one ill that loves me, unless I loved that one again; then, indeed, there might be danger. Come, don't look grave; my inclinations to another shall not hinder me paying every one what's due to their merit; I shall, therefore, always think myself obliged to treat your misfortunes and your modesty with the utmost tenderness.

Seyw. Your good opinion is all I aim at.

Charl. Ay, but the more I give it you, the better you'll think of me still; and then I must think the better of you again, and you the better of me upon that, too; and so, at last, I shall think seriously, and you'll begin to think ill of me: but I hope, Mr. Seyward, your good sense will prevent all this.

Seyw. I see my folly, madam, and blush at my presumption. I humbly take my leave. [Exit.]

Charl. Well, he's a pretty young fellow, after all; and the very first, sure, that ever heard reason against himself with so good an understanding. Lud! how one may live and learn! I could not believe that modesty in a young fellow could have been so amiable; and though I own there is I know not what of dear delight in indulging one's vanity with them, yet, upon serious reflection, I must confess, that truth and sincerity have a thousand charms beyond it. I believe I had as good confess all this to Darnley, and e'en make up the bustle with him, too; but then he will so tease one for instances of real inclination! Oh, gad! I can't bear the thought on't; and yet, we must come together, too. Well, nature knows the way, to be sure, and so I'll e'en trust to her for it.

Enter Lady LAMBERT.

Lady Lamb. Dear Charlotte, what will become of us?

Charl. Pray, explain, madam.

Lady Lamb. In spite of all I could urge, he has consented that the Doctor shall this minute come, and be his own advocate with you.

Charl. I'm glad on't: for the beast must come like a bear to the stake I'm sure he knows I shall bait him.

Lady Lamb. No matter for that; he presses it, to keep Sir John still blind to his wicked designs upon me; therefore, I come to give you notice, that you might be prepared to receive him.

Charl. I'm obliged to your ladyship. Our meeting will be a tender scene, no doubt on't.

Lady Lamb. I think I hear the Doctor coming up stairs. My dear girl, at any rate keep your temper. I shall expect you in my dressing-room, to tell me the particulars of your conduct. [Exit.]

Charl. He must have a great deal of impudence, to come in this manner to me.

Enter BETTY, introducing Dr. CANTWELL.

Betty. Dr. Cantwell desires to be admitted, madam.

Charl. Let him come in. Your servant, sir. Give us chairs, Betty, and leave the room. [Exit Betty.] Sir, there's a seat. What can this ugly cur say to me? He seems a little puzzled. (Aside.)

Dr. Cant. (They sit.) Lookye! young lady, I am afraid, notwithstanding your good father's favour, I am not the man you would desire to be alone with upon this occasion.

Charl. Your modesty is pleased to be in the right.

Dr. Cant. I am afraid, too, notwithstanding all my endeavours to the contrary, that you entertain a pretty bad opinion of me.

Charl. A worse, sir, of no mortal breathing.

Dr. Cant. Which opinion is immovable?

Charl. No rock so firm.

Dr. Cant. I am afraid, then, it will be a vain pursuit, when I solicit you, in compliance with my worthy friend's desire, and my own inclinations, to become my partner in that blessed estate, in which we may be a comfort and support to each other.

Charl. I would die rather than consent to it.

Dr. Cant. In other words, you hate me.

Charl. Most transcendently!

Dr. Cant. Well, there is sincerity, at least, in your confession: you are not, I see, totally deprived of all virtue; though, I must say, I never could perceive in you but very little.

Charl. Oh, fie! you flatter me.

Dr. Cant. No; I speak it with sorrow, because you are the daughter of my best friend. But how are we to proceed, now? Are we to preserve temper?

Charl. Oh! never fear me, sir; I shall not fly out; being convinced that nothing gives so sharp a point to one's aversion as good breeding; as, on the contrary, ill manners often hide a secret inclination.

Dr. Cant. Well, then, young lady, be assured, so far am I from the unchristian disposition of returning injuries, that your antipathy to me causes no hatred in my soul towards you; on the contrary, I would willingly make you happy, if it may be done according to my conscience, with the interest of heaven in view.

Charl. Why, I can't see, sir, how heaven can be any way concerned in a transaction between you and me.

Dr. Cant. When you marry any other person, my consent is necessary.

Charl. So I hear, indeed! But, pray, Doctor, how could your modesty receive so insolent a power, without putting my poor father out of countenance with your blushes?

Dr. Cant. I sought it not; but he would crowd it in among other obligations. He is good-natured; and I foresaw it might serve to pious purposes.

Charl. I don't understand you.

Dr. Cant. I take it for granted, that you would marry Mr. Darnley. Am I right?

Charl. Once in your life, perhaps you are.

Dr. Cant. Nay, let us be plain. Would you marry him?

Charl. You're mighty nice, methinks. Well, I would.

Dr. Cant. Then I will not consent.

Charl. You won't?

Dr. Cant. My conscience will not suffer me. I know you to be both luxurious and worldly-minded; and you would squander upon the vanities of the world, those treasures which ought to be better laid out.

Charl. Hum! I believe I begin to conceive you.

Dr. Cant. If you can think of any project to satisfy my conscience, I am tractable. You know there is a considerable moiety of your fortune which goes to my lady, in case of our disagreement.

Charl. That's enough, sir. You think we should have a fellow-feeling in it. At what sum do you rate your concurrence to my inclinations? That settled, I am willing to strike the bargain.

Dr. Cant. What do you think of half?

Charl. How! two thousand pounds! [Rises.]

Dr. Cant. Why, you know, you gain two thousand pounds; and, really, the severity of the times for the poor, and my own stinted pittance, which cramps my charities, will not suffer me to require less. [Rises.]

Charl. But how is my father to be brought into this?

Dr. Cant. Leave that to my management.

Charl. And what security do you expect for the money?

Dr. Cant. Oh! Mr. Darnley is wealthy: when I deliver my consent in writing, he shall lay it down to me in bank-bills.

Charl. Pretty good security! On one proviso, though.

Dr. Cant. Name it.

Charl. That you immediately tell my father that you are willing to give up your interest to Mr. Darnley.

Dr. Cant. Hum! Stay—I agree to it: but, in the meantime, let me warn you, child, not to expect to turn that, or what has now passed between us, to my confusion, by sinister construction, or evil representation to your father. I am satisfied of the piety of my own intentions, and care not what the wicked think of them; but force me not to take advantage of Sir John's good opinion of me, in order to shield myself from the consequences of your malice.

Charl. Oh! I shall not stand in my own light: I know your conscience and your power too well, dear Doctor.

Dr. Cant. Well, let your interest sway you. Thank heaven! I am actuated by more worthy motives.

Charl. No doubt on't.

Dr. Cant. Farewell, and think me your friend.

[Exit.]

Charl. What this fellow's original was I know not; but, by his conscience and cunning, he would make an admirable Jesuit.

Enter Servant.

Serv. Madam, Mr. Darnley.

Charl. Desire him to walk in.

[Exit Serv.]

Enter DARNLEY.

Darn. To find you thus alone, madam, is a happiness I did not expect, from the temper of our last parting.

Charl. I should have been as well pleased, now, to have been thanked as reproached for my good-nature; but you will be in the right, I find.

Darn. Indeed you take me wrong. I literally meant that I was afraid you would not so soon think I had deserved this favour.

Charl. Well, but were you not silly, now?

Darn. Come, you shall not be serious: you can't be more agreeable.

Charl. Oh! but I am serious.

Darn. Then I'll be so. Do you forgive me all?

Charl. What?

Darn. Are we friends, Charlotte?

Charl. Oh, lud! but you have told me nothing of poor Seyward.

Darn. Must you needs know that, before you answer me?

Charl. Lud! you are never well till you have talked one out of countenance.

Darn. Come, I won't be too particular: you shall answer nothing. Give me but your hand only.

Charl. Psha! I won't pull off my glove, not I.

Darn. I'll take it as it is, then.

Charl. Lud! there, there; eat it, eat it.

Darn. And so I could, by heaven!

Charl. Oh! my glove, my glove, my glove! You are in a perfect storm. Lud! if you make such a rout with one's hand only, what would you do if you had one's heart?

Darn. That's impossible to tell. But you were asking me of Seyward, madam.

Charl. Oh! ay, that's true. Well, now you are very good again. Come, tell me all the affair, and then, you shall see—how I will like you.

Darn. There is not much to tell; only this: we met the attorney-general, to whom he has given a very sensible account of himself, and the Doctor's proceedings. The attorney-general seems very clear in his opinion, that, as the Doctor, at the time of the death of Seyward's mother, was intrusted with her whole affairs, the court of equity will oblige him to be accountable.

Charl. If Seyward do not recover his fortune, you must absolutely get him a commission, and bring him into acquaintance.

Darn. Upon my word, I will.

Charl. And shew him to all the women of taste; and I'll have you call him my pretty fellow, too.

Darn. I will, indeed. But hear me.

Charl. You can't conceive how pretty he makes love.

Darn. Not so well as you make your defence, Charlotte.

Charl. Lud! I had forgotten; he is to teach me Greek, too.

Darn. Trifling tyrant! How long, Charlotte, do you think you can find new evasions for what I say to you?

Charl. Lud! you are horrid silly; but since 'tis love that makes you such a dunce, poor Darnley! I forgive you.

Enter Colonel LAMBERT behind.

Darn. That's kind, however. But, to complete my joy, be kinder yet, and—

Charl. Oh! I can't, I can't. Lud! did you ever ride a horse-match?

Darn. Was ever so wild a question?

Charl. Because, if you have, it runs in my head that you galloped a mile beyond the winning-post, to make sure on't.

Darn. Now I understand you. But since you will have me touch every thing so very tenderly Charlotte, how shall I find proper words to ask you the lover's last necessary question?

Charl. Oh! there are a thousand points to be adjusted before that's answered.

Col. Lamb. [Advancing.] Name them this moment; for, positively, this is the last time of asking.

Charl. Psha! who sent for you?

Col. Lamb. I only came to teach you to speak plain English, my dear.

Charl. Lud! mind your own business, can't you?

Col. Lamb. So I will; for I will make you do more of your's in two minutes, than you would have done without me in a twelvemonth. Why, how now! do you think the man's to dangle after your ridiculous airs for ever?

Charl. This is mighty pretty!

Col. Lamb. You'll say so on Thursday se'nnight; for, let affairs take what turn they will in the family, that's positively your wedding-day. [CHAR. attempts to go.] Nay, you shan't stir.

Char. Was ever such assurance?

Darn. Upon my life, madam, I'm out of countenance; I don't know how to behave myself.

Charl. No, no; let him go on, only—this is beyond whatever was known, sure!

Col. Lamb. Ha, ha! if I were to leave you to yourselves, what a couple of pretty out-of-countenance figures you would make! humming and ha'ing upon the vulgar points of jointure and pin-money! Come come; I know what's proper on both sides; you shall leave it to me.

Darn. I would rather Charlotte would name her own terms to me.

Col. Lamb. Have you a mind to any thing particular, madam?

Charl. Why, sure! What, do you think I'm only to be filled out as you please, and sweetened and sipped up like a dish of tea?

Col. Lamb. Why, pray, madam, when your tea is ready, what have you to do but to drink it? But you, I suppose, expect a lover's heart, like your lamp, should always be flaming at your elbow; and when it's ready to go out, you indolently supply it with the spirit of contradiction.

Char. And, so, you suppose that your assurance has made an end of this matter?

Col. Lamb. Not till you have given him your hand upon it.

Charl. That, then, would complete it?

Col. Lamb. Perfectly.

Charl. Why, then, take it, Darnley. Now, I presume, you are in high triumph, sir. [To the Col.]

Col. Lamb. No, sister: now you are consistent with the good sense I always thought you mistress of.

Charl. And now, I beg we may separate; for our being seen together, at this critical juncture, may give that devil, the Doctor, suspicion of a confederacy, and make him set some engine to work that we are not aware of.

Col. Lamb. It's a very proper caution. Come along, Darnley: nay, you must leave her now, whatever violence you do yourself.

Charl. Ay, ay, take him with you, brother; or, stay, Darnley; if you please, you may come along with me. [Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Parlour in Sir John Lambert's House.

Enter DARNLEY and CHARLOTTE.

Charl. But, really, will you stand to the agreement though, that I have made with the Doctor?

Darn. Why not? You shall not break your word upon my account, though he might be a villain you gave it to. Suppose I should talk with Sir John myself? 'Tis true, he has slighted me of late.

Charl. No matter; here he comes. This may open another scene of action to that I believe my brother's preparing for.

Enter Sir JOHN and Lady LAMBERT.

Sir J. Lamb. Mr. Darnley, I'm glad I have met you here.

Darn. I have endeavoured twice to-day, sir, to pay my respects to you.

Sir J. Lamb. Sir, I'll be plain with you; I went out to avoid you: but where the welfare of a child is concerned, you must not take it ill if we don't stand upon ceremony. However, since I have reason now to be more in temper than, perhaps, I was at that time, I shall be glad to talk with you.

Darn. I take it as a favour, sir.

Sir J. Lamb. You must allow, Mr. Darnley, that conscience is the rule which every honest man ought to walk by.

Darn. 'Tis granted, sir.

Sir J. Lamb. Then give me leave to tell you, sir, that giving you my daughter would be to act against that conscience I pretend to, whilst I thought you an ill lover; and, consequently, the same tie obliges me to bestow her on a better man.

Darn. Well,—but, sir, come to the point. Suppose the Doctor (whom I presume you intend her for) actually consents to give me up his interest?

Sir J. Lamb. But why do you suppose, sir, he will give up his interest?

Darn. I only judge from what your daughter tells me, sir.

Sir J. Lamb. My daughter?

Darn. I appeal to her.

Charl. And I appeal even to yourself, sir. Has not the Doctor, just now, in the garden, spoken in favour of Mr. Darnley to you? Nay, pray, sir, be plain; because more depends on that than you can easily imagine or believe.

Sir J. Lamb. What senseless insinuation have you got into your head now?

Charl. Be so kind, sir, first to answer me, that I may be better able to inform you.

Sir J. Lamb. Well, I own he has declined his interest in favour of Mr. Darnley; but I must tell you, madam, that he did it in so modest, so friendly, so good-natured, so conscientious a manner, that I now think myself more than ever bound in honour to espouse him.

Charl. But now, sir, (only for argument's sake,) suppose I could prove that all this seeming virtue was artificial; that his regard for Mr. Darnley was neither founded upon modesty, friendship, good-nature, nor conscience; or, in short, that he has, like a villain, bartered, bargained, to give me to Mr. Darnley for half the four thousand pounds you valued his consent at; I say, sir, suppose this could be proved, where would be his virtue then?

Sir J. Lamb. It is impious to suppose it.
Charl. Then, sir, from what principle must you suppose that I accuse him?

Sir J. Lamb. From an obstinate prejudice to all that's good and virtuous.

Charl. That's too hard, sir. But the worst your opinion can provoke me to, is to marry Mr. Darnley without either his consent or your's.

Sir J. Lamb. What! do you brave me, madam?

Charl. No, sir; but I scorn a lie; and will so far vindicate my integrity, as to insist on your believing me; if not, as a child you abandon I have a right to throw myself into other arms for protection.

Darn. Dear Charlotte, how your spirit charms me!

Sir J. Lamb. I am confounded! These tears cannot be counterfeit, nor can this be true.

Lady Lamb. Indeed, my dear, I fear it is. Give me leave to ask you one question: in all our mutual course of happiness, have I ever yet deceived you with a falsehood?

Sir J. Lamb. Never.

Lady Lamb. Would you, then, believe me, should I accuse him even of crimes which virtue blushes but to mention?

Sir J. Lamb. To what extravagance would you drive me?

Lady Lamb. I would before have undeceived you, when his late artifice turned the honest duty of your son into his own reproach and ruin; but knowing then your temper was inaccessible, I durst not offer it. But suppose I should be able to let you see his villainy, make him repeat his odious love to me in your own hearing; at once throw off the mask, and shew the barefaced traitor?

Sir J. Lamb. Is it possible?

Lady Lamb. But then, sir, I must prevail on you to descend to the poor shifts we are reduced to.

Sir J. Lamb. All; to any thing, to ease me of my doubts. Make me but witness of this fact, and I shall soon accuse myself, and own my folly equal to his baseness.

Lady Lamb. Behind that screen you may easily conceal yourself.

Sir J. Lamb. Be it so.

Lady Lamb. Mr. Darnley, shall we beg your leave; and you, Charlotte, take the least suspected way to send the Doctor to me directly.

Charl. I have a thought will do it, madam.

Sir J. Lamb. Oh, Charlotte! Oh, Mr. Darnley!

Darn. Have but resolution, sir, and fear nothing.

[Exit with CHARLOTTE.]

Lady Lamb. Now, sir, you are to consider what a desperate disease I have undertaken to cure; therefore, be sure to keep close and still; and when the proof is full, appear at your discretion.

Sir J. Lamb. Fear not; I will conform myself. Yet be not angry, my love, if in a case like this, where I should not believe even him accusing you; be not angry, I say, if I have also charity enough to hope you may yet be deceived in what you charge him with, till the evidence of my own senses assures me to the contrary.

Lady Lamb. 'Tis just.

Sir J. Lamb. Hark! I think I hear him coming.

Lady Lamb. Now, my dear, remember your promise to have patience.

Sir J. Lamb. Rely upon it.

Lady Lamb. To your post, then. [Sir JOHN goes behind the screen.]

Enter Doctor CANTWELL, with a book.

Dr. Cant. Madam, your woman tells me, that being here and alone, you desired to speak with me.

Lady Lamb. I did, sir; but that we may be sure that we are alone, pray, shut the outward door; another surprise might ruin us. Is all safe?

Dr. Cant. [Fastens the door.] I have taken care, madam.

Lady Lamb. But I am afraid I interrupt your meditations.

Dr. Cant. No, madam, no; I was only looking over some pious exhortations here, for the use of a society of chosen brethren.

Lady Lamb. Ah! Doctor, what have you done to me? The trouble of my mind, since our last unfortunate conference, is not to be expressed. You, indeed, discovered to me what, perhaps, for my own peace, 'twere better I had never been acquainted with; but I had not sufficient time to lay my heart open to you.

Dr. Cant. Whither, madam, would you lead me?

Lady Lamb. I have been uneasy, too, not knowing how far you might mistake my behaviour on the last accident that happened; but I was really so shocked, so terrified, I knew not what I was doing; only, had I joined in your defence against the Colonel, it would have been evident I was his enemy, and I have uses for his friendship. Silence, therefore, was my only prudent part; and I knew your credit with Sir John needed no support.

Dr. Cant. Let me presume, then, to hope, that what I did, you judge was self-defence, and pure necessity.

Lady Lamb. And, perhaps, after all, the accident was lucky; for Sir John, in order to obviate any ill construction that may be put upon it, insists now that we should be more together, to let the world see his confidence in us both. This relieves us from restraint, and I now dare tell you—but, no—I won't—

Dr. Cant. But, why, madam? let me beseech you—

Lady Lamb. No; besides, why need you ask me?

Dr. Cant. Ah! do not endeavour to decoy my foolish heart, too apt to flatter itself. You cannot, sure, think kindly of me? [Gins so.]

Lady Lamb. Well, well; I would have you imagine—

Dr. Cant. Besides, may I not with reason suspect, that this apparent goodness is but artifice, a shadow of compliance, meant only to persuade me from your daughter?

Lady Lamb. Methinks this doubt of me seems rather founded on your settled resolution not to resign her. I am convinced of it. I can assure you, sir, I should have saved you this trouble, had I known how deeply you were engaged to her. [Weeps.]

Dr. Cant. Tears! then I must believe you; but, indeed, you wrong me. To prove my innocence, it is not an hour since I pressed Sir John to give Charlotte to young Darnley.

Lady Lamb. Mere artifice! you knew that modest resignation would make Sir John warmer in your interest.

Dr. Cant. No, indeed, indeed. I had other motives, which you may hereafter be made acquainted with, and will convince you—

Lady Lamb. Well, sir; now I'll give you reason to guess why, at our last meeting, I pressed you so warmly to resign Charlotte.

Dr. Cant. Ah, dear! ah, dear!

Lady Lamb. You cannot blame me for having opposed your happiness, when my own, perhaps, depended upon it.

Dr. Cant. Spare me, spare me! you kill me with this kindness.

Lady Lamb. But, now that I have discovered my weakness, be secret; for the least imprudence—

Dr. Cant. It is a vain fear.

Lady Lamb. Call it not vain: my reputation is dearer to me than life.

Dr. Cant. Where can it find so sure a guard? The grave austerities of my life will dumbfound suspicion, and your's may defy detraction.

Lady Lamb. Well, Doctor, 'tis you must answer for my folly.

Dr. Cant. I take it all upon myself.

Lady Lamb. But there's one thing still to be afraid of.

Dr. Cant. Nothing, nothing.

Lady Lamb. My husband—Sir John.

Dr. Cant. Alas! poor man, I will answer for him. Between ourselves, madam, your husband is weak; I can lead him by the nose anywhere.

Sir JOHN LAMBERT advances between them.

Sir J. Lamb. No, caitiff! I'm to be led no further.

Dr. Cant. Ah! woman!

Sir J. Lamb. Is this your sanctity? this your doctrine? these your meditations?

Dr. Cant. Is, then, my brother in a conspiracy against me?

Sir J. Lamb. Your brother! I have been your friend, indeed, to my shame; your dupe; but your spell has lost its hold: no more canting; it will not serve your turn any longer.

Lady Lamb. Now, heaven be praised!

Dr. Cant. It seems you want an excuse to part with me.

Sir J. Lamb. Ungrateful wretch! But why do I reproach you? Had I not been the weakest of mankind, you never could have proved so great a villain. Get out of my sight! leave my house! Of all my follies, which is it tells you that, if you stay much longer, I shall not be tempted to wrest you out of the hands of the law, and punish you as you deserve?

Dr. Cant. Well; but first, let me ask you, sir, who it is you menace? Consider your own condition, and where you are.

Sir J. Lamb. What would the villain drive at? Leave me; I forgive you; but once more I tell you, seek some other place, out of my house. This instant be gone, and see my shameful face no more.

Dr. Cant. Nay, then, 'tis my duty to exert myself, and let you know that I am master here. Turn you out, sir! This house is mine! and now, sir, at your peril, dare to insult me.

Sir J. Lamb. Oh, heavens! 'tis true! whither shall I fly to hide me from the world?

Lady Lamb. Whither are you going, sir?

Sir J. Lamb. I know not; but here, it seems, I am a trespasser; the master of the house has warned me hence; and, since the right is now in him, 'tis just I should resign it.

Lady Lamb. You shall not stir. He dares not act with such abandoned insolence. No, sir; possession still is your's. If he pretend a right, let him by open course of law maintain it.

Dr. Cant. Ha! Here, Seyward! [Exit.

Enter MAWWORM.

Sir J. Lamb. Who is this fellow? What do you want, man?

Maw. My lady, come up.

Enter Old Lady LAMBERT.

Old Lady Lamb. How now!

Maw. He wants to know who I be.

Old Lady Lamb. The gentleman is a friend of mine, son. I was carrying him in a coach to attend a controversy that's to be held this evening, at the reverend Mr. Scruple's, about an affair of simony, and called to take up the Doctor. But what strange tales are these I hear below?

Sir J. Lamb. The Doctor is a villain, madam: I have detected him: detected him in the horrible design of seducing my wife.

Maw. It's impossible!

Sir J. Lamb. What do you say, man?

Maw. I say, it's impossible! He has been locked up with my wife for hours together, morning, noon, and night; and I never found her the worse for him.

Old Lady Lamb. Ah! son, son!

Sir J. Lamb. What is your ladyship going to say now?

Old Lady Lamb. The Doctor is not in fault.

Sir J. Lamb. 'Slife, madam!

Old Lady Lamb. Oh! he swears, he swears! Years in growing good, we become profligate in a moment. If you swear again, I won't stay in the house.

Maw. Nor I neither. Aren't you ashamed of yourself? have you no commensuration on your soul? Ah! poor wicked sinner, I pity you.

Sir J. Lamb. 'Sdeath and the devil!

Maw. If you swear any more, I'll inform against you.

Sir J. Lamb. Why would you bring this idiot, madam?

Maw. Ay, do despise me, I'm the prouder for it; I likes to be despised.

Enter CHARLOTTE.

Charl. Oh! dear papa, I shall faint away; there's murder doing.

Sir J. Lamb. Who, where, what is it?

Charl. The Doctor, sir, and Seyward, were at high words just now in the garden; and, upon a sudden, there was a pistol fired between them. Oh! I'm afraid poor Seyward is killed.

Sir J. Lamb. How!

Charl. Oh! here he comes himself; he'll tell you more.

Enter Dr. CANTWELL, DARNLEY, SEYWARD, and Servants.

Darn. [Speaking as he enters.] Here, bring in this ruffian; this is villainy beyond example.

Sir J. Lamb. What means this outrage?

Lady Lamb. I tremble.

Seyw. Don't be alarmed, madam; there is no mischief done; what was intended, the Doctor here can best inform you.

Sir J. Lamb. Mr. Darnley, I am ashamed to see you.

Maw. So you ought; but this good man is ashamed of nothing.

Dr. Cant. Alas! my enemies prevail.

Seyw. In short, gentlemen, the affair is circumstantially this: the Doctor called me out into the pavilion in the garden; appeared in great disorder; told me there was a sudden storm raised, which he was not sufficiently prepared to weather. He said, his dependance was upon me; and, at all events, I must be ready to swear, when he called upon me, I had seen him pay Sir John several large sums of money. He talked confusedly about giving value for an estate; but I boldly refused to perjure myself; and told him, on the contrary, I was satisfied he had fleeced Sir John of several large sums, under the pretence of charitable uses, which he secretly converted to his own. This stung him, and he fastened at my throat. Then, indeed, all temper left me; and disengaging myself from his hold, with a home-

Now I struck him down. At this, grown desperate, he ran with fury to some pistols that hung above the chimney; but, in the instant he reached one, I seized upon his wrist; and, as we grappled, the pistol firing to the ceiling, alarmed the family.

Old Lady Lamb. This is a lie, young man; I see the devil standing at your elbow.

Mau. So do I, with a great big pitchfork, pushing him on.

Dr. Cant. Well, what have you more against me? Darn. More, sir, I hope, is needless; but, if Sir John be yet unsatisfied—

Sir J. Lamb. Oh! I have seen too much.

Dr. Cant. I demand my liberty.

Sir J. Lamb. Let him go.

Enter Colonel LAMBERT, and Attendants.

Col. Lamb. Hold, sir! not so fast; you can't pass.

Dr. Cant. Who, sir, shall dare to stop me?

Col. Lamb. Within, there!

Enter TIPSTAFF.

Tipstaff. Is your name Cantwell, sir?

Dr. Cant. What if it be, sir?

Tipstaff. Then, sir, I have my lord chief justice's warrant against you.

Dr. Cant. Against me?

Tipstaff. Yes, sir, for a cheat and impostor.

Old Lady Lamb. What does he say?

Sir J. Lamb. Dear son, what is this?

Col. Lamb. Only some actions of the Doctor's, sir, which I have affidavits in my hand here to prove, from more than one credible witness; and I think it my duty to make the public acquainted with them: if he can acquit himself of them, so; if not, he must take the consequence.

Dr. Cant. Well, but stay; let the accusations against me be what they will, by virtue of this conveyance, [producing it,] I am still master here; and, if I be forced to leave the house myself, I will shut up the doors; nobody shall remain behind.

Sir J. Lamb. There, there, indeed, he stings me to the heart! for that rash act, reproach and endless shame will haunt me!

Charl. No, sir; be comforted. Even there, too, his wicked hopes must leave him; for know, the fatal deed, which you intended to sign, is here, even yet unsealed and innocent. [Producing it.]

Sir J. Lamb. What mean you?

Charl. I mean, sir, that this deed, by accident, falling into this gentleman's hands, his generous concern for our family discovered it to me; and, that, in concert, we procured that other to be drawn exactly like it: which, in your impatience to execute, passed, unsuspected, for the original. Their only difference is, that wherever here you read the Doctor's name, there you'll find my brother's.

Dr. Cant. Come, sir, lead me where you please.

[Exit, guarded.]

Old Lady Lamb. I don't know what to make of all this.

Mau. [Mounts a form behind the screen, and looks over; throws about his arms, and delivers the following rhapsody.] Stay, stay, you infatuated wretches! you know not what ye do. The Doctor is innocent: I say he is innocent! Touch not a hair of his precious head; rumple not one curl of his gracious wig! He's a saint! if ever there was a saint, he is one! But, ye will be the sufferers. I have one great and glorious consolation—I say, one glorious consolation!—you'll all go to the devil! I shall go up, but you'll go down. And, when you see me mount, and leave ye to your fate, you'll want my aid! you'll want me to take you with me! you'll cling to me! you'll attempt to lay hold of the skirts of my coat! but, I'll fling ye all; for I'll wear a spencer! [Exit with Old Lady LAMB.]

Charl. Now, Darnley, I hope I have made some atonement for your jealousy.

Darn. You've banished it for ever! This was beyond yourself surprising.

Col. Lamb. Sister—

Charl. Come, no set speeches; if I deserve your thanks, return them in friendship to your first pre-server.

Col. Lamb. The business of my life shall be to merit it.

Seyv. And mine to speak my sense of obligations.

Sir J. Lamb. Oh! my child, for my deliverance I can only reward you here. [Giving her hand to DARNLEY.] For you, my son, whose filial virtue I have injured, this honest deed shall in every article be ratified. And, for the sake of that hypocritical villain, I declare, that from henceforward I renounce all pious folks; I will have an utter abhorrence for everything that bears the appearance—

Charl. Nay, now, my dear sir, I must take the liberty to tell you you carry things too far, and go from one extreme to another. What! because a worthless wretch has imposed upon you under the fallacious shew of austere grimace, will you needs have it, everybody is like him? confound the good with the bad, and conclude there are no truly religious in the world? Leave, my dear sir, such rash conclusions to fools and libertines. Let us be careful to distinguish between virtue and the appearance of it. Guard, if possible, against doing honour to hypocrisy; but, at the same time, let us allow there is no character in life greater or more valuable than that of the truly devout; nor anything more noble, or more beautiful, than the fervour of a sincere piety.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Street.

Enter DON LOPEZ, meeting FREDERICK.

Fred. My lord, Don Lopez.

Lop. How d'y'e, Frederick?

Fred. At your lordship's service. I am glad to see you look so well, my lord. I hope Antonio's out of danger?

Lop. Quite contrary; his fever increases, they tell me; and the surgeons are of opinion his wound is mortal.

Fred. Your son, Don Felix, is safe, I hope?

Lop. I hope so too; but they offer large rewards to apprehend him.

Fred. When heard your lordship from him?

Lop. Not since he went: I forbade him writing till the public news gave him an account of Antonio's health. Letters might be intercepted, and the place of his abode discovered.

Fred. Your caution was good, my lord. Though I am impatient to hear from Felix, yet his safety is my chief concern.

Lop. If Antonio dies, Felix shall for England.—You have been there; what sort of people are the English?

Fred. My lord, the English are, by nature, what the ancient Romans were by discipline—courageous, bold, hardy, and in love with liberty.

Lop. I like their principles: who does not wish for freedom in all degrees of life? though common prudence sometimes makes us act against it, as I am now obliged to do; for I intend to marry my daughter to Don Guzman, whom I expect from Holland every day, whither he went to take possession of a large estate left him by his uncle.

Fred. You will not surely sacrifice the lovely Isabella to avarice, and a fool? Pardon the expression, my lord, but my concern for your beautiful daughter transports me beyond that good manners which I ought to pay your lordship's presence.

Lop. I can't deny the justness of the character, Frederick; but you are not insensible what I have suffered by these wars: and he has two things which render him very agreeable to me for a son-in-law—he is rich and well-born; as for his being a fool, I don't conceive how that can be any blot in a husband who is already possessed of a good estate. A poor fool is, indeed, a very scandalous thing, and so are your poor wits in my opinion, who have nothing to be vain of but the inside of their skulls. Now, for Don Guzman—I know I can rule him as I think fit. This is acting the politic part, Frederick, without which it is impossible to keep up the port of this life.

Fred. But have you no consideration for your daughter's welfare, my lord?

Lop. Is a husband of twenty thousand crowns a year no consideration? Now I think it a very good consideration.

Fred. One way, my lord. But what will the world say of such a match?

Lop. Sir, I value not the world a button.

Fred. I cannot think your daughter can have any inclination for such a husband.

Lop. There, I believe, you are pretty much in the right, though it is a secret which I never had the curiosity to inquire into, nor I believe ever shall. Inclination, quotha! Parents would have a fine time on't if they consulted their children's inclinations! No, no, sir, it is not a father's business to follow his children's inclinations till he makes himself a beggar.

Fred. But this is of another nature, my lord.

Lop. Look ye, sir; I resolve she shall marry Don Guzman, the moment he arrives. Though I could not govern my son, I will my daughter, I assure you.

Fred. This match, my lord, is more preposterous than that which you proposed to your son, from whence arose this fatal quarrel. Don Antonio's sister, Elvira, wanted beauty only, but Guzman every thing but—

Lop. Money—and that will purchase every thing; and so adieu. [Exit.]

Fred. Monstrous! these are the resolutions which destroy the comforts of matrimony. Lissardo! from whence came you?

Enter LISSARDO, in a riding habit.

Liss. That letter will inform you, sir.

Fred. I hope your master's safe?

Liss. I left him so. I have another to deliver, which requires haste. Your most humble servant, sir. [Bowing.]

Fred. To Violante, I suppose?

Liss. The same. [Exit.]

Fred. [Reads.] "Dear Frederick,—The two chief blessings of this life are a friend and a mistress; to be debarred the sight of these is not to live. I hear no thing of Antonio's death, and therefore resolve to venture to thy house this evening, impatient to see Violante, and embrace my friend. Yours, FELIX." 'Pray heaven he comes undiscovered! Ha! Colonel Briton!

Enter Colonel BRITON.

Col. B. Frederick, I rejoice to see thee. [Shake hands.]

Fred. What brought you to Lisbon, Colonel?

Col. B. La fortune de la guerre, as the French say. I have commanded these three last years in Spain; but my country has thought fit to strike up a peace, and give us good Protestants leave to hope for Christian burial; so I resolved to take Lisbon in my way home.

Fred. If you are not provided of a lodging, Colonel, pray command my house while you stay.

Col. B. If I were sure I should not be troublesome, I would accept your offer, Frederick.

Fred. So far from trouble, Colonel, I shall take it as a particular favour. What have we here?

Col. B. My footman—this is our country dress, you must know; which, for the honour of Scotland, I make all my servants wear.

Enter GIBBY, in an Highland dress.

Gibby. What maud I de with the horses, and like yer honour? They will tack could gin they stand in the causeway.

Fred. Oh, I'll take care of them. What, ho! Vasquez!

Enter VASQUEZ.

Put those horses, which that honest fellow will show you, into my stable, do you hear? and feed them well.

Vas. Yes, sir. Sir, by my master's orders, I am, sir, your most obsequious humble servant. [To GIBBY.] Be pleased to lead the way.

Gibby. 'Sbleed! gang your gate, sir, and I shall follow ye. I se to hungry to feed on compliments.

[Exeunt GIBBY and VASQUEZ.]

Fred. [Surveying GIBBY as he passes.] Ha! ha! a comical fellow! Well, how do you like our country, Colonel?

Col. B. Why, 'faith, Frederick, a man might pass his time agreeably enough within side of a nunnery; but to behold such troops of soft, plump, tender, melting, wishing, nay, willing girls too, through a damned grate, gives us Britons strong temptations to plunder. Hark ye, hast thou never a pretty acquaintance now that thou wouldst consign over to a friend for half an hour, ha?

Fred. 'Faith, Colonel, I am the worst pimp in Christendom; you had better trust to your own luck—the women will soon find you out, I warrant you.

Col. B. Ay, but it is dangerous foraging in an enemy's country; and, since I have some hopes of seeing my own again, I had rather purchase my pleasure than run the hazard of a stiletto in my guts. Wilt thou recommend me to a wife then, ha, friend?

Fred. She must be very handsome, I suppose?

Col. B. The handsomer the better.

Fred. And rich, I suppose?

Col. B. Oh, very rich—I shall never be able to swallow the matrimonial pill, if it be not well gilded.

Fred. Pugh! beauty will make it slide down nimbly.

Col. B. At first, perhaps, it may; but the second or third dose will choke me. I confess, Frederick, women are the prettiest playthings in nature; but gold, substantial gold! gives them the air, the mien, the shape, the grace, and beauty of a goddess.

Fred. And has not gold the same divinity in their eyes, Colonel?

Col. B. Too often—

None marry now for love—no, that's a jest:

The self-same bargain serves for wife and beast.

Fred. You are always gay, Colonel. Come, shall we take a refreshing glass at my house, and consider what has been said?

Col. B. I have two or three compliments to discharge for some friends, and then I shall wait on you with pleasure. Where do you live?

Fred. At yon corner house, with the green rails.

Col. B. In the close of the evening I will endeavour to kiss your hand. Adieu! [Exit.]

Fred. I shall expect you with impatience. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Room in Don Lopez's House.

Enter ISABELLA and INIS.

Inis. For goodness' sake, Madam, where are you going in this pet?

Isab. Any where to avoid matrimony. The thoughts of a husband are as terrible to me as the sight of a hobgoblin.

Inis. Ay, of an old husband; but, if you may choose for yourself, I fancy matrimony would be no such frightful thing to you.

Isab. You are pretty much in the right, Inis: but to be forced into the arms of an idiot, who has neither person to please the eye, sense to charm the ear, nor generosity to supply these defects! Ah, Inis! what pleasant lives women lead in England, where duty wears no fetter but inclination! The custom of our country enslaves us from our very cradles, first to our parents, next to our husbands; and, when heaven is so kind as to rid us of both these, our brothers still usurp authority, and expect a blind obedience from us; so that, maids, wives, or widows, we are little better than slaves to the tyrant, man. Therefore, to avoid their power, I resolve to cast myself into a monastery.

Inis. That is, you'll cut your own throat to avoid another's doing it for you. Ah, madam, those eyes tell me you have no nun's flesh about you. A monastery, quotha! Odslife, Madam, you are the first woman that ever despised in a Christian country. Were I in your place—

Isab. Why, what would your wisdom do if you were?

Inis. I'd embark with the first fair wind with all my jewels, and seek my fortune on t'other side the water: no shore can treat you worse than your own. There's ne'er a father in Christendom should make me marry any man against my will.

Isab. I am too great a coward to follow your advice. I must contrive some way to avoid Don Guzman, and yet stay in my own country.

Enter DON LOPEZ.

Lop. Must you so, mistress? but I shall take care to prevent you. [Aside.] Isabella, whither are you going, my child?

Isab. To church, sir?

Inis. The old rogue has certainly overheard her! [Aside.]

Lop. Your devotion must needs be very strong, or your memory very weak, my dear. Why, vespers are over for this night. Come, come, you shall have a better errand to church than to say your prayers there. Don Guzman is arrived in the river, and I expect him a-shore to-morrow!

Isab. Ha! to-morrow!

Lop. He writes me word that his estate in Holland is worth twelve thousand crowns a-year, which, together with what he had before, will make thee the happiest wife in Lisbon.

Isab. And the most unhappy woman in the world. [Takes his hand.] Oh, sir! if I have any power in your heart—if the tenderness of a father be not quite extinct—hear me with patience.

Lop. No objection against the marriage, and I will hear whatsoever thou hast to say.

Isab. That's torturing me on the rack, and forbidding me to groan. Upon my knees I claim the privilege of flesh and blood. [Kneels.]

Lop. I grant it; thou shalt have an armful of flesh and blood to-morrow. Flesh and blood, quotha!—Heaven forbid I should deny thee flesh and blood, my girl.

Inis. Here's an old dog for you!

[Aside.]

Isab. Do not mistake, sir. The fatal stroke which separates soul and body, is not more terrible to the thoughts of sinners, than the name of Guzman to my ear.

Lop. Puh, puh! you lie, you lie!

Isab. My frightened heart beats hard against my breast, as if it sought a passage to your feet, to beg you'd change your purpose.

Lop. A very pretty speech this; if it were turned into blank verse, it would serve for a tragedy. Why, thou hast more wit than I thought thou hadst, child. I fancy this was all extempore; I don't believe thou didst ever think one word on't before.

Inis. Yes, but she has, my lord; for I have heard her say the same things a thousand times.

Lop. How, how! What, do you top your second-hand jests upon your father, hussy, who knows better what's good for you than you do yourself? Remember, 'tis your duty to obey.

Isab. [Rising.] I never disobeyed before, and I wish I had not reason now; but nature hath got the better of my duty, and makes me loathe the harsh commands you lay.

Lop. Ha! ha!—Very fine! ha! ha!

Isab. Death itself would be more welcome.

Lop. Are you sure of that?

Isab. I am your daughter, my lord, and can boast as strong a resolution as yourself. I'll die before I'll marry Guzman.

Lop. Say you so? I'll try that presently. [Draws.] Here, let me see with what dexterity you can breathe a vein now. [Offers her his sword.] The point is pretty sharp—'Twill do your business, I warrant you.

Inis. [Going between them.] Bless me, sir! What do you mean, to put a sword into the hands of a desperate woman?

Lop. Desperate! ha, ha, ha! you see how desperate she is. What, art thou frightened, little Bell, ha?

Isab. I confess I am startled at your morals, sir.

Lop. Ay, ay, child, thou hadst better take the man; he'll hurt thee least of the two.

Isab. I shall take neither, sir: death has many doors; and, when I can live no longer with pleasure, I shall find one to let him in at without your aid.

Lop. Say'st thou so, my dear Bell? Ods, I'm afraid thou art a little lunatic, Bell. I must take care of thee, child. I shall make bold to secure thee, my dear; I'll seek if locks and bars can keep thee till Guzman come. Go, get into your chamber:

[Locks her in.]

There I'll your boasted resolution try,

And see who'll get the better, you or I.

[Drives off Inis, and exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Room in Don Pedro's House.

Enter DONNA VIOLANTE, reading a Letter, and FLORA following.

Flora. What, must that letter be read again?

Vio. Yes, and again, and again, and again, a thousand times again; a letter from a faithful lover can never be read too often; it speaks such kind, such soft, such tender things—

[Kisses it.]

Flora. But always the same language.

Vio. It does not charm the less for that.

Flora. In my opinion, nothing charms that does not change: and any composition of the four-and-twenty letters, after the first essay, from the same hand, must be dull, except a bank-note, or a bill of exchange.

Vio. Thy taste is my aversion.

[Reads.] "My all that's charming, since life' not life exiled from thee, this night shall bring me to thy arms. Frederick and thee are all I trust. These six weeks' absence have been in love's account six hundred years. When it is dark, expect the wonted signal at thy window: till when, adieu. Thine, more than his own,"

"FELIX."

Flora. Who would not have said as much to a lady of her beauty and twenty thousand pounds?—Were I a man, methinks I could have said a hundred finer things.

Vio. What would you have said?

Flora. I would have compared your eyes to the stars, your teeth to ivory, your lips to coral, your neck to alabaster, your shape to—

Vio. No more of your bombast! truth is the best eloquence in a lover.—What proof remains ungiven of his love? When his father threatened to disinherit him for refusing Don Antonio's sister, from whence sprung this unhappy quarrel, did it shake his love for me?—and now, though strict inquiry runs through every place, with large rewards to apprehend him, does he not venture all for me?

Flora. But you know, madam, your father, Don Pedro, designs you for a nun—to be sure, you look very like a nun!—and says, your grandfather left you your fortune upon that condition.

Vio. Not without my approbation, girl, when I come to one-and-twenty, as I am informed. But, however, I shall run the risk of that. Go, call in Lissardo.

Flora. Yes, madam. Now for a thousand verbal questions. [Exit.]

Re-enter FLORA, with LISSARDO.

Vio. Well, and how do you do, Lissardo?

Liss. Ah, very weary, madam.—'Faith, thou look'st wondrous pretty, Flora! [Aside to Flora.]

Vio. How came you?

Liss. En chevalier, madam, upon a hackney jade, which they told me formerly belonged to an English colonel; but I should have rather thought she had been bred a good Roman Catholic all her lifetime—for she down'd on her knees to every stock and stone we came along by.—My chops water for a kiss; they do, Flora. [Aside to Flora.]

Flora. You'd make one believe you are wond'rous fond, now.

Vio. Where did you leave your master?

Liss. Odd, if I had you alone, housewife, I'd show you how fond I could be! [Aside to Flora.]

Vio. Where did you leave your master?

Liss. At a little farm-house, madam, about five miles off. He'll be at Don Frederick's in the evening.—Od, I will so revenge myself of those lips of thine! [To Flora.]

Vio. Is he in health?

Flora. Oh, you counterfeit wond'rous well. [To Lissardo.]

Liss. No; every body knows I counterfeit very ill. [To Flora.]

Vio. How say you? Is Felix ill? What's his distemper? ha?

Liss. A prize on't, I hate to be interrupted.—Love, madam, love. In short, madam, I believe he has thought of nothing but your ladyship ever since he left Lisbon. I am sure he could not, if I may judge of his heart by my own. [Looking lovingly upon Flora.]

Vio. How came you so well acquainted with your master's thoughts, Lissardo?

Liss. By an infallible rule, madam: words are the pictures of the mind, you know; now, to prove he thinks of nothing but you, he talks of nothing but you. For example, madam, coming from shooting, t'other day, with a brace of partridges, Lissardo, said he, go bid the cook roast me these Violantes.—I flew into the kitchen, full of thoughts of thee, cried, here, cook, roast me these Floras. [To Flora.]

Flora. Ha! ha! excellent!—You mimic your master, then, it seems.

Liss. I can do every thing as well as my master, you little rogue.—Another time, madam, the priest came to make him a visit; he called out hastily, Lissardo, said he, bring a Violante for my father to sit down on. Then he often mistook my name, madam, and called me Violante: in short, I heard it so often, that it became as familiar to me as my prayers.

Vio. You live very merrily then, it seems.

Liss. Oh, exceeding merry, madam!

[Kisses Flora's hand.]

Vio. Ha! exceeding merry!—Had you treats and balls?

Liss. Oh! yes, yes, madam, several.

Flora. You are mad, Lissardo; you don't mind what my lady says to you. [Aside to Lissardo.]

Vio. Ha! balls!—Is he so merry in my absence? And did your master dance, Lissardo?

Liss. Dance, madam! where, madam?

Vio. Why, at those balls you speak of.

Liss. Balls! what balls, madam?

Vio. Why, sure you are in love, Lissardo! Did not you say, but now, you had balls where you have been?

Liss. Balls, madam! Odslife, I ask your pardon, madam. I, I, I, had mislaid some wash-balls of my master's t'other day; and, because I could not think where I had lain them, just when he asked for them, he very fairly broke my head, madam: and now, it seems, I can think of nothing else. Alas! he dance, madam! No, no, poor gentleman, he is as melancholy as an unbraced drum.

Vio. Poor Felix! There, wear that ring for your master's sake, and let him know I shall be ready to receive him. [Exit.]

Liss. I shall, madam. [Puts on the ring.] Methinks a diamond ring is a vast addition to the little finger of a gentleman. [Admiring his hand.]

Flora. That ring must be mine.—Well, Lissardo, what haste you make to pay off arrears now! Look how the fellow stands!

Liss. [admiring his hand.] Egad, methinks I have a very pretty hand—and very white—and the shape!—Faith, I never minded it so much before.—In my opinion, it is a very fine-shaped hand—and becomes a diamond ring as well as the first grandee's in Portugal.

Flora. The man's transported! Is this your love, this your impatience?

Liss. [Takes snuff.] Now, in my mind, I take snuff with a very jaunty air.—Well, I am persuaded I want nothing but a coach and a title to make me a very fine gentleman. [Struts about.]

Flora. Sweet Mr. Lissardo! [Courtesying.] If I may presume to speak to you without affronting your little finger—

Liss. Odsso, madam, I ask your pardon.—Is it to me, or to the ring, you direct your discourse, madam?

Flora. Madam! Good lack! how much a diamond ring improves one!

Liss. Why, though I say it, I can carry myself as well as anybody.—But what wert thou going to say, child?

Flora. Why I was going to say that I fancy you had best let me keep that ring; it will be a very pretty wedding-ring, Lissardo, would it not?

Liss. Humph! ah!—But—but—but—I believe I sha'n't marry yet awhile.

Flora. You sha'n't, you say!—Very well! I suppose you design that ring for Inis.

Liss. No, no; I never bribe an old acquaintance. Perhaps I might let it sparkle in the eyes of a stranger a little, till we come to a right understanding—but then, like all other mortal things, it would return from whence it came.

Flora. Insolent!—Is that your manner of dealing?

Liss. With all! but thee—Kiss me, you little rogue, [Hugging her.]

Flora. Little rogue! Prythee, fellow, don't be so familiar: [Pushing him away.] If I mayn't keep your ring, I can keep my kisses.

Liss. You can, you say! Spoke with the air of a chambermaid.

Flora. Replied with the spirit of a serving-maid.

Liss. Prythee, Flora, don't let you and I fall out. I am in a merry humour, and shall certainly fall in somewhere.

Flora. What care I where you fall in!

Enter DONNA VIOLANTE.

Vio. Why do you keep Lissardo so long, Flora, when you don't know how soon my father may awake? His afternoon naps are never so long.

Flora. Had Don Felix been with her, she would not have thought the time long. These ladies consider nobody's wants but their own. [Aside.]

Vio. Go, go, let him out.

Flora. Yes, madam.

Liss. I fly, madam.

[Exeunt LISSARDO and FLORA.]

Vio. The day draws in, and night, the lover's friend, advances—night, more welcome than the sun to me, because it brings my love.

Flora. [Shrieking within.] Ah! thieves! thieves! Murder! murder!

Vio. [Shrieking and running.] Ah! defend me, Heaven! What do I hear! Felix is certainly pursued, and will be taken.

Enter FLORA, running.

How now? why dost stare so? Answer me quickly; what's the matter?

Flora. Oh, madam, as I was letting out Lissardo, a gentleman rushed between him and I, struck down my candle, and is bringing a dead person in his arms into our house.

Vio. Ha! a dead person? Heaven grant it does not prove my Felix!

Flora. Here they are, madam.

Vio. I'll retire till you discover the meaning of this accident. [Exit.]

Enter COLONEL BRITON, with DONNA ISABELLA in his arms; sets her down in a chair, and addresses himself to FLORA.

Col. B. Madam, the necessity this lady was under of being conveyed into some house with speed and secrecy, will, I hope, excuse any indecency I might be guilty of in pressing so rudely into this.—I am an entire stranger to her name and circumstances—'would I were so to her beauty too! [Aside.] I commit her, madam, to your care, and fly to make her retreat secure. If the street be clear, permit me to return, and learn from her own mouth if I can be further servicable. Pray, madam, how is the lady of this house called?

Flora. Violante, signior.

Col. B. Are you she, madam?

Flora. Only her woman, signior.

Col. B. Your humble servant, mistress. Pray be careful of the lady. [Gives her two moidores, and Exit.]

Flora. Two moidores! Well, he is a generous fellow! This is the only way to make one careful.

Enter DONNA VIOLANTE.

Vio. Were you distracted, Flora, to tell my name to a man you never saw! Unthinking wench! who knows what this may turn to?—What, is the lady dead? Ah! defend me, Heaven! 'tis Isabella, sister to my Felix! What has befallen her! Pray Heaven he's safe!—Run and fetch some cold water.

—Stay, stay, Flora.—Isabella, friend, speak to me; oh! speak to me, or I shall die with apprehension.

Isab. Oh, hold, my dearest father! do not force me; indeed I cannot love him.

Vio. How wild she talks!

Isab. Ha! where am I?

Vio. With one as sensible of thy pain as thou thyself canst be.

Isab. Violante! what kind star preserved and lodged me here?

Flora. It was a terrestrial star, called a man, madam; 'pray Jupiter he proves a lucky one!

Isab. Oh, I remember now. Forgive me, dear Violante; my thoughts run so much upon the danger I escaped, I forgot.

Vio. May I not know your story?

Isab. Thou art no stranger to one part of it. I have often told thee that my father designed to sacrifice me to Don Guzman, who, it seems, is just returned from Holland, and expected ashore to-morrow, the day that he has set to celebrate our nuptials. Upon my refusing to obey him, he locked me into my chamber, vowing to keep me there till he arrived, and force me to consent. I know my father to be positive, never to be won from his design; and, having no hope left me to escape the marriage, I leaped from the window into the street.

Vio. You have not hurt yourself, I hope?

Isab. No; a gentleman passing by, by accident, caught me in his arms; at first, my fright made me apprehend it was my father, till he assured me to the contrary.

Flora. He is a very fine gentleman, I promise you, madam, and a well-bred man, I warrant him. I think I never saw a grandee put his hand into his pocket with a better air in my whole lifetime; then he opened his purse with such a grace that nothing but his manner of presenting me with the gold could equal.

Vio. Go, leave us, Flora.—But how came you hither, Isabella?

Isab. I know not; I desired the stranger to convey me to the next monastery; but ere I reached the door, I saw, or fancied that I saw, Lissardo, my brother's man—and the thought that his master might not be far off flung me into a swoon, which is all that I can remember.—Ha! what's here? [Takes up a letter.] For Colonel Briton, to be left at the post-house at Lisbon. This must be dropped by the stranger who brought me hither.

Vio. Thou art fallen into the hands of a soldier; take care he does not lay thee under contribution, girl.

Isab. I find he is a gentleman, and if he is but unmarried, I could be content to follow him all the world over.—But I shall never see him more, I fear. [Sighs and pauses.]

Vio. What makes you sigh, Isabella?

Isab. The fear of falling into my father's clutches again.

Vio. Can I be servicable to you?

Isab. Yes, if you conceal me two or three days.

Vio. You may command my house and secrecy.

Isab. I thank you, Violante; I wish you would oblige me with Mrs. Flora awhile.

Vio. I'll send her to you.—I must watch if dad be still asleep, or here will be no room for Felix. [Exit.]

Isab. Well, I don't know what ails me! methinks I wish I could find this stranger out.

Enter FLORA.

Flora. Does your ladyship want me, madam?

Isab. Ay, Mrs. Flora : I resolve to make you my confidante.

Flora. I shall endeavour to discharge my duty, madam.

Isab. I doubt it not, and desire you to accept this as a token of my gratitude.

Flora. Oh, dear Signora ! I should have been your humble servant without a fee.

Isab. I believe it—But to the purpose—Do you think, if you saw the gentleman who brought me hither, you should know him again ?

Flora. From a thousand, madam ; I have an excellent memory where a handsome man is concerned. When he went away, he said he would return again immediately. I admire he comes not.

Isab. Here, did you say ? You rejoice me—though I'll not see him if he comes. Could you not contrive to give him a letter ?

Flora. With the air of a duenna !

Isab. Not in this house—you must veil, and follow him—He must not know it comes from me.

Flora. What, do you take me for a novice in love affairs ? Though I have not practised the art since I have been in Donna Violante's service, yet I have not lost the theory of a chambermaid. [Isabella sits at a table, and writes.] Do you write the letter, and leave the rest to me.—Here, here ; here's pen, ink, and paper.

Isab. I'll do it in a minute.

Flora. So ! this is a business after my own heart.—Love always takes care to reward his labourers, and Great Britain seems to be his favourite country.—Oh ! I long to see the other two maidens with a British air !—Methinks there's a grace peculiar to that nation in making a present.

Isab. So, I have done. Now, if he does but find this house again !

Flora. If he should not—I warrant I'll find him, if he's in Lisbon ; for I have a strong prepossession that he has two maidens as good as ever were told.

[Puts the letter into her bosom.]

Enter DONNA VIOLANTE.

Vio. Flora, watch my father ; he's fast asleep in his study : if you find him stir, give me notice. [Colonel Briton taps at the window.] Hark ! I hear Felix at the window ! admit him instantly, and then to your post. [Exit FLORA.]

Isab. What say you, Violante ? is my brother come ?

Vio. It is his signal at the window.

Isab. [Kneels.] Oh, Violante ! I conjure you, by all the love thou bear'st to Felix, by thy own generous nature—nay, more, by that unspotted virtue thou art mistress of, do not discover to my brother I am here.

Vio. Contrary to your desire, be assured I never shall. But where's the danger ?

Isab. [Rises.] Art thou born in Lisbon, and ask that question ? He'll think his honour blemished by my disobedience, and would restore me to my father, or kill me ; therefore, dear dear girl—

Vio. Depend upon my friendship ; nothing shall draw the secret from these lips, not even Felix, though at the hazard of his love. I hear him coming ; retire into that closet.

Isab. Remember, Violante, upon thy promise my very life depends. [Exit.]

Vio. When I betray thee, may I share thy fate.

Enter DON FELIX.

My Felix, my everlasting love ! [Runs into his arms.]

Fel. My life ! my soul ! my Violante !

Vio. What hazards dost thou run for me !—Oh, how shall I requite thee ?

Fel. If, during this tedious painful exile, thy thoughts have never wandered from thy Felix, thou hast made me more than satisfaction.

Vio. Can there be room within this heart for any but thyself ? No, if the god of love were lost to all the rest of human kind, thy image would secure him in my breast : I am all truth, all love, all faith, and know no jealous fears.

Fel. My heart's the proper sphere where love resides : could he quit that, he would be nowhere found ; and yet, Violante, I'm in doubt.

Vio. Did I ever give thee cause to doubt, my Felix ?

Fel. True love has many fears, and fear as many eyes as fame ; yet sure I think I see no fault in thee.

[Colonel taps again.] What's that ? [Taps again.]

Vio. What ! I heard nothing. [Again.]

Fel. Ha ! What means this signal at your window ?

Vio. Somewhat, perhaps, in passing by, might accidentally hit it ; it can be nothing else.

Cok. B. [Within.] Hist, hist, Donna Violante ! Donna Violante !

Fel. They use your name by accident too, do they, madam ?

Enter FLORA.

Flora. There is a gentleman at the window, madam, which I fancy to be him who brought Isabella hither. Shall I admit him ? [Aside to Violante.]

Vio. Admit distraction rather ! Thou art the cause of this, unthinking wretch ! [Aside to Flora.]

Fel. What, has Mrs. Scout brought you fresh intelligence ?

Flora. Scout ! I scorn your words, signior.

Vio. Nay, nay, nay, you must not leave me.

[Catches hold of him.]

Fel. Oh ! 'tis but fair to answer the gentleman, madam ! it is none of his fault that his visit proves unseasonable ! Pray let me go ; my presence is but a restraint upon you. [Struggles to get from her.]

Vio. Was ever accident so mischievous ! [Aside.]

Flora. It must be the colonel. Now, to deliver my letter to him. [Exit, the Colonel taps louder.]

Vio. Hark ! he grows impatient at your delay. Why do you hold the man whose absence would oblige you ? Pray, let me go, madam. Consider, the gentleman wants you at the window.

[Struggles still.]

Vio. It is not me he wants.

Fel. Death ! not you ! Is there another of your name in the house ? But come on, convince me of the truth of what you say ; open the window ; if his business does not lie with you, your conversation may be heard. This, and only this, can take off my suspicion. What, do you pause ? Oh ! guilt, guilt ! Have I caught you ? Nay, then, I'll leap the balcony. If I remember, this way leads to it.

[Breaks from her, and goes to the door where Isabella is.]

Vio. [Stopping him at the door.] Hold ! hold ! hold ! hold ! not for the world you enter there. Which way shall I preserve his sister from his knowledge ? [Aside.]

Fel. What, have I touched you ? Do you fear your lover's life ?

Vio. I fear for none but you. For goodness sake, do not speak so loud, my Felix. If my father hears you, I am lost for ever : that door opens into his apartment. [Aside.] What shall I do if he enters ? There he finds his sister. If he goes out he'll quarrel with the stranger. Felix ! Felix ! your curiosity shall be satisfied. [Goes to the window and throws up the sash.] Whoever you are, that with such insolence dare use my name, and give the neighbourhood pretence to reflect upon my conduct, I charge you instantly to be gone, or expect the treatment you deserve.

Col. B. [Without.] I ask pardon, madam, and will obey: but when I left this house to-night—

Fel. Good!

Vio. It is most certainly the stranger. [Aside.] You are mistaken in the house, suppose, sir.

Fel. No, no; he's not mistaken.—Pray, madam, let the gentleman go on.

Vio. Pray be gone, sir; I know of no business you have here.

Col. B. [Without.] I wish I did not know it neither. But this house contains my soul; then can you blame my body for hovering about it?

Fel. Excellent!

Vio. I tell you again you are mistaken; however, for your own satisfaction, call to-morrow.

Fel. Matchless impudence! An assignation before my face! No, he shall not live to meet your wishes.

Takes out a pistol, and goes towards the window; she catches hold of him.

Vio. Ah! [Shrieks.] Hold, I conjure you.

Col. B. To-morrow's an age, madam! may I not be admitted to-night?

Vio. If you be a gentleman, I command your absence. Unfortunate! what will my stars do with me! [Aside.]

Col. B. I have done—only this—be careful of my life, for it is in your keeping.

[Exit from the window.]

Fel. Pray observe the gentleman's request, madam. [Walking off from her.]

Vio. I am all confusion! [Aside.]

Fel. You are all truth, all love, all faith! Oh, thou all woman! How have I been deceived! 'Sdeath! could you not have imposed upon me for this one night? Could neither my faithful love, nor all the hazard I have run to see you, make me worthy to be cheated on?—Oh, thou—

Vio. Can I bear this from you?

Fel. [Repeats.] When I left this house to-night—To-night! the devil! return so soon! [Aside.]

Vio. Oh, Isabella! what hast thou involved me in! Fel. [Repeats.] This house contains my soul!—Sweet soul!

Vio. Yet I resolve to keep the secret. [Aside.]

Fel. [Repeats.] Be careful of my life, for it is in your keeping.—Damnation!—How ugly she appears!

Vio. Do not look so sternly on me: but believe me, Felix, I have not injured you, nor am I false.

Fel. Not false! not injured me! Oh, Violante, lost and abandoned to thy vice! Not false! Oh, monstrous!

Vio. Indeed I am not.—There is a cause which I must not reveal. Oh, think how far honour can oblige your sex—then, allow a woman may be bound by the same rule to keep a secret.

Fel. Honour! what hast thou to do with honour? Thou, that canst admit plurality of lovers?—A secret! ha! ha! ha!—His affairs are wondrous safe who trusts his secret in a woman's keeping. But you need give yourself no trouble about clearing this point, madam, for you are become so indifferent to me, that your truth and falsehood are the same.

Enter FLORA.

Flora. So, I have delivered my letter to the Colonel. Madam, your father bide me see what noise that was. For goodness sake, sir, [To FEL.] why do you speak so loud?

Exit FLORA.

Fel. I understand my cue, mistress; my absence is necessary; I'll oblige you.

[Going, she takes hold of him.]

Vio. Oh, let me undeceive you first!

Fel. Impossible!

Vio. 'Tis very possible, if I durst.

Fel. Durst! ha! ha! ha!—Durst, quotha!

Vio. But another time I'll tell thee all.

Fel. Nay, now or never—

Vio. Now it cannot be.

Fel. Then it shall never be.—Thou most ungrateful of thy sex, farewell. [Breaks from her, and exit.]

Vio. Oh, exquisite trial of my friendship! Yet not even this shall draw the secret from me.

That I'll preserve, let fortune frown or smile;
And trust to love, my love to reconcile. [Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The Street.

Enter DON LOPEZ.

Lop. Was ever man thus plagued! Odsheart, I could swallow my dagger for madness! I know not what to think: sure Frederick had no hand in her escape. She must get out of the window, and she could not do that without a ladder; and who could bring it to her but him? Ay, it must be so! This graceless baggage! But I'll to Frederick immediately; I'll take the alguazil with me, and search the house; and if I find her, I'll use her—By St. Anthony, I don't know how I'll use her! [Exit.]

Enter Colonel BRITON, with a letter in his hand, and GIBBY following.

Col. B. Well, though I could not see my fair incognita, Fortune, to make me amends, has flung another intrigue in my way. Oh, how I love these pretty, kind, coming females, that won't give a man the trouble of racking his invention to deceive them! This letter I received from a lady in a veil—some duenna, some necessary implement of Cupid. I suppose the style is frank and easy, I hope like her that writ it.—[Reads.] Sir, I have seen your person, and like it—very concise—and, if you will meet me at four o'clock in the morning, upon the Terriero de Passa, half an hour's conversation will let me into your mind.—Ha, ha, ha! a philosophical wench! This is the first time I ever knew a woman had any business with the mind of a man. If your intellects answer your outward appearance, the adventure may not displease you. I expect you'll not attempt to see my face, nor offer anything unbecoming the gentleman I take you for!—Humph! the gentleman she takes me for! I hope she takes me to be flesh and blood, and then I am sure I shall do nothing unbecoming a gentleman. Well, if I must not see her face, it shall go hard if I don't know where she lives.—Gibby!

Gibby. Here, an lik her honour.

Col. B. Follow me at a good distance, do you hear, Gibby?

Gibby. In troth dee I, weel enough, sir.

Col. B. I am to meet a lady upon the Terriero de Passa.

Gibby. The deel an mine eyn gin I ken her, sir.

Col. B. But you will when you come there, sirrah.

Gibby. Like enough, sir; I have as sharp an ee tulla a bonny lass as e'er a lad in aw Scotland. And what mun I dee wi' her, sir?

Col. B. Why, if she and I part, you must watch her home, and bring me word where she lives.

Gibby. In troth sal I, sir, gin the deel tak her not.

Col. B. Come along, then; it is pretty near the time. I like a woman that rises early to pursue her inclination.

Thus we improve the pleasure of the day,
While tasteless mortals sleep their time away.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Frederick's House.

Enter INIS and LISSARDO.

Liss. Your lady run away, and you know not whither, say you?

Inis. She never greatly cared for me, after finding you and I together. But you are very grave, methinks, Lissardo.

Liss. [Looking on the ring.] Not at all—I have some thoughts, indeed, of altering my course of living; there is a critical minute in every man's life, which, if he can but lay hold of, he may make his fortune.

Inis. Ha! what do I see? A diamond ring! Where the deuce had he that ring?—You have got a very pretty ring there, Lissardo.

Liss. Ay, the trifle is pretty enough—but the lady who gave it to me is a bona roba in beauty, I assure you.

[Cocks his hat and struts.]

Inis. I can't bear this—The lady! what lady, pray?

Liss. O fie! there's a question to ask a gentleman!

Inis. A gentleman! why the fellow's spoil'd! Is this your love for me? Ungrateful man! you'll break my heart, so you will!

[Bursts into tears.]

Liss. Poor tender-hearted fool!

Inis. If I knew who gave you that ring, I'd tear her eyes out, so I would!

[Sobs.]

Liss. So, now the jade wants a little coaxing.—Why, what dost weep for now, my dear, ha?

Inis. I suppose Flora gave you that ring, but I'll—

Liss. No, the devil take me if she did: you make me swear now.—So, they are all for the ring, but I shall bob them.—I did but joke; the ring is none of mine, it is my master's; I am to give it to be new set, that's all; therefore, pr'ythee, dry thy eyes, and kiss me; come.

Enter FLORA.

Inis. And do you really speak the truth now?

Liss. Why, do you doubt it?

Flora. So, so; very well! I thought there was an intrigue between him and Inis, for all he has sworn it so often.

[Aside.]

Inis. Nor ha'n't you seen Flora since you came to town?

Flora. Ha! how dares she name my name? [Aside.]

Liss. No, by this kiss I ha'n't. [Kisses her.]

Flora. Here's a dissembling varlet! [Aside.]

Inis. Nor don't you love her at all?

Liss. Love the devil! Why, did I not always tell thee she was my aversion?

Flora. Did you so, villain?

[Strikes him a box on the ear.]

Liss. Zounds, she here! I have made a fine spot of work on't!

[Aside.]

Inis. What's that for, ha?

[Brushes up to her.]

Flora. I shall tell you by and by, Mrs. Frippery, if you don't get about your business.

Inis. Who do you call Frippery, Mrs. Trollop?—Pray, get about your business, if you go to that. I hope you pretend to no right and title here!

Liss. [Walking about conceitedly.] What the devil! do they take me for an acre of land, that they quarrel about right and title to me?

Flora. Pray, what right have you, mistress, to ask that question?

Inis. No matter for that: I can show a better title to him than you, I believe.

Flora. What, has he given thee nine months' earnest for a living title? Ha, ha!

Inis. Don't fling your flaunting jests at me, Mrs. Boldface, for I won't take them, I assure you.

Liss. So! now I'm as great as the famed Alexander. But, my dear Statira and Roxana, don't exert yourselves so much about me. Now, I fancy if you would agree lovingly together, [Gets between them, and takes a hand of each.] I might, in a modest way, satisfy both your demands upon me.

Flora. You satisfy! No, sirrah, I am not to be satisfied so soon as you think, perhaps!

Inis. No, nor I neither.—What! do you make no difference between us!

Flora. You pitiful fellow, you!—What! you fancy, I warrant, I gave myself the trouble of dogging you, out of love to your filthy person!—but you are mistaken, sirrah!—it was to detect your treachery.—How often have you sworn to me that you hated Inis, and only carried fair for the good cheer she gave you, but that you could never like a woman with crooked legs, you said!

Inis. How, how, sirrah! crooked legs! Odds, I could find in my heart—

[Snatches up her petticoat a little.]

Liss. Here's a lying young jade, now! Pr'ythee, my dear, moderate thy passion.

[Coaxingly.]

Inis. I'd have you to know, sirrah, my legs were never—Your master, I hope, understands legs better than you do, sirrah.

[Passionately.]

Liss. My master!—So, so!

[Shaking his head and winking.]

Flora. I am glad I have done some mischief, however.

Liss. [To INIS.] Art thou really so foolish to mind what an enraged woman says? Don't you see she does it on purpose to part you and I? [Runs to FLORA.] Could not you find the joke without putting yourself in a passion, you silly girl, you? Why, I saw you follow us plain enough, mun, and said all this, that you might not go back with only your labour for your pains. But you are a revengeful young slut, though, I tell you that; but come, kiss and be friends.

Flora. Don't think to coax me; hang your kisses.

Fel. [Within.] Lissardo!

Liss. Ods heart, here's my master! The devil take both these jades for me; what shall I do with them?

Inis. Ha! 'tis Don Felix's voice; I would not have him find me here with his footman for the world!

[Aside.]

Fel. [Within.] Why, Lissardo! Lissardo!

Liss. Coming, sir.—What a plague will you do?

Flora. Bless me, which way shall I get out?

Liss. Nay, nay, you must e'en set your quarrel aside, and be content to be mewed up in the clothes press together, or stay where you are, and face it out:—there's no help for it.

Flora. Put me anywhere rather than that; come, come, let me in.

[LISSARDO opens the press, and FLORA goes in.]

Inis. I'll see her hanged before I'll go into the place where she is.—I'll trust Fortune with my deliverance.—Here used to be a pair of back stairs—I'll try to find them out.

[Exit]

Enter Don FELIX and FREDERICK.

Fel. Were you asleep, sirrah, that you did not hear me call?

Liss. I did hear you, and answered you I was coming, sir.

Fel. Go, get the horses ready! I'll leave Lisbon to-night, never to see it more.

Liss. Hey-day! what's the matter now? [Exit.]

Fred. Pray tell me, Don Felix, what has ruffled your temper thus?

Fel. A woman—Oh, friend! who can name woman, and forget inconstancy!

Fred. This from a person of mean education were excusable; such low suspicions have their source from vulgar conversation; men of your politer taste never rashly censure. Come, this is some groundless jealousy. Love raises many fears.

Fel. No, no: my ears conveyed the truth into my heart, and reason justifies my anger. Oh, my friend! Violante's false! and I have nothing left but thee in Lisbon, which can make me wish ever to see it more, except revenge upon my rival, of whom I'm ignorant. Oh, that some miracle would reveal him to me, that I might, through his heart, punish her infidelity!

Enter LISSARDO.

Liss. Oh, sir, here's your father, Don Lopez, coming up!

Fel. Does he know that I am here?

Liss. I can't tell, sir—he ask'd for Don Frederick.

Fred. Did he see you?

Liss. No, sir; for as soon as I heard him, I ran to give my master notice.

Fel. Keep out of his sight then. [Exit LISSARDO.]
And, dear Frederick, permit me to retire into the next room; for I know the old gentleman will be very much displeased at my return without his leave.

[Exit.]

Fred. Quick, quick, begone! he is here!

Enter Don LOPEZ.

Lop. [Speaking as he enters.] Mr. Alguazil, wait you without till I call for you. Frederick, an affair brings me here which requires privacy—so that if you have anybody within ear-shot, pray order them to retire.

Fred. We are private, my lord; speak freely.

Lop. Why, then, sir, I must tell you, that you had better have pitched upon any man in Portugal to have injured than myself.

Fred. I understand you not, my lord.

Lop. Though I am old, I have a son! Alas, why name I him? He knows not the dishonour of my house.

Fred. Explain yourself, my lord—I am not conscious of any dishonourable action to any man, much less to your lordship.

Lop. 'Tis false; you have debauched my daughter.

Fred. My lord, I scorn so foul a charge.

Lop. You have debauched her duty, at least; therefore instantly restore her to me, or by St. Anthony I'll make you.

Fred. Restore her, my lord! where shall I find her?

Lop. I have those that will swear she is here in your house.

Fred. You are misinformed, my lord! Upon my reputation, I have not seen Donna Isabella since the absence of Don Felix.

Lop. Then pray, sir—if I am not too inquisitive, what motive had you for those objections you made against her marriage with Don Gusman yesterday?

Fred. The disagreeableness of such a match, I feared, would give your daughter cause to curse her duty, if she complied with your demands: that was all, my lord.

Lop. And so you helped her through the window, to make her disobey?

Fred. This is insulting me, my lord, when I assure you I have neither seen, nor know anything of your daughter; if she is gone, the contrivance was her own, and you may thank your rigour for it.

Lop. Very well, sir; however, my rigour shall make bold to search your house. Here, call in the alguazil.

Flora. [Peeping.] The alguazil! What in the name of wonder will become of me?

Fred. The alguazil! My lord, you'll repent this.

Enter Alguazil and two Officers.

Lop. No, sir, 'tis you that will repent it. I charge you, in the king's name, to assist me in finding my daughter. Be sure you leave no part of the house unsearched. Come, follow me.

[Goes towards the door where FELIX is; FREDERICK draws and plants himself before the door.]

Fred. Sir, I must first know by what authority you pretend to search my house, before you enter here.

Alg. How, sir! dare you presume to draw your sword upon the representative of majesty? I am, sir, I am his majesty's alguazil, and the very quintessence of authority; therefore, put your sword up, or I shall order you to be knocked down; for know, sir, the breath of an alguazil is as dangerous as the breath of a demi-culverin.

Lop. She is certainly in that room, by his guarding the door—if he disputes your authority, knock him down, I say.

Fred. The woman you look for is not here; but there is something in this room, which I'll preserve from your sight at the hazard of my life.

Lop. Enter, I say; nothing but my daughter can be there. Force his sword from him.

[FELIX comes out, and joins FREDERICK.]

Fel. Villains, stand off! assassinate a man in his own house!

Lop. Oh, oh, oh, misericordia! what do I see? my son!

Alg. Ha, his son! Here's five hundred pistoles good, my brethren, if Antonio dies; and that's in the surgeon's power, and he's in love with my daughter, you know; so seize upon him.

Lop. Hold, hold! Oh that I ever was born!

Fred. Did I not tell you, you would repent, my lord? What, ho! within there!

Enter Servants.

Arm yourselves, and let not a man in or out, but Felix.

Fel. Generous Frederick!

Fred. Look ye, alguazil, when you would betray my friend, for filthy lucre, I shall no more regard you as an officer of justice, but, as a thief and robber, thus resist you.

Fel. Come on, sir, we'll show you play for the five hundred pistoles. [They fight.]

Lop. Hold, hold, Alguazil; I'll give you the five hundred pistoles—that is, my bond to pay upon Antonio's death, and twenty pistoles, however things go, for you and these honest fellows to drink my health.

Alg. Say you so, my lord? Why, look ye, my lord, I bear the young gentleman no ill-will, my lord. If I get but the five hundred pistoles, my lord—why, look ye, my lord, 'tis the same thing to me whether your son be hanged or not, my lord.

Fel. Scoundrels!—

Lop. Ay, well, thou art a good-natured fellow, that's the truth on't.—Come, then, we'll away, and sign and seal this minute. Oh, Felix! why wouldst thou serve me thus? But I cannot upraid thee now, nor have I time to talk. Be careful of thyself, or thou wilt break my heart.

[Ereunt LOPEZ, ALGUAZIL, and Attendants.]

Fel. Now, Frederick, though I ought to thank you for your care of me, yet, till I am satisfied as to my father's accusation (for I overheard it all), I cannot return the acknowledgements I owe you. Know you aught relating to my sister?

Fred. I hope my faith and truth are known to you; and here by both I swear, I am ignorant of every thing relating to your father's charge.

Fel. Enough, I do believe thee. Oh, fortune! where will thy malice end?

Enter VASQUEZ.

Vasq. Sir, I bring you joyful news.

Fel. What's the matter?

Vasq. I am told that Don Antonio is out of danger, and now in the palace.

Fel. I wish it be true; then I'm at liberty to watch my rival, and pursue my sister. Pr'ythee, Frederick, inform thyself of the truth of this report.

Fred. I will, this minute. Do you hear? let nobody in to Don Felix till my return. [Exit.]

Vasq. I'll observe, sir.

Flora. [Peeping.] They have almost frightened me out of my wits, I'm sure—Now Felix is alone, I have a good mind to pretend I came with a message from my lady; but how, then, shall I say I came into the cupboard?

Vasq. [Within.] I tell you, madam, Don Felix is not here.

Vio. [Within.] I tell you, sir, he is here, and I will see him.

Fel. What noise is that?

Flora. [From the closet.] My stars! my lady here! [Shuts the press close.]

Enter VIOLENTE.

Vio. You are as difficult of access, sir, as a first minister of state.

Fel. If your visit was designed for Frederick, madam, he is abroad.

Vio. No, sir, the visit is to you.

Fel. You are very punctual in your ceremonies, madam.

Vio. Though I did not come to return your visit, but to take that which your civility ought to have brought me.

Fel. If my eyes, my ears, and my understanding lied, them I am in your debt; else not, madam.

Vio. I will not charge them with a term so gross to say they lied; but call it a mistake—nay, call it any thing to excuse my Felix. Could I, think ye—could I put off my pride so far, poorly to dissemble a passion which I did not feel, or seek a reconciliation with what I did not love? And no law, whilst single, binds us to obey; but your sex are, by nature and education, obliged to pay a deference to all womankind.

Fel. These are fruitless arguments. 'Tis most certain thou wert dearer to these eyes than all that heaven e'er gave to charm the sense of man; but I would rather tear them out, than suffer them to deduce my reason and enslave my peace.

Vio. Can you love without esteem? and where is the esteem for her you still suspect?—O, Felix! there is a delicacy in love which equals even a religious faith! True love never doubts the object it adores, and sceptics there will disbelieve their sight.

Fel. Your notions are too refined for mine, madam.

Enter VASQUEZ.

How now, sirrah! what do you want?

Vasq. Only my master's cloak out of this press, sir, that's all.

Fel. Make haste, then.

Vasq. [Opens the press, sees FLORA, and roars out.] Oh, the devil! the devil! [Exit.]

Flora. Discovered! nay, then, legs befriended me.

[Runs out.]

Vio. Ah! a woman concealed! very well, Felix.

Fel. A woman in the press!

Enter LISSARDO

Liss. Sir, the horses are—

Fel. How the devil came a woman there, sirrah?

Liss. What shall I say now?

Vio. Now, Lissardo, show your wit to bring your master off.

Liss. Off, madam? Nay, nay, nay, there—there needs no great wit to—to—to bring him off, madam: for she did come—

Fel. She did come!

Liss. That is, she did not come, as—as—as—a—a man may say directly to—to—to—to speak with my master, madam.

Vio. I see by your stammering, Lissardo, that your invention is at a very low ebb.

Fel. 'Sdeath, rascal! speak without hesitation, and the truth too, or I shall stick my spado in your guts.

Vio. No, no, your master mistakes; he would not have you speak the truth.

Fel. Madam, my sincerity wants no excuse.

Liss. [Retiring.] I am so confounded between one and the other, that I cannot think of a lie.

Fel. Sirrah, fetch me this woman back instantly—I'll know what business she has here.

Vio. Not a step; your master shall not be put to the blush. Come, a truce, Felix; do you ask me no more questions about the window, and I'll forgive this.

Fel. Madam, I scorn forgiveness, where I own no crime; but your soul, conscious of its guilt, would fain lay hold of this occasion to blend your treason with my innocence.

Vio. Insolent! Nay, if instead of owning your fault, you endeavour to insult my patience, I must tell you, sir, you don't behave yourself like that man of honour you would be taken for—you ground your quarrel with me upon your own inconstancy; 'tis plain you are false yourself, and would make me the aggressor. It was not for nothing the fellow opposed my entrance; this last usage has given me back my liberty, and now my father's will shall be obeyed without the least reluctance; and so your servant. [Exit.]

Fel. Oh, stubborn, stubborn heart! what wilt thou do?—Her father's will shall be obeyed!—Ha! that carries her to a cloister, and cuts off all my hopes at once!—By heaven she shall not, must not leave me!—No, she is not false.—Ha, villain! art thou here? [To LISSARDO, who is going.] Tell me this moment who this woman was, and for what intent she was here concealed, or—

Liss. Ah, good sir, forgive me, and I'll tell you the whole truth. [Falls on his knees.]

Fel. Out with it, then.

Liss. It—it—it was Flora, sir, Donna Violante's woman. You must know, sir, we have had a sneaking kindness for one another a great while; she was not willing you should know it; so, when she heard your voice, she ran into the clothes-press. I would have told you this at first, but I was afraid of her lady's knowing it. This is the whole truth, as I hope for a whole skin, sir.

Fel. If it be not, I'll not leave you a whole bone in it, sirrah.—Fly, [Liss. rises.] and observe if Violante goes directly home.

Liss. Yes, sir, yes.

Fel. Fly, you dog, fly. [Exit LISSARDO.] I must convince her of my faith. Oh, how irresolute is a lover's heart!—how absolute is a woman's power!

In vain we strive their tyranny to quit,

In vain we struggle, for we must submit. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—The Terriero de Passa.

Enter Colonel BRITON, and ISABELLA veiled.—GIBBY at a distance.

Col. B. Then you say it is impossible for me to wait on you at home, madam?

Isab. I say it is inconsistent with my circumstances, Colonel—and that way impossible for me to admit of it.

Col. B. Consent to go with me, then—I lodge at one Don Frederick's, a merchant, just by here; he is a very honest fellow, and I dare confide in his secrecy.

Isab. Ha! does he lodge there?—'Pray heaven I am not discovered! [Aside.]

Col. B. What say you, my charmer?—shall we breakfast together?—I have some of the best tea in the universe.

Isab. Puh! Tea! Is that the best treat you can give a lady at your lodgings, colonel?

Col. B. Well hinted—No, no, no, I have other things at thy service, child.

Isab. What are those things, pray?

Col. B. My heart, soul, and body, into the bargain.

Isab. Has the last no incumbrance upon it? Can you make a clear title, colonel?

Col. B. All freehold, child, and I'll afford thee a very good bargain. [Embraces her.]

Gibby. O' my saul, they mak muckle words about it—Ise sare weary with standing, Ise e'en tak a sleep. [Lies down to sleep.]

Isab. If I take a lease, it must be for life, colonel.

Col. B. Thou shalt have me as long, or as little time as thou wilt, my dear. Come, let's to my lodgings, and we'll sign and seal this minute.

Isab. Oh, not so fast, colonel; there are many things to be adjusted before the lawyer and the parson come.

Col. B. The lawyer and parson!—No, no, you little rogue, we can finish our affairs without the help of the law—or the gospel.

Isab. Indeed but we can't, colonel.

Col. B. Indeed!—Why, hast thou then trepanned me out of my warm bed this morning for nothing? Why, this is showing a man, half famished, a well-furnished larder, then clapping a padlock on the door, till you starve him quite.

Isab. If you can find in your heart to say grace, colonel, you shall keep the key.

Col. B. I love to see my meat before I give thanks, madam; therefore, uncover thy face, child, and I'll tell thee more of my mind—if I like you.

Isab. I dare not risk my reputation on your ifs, colonel, and so adieu. [Going.]

Col. B. Nay, nay, nay, we must not part.

Isab. As you ever hope to see me more, suspend your curiosity now: one step farther loses me for ever. Show yourself a man of honour, and you shall find me a woman of honour. [Exit.]

Col. B. Well, for once I'll trust to a blind bargain, madam—[Kisses her hand, and parts.] But I shall be too cunning for your ladyship, if Gibby observes my orders. Ha! what do I see? my rascal asleep! Sirrah, did not I charge you to watch the lady? And is it thus you observe my orders, ye dog?

[Kicks him, he shrugs, rubs his eyes, and yawns.]

Gibby. [Rising.] That's true, an like your honour: but I thought, that when ance ye had her in yer ane hands, ye might a' ordered her yersel weel enough without me, en ye ken, en like yer honour.

Col. B. Sirrah, hold your impertinent tongue, and make haste after her. If you don't bring me some account of her, never dare to see my face again.

[Exit.]

Gibby. Ay, this is bonny wark, indeed! to run three hundred miles to this wicked town, and before I can weel fill my weam, to be sent a whore-hunting after this black she devil.—What gate sall I gang to speer for this watch now? Ah, for a ruling elder—or the kirk-treasurer—or his mon—I'd gar my master mak tae o' this: but I am sure there's no sic honest folk here, or there wud na be sa mickle sculdredie.

[VIOLANTE crosses.—GIBBY goes up to VIOLANTE.]

Gibby. I vow, madam, but I am glad that ye and I are foregathered.

Vio. What would the fellow have?

Gibby. Nothing.—Away, madam! wo worthy yer heart, what a muckle deal o'mischief had you like to bring upon poor Gibby.

Vio. The man's drunk.

Gibby. In troth I am not—And gin I had na found ye, madam, the Lord know when I should; for my maister bade me ne'er gang hame without tidings of ye, madam.

Vio. Sirrah, get about your business, or I'll have your bones drubbed!

Gibby. Gude faith, my meister has e'en done that t'yer honds, madam.

Vio. Who is your master, sir?

Gibby. Money a ane speers the gate they ken right weel—it is na sa lang sen ye parted wi' him. I wish he ken'd ye half as weel as ye ken him.

Vio. Puh! the creature's mad, or mistakes me for somebody else; and I should be as mad as he to talk to him any longer. [Exit.]

Enter LISSARDO.

Liss. So, she's gone home, I see—What did that Scots fellow want with her? I'll try to find it out—perhaps I may discover something that may make my master friends with me again.

Gibby. Are ye gone, madam? a deel scope in yer company, for I'm as wise as I was. But I'll bide an see wha's hoose it is, gin I can meet with any civil body to speer at. My lad, wot ye wha lives here?

[Turns and sees LISSARDO.]

Liss. Don Pedro de Mendosa.

Gibby. And did you see a lady gang in but now?

Liss. Yes, I did.

Gibby. And d'ye ken her tee?

Liss. It was Donna Violante, his daughter. What the devil makes him so inquisitive? Here is something in it, that is certain. [Aside.] 'Tis a cold morning, brother, what think you of a dram?

Gibby. In troth, very weel, sir.

Liss. You seem an honest fellow ; pr'ythee, let's drink to our better acquaintance.

Gibby. W! all my heart, sir; gang your gate to the next house, and Ise follow ye.

Liss. Come along, then.

Gibby. Don Pedro de Mendoza! Donna Violante his daughter! that's as right as my leg, now—Ise need na mair—I'll tak a drink, and then to my maister.

Ise bring him news will make his heart full blee ;
Gin he rewards it not, deel pimp for me. [Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—Donna Violante's Lodgings.

Enter DONNA ISABELLA, in a gay temper, and DONNA VIOLANTE, out of humour.

Isab. My dear, I have been wishing for you this half hour, to tell you the most lucky adventure!

Vio. And you have pitched upon the most unlucky hour for it that you could possibly have found in the whole four-and-twenty.

Isab. Hang unlucky hours! I won't think of them—I hope all my misfortunes are past.

Vio. And mine all to come.

Isab. I have seen the man I like.

Vio. And I have seen the man that I could wish to hate.

Isab. And you must assist me in discovering whether he can like me or not.

Vio. You have assisted me in such a discovery already, I thank ye.

Isab. What say you, my dear?

Vio. I say I am very unlucky at discoveries, Isabella: I have too lately made one pernicious to my case—your brother is false.

Isab. Impossible!

Vio. Most true!

Isab. Some villain has traduced him to you.

Vio. No, Isabella, I loved too well to trust the eyes of others; I never credit the ill-judging world, or form suspicions upon vulgar censures—no, I had ocular proof of his ingratitude.

Isab. Then I am most unhappy—My brother was the only pledge of faith betwixt us; if he has forfeited your favour, I have no title to your friendship.

Vio. You wrong my friendship, Isabella; your own merit entitles you to every thing within my power.

Isab. Generous maid!—But may I not know what grounds you have to think my brother false?

Vio. Another time.—But tell me, Isabella, how can I serve you?

Isab. Thus, then—The gentleman that brought me hither I have seen and talked with upon the Terriero de Passa this morning, and I find him a man of sense, generosity, and good humour; in short, he is every thing that I could like for a husband, and I have dispatched Mrs. Flora to bring him hither: I hope you'll forgive the liberty I have taken.

Vio. Hither! to what purpose?

Isab. To the great universal purpose, matrimony.

Vio. Matrimony! why, do you design to ask him?

Isab. No, Violante, you must do that for me.

Vio. I thank you for the favour you design me, but desire to be excused—I manage my own affairs too ill to be trusted with those of other people. I can't for my life admire your conduct, to encourage a person altogether unknown to you: 'twas very imprudent to meet him this morning, but much more so to send for him hither, knowing what inconveniency you have already drawn upon me.

Isab. I am not insensible how far my misfortunes have embarrassed you; and, if you please, will sacrifice my quiet to your own.

Vio. Unkindly urged!—Have I not preferred your happiness to every thing that's dear to me?

Isab. I know thou hast—then do not deny me this last request, when a few hours, perhaps, may render my condition able to clear thy fame, and bring my brother to thy feet for pardon.

Vio. I wish you don't repent of this intrigue. I suppose he knows you are the same woman that he brought in last night?

Isab. Not a syllable of that; I met him veiled, and, to prevent his knowing the house, I ordered Mrs. Flora to bring him in by the back door into the garden.

Vio. The very way which Felix comes: if they should meet, there would be fine work!—Indeed, my dear, I can't approve of your design.

Enter FLORA.

Flora. Madam, the Colonel waits your pleasure.

Vio. How durst you go upon such a message, mistress, without acquainting me?

Flora. So I am to be buffed for every thing.

Isab. 'Tis too late to dispute that now, dear Violante; I acknowledge the rashness of the action; but consider the necessity of my deliverance.

Vio. That, indeed, is a weighty consideration: well, what am I to do?

Isab. In the next room I'll give you instructions; in the meantime, Mrs. Flora, show the Colonel into this. [Exit FLORA, ISABELLA and VIOLANTE.

Re-enter FLORA, with Colonel BRITON.

Flora. The lady will wait on you presently, sir.

[Exit.]

Col. B. Very well—this is a fruitful soil—I have not been here quite four-and-twenty hours, and I have three intrigues upon my hands already; but I hate the chase without partaking of the game—

Enter VIOLANTE, veiled.

Ha! a fine-sized woman—'Pray heaven she proves handsome!—I am come to obey your ladyship's commands.

Vio. Are you sure of that, Colonel?

Col. B. If you be not very unreasonable, indeed, madam.—A man is but a man.

[Takes her hand and kisses it.]

Vio. Nay, we have no time for compliments, Colonel.

Col. B. I understand you, madam—Montrez moi votre chambre. [Takes her in his arms.]

Vio. Nay, nay, hold, Colonel; my bed-chamber is not to be entered without a certain purchase—

Col. B. Purchase—humph, this is some kept mistress, I suppose, who industriously lets out her leisure hours.—[Aside.—Look ye, madam, you must consider, we soldiers are not overstocked with money, but we make ample satisfaction in love; we have a world of courage upon our hands now, you know—then, pr'ythee use a conscience, and I'll try if my pocket can come up to your price.

Vio. Nay, don't give yourself the trouble of drawing your purse, Colonel; my design is levelled at your person, if that be at your disposal.

Col. B. Ay, that it is, 'faith, madam; and I'll settle it as firmly upon thee—

Vio. As law can do it.

Col. B. Hang law in love affairs; thou shalt have right and title to it out of pure inclination.—A matrimonial hint again. [Aside.]

Vio. Then you have an aversion to matrimony, Colonel? Did you never see a woman in all your travels that you could like for a wife?

Col. B. A very odd question—Do you really expect that I should speak truth now?

Vio. I do, if you expect to be dealt with, Colonel.

Col. B. Why, then—yes.

Vio. Is she in your country, or this?

Col. B. This is a very pretty kind of catechism!—In this town, I believe, madam.

Vio. Her name is—

Col. B. Ay, how is she called, madam?

Vio. Nay, I ask you that, sir!

Col. B. Oh, oh! why she is called—Pray, madam, how is it you spell your name?

Vio. Oh, Colonel, I am not the happy woman, nor do I wish it.

Col. B. No? I am sorry for that.—What the devil does she mean by all these questions? [Aside.]

Vio. Come, Colonel, for once be sincere; perhaps you may not repent it.

Col. B. This is like to be but a silly adventure—here's so much sincerity required. [Aside.] 'Faith, madam, I have an inclination to sincerity, but I'm afraid you'll call my manners in question.

Vio. Not at all; I prefer truth before compliment in this affair.

Col. B. Why, then, to be plain with you, madam, a lady last night wounded my heart by a fall from a window, whose person I could be content to take, as my father took my mother, till death do us part. But who she is, or how distinguished, whether maid, wife, or widow, I can't inform you—perhaps you are she?

Vio. Not to keep you in suspense, I am not she; but I can give you an account of her. That lady is a maid of condition—has ten thousand pounds—and, if you are a single man, her person and fortune are at your service.

Col. B. I accept the offer with the highest transports: but say, my charming angel, art thou not she?

[Offers to embrace her.]

Vio. Once again, Colonel, I tell you I am not she—but at six this evening you shall find her on the Terriero de Passa, with a white handkerchief in her hand—Get a priest ready, and you know the rest.

Col. B. I shall infallibly observe your directions, madam.

Enter FLORA, hastily, and whispers VIOLANTE, who starts, and seems surprised.

Vio. Ah! Felix crossing, say you? What shall I do now?

Col. B. You seem surprised, madam.

Vio. Oh, Colonel, my father is coming hither, and if he finds you here I am ruined.

Col. B. Odslife, madam, thrust me any where! Can't I go out this way?

Vio. No, no, no,—he comes that way.—How shall I prevent their meeting?—Here, here, step into my bedchamber.

Col. B. Oh, the best place in the world, madam.

Vio. And be still, as you value her you love.—Don't stir till you've notice, as ever you hope to have her in your arms.

Col. B. On that condition I'll not breathe.

[Exit Colonel.]

Enter DON FELIX.—FLORA waiting in background.

Fel. I wonder where this dog of a servant is all this while.—But she is at home, I find.—How coldly she regards me!—You look, Violante, as if the sight of me were troublesome to you.

Vio. Can I do otherwise, when you have the assurance to approach me, after what I saw to-day?

Fel. Assurance! rather call it good-nature, after what I heard last night. But such regard to honour have I, in my love to you, I cannot bear to be suspected, nor suffer you to entertain false notions of my truth, without endeavouring to convince you of my innocence; so much good-nature have I more than you, Violante. Pray give me leave to ask your woman one question—my man assures me she was the person you saw at my lodgings.

Flora. I confess it, madam, and ask your pardon.

Vio. Impudent baggage!—not to deceive me sooner! what business could you have there?

Fel. Lissardo and she, it seems, imitate you and me.

Flora. I love to follow the example of my betters, madam.

Fel. I hope I am justified.

Vio. Since we are to part, Felix, there needs no justification.

Fel. Methinks you talk of parting as a thing indifferent to you. [Lays his hand on her arm.] Can you forget how I have loved?

Vio. I wish I could forget my own passion: I should, with less concern, remember yours. But for Mrs. Flora—

Fel. You must forgive her.—Must, did I say? I fear I have no power to impose, though the injury was done to me.

Vio. 'Tis harder to pardon an injury done to what we love than to ourselves; but, at your request, Felix, I do forgive her. Go, watch my father, Flora, lest he should awake, and surprise us.

Flora. Yes, madam. [Exit.]

Fel. Dost thou, then, love me, Violante?

Vio. What need of repetition from my tongue, when every look confesses what you ask?

Fel. Oh, let no man judge of love but those who feel it! what wondrous magic lies in one kind look!—One tender word destroys a lover's rage, and melts his fiercest passion into soft complaint. Oh, the window, Violante! wouldst thou but clear that one suspicion—

Vio. Pr'ythee, no more of that, my Felix! a little time shall bring thee perfect satisfaction.

Fel. Well, Violante, on condition you think no more of a monastery, I'll wait with patience for this mighty secret.

Vio. Ah, Felix, love generally gets the better of religion in us women. [He kisses her hand.]

Enter FLORA, hastily

Flora. Oh, madam, madam, madam! my lord, your father, has been in the garden, and locked the back-door, and comes muttering this way into the house.

Vio. Then we are caught.—Now, Felix, we are undone.

Fel. Heavens forbid! This is most unlucky—I may conceal myself.

[Runs to the door and pushes it open a little.]

Vio. If he goes in, he'll find the Colonel! [Aside.]
—No, no, Felix, that's no safe place—[Running to him.]
—my father often goes thither—

Fel. Either my eye deceived me, or I saw a man within—I'll watch him close.

Flora. Oh, invention, invention!—I have it, madam.—Here, I'll fetch you a disguise. [Exit.]

Fel. She shall deal with the devil, if she conveys him out without my knowledge.

Enter FLORA, with a Riding-Hood.

Flora. Here, sir, put on this.

Fel. Ay, ay, any thing to avoid Don Pedro.

[They dress him in the habit of an old woman.]

Vio. Oh, quick, quick! I shall die with apprehension.

Flora. Be sure you don't speak a word.

Fel. Ay, ay, any thing to avoid Don Pedro. [Aside.]

Ped. [Within.] Violante, where are you, child?

Enter DON PEDRO.

Why, how came the garden-door open?—Ha! how now? who have we here?

Flora. 'Tis my mother, an't please you, sir.

[She and Felix both courtesies.]

Ped. Your mother! by St. Andrew, she's a strapper! why, you are a dwarf to her.—How many children have you got, good woman?

Flora. Oh dear, signior, she cannot hear you! she has been deaf these twenty years.

Ped. Alas, poor woman!—Why, you muffle her up as if she was blind too. Turn up her hood.

Vio. St. Antony forbid! Oh, sir, she has the dread-fullest unlucky eyes.—Pray don't look upon them; made her keep her hood shut on purpose.—Oh! oh! oh! oh!

Ped. Eyes!—Why, what's the matter with her eyes?

Flora. My poor mother, sir, is much afflicted with the cholick; and, about two months ago, she had it grievously in her stomach, and was over-persuaded to take a dram of filthy English geneva, which immediately flew up into her head, and caused such a defluxion in her eyes, that she could never since bear the daylight.

Ped. Say you so?—Poor woman!—Well, make her sit down, Violante, and give her a glass of wine.

Vio. Let her daughter give her a glass below, sir.—For my part, she has frightened me so I sha't be myself these two hours—I am sure her eyes are evil eyes.

Ped. Well, well, do so.—Evil eyes! there are no evil eyes, child.

Flora. Come along, mother. [Speaks aloud.]

Ped. Take care how you go down.

[Felix and Flora cross, and exeunt.]

Vio. I'm glad he's gone. [Aside.]

Ped. Hast thou heard the news, Violante?

Vio. What news, sir?

Ped. Why, Vasquez tells me that Don Lopez's daughter, Isabella, is run away from her father: that lord has very ill fortune with his children.—Well, I'm glad my daughter has no inclination to mankind, that my house is plagued with no suitors. [Aside.]

Vio. This is the first word ever I heard of it:—I pity her frailty—

Ped. Well said, Violante.—Next week I intend thy happiness shall begin.

Enter FLORA.

Vio. I don't intend to stay so long, thank you papa.

[Aside.]

Ped. My Lady Abbess writes word she longs to see thee, and has provided everything in order for thy reception.—Thou wilt lead a happy life, my girl—fifty times before that of matrimony—where an extravagant coxcomb might make a beggar of thee, or an ill-natured surly dog break thy heart.

Flora. Break her heart! she had as good have her bones broke as to be a nun! I am sure, I had rather of the two. You are wondrous kind, sir: but if I had such a father, I know what I would do.

Ped. Why, what would you do, minx, ha?

Flora. I would tell him I had as good a right and title to the law of nature, and the end of the creation, as he had.

Ped. You would, mistress; who the devil doubts it?—A good assurance is a chambermaid's coat of arms, and lying and contriving the supporters.—Your inclinations are on tiptoe, it seems.—If I were your father, housewife, I'd have a penance enjoined you so strict, that you should not be able to turn you in your bed for a month.—You are enough to spoil your lady, housewife, if she had not abundance of devotion.

Vio. Fie, Flora! are you not ashamed to talk thus to my father?—You said yesterday you would be glad to go with me into the monastery.

Flora. Did I? I told a great lie, then.

Ped. She go with thee! no, no, she's enough to debauch the whole convent.—Well, child, remember what I said to thee; next week—

Vio. Ay, and what I am to do this, too. [Aside.] I am all obedient, sir; I care not how soon I change my condition.

Flora. [In the background.] But little does he know what change she means. [Aside.]

Ped. Well, child, I am going into the country for two or three days, to settle some affairs with thy uncle, and when I return, we'll proceed for thy happiness, child.—Good b'ye, Violante; take care of thyself. [Exeunt DON PEDRO and VIOLANTE.]

Flora. So, now for the Colonel.—Hist, hist, Colonel!

Enter Colonel BRITON.

Col. B. Is the coast clear?

Flora. Yes, if you can climb; for you must get over the wash-house, and jump from the garden-wall, into the street.

Col. B. Nay, nay, I don't value my neck, if my incognita answers but thy lady's promise.

[Exeunt Colonel BRITON and FLORA.]

Enter DON FELIX.

Fel. I have lain perdue under the stairs till I watched the old man out. [VIOLANTE opens the door.] 'Sdeath! I am prevented. [FELIX retires.]

Enter DONNA VIOLANTE.

Vio. Now to set my prisoner at liberty. [Goes to the door where the colonel was hid.] Sir! sir! you may appear.

Enter DON FELIX, following her.

Fel. [Seizes her hand.] May he so, madam? I had cause for my suspicion, I find. Treacherous woman!

Vio. Ha! Felix here! Nay, then all is discovered!

Fel. [draws.] Villain, whoever thou art, come forth, I charge thee, and take the reward of thy adulterous errand.

Vio. What shall I say?

Fel. A coward! Nay, then, I'll fetch you out; think not to hide thyself; no, by St. Anthony, an altar should not protect thee! [Exit.]

Vio. What shall I do? I must discover Isabella, or here will be murder.

Enter FLORA.

Flora. I have helped the colonel off clear, madam.

Vio. Sayst thou so, my girl? Then I am armed.

Re-enter DON FELIX.

Fel. Where has the devil, in compliance to your sex, conveyed him from my resentment?

Vio. Him! whom do you mean, my dear inquisitive spark? [She sits.] Ha, ha, ha, ha! you will never leave these jealous whims.

Fel. Will you never cease to impose upon me?

Vio. You impose upon yourself, my dear. Do you think I did not see you? Yes, I did, and resolved to put this trick upon you.

Fel. Trick!

Vio. Yes, trick. I knew you'd take the hint, and soon relapse into your wonted error. How easily your jealousy is fired! I shall have a blessed life with you!

[Rises.]

Fel. Was there nothing in it, then, but only to try me?

Vio. Won't you believe your eyes?

Fel. My eyes! No, nor my ears, nor any of my senses; for they have all deceived me. Well, I am convinced that faith is as necessary in love as in religion; for the moment a man lets a woman know her conquest, he resigns his senses, and sees nothing but what she'd have him.

Vio. And as soon as that man finds his love returned, she becomes as arrant a slave as if she had already said after the priest.

Fel. [Takes her hand.] The priest, Violante, would dissipate those fears which cause these quarrels. When wilt thou make me happy?

Vio. To-morrow I will tell thee: my father is gone for two or three days to my uncle's; we have time enough to finish our affairs—But, prythee, leave me now, lest some accident should bring my father.

Fel. To-morrow, then—

Fly swift, ye hours, and bring to-morrow on!

But must I leave you now, my Violante?

Vio. You must, my Felix. We soon shall meet to part no more!

Fel. Oh, rapturous sounds! charming woman! Thy words and looks have fill'd my heart With joy, and left no room for jealousy. Do thou, like me, each doubt and fear remove, And all to come be confidence and love. [Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—Frederick's House.

Enter DON FELIX and FREDERICK.

Fel. This hour has been propitious: I am reconciled to Violante, and you assure me Antonio is out of danger.

Fred. Your satisfaction is doubly mine.

Enter LISSARDO.

Fel. What haste you made, sirrah, to bring me word if Violante went home!

Liss. I can give you very good reason for my stay, sir.—Yes, sir, she went home.

Fred. Oh, your master knows that, for he has been there himself, Lissardo.

Liss. Sir, may I beg the favour of your ear?

Fel. What have you to say?

[Retire, whisper, and Felix seems uneasy]

Fred. Ha! Felix changes colour at Lissardo's news! What can it be?

Fel. A Scots footman, that belongs to Colonel Briton, an acquaintance of Frederick's, say you? The devil! If she be false, by heaven I'll trace her.—Prythee, [Comes forward.] Frederick, do you know one Colonel Briton, a Scotsman?

[Exit LISSARDO.]

Fred. Yes: why do you ask me?

Fel. Nay, no great matter; but my man tells me that he has had some little differences with a servant of his, that's all.

Fred. He is a good, harmless, innocent fellow; I am sorry for it. The colonel lodges in my house; I knew him formerly in England, and met him here by accident last night, and gave him an invitation home. He is a gentleman of good estate, besides his commission; of excellent principles, and strict honour, I assure you.

Fel. Is he a man of intrigue?

Fred. Like other men, I suppose. Here he comes.

Enter Colonel BRITON.

Colonel, I began to think I had lost you.

Col. B. And not without some reason, if you knew all.

Fel. [Retiring.] There's no danger of a fine gentleman's being lost in this town, sir.

Col. B. That compliment don't belong to me, sir; but, I assure you, I have been very near being run away with.

Fred. Who attempted it?

Col. B. 'Faith, I know not—only that she is a charming woman; I mean, as much as I saw of her.

Fel. [Coming forward.] My heart swells with apprehension!—some accidental rencounter?

Fred. A tavern, I suppose, adjusted the matter.

Col. B. A tavern! no, no, sir; she is above that rank, I assure you: this nymph sleeps in a velvet bed, and has lodgings every way agreeable.

Fel. Ha! a velvet bed! I thought you said but now, sir, you knew her not.

Col. B. No more I do, sir.

Fel. How came you then so well acquainted with her bed?

Fred. Ay, ay; come, come, unfold.

Col. B. Why, then, you must know, gentlemen, that I was conveyed to her lodgings by one of Cupid's emissaries, called a chambermaid, in a chair, through fifty blind allies—who, by the help of a key, let me into a garden.

Fel. A garden! this must be Violante's garden.

[Aside.]

Col. B. From thence she conducted me into a spacious room, then dropped me a curtesy, told me her lady would wait on me presently; so, without unveiling, modestly withdrew.

Fel. Damn her modesty! this was Flora. [Aside.]

Fred. Well, how then, colonel?

Col. B. Then, sir, immediately, from another door, issued forth a lady, armed at both eyes, from whence such showers of darts fell round me, that, had I not been covered with the shield of another beauty, I had infallibly fallen a martyr to her charms; for, you must know, I just saw her eyes—Eyes, did I say? no, no, hold; I saw but one eye, though I suppose it had a fellow equally killing.

Fel. But how came you to see her bed, sir?

Col. B. 'Sdeath! this expectation gives a thousand racks.

[Aside.]

Col. B. Why, upon her maid's giving notice her father was coming, she thrust me into the bed-chamber.

Fel. Upon her father's coming!

Col. B. Ay, so she said; but, putting my ear to the key-hole of the door, I found it was another lover.

Fel. Confound the jilt! 'twas she without dispute!

[Aside.]

Fred. Ah, poor colonel! ha! ha!

Col. I discovered they had had a quarrel; but whether they were reconciled or not I can't tell, for the second alarm brought the father in good earnest, and had like to have made the gentleman and me acquainted, but she found some other stratagem to convey him out.

Fel. Contagion seize her, and make her body ugly as her soul! There is nothing left to doubt of now—'Tis plain 'twas she. [Fred. and Col. laughing.] Sure he knows me, and takes this method to insult me. 'Sdeath! I cannot bear it. [Aside.]

Fred. So, when she had dispatched her old lover, she paid you a visit in her bed-chamber—ha, colonel?

Col. B. No, plague take the impertinent puppy! he spoiled my diversion; and I saw her no more.

Fel. Very fine! Give me patience, Heaven, or I shall burst with rage. [Aside.]

Fred. That was hard.

Col. B. Nay, what was worse—But, Sir, dear sir, do hearken to this:—[To Felix.] The nymph that introduced me conveyed me out again, over the top of a high wall, where I ran the danger of having my neck broke, for the father, it seems, had locked the door by which I entered.

Fel. [Turning away.] That way I missed him—Damn her invention! [Aside.] Pray, colonel!—Ha! ha! ha! it's very pleasant, ha, ha!—Was this the same lady you met upon the Terriero de Passa this morning?

Col. B. 'Faith, I can't tell, sir; I had a design to know who that lady was, but my dog of a footman, whom I had ordered to watch her home, fell fast asleep. I gave him a good beating for his neglect, and I have never seen the rascal since.

Fred. Here he comes.

Enter GIBBY.

Col. B. Where have you been, sirrah?

Gibby. Troth, I've been seeking ye, an like yer honour, these two hours and mair. I bring ye glad teelings, sir.

Col. B. What, have you found the lady?

Gibby. Gude faith ha I, sir—and she's called Donna Violante, and her parent Don Pedro de Mendosa, and gin ye will gang wi' me, an like yer honour, Ise mak ye ken the hoose right weel.

Fel. Oh, torture! torture! [Aside.]

Col. B. Ha! Violante! that's the lady's name of the house where my incognita is; sure it could not be her; at least it was not the same house, I'm confident. [Aside.]

Fred. Violante! 'tis false; I would not have you credit him, colonel.

Gibby. The deel burst my bladder, sir, gin I lee.

Fel. [Runs across to Gibby.] Sirrah, I say you do lie, and I'll make you eat it, you dog! [Kicks him.] and if your master will justify you—

Col. B. Not I, faith, sir—I answer for nobody's lies but my own; if you please, kick him again.

Gibby. But gin he does Ise na tak it, sir, gin he was a thousand Spaniards. [Walks about in a passion.]

Col. B. I owed you a beating, sirrah, and I'm obliged to this gentleman for taking the trouble off my hands; therefore, say no more; d'ye hear, sir? [Aside to Gibby.]

Gibby. Troth dee I, sir, and feel tee.

[Gibby retires to background.]

Fred. This must be a mistake, colonel, for I know Violante perfectly well, and I am certain she would not meet you upon the Terriero de Passa.

Col. B. Don't be too positive, Frederick; now I have some reasons to believe it was that very lady.

Fel. You'd very much oblige me, sir, if you'd let me know these reasons.

Col. B. Sir!

Fel. Sir, I say, I have a right to inquire into these reasons you speak of.

Col. B. Ha! ha! really, sir, I cannot conceive how you, or any man, can have a right to inquire into my thoughts.

Fel. Sir, I have a right to every thing that relates to Violante—and he that traduces her fame, and refuses to give his reasons for it, is a villain. [Draws.]

Col. B. What the devil have I been doing! Now, blisters on my tongue by dozens! [Aside.]

Fred. Pr'ythee, Felix, don't quarrel till you know for what: this is all a mistake, I'm positive.

Col. B. Look ye, sir; that I dare draw my sword, I think will admit of no dispute. But though fighting's my trade, I'm not in love with it, and think it more honourable to decline this business than pursue it. This may be a mistake; however, I'll give you my honour never to have any affair, directly or indirectly, with Violante, provided she is your Violante; but if there should happen to be another of her name, I hope you would not engross all the Violantes in the kingdom.

Fel. Your vanity has given me sufficient reasons to believe I'm not mistaken. I'll not be imposed upon, sir.

Col. B. Nor I bullied, sir.

Fel. Bullied! 'Sdeath! such another word, and I'll nail thee to the wall.

Col. B. Are you sure of that, Spaniard? [Draws.]

Gibby. [Draws.] Say na mair, mon. O' my saul, here's twa to twa. Dinna fear, sir; Gibby stonds by ye for the honour of Scotland. [Vapours about.]

Fred. By St. Antony, you shan't fight [Interposes:] on bare suspicion: be certain of the injury, and then—

Fel. That I will this moment; and then, sir—I hope you are to be found—

Col. B. Whenever you please, sir. [Exit Felix.]

Gibby. Hoot awa, mon! there ne'er was a Scotsman yet that shamed to show his face. [Strutting about.]

Fred. So, quarrels spring up like mushrooms, in a minute. Violante and he were but just reconciled, and you have furnished him with fresh matter for falling out again; and I am certain, colonel, Gibby is in the wrong.

Gibby. Gin I be, sir, the mon that tald me leed; and gin he did, the deel be my landlord, and hell my winter-quarters, and a rape my winding-sheet, gin I dee not lick him as lang as I can haud a stick in my hond, now see ye.

Col. B. I am sorry for what I have said, for the lady's sake; but who could divine that she was his mistress? Pr'ythee, who is this warm spark?

Fred. He is the son of one of our graveeens, named Don Lopez de Pimentello; a very honest gentleman, but something passionate in what relates to his love. He is an only son, which may, perhaps, be one reason for indulging his passion.

Col. B. When parents have but one child, they either make a madman or a fool of him.

Fred. He is not the only child, he has a sister; but I think, through the severity of his father, who would have married her against her inclination, she has made her escape, and, notwithstanding he has offered five hundred pounds, he can get no tidings of her.

Col. B. Ha! how long has she been missing?

Fred. Nay, but since last night, it seems.

Col. B. Last night! The very time! How went she?

Fred. Nobody can tell; they conjecture, through the window.

Col. B. I'm transported! this must be the lady I caught. What sort of a woman is she?

Fred. Middle-sized, a lovely brown, a fine pout-ing lip, eyes that roll and languish, and seem to speak the exquisite pleasure her arms could give.

Col. B. Oh! I am fired with this description—'tis the very she. What's her name?

Fred. Isabella. You are transported, colonel.

Col. B. I have a natural tendency in me to the flesh, thou know'st—and who can hear of charms so exquisite, and yet remain unmoved? Oh, how I long for the appointed hour! I'll to the Terriero de Passa, and wait my happiness: if she fails to meet me, I'll once more attempt to find her at Violante's, in spite of her brother's jealousy. [Aside.] Dear Frederick, I beg your pardon, but I had forgot I was to meet a gentleman upon business at five: I'll endeavour to despatch him, and wait upon you again as soon as possible.

Fred. Your humble servant, Colonel. [Exit.]

Col. B. Gibby, I have no business with you at present. You may go to the devil. [Exit.]

Gibby. That's well. Now will I gang and seek this loon, and gar him gang with me to Don Pedro's hoose. Gin he'll no gang of himself, Ise gar him gang by the lug, sir. Gadswarbit! Gibby hates a leer. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Violante's Lodgings.

Enter VIOLANTE and ISABELLA.

Isab. The hour draws on, Violante, and now my heart begins to fail me; but I resolve to venture, for all that.

Vio. What, does your courage sink, Isabella?

Isab. Only the force of resolution a little retreated; but I'll rally it again, for all that.

Enter FLORA.

Flora. Don Felix is coming up, madam.

Isab. My brother! which way shall I get out?—Despatch him as soon as you can, dear Violante.

[Exit into the closet.]

Vio. I will.

Enter FELIX in a surly humour.

Felix, what brings you back so soon? did I not say to-morrow?

Fel. My passion chokes me; I cannot speak—Oh, I shall burst!

[Aside—Throws himself into a chair.]

Vio. Bless me! are you not well, my Felix?

Fel. Yes—No—I don't know what I am.

Vio. Hey-day! what's the matter now? another jealous whim?

Fel. With what an air she carries it!—I'm astonished at her impudence! [Aside.]

Vio. If I were in your place, Felix, I'd choose to stay at home when these fits of spleen were upon me, and not trouble such persons as are not obliged to bear with them.

[Here he affects to be careless of her.]

Fel. I am very sensible, madam, of what you mean: I disturb you, no doubt; but were I in a better humour, I should not incommode you less: I am too well convinced you could easily dispense with my visits.

Vio. When you behave yourself as you ought to do, no company so welcome—but when you reserve for me your ill-nature, I wave your merit, and consider what's due to myself. And I must be free to tell you, Felix, that these humours of yours will abate, if not absolutely destroy, the very principles of love.

Fel. [Rising.] And I must be so free to tell you, madam, that, since you have made such ill returns to the respect that I have paid you, all you do shall be indifferent to me for the future; and you shall find me abandon your empire with so little difficulty, that I'll convince the world your chains are not so hard to break as your vanity would tempt you to believe.—I cannot brook the provocation you give.

Vio. This is not to be borne—Insolent! you abandon! you! whom I have so often forbade ever to see me more! Have you not fallen at my feet? implored my favour and forgiveness? did you not trembling wait, and wish, and sigh, and swear yourself into my heart? Ungrateful man! if my chains are so easily broken as you pretend, then you are the silliest coxcomb living you did not break them long ago; and I must think him capable of brooking anything, on whom such usage could make no impression.

Fel. I always believed, madam, my weakness was the greatest addition to your power; you would be less imperious had my inclination been less forward to oblige you. You have indeed forbade me your sight, but your vanity even then assured you I would return, and I was fool enough to feed your pride. Your eyes, with all their boasted charms, have acquired their greatest glory in conquering me—and the brightest passage of your life is wounding this heart with such arms as pierce but few persons of my rank.

[Walks about.]

Vio. Matchless arrogance! True, sir, I should have kept measures better with you, if the conquest had been worth preserving; but we easily hazard what gives us no pain to lose. As for my eyes, you are mistaken if you think they have vanquished none but you: there are men above your boasted rank who have confessed their power, when their misfortune in pleasing you made them obtain such a disgraceful victory.

Fel. Yes, madam, I am no stranger to your victories. Vio. And what you call the brightest passage of my life is not the least glorious part of yours.

Fel. Ha, ha! don't put yourself in a passion, madam; for, I assure you, after this day, I shall give you no trouble. You may meet your sparks on the Terriero de Passa at four in the morning, without the least regard to me,—for when I quit your chamber, the world sha'n't bring me back.

Vio. I am so well pleased with your resolution, I don't care how soon you take your leave. But what you mean by the Terriero de Passa at four in the morning, I can't guess.

Fel. No, no, no! not you. You were not upon the Terriero de Passa at four this morning!

Vio. No, I was not; but if I were, I hope I may walk where I please, and at what hour I please, without asking your leave?

Fel. Oh, doubtless, madam!—and you might meet Colonel Briton there, and afterwards send your emissary to fetch him to your house—and, upon your father's coming in, thrust him into your bed-chamber—without asking my leave! 'Tis no business of mine, if you are exposed among all the footmen in town—nay, if they ballad you, and cry you about at a half-penny a-piece—they may, without my leave!

Vio. Audacious!—don't provoke me—don't: my reputation is not to be sported with [going up to him,] at this rate—no, sir, it is not. [Bursting into tears.] Inhuman Felix! [Sits.] Oh, Isabella! what a train of ills hast thou brought on me— [Aside.]

Fel. Ha! I cannot bear to see her weep—a woman's tears are far more fatal than our swords. [Aside.]—Oh, Violante!—Sdeath! what a dog am I! Now have I no power to stir.—Dost not thou know such a person as Colonel Briton? Pr'ythee, tell me. [Going to her.] Didst thou not meet him at four this morning upon the Terriero de Passa?

Vio. Were it not to clear my fame, I would not answer thee, thou black ingrate!—but I cannot bear to be reproached with what I even blush to think of, much less to act. By heaven! I have not seen the Terriero de Passa this day.

Fel. Did not a Scotch footman attack you in the street neither, Violante?

Vio. Yes—but he mistook me for another—or he was drunk, I know not which.

Fel. And do not you know this Scotch colonel?

Vio. Pray ask me no more questions: this night shall clear my reputation, and leave you without excuse for your base suspicions. More than this, I shall not satisfy you—therefore, pray leave me.

Fel. Didst thou ever love me, Violante?

Vio. I'll answer nothing—You was in haste to be gone just now; I should be very well pleased to be alone, sir.

[Sits down.]

Fel. I shall not interrupt your contemplation.—Stubborn to the last.

[Aside.]

Vio. Did ever woman involve herself as I have done!

Fel. Now would I give one of my eyes to be friends with her, for something whispers to my soul she is not guilty.—[He pauses, then takes a chair, and sits by her at a little distance, looking at her some time without speaking, then draws a little nearer to her.]—Give me your hand at parting, however, Violante, won't you—[He lays his hand upon her knee several times,] won't you—won't you—won't you?

Vio. [Half regarding him.] Won't I do what?

Fel. You know what I would have, Violante.—Oh, my heart!

Vio. [Smiling.] I thought my chains were easily broken.

[Lays her hand into his.]

Fel. [Draws his chair close to her, and kisses her hand.] Too well thou knowest thy strength.—Oh, my charming angel! my heart is all thy own. Forgive my hasty passion—'tis the transport of a love sincere. Oh, Violante! Violante!

Pedro. [Within.] Bid Sancho get a new wheel to my chariot presently.

Vio. Bless me, my father returned; what shall we do now, Felix? We are ruined past redemption.

Fel. No, no, no, my love, I can leap from the closet window. [Runs to the door where ISABELLA is, who claps to the door, and bolts it within.] Confusion! somebody bolts the door within. Oh, Violante! hast thou again sacrificed me to my rival?

[Draws.]

Vio. By heaven, thou hast no rival in my heart! Let that suffice. Nay, sure, you will not let my father find you here—Distraction!

Fel. Indeed but I shall—unless you command this door to be opened, and that way conceal me from his sight. [He struggles with her to come at the door.]

Vio. Hear me, Felix—though I were sure the refusing what you ask would separate us for ever, by all that's powerful, you shall not enter here. Either you do love me, or you do not: convince me by your obedience.

Fel. That's not the matter in debate—I will know who is in this closet, let the consequence be what it will. Nay, nay, you strive in vain—I will go in.

Vio. You shall not go—

Fel. I will go in.

Enter DON PEDRO.

Ped. Hey-day! what's here to do? I will go in,—and you sha'n't go in,—and I will go in. Why, who are you, sir?

Fel. 'Sdeath! what shall I say now?

Ped. Don Felix! Pray, what's your business in my house—ha, sir?

Vio. Oh, sir! what miracle returned you home so soon? Some angel 'twas that brought my father back, to succour the distressed. This ruffian, he—I cannot call him gentleman—has committed such an uncommon rudeness, as the most profligate wretch would be ashamed to own.

Fel. What does she mean?

[Aside.]

Vio. As I was at my devotion in my closet, I heard a loud knocking at my door, mixed with a woman's voice, which seemed to imply she was in danger. I flew to the door with the utmost speed, where a lady, veiled, rushed in upon me; who, falling on her knees, begged my protection from a gentleman who, she said, pursued her. I took compassion on her tears, and locked her into this closet; but in the surprise, having left open the door, this very person, whom you see with his sword drawn, ran in, protesting, if I did not give her up to his revenge, he'd force the door.

Fel. What the devil does she mean to do?—hang me?

[Aside.]

Vio. I strove with him till I was out of breath, and had you not come as you did, he must have entered. But he's in drink, I suppose; or he could not have been guilty of such an indecorum.

[Leering at FELIX.]

Ped. I am amazed!

Fel. The devil never failed a woman at a pinch:—what a tale has she formed in a minute! In drink, quotha! a good hint: I'll lay hold on't to bring myself off.

[Aside.]

Ped. Fie, Don Felix! No sooner rid of one broil, but you are commencing another? To assault a lady with a naked sword derogates much from the character of a gentleman, I assure you.

Fel. [Counterfeits drunkenness.] Who, I assault a lady—upon honour, the lady assaulted me, sir, and would have seized this body politic on the king's highway. Let her come out, and deny it if she can. Pray, sir, command the door to be opened; and let her prove me a liar, if she knows how.

Ped. Ay, ay! open the door, Violante, and let the lady come out. Come, I warrant thee he sha'n't hurt her.

Fel. No, no, I won't let the dear creature.—Now, now! which way will you come off now?

[Aside.]

Vio. [Unlocks the door.] Come forth, madam! None shall dare to touch your veil—I'll convey you out with safety, or lose my life. I hope she understands me.

[Aside.]

Enter ISABELLA, veiled.

Isab. Excellent girl!

[Exit.]

Fel. The devil! a woman! I'll see she be really so.

[Aside.]

Vio. [To FELIX.] Get clear of my father, and follow me to the Terriero de Passa, where all mistakes shall be rectified.

[Exit, with ISABELLA; DON FELIX offers to follow her.]

Ped. [Drawing his sword.] Not a step, sir, till the lady is past your recovery! I never suffer the laws of hospitality to be violated in my house, sir. I'll keep Don Felix here till you see her safe out, Violante! Come, sir, you and I will take a pipe and a bottle together.

Fel. Damn your pipe, and damn your bottle!—I hate drinking, and smoking, and how will you help yourself, old blue-bottle?

Ped. As to smoking or drinking, you have your liberty; but you shall stay, sir!

Fel. But I won't stay, sir—for I don't like your company; besides, I have the best reasons in the world for my not staying.

Ped. Ay, what's that?

Fel. Why, I'm going to be married—and so good bye.

Ped. To be married?—it can't be. Why, you are drunk, Felix.

Fel. Drunk! ay, to be sure; you don't think I'd go to be married if I were sober; but, drunk or sober, I am going to be married; and if you won't believe me, to convince you, I'll show you the contract, old gentleman.

Ped. Ay, do; come, let's see this contract, then.

Fel. Yes, yes, I'll show you the contract.—Here, sir—here's the contract. [Draws a pistol.]

Ped. [Starting.] Well, well, I'm convinced—go, go—pray go and be married, sir.

Fel. Yes, yes—I'll go—I'll go and be married; but sha'n't we take a bottle first?

Ped. No, no; pray, dear sir, go and be married.

Fel. Very well—very well! [Going.] But I insist upon your taking one glass, though.

Ped. No, not now—some other time—consider, the lady waits.

Fel. What a cross old fool!—first he will, and then he won't—and then he will, and then he won't! [Exit.]

Enter SANCHO.

San. Don Lopez de Pimentello is in the next room, signior.

Ped. What the devil does he want? he is not going to be married, too!—Bring him up—he's in pursuit of his son, I suppose! [Exit SANCHO.]

Enter DON LOPEZ.

Lop. I am glad to find you at home, Don Pedro: I was told that you were going into the country this afternoon.

Ped. That might be, my lord; but I had the misfortune to break the wheel of my chariot, which obliged me to return. What is your pleasure with me, my lord?

Lop. I am informed that my daughter is in your house.

Ped. That's more than I know, my lord: but here was your son, just now, as drunk as an emperor.

Lop. My son drunk! I never saw him in drink in my life.—Where is he, pray, sir?

Ped. Gone to be married.

Lop. Married!—to whom?—I don't know that he courted anybody!

Ped. Nay, I know nothing of that—but I'm sure he showed me the contract—Within, there!

Enter SANCHO.

Bid my daughter come hither; she'll tell you another story, my lord.

San. She's gone out in a chair, sir.

Ped. Out in a chair!—What do you mean, sir!

San. As I say, sir; and your daughter, Donna Isabella, went in another, just before her.

Lop. Isabella!

San. And Don Felix followed in another; I overheard them all bid the chairs go to the Terrier de Passa. [Exit.]

Ped. Ha! what business has my daughter there? I am confounded, and know not what to think. Within there! [Exit.]

Lop. My heart misgives me plaguily. Call me an alguazil—I'll pursue them straight. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—The Street before Don Pedro's House.

Enter LISSARDO.

Liss. I wish I could see Flora—methinks I have an hankering kindness after the slut—we must be reconciled.

Enter GIBBY.

Gibby. Aw my sal, sir, but Ise blithe to find yee here now.

Liss. Ha, brother! give me thy hand, boy.

Gibby. No se fast, se ye me—brether me ne brethers: I scorn a leer as muckle as a thiefe, se ye now, and ye must gang intul this house with me, and justifie to Donna Violante's face, that she was the lady that ganged in here this morn, se ye me, or the deel ha my saul, sir, but ye and I shall be twa folks.

Liss. Justify it to Donna Violante's face, quotha! For what?—Sure you don't know what you say!

Gibby. Troth de I, sir, as weel as ye de; therefore, come along, and make no mair words about it.

Liss. Why, what the devil do you mean? Don't you consider you are in Portugal?—Is the fellow mad?

Gibby. Fellow! Ise none of yer fellow, sir, and gin the place were hell, I'd gar ye do me justice.—[LISSARDO going.] Nay, the deel a feet ye gang.

[Lays hold of him, and knocks.]

Liss. Ha! Don Pedro himself! I wish I were fairly off. [Aside.]

Enter DON PEDRO.

Ped. How now? what makes you knock so loud?

Gibby. Gin this be Don Pedro's house, sir, I would speak with Donna Violante, his daughter.

Ped. Ha! What is it you want with my daughter, pray?

Gibby. An she be your daughter, an' lik your honour, command her to come out, and answer for herself now, and either justifie or disprove what this chiel told me this morn.

Ped. Why, what did he tell you? ha!

Gibby. By my saul, sir, Ise tell you aw the truth.—My master got a pratty lady upon the how-de-call't—Passa—here at five this morn, and he gar me watch her heam—and in troth I lodged her here: and meeting this ill-favoured thiefe, se ye me, I speered what she was—and he tald me her name was Donna Violante, Don Pedro de Mendosa's daughter.

Ped. Ha! my daughter with a man, abroad at five in the morning! Death, hell, and furies! By St. Anthony, I'm undone.

Gibby. Wounds, sir! ye put yer saint intul bonny company.

Ped. Who is your master, you dog, you?

Gibby. You dog, you! 'Sbleed, sir, you don't call names!—I won't tell you who my master is, se ye me, now.

Ped. And who are you, rascal, that know my daughter so well? ha! [Holds up his cane.]

Liss. What shall I say, to make him give this Scotch dog a good beating? [Aside.]—I know your daughter, signior! not I; I never saw your daughter in all my life!

Gibby. [Knocks him down with his fist.] Deel ha my saul, sir, gin ye get no your carich for that lie, now.

Ped. What, ho! where are all my servants?

Enter DON FELIX, DONNA VIOLANTE, COL. BRITON, and DONNA ISABELLA.

Raise the house in pursuit of my daughter!

Col. B. Hey-day! what's here to do?

Gibby. This is the loonlike tike, an like your honour, that sent me heam with a lee this morn.

Col. B. Come, come, 'tis all well, Gibby; let him rise.

Fel. This is a day of jubilee, Lissardo: no quarrelling with him this day.

Liss. A plague take his fists!—Egad, these Britons are but a word and a blow.

Enter Don Lopez.

Lop. So, have I found you, daughter! Then you have not hanged yourself yet, I see.

Col. B. But she is married, my lord.

Lop. Married! zounds! to whom?

Col. B. Even to your humble servant, my lord.—If you please to give us your blessing. [Kneels.]

Lop. Why, hark ye, mistress, are you really married?

Isab. Really so, my lord.

Lop. And who are you, sir?

Col. B. An honest North Briton by birth, and a colonel by commission, my lord.

Lop. An heretic! the devil!

[Holding up his hands.]

Ped. She has played you a slippery trick, indeed, my lord. Well, my girl, thou hast been to see thy friend married—next week thou shalt have a better husband, my dear.

[To VIOLANTE.]

Fel. Next week is a little too soon, sir: I hope to live longer than that.

Ped. What do you mean, sir? You have not made a rib of my daughter too, have you?

Vio. Indeed, but he has, sir: I know not how, but he took me in an unguarded minute, when my thoughts were not over-strong for a nunnery, father.

Lop. Your daughter has played you a slippery trick too, signior.

Ped. But your son shall never be the better for't, my lord; her twenty thousand pounds were left on certain conditions, and I'll not part with a shilling.

Lop. But we have a certain thing, called law, shall make you do justice, sir.

Ped. Well, we'll try that—my lord, much good may it do you with your daughter-in-law. [Erit.]

Lop. I wish you much joy of your rib. [Erit.]

Enter FREDERICK.

Fel. Frederick, welcome! I sent for thee to be partaker of my happiness, and pray give me leave to introduce you to the cause of it.

Fred. Your messenger has told me all, and I sincerely share in all your happiness.

Col. B. To the right about, Frederick—wish thy friend joy.

Fred. I do with all my soul—and, madam, I congratulate your deliverance. Your suspicions are cleared now, I hope, Felix?

Fel. They are, and I heartily ask the colonel pardon, and wish him happy with my sister; for love has taught me to know that every man's happiness consists in choosing for himself.

Liss. After that rule, I fix here. [To FLORA.]

Flora. That's your mistake; I prefer my lady's service, and turn you over to her that pleaded right and title to you to-day.

Liss. Choose, proud fool! I sha'n't ask you twice.

Gibby. What say ye now, lass? will ye gee yer hond to poor Gibby? Will ye dance the reel of Bogie with me?

Inis. That I may not leave my lady, I take you at your word; and though our wooing has been short, I'll, by her example, love you dearly.

Fel. Now, my Violante, I shall proclaim thy virtues to the world:

Let us no more the sex's conduct blame,
Since thou'rt a proof, to their eternal fame,
That man has no advantage, but the name.

[Exeunt omnes.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Tavern.

COLONEL FEIGNWELL and FREEMAN are discovered over a bottle.

Free. Come, Colonel, his majesty's health. You are as melancholy as if you were in love; I wish some of the beauties of Bath ha'n't snapt your heart.

Col. F. Why, 'faith, Freeman, there is something in't: I have seen a lady at Bath, who has kindled such a flame in me, that all the waters there can't quench.

Free. Is she not to be had, Colonel?

Col. F. That's a difficult question to answer; however, I resolve to try; perhaps you may be able to serve me; you merchants know one another. The lady told me herself she was under the charge of four persons.

Free. Odso! 'tis Miss Anne Lovely.

Col. F. The same; do you know her?

Free. Know her! ay. 'Faith, Colonel, your condition is more desperate than you imagine: why, she is the talk and pity of the whole town; and, it is the opinion of the learned, that she must die a maid.

Col. F. That's somewhat odd, in this charitable city. She's a woman, I hope?

Free. For aught I know; but it had been as well for her, had nature made her any other part of the creation. The man who keeps this house served her father; he is a very honest fellow, and may be of use to you: we'll send for him to take a glass with us; he'll give you her whole history, and 'tis worth your hearing.

Col. F. But may one trust him?

Free. With your life. I have obligations enough upon him, to make him do any thing: I serve him with wine. [Rings.]

Col. F. Nay, I know him very well myself. I once used to frequent a club that was kept here.

Enter Waiter.

Wai. Gentlemen, d'ye call?

Free. Ay; send up your master.

Wai. Yes, sir.

Col. F. Do you know any of this lady's guardians, Freeman? [Exit.]

Free. I know two of them very well.

Enter SACKBUT.

Free. Here comes one will give you an account of them all. Mr. Sackbut, we sent for you to take a glass with us. 'Tis a maxim among the friends of the bottle, that, as long as the master is in company, one may be sure of good wine.

Sack. Sir, you shall be sure to have as good wine as you send in. Colonel, your most humble servant; you are welcome to town.

Col. F. I thank you, Mr. Sackbut.

Sack. I am as glad to see you as I should a hundred tuns of French claret, custom free: my service to you, sir. [Drinks.] You don't look so merry as you used to do; aren't you well, Colonel?

Free. He has got a woman in his head, landlord; can you help him?

Sack. If 'tis in my power, I sha'n't scruple to serve my friend.

Col. F. 'Tis one perquisite of your calling.

Sack. Ay; at t'other end of the town, where you officers use, women are good forciers of trade: a well-customed house, a handsome bar-keeper, with clean, obliging drawers, soon get the master an estate; but our citizens seldom do any thing but cheat, within the walls. But, as to the lady, Colonel; point you at particulars? Or have you a good champagne stomach? Are you in full pay, or reduced, Colonel?

Col. F. Reduced, reduced, landlord!

Free. To the miserable condition of a lover.

Sack. Pish! that's preferable to half-pay: a woman's resolution may break before the peace: push her home, Colonel, there's no parleying with the fair sex.

Col. F. Were the lady her own mistress, I have some reasons to believe I should soon command in chief.

Free. You know Miss Lovely, Mr. Sackbut?

Sack. Know her! ay, poor Nancy! I have carried her to school many a frosty morning. Alas! if she's the woman, I pity you, Colonel; her father, my old master, was the most whimsical, out-of-the-way-tempered man, I ever heard of,—as you will guess by his last will and testament. This was his only child; and I have heard him wish her dead a thousand times. He died worth thirty thousand pounds, which he left to his daughter, provided she married with the consent of her guardians; but that she might be sure never to do so, he left her in the care of four men, as opposite to each other as the four elements; each has his quarterly rule, and three months in the year she is obliged to be subject to each of their humours; and they are pretty different, I assure you. She is just come from Bath.

Col. F. 'Twas there I saw her.

Sack. Ay, sir; the last quarter was her beau guardian's. She appears in all public places during his reign.

Col. F. She visited a lady, who boarded in the same house with me; I liked her person, and found an opportunity to tell her so. She replied, she had no objection to mine; but if I could not reconcile contradictions, I must not think of her; for that she was condemned to the caprice of four persons, who never yet agreed in any one thing, and she was obliged to please them all.

Sack. 'Tis most true, sir; I'll give you a short description of the men, and leave you to judge of the poor lady's condition. One is a kind of virtuosos, a silly, half-witted fellow, but positive and surly, fond of every thing antique and foreign, and wears his clothes of the fashion of the last century, doats upon travellers, and believes more of Sir John Mandeville than he does of the Bible.

Col. F. That must be a rare odd fellow.

Sack. Another is a change-broker; a fellow that will out-lie the devil for the advantage of stock, and cheat his father that got him, in a bargain; he is a great stickler for trade, and hates every man that wears a sword.

Free. He is a great admirer of the Dutch management, and swears they understand trade better than any nation under the sun.

Sack. The third is an old beau, that has May in his fancy and dress, but December in his face and his heels: he admires all new fashions, and those must be French; loves operas, balls, masquerades, and is always the most tawdry of the whole company on a birth-day.

Col. F. These are pretty opposite one to another, truly; and the fourth—what is he, landlord?

Sack. A very rigid quaker, whose quarter began this day. I saw Miss Lovely go in, not above two hours ago: Sir Philip set her down. What think you now, Colonel? Is not the poor lady to be pitied?

Col. F. Ay; and rescued, too, landlord.

Free. In my opinion that's impossible.

Col. F. There is nothing impossible to a lover. What would not a man attempt for a fine woman and thirty thousand pounds? Besides, my honour is at stake: I promised to deliver her, and she bid me win her, and wear her.

Sack. That's fair, 'faith!

Free. If it depended upon knight-errantry, I should not doubt your setting free the damsel; but to have avarice, impertinence, hypocrisy, and pride, at once to deal with, requires more cunning than generally attends a man of honour.

Col. F. My fancy tells me I shall come off with glory: I resolve to try, however. Do you know all the guardians, Mr. Sackbut?

Sack. Very well; they all use my house.

Col. F. And will you assist me, if occasion requires?

Sack. In every thing I can, Colonel.

Free. I'll answer for him.

Col. F. First, I'll attack my beau guardian: where lives he?

Sack. 'Faith, somewhere about St. James's; though, to say in what street, I cannot; but any chairman will tell where Sir Philip Modelove lives.

Free. Oh! you'll find him in the Park at eleven every day; at least, I never pass through at that hour without seeing him there. But what do you intend?

Col. F. To address him in his own way, and find what he designs to do with the lady.

Free. And what then?

Col. F. Nay, that I can't tell; but I shall take my measures accordingly.

Sack. Well, 'tis a mad undertaking, in my mind; but here's to your success, Colonel. [Drinks.]

Col. F. 'Tis something out of the way, I confess; but fortune may chance to smile, and I succeed.

Bold was the man who ventured first to sea,

But the first vent'ring lovers bolder were.

The path of love's a dark and dang'rous way,

Without a landmark, or one friendly star.

And he, that runs the risk, deserves the fair.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—An Apartment in Prim's house.

Enter Miss LOVELY and her Maid BETTY.

Betty. Bless me, madam! why do you fret and tease yourself so? This is giving them the advantage, with a witness!

Miss L. Must I be condemned all my life to the preposterous humours of other people, and pointed at by every boy in town? Oh! I could tear my flesh, and curse the hour I was born! Isn't it monstrously ridiculous, that they should desire to impose their quaking dress upon me at these years? When I was a child, no matter what they made me wear; but now—

Betty. I would resolve against it, madam; I'd see 'em hanged before I'd put on the pinched cap again.

Miss L. Then I must never expect one moment's ease: she has rung such a peal in my ears already, that I sha'n't have the right use of them this month. What can I do?

Betty. What can you not do, if you will but give your mind to it? Marry, madam.

Miss L. What! and have my fortune go to build churches and hospitals?

Betty. Why, let it go. If the Colonel loves you, as he pretends, he'll marry you without a fortune, madam; and, I assure you, a colonel's lady is no despicable thing.

Miss L. So, you would advise me to give up my own fortune, and throw myself upon the Colonel's?

Betty. I would advise you to make yourself easy, madam.

Miss L. That's not the way, I'm sure. No, no, girl; there are certain ingredients to be mingled with matrimony, without which I may as well change for the worse as the better. When the woman has fortune enough to make the man happy, if he has either honour or good manners, he'll make her easy. Love makes but a slovenly figure in a house, where poverty keeps the door.

Betty. And so you resolve to die a maid, do you, madam?

Miss L. Or have it in my power to make the man I love master of my fortune.

Betty. Then you don't like the Colonel so well as I thought you did, madam, or you would not take such a resolution.

Miss L. It is because I do like him, Betty, that I do take such a resolution.

Betty. Why, do you expect, madam, the Colonel can work miracles? Is it possible for him to marry you with the consent of all your guardians?

Miss L. Or he must not marry me at all; and so I told him; and he did not seem displeased with the news. He promised to set me free; and I, on that condition, promised to make him master of that freedom.

Betty. Well! I have read of enchanted castles, ladies delivered from the chains of magic, giants killed, and monsters overcome; so that I shall be the less surprised if the Colonel shall conjure you out of the power of your four guardians: if he does, I am sure he deserves your fortune.

Miss L. And shall have it, girl, if it were ten times as much; for I'll ingenuously confess to thee, that I do love the Colonel above all the men I ever saw: there's something so jaunty in a soldier, a kind of je ne sais quoi air, that makes them more agreeable than all the rest of mankind. They command regard, as who shall say, "We are your defenders; we preserve your beauties from the insults of rude and unpollished foes, and ought to be preferred before those lazy, indolent mortals, who, by dropping into their fathers' estates, set up their coaches, and think to rattle themselves into your affections."

Betty. Nay, madam, I confess that the army has engrossed all the prettiest fellows. A laced coat and feather have irresistible charms.

Miss L. But the Colonel has all the beauties of the mind, as well as the body. O, all ye powers that favour happy lovers, grant that he may be mine! Thou god of love, if thou be'st aught but name, assist my Feignwell!

*Point all thy darts to aid his just design,
And make his plots as prevalent as thine.*

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Park.

Sir Philip MODELOVE discovered upon a bench, with a Woman, masked.

Sir P. Well but, my dear, are you really content to your keeper?

Wom. Yes, really, sir. Heyday! who comes yonder? He cuts a mighty figure.

Sir P. Ha! a stranger, by his equipage keeping so close at his heels. He has the appearance of a man of quality: positively French, by his dancing air.

Wom. He crosses, as if he meant to sit down here.

Sir P. He has a mind to make love to thee, child.

Enter Colonel FEIGNWELL.

Wom. It will be to no purpose, if he does.

Sir P. Are you resolved to be cruel, then?

Col. F. Your must be very cruel, indeed, if you can deny anything to so fine a gentleman, madam.

[Takes out his watch.]

Wom. I never mind the outside of a man.

Col. F. And I'm afraid thou art no judge of the inside.

Sir P. I am positively of your mind, sir; for creatures of her function seldom penetrate beyond the pocket.

Wom. Coxcombs!

[Aside and exit.]

Sir P. Pray what says your watch? mine is down.

[Pulling out his watch.]

Col. F. I want thirty-six minutes of twelve, sir.

[Puts up his watch, and takes out his snuff-box.]

Sir P. May I presume, sir—

Col. F. Sir, you honour me. [Presenting the box.]

Sir P. He speaks good English; though he must be a foreigner. [Aside.] This snuff is extremely good, and the box prodigious fine: the work is French, I presume, sir.

Col. F. I bought it in Paris, sir. I do think the workmanship pretty neat.

Sir P. Neat! 'tis exquisitely fine, sir! Pray, sir, if I may take the liberty of inquiring,—what country is so happy to claim the birth of the finest gentlemen in the universe? France, I presume.

Col. F. Then you don't think me an Englishman?

Sir P. No, upon my soul, don't I.

Col. F. I am sorry for it.

Sir P. Impossible you should wish to be an Englishman! Pardon me, sir, this island could not produce a person of such alertness.

Col. F. As this mirror shews you, sir. [Puts up a pocket-glass to Sir Philip's face.] I know not how to distinguish you, sir; but your mien and address speak you right honourable.

Sir P. Thus great souls judge of others by themselves. I am only adorned with knighthood: that's all, I assure you, sir; my name is Sir Philip Modelove.

Col. F. Of French extraction?

Sir P. My father was French.

Col. F. One may plainly perceive it. There is a certain gaiety peculiar to our nation, (for I will own myself a Frenchman,) which distinguishes us every where. A person of your figure would be a vast addition to a coronet.

Sir P. I must own I had the offer of a barony about five years ago; but I abhorred the fatigue which must have attended it. I could never yet bring myself to join with either party.

Col. F. You are perfectly in the right, Sir Philip:—a fine person should not embark himself in the slovenly concern of politics: dress and pleasure are objects proper for the soul of a fine gentleman.

Sir P. And love!

Col. F. Oh! that's included under the article of pleasure.

Sir P. Parbleu! il est un homme d'esprit. May I crave your name, sir?

Sir P. My name is La Feignwell, sir, at your service.

Sir P. The La Feignwells are French, I know; though the name is become very numerous in Great Britain, of late years. I was sure you was French the moment I laid my eyes upon you: I could not come into the supposition of your being an Englishman: this island produces few such ornaments.

Col. F. Are you married, Sir Philip?

Sir P. No; nor do I believe I shall ever enter into that honourable state; I have an absolute tendresse for the whole sex.

Col. F. That's more than they have for you, I dare swear. [Aside.] I find I was very much mistaken. I imagined you had been married to that young lady whom I saw in the chariot with you this morning in Gracechurch-street.

Sir P. Who, Nancy Lovely? I am a piece of a guardian to that lady. You must know, her father, I thank him, joined me with three of the most preposterous old fellows—that, upon my soul, I am in pain for the poor girl: she must certainly lead apes; ha, ha!

Col. F. That's a pity, Sir Philip. If the lady would give me leave, I would endeavour to avert that curse.

Sir P. As to the lady, she'd gladly be rid of us at any rate, I believe; but here's the mischief—he who marries Miss Lovely, must have the consent of us all four, or not a penny of her portion. For my part, I shall never approve of any but a man of figure; and the rest are not only averse to cleanliness, but have each a peculiar taste to gratify. For my part, I declare I would prefer you to all men I ever saw.

Col. F. And I her, to all women.

Sir P. I assure you, Mr. Feignwell, I am for marrying her; for I hate the trouble of a guardian, especially among such wretches. But I resolve never to agree to the choice of any one of them; and I fancy they'll be even with me, for they never came into any proposal of mine yet.

Col. F. I wish I had leave to try them, Sir Philip.

Sir P. With all my soul, sir; I can refuse a person of your appearance nothing.

Col. F. Sir, I am infinitely obliged to you.

Sir P. But do you really like matrimony?

Col. F. I believe I could with that lady.

Sir P. The only point in which we differ. But you are master of so many qualifications, that I can excuse one fault; for I must think it a fault in a fine gentleman; and that you are such, I'll give it under my hand.

Col. F. I wish you'd give me your consent to marry Miss Lovely, under your hand, Sir Philip.

Sir P. I'll do't, if you'll step into St. James's coffee-house, where we may have pen and ink; though I can't force what advantage my consent will be to you, without you can find a way to get the rest of the guardians; but I'll introduce you, however. She is now at a quaker's, where I carried her this morning, when you saw us in Gracechurch-street. I assure you she has an odd ragout of guardians, as you will find when you hear the characters, which I'll endeavour to give you as we go along. Hey! Pierre, Jacques, Reuno! Where are ye all, scoundrels? Order the chariot to St. James's coffee-house.

Col. F. Le Noire, La Brun, La Blanc! Morbleu, ou sont ces coquins la? Allons, Monsieur le Chevalier.

Enter three Servants.

Sir P. Ah! Pardonnez moi, monsieur.

Col. F. Not one step upon my soul, Sir Philip.

Sir P. The best bred man in Europe, positively. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Obadiah Prim's House.

Enter Miss LOVELY and Mrs. PRIM.

Mrs. P. Then thou wilt not obey me; and thou dost really think those fallals become thee?

Miss L. I do, indeed.

Mrs. P. Now will I be judged by all sober people, if I don't look more like a sober woman than thou dost, Anne.

Miss L. More like a hypocrite you mean, Mrs. Prim.

Mrs. P. Ah! Anne, Anne, that wicked Philip Modelove will undo thee. Satan so fills thy heart with pride, during the three months of his guardianship, that thou becomest a stumbling-block to the upright.

Miss L. Pray, who are they? Are the pinched cap and formal hood the emblems of sanctity? Does your virtue consist in your dress, Mrs. Prim?

Mrs. P. It does not consist in cut hair, spotted face, and a bare neck. Oh, the wickedness of the generation! The primitive women knew not the abomination of short petticoats.

Miss L. No; nor the abomination of cant neither. Don't tell me, Mrs. Prim, don't; I know you have as much pride, vanity, self-conceit, and ambition among you, couched under that formal habit and sanctified countenance, as the proudest of us all; but the world begins to see your prudery.

Mrs. P. Prudery! What! do they invent new words as well as new fashions? Ah! poor, fantastic age, I pity thee. Poor deluded Anne, which dost thou think most resembleth the saint, and which the sinner, thy dress or mine? Thy naked bosom allureth the eye of the by-stander, encourageth the frailty of human nature, and corrupteth the soul with evil longings.

Miss L. And pray who corrupted your son Tobias with longings? Your maid Tabitha were a handkerchief, and yet he made the saint a sinner.

Mrs. P. Well, well, spit thy malice. I confess Satan did buffet my son Tobias, and my servant Tabitha: the evil spirit was at that time too strong, and they both became subject to its workings; not from any outward provocation, but from an inward call: he was not tainted with the rottenness of the fashions, nor did his eyes take in the drunkenness of beauty.

Miss L. No! that's plainly to be seen.

Mrs. P. Tabitha is one of the faithful; he fell not with a stranger.

Miss L. So! then you hold wenching no crime, provided it be within the pale of your own tribe. You are an excellent casuist, truly!

Enter Obadiah PRIM.

Obad. Not stripped of thy vanity yet, Anne! Why dost thou not make her put it off, Sarah?

Mrs. P. She will not do it.

Obad. Verily thy naked bosom troubleth my outward man: put on a handkerchief, Anne Lovely.

Miss L. I hate handkerchiefs when 'tis not cold weather, Mr. Prim.

Mrs. P. I have seen thee wear a handkerchief, in the middle of July.

Miss L. Ay, to keep the sun from scorching me.

Obad. If thou couldst not bear the sunbeams, how dost thou think man can bear thy beams?

Miss L. Let me be quiet, I say. Must I be tormented thus for ever? Sure no woman's condition ever equalled mine! Foppery, folly, avarice, and hypocrisy, are, by turns, my constant companions. I cannot think my father meant this tyranny. No, you usurp an authority which he never intended you should take.

Obad. Hark thee, dost thou call good counsel tyranny? Do I or my wife tyrannise, when we desire thee in all love to put off thy tempting attire?

Miss L. I wish I were in my grave! Kill me rather than treat me thus.

Obad. Kill thee! Ha, ha! thou thinkest thou art acting some lewd play sure. Kill thee! Art thou prepared for death, Anne Lovely? No, no; thou would'st rather have a husband, Anne. Thou wantest a gilt coach, with six lazy fellows behind, to flaunt it in the ring of vanity, among the princes and rulers of the land, who pamper themselves with the fatness thereof; but I will take care that none shall squander away thy father's estate; thou shalt marry none such, Anne.

Miss L. Would you marry me to one of your own canting sect?

Obad. Yea, verily, no one else shall ever get my consent, I do assure thee, Anne.

Miss L. And I do assure thee, Obadiah, that I will as soon turn papist, and die in a convent.

Mrs. P. O wickedness!

Miss L. O stupidity!

Obad. O blindness of heart!

Miss L. Thou blinder of the world, don't provoke me, lest I betray your sanctity, and leave your wife to judge of your purity! What were the emotions of your spirit, when you squeezed Mary by the hand last night in the pantry? Don't you remember, Mr. Prim?

Mrs. P. What does she say, Obadiah?

Obad. She talketh unintelligibly, Sarah. Which way did she hear this? This should not have reach'd the ears of the wicked ones. Verily it troubleth me.

[Aside.]

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Philip Modelove, whom they call Sir Philip, is below, and such another with him; shall I send them up?

Obad. Yea. [Exit Servant.]

Enter Sir PHILIP MODELLOVE and Colonel FEIGNWELL.

Sir P. How dost thou do, friend Prim? Odo! my she friend here too! What, are you documenting Miss Nancy? Reading her a lecture upon the pinch'd coif, I warrant ye!

Mrs. P. I am sure thou didst never read her any lecture that was good. My flesh so riseth at these wicked ones, that prudence adviseth me to withdraw from their sight.

Col. F. Oh, that I could find means to speak with her! How charming she appears! I wish I could get this letter into her hand.

Sir P. Well, miss, I hope thou hast got the better of them.

Miss L. The difficulties of my life are not to be surmounted, Sir Philip. I hate the impertinence of him as much as the stupidity of the other. [Aside.]

Obad. Verily, Philip, thou wilt spoil this maiden.

Sir P. I find we still differ in opinion; but that we may none of us spoil her, pr'ythee, Prim, let us consent to marry her. I have sent for our brother Quarrant to meet me here about this very thing. Madam, will you give me leave to recommend a husband to you? Here's a gentleman, whom, in my mind, you can have no objection to.

[Presents the Colonel to her; she looks another way.]

Miss L. Heaven deliver me from the formal and the fantastic fool!

Col. F. A fine woman,—a fine horse, and fine equipage, are the finest things in the universe; and if I am so happy to possess you, madam, I shall become the envy of mankind, as much as you outshine your whole sex.

[As he takes her hand to kiss it, he endeavours to put a letter into it; she lets it drop; PRIM takes it up.]

Miss L. I have no ambition to appear conspicuously ridiculous, sir. [Turning from him.]

Col. F. So fail the hopes of Feignwell.

Miss L. Ha! Feignwell! 'tis he! What have I done! Prim has the letter, and it will be discovered.

[Aside.]

Obad. Friend, I know not thy name, so cannot call thee by it; but thou seest thy letter is unwellcome to the maiden: she will not read it.

Miss L. Nor shall you: [snatches the letter.] I'll tear it in a thousand pieces, and scatter it, as I will the hopes of all those that any of you shall recommend to me.

[Tears the letter.]

Sir P. Ha! right woman, 'faith!

Col. F. Excellent woman!

[Aside.]

Obad. Friend, thy garb savoureth too much of the vanity of the age for my approbation; nothing that resembleth Philip Modelove, shall I love. Mark that, therefore, friend Philip; bring no more of thy own apes under my roof.

Sir P. I am so entirely a stranger to the monsters of thy breed, that I shall bring none of them, I am sure.

Col. F. I am likely to have a pretty task by the time I have gone through them all; but she's a city worth taking, and egad I'll carry on the siege: if I can but blow up the out-works, I fancy I am pretty secure of the town.

[Aside.]

Enter Servant.

Serv. Toby Periwinkle and Thomas Tradelove demand to see thee.

[To Sir PHILIP.]

Sir P. Bid them come up.

[Exit Servant.]

Miss L. Deliver me from such an inundation of noise and nonsense. Oh, Feignwell! whatever thy contrivance be, prosper it, heaven!

[Exit.]

Sir P. Sic transit gloria mundi!

Enter PERIWINKLE and TRADELOVE.

These are my brother guardians, Mr. Feignwell. Pr'ythee observe the creatures.

[Aside to Col. FEIGNWELL.]

Trade. Well, Sir Philip, I obey your summons.

Per. Pray what have you to offer for the good of Miss Lovely, Sir Philip?

Sir P. First, I desire to know what you intend to do with that lady? Must she be sent to the Indies for a venture, or live an old maid; and then be entered amongst your curiosities, and shewn for a monster, Mr. Periwinkle?

Col. F. Humph! curiosities; that must be the virtuoso.

[Aside.]

Per. Why what would you do with her?

Sir P. I would recommend this gentleman to her for a husband, sir; a person whom I have picked out from the whole race of mankind.

Obad. I would advise thee to shuffle him again with the rest of mankind; for I like him not.

Col. F. Pray, sir, without offence to your formality, what may be your objections?

Obad. Thy person, thy manners, thy dress, thy acquaintance, thy everything, friend.

Sir P. You are most particularly obliging, friend. Ha, ha!

Trade. What business do you follow, pray, sir?

Col. F. Humph! by that question he must be the broker. [Aside.] Business, sir? the business of a gentleman.

Trade. That is as much as to say, you dress fine, feed high, and pay your debts of honour better than your tailor's or your butcher's.

Col. F. The court is much obliged to you, sir, for your character of a gentleman.

Trade. The court, sir! What would the court do without us citizens?

Sir P. Without your wives and daughters, you mean, Mr. Tradelove.

Per. Have you ever travelled, sir?

Col. F. That question must not be answered now. [Aside.] In books I have, sir.

Per. In books! That's fine travelling indeed! Sir Philip, when you present a person I like, he shall have my consent to marry Miss Lovely; till then, your servant. [Exit.]

Col. F. I'll make you like me before I have done with you, or I am mistaken. [Aside.]

Trade. And when you can convince me that a beau is more useful to my country than a merchant, you shall have mine; till then you must excuse me. [Exit.]

Col. F. So much for trade. I'll fit you too. [Aside.]

Sir P. In my opinion, this is very inhuman treatment, as to the lady, Mr. Prim.

Obad. Thy opinion and mine happen to differ as much as our occupations, friend: business requireth my presence, and folly thine; and so I must bid thee farewell. [Exit.]

Sir P. Here's breeding for you, Mr. Feignwell! 'Gad take me.

Half my estate I'd give to see 'em bit. [Aside.]

Col. F. I hope to bite you all, if my plot hit.

[Eseunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Tavern.

Col. FEIGNWELL is discovered in an Egyptian dress, with SACKBUT.

Sack. A lucky beginning, Colonel; you have got the old beau's consent.

Col. F. Ay, he's a reasonable creature; but the other three will require some pains. Shall I pass upon him, think you? Egad, in my mind, I look as antique as if I had been preserved in the ark.

Sack. Pass upon him! ay, ay, if you have assurance enough.

Col. F. I have no apprehension from that quarter; assurance is the cockade of a soldier.

Sack. Ay, but the assurance of a soldier differs much from that of a traveller. Can you lie with a good grace?

Col. F. As heartily, when my mistress is the prize, as I would meet the foe when my country called and king commanded; so don't you fear that part: if he don't know me again, I am safe. I hope he'll come.

Sack. I wish all my debts would come as sure: I told him you had been a great traveller, had many valuable curiosities, and was a person of most singular taste: he seemed transported, and begged me to keep you till he came.

Col. F. Ay, ay, he need not fear my running away. Let's have a bottle of sack, landlord; our ancestors drank sack.

Sack. You shall have it.

Col. F. And whereabouts is the trap-door you mentioned?

Sack. There's the conveyance, sir. [Exit.]

Col. F. Now, if I should cheat all these roguish guardians, and carry off my mistress in triumph, it would be what the French call a grand coup d'éclat. Odso! here comes Periwinkle. Ah! deuce take this beard; pray Jupiter it does not give me the slip and spoil all.

Enter SACKBUT, with wine, and PERIWINKLE following

Sack. Sir, this gentleman hearing you have been a great traveller, and a person of fine speculation, begs leave to take a glass with you; he is a man of a curious taste himself.

Col. F. The gentleman has it in his face and garb. Sir, you are welcome.

Per. Sir, I honour a traveller and men of your inquiring disposition; the oddness of your habit pleases me extremely; 'tis very antique, and for that I like it.

Col. F. 'Tis very antique, sir. This habit once belonged to the famous Claudius Ptolomeus, who lived in the year one hundred and thirty-five.

Sack. If he keeps up to the sample, he shall lie with the devil for a bean-stack, and win it every straw. [Aside.]

Per. A hundred and thirty-five! why, that's prodigious now! Well, certainly 'tis the finest thing in the world to be a traveller.

Col. F. For my part, I value none of the modern fashions a fig-leaf.

Per. No more don't I, sir; I had rather be the jest of a fool than his favourite. I am laughed at here for my singularity. This coat, you must know, sir, was formerly worn by that ingenious and very learned person, Mr. John Tradescant, of Lambeth.

Col. F. John Tradescant! Let me embrace you, sir. John Tradescant was my uncle, by my mother's side; and I thank you for the honour you do his memory: he was a very curious man indeed.

Per. Your uncle, sir! Nay, then 'tis no wonder that your taste is so refined; why you have it in your blood. My humble service to you, sir: to the immortal memory of John Tradescant, your never-to-be-forgotten uncle. [Drinks.]

Col. F. Give me a glass, landlord.

Per. I find you are primitive, even in your wine. Canary was the drink of our wise forefathers; 'tis balsamic, and saves the charge of apothecaries' cordials. Oh! that I had lived in your uncle's days! or rather, that he were now alive! Oh! how proud he'd be of such a nephew. A person of your curiosity must have collected many rarities.

Col. F. I have some, sir, which are not yet come ashore; as an Egyptian idol:—

Per. Pray what may that be?

Col. F. It is, sir, a kind of an ape, which they formerly worshipped in that country; I took it from the breast of a female mummy.

Per. Ha, ha! our women retain part of their idolatry to this day; for many an ape lies on a lady's breast. Ha, ha!—

Sack. A smart old thief.

Col. F. Two tusks of an hippopotamus, two pair of Chinese nut-crackers, and one Egyptian mummy.

Per. Pray, sir, have you never a crocodile?

Col. F. Humph! the boatswain brought one with a design to shew it; but touching at Rotterdam, and hearing it was no rarity in England, he sold it to a Dutch poet. Lookye, sir, do you see this little phial?

Per. Pray you what is it?

Col. F. This is called polufosboio.

Per. Polufosboio! It has a rumbling sound.

Col. F. Right, sir; it proceeds from a rumbling nature. This water was part of those waves which bore Cleopatra's vessel when she sailed to meet Antony.

Per. Well, of all that travelled, none had a taste like you.

Col. F. But here's the wonder of the world. This, sir, is called zona, or moros musphonon; the virtues of this are inestimable.

Per. Moros musphonon? What in the name of wisdom can that be? To me it seems a plain belt.

Col. F. This girdle has carried me all the world over.

Per. You have carried it, you mean.

Col. F. I mean as I say, sir. Whenever I am girded with this, I am invisible! and by turning this little screw, can be in the court of the great Mogul, the grand Signior, and king George, in as little time as your cook can poach an egg.

Per. You must pardon me, sir; I can't believe it.

Col. F. If my landlord pleases, he shall try the experiment immediately.

Sack. I thank you kindly, sir; but I have no inclination to ride post to the devil.

Col. F. No, no, you shan't stir a foot; I'll only make you invisible.

Sack. But if you could not make me visible again.

Per. Come, try it upon me, sir; I am not afraid of the devil nor all his tricks. 'Sbud, I'll stand 'em all.

Col. F. There, sir, put it on. Come landlord, you and I must face the east. [They turn about.] Is it on, sir?

Per. 'Tis on. [They turn about again.]

Sack. Heaven protect me! where is he?

Per. Why here, just where I was.

Sack. Where, where in the name of virtue? Ah, poor Mr. Periwinkle! Egad, look to't, you had best, sir; and let him be seen again, or I shall have you burnt for a wizard.

Col. F. Have patience, good landlord.

Per. But really don't you see me now?

Sack. No more than I see my grandmother, that died forty years ago.

Per. Are you sure you don't lie? Methinks I stand just where I did, and see you as plain as I did before.

Sack. Ah! I wish I could see you once again.

Col. F. Take off the girdle, sir. [He takes it off.]

Sack. Ah! sir, I am glad to see you with all my heart. [Embraces him.]

Per. This is very odd; certainly there must be some trick in't. Pray, sir, will you do me the favour to put it on yourself?

Col. F. With all my heart.

Per. But first I'll secure the door.

Col. F. You know how to turn the screw, Mr. Sackbut.

Sack. Yes, yes. Come, Mr. Periwinkle, we must turn full east.

[They turn; the Colonel sinks through the trap-door.]

Col. F. 'Tis done; now turn. [They turn.]

Per. Ha! mercy upon me; my flesh creeps upon my bones. This must be a conjuror, Mr. Sackbut.

Sack. He's the devil, I think.

Per. Oh! Mr. Sackbut, why do you name the devil, when perhaps he may be at your elbow?

Sack. At my elbow! Marry, heaven forbid!

Col. F. Are you satisfied? [From under the stage.]

Per. Yes, sir, yes. How hollow his voice sounds!

Sack. Yours seemed just the same. 'Faith, I wish this girdle were mine, I'd sell wine no more. Harkye! Mr. Periwinkle, [Takes him aside till the Colonel rises again.] if he would sell this girdle, you might travel with great expedition.

Col. F. But it is not to be parted with for money.

Per. I am sorry for't, sir; because I think it the greatest curiosity I ever heard of.

Col. F. By the advice of a learned physiognomist in Grand Cairo, who consulted the lines in my face, I returned to England, where he told me I should find a rarity in the keeping of four men, which I was born to possess for the benefit of mankind; and the first of the four that gave me his consent, I should present him with this girdle. Till I have found this jewel, I shall not part with the girdle.

Per. What can this rarity be? Didn't he name it to you?

Col. F. Yes, sir; he call'd it a chaste, beautiful, unaffected woman.

Per. Pish! women are no rarities. Women are the very gewgaws of the creation; playthings for boys, which when they write man they ought to throw aside.

Sack. A fine lecture to be read to a circle of ladies!

[Aside.]

Per. What woman is there, dressed in all the pride and foppery of the times, can boast of such a foretop as the cockatoo?

Col. F. I must humour him. [Aside.] Such a skin as the lizard?

Per. Such a shining breast as the humming-bird?

Col. F. Such a shape as the antelope?

Per. Or, in all the artful mixture of their various dresses, have they half the beauty of one box of butterflies?

Col. F. No; that must be allowed. For my part, if it were not for the benefit of mankind, I'd have nothing to do with them; for they are as indifferent to me as a sparrow, or a flesh-fly.

Per. Pray, sir, what benefit is the world to reap from this lady?

Col. F. Why, sir, she is to bear me a son, who shall revive the art of embalming, and the old Roman manner of burying the dead; and, for the benefit of posterity, he is to discover the longitude, so long sought for in vain.

Per. Od! these are valuable things, Mr. Sackbut!

Sack. He hits it off admirably; and 't'other swallows it like sack and sugar. [Aside.] Certainly, this lady must be your ward, Mr. Periwinkle, by her being under the care of four persons.

Per. By the description, it should. Egad, if I could get that girdle, I'd ride with the sun, and make the tour of the world in four-and-twenty hours. [Aside.] And you are to give that girdle to the first of the four guardians that shall give you his consent to marry that lady, say you, sir?

Col. F. I am so ordered, when I can find him.

Per. I fancy I know the very woman; her name is Anne Lovely.

Col. F. Excellent! He said, indeed, that the first letter of her name was L.

Per. Did he really? Well, that's prodigiously amazing, that a person in Grand Cairo should know anything of my ward?

Col. F. Your ward?

Per. To be plain with you, sir, I am one of those four guardians.

Col. F. Are you indeed, sir! I am transported to find that the very man who is to possess this moros musphonon is a person of so curious a taste. Here is a writing drawn up by that famous Egyptian, which, if you will please to sign, you must turn your face full north, and the girdle is your's.

Per. If I live till the boy is born, I'll be embalmed, and sent to the Royal Society when I die.

Col. F. That you shall, most certainly.

Enter Waiter.

Waiter. Here's Mr. Staytape, the tailor, inquires for you, Colonel.

Col. F. Who do you speak to, you son of a whore?

Per. Ha! Colonel!

Col. F. Confound the blundering dog!

Waiter. Why to Colonel—

Sack. Get you out, you rascal.

[Kicks him out, and goes after him.]

Per. What the devil is the matter?

Col. F. This dog has ruined all my schemes, I see by Periwinkle's looks.

Per. How finely I should have been choused. Colonel, you'll pardon me that I did not give you your title before. It was pure ignorance, 'faith it was. Pray,—hem—hem! Pray, Colonel, what post had this learned Egyptian in your regiment?

Col. F. A plague of your sneer! [Aside.] I don't understand you, sir.

Per. No! that's strange! I understand you, Colonel. An Egyptian of Grand Cairo! ha, ha, ha! I'm sorry such a well-invented tale should do you no more service. We old fellows can see as far into a millstone as them that pick it. I am not to be tricked out of my trust; mark that.

Col. F. The devil! I must carry it off; I wish I were fairly out. [Aside.] Lookye, sir, you may make what jest you please, but the stars will be obeyed, sir; and depend upon't I shall have the lady, and you none of the girdle. Now for Mr. Freeman's part of the plot.

Per. The stars! Ha, ha! No star has favoured you, it seems. The girdle! Ha, ha, ha! None of your legerdmain tricks can pass upon me. Why, what a pack of trumpery has this rogue picked up. His pagod, poluflosboia, his zonos moros musphonons, and the devil knows what. But I'll take care. Ha! gone? Ay, 'twas time to sneak off. Soho! the house!

Enter SACKBUT.

Where is this trickster? Send for a constable; I'll have this rascal before the lord mayor; I'll Grand Cairo him, with the plague to him. I believe you had a hand in putting this imposture upon me, Sackbut.

Sack. Who, I, Mr. Periwinkle? I scorn it. I perceived he was a cheat, and left the room on purpose to send for a constable to apprehend him, and endeavoured to stop him when he went out. But the rogue made but one step from the stairs to the door; called a coach, leaped into it, and drove away like the devil, as Mr. Freeman can witness, who is at the bar, and desires to speak with you; he is this minute come to town.

Per. Send him in. [Exit SACKBUT] What a scheme this rogue has laid! How I should have been laughed at, had it succeeded!

Enter FREEMAN, booted and spurred.

Mr. Freeman, I had like to have been imposed on by the veriest rascal—

Free. I am sorry to hear it. The dog flew for't; he had not escaped me, had I been aware of him: Sackbut struck at him, but missed his blow, or he had done his business for him.

Per. I believe you never heard of such a contrivance, Mr. Freeman, as this fellow had found out.

Free. Mr. Sackbut has told me the whole story, Mr. Periwinkle; but now I have something to tell you of much more importance to yourself. I happened to lie one night at Coventry, and knowing your uncle, Sir Toby Periwinkle, I paid him a visit, and, to my great surprise, found him dying.

Per. Dying!

Free. Dying, in all appearance; the servants weeping, the room in darkness; the apothecary, shaking his head, told me the doctors had given him over; and then there are small hopes, you know.

Per. I hope he has made his will; he always told me he would make me his heir.

Free. I have heard you say as much, and therefore resolved to give you notice. I should think it would not be amiss if you went down to-morrow morning.

Per. It is a long journey, and the roads very bad.

Free. But he has a great estate, and the land very good. Think upon that.

Per. Why, that's true, as you say; I'll think upon it. In the meantime, I give you many thanks for your civility, Mr. Freeman, and should be glad of your company to dine with me.

Free. I am obliged to be at Jonathan's coffee-house at two, and now it is half an hour after one; if I despatch my business, I'll wait on you: I know your hour.

Per. You shall be very welcome, Mr. Freeman; and so your humble servant. [Exit.]

Re-enter Colonel FEIGNWELL and SACKBUT.

Free. Ha, ha, ha! I have done your business, Colonel; he has swallowed the bait.

Col. F. I overheard all, though I am a little in the dark. I am to personate a highwayman, I suppose; that's a project I am not fond of; for though I may fright him out of his consent, he may fright me out of my life when he discovers me, as he certainly must in the end.

Free. No, no: I have a plot for you without danger; but first we must manage Tradelove. Has the tailor brought your clothes?

Sack. Yes, plague take the thief.

Free. Well, well, no matter; I warrant we have him yet. But now you must put on the Dutch merchant.

Col. F. The deuce of this trading plot! I wish he had been an old soldier, that I might have attacked him in my own way, and heard him fight over all the battles of the late war. But for trade, by Jupiter! I shall never do it.

Sack. Never fear, Colonel: Mr. Freeman will instruct you.

Free. You'll see what others do; the coffee-house will instruct you.

Col. F. I must venture, however. But I have a further plot in my head upon Tradelove, which you must assist me in, Freeman. You are in credit with him, I heard you say.

Free. I am, and will scruple nothing to serve you, Colonel.

Col. F. Come along, then, Now for the Dutchman. Honest P'tolemy, by your leave.

*Now must bob-wig and business come in play,
A thirty thousand pound girl leads the way.*

[Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—Jonathan's Coffee-house in 'Change-alley.—A crowd of people, with rolls of paper and parchment in their hands.—A bar; Waiters, &c.

Enter TRADELOVE and Stock-jobbers, with rolls of paper and parchment.

1st. Stock. South sea at seven-eighths; who buys?

Trade. Harkye! Gabriel, you'll pay the difference of that stock we transacted for t'other day?

Gab. Ay, Mr. Tradelove; here's a note for the money.

Trade. I would fain bite the spark in the brown coat; he comes very often into the alley, but never employs a broker.

Enter Colonel FEIGNWELL and FREEMAN.

Trade. Mr. Freeman, your servant! Who is that gentleman?

Free. A Dutch merchant just come to England; but, harkye! Mr. Tradelove, I have a piece of news will get you as much as the French king's death did, if you are expeditious. [Shewing him a letter.] Read there: I received it just now from one that belongs to the emperor's minister.

Trade. [Reads.] "Sir,—As I have many obligations to you, I cannot miss any opportunity to shew my gratitude: this moment my lord has received a private express, that the Spaniards have raised their siege from before Cagliari. If this proves of any advantage to you, it will answer both the ends and wishes of, sir, your most obliged humble servant,—Henricus Dusseldorp.—P.S. In two or three hours the news will be public."—May one depend upon this, Mr. Freeman?

[Aside to FREEMAN.]

Free. You may. I never knew this person send me a false piece of news in my life.

Trade. Sir, I am much obliged to you; egad, 'tis rare news. Who sells South-sea for next week?

Stock. [All together.] I sell; I, I, I, I, I sell.

1st Stock. I'll sell five thousand, at five-eighths, for the same time.

Trade. Nay, nay; hold, hold! not all together, gentlemen; I'll be no bull; I'll buy no more than I can take. Will you sell ten thousand pounds at a half, for any day next week, except Saturday?

1st Stock. I'll sell it you, Mr. Tradelove.

[Freeman whispers to one of the gentlemen.]

1st Gent. The Spaniards raised the siege of Cagliari! I don't believe one word of it.

[Aside.]

2d Gent. Raised the siege! as much as you have raised the Monument.

Free. 'Tis raised, I assure you, sir.

2d Gent. What will you lay on't?

Free. What you please.

1st Gent. Why, I have a brother upon the spot, in the emperor's service; I am certain, if there were any such thing, I should have had a letter.

2d Gent. I'll hold you fifty pounds 'tis false.

Free. 'Tis done.

1st Gent. I'll lay you a brace of hundreds upon the same.

Free. I'll take you.

Trade. I'll lay any man a brace of thousands the siege is raged.

Free. The Dutch merchant is your man to take in.

[Aside to Tradelove.]

Trade. Does he not know the news?

Free. Not a syllable; if he did, he would bet a hundred thousand pounds as soon as one penny. He's plaguy rich, and a mighty man at wagers.

[To Tradelove.]

Trade. Say you so? Egad, I'll bite him, if possible. Are you from Holland, sir?

Col. F. Ya, mynheer.

Trade. Had you the news before you came away?

Col. F. What believe you, mynheer?

Trade. What do I believe? Why, I believe that the Spaniards have actually raised the siege of Cagliari.

Col. F. What duyvel's news is dat? 'Tis niet waer, mynheer; 'tis no true, sir.

Trade. 'Tis so true, mynheer, that I'll lay you two thousand pounds on it.

Col. F. Two duysend pound mynheer, 'tis gadaen. Dis gentleman sal hold de gelt.

[Gives Freeman money.]

Trade. With all my heart; this binds the wager.

Free. You have certainly lost, mynheer; the siege is raised, indeed.

Col. F. Ik gelyt niet, mynheer Freeman ik sal ye doubled honden, if you please.

Free. I am let into the secret, therefore won't win your money.

Trade. Ha, ha, ha! I have snapped the Dutchman, 'faith; ha, ha! This is no ill day's work. Pray may I crave your name, mynheer?

Col. F. Myn naem, mynheer? Myn naem is Jan Van Timtamtiroleleletta Her Van Feignwell.

Trade. Zounds! 'tis a damned long name; I shall never remember it. Myn Heer Van, Tim, Tim, Tim—What the devil is it?

Free. Oh! never heed: I know the gentleman, and will pass my word for twice the sum.

Trade. That's enough.

Col. F. You'll hear of me sooner than you wish, old gentleman, I fancy. [Aside.] You'll come to Sackbut's, Freeman?

[Aside to Freeman.]

Free. Immediately. [Aside to Colonel.]

Trade. Mr. Freeman, I give you many thanks for your kindness.—

Free. I fear you'll repent when you know all. [Aside.]

Trade. Will you dine with me?

Free. I am engaged at Sackbut's: adieu. [Exit.]

Trade. Sir, your humble servant. Now I'll see what I can do upon 'Change with my news. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—The Tavern.

Enter FREEMAN and Colonel FEIGNWELL.

Free. Ha, ha, ha! The old fellow swallowed the bait as greedily as a gudgeon.

Col. F. I have him, 'faith; ha, ha, ha! His two thousand pounds secure. If he would keep his money, he must part with the lady; ha, ha!

Enter SACKBUT.

Sack. Joy, joy, Colonel! the luckiest accident in the world.

Col. F. What say'st thou?

Sack. This letter does your business.

Col. F. [Reads.] "To Obadiah Prim, hosier, near the building called the Monument, in London."

Free. A letter to Prim! How came you by it?

Sack. Looking over the letters our post-man brought, as I always do, to see what letters are directed to my house, I spied this directed to Prim; so paid for it among the rest. I have given the old fellow a pint of wine, on purpose to delay time, till you see if the letter be of any service; then I'll seal it up again, and say I took it by mistake. I have read it, and fancy you'll like the project. Read, read, Colonel.

Col. F. [Reads.] "Friend Prim, there is arrived from Pennsylvania, one Simon Pure, a leader of the faithful, who hath sojourned with us eleven days, and hath been of great comfort to the brethren. He intendeth for the quarterly meeting in London; I have recommended him to thy house. I pray thee, treat him kindly, and let thy wife cherish him, for he's of a weakly constitution; he will depart from us the third day; which is all from thy friend in the faith, Aminadab Holdfast." Ha, ha! excellent! I understand you, laudlord: I am to personate this Simon Pure, am I not?

Sack. Don't you like the hint?

Col. F. Admirably well!

Free. 'Tis the best contrivance in the world, if the right Simon gets not there before you.

Col. F. No, no; the quakers never ride post. And suppose, Freeman, you should wait at the Bristol coach, that if you see any such person, you might contrive to give me notice.

Free. I will.

[Bell rings.

Sack. Coming, Coming!

[Exit.

Free. Thou must despatch Periwinkle first. Remember his uncle, Sir Toby Periwinkle, is an old bachelor of seventy-five; that he has seven hundred a year, most in abbey-land,—that he was once in love with your mother—shrewdly suspected by some to be your father; that you have been thirty years his steward, and ten years his gentleman: remember to improve these hints.

Col. F. Never fear; let me alone for that. But what's the steward's name?

Free. His name is Pillage.

Col. F. Enough. Now for the country put.

Enter SACKBUT.

Sack. Zounds! Mr. Freeman, yonder is Trade-love in the d——st passion in the world. He swears you are in the house: he says you told him you were to dine here.

Free. I did so: ha, ha, ha! he has found himself bit already.

Col. F. The devil! he must not see me.

Sack. I told him I expected you here, but you were not come yet.

Free. Very well; make you haste out, colonel, and let me alone to deal with him. Where is he?

Sack. In the King's-head.

Free. Ay, ay; very well, landlord; let him know I am come in; and now, Mr. Pillage, success attend you.

[Exit Sackbut.

Col. F. Mr. Proteus rather,—

From changing shape, and imitating Jove,

I draw the happy omens of my love.

I'm not the first young brother of the blade,

Who made his fortune in a masquerade. [Exit.

Enter TRADELOVE.

Free. Zounds! Mr. Trade-love, we're bit it seems.

Trade. Bit, do you call it, Mr. Freeman! I'm ruined. Plague on your news.

Free. Plague on the rascal that sent it me.

Trade. Sent it you! Why, Gabriel Skinflint has been at the minister's, and spoke with him; and he has assured him 'tis every syllable false: he received no such express.

Free. I know it; I this minute parted with my friend, who protested he never sent me any such letter. Some roguish stock-jobber has done it on purpose to make me lose my money, that's certain. I wish I knew who he was; I'd make him repent it: I have lost three hundred pounds by it.

Trade. What signifies your three hundred pounds to what I have lost? There's two thousand pounds to that Dutchman with a cursed long name, besides the stock I bought; the devil! I must never shew my face upon 'Change more; for, by my soul! I can't pay it.

Free. I am heartily sorry for it! What can I serve you in? Shall I speak to the Dutch merchant, and try to get you time for the payment?

Trade. Time! Ad's'heart! I shall never be able to look up again.

Free. I am very much concerned that I was the occasion, and wish I could be an instrument of retrieving your misfortune; for my own, I value it not. Adso! a thought comes into my head, that, well improved, may be of service.

Trade. Ah! there's no thought can be of any service to me, without paying the money or running away.

Free. How do you know? What do you think of my proposing Miss Lovely to him? He is a single man; and I heard him say he had a mind to marry an English woman; nay, more than that, he said somebody told him you had a pretty ward; he wished you had betted her instead of your money.

Trade. Ay, but he'd be hanged before he'd take her instead of the money: the Dutch are too covetous for that; besides, he did not know that there were three more of us, I suppose.

Free. So much the better; you may venture to give him your consent, if he'll forgive you the wager. It is not your business to tell him that your consent will signify nothing.

Trade. That's right, as you say; but will he do it, think you?

Free. I can't tell that; but I'll try what I can do with him. He has promised to meet me here an hour hence; I'll feel his pulse, and let you know: if I find it feasible, I'll send for you; if not, you are at liberty to take what measures you please.

Trade. You must extol her beauty, double her portion, and tell him I have the entire disposal of her, and that she can't marry without my consent; and that I am a covetous rogue, and will never part with her without a valuable consideration.

Free. Ay, ay, let me alone for a lie at a pinch.

Trade. Égad, if you can bring this to bear, Mr. Freeman, I'll make you whole again; I'll pay the three hundred pounds you lost with all my soul.

Free. Well, I'll use my best endeavours. Where will you be?

Trade. At home. Pray heaven you prosper!—If I were but the sole trustee now, I should not fear it.

[Exit.

Free. Ha, ha, ha!—he has it.

[Exit.

SCENE III.—Periwinkle's House.

Enter PERIWINKLE, meeting a Footman.

Foot. A gentleman from Coventry inquires for you, sir.

Per. From my uncle, I warrant you; bring him up. This will save me the trouble, as well as the expense, of a journey.

Enter COLONEL FEIGNWELL.

Col. F. Is your name Periwinkle, sir?

Per. It is, sir.

Col. F. I am sorry for the message I bring. My old master, whom I served these forty years, claims the sorrow due from a faithful servant to an indulgent master. [Weeps.]

Per. By this, I understand, sir, my uncle, Sir Toby Periwinkle, is dead.

Col. F. He is, sir; and has left you heir to seven hundred a year, in as good abbey-land as ever paid Peter-pence to Rome. I wish you long to enjoy it; but my tears will flow when I think of my benefactor. [Weeps.] Ah! he was a good man, he has not left many of his fellows; the poor lament him sorely.

Per. I pray, sir, what office bore you?

Col. F. He was his steward, sir.

Per. I have heard him mention you with much respect; your name is,—

Col. F. Pillage, Sir.

Per. Ay, Pillage; I do remember he called you Pillage. [The Colonel sits down.] Pray Mr. Pillage, when did my uncle die?

Col. F. Monday last, at four in the morning. About two he signed his will, and gave it into my hands, and strictly charged me to leave Coventry the moment he expired, and deliver it to you with what speed I could; I have obeyed him, sir, and there is the will. [Gives it to Periwinkle.]

Per. 'Tis very well; I'll lodge it in the Commons.

Col. F. There are two things which he forgot to insert; but charged me to tell you, that he desired you'd perform them as readily as if you had found them written in the will—which is to remove his corpse, and bury him by his father, at St. Paul's, Covent-garden, and to give all his servants mourning.

Per. That will be a considerable charge. A plague of all modern fashions! [Aside.] Well! it shall be done, Mr. Pillage; I will agree with one of death's fashion-monger's, called an undertaker, to go down, and bring up the body.

Col. F. I hope, sir, I shall have the honour to serve you in the same station I did your worthy uncle; I have not many years to stay behind him, and would gladly spend them in the family, where I was brought up. [Weeps.] He was a kind and a tender master to me.

Per. Pray don't grieve, Mr. Pillage, you shall hold your place, and every thing else which you held under my uncle. You make me weep to see you so concerned. [Weeps.] He lived to a good old age, and we are all mortal.

Col. F. We are so, sir, and therefore I must beg you to sign this lease. You'll find sir Toby has taken particular notice of it in his will; I could not get it time enough from the lawyer, or he had signed it before he died. [Gives him a paper.]

Per. A lease! for what?

Col. F. I rented a hundred a-year farm of Sir Toby upon lease, which lease expires at Lady-day next. I desire to renew for twenty years; that's all, sir.

Per. Let me see. [Looks over the lease.] Very well. Let me see what he says in his will about it. [Lays the lease upon the table, and looks on the will.] Oh! here it is. The farm lying,—now in possession of Samuel Pillage,—suffer him to renew his lease,—at the same rent. Very well, Mr. Pillage, I see my uncle does mention it, and I'll perform his will. Give me the lease. [Colonel gives it him, he looks at it, and lays it upon the table.] Pray you step to the door, and call for pen and ink, Mr. Pillage.

Col. F. I have a pen and ink in my pocket, sir. [Picks out an ink-horn.] I never go without that.

Per. I think it belongs to your profession. [Looks upon the pen, while the Colonel changes the lease and lays down the contract.] I doubt this is but a sorry pen, though it may serve to write my name. [Writes.]

Col. F. Little does he think what he signs. [Aside.]

Per. There is your lease, Mr. Pillage. [Gives him the paper.] Now, I must desire you to make what haste you can down to Coventry, and take care of every thing, and I'll send down the undertaker for the body; do you attend it up, and whatever charge you are at, I'll repay you.

Col. F. You have paid me already, I thank you, sir. [Aside.]

Per. Will you dine with me?

Col. F. I would rather not; there are some of my neighbours which I met as I came along, who leave town this afternoon, they told me, and I should be glad of their company down.

Per. Well, well, I won't detain you. I will give orders about mourning. [Exit Colonel.] Seven hundred a-year! I wish he had died seventeen years ago. What a valuable collection of rarities might I have had by this time! I might have travelled over all the known parts of the globe, and made my own closet rival the Vatican at Rome.—Odso! I have a good mind to begin my travels now—let me see—I am but sixty. My father, grandfather, and great grandfather, reached ninety odd; I have almost forty years good. Let me consider! what will seven hundred a-year amount to in—ay, in thirty years, I say, but thirty: thirty times seven, is seven times thirty; that is, just twenty-one thousand pounds. 'Tis a great deal of money; I may very well reserve sixteen hundred of it for a collection of such rarities as will make my name famous to posterity. I would not die like other mortals, forgotten in a year or two, as my uncle will be; no,—

With nature's curious works I'll raise my fame,
That men till doomsday may repeat my name.

[Exit.]

SCENE IV.—A Tavern.

FREEMAN and TRADELOVE discovered over a bottle.

Trade. Come, Mr. Freeman, here's Mynheer Jan Van, Tim, Tam, Tam—I shall never think of that Dutchman's name.

Free. Mynheer Jan Van Timamtirelereletta Heer Van Feignwell.

Trade. Ay, Heer Van Feignwell; I never heard such a confounded name in my life; here's his health, I say.

Free. With all my heart.

Trade. 'Faith, I never expected to have found so generous a thing in a Dutchman.

Free. As soon as I told him your circumstances, he replied, he would not be the ruin of any man for the world; and immediately made this proposal himself. Let him take what time he will for the payment, said he; or if he'll give me his ward, I'll forgive him the debt.

Trade. Well, Mr. Freeman, I can but thank you. Egad, you have made a man of me again! and if ever I lay a wager more, may I rot in gaol.

Free. I assure you, Mr. Tradelove, I was very much concerned, because I was the occasion, though very innocently, I protest.

Trade. I dare swear you was, Mr. Freeman.

Enter COLONEL FEIGNWELL, dressed as the Dutch merchant.

Col. F. Ha, mynheer Tradelove, Ik bin sorry voor your trouble, maer Ik sal you easie maken Ik wil de gelt mie hebben,— Trade. I shall for ever acknowledge the obligation, sir.

Free. But you understand upon what condition, Mr. Tradelove—Miss Lovely.

Col. F. Ya, de vrow sal al te regt setten, mynheer.

Trade. With all my heart, mynheer; you shall have my consent to marry her freely.

Free. Well, then, as I am a party concerned between you, mynheer Jan Van Tintamtirelereletta Heer Van Feignwell shall give you a discharge of your wager under his own hand, and you shall give him your consent to marry Miss Lovely under your's; that is the way to avoid all manner of disputes hereafter.

Col. F. Ya, weeragtig.

Trade. Ay, ay, so it is, Mr. Freeman; I'll give it under mine this minute. [Sits down to write.]

Col. F. And so Ik sal. [Does the same.]

Free. So ho, the house!

Enter Waiter.

Bid your master come up. [Exit Waiter.] I'll see there be witnesses enough to the bargain. [Aside.]

Enter SACKBUT.

Sack. Do you call, gentlemen?

Free. Ay, Mr. Sackbut, we shall want your hand here.

Trade. There, mynheer, there's my consent as amply as you can desire; but you must insert your own name, for I know not how to spell it; I have left a blank for it. [Gives the Colonel a paper.]

Col. F. Ya Ik sal dat well doen.

Free. Now, Mr. Sackbut, you and I will witness it. [They write.]

Col. F. Daer, Mynheer Tradelove, is your discharge. [Gives him a paper.]

Trade. Be pleased to witness this receipt too, gentlemen. [Freeman and Sackbut put their hands.]

Free. Ay, ay, that we will.

Col. F. Well, mynheer, ye most meer doen, ye most myn voorsprach to de vrow syn.

Free. He means you must recommend him to the lady.

Trade. That I will, and to the rest of my brother guardians.

Col. F. Wat voo? de duyvel! heb you meer guardians?

Trade. Only three, mynheer.

Col. F. What donder heb ye myn betrocken, mynheer? Had Ik dat gewoeten, Ik soude eaven met you geweest syn.

Sack. But, Mr. Tradelove is the principal; and he can do a great deal with the rest, sir.

Free. And he shall use his interest, I promise you, mynheer.

Trade. I will say all that ever I can think on to recommend you, mynheer; and if you please, I'll introduce you to the lady.

Col. F. Well, dat is waer. Maer ye must first sprekten of myn to de vrow, and to ondere gentlemen.

Free. Ay, that's the best way, and then I and the Heer Van Feignwell will meet you there.

Trade. I will go this moment, upon my honour. Your most obedient humble servant. My speaking will do you little good, mynheer; ha, ha! we have bit you, 'faith: ha, ha! [Aside]

Well, my debt's discharged—and as for Nan,

He has my consent—to get her if he can. [Aside.]

[Exit.]

Col. F. Ha, ha, ha! this was a masterpiece of contrivance, Freeman.

Free. He hugs himself with his supposed good fortune, and little thinks the luck's on our side! But, come, pursue the fickle goddess, while she's in the mood. Now for the Quaker,

Col. F. That's the hardest task

Of all the counterfeits perform'd by man,

A soldier makes the simplest puritan. 'Ereunt.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in Prim's house.

Enter MRS. PRIM, and MISS LOVELY, in a Quaker's dress.

Mrs. P. So, now I like thee, Anne; art thou not better without thy monstrous vanities and patches? If heaven should make thee so many black spots upon thy face, would it not fright thee, Anne?

Miss L. If it should turn you inside outward, and shew all the spots of your hypocrisy, 'twould fright me worse!

Mrs. P. My hypocrisy! I seem thy words, Anne; I lay no baits.

Miss L. If you did, you'd catch no fish.

Mrs. P. Well, well, make thy jests; but I'd have thee to know, Anne, that I could have catched as many fish (as thou callest them,) in my time, as ever thou didst with all thy fool-traps about thee.

Miss L. Is that the reason of your formality, Mrs. Prim? Truth will out; I ever thought, indeed, there was more design than godliness in the pinched cap.

Mrs. P. Go, thou art corrupted with reading lewd plays, and filthy romances. Ah! I wish thou art not already too familiar with the wicked ones!

Miss L. Too familiar with the wicked ones! Pray, no more of these freedoms, madam. I am familiar with none so wicked as yourself; how dare you thus talk to me! you—you—you, unworthy woman, you. [Bursts into tears.]

Enter TRADELOVE.

Trade. What, in tears, Nancy? What have you done to her, Mrs. Prim, to make her weep?

Miss L. Done to me? I admire I keep my senses among you; but I will rid myself of your tyranny, if there be either law or justice to be had. I'll force you to give me up my liberty.

Mrs. P. Thou hast more need to weep for thy sins, Anne; yea, for thy manifold sins.

Miss L. Don't think that I'll be still the fool which you have made me; no, I'll wear what I please—go when and where I please,—and keep what company I think fit, and not what you shall direct; I will.

Trade. For my part, I do think all this very reasonable, Miss Lovely; 'tis fit you should have your liberty, and for that very purpose I am come.

Enter PERIWINKLE and OBADIAH PRIM, with a letter in his hand.

Per. I have bought some black stockings of your husband, Mrs. Prim; but he tells me the Glover's trade belongs to you: therefore, I pray you look me out five or six dozen of mourning gloves, such as are given at funerals, and send them to my house.

Obad. My friend Periwinkle has got a good wind-fall to-day; seven hundred a-year.

Mrs. P. I wish thee joy of it, neighbour.

Trade. What, is Sir Toby dead then?

Per. He is. You'll take care, Mrs. Prim.

Mrs. P. Yea, I will, neighbour.

Obad. This letter recommendeth a speaker: 'tis from Aminadab Holdfast, of Bristol; peradventure he will be here this night; therefore, Sarah, do thou take care for his reception. [Gives her the letter.]

Mrs. P. I will obey thee. [Exit.]

Obad. What art thou in the dumps for, Anne?

Trade. We must marry her, Mr. Prim.

Obad. Why, truly, if we could find a husband worth having, I should be as glad to see her married as thou wouldst, neighbour.

Per. Well said, there are but few worth having.

Trade. I can recommend you a man now, that I think you can none of you have an objection to.

Enter Sir PHILIP MODELOVE.

Per. You recommend? Nay, whenever she marries, I'll recommend the husband.

Sir P. What, must it be a whale, or a rhinoceros, Mr. Periwinkle? Ha, ha, ha!

Per. He shall be none of the fops at your end of the town, with mop-heads and empty skulls; nor yet any of our trading gentry, who puzzle the heralds to find arms for their coaches. No; he shall be a man famous for travels, solidity, and curiosity; one who has searched into the profundity of nature: when heaven shall direct such a one, he shall have my consent, because it may turn to the benefit of mankind.

Miss L. The benefit of mankind! What, would you anatomize me?

Sir P. Ay, ay, madam, he would dissect you.

Trade. Or, pure over you through a microscope, to see how your blood circulates from the crown of your head to the sole of your foot;—ha, ha! But I have a husband for you, a man that knows how to improve your fortune; one that trades to the four corners of the globe.

Miss L. And would send me for a venture, perhaps.

Trade. One that will dress you in all the pride of Europe, Asia, Africa, and America: a Dutch merchant, my girl.

Sir P. A Dutchman! ha, ha! There's a husband for a fine lady. Ya frow, will you meet myn slapen, ha, ha! he'll learn you to talk the language of the hogs, madam, ha, ha!

Trade. He'll teach you that one merchant is of more service to a nation than fifty coxcombs. 'Tis the merchant makes the belle. How would the ladies sparkle in the box, without the merchant? The Indian diamond! the French brocade! the Italian fan! the Flanders lace! the fine Dutch holland! How would they vent their scandal over their teatables? And where would your beaux have champagne to toast their mistresses, were it not for the merchant?

Obad. Verily, neighbour Tradelove, thou dost waste thy breath about nothing. All that thou hast said tendeth only to debauch youth, and fill their heads with the pride and luxury of this world. The merchant is a very great friend to Satan, and sendeth as many to his dominions as the Pope.

Per. Right; I say, knowledge makes the man.

Obad. Yea, but not thy kind of knowledge; it is the knowledge of truth. Search thou for the light within, and not for baubles, friend.

Miss L. Ah! study your country's good, Mr. Periwinkle, and not her insects. Rid you of your home-bred monsters, before you fetch any from abroad. I dare swear, you have maggots enough in your own brain to stock all the virtuosos in Europe with butterflies.

Sir P. By my soul! Miss Nancy's a wit.

Obad. That is more than she can say of thee, friend. Lookye, 'tis in vain to talk; when I meet a man worthy of her, she shall have my leave to marry him.

Miss L. Provided he be of the faithful. Was there ever such a swarm of caterpillars to blast the hopes of a woman! [Aside.] Know this, that you contend in vain; I'll have no husband of your choosing, nor shall you lord it over me long. I'll try the power of an English senate. Orphans have been redressed, and will set aside, and none did ever deserve their pity more. O, Feignwell! where are thy promises to free me from these vermin? Alas! the task was more difficult than he imagined. [Aside.]

A harder task than what the poets tell

Of yore the fair Andromeda befell;

She but one monster fear'd, I've four to fear,

And see no Perseus, no deliverer near. [Exit.]

Enter Servant, who whispers to OBADIAH PRIM.

Per. The woman is mad.

Sir P. So are you all, in my opinion. [Exit.]

Serv. One Simon Pure inquireth for thee. [Exit.]

Obad. Friend Tradelove, business requireth my presence.

Trade. Oh! I sha'n't trouble you. Plague take him for an unmannerly dog; however, I have kept my word with my Dutchman, and I'll introduce him too, for all you. [Exit.]

Enter Colonel FEIGNWELL, in a Quaker's habit.

Obad. Friend Pure, thou art welcome. How is it with friend Holdfast, and all friends in Bristol; Timothy Littleworth, John Slenderbrain, and Christopher Keepfaith?

Col. F. A goodly company! [Aside.] They are all in health, I thank thee for them.

Obad. Friend Holdfast writes me word, that thou camest lately from Pennsylvania: how do all friends there?

Col. F. What the devil shall I say? I know just as much of Pennsylvania as I do of Bristol. [Aside.]

Obad. Do they thrive?

Col. F. Yea, friend, the blessing of their good works falls upon them.

Enter Mrs. PRIM and Miss LOVELY.

Obad. Sarah, know our friend Pure.

Mrs. P. Thou art welcome. [He salutes her.]

Col. F. Here comes the sum of all my wishes. How charming she appears even in that disguise!

[Aside.]

Obad. Why dost thou consider the maiden so attentively, friend?

Col. F. I will tell thee. About four days ago I saw a vision. This very maiden, but in vain attire, standing on a precipice, I heard a voice which called me by my name, and bid me put forth my hand, and save her from the pit. I did so, and methought the damsel grew unto my side.

Mrs. P. What can that portend?

Obad. The damsel's conversion, I am persuaded.

Miss L. That's false, I'm sure. [Aside.]

Obad. Wilt thou use the means, friend Pure?

Col. F. Means! What means? Is she not thy daughter, already one of the faithful?

Mrs. P. No, alas! she's one of the ungodly.

Obad. Pray thee mind what this good man will say unto thee: he will teach thee the way thou should'st walk, Anne.

Miss L. I know my way without his instruction: I hoped to have been quiet when once I had put on your odious formality here.

Col. F. Then thou wearest it out of compulsion, not choice, friend?

Miss L. Thou art in the right of it, friend.

Mrs. P. Art thou not ashamed to mimic the good man? Ah! thou stubborn girl.

Col. F. Mind her not; she hurteth not me. If thou wilt leave her alone with me, I will discuss some few points with her, that may perchance soften her stubbornness, and melt her into compliance.

Obad. Content; I pray thee put it home to her. Come, Sarah, let us leave the good man with her.

Miss L. [Catches hold of PRIM; he breaks loose. Enter OBAD. and Mrs. P.] What, do you mean to leave me with this old, enthusiastical canter! Don't think because I complied with your formality, to impose your ridiculous doctrine upon me.

Col. F. I pray thee, young woman, moderate thy passion.

Miss L. I pray thee, walk after thy leader; you will but lose your labour upon me. These wretches will certainly make me mad!

Col. F. I am of another opinion; the spirit telleth me I shall convert thee, Anne.

Miss L. 'Tis a lying spirit; don't believe it.

Col. F. Say'st thou so? Why then thou shalt convert me, my angel. [Catching her in his arms.

Miss L. [Shrieks.] Ah! monster, hold off, or I'll tear thy eyes out.

Col. F. Hush! for heaven's sake; dost thou not know me? I am Feignwell!

Miss L. Feignwell!

Re-enter OBADIAH PRIM.

Oh, I'm undone! Prim here! I wish with all my soul I had been dumb.

Obad. What is the matter? Why didst thou shriek out, Anne?

Miss L. Shriek out! I'll shriek and shriek again, cry murder, thieves, or anything, to drown the noise of that eternal babbler, if you leave me with him any longer.

Obad. Was that all? Fie, fie, Anne!

Col. F. No matter, I'll bring down her stomach, I'll warrant thee. Leave us, I pray thee.

Obad. Fare thee well. Verily, I was afraid the flesh had got the better of the spirit. [Exit.

Col. F. My charming, lovely woman!

[Embraces her.

Miss L. What meanest thou by this disguise, Feignwell?

Col. F. To set thee free, if thou wilt perform thy promise.

Miss L. Make me mistress of my fortune, and make thy own conditions.

Col. F. This night shall answer all my wishes. See here I have the consent of three of thy guardians already, and doubt not but Prim will make the fourth.

Enter OBADIAH PRIM, who listens.

Obad. I would gladly hear what arguments the good man useth to bend her. [Aside.

Miss L. Thy words give me new life, methinks.

Obad. What do I hear? [Aside.

Miss L. Thou best of men, heaven meant to bless me sure, when I first saw thee.

Obad. He hath mollified her. O wonderful conversion! [Aside.

Col. F. [Softly.] Ha! Prim listening.—No more my love, we are observed: seem to be edified, and give them hopes that thou wilt turn Quaker, and leave the rest to me. [Aloud.] I am glad to find that thou art touched with what I said unto thee, Anne;

another time I will explain the other article unto thee: in the meanwhile be thou dutiful to our friend Prim.

Miss L. I shall obey thee in everything.

[OBADIAH comes forward.

Obad. Oh, what a prodigious change is here! Thou hast wrought a miracle, friend! Anne, how dost thou like the doctrine he hath preached?

Miss L. So well that I could talk to him for ever, methinks. I am ashamed of my former folly, and ask your pardon.

Col. F. Enough, enough, that thou art sorry; he is no pope, Anne.

Obad. True; I am no pope, Anne. Verily, thou dost rejoice me exceedingly, friend: will it please thee to walk into the next room, and refresh thyself? Come, take the maiden by the hand.

Col. F. We will follow thee. [Going.

Enter Servant.

Serv. There is another Simon Pure inquireth for thee, master.

Col. F. The devil there is! [Aside.

Obad. Another Simon Pure! I do not know him; is he any relation of thine?

Col. F. No, friend; I know him not. Plague take him! I wish he were in Pennsylvania again, with all my soul. [Aside.

Miss L. What shall I do?

Obad. Bring him up. [Exit Servant.

Col. F. Humph! then one of us must go down, that's certain. Now, impudence assist me.

Enter SIMON PURE.

Obad. What is thy will with me, friend?

Simon. Didst thou not receive a letter from Aminadab Holdfast of Bristol, concerning one Simon Pure?

Obad. Yea, Simon Pure is already here, friend. Col. F. And Simon Pure will stay here, friend, if it be possible. [Aside.

Simon. That's an untruth, for I am he.

Col. F. Take thou heed, friend, what thou dost say: I do affirm that I am Simon Pure.

Simon. Thy name may be Pure, friend, but not that Pure.

Col. F. Yea, that Pure which my good friend, Aminadab Holdfast, wrote to my friend Prim about; the same Simon Pure that came from Pennsylvania, and sojourned in Bristol eleven days; thou would'st not take my name from me, would'st thou?—till I have done with it. [Aside.

Simon. Thy name! I am astonished!

Col. F. At what? At thy own assurance?

[Going up to him, SIMON PURE starts back.

Simon. Avaunt! Satan, approach me not: I defy thee, and all thy works.

Miss L. Oh! he'll out-cant him. Undone, undone for ever. [Aside.

Col. F. Hark thee, friend! thy sham will not take. Don't exert thy voice; thou art too well acquainted with Satan to start at him, thou wicked reprobate. What can thy design be here?

Enter a Servant, who gives PRIM a letter.

Obad. One of these must be a counterfeit, but which I cannot say.

Col. F. What can that letter be? [Aside.

Simon. Thou must be the devil, friend, that's certain; for no human power can speak so great a falsehood.

Obad. This letter sayeth that thou art better acquainted with that prince of darkness, than any here.

[To SIMON.] Read that, I pray thee, Simon.

[Gives it to the Colonel.
Col. F. [Aside.] 'Tis Freeman's hand. [Reads.]
"There is a design formed to rob your house this night, and cut your throat; and for that purpose there is a man disguised like a Quaker, who is to pass for one Simon Pure: the gang, whereof I am one, though now resolved to rob no more, has been at Bristol: one of them came in the coach with the Quaker, whose name he hath taken; and from what he hath gathered from him, formed that design, and did not doubt but he should impose so far upon you as to make you turn out the real Simon Pure, and keep him with you. Make the right use of this. Adieu."—Excellent well! [Aside.]

Obad. Dost thou hear this? [To SIMON.]

Simon. Yea, but it moveth me not; that doubtless is the impostor. [Pointing to the Colonel.]

Col. F. Ah! thou wicked one. Now I consider thy face, I remember thou didst come up in the leathern conveniency with me. Thou hadst a black bob-wig on, and a brown camblet coat with brass buttons. Canst thou deny it, eh?

Simon. Yea, I can, and with a safe conscience too, friend.

Obad. Verily, friend, thou art the most impudent villain I ever saw.

Miss L. Nay, then, I'll have a fling at him.
[Aside.] I remember the face of this fellow at Bath.
Ay, this is he that picked my Lady Raffle's pocket in the Grove. Don't you remember that the mob pumped upon you, friend? This is the most notorious rogue—

Simon. What does provoke thee to seek my life?
Thou wilt not hang me, wilt thou, wrongfully?

Obad. She will do thee no hurt; nor thou shalt do me none; therefore get thee about thy business, friend, and leave thy wicked course of life, or thou may'st not come off so favourably everywhere. Simon,
I pray thee, put him forth.

Col. F. Go, friend, I would advise thee, and tempt thy fate no more.

Simon. Yea, I will go: but it shall be to thy confusion; for I shall clear myself. I will return with some proofs that shall convince thee, Obadiah, that thou art highly imposed upon. [Exit.]

Col. F. Then there will be no staying for me, that's certain. What the devil shall I do? [Aside.]

Obad. What monstrous works of iniquity are there in this world, Simon?

Col. F. Yea, the age is full of vice. 'Sdeath, I am so confounded I know not what to say. [Aside.]

Obad. Thou art disordered, friend; art thou not well?

Col. F. My spirit is greatly troubled, and something telleth me, that though I have wrought a good work in converting this maiden, this tender maiden, yet my labour will be in vain, for the evil spirit fighteth against her; and I see, yea, I see with the eye of my inward man, that Satan will rebuff her again, whenever I withdraw myself from her; and she will, yea, this very damsel will return again to that abomination from whence I have retrieved her, as it were—yea, as if it were out of the jaws of the fiend.

Miss L. I must second him. [Aside.] What mean-eth this struggling within me? I feel the spirit resisteth the vanities of this world; but the flesh is rebellious, yea, the flesh—I greatly fear the flesh and the weakness thereof. Hum.

Obad. The maid is inspired. [Aside.] Prodigious!
The damsel is filled with the spirit. Sarah!

Enter Mrs. PRIM.

Mrs P. I am greatly rejoiced to see such a change in our beloved Anne. I came to tell thee that supper stayeth for thee.

Col. F. I am not disposed for thy food; my spirit longeth for more delicious meat! Fain would I redeem this maiden from the tribe of sinners, and break those cords asunder wherewith she is bound. Hum.

Miss L. Something whispers in my ears, methinks, that I must be subject to the will of this good man,
and from him only must hope for consolation. Hum.
It also telleth me that I am a chosen vessel to raise up seed to the faithful, and that thou must consent that we two be one flesh, according to the word.
Hum!

Obad. What a revelation is here! This is certainly part of thy vision, friend; this is the maiden's growing unto thy side. Ah! with what willingness should I give thee my consent, could I give thee her fortune too; but thou wilt never get the consent of the wicked ones.

Col. F. I wish I was as sure of your's. [Aside.]

Obad. [To Miss L.] My soul rejoiceth, yea rejoiceth, I say, to find the spirit within thee; for lo, it moveth thee with natural agitation; yea, with natural agitation; yea, with natural agitation towards this good man; yea, it stirreth, as one may say,—yea, verily I say, it stirreth up thy inclination,—yea, as one would stir a pudding.

All. Hum!

Miss L. I see, I see the spirit guiding of thy hand, good Obadiah Prim, and now behold thou art signing thy consent; and now I see myself within thy arms, my friend and brother; yea, I am become bone of thy bone, and flesh of thy flesh. [Embracing
Col. F.] Hum!

Mrs. P. The spirit hath greatly moved them both.
Friend Prim, thou must consent; there's no resisting of the spirit.

Obad. Fetch me the pen and ink, Sarah; and my hand shall confess its obedience to the spirit.

[Exit Mrs. P.]

Col. F. I wish it were over.

Re-enter Mrs. PRIM, with pen and ink

Miss L. I tremble lest this quaking rogue should return, and spoil all. [Aside.]

Obad. Here, friend, do thou write what the spirit prompteth, and I will sign it. [Col. F. sits down.]

Col. F. [Reads.] "This is to certify to all whom it may concern, that I do freely give all my right and title in Anne Lovely to Simon Pure, and my full consent that she shall become his wife, according to the form of marriage. Witness my hand."

Obad. That enough; give me the pen. [Signs it.]

Enter BETTY.

Betty. Oh! madam, madam, here's the quaking man again: he has brought a coachman, and two or three more. [Aside to Miss L. and exit.]

Miss L. Ruined, past redemption!

[Aside to the Colonel.]

Col. F. No, no; one minute sooner had spoiled all; but now—Here's company coming, friend; give me the paper. [Going to Prim hastily.]

Obad. Here it is, Simon; and I wish thee happy with the maiden.

Miss L. 'Tis done; and now, devil, do thy worst.

Enter SIMON PURE, Coachman, and others.

Simon. Look thee, friend, I have brought these people to satisfy thee that I am not that impostor which thou didst take me for. This is the man that did drive the leathern conveniency, and brought me from Bristol; and this is,—

Col. F. Lookye, friend, to save the court the trouble of examining witnesses, I plead guilty. Ha, ha!

Obad. How's this? Is not thy name Pure, then?

Col. F. No, really, sir; I only made bold with this gentleman's name; but here I give it up safe and sound: it has done the business I had occasion for, and now I intend to wear my own, which shall be at his service upon the same occasion at any time. Ha, ha, ha!

Simon. Oh! the wickedness of the age!

[Exit Coachman, &c.]

Obad. I am struck dumb with thy impudence, Anne; thou hadst deceived me, and perchance undone thyself.

Mrs. P. Thou art a dissembling baggage, and shame will overtake thee. [Exit.]

Simon. I am grieved to see thy wife so much troubled; I will follow and console her. [Exit.]

Enter Servant.

Serv. Thy brother guardians inquire for thee; here is another man with them. [Exit.]

Miss L. Who can that man be? [To Col. F.]

Col. F. 'Tis Freeman; a friend of mine, whom I ordered to bring the rest of the guardians here.

Enter Sir PHILIP MODELOVE, TRADELOVE, PERIWINKLE, and FREEMAN.

Free. Is all safe? Did my letter do you service?

[Aside to the Colonel.]

Col. F. All, all's safe;—ample service. [Aside.]

Sir P. Miss Nancy, how dost do, child?

Miss L. Don't call me miss, friend Philip; my name is Anne, thou knowest.

Sir P. What, is the girl metamorphosed?

Miss L. I wish thou wert so metamorphosed. Ah! Philip, throw off that gaudy attire, and wear the clothes becoming thy age.

Obad. I am ashamed to see these men. [Aside.]

Sir P. My age! the woman is possessed.

Col. F. No; thou art possessed rather, friend.

Trade. Harkye! Miss Lovely, one word with you.

[Takes hold of her hand.]

Col. F. This maiden is my wife, thanks to my friend Prim, and thou hast no business with her.

[Takes her from him.]

Trade. His wife! harkye, Mr. Freeman.

Per. Why, you have made a very fine piece of work of it, Mr. Prim.

Sir P. Married to a quaker! thou art a fine fellow to be left guardian to an orphan, truly. There's a husband for a young lady!

Col. F. When I have put on my beau clothes, Sir Philip, you'll like me better.

Sir P. Thou wilt make a very scurvy beau, friend.

Col. F. I believe I can prove it under your hand that you thought me a very fine gentleman in the park 't'other day, about thirty-six minutes after eleven. Will you take a pinch, Sir Philip? One of the finest snuff-boxes you ever saw. [Offers him snuff.]

Sir P. Ha, ha, ha! I am overjoyed, 'faith I am, if thou be'st the gentleman. I own I did give my consent to the gentleman I brought here to-day; but whether this is he, I can't be positive.

Obad. Canst thou not? Now I think thou art a fine fellow to be left guardian to an orphan. Thou shallow-brained shuttlecock! he may be a pick-pocket for aught thou dost know.

Per. You would have been two rare fellows to have been entrusted with the sole management of her fortune, would ye not, think ye? But Mr. Trade-love and myself shall take care of her portion.

Trade. Ay, ay, so we will. Didn't you tell me the Dutch merchant desired me to meet him here, Mr. Freeman?

Free. I did so, and I am sure he will be here, if you'll have a little patience.

Col. F. What, is Mr. Trade-love impatient? Nay, then, ib ben gereet voor you, he be, Jan Van Tintamtielreleletta Heer Van Feignwelt, vergeeten!

Trade. Oh! plague of the name! what have you tricked me too, Mr. Freeman?

Col. F. Tricked, Mr. Trade-love! Did not I give you two thousand pounds for your consent fairly? And now do you tell a gentleman he has tricked you?

Per. So, so! you are a pretty guardian, 'faith, to sell your charge! What, do you look upon her as part of your stock?

Obad. Ha, ha, ha! I am glad thy knavery is found out, however; I confess the maiden overreached me, and I had no sinister end at all.

Per. Ay, ay, one thing or other overreached you all; but I'll take care he shall never finger a penny of her money, I warrant you. Overreached quotha! Why I might have been overreached too, if I had no more wit: I don't know but this very fellow may be him that was directed to me from Grand Cairo, 't'other day. Ha, ha, ha!

Col. F. The very same.

Per. Are you so, sir? But your trick would not pass upon me.

Col. P. No, as you say, at that time it did not; that was not my lucky hour. But, harkye! sir, I must let you into one secret. You may keep honest John Tradesant's coat on, for your uncle, Sir Toby Periwinkle, is not dead, so the charge of mourning will be saved. Ha, ha, ha! Don't you remember Mr. Pillage, your uncle's steward? Ha, ha, ha!

Per. Not dead! I begin to fear I am tricked too.

Col. F. Don't you remember the signing of a lease, Mr. Periwinkle?

Per. Well, and what signifies that lease, if my uncle is not dead? Ha! I am sure it was a lease I signed.

Col. F. Ay, but it was a lease for life, sir; and for this beautiful tenement, I thank you.

[Taking hold of Miss Lovely.]

All. Ha, ha, ha! neighbours' fare.

Free. So then, I find you are all tricked, ha, ha!

Per. I am certain I read as plain a lease as ever I read in my life.

Col. F. You read a lease I grant you; but you signed this contract. [Shewing a paper.]

Per. How durst you put this trick upon me, Mr. Freeman? Didn't you tell me my uncle was dying?

Free. And would tell you twice as much to serve my friend: ha, ha!

Sir P. What, the learned and famous Mr. Periwinkle choused too! ha, ha, ha! I shall die with laughing; ha, ha, ha!

Trade. Well, since you have out-witted us all, pray you, what and who are you, sir?

Sir P. Sir, the gentleman is a fine gentleman. I am glad you have got a person, madam, who understands dress and good breeding. I was resolved she should have one of my choosing.

Trade. A beau! nay, then, she is finely helped up.

Miss L. Why, beaus are great encouragers of trade, sir; ha, ha!

Col. F. Lookye, gentlemen: I am the person who can give you the best account of myself; and I must beg Sir Philip's pardon, when I tell him, that, I have as much aversion to what he calls dress and breeding, as I have to the enemies of my religion.

I have had the honour to serve his majesty, and headed a regiment of the bravest fellows that ever pushed bayonet into the throat of an enemy; and notwithstanding the fortune this lady brings me, whenever my country wants my aid, my sword and arm are at her service.

*And now, my fair, if thou'lt but deign to smile,
I meet a recompense for all my toil:*

*Love and religion ne'er admit restraint,
And force makes many sinners, not one saint;
Still free as air the active mind does rove,
And searches proper objects for its love;
But that once fix'd, 'tis past the power of art
To chase the dear idea from the heart:
'Tis liberty of choice that sweetens life,
Makes the glad husband, and the happy wife.*

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The Park.

Enter SIR GEORGE AIRY, meeting CHARLES.

Charles. Ha! Sir George Airy, a birding thus early! What forbidden game roused you so soon? for no lawful occasion could invite a person of your figure abroad at such unfashionable hours.

Sir G. There are some men, Charles, whom fortune has left free from inquietudes, who are diligently studious to find out ways and means to make themselves uneasy.

Charles. Is it possible that anything in nature can ruffle the temper of a man whom the four seasons of the year compliment with as many thousand pounds; nay, and a father at rest with his ancestors.

Sir G. Why, there it is now! a man that wants money thinks none can be unhappy that has it; but my affairs are in such a whimsical posture, that it will require a calculation of my nativity to find if my gold will relieve me or not.

Charles. Ha, ha, ha! never consult the stars about that; gold has a power beyond them. Then what can thy business be that gold won't serve thee in.

Sir G. Why I'm in love.

Charles. In love! Ha, ha, ha! in love! Ha, ha, ha, ha! with what, prythee? a cherubin?

Sir G. No; with a woman.

Charles. A woman! good. Ha, ha, ha, ha! and gold not help thee?

Sir G. But suppose I'm in love with two?

Charles. Ay, if thou'rt in love with two hundred, gold will fetch them, I warrant thee, boy. But who are they? who are they? come.

Sir G. One is a lady whose face I never saw, but witty to a miracle; the other beautiful as Venus—

Charles. And a fool.

Sir G. For ought I know, for I never spoke to her; but you can inform me. I am charmed by the wit of the one, and die for the beauty of the other.

Charles. And pray which are you in quest of now?

Sir G. I prefer the sensual pleasure; I'm for her I've seen, who is thy father's ward, Miranda.

Charles. Nay, then I pity you; for the Jew, my father, will no more part with her and thirty thousand pounds than he would with a guinea to keep me from starving.

Sir G. Now you see gold can't do every thing, Charles.

Charles. Yes; for it is her gold that bars my father's gate against you.

Sir G. Why, if he be this avaricious wretch, how can'st thou by such a liberal education?

Charles. Not a sous out of his pocket, I assure you: I had an uncle who defrayed that charge; but for some little wildness of youth, though he made me his heir, left dad my guardian till I came to years of discretion, which I presume the old gentleman will never think I am; and now he has got the estate into his clutches, it does me no more good than if it lay in Prester John's dominions.

Sir G. What, canst thou find no stratagem to redeem it?

Charles. I have made many essays to no purpose; though want, the mistress of invention, still tempts me on, yet still the old fox is too cunning for me. I am upon my last project, which if it fails, then for my last refuge, a brown musket.

Sir G. What is't? can I assist thee?

Charles. Not yet; when you can, I have confidence enough in you to ask it.

Sir G. I am always ready. But what does he intend to do with Miranda? Is she to be sold in private, or will he put her up by way of auction, at who bids most? If so, 'egad I'm for him; my gold, as you say, shall be subservient to my pleasure.

Charles. To deal ingenuously with you, Sir George, I know very little of her or home; for since my uncle's death, and my return from travel, I have never been well with my father; he thinks my expenses too great, and I his allowance too little; he never sees me but he quarrels, and to avoid that I shun his house as much as possible. The report is, he intends to marry her himself.

Sir G. Can she consent to it?

Charles. Yes faith, so they say; but I tell you I am wholly ignorant of the matter. I fancy she plays the mother-in-law already, and sets the old gentleman on to do mischief.

Sir G. Then I have your free consent to get her?

Charles. Ay, and my helping hand, if occasion be.

Sir G. Poh! yonder's a fool coming this way; let's avoid him.

Charles. What, Marplot? No, no, he's my instrument; there's a thousand conveniences in him; he'll lend me his money, when he has any, run of my errands and be proud on it; in short, he'll pimp for me, lie for me, drink for me, do anything but fight for me, and that I trust to my own arm for.

Sir G. Nay, then he's to be endured; I never knew his qualifications before. [Retires.]

Enter MARPLOT, with a patch across his face.

Mar. Dear Charles, your's. Ha! Sir George Airy! the man in the world I have an ambition to be known to. [Aside.] Give me thy hand, dear boy.

[To Charles.]

Charles. A good assurance! But harkye, how came your beautiful countenance clouded in the wrong place?

Mar. I must confess 'tis a little mal-a-propos; but no matter for that. A word with you, Charles. Pr'ythee introduc'd me to Sir George, he is a man of wit, and I'd give ten guineas to—

Charles. When you have them, you mean.

Mar. Ay, when I have them; poh, plague! you cut the thread of my discourse. I will give ten guineas, I say, to be ranked in his acquaintance. But, pr'ythee, introduce me.

Charles. Well, on condition you'll give us a true account how you came by that mourning nose, I will.

Mar. I'll do it.

Charles. Sir George, here's a gentleman has a passionate desire to kiss your hand.

Sir G. [advancing.] Oh! I honour men of the sword; and I presume this gentleman is lately come from Spain or Portugal, by his scars.

Mar. No, really, Sir George, mine sprung from civil fury. Happening last night to step into the groom-porter's, I had a strong inclination to go ten guineas with a sort of a, sort of a—kind of a milk-sop, as I thought. A plague of the dice! he flung out, and my pockets being empty, as Charles knows they often are, he proved a surly North Briton, and broke my face for my deficiency.

Sir G. Ha, ha! and did you draw?

Mar. Draw, sir! why I did but lay my hand upon my sword to make a swift retreat, and he roared out. Now the deil a ma saul, sir, gin ye touch yer steel I'll se whip mine through yer wem.

Sir G. Ha, ha, ha!

Charles. Ha, ha, ha, ha! Safe was the word. So you walked off, I suppose.

Mar. Yes, for I avoid fighting, purely to be serviceable to my friends, you know.

Sir G. Your friends are much obliged to you, sir; I hope you will rank me in that number.

Mar. Sir George, a bow from the side-box, or to be seen in your chariot, binds me ever yours.

Sir G. Trifles; you may command them when you please.

Charles. Provided he may command you.

Mar. Me! why I live for no other purpose. Sir George, I have the honour to be caressed by most of the reigning toasts of the town: I'll tell them you are the finest gentleman—

Sir G. No, no, pr'ythee let me alone to tell the ladies my parts. Can you convey a letter upon occasion, or deliver a message with an air of business, ha?

Mar. With the assurance of a page and the gravity of a statesman.

Sir G. You know Miranda?

Mar. What! my sister ward! why, her guardian is mine; we are fellow sufferers. Ah! he is a covetous, cheating, sanctified, curnudgeon: that Sir Francis Gripe is a d—d old—hypocritical—

Charles. Hold, hold; I suppose, friend, you forget that he is my father.

Mar. I ask your pardon, Charles, but it is for your sake I hate him. Well, I say, the world is mistaken in him; his outside piety makes him every man's executor, and his inside cunning makes him every heir's gaoler. 'Egad, Charles, I'm half persuaded that thou art some ward too, and never of his getting; for never were two things so unlike as you and your father; he scrapes up everything, and thou spendest every thing; everybody is indebted to him, and thou art indebted to everybody.

Charles. You are very free, Mr. Marplot.

Mar. Ay, I give and take, Charles; you may be as free with me, you know.

Sir G. A pleasant fellow.

Charles. The dog is diverting sometimes, or there would be no enduring his impertinence. He is pressing to be employed, and willing to execute; but some ill fate generally attends all he undertakes, and he oftener spoils an intrigue than helps it.

Mar. I have always your good word; but if I miscarry, 'tis none of my fault; I follow my instructions.

Charles. Yes, witness the merchant's wife.

Mar. Pish, poh! that was an accident.

Sir G. What was it, pr'ythee?

Mar. Nay, Charles, now don't expose your friend.

Charles. Why, you must know I had lent a certain merchant my hunting horses, and was to have met his wife in his absence. Sending him along with my groom to make the compliment, and to deliver a letter to the lady at the same time, what does he do but gives the husband the letter and offers her the horses!

Mar. Why to be sure I did offer her the horses, and I remember you was even with me, for you denied the letter to be yours, and swore I had a design upon her, which my bones paid for.

Charles. Come, Sir George, let us walk round, if you are not engaged, for I have sent my man upon a little earnest business, and I have ordered him to bring me the answer into the park.

Mar. Business! and I not know it! 'Egad, I'll watch him. [Aside.]

Sir G. I must beg your pardon, Charles, I am to meet your father.

Charles. My father!

Sir G. Ay, and about the oddest bargain perhaps you ever heard of; but I'll not impart till I know the success.

Mar. What can his business be with Sir Francis? Now would I give all the world to know it. Why the devil should not one know every man's concerns?

[Aside.]

Charles. Prosperity to't, whatever it be: I have private affairs too: over a bottle we'll compare notes.

Mar. Charles knows I love a glass as well as any man; I'll make one; shall it be to-night? I long to know their secrets. [Aside.]

Enter WHISPER.

Whis. Sir, sir, Mrs. Patch says Isabinda's Spanish father has quite spoiled the plot, and she cannot meet you in the park, but he infallibly will go out this afternoon, she says; but I must step again to know the hour.

Mar. What did Whisper say now? I shall go stark mad if I'm not let into the secret. [Aside.]

Charles. Curst misfortune!

Mar. Curst! what's curst, Charles?

Charles. Come along with me; my heart feels pleasure at her name. Sir George, yours; we'll meet at the old place, the usual hour.

Sir G. Agreed, I think I see Sir Francis yonder.

[Exit.]

Charles. Marplot, you must excuse me; I am engaged. [Exit.]

Mar. Engaged! Egad, I'll engage my life I'll know what your engagement is. [Exit.]

Enter MIRANDA.

Mir. Let the chair wait. My servant, that dogged Sir George, said he was in the park.

Enter PATCH.

Ha! Miss Patch alone! did not you tell me you had contrived a way to bring Isabinda to the park?

Patch. Oh, madam, your ladyship cannot imagine what a wretched disappointment we have met with! Just as I had fetched a suit of my clothes for a disguise, comes my old master into his closet, which is right against her chamber door: this struck us into a terrible fright; at length I put on a grave face, and asked him if he was at leisure for his chocolate? in hopes to draw him out of his hole; but he snapp'd my nose off: "No, I shall be busy here these two hours." At which my poor mistress, seeing no way of escape, ordered me to wait on your ladyship with the sad relation.

Mir. Unhappy Isabinda! was ever any thing so unaccountable as the humour of Sir Jealous Traffick?

Patch. Oh, madam, it's his living so long in Spain; he vows he'll spend half his estate but he'll be a parliament man, on purpose to bring in a bill for women to wear veils, and other odious Spanish customs. He swears it is the height of impudence to have a woman seen barefaced even at church, and scarce believes there's a true begotten child in the city.

Mir. Ha, ha, ha! how the old fool torments himself! Suppose he could introduce his rigid rules, does he think we could not match them in contrivance? No, no! let the tyrant man make what laws he will, if there's a woman under the government, I warrant she finds a way to break them. Is his mind set upon the Spaniard for a son-in-law, still?

Patch. Ay, and he expects him by the next fleet, which drives his daughter to melancholy and despair. But, madam, I find you retain the same gay, cheerful spirit you had when I waited on your ladyship. My lady is mighty good-humoured too, and I have found a way to make Sir Jealous believe I am wholly in his interest, when my real design is to serve her: he makes me her gaoler, and I set her at liberty.

Mir. I knew thy prolific brain would be of singular service to her, or I had not parted with thee to her father.

Patch. But, madam, the report is that you are going to marry your guardian.

Mir. It is necessary such a report should be, Patch.

Patch. But is it true, madam?

Mir. That's not absolutely necessary.

Patch. I thought it was only the old strain, coaxing him still for your own, and railing at all the young fellows about town: in my mind now, you are as ill plagued with your guardian, madam, as my lady is with her father.

Mir. No, I have liberty, wench; that she wants: what would she give now to be in this dishabille in the open air; nay more, in pursuit of the young fellow she likes? for that's my case, I assure you.

Patch. As for that, madam, she's even with you; for though she cannot come abroad, we have a way to bring him home in spite of old Argus.

Mir. Now, Patch, your opinion of my choice, for here he comes. Ha! my guardian with him! what can be the meaning of this? I'm sure Sir Francis can't know me in this dress. Let's observe them. [They withdraw.]

Enter SIR FRANCIS GRIPE and SIR GEORGE AIRY.

Sir F. Verily, Sir George, thou wilt repent throwing away thy money so, for I tell thee sincerely, Miranda, my charge, does not like a young fellow; they are all vicious, and seldom make good husbands. In sober sadness she cannot abide them.

Mir. [Peeping.] In sober sadness, you are mistaken. What can this mean?

Sir G. Lookye, Sir Francis, whether she can or cannot abide young fellows is not the business: will you take the fifty guineas?

Sir F. In good troth I will not; for I knew thy father, he was a hearty, wary man, and I cannot consent that his son should squander away what he saved to no purpose.

Mir. [Peeping.] Now, in the name of wonder, what bargain can he be driving about me for fifty guineas?

Sir G. Well, Sir Francis, since you are so conscientious for my father's sake, then permit me the favour gratis.

Sir F. No, verily; if thou dost not buy thy experience thou wilt never be wise; therefore give me a hundred and try thy fortune.

Sir G. The scruples arose, I find, from the scanty sum. Let me see—a hundred guineas. [Takes the money out of a purse and chinks it.] Ha! they have a very pretty sound, and a very pleasing look. But then, Miranda; but if she should be cruel—

Sir F. Ay, do consider on't. He, he, he!

Sir G. No, I'll do it. Come, to the point; here is the gold; sum up the conditions. [Sir Francis pulls out a paper.]

Mir. [Peeping.] Ay, for heaven's sake do, for my expectation is on the rack.

Sir F. Well, at your peril be it.

Sir G. Ay, go on.

Sir F. Imprimis, you are to be admitted into my house in order to move your suit to Miranda, for the space of ten minutes, without let or molestation, provided I remain in the same room.

Sir G. But out of ear-shot.

Sir F. Well, well, I don't desire to hear what you say; ha, ha, ha! In consideration I am to have that purse and a hundred guineas.

Sir G. Take it. [Gives him the purse.] And this agreement is to be performed to-day?

Sir F. Ay, ay; the sooner the better. Poor fool! how Miranda and I shall laugh at him! [Aside.] Well, Sir George, ha, ha, ha! take the last sound of your guineas, ha, ha, ha! [Chinks them. Exit.]

Mir. [Peeping.] Sure he does not know that I am Miranda.

Sir G. A very extraordinary bargain I have made, truly; if she should be really in love with this old cuff now? Psha! that's morally impossible. But then, what hopes have I to succeed? I never spoke to her.

Mir. [Peeping.] Say you so? then I am safe.

Sir G. What, though my tongue never spoke, my eyes said a thousand things, and my hopes flattered me her's answered them. If I am lucky—if not, it is but a hundred guineas thrown away. [Miranda comes forward.]

Mir. Upon what, Sir George?

Sir G. Ha! my incognita! upon a woman, madam.

Mir. They are the worst things you can deal in, and damage the soonest; your very breath destroys them, and I fear you'll never see your return, Sir George, ha, ha!

Sir G. Were they more brittle than china, and dropped to pieces with a touch, every atom of her I have ventured at, if she is but mistress of thy wit, balances ten times the sum. Pr'ythee, let me see thy face.

Mir. By no means; that may spoil your opinion of my sense.

Sir G. Rather confirm it, madam.

Patch. So rob the lady of your gallantry, sir.

Sir G. No child, a dish of chocolate, in the morning never spoils my dinner; the other lady I design for a set meal; so there's no danger.

Mir. Matrimony! ha, ha, ha! what crimes have you committed against the god of love, that he should revenge them so severely, as to stamp husband on your forehead?

Sir G. For my folly, in having so often met you here without pursuing the laws of nature and exercising her commands: but I resolve ere we part now to know who you are, where you live, what kind of flesh and blood your face is; therefore unmask, and don't put me to the trouble of doing it for you.

Mir. My face is the same flesh and blood with my hand, Sir George; which if you will be so rude to provoke—

Sir G. You'll apply to my cheek; the ladies' favours are always welcome, but I must have that cloud withdrawn. [Taking hold of her.] Remember you are in the park, child; and what a terrible thing would it be to lose this pretty white hand!

Mir. And how it will sound in a chocolate-house, that Sir George Airy rudely pulled off a lady's mask, when he had given her his honour that he never would, directly or indirectly, endeavour to know her till she gave him leave?

Sir G. But if that lady thinks fit to pursue and meet me at every turn, like some troubled spirit, shall I be blamed if I inquire into the reality? I would have nothing dissatisfied in a female shape.

Mir. What shall I do? [Pauses.]

Sir G. Ay, pr'ythee, consider, for thou shalt find me very much at thy service.

Patch. Suppose, sir, the lady should be in love with you?

Sir C. Oh! I'll return the obligation in a moment.

Patch. And marry her?

Sir G. Ha, ha, ha! that's not the way to love her, child.

Mir. If he discovers me I shall die. Which way shall I escape? let me see. [Pauses.]

Sir G. Well, madam.

Mir. I have it. Sir George, 'tis fit you should allow something; if you'll excuse my face, and turn your back (if you look upon me I shall sink, even masked as I am,) I will confess why I have engaged you so often, who I am, and where I live.

Sir G. Well, to shew you I am a man of honour, I accept the conditions: let me but once know those, and the face won't be long a secret to me.

Patch. What do you mean, madam? [Aside to Miranda.]

Mir. To get off. [Aside to Patch.]

Sir G. 'Tis something indecent to turn one's back upon a lady; but you command, and I obey. [Turns his back.] Come, madam, begin.

Mir. First, then it was my unhappy lot to see you at Paris [Draws back a little way, and speaks], at a ball upon a birth-day; your shape and air charmed my eyes, your wit and complaisance my soul, and from that fatal night I loved you. [Drawing back.]

*And when you left the place, grief seiz'd me so,
Nor rest my heart, nor sleep my eyes could know;
Last, I resolv'd a hazardous point to try,
And quit the place in search of liberty.*

[Exit, followed by Patch.]

Sir G. Excellent! I hope she's handsome. Well, now, madam, to the two other things, your name, and where you live. I am a gentleman, and this confession will not be lost upon me. Nay, pr'ythee, don't weep, but go on, for I find my heart melts in thy behalf. Speak quickly, or I shall turn about. Not yet; poor lady! she expects I should comfort her, and, to do her justice, she has said enough to encourage me. [Turns about.] Ha! gone! the devil! jilted! Why, what a tale she has invented, of Paris, balls, and birth-days! 'Egad, I'd give ten guineas to know who the gipsy is. A curse of my folly; I deserve to lose her. What woman can forgive a man that turns his back?

*The bold and resolute in love and war
To conquer take the right and swiftest way:
The boldest lover soonest gains the fair,
As courage makes the rudest force obey;
Take no denial, and the dames adore ye;
Closely pursue them, and they fall before ye.*

[Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Room in Sir Francis Gripe's house.

Enter SIR FRANCIS GRIFE and MIRANDA.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha!

Mir. Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha! Oh! I shall die with laughing: the most romantic adventure. Ha, ha, ha! what does the odious young fop mean? A hundred pieces to talk ten minutes with me! ha, ha, ha, ha!

Sir F. And I am to be by too, there's the jest, adad, if it had been in private, I should not have cared to trust the young dog.

Mir. Indeed and indeed but you might, gardy. Now methinks there's nobody handsomer than you : so neat, so clean, so good-humoured, and so loving.

Sir F. Pretty rogue, pretty rogue ! and so thou shalt find me, if thou dost prefer thy gardy before these capers of the age : thou shalt outshine the queen's box on an opera night ; thou shalt be the envy of the ring (for I will carry thee to Hyde-park,) and thy equipage shall surpass the—what d'y'e call 'em ambassador's ?

Mir. Nay, I am sure the discreet part of my sex will envy me more for the inside furniture, when you are in it, than my outside equipage.

Sir F. A cunning baggage, ifaith thou art, and a wise one too ! and to shew thee that thou hast not chosen amiss, I'll this moment disinheret my son and settle my whole estate upon thee.

Mir. There's an old rogue now. [Aside.] No, gardy, I would not have your name be so black in the world. You know my father's will runs that I am not to possess my estate, without your consent, till I am five-and-twenty ; you shall only abate the odd seven years, and make me mistress of my estate to-day, and I'll make you master of my person to-morrow.

Sir F. Humph ! that may not be safe. No, chargy, I'll settle it upon thee for pin money, and that will be every bit as well, thou knowest.

Mir. Unconscionable old wretch ! bribe me with my own money ! Which way shall I get out of his hands ? [Aside.]

Sir F. Well, what art thou thinking on, my girl, ha ! how to banter Sir George ?

Mir. I must not pretend to banter ; he knows my tongue too well. [Aside.] No, gardy, I have thought of a way will confound him more than all I could say, if I could talk to him seven years.

Sir F. How's that ? oh ! I'm transported, I'm ravished, I'm mad.

Mir. It would make you mad if you knew all. [Aside.] I'll not answer him a word, but be dumb to all he says.

Sir F. Dumb ! good ; ha, ha, ha ! Excellent ! ha, ha, ha, ha ! I think I have you now, Sir George. Dumb ! he'll go distracted ; well, she is the wittiest rogue. Ha, ha ! dumb ! I can't but laugh, ha, ha ! to think how d—d mad he'll be when he finds he has given his money away for a dumb shew ! ha, ha, ha !

Mir. Nay, gardy, if he did but know my thoughts of him it would make him ten times madder ; ha, ha, ha, ha !

Sir F. Ay, so it would, chargy, to hold him in such derision, to scorn to answer him, to be dumb ; ha, ha, ha

Enter CHARLES.

How now, sirrah ! who let you in ?

Charles. My necessities, sir.

Sir F. Your necessities are very impertinent, and ought to have sent before they entered.

Charles. Sir, I knew it was a word would gain admittance nowhere.

Sir F. Then, sirrah, how durst you rudely thrust that upon your father which nobody else would admit ?

Charles. Sure the name of a son is a sufficient plea ! I ask this lady's pardon, if I have intruded.

Sir F. Ay, ay, ask her pardon and her blessing too, if you expect anything from me.

Mir. I believe your's, Sir Francis, and a purse of guineas, would be more material. Your son may have business with you ; I'll retire.

Sir F. I guess his business, but I'll dispatch him ;

I expect the knight every minute : you'll be in readiness ?

Mir. Certainly. My expectation is more upon the wing than yours, old gentleman. [Aside, and exit.]

Sir F. Well, sir.

Charles. Nay, it is very ill, sir ; my circumstances are, I'm sure.

Sir F. And what's that to me, sir ? your management should have made them better.

Charles. If you please to entrust me with the management of my estate, I shall endeavour it, sir.

Sir F. What, to set upon a card, and buy a lady's favour at the price of a thousand pieces—to rig out an equipage for a wench—or by your carelessness to enrich your steward to fine for sheriff, or put up for a parliament man.

Charles. I hope I should not spend it this way : however, I ask only for what my uncle left me ; yours you may dispose of as you please, sir.

Sir F. That I shall, out of your reach, I assure you, sir. Adad, these young fellows think old men get estates for nothing but for them to squander away in dicing, wenching, drinking, dressing, and so forth.

Charles. I think I was born a gentleman, sir ; I am sure my uncle bred me like one.

Sir F. From which you would infer, sir, that gambling and wenching are requisites for a gentleman.

Charles. Monstrous ! when I would ask him only for a support, he falls into these unmannerly reproaches. I must, though against my will, employ invention, and by stratagem relieve myself. [Aside.]

Sir F. Sirrah, what is it you mutter, sirrah, ha ? [Holds up his cane.] I say you sha'n't have a groat out of my hands till I please, and may be I'll never please ; and what's that to you ?

Charles. Nay, to be robbed or have one's throat cut is not much.

Sir F. What's that, sirrah ! would you rob me or cut my throat, you rogue ?

Charles. Heaven forbid, sir ! I said no such thing.

Sir F. Mercy on me ! what a plague it is to have a son of one-and-twenty, who wants to elbow one out of one's life to edge himself into the estate !

Enter MARPLOT.

Mar. 'Egad he's here. I was afraid I had lost him : his secret could not be with his father ; his wants are public there. Guardian, your servant. O Charles, are you there ? I know by that sorrowful countenance of thine, the old man's fist is as close as his strong box. But I'll help thee. [Aside.]

Sir F. So ! here's another extravagant coxcomb, that will spend his fortune before he comes to it ! but he shall pay swinging interest, and so let the fool go on. Well, what, does necessity bring you too, sir ?

Mar. You have hit it, guardian. I want a hundred pounds.

Sir F. For what ?

Mar. Poh ! for a hundred things ; I can't for my life tell you for what.

Charles. Sir, I suppose I have received all the answer I am like to have ?

Mar. O, the devil ! if he gets out before me I shall lose him again. [Aside.]

Sir F. Ay, sir, and you may be marching as soon as you please. I must see a change in your temper, ere you find one in mine.

Mar. Pray, sir, despatch me ; the money, sir ; I'm in mighty haste.

Sir F. Fool, take this and go to the cashier. I shall not be long plagued with thee.

[Gives him a note]

Mar. Devil take the cashier! I shall certainly have Charles gone before I come back.

[Exit, running.]

Charles. Well, sir, I take my leave; but remember you expose an only son to all the miseries of wretched poverty, which too often lays the plan for scenes of mischief.

Sir F. Stay, Charles! I have a sudden thought come into my head which may prove to thy advantage.

Charles. Ha! does he relent?

Sir F. My Lady Wrinkle, worth forty thousand pounds, sets up for a handsome young husband; she praised thee the other day; though the match-makers can get twenty guineas for a sight of her, I can introduce thee for nothing.

Charles. My Lady Wrinkle, sir! why she has but one eye.

Sir F. Then she'll see but half your extravagance, sir.

Charles. Condemn me to such a piece of deformity! a toothless, dirty, wry-necked, hunch-backed hag!

Sir F. Hunch-backed! so much the better! then she has a rest for her misfortunes, for thou wilt load her swingingly. Now, I warrant, you think this is no offer of a father; forty thousand pounds is nothing with you.

Charles. Yes, sir, I think it too much; a young beautiful woman with half the money would be more agreeable. I thank you, sir; but you choose better for yourself, I find.

Sir F. Out of my doors, you dog! you pretend to meddle with my marriage, sirrah!

Charles. Sir, I obey you, but—

Sir F. But me no buts—begone, sir! dare to ask me for money again!—refuse forty thousand pounds! Out of my doors, I say, without reply.

[Exit CHARLES.]

Enter MARPLOT, running.

Mar. Ha! gone! is Charles gone, gardy?

Sir F. Yes, and I desire your wise worship to walk after him.

Mar. Nay, egad I shall run, I tell you that. A plague of the cashier for detaining me so long! Where the devil shall I find him now? I shall certainly lose this secret, and I had rather by half lose my money. Where shall I find him now? D'ye know where Charles is gone, gardy?

Sir F. Gone to the devil, and you may go after him.

Mar. Ay, that I will as fast as I can. [Going, returns.] Have you any commands there, gardy?

[Exit.]

Sir F. What, is the fellow distracted?

Enter Servant.

Serv. Sir George Airy inquires for you, sir.

Sir F. Desire Sir George to walk up. [Exit Servant.] Now for a trial of skill, that will make me happy and him a fool. Ha, ha, ha! In my mind he looks like an ass already.

Enter Sir GEORGE AIRY.

Well, Sir George, do you hold in the same mind, or would you capitulate? ha, ha, ha! Look, here are the guineas. [Chinks them.] Ha, ha, ha!

Sir G. Not if they were twice the sum, Sir Francis; therefore be brief, call in the lady, and take your post.

Sir F. Agreed. Miranda!

[Exit.]

Sir G. If she's a woman, and not seduced by witchcraft, to this old rogue, I'll make his heart ache; for if she has but one grain of inclination about her, I'll vary a thousand shapes but find it.

Re-enter Sir FRANCIS GRIPE and MIRANDA.

Sir G. So from the eastern chambers breaks the sun,
Dispers the clouds, and gilds the vales below.

[Salutes her.]

Sir F. Hold, sir! kissing was not in our agreement.

Sir G. Oh! that's by way of prologue. Pr'ythee, old Mammon, to thy post.

Sir F. [Takes out his watch.] Well, young Timon, 'tis uow four exactly; ten minutes, remember, is your utmost limit; not a minute more. [Retires.]

Sir G. Madam, whether you'll excuse or blame my love, the author of this rash proceeding depends upon your pleasure, as also the life of your admirer; your sparkling eyes speak a heart susceptible of love, your vivacity a soul too delicate to admit the embraces of decayed mortality. Shake off this tyrant guardian's yoke; assume yourself, and dash his bold, aspiring hopes. The deity of his desires is avarice, a heretic in love, and ought to be banished by the queen of beauty. [Kneels.] See, madam, a faithful servant kneels, and begs to be admitted in the number of your slaves.

[MIRANDA gives him her hand to raise him.]

Sir F. [Comes forward.] Hold, hold, hold! no palming; that's contrary to articles.

Sir G. 'Sdeath, sir! keep your distance, or I'll write another article in your guts.

[Lays his hand to his sword.]

Sir F. [Going back.] A bloody-minded fellow!

Sir G. Not answer me! perhaps she thinks my address too grave: I'll be more free. [Aside.] Can you be so unconscionable, madam, to let me say all these fine things to you without one single compliment in return?

Sir F. [Running up with his watch in his hand.] There's five of the ten minutes gone, Sir George. Adad! I don't like those close conferences.

Sir G. More interruptions! You will have it, sir.

[Lays his hand to his sword.]

Sir F. [Going back.] No, no; you sha'n't have her, neither.

[Aside.]

Sir G. Dumb still! Sure, this old dog has enjoin'd her silence. I'll try another way. [Aside.] Madam, these few minutes cost me an hundred pounds, and, would you answer me, I could purchase the whole day so. However, madam, you must give me leave to make the best interpretation I can for my money, and take the indication of your silence for the secret liking of my person; therefore, madam, I will instruct you how to keep your word inviolate to Sir Francis, and yet answer me to every question: as for example, when I ask anything to which you would reply in the affirmative, gently nod your head, thus [nods]; and when in the negative, thus [shakes his head]; and in the doubtful, a tender sigh, thus [sighs].

Mir. How every action charms me! But I'll fit him for signs, I warrant him.

[Aside.]

Sir G. Was it by his desire that you are dumb, madam, to all I can say? [Mir. nods.] Very well; she's tractable, I find. [Aside.] And is it possible that you can love him? [Mir. nods.] Miraculous! Pardon the bluntness of my questions, for my time is short. May I not hope to supplant him in your esteem? [Mir. sighs.] Good! she answers me as I could wish. [Aside.] You'll not consent to marry him then? [Mir. sighs.] How! doubtful in that? Undone again! Humph! but that may proceed from his power to keep her out of her estate till twenty-five: I'll try that. [Aside.] Come, madam, I cannot think you hesitate in this affair out of any motive but your fortune: let him keep it till those few years are expired; make me happy with your person, let him enjoy your wealth. [MIR. holds up her hands.] Why, what sign is that now? Nay, nay, madam, except you observe my lesson I can't understand your meaning.

Sir F. What a vengeance! are they talking by signs? 'Ad! I may be fooled here. [Aside.] What do you mean, Sir George?

Sir G. To cut your throat, if you dare mutter another syllable.

Sir F. 'Od! I wish he were fairly out of my house. [Aside.]

Sir G. Pray, madam, will you answer me to the purpose? [Miranda shakes her head, and points to Sir Francis.] What does she mean? She won't answer me to the purpose; or is she afraid you old cuff should understand her signs? ay, it must be that. [Aside.] I perceive, madam, you are too apprehensive of the promise you have made, to follow my rules, therefore, I'll suppose your mind, and answer for you. First for myself, madam; "That I am in love with you is an infallible truth." Now for you. [Turns on her side.] "Indeed, sir! and may I believe it?" "As certainly, madam, as that 'tis daylight, or that I die if you persist in silence. Bless me with the music of your voice, and raise my spirits to their proper heaven. [Kneels.] Thus low let me entreat! ere I am obliged to quit this place, grant me some token of a favourable reception, to keep my hopes alive." [Arises hastily, and turns on her side.] "Rise, sir, and since my guardian's presence will not allow me privilege of tongue, read that, and rest assured you are not indifferent to me." [Offers her a letter, she strikes it down.] Ha! right woman! but no matter; I'll go on. [Aside.]

Sir F. Ha! what's that? a letter! Ha, ha, ha! thou art balked.

Sir G. Ha! a letter! Oh! let me kiss it with the same raptures that I would do the dear hand that touched it. [Opens it.] Now for a quick fancy, and a long extempore. [Aside.]

Sir F. [Coming up hastily.] The time is expired, sir, and you must take your leave. There, my girl; there's the hundred pounds which thou hast won. Go; I'll be with you presently. Ha, ha, ha, ha!

[Exit Miranda.]

Sir G. Adsheart, madam! you won't leave me just in the nick, will you?

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! she has nicked you, Sir George, I think! ha, ha, ha! Have you any more hundred pounds to throw away upon courtship? ha, ha, ha!

Sir G. He, he, he, he! A curse of your fleering jests! Yet, however ill I have succeeded, I'll venture the same wager she does not value thee a spoonful of snuff; nay, more, though you enjoined her silence to me, you'll never make her speak to the purpose with yourself.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! Did I not tell thee thou would'st repent thy money? Did I not say she hated young fellows? ha, ha, ha!

Sir G. And I am positive she is not in love with age.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! No matter for that; ha, ha! She is not taken with your youth, nor your rhetoric to boot; ha, ha!

Sir G. Whatever her reasons are for disliking of me, I am certain she can be taken with nothing about thee.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! how he swells with envy! Poor man, poor man! ha, ha, ha! I must beg your pardon, Sir George; Miranda will be impatient to have her share of mirth. Verily, we shall laugh at thee most egregiously; ha, ha, ha!

Sir G. With all my heart, faith! I shall laugh in my turn too; for if you dare marry her, old Belzebub, you will be cuckolded most egregiously: remember that, and tremble. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Sir Jealous Traffick's House.

Enter SIR JEALOUS TRAFFICK, ISABINDA, and PATCH.

Sir J. What! in the balcony again—notwithstanding my positive commands to the contrary? Why don't you write a bill on your forehead to shew passengers there's something to be let?

Isa. What harm can there be in a little fresh air, sir?

Sir J. Is your constitution so hot, mistress, that it wants cooling, ha? Apply the virtuous Spanish rules; banish your taste and thoughts of flesh, feed upon roots, and quench your thirst with water.

Isa. That, and a close room, would certainly make me die of the vapours.

Sir J. No, mistress, 'tis your high-fed, lusty, rambling, rampant ladies that are troubled with the vapours: 'tis your ratafia, persico, cinnamon, citron, and spirit of clara, cause such swimming in the brain, that carries many a guinea full tide to the doctor: but you are not to be bred this way: no galloping abroad, no receiving visits at home—for in our loose country, the women are as dangerous as the men.

Patch. So I told her, sir; and that it was not decent to be seen in a balcony; but she threatened to slap my chops, and told me I was her servant, not her governess.

Sir J. Did she so? but I'll make her to know that you are her duenna. Oh! that incomparable custom of Spain! Why, here is no depending upon old women in my country, for they are as wanton at eighty as a girl of eighteen; and a man may as safely trust to Asgil's translation, as to his great-grandmother's not marrying again.

Isa. Or to the Spanish ladies' veils and duennas for the safeguard of their honour.

Sir J. Dare to ridicule the cautious conduct of that wise nation, and I'll have you locked up this fortnight, without a peep-hole.

Isa. If we had but the ghostly helps in England which they have in Spain, I might deceive you if you did. Let me tell you, sir, confinement sharpens the invention, as want of sight strengthens the other senses, and is often more pernicious than the recreation that innocent liberty allows.

Sir J. Say you so, mistress? Who the devil taught you the art of reasoning? I assure you they must have a greater faith than I pretend to, that can think any woman innocent that requires liberty; therefore, Patch, to your charge I give her; lock her up till I come back from Change. I shall have some sauntering coxcomb, with nothing but a red coat and a feather, think, by leaping into her arms, to leap into my estate; but I'll prevent them; she shall be only Signior Babinetto's.

Patch. Really, sir, I wish you would employ any body else in this affair; I lead a life like a dog in obeying your commands. Come, madam, will you be locked up?

Isa. Ay! to enjoy more freedom than he is aware of. [Aside.—Exit with Patch.]

Sir J. I believe this wench is very true to my interest : I am happy I met with her : if I can but keep my daughter from being blown upon till Signior Babinetto arrives, he shall marry her as soon as he comes, and carry her to Spain as soon as he has married her. She has a pregnant wit, and I would no more have her an English wife than the grand signior's mistress. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—Outside of Sir JEALOUS TRAFFICK'S House.

Sir J. comes from his House, looks about, then exit.

Enter WHISPER.

Whis. So ; there goes Sir Jealous : where shall I find Mrs. Patch, now ?

Enter PATCH.

Patch. Oh, Mr. Whisper ! my lady saw you out of the window, and ordered me to bid you fly and let your master know she's now alone.

Whis. Hush ! speak softly ! I go, I go. But Jarkye, Mrs. Patch, shall not you and I have a little confabulation, when my master and your lady are engaged ?

Patch. Ay, ay ; farewell.

[Goes in and shuts the door. Whisper peeps after her through the key-hole.]

Re-enter Sir JEALOUS TRAFFICK.

Sir J. Sure, whilst I was talking with Mr. Trade-well, I heard my door clap. [Seeing Whisper.] Ha ! a man lurking about my house ! Who do you want there, sir ?

Whis. Want—want ? A plague ! Sir Jealous ! What must I say now ? [Aside.]

Sir J. Ay, want. Have you a letter or message for anybody there ? O my conscience ! this is some he-bawd.

Whis. Letter or message, sir ?

Sir J. Ay ; letter or message, sir !

Whis. No, not I, sir.

Sir J. Sirrah, sirrah ! I'll have you set in the stocks if you don't tell your business immediately.

Whis. Nay, sir, my business is no great matter of business neither ; and yet, 'tis business of consequence too.

Sir J. Sirrah, don't trifle with me.

Whis. Trifle, sir ! have you found him, sir ?

Sir J. Found what, you rascal ?

Whis. Why, Trifle is the very lapdog my lady lost, sir ; I fancied I saw him run into this house. I am glad you have found him, sir ; my lady will be overjoyed that I have found him.

Sir J. Who is your lady, friend ?

Whis. My Lady Lovepuppy, sir.

Sir J. My lady Lovepuppy, sir ! then, pr'ythee, carry thyself to her, for I know of no other whelp that belongs to her ; and let me catch you no more puppy-hunting about my doors, lest I have you pressed into the service, sirrah !

Whis. By no means, sir : your humble servant. I must watch whether he goes or no, before I can tell my master. [Aside.—Exit.]

Sir J. This fellow has the officious leer of a pimp, and I half suspect a design ; but I'll be upon them before they think on me, I warrant them.

[Exit into the house.]

SCENE IV.—Charles's Lodgings.

Enter CHARLES and MARPLOT.

Charles. Honest Marplot, I thank thee for this supply. I expect my lawyer with a thousand pounds

I have ordered him to take up, and then you shall be repaid.

Mar. Pho, pho ! no more of that. Here comes Sir George Airy.

Enter Sir GEORGE AIRY.

cursedly out of humour at his disappointment. See how he looks ! ha, ha, ha !

Sir G. Ah, Charles ! I am so humbled in my pretensions to plots upon women, that I believe I shall never have courage enough to attempt a chambermaid again. I'll tell thee—

Charles. Ha, ha ! I'll spare you the relation by telling you : impatient to know your business with my father, when I saw you enter I slipped back into the next room, where I overheard every syllable.

Mar. Did you, Charles ? I wish I had been with you.

Sir G. That I said ; but I'll be hanged if you heard her answer. But, pr'ythee, tell me, Charles, is she a fool ?

Charles. I never suspected her for one ; but Marplot can inform you better, if you'll allow him a judge.

Mar. A fool ! I'll justify she has more wit than all the rest of her sex put together. Why, she'll rally me till I ha'n't a word to say for myself.

Charles. A mighty proof of her wit, truly !

Mar. There must be some trick in it, Sir George ; egad ! I'll find it out, if it cost me the sum you paid for it.

Sir G. Do, and command me.

Mar. Enough : let me alone to trace a secret.

Enter WHISPER, who speaks aside to his master.

The devil ! he here again ! d—n that fellow, he never speaks out. Is this the same, or a new secret ?—[Aside.] You may speak out, here are none but friends.

Charles. Pardon me, Marplot, 'tis a secret.

Mar. A secret ! ay, or, ecod ! I would not give a farthing for it. Sir George, won't you ask Charles what news Whisper brings ?

Sir G. Not I, sir ; I suppose it does not relate to me.

Mar. Lord, lord ! how little curiosity some people have ! Now my chief pleasure is in knowing everybody's business. [Exit Whisper.]

Sir G. I fancy, Charles, thou hast some engagement upon thy hands ?

Mar. Have you, Charles ?

Sir G. I have a little business too.

Mar. Have you, Sir George ?

Sir G. Marplot, if it falls in your way to bring me any intelligence from Miranda, you'll find me at the Thatched-house, at six.

Mar. You do me much honour.

Charles. You guess right, Sir George ; wish me success.

Sir G. Better than attended me. Adieu. [Exit.]

Charles. Marplot, you must excuse me.

Mar. Nay, nay ; what need of any excuse amongst friends ? I'll go with you.

Charles. Indeed you must not.

Mar. No ! then I suppose 'tis a duel ; and I will go to secure you.

Charles. Well, but 'tis no duel ; consequently, no danger ; therefore, pr'ythee, be answered.

Mar. What is't, a mistress, then ? Mum ! you know I can be silent upon occasion.

Charles. I wish you could be civil too ; I tell you, you neither must nor shall go with me. Farewell. [Exit.]

Mar. Why, then, I must and will follow you. [Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Street.

Enter CHARLES.

Charles. Well! here's the house which holds the lovely prize, quiet and serene: here no noisy footmen throng to tell the world that beauty dwells within; no ceremonious visit makes the lover wait, no rival to give my heart a pang. Who would not scale the window at midnight without fear of the jealous father's pistol, rather than fill up the train of a coquette, where every minute he is jostled out of place? [Knocks softly.] Mrs. Patch, Mrs. Patch!

Enter PATCH from the House.

Patch. Oh! are you come, sir? All's safe.

Charles. So! in—in then. [They go in.]

Enter MARPLOT.

Mar. There he goes! Who the devil lives here? Except I find out that, I am as far from knowing his business as ever. Gad! I'll watch; it may be a bawdy-house, and he may have his throat cut. I there should be any mischief, I can make oath he went in. Well, Charles, in spite of your endeavours to keep me out of the secret, I may save your life, for aught I know. At that corner I'll plant myself; there I shall see whoever goes in or comes out. Gad! I love discoveries. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Chamber in the house of Sir Jealous Traffick.

Enter CHARLES, ISABINDA, and PATCH.

Isa. Patch, look out sharp; have a care of dad.

Patch. I warrant you. [Exit.]

Isa. Well, sir, if I may judge your love by your courage, I ought to believe you sincere; for you venture into the lion's den when you come to see me.

Charles. If you'll consent, whilst the furious beast is abroad, I'd free you from the reach of his paws.

Isa. That would be but to avoid one danger by running into another—like poor wretches, who fly the burning ship, and meet their fate in the water. Come, come, Charles; I fear, if I consult my reason, confinement and plenty are better than liberty and starving. I know you would make the frolic pleasing for a little time, by saying and doing a world of tender things; but when our small substance is exhausted, and a thousand requisites for life are wanting, love, who rarely dwells with poverty, would also fail us.

Charles. Faith! I fancy not: methinks my heart has laid up a stock will last for life; to back which, I have taken a thousand pounds upon my uncle's estate; that, surely, will support us till one of our fathers relent.

Isa. There's no trusting to that, my friend: I doubt your father will carry his humour to the grave, and mine till he sees me settled in Spain.

Charles. And can you then cruelly resolve to stay till that cursed Don arrives, and suffer that youth, beauty, fire, and wit, to be sacrificed to the arms of a dull Spaniard, to be immured, and forbid the sight of any thing that's human?

Isa. No: when it comes to that extremity, and no stratagem can relieve us, thou shalt list for a soldier, and I'll carry thy knapsack after thee.

Charles. Bravely resolved! the world cannot be more savage than our parents, and fortune generally assists the bold; therefore, consent now; why should we put it to a future hazard? who knows when we shall have another opportunity?

Isa. Oh! you have your ladder of ropes, I suppose; and the closet-window stands just where it did; and, if you ha'n't forgot to write in characters, Patch will find a way for our assignations. Thus much of the Spanish contrivance my father's severity has taught me; I thank him; though I hate the nation, I admire their management in these affairs.

Enter PATCH.

Patch. Oh, madam! I see my master coming up the street.

Charles. Oh, the devil! Would I had my ladder now! I thought you had not expected him till night. Why—why—why—why—what shall I do, madam?

Isa. Oh! for heaven's sake, don't go that way! you'll meet him full in the teeth. Oh, unlucky moment!

Charles. Adsheart! can you shut me into no cupboard, nor ram me into a chest, eh?

Patch. Impossible, sir! he searches every hole in the house.

Isa. Undone for ever! If he sees you I shall never see you more.

Patch. I have thought on it; run you to your chamber, madam; and, sir, come you along with me; I am certain you may easily get down from the balcony.

Charles. My life, adieu! Lead on, guide.

[Exit PATCH and CHARLES.]

Isa. Heavens preserve him! [Exit.]

SCENE III.—The Street.

Enter Sir JEALOUS TRAFFICK, followed by MARPLOT.

Sir J. I don't know what's the matter, but I have a strong suspicion all is not right within; that fellow's sauntering about my door!—and his tale of a puppy had the face of a lie, methought. By St. Jago, if I should find a man in the house, I'd make mince-meat of him.

Mar. Mince-meat! Ah, poor Charles! how I sweat for thee! Egad! he's old; I fancy I might bully him, and make Charles have an opinion of my courage. Egad! I'll pluck up, and have a touch with him.

Sir J. My own key shall let me in; I'll give them no warning. [Feeling for his key.]

Mar. What's that you say, sir? [Going up to Sir Jealous.]

Sir J. What's that to you, sir? [Turns quick upon him.]

Mar. Yes, 'tis to me, sir; for the gentleman you threaten is a very honest gentleman. Look to it; for if he comes not as safe out of your house as he went in—

Sir J. What! is he in then?

Mar. Yes, sir, he is in then; and I say if he does not come out, I have half-a-dozen myrmidons hard by shall beat your house about your ears.

Sir J. Ah! a combination to undo me. I'll myrmidon you, ye dog, you! Thieves, thieves! [Beats Marplot.]

Mar. Murder, murder! I was not in your house, sir.

Enter Servant.

Serv. What's the matter, sir?

Sir J. The matter, rascal! you have let a man into my house; but I'll flay him alive. Follow me;

I'll not leave a mouse-hole unsearched. If I find him, by St. Jago! I'll equip him for the opera.

[Exit.]

Mar. A deuce of his cane! There's no trusting to age. What shall I do to relieve Charles? Egad! I'll raise the neighbourhood. Murder, murder! [Charles drops down upon him from the balcony.] Charles! faith, I'm glad to see thee safe out, with all my heart!

Charles. A plague of your bawling! how the devil came you here?

Mar. Egad! it's very well for you that I was here; I have done you a piece of service: I told the old thunderbolt, that the gentleman that was gone in was—

Charles. Was it you that told him, sir? [Laying hold of him.] 'Sdeath! I could crush thee into atoms.

[Exit.]

Mar. What! will you choke me for my kindness? Will my inquiring soul never leave searching into other people's affairs till it gets squeezed out of my body? I dare not follow him now for my blood, he's in such a passion. I'll go to Miranda; if I can discover aught that may oblige Sir George, it may be a means to reconcile me again to Charles.

Sir J. [Within.] Look about! search, find him out.

Mar. Oh, the devil! there's old Crabstick again. [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—A Hall in the house of Sir Jealous Traffick.

Enter Sir JEALOUS TRAFFICK and his Servants.

Sir J. Are you sure you have searched everywhere?

Serv. Yes, from the top of the house to the bottom.

Sir J. Under the beds and over the beds?

Serv. Yes, and in them too, but found nobody, sir.

Sir J. Why, what could this rogue mean?

Enter ISABINDA and PATCH.

Patch. Take courage, madam; I saw him safe out. [Aside to ISABINDA.]

Isa. Bless me! what's the matter, sir?

Sir J. You know best. Pray, where's the man that was here just now?

Isa. What man, sir? I saw none.

Patch. Nor I, by the trust you repose in me! Do you think I would let a man come within these doors when you are absent?

Sir J. Ah, Patch! she may be too cunning for thy honesty; the very scout that he had set to give warning discovered it to me, and threatened me with half-a-dozen myrmidons; but I think I mauled the villain. These afflictions you draw upon me, mistress. [To ISABINDA.]

Isa. Pardon me, sir, 'tis your own ridiculous humour draws you into these vexations, and gives every fool pretence to banter you.

Sir J. No, 'tis your idle conduct, your coquettish flirting into the balcony. Oh! with what joy shall I resign thee into the arms of Don Diego Babinetto!

Isa. And with what industry shall I avoid him! [Aside.]

Sir J. Certainly that rogue had a message from somebody or other, but being balked by my coming popped that sham upon me. Come along, ye sots, let's see if we can find the dog again. Patch, lock her up, d'ye hear? [Exeunt Sir J. and Servants.]

Patch. Yes, sir. Ay! walk till your heels ache, you'll find nobody, I promise you.

Isa. Who could that scout be he talks of?

Patch. Nay, I can't imagine, without it was Whis-per.

Isa. Well, dear Patch! let's employ all our thoughts how to escape this horrid Don Diego; my very heart sinks at his terrible name.

Patch. Fear not, madam; Don Carlo shall be the man, or I'll lose the reputation of contriving; and then what's a chambermaid good for? [Exeunt.]

SCENE V.—Sir Francis Gripe's House.

Enter Sir FRANCIS GRIPE and MIRANDA.

Mir. Well, gardy, how did I perform the dumb scene?

Sir F. To admiration! Thou dear little rogue! let me buss thee for it: nay, adad! I will, chargy, so muzzle, and tuzzle, and hug thee; I will, i'faith! I will. [Hugging and kissing her.]

Mir. Nay, gardy, don't be so lavish. Who would ride post when the journey lasts for life?

Sir F. Oh, I'm transported! When, when, my gard, wilt thou convince the world of the happy day? when shall we marry, eh?

Mir. There's nothing wanting but your consent, Sir Francis.

Sir F. My consent! What does my charmer mean?

Mir. Nay, 'tis only a whim; but I'll have every thing according to form: therefore, when you sign an authentic paper, drawn up by an able lawyer, that I have your leave to marry, the next day makes me your's, gardy.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! a whim indeed! why is it not demonstration I give my leave when I marry thee?

Mir. Not for your reputation, gardy; the malicious world will be apt to say you tricked me into marriage, and so take the merit from my choice: now I will have the act my own, to let the idle fops see how much I prefer a man loaded with years and wisdom.

Sir F. Humph! Pr'ythee, leave out years, chargy; I'm not soold, as thou shalt find. Adad! I'm young: there's a caper for ye. [Jumps.]

Mir. Oh! never excuse it; why, I like you the better for being old: but I shall suspect you don't love me if you refuse me this formality.

Sir F. Not love thee, chargy! Adad! I do love better than—than—than—better than—what shall I say? egad! better than money; i'faith, I do.

Mir. That's false, I'm sure. [Aside.] To prove it, do this then.

Sir F. Well, I will do it, chargy, provided I bring a license at the same time.

Mir. Ay! and a parson too, if you please. Ha, ha, ha! I can't help laughing to think how all the young coxcombs about town will be mortified when they hear of our marriage.

Sir F. So they will, so they will! ha, ha, ha!

Mir. Well, I fancy, I shall be so happy with my gardy!

Sir F. If wearing pearls and jewels, or eating gold, as the old saying is, can make thee happy, thou shalt be so, my sweetest, my lovely, my charming, my—verily, I know not what to call thee.

Mir. You must know, gardy, that I am so eager to have this business concluded, that I employed my woman's brother, who is a lawyer in the Temple, to settle matters just to your liking; you are to give your consent to my marriage—which is to yourself you know; but, mum! you must take no notice of that. So then I will—that is, with your leave—put my writings into his hands; then to-morrow we come slap upon them with a wedding that nobody thought on, by which you seize me and my estate, and, I suppose, make a bonfire of your own act and deed.

Sir F. Nay, but chary, if—

Mir. Nay, gardy, no ifs. Have I refused three northern lords, two British peers, and half-a-score knights, to have you put in your ifs?

Sir F. So thou hast indeed, and I will trust to thy management. Od! I'm all of a fire.

Mir. 'Tis a wonder the dry stubble does not blaze.
[Aside.]

Enter MARPLOT.

Sir F. How now! who sent for you, sir? What! is the hundred pounds gone already?

Mar. No, sir; I don't want money now, gardy.

Sir F. No! that's a miracle! but there's one thing you want, I'm sure.

Mar. Ay! what's that?

Sir F. Manners. What! had I no servants without?

Mar. None that could do my business, guardian; which is, at present, with this lady.

Mir. With me, Mr. Marplot? what is it, I beseech you?

Sir F. Ay, sir! what is it? any thing that relates to her, may be delivered to me.

Mar. I deny that.

Mir. That's more than I do, sir.

Mar. Indeed, madam! Why, then, to proceed: Fame says (you know best whether she tells truth or not), that you and my most conscionable guardian here, designed, contrived, plotted, and agreed to chouse a very civil, honest, honourable gentleman out of a hundred pounds: guilty or not?

Mir. That I contrived it?

Mar. Ay, you! you said never a word against it; so far you are guilty.

Sir F. Pray tell that civil, honest, honourable gentleman, that if he has any more such sums to fool away, they shall be received like the last; ha, ha, ha! Choused, quotha! But, harkye, let him know, at the same time, that if he dare to report I tricked him of it, I shall recommend a lawyer to him, who shall shew him a trick for twice as much. D'ye hear? tell him that.

Mar. So, and this is the way you use a gentleman, and my friend!

Mir. Is the wretch thy friend?

Mar. The wretch! look ye, madam, don't call names; egad! I won't take it.

Mir. Why, you won't beat me, will you? ha, ha!

Mar. I don't know whether I will or no.

Sir F. Sir, I shall make a servant shew you out at the window if you are saucy.

Mar. I am your most humble servant, guardian; I design to go out the same way I came in. I would only ask this lady one question: don't you think he's a fine gentleman?

Sir F. Who's a fine gentleman?

Mar. Not you, gardy, not you. Don't you think, in your soul, that Sir George Airy is a very fine gentleman?

Mir. He dresses well.

Sir F. Which is chiefly owing to his tailor and valet-de-chambre.

Mar. Well! and who is your dress owing to, eh? There's a beau, ma'am! do but look at him!

Sir F. Sirrah!

Mir. And if being a beau be a proof of his being a fine gentleman, he may be so.

Mar. He may be so! Why, ma'am, the judicious part of the world allow him wit, courage, gallantry, and economy too, though I think he forfeited that character when he flung away a hundred pounds upon your dumb ladyship.

Sir F. Does that gall him? ha, ha, ha!

Mir. So, Sir George, remaining in deep discontent, has sent you, his trusty squire, to utter his complaint. Ha, ha, ha!

Mar. Yes, madam; and you, like a cruel hard-hearted Jew, value it no more—than I would your ladyship, were I Sir George; you, you, you—

Mir. Oh, don't call names; I know you love to be employed, and I'll oblige you, and you shall carry him a message from me.

Mar. According as I like it. What is it?

Mir. Nay, a kind one you may be sure. First, tell him I have chose this gentleman, to have and to hold, and so forth. [Taking the hand of Sir F.]

Mar. Much good may it do you.

Sir F. Oh the dear rogue! how I dote on her!
[Aside.]

Mir. And advise his impertinence to trouble me no more, for I prefer Sir Francis for a husband before all the universe.

Mar. Oh lord, oh lord! she's bewitched, that's certain. Here's a husband for eighteen; here's a tit-bit for a young lady; here's a shape, an air, and a grace; here's bones rattling in a leathern bag; [Turning Sir F. about.] here's buckram and canvass to scrub you to repentance.

Sir F. Sirrah, my cane shall teach you repentance, presently.

Mar. No, faith, I have felt its twin brother from just such a withered hand too lately.

Mir. One thing more; advise him to keep from the garden-gate on the left hand, for if he dare to saunter there, about the hour of eight, as he used to do, he shall be saluted with a pistol or a blunderbuss.

Sir F. Oh, monstrous! Why, chary, did he use to come to the garden-gate?

Mir. The gardener described just such another man that always watched his coming out, and fain would have bribed him for an entrance: tell him he shall find a warm reception if he comes this night.

Mar. Pistols and blunderbusses! Egad, a warm reception indeed! I shall take care to inform him of your kindness, and advise him to keep further off.

Mir. I hope he will understand my meaning better than to follow your advice.
[Aside.]

Sir F. Thou hast signed, sealed, and taken possession of my heart for ever, chary, ha, ha, ha! and for you, Mr. Saucebox, let me have no more of your messages, if ever you design to inherit your estate, gentleman.

Mar. Why, there 'tis now. Sure I shall be out of your clutches one day. Well, guardian, I say no more; but if you be not as arrant a cuckold as ever drove bargain upon the exchange, or paid attendance to a court, I am the son of a whetstone; and so your humble servant.

Mir. Mr. Marplot, don't forget the message; ha, ha, ha!

Mar. Nang, nang, nang!
[Exit.]

Sir F. I am so provoked; 'tis well he's gone.

Mir. Oh, mind him not, gardy, but let's sign articles, and then—

Sir F. And then—Adad, I believe I am metamorphosed! my pulse beats high, and my blood boils, methinks.
[Kissing and hugging her.]

Mir. Oh, fie, gardy, be not so violent; consider the market lasts all the year. Well, I'll in, and see if the lawyer be come; you'll follow.
[Exit.]

Sir F. Ay, to the world's end, my dear. Well,

Frank, thou art a lucky fellow in thy old age—to have such a delicate morsel, and thirty thousand pounds, in love with thee. I shall be the envy of bachelors, the glory of married men, and the wonder of the town. Some guardians would be glad to compound for part of the estate at despatching an heiress, but I engross the whole. O! mihi prateritos referet Jupiter annos. [Exit.]

SCENE VI.—A Tavern.

Sir GEORGE AIRY and CHARLES discovered, with wine, pens, ink and paper on the table. WHISPER waiting.

Sir G. Nay, pr'ythee, don't be grave, Charles; misfortunes will happen. Ha, ha, ha! 'tis some comfort to have a companion in our sufferings.

Charles. I am only apprehensive for Isabinda; her father's humour is implacable; and how far his jealousy may transport him to her undoing, shocks my soul to think.

Sir G. But since you escap'd undiscovered by him, his rage will quickly lash into a calm, never fear it.

Charles. But who knows what that unlucky dog, Marplot, told him? nor can I imagine what brought him thither; that fellow is ever doing mischief, and yet, to give him his due, he never designs it. This is some blundering adventure wherein he thought to shew his friendship, as he calls it—a curse on him!

Sir G. Then you must forgive him. What said he?

Charles. Said! nay, I had more mind to cut his throat, than to hear his excuses.

Sir G. Where is he?

Whis. Sir, I saw him go into Sir Francis Gripe's just now.

Charles. Oh! then he's upon your business, Sir George; a thousand to one but he makes some mistake there too.

Sir G. Impossible, without he huffs the lady, and makes love to Sir Francis.

Enter Drawer.

Draw. Mr. Marplot is below, gentlemen, and desires to know if he may have leave to wait upon ye.

Charles. How civil the rogue is, when he has done a fault!

Sir G. Oh! desire him to walk up. [Exit Drawer.] Pr'ythee, Charles, throw off this chagrin, and be good company.

Charles. Nay, hang him, I'm not angry with him.

Enter MARPLOT.

Do but mark his sheepish look, Sir George.

Mar. Dear Charles, don't overwhelm a man already under insupportable affliction. I'm sure I always intend to serve my friends; but if my malicious stars deny the happiness, is the fault mine?

Sir G. Never mind him, Mr. Marplot; he's eat up with spleen. But tell me, what says Miranda?

Mar. Says! Nay, we are all undone there too.

Charles. I told you so; nothing prospers that he undertakes.

Mar. Why, can I help her having chose your father for better or worse?

Charles. So; there's another of fortune's strokes. I suppose I shall be edged out of my estate with twins every year, let who will get 'em.

Sir G. What! is the woman really possessed?

Mar. Yes, with the spirit of contradiction; she railed at you most prodigiously.

Sir G. That's no ill sign.

Mar. You'd say it was no good sign if you knew all.

Sir G. Why, pr'ythee?

Mar. Harkye, Sir George, let me warn you; pursue your old haunt no more; it may be dangerous.

[CHARLES sits down to write.

Sir G. My old haunt! what do you mean?

Mar. Why, in short then, since you will have it, Miranda vows if you dare approach the garden gate at eight o'clock, as you used, you shall meet with a warm reception.

Sir G. A warm reception!

Mar. Ay, a very warm reception; you shall be saluted with a blunderbuss, sir. These were her very words; nay, she bid me tell you so too.

Sir G. Ha! the garden-gate at eight, as I used to do! There must be meaning in this. Is there such a gate, Charles?

Mar. Is there such a gate, Charles?

Charles. Yes, yes, it opens into the Park; I suppose her ladyship has made many a scamper through it.

Sir G. It must be an assignation then. Ha! my heart springs for joy; 'tis a propitious omen. My dear Marplot, let me embrace thee; thou art my friend, my better angel.

Mar. What do you mean, Sir George?

Sir G. No matter what I mean. Here, take a bumper to the garden-gate, you dear rogue, you!

Mar. You have reason to be transported, Sir George; I have saved your life.

Sir G. My life! thou hast saved my soul, man. Charles, if thou dost not pledge this health, may'st thou never taste the joys of love.

Charles. Whisper, be sure you take care how you deliver this. [Gives him a letter.] Bring me the answer to my lodgings.

Whis. I warrant you, sir.

[To CHARLES.

Mar. Whither does that letter go? Now dare I not ask for my blood; that fellow knows more secrets than I do. [Aside, following WHISPER as he is going.] Whisper! Whisper!

Whis. Sir.

[Aside to MAR.

Mar. Whisper, here's half a crown for you.

[Aside to WHIS.

Whis. Thank ye, sir.

[Aside to MAR.

Mar. Now, where is that letter going?

[Aside to WHIS.

Whis. Into my pocket, sir.

[Aside to MAR. Exit.

Charles. Now I'm for you.

Sir G. To the garden-gate at the hour of eight, Charles.—Allons; huzza!

Charles. I begin to conceive you.

Mar. That's more than I do, egad. To the garden gate, huzza! [Drinks.] But I hope you design to keep far enough off on't, Sir George.

Sir G. Ay, ay, never fear that; she shall see I despise her frowns; let her use the blunderbuss against the next fool; she sha'n't reach me with the smoke, I warrant her, ha, ha, ha!

Mar. Ah, Charles! if you could receive a disappointment thus, en cavalier, one should have some comfort in being beat for you.

Charles. The fool comprehends nothing.

[Aside to Sir G.

Sir G. Nor would I have him. Pr'ythee, take him along with thee.

[Aside to CHARLES

Charles. Enough.

[Aside to Sir G.

Sir G. I kiss both your hands; and now for the garden-gate.

It's beauty gives the assignation there,

And love too powerful grows t' admit of fear.

[Exit.

Charles. Come, you shall go home with me.

Mar. Shall I? and are we friends, Charles? I am glad of it.

Charles. Come along.

[Exit.]

Mar. Egad, Charles's asking me to go home with him gives me a shrewd suspicion there's more in the garden-gate than I comprehend. Faith, I'll give him the drop, and away to gardy's and find it out.

[Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The Outside of Sir JEALOUS TRAFFICK'S house: PATCH peeping out of the door.

Enter WHISPER.

Whis. Ha! Mrs. Patch, this is a lucky minute, to find you so readily; my master dies with impatience.

Patch. My lady imagined so, and by her orders I have been scouting this hour in search of you, to inform you that Sir Jealous has invited some friends to supper with him to-night, which gives an opportunity to your master to make use of his ladder of ropes. The closet window shall be open, and Isabinda ready to receive him. Bid him come immediately.

Whis. Excellent! he'll not disappoint, I warrant him;—but hold, I have a letter here which I'm to carry an answer to. I cannot think what language the direction is.

Patch. Pho! 'tis no language, but a character which the lovers invented to avert discovery. Ha! I hear my old master coming down stairs; it is impossible you should have an answer. Away, and bid him come himself for that. Be gone, we're ruined if you're seen, for he has doubled his care since the last accident.

Whis. I go, I go.

[Exit.]

Patch. There, go thou into my pocket. [Puts it aside, and it falls down.] Now, I'll up the back stairs, lest I meet him. Well, a dexterous chambermaid is the ladies' best utensil, I say.

[Exit.]

Enter Sir JEALOUS TRAFFICK, with a letter in his hand.

Sir J. So, this is some comfort; this tells me that Signior Don Diego Babinetto is safely arrived. He shall marry my daughter the minute he comes. Ha, ha! what's here? [Takes up the letter PATCH dropped.] A letter! I don't know what to make of the superscription. I'll see what's within-side. [Opens it.] Humph! 'tis Hebrew, I think. What can this mean? There must be some trick in it. This was certainly designed for my daughter; but I don't know that she can speak any language but her mother tongue. No matter for that; this may be one of love's hieroglyphics; and I fancy I saw Patch's tail sweep by; that wench may be a slut, and instead of guarding my honour, betray it. I'll find it out, I'm resolved. Who's there?

Enter Servant.

What answer did you bring from the gentlemen I sent you to invite?

Serv. That they'd all wait on you, sir, as I told you before; but I suppose you forgot, sir.

Sir J. Did I so, sir? but I sha'n't forget to break your head if any of them come, sir.

Serv. Come, sir! why, did not you send me to desire their company, sir?

Sir J. But I send you now to desire their absence. Say I have something extraordinary fallen out, which calls me abroad, contrary to expectation, and ask their pardon; and, d'ye hear, send the butler to me.

Serv. Yes, sir

[Exit.]

Enter Butler.

Sir J. If this paper has a meaning I'll find it.—Lay the cloth in my daughter's chamber, and bid the cook send supper thither presently.

But. Yes, sir. Heyday! what's the matter now?

[Exit.]

Sir J. He wants the eyes of Argus, that has a young handsome daughter in this town; but my comfort is, I shall not be troubled long with her. He that pretends to rule a girl once, in her teens, had better be at sea in a storm, and would be in less danger.

[Exit]

SCENE II.—Isabinda's Chamber

Enter ISABINDA and PATCH.

Isa. Are you sure nobody saw you speak to Whis-per?

Patch. Yes, very sure, madam; But I heard Sir Jealous coming down stairs, so clapped his letter into my pocket. [Feels for the letter.]

Isa. A letter! give it me quickly.

Patch. Bless me! what's become o't? I'm sure I put it— [Searching still.]

Isa. Is it possible thou could'st be so careless? Oh, I'm undone for ever if it be lost.

Patch. I must have dropp'd it upon the stairs. But why are you so much alarmed? If the worst happens nobody can read it, madam, nor find out whom it was designed for.

Isa. If it falls into my father's hand the very figure of a letter will produce ill consequences. Run and look for it upon the stairs this moment.

Patch. Nay, I'm sure it can be no where else.

[Going.]

Enter Butler.

How now, what do you want?

But. My master ordered me to lay the cloth here for supper.

Isa. Ruined past redemption. [Aside.]

Patch. You mistake, sure. What shall we do?

Isa. I thought he expected company to-night.—Oh, poor Charles! oh, unfortunate Isabinda! [Aside.]

But. I thought so, too, madam; but I suppose he has altered his mind. [Lays the cloth, and exit.]

Isa. The letter is the cause. This heedless action has undone me. Fly and fasten the closet window, which will give Charles notice to retire. Ha! my father! Oh, confusion!

Enter Sir JEALOUS TRAFFICK.

Sir J. Hold, hold, Patch; whither are you going? I'll have nobody stir out of the room till after supper.

Patch. Sir, I was going to reach your easy chair. Oh, wretched accident! [Aside.]

Sir J. I'll have nobody stir out of this room. I don't want my easy chair.

Isa. What will be the event of this? [Aside.]

Sir J. Harkye, daughter, do you know this hand?

Isa. As I suspected. [Aside.] Hand, do you call it, sir? 'tis some schoolboy's scrawl.

Patch. Oh, invention! thou chambermaid's best friend, assist me. [Aside.]

Sir J. Are you sure you don't understand it?

[Patch feels in her bosom, and shakes her clothes.]

Isa. Do you understand it, sir?

Sir J. I wish I did.

Isa. Thank heaven you do not. [Aside.] Then I know no more of it than you do, indeed, sir.

Patch. O lord, O lord! what have you done, sir?

Why, the paper is mine; I dropp'd it out of my bosom. [Snatching it from him.]

Sir J. Ha! yours, mistress?

Patch. Yes sir, it is—

Sir J. What is it? Speak.

Patch. Yes, sir, it is a charm for the tooth-ache: I have worn it these seven years; 'twas given me by an angel for aught I know, when I was raving with the pain, for nobody knew from whence he came nor whither he went. He charged me never to open it, lest some dire vengeance befell me, and heaven knows what will be the event. Oh, cruel misfortune! that I should drop it and you should open it.

Sir J. Plague of your charms and whims for me! if that be all, 'tis well enough: there, there, burn it, and I warrant you no vengeance will follow.

Patch. So, all's right again thus far. [Aside.]

Isa. I would not lose Patch for the world; I'll take courage a little. [Aside.] Is this usage for your daughter, sir? must my virtue and conduct be suspected for every trifle? You immure me like some dire offender here, and deny me all the recreations which my sex enjoy, and the custom of the country and modesty allow; yet not content with that, you make my confinement more intolerable by your mistrusts and jealousies. Would I were dead, so I were free from this.

Sir J. To-morrow rids you of this tiresome load; Don Diego Babinetto will be here, and then my care ends and his begins.

Isa. Is he come, then? Oh, how shall I avoid this hated marriage! [Aside.]

Enter Servants, with supper.

Sir J. Come, will you sit down?

Isa. I can't eat, sir.

Patch. No, I dare swear he has given her supper enough. I wish I could get into the closet. [Aside.]

Sir J. Well, if you can't eat, then give me a song whilst I do.

Isa. I have such a cold I can scarce speak, sir, much less sing. How shall I prevent Charles's coming in? [Aside.]

Sir J. I hope you have the use of your fingers, madam. Play a tune upon your spinnet whilst your woman sings me a song.

Patch. I'm as much out of tune as my lady, if he knew all. [Aside.]

Isa. I shall make excellent music.

[Sits down to play.]

Patch. Really, sir, I am so frightened about your opening this charm that I can't remember one thing.

Sir J. Pish! hang your charm! come, come, sing anything.

Patch. Yes, I'm likely to sing, truly. [Aside.] Humph, humph! bless me, I can't raise my voice, my heart pants so.

Sir J. Why, what, does your heart pant so that you can't play neither? Pray, what key are you in, eh?

Patch. Ah, would the key was turned on you once. [Aside.]

Sir J. Why don't you sing, I say?

Patch. When madam has put her spinnet in tune, sir; humph, humph!

Isa. I cannot play, sir, whatever ails me. [Rising.]

Sir J. Zounds! sit down and play me a tune, or I'll break the spinnet about your ears.

Isa. What will become of me?

[Sits down and plays.]

Sir J. Come, mistress.

[To Patch.]

Patch. Yes, sir. [Sings, but horribly out of tune.]

Sir J. Hey, hey! why, you are a-top of the house, and you are down in the cellar. What is the meaning of this? Is it on purpose to cross me, eh?

Patch. Pray madam, take it a little lower; I cannot reach that note, nor any note I fear.

Isa. Well, begin. Oh, Patch, we shall be discovered. [Aside.]

Patch. I sink with apprehension, madam. [Aside.]

Humph, humph! [Sings. Charles opens the closet door.]

Charles. Music and singing! Death! her father there! [The women shriek.] Then I must fly.

[Exit into the closet. Sir J. rises up hastily, seeing]

CHARLES slip back into the closet.]

Sir J. Hell and furies! A man in the closet!

Patch. Ah! a ghost! a ghost! He must not enter the closet. [Aside.]

[ISABINDA throws herself down before the closet door, as in a swoon.]

Sir J. The devil! I'll make a ghost of him, I warrant you. [Strives to get by.]

Patch. Oh, hold, sir, have a care; you'll tread upon my lady. Who waits there? Bring some water. Oh, this comes of your opening the charm. Oh, oh, oh! [Weeps aloud.]

Sir J. I'll charm you, housewife. Here lies the charm that conjured this fellow in, I'm sure on't. Come out, you rascal, do. Zounds! take her from the door, or I'll spurn her from it, and break your neck down stairs. Where are you, sirrah? Villain! robber of my honour! I'll pull you out of your nest. [Goes into the closet.]

Patch. You'll be mistaken, old gentleman; the bird is flown.

Isa. I'm glad I have escaped so well; I was all most dead in earnest with the fright.

Re-enter Sir JEALOUS out of the closet.

Sir J. Whoever the dog was, he has escaped out of the window, for the sash is up; but though he is got out of my reach, you are not. And first, Mrs. Pander, with your charms for the tooth-ache, get out of my house, go, troop; yet hold, stay, I'll see you of doors myself; but I'll secure your charge ere I do.

Isa. What do you mean, sir? was she not a creature of your own providing?

Sir J. She was of the devil's providing, for aught I know.

Patch. What have I done, sir, to merit your displeasure?

Sir J. I don't know which of you have done it, but you shall both suffer for it, till I can discover whose guilt it is. Go, get in there; I'll move you from this side of the house. [Pushes ISABINDA in at the door and locks it, puts the key in his pocket.] I'll keep the key myself; I'll try what ghost will get into that room; and now, forsooth, I'll wait on you down stairs.

Patch. Ah, my poor lady! Down stairs, sir! but I won't go out, sir, till I have locked up my clothes, and that's flat.

Sir J. If thou wert as naked as thou wert born, thou shouldst not stay to put on a rag, and that's flat. [Ereunt.]

SCENE III.—The Street.

Sir J. [Putting PATCH out of the door.] There, go, and come no more within sight of my habitation these three days, I charge you.

[Slaps the door after her.]

Patch. Did ever anybody see such an old monster?

Enter CHARLES.

Oh, Mr. Charles! your affairs and mine are in an ill posture.

Charles. I am inured to the frowns of fortune; but what has befallen thee?

Patch. Sir Jealous, whose suspicious nature is always on the watch, nay, even while one eye sleeps the other keeps sentinel, upon sight of you flew into such a violent passion, that I could find no stratagem to appease him, but in spite of all arguments he locked his daughter into her own apartment, and turned me out of doors.

Charles. Ha! Oh, Isabinda!

Patch. And swears she shall see neither sun nor moon, till she is Don Diego Babinetto's wife, who arrived last night, and is expected with impatience.

Charles. He dies; yes, by all the wrongs of love, he shall; here will I plant myself, and through my breast he shall make his passage, if he enters.

Patch. A most heroic resolution! there might be ways found out more to your advantage; policy is often preferred to open force.

Charles. I apprehend you not.

Patch. What think you of personating this Spaniard, imposing upon the father, and marrying your mistress, by his own consent?

Charles. Say'st thou so, my angel! Oh, could that be done, my life to come would be too short to recompense thee; but how can I do that when I neither know what ship he came in, nor from what part of Spain; who recommends him, or how attended?

Patch. I can solve all this. He is from Madrid, his father's name is Don Pedro Questo Portento Babinetto. Here's a letter of his to Sir Jealous, which he dropped one day. You understand Spanish, and the hand may be counterfeited. You conceive me, sir?

Charles. My better genius! thou hast revived my drooping soul. I'll about it instantly. Come to my lodgings, and we'll concert matters. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—A Garden-gate open; SCENTWELL waiting within.

Enter Sir GEORGE AIRY.

Sir G. So, this is the gate, and most invitingly open. If there should be a blunderbuss here, now, what a dreadful dirty would my fall make for fools, and what a jest for the wits; how my name would be roared about the streets! Well, I'll venture all.

Scent. Hist! hist! Sir George Airy. [Comes forward.]

Sir G. A female voice! thus far I'm safe. My dear,—

Scent. No, I'm not your dear, but I'll conduct you to her. Give me your hand; you must go through many a dark passage and dirty step before you arrive—

Sir G. I know I must before I arrive at paradise; therefore be quick, my charming guide:—

Scent. For aught you know. Come, come, your hand, and away.

Sir G. Here, here, child; you can't be half so swift as my desires. [Exeunt through the gate.]

SCENE V.—The House.

Enter MIRANDA.

Mir. Well, let me reason a little with my mad self. Now, don't I transgress all rules to venture upon a man without the advice of the grave and wise? But then a rigid, knavish guardian, who would have married me—to whom? even to his nauseous self, or nobody. Sir George is what I have tried in conversation, inquired into his character, and am satisfied in both. Then his love! who would have given a hundred pounds only to have seen a woman he had not infinitely loved? So I find my liking him has furnished me with arguments enough of his side; and now the only doubt remains, whether he will come or no.

Enter SCENTWELL and Sir GEORGE AIRY.

Scent. That's resolved, madam, for here's the knight. [Exit.]

Sir G. And do I once more behold that lovely object whose idea fills my mind, and forms my pleasing dreams?

Mir. What, beginning again in heroics? Sir George, don't you remember how little fruit your last prodigal oration produced? Not one bare single word in answer.

Sir G. Ha! the voice of my incognita! Why did you take ten thousand ways to captivate a heart your eyes alone had vanquished?

Mir. No more of these flights. Do you think we can agree on that same terrible bugbear, matrimony, without heartily repenting on both sides?

Sir G. It has been my wish since first my longing eyes beheld you.

Mir. And your happy ears drank in the pleasing news I had thirty thousand pounds.

Sir G. Unkind! Did I not offer you, in those purchased minutes, to run the risk of your fortune, so you would but secure that lovely person to my arms?

Mir. Well, if you have such love and tenderness, since our wooing has been short, pray reserve it for our future days, to let the world see we are lovers after wedlock; 'twill be a novelty.

Sir G. Haste then, and let us tie the knot, and prove the envied pair—

Mir. Hold, not so fast; I have provided better than to venture on dangerous experiments headlong. My guardian, trusting to my dissembled love, has given up my fortune to my own disposal, but with this proviso, that he to-morrow morning weds me. He is now gone to Doctor's Commons for a licence.

Sir G. Ha! a licence!

Mir. But I have planted emissaries that infallibly take him down to Epsom, under a pretence that a brother usurer of his is to make him his executor—the thing on earth he covets.

Sir G. 'Tis his known character.

Mir. Now my instruments confirm him this man is dying, and he sends me word he goes this minute. It must be to-morrow ere he can be undecieved; that time is ours.

Sir G. Let us improve it then, and settle on our coming years endless happiness.

Mir. I dare not stir till I hear he's on the road; then I, and my writings, the most material point, are soon removed.

Sir G. I have one favour to ask; if it lies in your power you would be a friend to poor Charles; though the son of this tenacious man, he is as free from all his vices as nature and a good education can make him; and what now I have vanity enough to hope will induce you, he is the man on earth I love.

Mir. I never was his enemy, and only put it on as it help'd my designs on his father. If his uncle's estate ought to be in his possession, which I shrewdly suspect, I may do him a singular piece of service.

Sir G. You are all goodness.

Enter SCENTWELL.

Scent. Oh, madam! my master and Mr. Marplot are just coming into the house.

Mir. Undone, undone; if he finds you here in this crisis, all my plots are unravelled.

Sir G. What shall I do? Can't I get back into the garden?

Scent. Oh, no! he comes up those stairs.

Mir. Here, here, here! Can you condescend to stand behind this chimney-board, Sir George?

Sir G. Any where, any where, dear madam, without ceremony.

Scent. Come, come, sir, lie close. [They put him behind the chimney-board.]

Enter SIR FRANCIS GRIPE and MARPLOT; Sir Francis peeling an orange.

Sir F. I could not go, though 'tis upon life and death, without taking leave of dear charge. Besides, this fellow buzzed in my ears that thou might'st be so desperate as to shoot that wild rake that haunts the garden-gate, and that would bring us into trouble, dear.

Mir. So Marplot brought you back then?

Mar. Yes, I brought him back.

Mir. I'm obliged to him for that, I'm sure. [Frowning at MARPLOT aside.]

Mar. By her looks she means she's not obliged to me. I have done some mischief now, but what I can't imagine. [Aside.]

Sir F. Well, chargy, I have had three messengers to come to Epsom to my neighbour Squeezum's, who, for all his vast riches, is departing. [Sighs.]

Mar. Ay, see what all you usurers must come to.

Sir F. Peace, you young knave! Some forty years hence I may think on't; but, chargy, I'll be with thee to-morrow before those pretty eyes are open; I will, I will, chargy; I'll rouse you, i'faith. Here, Mrs. Scentwell, lift up your lady's chimney-board, that may throw my peel in, and not litter her chamber.

Mir. Oh, my stars! what will become of us now?

[Aside.]

Scent. O, pray, sir, give it me; I love it above all things in nature, indeed I do.

Sir F. No, no, hussy; you have the green pip already; I'll have no apothecary's bills.

[Goes toward the chimney.]

Mir. Hold, hold, hold, dear gardy! I have a,—a monkey shut up there; and if you open it before the man comes that is to tame it, 'tis so wild 'twill break all my china or get away, and that would break my heart; for I'm fond on't to distraction, next thee, dear gardy! [In a flattering tone.]

Sir F. Well, well, chargy, I won't open it; she shall have her monkey, poor rogue! Here, throw this peel out of the window. [Exit SCENTWELL.]

Mar. A monkey! Dear madam, let me see it; I can tame a monkey as well as the best of them all. Oh, how I love the little miniatures of man.

Mir. Be quiet, mischief; and stand further from the chimney. You shall not see my monkey—why sure—[Striving with him.]

Mar. For heaven's sake, dear madam, let me but peep, to see if it be as pretty as Lady Fiddlefaddle's. Has it got a chain?

Mir. Not yet; but I design it one shall last its life-time. Nay, you shall not see it. Look, gardy, how he teazes me!

Sir F. [Getting between him and the chimney.] Sirrah, sirrah, let my chargy's monkey alone, or my bamboo shall fly about your ears. What, is there no dealing with you?

Mar. Pugh! plague of the monkey! here's a rout! I wish he may rival you.

Enter Servant.

Serv. Sir, they have put two more horses to the coach, as you ordered, and 'tis ready at the door.

Sir F. Well, I am going to be executor; better for thee, jewel. B'ye, chargy; one buss. I'm glad thou hast got a monkey to divert thee a little.

Mir. Thankye, dear gardy! Nay, I'll see you to the coach.

Sir F. That's kind, adad!

Mir. Come along, impertinence! [To MARPLOT.] Mar. [Stepping back.] 'Egad, I will see the monkey now. [Lifts up the board and discovers Sir GEORGE.]

O lord! O lord! thieves, thieves! murder! Sir G. D—n ye, you unlucky dog! 'tis I. Which way shall I get out? Shew me instantly, or I'll cut your throat.

Mar. Undone, undone! At that door there. But hold, hold; break that china, and I'll bring you off. [He runs off at the corner, and throws down some china.]

Re-enter SIR FRANCIS GRIPE, MIRANDA, and SCENTWELL.

Sir F. Mercy on me! what's the matter?

Mir. O, you toad! what have you done?

Mar. No great harm; I beg of you to forgive me. Longing to see this monkey, I did but just raise up the board, and it flew over my shoulders, scratched all my face, broke your china, and whisked out of the window.

Sir F. Where, where is it, sirrah?

Mar. There, there, Sir Francis, upon your neighbour Parmazan's pantiles.

Sir F. Was ever such an unlucky rogue! Sirrah, I forbid you my house. Call the servants to get the monkey again. Pug, pug, pug! I would stay myself to look for it, but you know my earnest business.

Scent. Oh, my lady will be best to lure it back: all them creatures love my lady extremely.

Mir. Go, go, dear gardy! I hope I shall recover it.

Sir F. B'ye, b'ye, dearee! Ah, mischief! how you look now! B'ye, b'ye. [Exit.]

Mir. Scentwell, see him in the coach, and bring me word.

Scent. Yes, madam.

[Exit.]

Mir. So, sir, you have done your friend a signal piece of service, I suppose.

Mar. Why, look you, madam, if I have committed a fault, thank yourself; no man is more serviceable when I am let into a secret, and none more unlucky at finding it out. Who could divine your meaning? when you talked of a blunderbuss, who thought of a rendezvous? and when you talked of a monkey, who the devil dreamt of Sir George?

Mir. A sign you converse but little with our sex, when you can't reconcile contradictions.

Re-enter SCENTWELL.

Scent. He's gone, madam, as fast as the coach and six can carry him.

Re-enter SIR GEORGE AIRY.

Sir G. Then I may appear.

Mar. Here's pug, madam. Dear Sir George, make my peace; on my soul I never took you for a monkey before.

Sir G. I dare swear thou didst not. Madam, I beg you to forgive him.

Mir. Well, Sir George, if he can be secret.

Mar. 'Odsheart, madam! I'm as secret as a priest when trusted.

Sir G. Why 'tis with a priest our business is at present.

Scent. Madam, here's Mrs. Isabinda's woman to wait on you.

Mir. Bring her up.

Enter PATCH.

How do ye, Mrs. Patch? What news from your lady?

Patch. That's for your private ear, madam. Sir George, there's a friend of yours has an urgent occasion for your assistance.

Sir G. His name.

Patch. Charles.

Mar. Ha! then there's something a-foot that I know nothing of. [Aside.] I'll wait on you Sir George.

Sir G. A third person may not be proper, perhaps. As soon as I have despatched my own affairs I am at his service. I'll send my servant to tell him I'll wait on him in half an hour.

Mir. How came you employed in this message, Mrs. Patch?

Patch. Want of business, madam; I am discharged by my master, but hope to serve my lady still.

Mir. How, discharged! you must tell me the whole story within.

Patch. With all my heart, madam.

Mar. Tell it here, Mrs. Patch. Pish! plague! I wish I were fairly out of the house. I find marriage is the end of this secret; and now I'm half mad to know what Charles wants him for. [Aside.]

Sir G. Madam, I'm doubly pressed by love and friendship. This exigence admits of no delay. Shall we make Marplot of the party?

Mir. If you'll run the hazard, Sir George; I believe he means well.

Mar. Nay, for my part I desire to be let into nothing; I'll be gone, therefore pray don't mistrust me.

Sir G. So, now he has a mind to be gone to Charles; but not knowing what affairs he may have upon his hands at present, I'm resolv'd he shan't stir. [Aside.] No, Mr. Marplot, you must not leave us; we want a third person. [Takes hold of him.]

Mar. I never had more mind to be gone in my life.

Mir. Come along then; if we fail in the voyage, thank yourself for taking this ill-starr'd gentleman on board.

Sir G. That vessel ne'er can unsuccessful prove,
Whose freight is beauty, and whose pilot's love.

Mar. Tyty ti, tyty ti. [Exeunt, with MIRANDA. Steals off the other way.]

Re-enter Sir GEORGE.

Sir G. Marplot! Marplot!

Mar. [Entering.] Here! I was coming, Sir George. [Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Room in Sir Francis Gripe's House.

Enter MIRANDA, PATCH, and SCENTWELL.

Mir. Well, Patch, I have done a strange bold thing; my fate is determined, and expectation is no more. Now to avoid the impertinence and roguery of an old man, I have thrown myself into the extravagance of a young one; if he should despise, slight, or use me ill, there's no remedy from a husband but the grave, and that's a terrible sanctuary to one of my age and constitution.

Patch. Oh! fear not, madam; you'll find your account in Sir George Airy; it is impossible a man of sense should use a woman ill, endued with beauty, wit, and fortune. It must be the lady's fault if she does not wear the unfashionable name of wife easy, when nothing but complaisance and good humour is requisite on either side to make them happy.

Mir. I long till I am out of this house, lest an accident should bring my guardian back. Scentwell, put my best jewels into the little casket, slip them into thy pocket, and let us march off to Sir Jealous's.

Scent. It shall be done, madam. [Exit.]

Patch. Sir George will be impatient, madam. If their plot succeeds, we shall be well received; if not, he will be able to protect us. Besides, I long to know how my young lady fares.

Mir. Farewell, old Mammon, and thy detested walls! 'Twill be no more sweet Sir Francis! I shall be compelled to the odious task of dissembling no longer to get my own, and coax him with the wheedling names of my precious, my dear, dear gardy! O heavens!

Enter Sir FRANCIS GRIPE.

Sir F. Ah, my sweet charge! don't be frightened; [She starts.] but thy poor gardy has been abused, cheated, fooled, betrayed; but nobody knows by whom.

Mir. Undone, past redemption. [Aside.]

Sir F. What, won't you speak to me, charge?

Mir. I am so surprised with joy to see you, I know not what to say.

Sir F. Poor dear girl! But do you know that my son, or some such rogue, to rob or murder me, or both, contrived this journey; for upon the road I met my neighbour Squeezum well, and coming to town.

Mir. Good lack, good lack! what tricks are there in this world!

Re-enter SCENTWELL, with a diamond necklace in her hand, not seeing Sir FRANCIS.

Scent. Madam, be pleased to tie this necklace on, for I can't get into the— [Seeing Sir F.]

Mir. The wench is a fool, I think! Could you not have carried it to be mended without putting it in the box.

Sir F. What's the matter?

Mir. Only, dearee,—I bid her, I bid her—Your ill-usage has put everything out of my head. But won't you go, gardy, and find out these fellows, and have them punished, and, and—

Sir F. Where should I look for them, child? no, I'll sit me down contented with my safety, nor stir out of my own doors till I go with thee to a parson.

Mir. If he goes into his closet I am ruined [Aside.] Oh, bless me! In this fright I had forgot Mrs. Patch.

Patch. Ay, madam, and I stay for your speedy answer.

Mir. I must get him out of the house. Now assist me, fortune! [Aside.]

Sir F. Mrs. Patch! I profess I did not see you: how dost thou do, Mrs. Patch? Well, don't you repent leaving my charge?

Patch. Yes, everybody must love her; but I come now—Madam, what did I come for? my invention is at the last ebb. [Aside to MIRANDA.]

Sir F. Nay, never whisper; tell me.

Mir. She came, dear gardy, to invite me to her lady's wedding, and you shall go with me, gardy; 'tis to be done this moment, to a Spanish merchant.

Old Sir Jealous keeps on his humour : the first minute he sees her, the next he marries her.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha, ha ! I'd go if I thought the sight of matrimony would tempt chary to perform her promise. There was a smile, there was a consenting look, with those pretty twinklers, worth a million ! 'Ods-precious ! I am happier than the great mogul, the emperor of China, or all the potentates that are not in the wars. Speak, confirm it, make me leap out of my skin.

Mir. When one has resolved, 'tis in vain to stand shilly-shally. If ever I marry, positively this is my wedding-day.

Sir F. Oh ! happy, happy man. Verily, I will beget a son the first night shall disinherit that dog Charles. I have estate enough to purchase a barony, and be the immortalizing the whole family of the Gripes.

Mir. Come then, gardy, give me thy hand ; let's to this house of Hymen.

My choice is fixed, let good or ill betide ;

Sir F. The joyful bridegroom I,

Mir. And I the happy bride. [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—An Apartment in the House of Sir Jealous Traffick.

Enter Sir JEALOUS TRAFFICK, meeting a Servant.

Serv. Sir, here's a couple of gentlemen inquires for you ; one of them calls himself Signior Diego Babinetto.

Sir J. Ha ! Signior Babinetto ! admit 'em instantly,—joyful minute ! I'll have my daughter married to-night.

Enter CHARLES, in a Spanish habit, with Sir GEORGE AIRY, dressed like a merchant.

Senhor, beso las manos: vuestra merced es muy bien venido en esta tierra.

Charles. Senhor, soy muy humi lde, y muy obligado cryado de vuestra merced: mi padre embia a vuestra merced, los mas profundos de sus respetos; y a commissionado este mercadil Ingles, de concluyr un negocio, que me haze el mas dichos shombre del mundo, haziendo me su yerno.

Sir J. I am glad on't, for I find I have lost much of my Spanish. Sir, I am your most humble servant. Signior Don Diego Babinetto has informed me that you are commissioned by Signior Don Pedro, &c. his worthy father—

Sir G. To see an affair of marriage consummated between a daughter of yours and Signior Diego Babinetto, his son here. True, sir, such a trust is reposed in me, as that letter will inform you. I hope it will pass upon him. [Aside.—Gives him a letter.

Sir J. Ay, 'tis his hand. [Seems to read.

Sir G. Good, you have counterfeited to a nicety, Charles. [Aside to CHARLES.

Sir J. Sir, I find by this that you are a man of honour and probity ; I think, sir, he calls you Meanwell.

Sir G. Meanwell is my name, sir.

Sir J. A very good name, and very significant. For to mean well is to be honest, and to be honest is the virtue of a friend, and a friend is the delight and support of human society.

Sir G. You shall find that I'll discharge the part of a friend in what I have undertaken, Sir Jealous. Therefore, sir, I must entreat the presence of your fair daughter, and the assistance of your chaplain ; for Signior Don Pedro strictly enjoined me to see the marriage rites performed as soon as we should arrive, to avoid the accidental overtures of Venus.

ACT. DRAMA.—NOS. 63 & 64.

Sir J. Overtures of Venus !

Sir G. Ay, sir ; that is, those little hawking females, that traverse the park and the playhouse to put off their damaged ware ; they fasten upon foreigners like leeches, and watch their arrival as carefully as the Kentish men do a shipwreck : I warrant you they have heard of him already.

Sir J. Nay, I know this town swarms with them.

Sir G. Ay, and then you know the Spaniards are naturally amorous, but very constant ; the first face fixes 'em ; and it may be very dangerous to let him ramble ere he is tied.

Sir J. Pat to my purpose. Well, sir, there is but one thing more, and they shall be married instantly.

Charles. Pray heaven that one thing more won't spoil all. [Aside.

Sir J. Don Pedro wrote me word, in his last but one, that he designed the sum of five thousand crowns by way of jointure for my daughter, and that it should be paid into my hand upon the day of marriage—

Charles. Oh, the devil ! [Aside.

Sir J. In order to lodge it in some of our funds in case she should become a widow, and return to England.

Sir G. Plague on't ! this is an unlucky turn. What shall I say ? [Aside.

Sir J. And he does not mention one word of it in this letter.

Sir G. Humph ! True, Sir Jealous, he told me such a thing, but, but, but—he, he, he, he—he did not imagine that you would insist upon the very day ; for, for, for, for money, you know, is dangerous returning by sea, an, an, an—

Charles. Zounds ! say we have brought it in commodities. [Aside to Sir G.

Sir G. And so, sir, he has sent it in merchandize ; tobacco, sugars, spices, lemons, and so forth, which shall be turned into money with all expedition ; in the meantime, sir, if you please to accept of my bond for performance—

Sir J. It is enough, sir ; I am so pleased with the countenance of Signior Diego, and the harmony of your name, that I'll take your word, and will fetch my daughter this moment. Within there !

Enter Servant.

Desire Mr. Tackum, my neighbour's chaplain, to walk hither.

Serv. Yes, sir. [Exit.

Sir J. Gentlemen, I'll return in an instant. [Exit.

Sir G. 'Egad, that five thousand crowns had like to have ruined the plot.

Charles. But that's over ; and if fortune throws no more rubs in our way—

Sir G. Thou'lt carry the prize—But hist ! here he comes.

Re-enter Sir JEALOUS TRAFFICK, dragging in ISABINDA.

Sir J. Come along, you stubborn baggage, you—come along.

Isa. Oh ! hear me, sir, hear me but speak one word:

Do not destroy my everlasting peace ; My soul abhors this Spaniard you have chose.

Sir J. How's that ?

Isa. Let this posture move your tender nature. [Kneels.

For ever will I hang upon these knees,
Nor loose my hands till you cut off my hold,
If you refuse to hear me, sir.

Sir J. Did you ever see such a perverse slut ? Off, I say. Mr. Meanwell, pray help me a little.

3 G

Sir G. Rise, madam, and do not disoblige your father, who has provided a husband worthy of you, one that will love you equal with his soul, and one that you will love, when once you know him.

Isa. Oh! never, never!

Could I suspect that falsehood in my heart,
I would this moment tear it from my breast,
And straight present him with the treach'rous part.

Sir J. Falsehood! why, who the devil are you in love with? Don't provoke me, for by St. Jago I shall beat you, housewife.

Sir G. Sir Jealous, you are too passionate. Give me leave, I'll try by gentle words to work her to your purpose.

Sir J. I pray do, Mr. Meanwell, I pray do; she'll break my heart. [Weeps.] There is in that casket, jewels of the value of three thousand pounds, which were her mother's, and a paper, wherein I have settled one half of my estate upon her now, and the whole when I die—but provided she marries this gentleman; else, by St. Jago, I'll turn her out of doors to beg or starve. Tell her this, Mr. Meanwell, pray do.

Sir G. Ha! this is beyond expectation. [Aside.] Trust to me, sir, I'll lay the dangerous consequence of disobeying you at this juncture before her, I warrant you. Come, madam, do not blindly cast your life away just in the moment you would wish to save it.

Isa. Pray cease your trouble, sir: I have no wish but death to free me from this hated Spaniard. If you are his friend, inform him what I say.

Sir G. Suppose this Spaniard, which you strive to shun, should be the very man to whom you'd fly?

Isa. Ha!

Sir G. Would you not blame your rash resolve, and curse your eyes that would not look on Charles?

Isa. On Charles! Where is he? [Rises.]

Sir G. Hold, hold, hold. 'Sdeath! madam, you'll ruin all. Your father believes him to be Signior Babinetto. Compose yourself a little, pray, madam. [He runs to Sir JEALOUS.] She begins to hear reason, sir; the fear of being turned out of doors has done it. Speak gently to her, sir; I'm sure she'll yield: I see it in her face.

Sir J. Well, Isabinda, can you refuse to bless a father whose only care is to make you happy?

Isa. Oh, sir! do with me what you please; I am all obedience.

Sir J. And wilt thou love him?

Isa. I will endeavour it, sir.

Enter Servant.

Serv. Sir, here is Mr. Tackum.

Sir J. Shew him into the parlour. [Exit Servant.] Senhor, tome vind sueipora; este momento les junta las manos. [Gives her to CHARLES.]

Charles. Senhor, yo la recibo como se deve un tesora tan grande. [Embraces her.]

Sir J. Now, Mr. Meanwell, let's to the parson: Who, by his art, will join this pair for life, Make me the happiest father, her the happiest wife.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—A Street before Sir Jealous Traffick's house.

Enter MARPLOT.

Mar. I have hunted all over the town for Charles, but can't find him, and by Whisper's scouting at the end of the street, I suspect he must be in the house again. I am informed too that he has borrowed a Spanish habit out of the playhouse: what can it mean?

Enter a Servant of Sir Jealous Traffick's to him out of the house.

Harkye, sir, do you belong to this house?

Serv. Yes, sir.

Mar. Isn't your name Richard?

Serv. No, sir; Thomas.

Mar. Oh, ay, Thomas. Well, Thomas, there's a shilling for you.

Serv. Thank you, sir.

Mar. Pray, Thomas, can you tell if there be a gentleman in it in a Spanish habit?

Serv. There's a Spanish gentleman within, that is just a-going to marry my young lady, sir.

Mar. Are you sure he is a Spanish gentleman?

Serv. I'm sure he speaks no English that I hear of.

Mar. Then that can't be him I want, for 'tis an English gentleman that I inquire after; he may be dressed like a Spaniard, for aught I know.

Serv. Ha! who knows but this may be an impostor? I'll inform my master, for if he should be imposed upon, he'll beat us all round. [Aside.] Pray come in, sir, and see if this be the person you inquire for.

Mar. Ay, I'll follow you. Now for it.

[Exeunt into the house.]

SCENE IV.—The inside of the house.

Enter MARPLOT, and Servant.

Serv. Sir, please to stay here; I'll send my master to you. [Exit.]

Mar. So, this was a good contrivance. If this be Charles now, he will wonder how I found him out.

Re-enter Servant, and SIR JEALOUS TRAFFICK.

Sir J. What is your earnest business, blockhead! that you must speak to me before the ceremony's past! Ha! who's this?

Serv. Why this gentleman, sir, wants another gentleman in a Spanish habit, he says.

Sir J. In a Spanish habit! 'tis some friend of Signior Don Diego's, I warrant. [Aside.] Sir, your servant.

Mar. Your servant, sir.

Sir J. I suppose you would speak with Signior Babinetto?

Mar. Sir?

Sir J. I say, I suppose you would speak with Signior Babinetto?

Mar. Hey-day! what the devil does he say now? [Aside.] Sir, I don't understand you.

Sir J. Don't you understand Spanish, sir?

Mar. Not I, indeed, sir.

Sir J. I thought you had known Signior Babinetto.

Mar. Not I, upon my word, sir.

Sir J. What, then, you'd speak with his friend, the English merchant, Mr. Meanwell?

Mar. Neither, sir, not I; I don't mean any such thing.

Sir J. Why, who are you then, sir? and what do you want?

Mar. Nay nothing at all, not I, sir. Plague on him! I wish I were out; he begins to exalt his voice! I shall be beaten again. [Aside.]

Sir J. Nothing at all, sir! Why then what business have you in my house, ha?

Serv. You said you wanted a gentleman in a Spanish habit.

Mar. Why ay, but his name is neither Babinetto nor Meanwell.

Sir J. What is his name then, sirrah? Ha! now

I look at you again, I believe you are the rogue that threatened me with half a dozen myrmidons—

Mar. Me, sir! I never saw your face in all my life before.

Sir J. Speak, sir; who is it you look for? or, or—

Mar. A terrible old dog! [Aside.] Why, sir, only an honest young fellow of my acquaintance—I thought that there might be a ball, and that he might have been here in a masquerade. 'Tis Charles, Sir Francis Gripe's son,—because I know he used to come hither sometimes.

Sir J. Did he so?—Not that I know of, I'm sure. Pray heaven that this be Don Diego. If I should be tricked now—Ha! my heart misgives me plaguily. Within there! stop the marriage. Run, sirrah, call all my servants! I'll be satisfied that this is Signior Pedro's son ere he has my daughter.

Mar. Ha! Sir George! what have I done now?

Enter Sir GEORGE AIRY, with a drawn sword.

Sir G. Ha! Marplot here! oh! the unlucky dog! What's the matter, Sir Jealous? [well.]

Sir J. Nay, I don't know the matter, Mr. Mean-

Mar. Upon my soul, Sir George—

[Going up to Sir George.]

Sir J. Nay, then, I'm betrayed, ruined, undone. Thieves, traitors, rogues! [Offers to go in.] Stop the marriage, I say—

Sir G. I say go on, Mr. Tackum—Nay, no entering here; I guard this passage, old gentleman: the act and the deed were both your own, and I'll see them signed, or die for't.

Enter Servant.

Sir J. A plague on the act and deed!—Fall on, sir, knock him down.

Sir G. Ay, come on, scoundrels! I'll prick your jackets for you. [Beats Marplot.]

Sir J. Zounds! sirrah, I'll be revenged on you.

Sir G. Ay, there your vengeance is due. Ha, ha!

Mar. Why, what do you beat me for? I han't married your daughter.

Sir J. Rascals! why don't you knock him down?

Serv. We are afraid of his sword, sir; if you'll take that from him, we'll knock him down presently.

Enter CHARLES and ISABINDA.

Sir J. Seize her, then.

Charles. Rascals, retire, she's my wife; touch her if you dare; I'll make dogs'-meat of you, rascals.

Mar. Ay, I'll make dogs'-meat of you, rascals.

Sir J. Ah! downright English.—Oh, oh, oh, oh!

Enter Sir FRANCIS GRIPE and MIRANDA.

Sir F. Into the house of joy we enter without knocking.—Ha! I think 'tis the house of sorrow, Sir Jealous.

Sir J. Oh, Sir Francis, are you come? What! was this your contrivance, to abuse, trick, and chouse me out of my child?

Sir F. My contrivance! what do you mean?

Sir J. No, you don't know your own son there in a Spanish habit?

Sir F. How! my son in a Spanish habit! Sirrah, you'll come to be hanged. Get out of my sight, ye dog! get out of my sight.

Sir J. Get out of your sight, sir! get out with your bags. Let's see what you'll give him now to maintain my daughter on.

Sir F. Give him! he shall never be the better for a penny of mine; and you might have looked after your daughter better, Sir Jealous. Tricked, quotha! Egad, I think you design to trick me: but look ye, gentlemen, I believe I shall trick you both. This lady is my wife, do you see, and my estate shall descend only to her children.

Sir G. I shall be extremely obliged to you, sir Francis.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha, ha! poor Sir George! does not your hundred pounds stick in your stomach? ha, ha, ha!

Sir G. No, faith, Sir Francis, this lady has given me a cordial for that. [Takes her by the hand.]

Sir F. Hold, sir, you have nothing to say to this lady.

Sir G. Nor you nothing to do with my wife, sir.

Sir F. Wife, sir!

Mir. Ay, really, guardian, 'tis even so. I hope you'll forgive my first offence.

Sir F. What, have you choused me out of my consent and your writings then, mistress, ha?

Mir. Out of nothing but my own, guardian.

Sir J. Ha, ha, ha! 'tis some comfort at least to see you are over-reached as well as myself. Will you settle your estate upon your son now?

Sir F. He shall starve first.

Mir. That I have taken care to prevent. There, sir, are the writings of your uncle's estate, which have been your due these three years.

[Gives Charles papers.]

Charles. I shall study to deserve this favour.

Mar. Now, how the devil could she get those writings, and I know nothing of it?

Sir F. What, have you robbed me too, mistress? 'Egad, I'll make you restore 'em—hussey, I will so.

Sir J. Take care I don't make you pay the arrears, sir. 'Tis well 'tis no worse, since 'tis no better. Come, young man, seeing thou hast out-witted me, take her, and bless you both!

Charles. I hope, sir, you'll bestow your blessing too; 'tis all I ask. [Kneels.]

Mar. Do, gardy, do.

Sir F. Confound you all!

[Erit.]

Mar. Mercy upon us, how he looks!

Sir G. Ha, ha, ha! never mind his curses, Charles; thou'lt thrive not one jot the worse for 'em. Since this gentleman is reconciled, we are all made happy.

Sir J. I always loved precaution, and took care to avoid dangers; but when a thing was past, I ever had philosophy to be easy.

Charles. Which is the true sign of a great soul. I loved your daughter, and she me, and you shall have no reason to repent her choice.

Isa. You will not blame me, sir, for loving my own country best.

Mar. So, here's every body happy, I find, but poor Pilgrarick. I wonder what satisfaction I shall have for being cuffed, kicked, and beaten in your service!

Sir J. I have been a little too familiar with you as things are fallen out; but since there's no help for it, you must forgive me.

Mar. 'Egad I think so; but provided that you be not so familiar for the future.

Sir G. Thou hast been an unlucky rogue.

Mar. But very honest.

Chas. That I'll vouch for, and freely forgive thee.

Sir G. And I'll do you one piece of service more, Marplot; I'll take care Sir Francis makes you master of your estate.

Mar. That will make me as happy as any of you.

Sir J. Now let us in, and refresh ourselves with a cheerful glass, in which we'll bury all animosities; and By my example let all parents move,

And never strive to cross their children's love;

But still submit that care to Providence above.

[Exeunt.]

THE FOLLIES OF A DAY; OR, THE MARRIAGE OF FIGARO.

A COMEDY, IN THREE ACTS,

BY THOMAS HOLCROFT.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

COUNT ALMAVIVA
BASIL

FIGARO ANTONIO

SUSAN AGNES

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Room in the castle.

FIGARO and SUSAN discovered. FIGARO measuring the chamber.

Fig. Eighteen feet by twenty-six: good.

Susan. What art thou so busy about?

Fig. Measuring, to try if the bed our noble lord intends to give us will stand well here.

Susan. In this chamber?

Fig. Yes.

Susan. I won't lie in this chamber.

Fig. Why so?

Susan. I don't like it.

Fig. Your reason?

Susan. What if I have no reason? What if I don't choose to give my reason? Thou knowest how our generous Count, when he, by thy help, obtained Rosina's hand, and made her Countess of Almaviva, during the first transports of love, abolished a certain Gothic right—

Fig. Of sleeping the first night with every bride.

Susan. Which, as lord of the manor, he could claim.

Fig. Know it? To be sure I do; or I would not have married even my charming Susan in his domain.

Susan. Tired of prowling among the rustic beauties of the neighbourhood, he returned to the castle—

Fig. And his wife.

Susan. And thy wife. Dost thou understand me?

Fig. Perfectly!

Susan. And endeavours, secretly, to re-purchase from her a right, which he now most sincerely repents he ever parted with.

Fig. Most gracious penitent!

Susan. This is what he hints to me every instant; and this, the faithful Basil, the honest agent of his pleasures, and our most noble music-master, every day repeats with my lesson.

Fig. Basil!

Susan. Basil.

Fig. Indeed! Well, if tough ashen-plant, or supple-jack, twine not round thy lazy sides, rascal—

Susan. Ha, ha, ha! Why, wert thou ever wise enough to imagine that the portion the Count intends to give us, was meant as a reward for thy services?

Fig. I think I had some reason to hope as much.

Susan. Lord, lord! what great fools are you men of wit!

Fig. I believe so.

Susan. I am sure so.

Fig. Oh! that it were possible to deceive this arch deceiver, this lord of mine! A thousand blundering boobies have had art enough to filch a wife from the side of her sleeping, simple, unsuspecting spouse; and, if he complained, to redress his injuries with a cudgel: but, to turn the tables on this poacher, make him pay for a delicious morsel he shall never taste, infect him with fears for his own honour, and—

Susan. [Bell rings.] Hark! my lady rings: I must run; for she has several times strictly charged me to be the first person at her breakfast the morning of our marriage.

Fig. Why the first?

Susan. The old saying tells us, that it's lucky to a neglected wife to meet a young bride on the morning of her wedding-day. [Exit.]

Fig. Ah! my sweet girl! She's an angel! Such wit, such grace, and so much prudence and modesty, too! I'm a happy fellow!—So, Mr. Basil, is it me, rascal, you mean to practise the tricks of your trade upon? I'll teach you to put your spoon in my milk. But, hold! a moment's reflection, friend Figaro, on the events of the day: first, thou must promote the sports and feastings already projected, that appearances may not cool, but that thy marriage may proceed with greater certainty; next, thou must—Ha! here again?

Enter SUSAN, with the Countess's gown, cap, and riband, in her hand.

Susan. It wasn't my lady's bell; she has left her room. Methinks, Figaro, you seem very indifferent about our wedding. Why aren't you gone to summon the bride-men and maids? and what's become of your fine plot to be revenged on my lord?

Fig. I'll away this moment, and prepare everything. Pr'ythee, my Susan, give me one kiss before I go; 'twill quicken my wits, and lend imagination a new impulse.

Susan. Oh! to be sure! But, if I kiss my lover to-day, what will my husband say to me to-morrow? Psha! Figaro, when wilt thou cease to trifle thus from morning till night?

Fig. When I may trifle from night till morning, sweet Susan. [Exit.

Susan. Ah! Figaro, Figaro! if thou provest but as loving a husband as thou art a fond lover, thou'lt never need fear the proudest lord of them all. I declare, I forget what I came for.

[Puts the gown on the arm-chair; but keeps the cap and riband in her hand.

Page. [Without.] Thank you, thank you, Figaro: I shall find her. [Enter the Page, running.

Susan. So, master Hannibal; what do you want here?

Page. Oh! my dear, dear, pretty Susan! I have been looking for you these two hours.

Susan. Well, what have you to say to me, now you have found me?

Page. How does your beauteous lady do, Susan?

Susan. Very well.

Page. Do you know, Susan, my lord is going to send me back to my papa and mamma?

Susan. Poor child!

Page. Child, indeed! umph! And, if my charming god-mother, your dear lady, cannot obtain my pardon, I shall soon be deprived of the pleasure of your company, Susan.

Susan. Upon my word! You are toying all day long with Agnes, and fancy yourself, moreover, in love with my lady, and then come to tell me you shall be deprived of my company. Ha, ha, ha!

Page. Agnes is good-natured enough to listen to me; and that is more than you are, Susan; for all I love you so.

Susan. Love me! Why, you amorous little villain, you are in love with every woman you meet.

Page. So I am, Susan, and I can't help it. If nobody is by, I swear it to the trees, the waters, and the winds; nay, to myself. Oh! how sweet are the words women, maidens, and love, in my ears!

Susan. Ha, ha, ha! he's bewitched. And what is the Count going to send you from the castle for?

Page. Last night, you must know, he caught me with Agnes, in her room: "Begone," said he, "thou little—"

Susan. Little what?

Page. Lord! he called me such a name—I can't for shame repeat it before a woman. I dare never meet his face again. [room?

Susan. And, pray, what were you doing in Agnes's

Page. Teaching her her part.

Susan. Her part?

Page. Yes; the love-scene, you know she is to act in the comedy this evening.

Susan. [Aside.] Which my lord would choose to teach her himself.

Page. Agnes is very kind, Susan.

Susan. Well, well; I'll tell the Countess what you say. But you are a little more circumspect in her presence.

Page. Ah! Susan, she is a divinity. How noble is her manner! her very smiles are awful!

Susan. That is to say, you can take what liberties you please with such people as me.

Page. Oh! how do I envy thy happiness, Susan! Always near her; dressing her every morning; undressing her every evening; putting her to bed; touching her; looking at her; speaking to—What is it thou hast got there, Susan?

Susan. It is the fortunate riband of the happy cap, which, at night, enfolds the auburn ringlets of the beauteous Countess.

Page. Give it me: nay, give it me; I will have it.

Susan. But, I say, you sha'n't. [The Page snatches it.] Oh! my riband.

Page. Be as angry as thou wilt, but thou shalt never have it again; thou should'st have one of my eyes rather.

Susan. I can venture to predict, young gentleman, that, three or four years hence, thou wilt be one of the most deceitful, veriest knaves—

Page. If thou dost not hold thy tongue, Susan, I'll kiss thee into the bargain.

Susan. Kiss me! Don't come near me, if thou lovest thy ears. I say, beg my lord to forgive you, indeed! No, I assure you.

Count A. [Without.] Jaques!

Page. Ah! I'm undone! 'Tis the Count himself, and there's no way out of this room. Lord, lord! what will become of me? [Hides himself.]

Enter Count ALMAVIVA.

Count A. So, my charming Susan, have I found thee at last? But thou seemest frightened, my little beauty.

Susan. Consider, my lord, if any body should come and find you here.

Count A. That would be rather mal apropos; but there's no great danger [Offers to kiss Susan.]

Susan. Fie, my lord!

Count A. Thou knowest, my charming Susan, the king has done me the honour to appoint me ambassador to the court of Paris. I shall take Figaro with me, and give him a very excellent post; and, as it is the duty of a wife to follow her husband, I may then be as happy as I could wish.

Susan. I really don't understand you, my lord. I thought your affection for my lady, whom you took so much pains to steal from her old guardian, and for love of whom you generously abolished a certain vile privilege—

Count A. For which all the young girls are very sorry, are they not?

Susan. No, indeed, my lord. I thought, my lord, I say—

Count A. Pr'ythee, say no more, my sweet Susan, but promise thou wilt meet me to-night in the garden; and be certain, if thou wilt but grant me this small favour, nothing thou canst ask shall ever—

Basil. [Without.] He is not in his own apartment. Count A. Heavens! here's somebody coming; and this infernal room has but one door. Where can I hide? Is there no place here?

[The Count runs behind the arm-chair: SUSAN keeps between him and the Page, who steals away as the Count advances, leaps into the arm-chair, and is covered over with the Countess's gown by SUSAN.]

Enter BASIL.

Basil. Ah! Susan, good morrow. Is my lord the Count here?

Susan. Here? what should he be here for?

Basil. Nay, there would be no miracle in it, if he were; would there, eh, gentle Susan?

Susan. It would be a greater miracle to see you honest.

Basil. Figaro is in search of him.

Susan. Then he is in search of the man who wishes most to injure him—yourself excepted.

Basil. It is strange that a man should injure the husband by obliging the wife.

Count A. [Peeping.] I shall hear now how well he pleads my cause.

Basil. For my part, marriage being of all serious things the greatest farce, I imagined—

Susan. All manner of wickedness.

Basil. That though you are obliged to fast to-day, you might be glad to feed to-morrow; grace being first duly said.

Susan. Begone, and don't shock my ears with your vile principles.

Basil. Yes, my pretty Susan; but you must not suppose I am the dupe of these fine appearances: I know it isn't Figaro who is the great obstacle to my lord's happiness; but a certain beardless Page, whom I surprised here yesterday looking for you, as I entered.

Susan. I wish you'd begone, you wicked devil.

Basil. Wicked devil! Ah! one is a wicked devil for not shutting one's eyes.

Susan. I wish you'd begone, I tell you.

Basil. Wasn't it for you that he wrote the song, which he goes chanting up and down the house at every instant?

Susan. Oh! yes, for me, to be sure.

Basil. I'm sure it was either for you or your lady.

Susan. What next?

Basil. Why, really, when he sits at table, he does cast certain very significant glances towards a beautiful Countess, who shall be nameless. But let him beware. If my lord catches him at his tricks, he'll make him dance without music.

Susan. Nobody but such a wicked creature as you, could ever invent such scandalous tales to the ruin of a poor youth, who has, unhappily, fallen into his lordship's displeasure.

Basil. I invent? Why, it's in every body's mouth.

Count A. [Discovers himself, and comes forward.] How? in every body's mouth?

Basil. Zounds!—

Count A. Run, Basil; let him have fifty pistols and a horse given him, and be sent back to his friends instantly.

Basil. I'm very sorry, my lord, that I happened to speak of—

Susan. Oh, oh! I am quite suffocated.

Count A. Let us seat her in this great chair, Basil: quick, quick.

Susan. This wicked fellow has ruined the poor boy. No, no; I won't sit down: I always faint best standing.

Basil. I assure you, my lord, what I said was only meant to sound Susan.

Count A. No matter; he shall depart: a little wanton, impudent rascal, that I meet at every turning! No longer ago than yesterday, I surprised him with the gardener's daughter.

Basil. Agnes?

Count A. In her very bed-chamber.

Susan. Where my lord happened to have business himself.

Count A. Hem! I was going there to seek her father, Antonio, my drunken gardener: I knocked at the door, and waited some time; at last Agnes came, with confusion in her countenance: I entered, cast a look around; and, perceiving a kind of long cloak or curtain, or some such thing, approached; and, without seeming to take the least notice, drew it gently aside, thus. Eh!

[Approaches the arm-chair, and draws aside the gown that hides the Page.]

Basil. Zounds! Susan—

Count A. Why, this is a better trick than t'other.

Basil. Worth ten of it. No; I won't sit down: I faint best standing. Ha, ha, ha!

Count A. And so, it was to receive this pretty youth that you were so desirous of being alone. And you, you little villain, what, you don't intend to mend your manners, then?—but, forgetting all respect for your friend Figaro, and for the Countess, your god-mother, likewise, you are endeavouring here to seduce her favourite woman! I, however, shall not suffer Figaro, a man whom I esteem sincerely, to fall the victim of such deceit. Did this imp enter with you, Basil?

Basil. No, my lord.

Susan. There's neither victim nor deceit in the case, my lord: he was here when you entered.

Count A. I hope that's false; his greatest enemy couldn't wish him so much mischief.

Susan. Knowing that you were angry with him, the poor boy came running to me, begging me to solicit my lady in his favour, in hopes she might engage you to forgive him; but was so terrified when he heard you coming, that he hid himself in the great chair.

Count A. A likely story! I sat down in it as soon as I came in.

Page. Yes, my lord; but I was then trembling behind it.

Count A. That's false again; for I hid myself behind it when Basil entered.

Page. Pardon me, my lord; but, as you approached, I returned, and crouched down as you now see me.

Count A. It's a little serpent that glides into every cranny. And he has been listening, too, to our discourse.

Page. Indeed, my lord, I did all I could not to hear a word.

Count A. [To SUSAN.] There is no Figaro, no husband for you, however.

Basil. [To PAGE.] Somebody's coming: get down. Enter the COUNTESS, FIGARO, AGNES, PEDRO, and Servants; Figaro carrying the nuptial cap.

Count A. [Plucks the Page from the arm-chair.] What, would you continue crouching there before the whole world?

Fig. We are come, my lord, to beg a favour, which, we hope, for your lady's sake, you will grant. [Aside to SUSAN.] Be sure to second what I say.

Susan. [Aside to FIG.] It will end in nothing.

Fig. [Aside to SUS.] No matter; let's try, at least.

Countess. You see, my lord, I am supposed to have a much greater degree of influence with you than I really possess.

Count A. Oh no, madam; not an atom, I assure you.

Fig. [Presenting the cap to the Count.] Our petition is, that the bride may have the honour of receiving from our worthy lord's hand this nuptial cap, ornamented with half-blown roses and white ribands, symbols of the purity of his intentions.

Count A. [Aside.] Do they mean to laugh at me?

Countess. Let me beg, my lord, you will not deny their request; in the name of that love you once had for me.

Count A. And have still, madam.

Fig. Join with me, my friends.

All. My lord, my lord—

Count A. Well, well; I consent. [Gives SUSAN the cap.] Remember the garden. [Aside.]

Fig. Look at her, my lord: never could a more beautiful bride better prove the greatness of the sacrifice you have made.

Susan. Oh! don't speak of my beauty, but his lordship's virtues.

Count A. [Aside.] My virtues! Yes, yes; I see they understand each other.

Agnes. [Pointing to the Page.] Have you forgiven what happened yesterday, my lord?

Count A. Hush!

Fig. [To the Page.] What's the matter, young Hannibal the brave? What makes you so silent?

Susan. He's sorrowful, because my lord is going to send him from the castle.

All. Oh! my lord—

Countess. Let me beg you will forgive him.

Count A. He does not deserve to be forgiven.

Countess. Consider, he is so young.

Count A. [Aside.] Not so young, perhaps, as you suppose.

Page. My lord certainly has not ceded away the right to pardon.

Susan. And, if he had, that would certainly be the first he would secretly endeavour to reclaim.

Count A. No doubt, no doubt.

Page. My conduct, my lord, may have been indiscreet; but I can assure your lordship, that the least word shall never pass my lips—

Count A. Enough, enough! since every body begs for him, I must grant. I shall, moreover, give him a company in my regiment.

All. Oh! my lord—

Count A. But, on condition, that he departs to-day for Catalonia, to join the corps.

All. Oh! my lord—

Fig. To-morrow, my lord?

Count A. To-day. It shall be so. [To the Page.] Take leave of your god-mother, and beg her protection. [The Page kneels to the Countess.]

Fig. Go, go, child; go. [Pushes the Page forward.]

Countess. [With great emotion.] Since it is not possible to obtain leave for you to remain here to-day, depart, young man, and follow the noble career which lies before you. Go where fortune and glory call. Be obedient, polite, and brave, and be certain we shall take part in your prosperity. [Raises him.]

Count A. You seem agitated, madam.

Countess. How can I help it, recollecting the perils to which his youth must be exposed? He has been bred in the same house with me, is of the same kindred, and is, likewise, my god-son.

Count A. [Aside.] Basil, I see, was in the right. [To the Page.] Go; kiss Susan, for the last time.

Fig. No, there's no occasion for kissing, my lord; he'll return in the winter; and, in the mean time, he may kiss me. The scene must now be changed, my delicate youth: you must not run up stairs and down into the women's chambers, play at hunt the slipper, steal cream, suck oranges, and live upon sweet-meats. Instead of that, zounds! you must look bluff; tan your face; handle your musket; turn to the right; wheel to the left; and march to glory—that is, if you are not stopped short by a bullet.

Susan. Fie! Figaro.

Countess. What a prophecy!

Fig. Were I a soldier, I'd make some of them scamper. But, come, come, my friends, let us prepare our feast against the evening.

Count A. Well, much diversion to you all, my friends. [Gong.]

Countess. You will not leave us, my lord.

Count A. I am undressed, you see.

Countess. We shall see nobody but our own people.

Count A. I must do what you please. Wait for me in the study, Basil. I shall make out his commission immediately. [Exeunt all but Fig. and Page.]

Fig. [Retains the Page.] Come, come; let us study our parts well for the play in the evening: I dare say, you know no more of your's than Agnes does of her's.

Page. You forget, Figaro, that I am going.

Fig. And you wish to stay?

Page. Ah! yes.

Fig. Follow my advice, and so thou shalt.

Page. How, how?

Fig. Make no murmuring, but clap on your boots, and seem to depart; gallop as far as the farm; return to the castle on foot; enter by the back way; and hide yourself, till I can come to you, in the lodge at the bottom of the garden; you will find pretty Agnes thereabouts.

Page. Ay, and then I may teach her her part, you know.

Fig. Yes, you have no objection to that, I suppose. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Countess's Bed-chamber.

The COUNTESS seated at her toilet, and SUSAN, waiting, discovered.

Countess. Shut the door. And so, the Page was hid behind the great chair?

Susan. Yes, madam.

Countess. But how did he happen to be in your room, Susan?

Susan. The poor boy came to beg I would prevail on you to obtain his pardon of my lord the count.

Countess. But why did not he come to me himself? I should not have refused him a favour of that kind.

Susan. Bashfulness, madam. "Ah! Susan, (said he,) she is a divinity! How noble is her manner! Her very smiles are awful."

Countess. Is that true, Susan?

Susan. Can you doubt it, madam?

Countess. I have always afforded him my protection.

Susan. Had you, madam, but seen him snatch the riband from me!

Countess. [Rising.] Psha! enough of this nonsense. And so, my lord the Count endeavours to seduce you, Susan?

Susan. Oh! no, indeed, madam, he does not give himself the trouble to seduce; he endeavours to purchase me; and, because I refuse him, will certainly prevent my marriage with Figaro.

Countess. Fear nothing. We shall have need, however, of a little artifice, perhaps; in the execution of which, Figaro's assistance may not be amiss.

Susan. He'll be here, madam, as soon as my lord is gone a-coursing.

Countess. Your lord is an ungrateful man, Susan! an ungrateful man! Open the window; I am stifled for want of air. Vows, protestations, and tenderness, are all forgotten. My love offends, my caresses disgust: his own infidelities must be overlooked, yet my conduct must be irreproachable.

Susan. [Looking out of the window.] Yonder goes my lord, with all his grooms and greyhounds.

Countess. To divert himself with hunting a poor, timid, harmless hare to death. This, however, will give us time to—[Knocking at the door.] Somebody is at the door, Susan.

Enter FIGARO.

Countess. Well, Figaro, you've heard of my lord the Count's designs on your fair bride.

Fig. Oh! yes, my lady. There was nothing very surprising in the news. My lord sees a sweet, young, lovely angel, and wishes to have her: can any thing be more natural? I wish the very same.

Countess. I don't find it so very pleasant, Figaro.

Fig. He endeavours to overturn the schemes of those who oppose his wishes; and in this he only follows the example of the world: I will endeavour to do the same by him; and first, my scheme requires that you dress up the Page in your clothes, my dear Susan: he is to be your representative in the design I have plotted.

Countess. The Page!

Susan. He is gone.

Fig. Is he? Perhaps so; but a whistle from me will bring him back.

Susan. So, now Figaro's happy; plots and contrivances—

Fig. Two, three, four, at a time! Embarrassed, involved, perplexed! Leave me to unravel them. I was born to thrive in courts.

Susan. I've heard the trade of a courtier is not so difficult as some pretend.

Fig. Ask for every thing that falls, seize every thing in your power, and accept every thing that's offered; there's the whole art and mystery in three words.

Countess. But should my lord discover the disguised Page?

Susan. He'll only give him a smart lecture, and that will do his boyish vanity no harm.

Countess. And, in truth, it deserves a little mortification. Well, next for the Count, Figaro.

Fig. Permit me, madam, to manage him. And first, the better to secure my property, I shall begin by making him dread the loss of his own: to which end, an anonymous letter must be sent, informing him, that a gallant (meaning to profit by his neglect and absence) is at present with his beauteous Countess; and, to confess the truth, the thing is already done, madam.

Countess. How? have you dared to trifle thus with a woman of honour?

Fig. Oh! madam, it is only with a woman of honour I should presume to take a liberty like this; lest my joke should happen to prove a reality.

Countess. You don't want an agreeable excuse for your plot, Figaro. Though I hardly know how to give into it.

[Aside.]

Fig. If you please, madam, I'll go and send the Page hither to be dressed. We must not lose a moment.

[Exit.]

Countess. [Examining her head-dress in the looking-glass.] What a hideous cap this is, Susan! it's quite awry. This youth who is coming—

Susan. Ah! madam, your beauty needs not the addition of art in his eyes.

Countess. I assure you, Susan, I shall be very severe with him; I shall tell him of all the complaints I hear against him.

Susan. Oh! yes, madam; I can see you will scold him heartily.

Countess. What do you say, Susan?

Susan. [Goes to the chamber-door.] Come, come in, Mister Soldier.

Enter the Page.

Page. Um!

[Aside]

Countess. Well, young gentleman! [Aside to SUSAN.] How innocent he looks, Susan!

Susan. And how bashful, madam!

[Aside to the Countess.]

Countess. Have you reflected on the duties of your new profession?

Susan. [Aside to the Page.] Ay, ay, young rake, I'll tell all I know. [Returns to the Countess.] Observe his downcast eyes, madam, and long eyelashes. [Aside to the Page.] Hypocrite, I'll tell—

Countess. Nay, Hannibal, don't be terrified. I—Come nearer.

Susan. [Pushing him towards the Countess.] Advance, modesty.

Countess. Poor youth, he's quite affected. I'm not angry with you; I was only going to speak to you on the duties of a soldier. Why do you seem so sorrowful?

Page. Alas! madam, I may well be sorrowful; being, as I am, obliged to leave a lady so gentle, and so kind,—

Susan. And so beautiful.

Page. Ah! yes.

Susan. [Mimicking.] Ah! yes. Come, let me try on one of my gowns upon you. Come here, let's measure: I declare the little villain is not so tall as I am.

Page. Um.

Susan. Turn about; let me untie your cloak.

Countess. But suppose anybody should come?

Susan. Dear, my lady, we are not doing any harm; I'll lock the door, however, for fear. Well! have you nothing to say to my beauteous lady, and your charming god-mother?

Page. Oh! yes; that I am sure I shall love her as long as I live.

Countess. Esteem, you mean, Hannibal.

Page. Ye—ye—yes; esteem, I should have said.

Susan. [Laughs.] Yes, yes; esteem! The poor youth overflows with esteem, and affection, and—

Page. Um!

[Aside to SUSAN.]

Susan. Now, let us try whether one of my caps—

Countess. There's a close cap of mine lies on my dressing-table. [Exit SUSAN.] Is your commission made out?

Page. Oh! yes, madam, and given me: here it is.

[Presents his commission to the Countess.]

Countess. Already? They have made haste, I see; they are not willing to lose a moment; their hurry has made them even forget to affix the seal to it.

Re-enter SUSAN, with a cap in her hand.

Susan. The seal? to what, madam?

Countess. His commission.

Susan. So soon!

Countess. I was observing, there has been no time lost.

Susan. Come. [Makes the Page kneel down, and puts the cap on him.] What a pretty little villain it is! I declare I am jealous. See, if he is not handsomer than I am! Turn about; there. What's here? the riband? So, so, so! now all's out. I am glad of it. I told my young gentleman I would let you know his thievish tricks, madam.

Countess. Fetch me some black patches, Susan.

Susan. There are none in your room, madam; I'll fetch some out of mine.

[Exit]

Countess. And—and so you—you are sorry leave us?

Page. Ye—yes, madam.

Countess. 'Tis that good-for-nothing Figaro who has frightened the child with his prognostics.

Page. No, indeed, madam; I am only grieved to part from so dear a lady. [Weeps.]

Countess. Nay, but don't weep, don't weep. Come, come, be comforted. [A knocking at the chamber-door.] Who's there?

Count A. [Without.] Open the door, my lady.

Countess. Heavens! it is the Count! I am ruined; if he finds the Page here, after receiving Figaro's anonymous letter, I shall be for ever lost. What imprudence!

Count A. [Without.] Why don't you open the door?

Page. Oh, ma'am!

Countess. Because—I am alone.

Count A. Alone! Who are you talking to, then?

Countess. To you, to be sure.—How could I be so thoughtless? This villainous Figaro!

Page. After the scene of the great chair this morning, he will certainly murder me if he finds me here.

Countess. Run into my dressing-room; and, Hannibal, lock the door on the inside.

[Exit Page into the dressing-room. The Countess opens the chamber-door.]

Enter Count ALMAVIVA.

Count A. You did not use to lock yourself in, when you were alone, madam. Whom were you speaking to?

Countess. To—Susan, who is rummaging in her own room.

Count A. You seem agitated, madam.

Countess. That is not impossible.—We were speaking of you.

Count A. Of me?

Countess. Your jealousy, your indifference, my lord. [Noise of a table overturned by the Page in the dressing-room.] What will become of me! [Aside.]

Count A. What noise is that?

Countess. I heard no noise.

Count A. No? You must be most confoundedly absent, then.

Countess. Oh! to be sure.

Count A. There's somebody in your dressing-room, madam.

Countess. Who should be there?

Count A. That's what I want to know.

Countess. It's Susan, I suppose, putting the chairs and tables in their places.

Count A. What! your favourite woman turned housemaid. You told me just now she was in her own room.

Countess. In her room, or my room, it's the same thing.

Count A. Really, my lady, this Susan of yours is a very nimble, convenient kind of person.

Countess. Really, my lord, this Susan of mine disturbs your quiet very much.

Count A. Very true, madam; so much, that I'm determined to see her. [He goes to the dressing-room door, and calls.] Susan, Susan! If Susan you are, come forth!

Countess. Very well, my lord, very well. Would you have the girl come out half undressed? She's trying on one of my left-off dresses. To disturb female privacy in this manner, my lord, is not to be endured.

[During this altercation, SUSAN comes out of her own room, perceives what is passing, and, after listening long enough to know how to act, slips, unseen by both, behind the curtains of the bed.]

Count A. Well, if she can't come out, she can answer, at least. [Calls.] Susan! answer me, Susan!

Countess. I say, do not answer, Susan; I forbid you to speak a word. We shall see whom she'll obey.

Count A. But if it is nobody but Susan, what is the reason, madam, of that emotion and perplexity so very evident in your countenance?

Countess. Emotion and perplexity? Ha, ha, ha! Ridiculous!

Count A. Be it as ridiculous as it may, I am determined to be satisfied; and I think present appearances give me a sufficient plea. [Goes to the chamber-door, and calls.] Hollo! Who waits there?

Countess. Do, do, my lord; expose your jealousy to your very servants! Make yourself and me the jest of the whole world.

Count A. Why do you oblige me to it? However, since you will not suffer that door to be quietly opened, will you be pleased to accompany me while I procure an instrument to force it.

Countess. To be sure, my lord, to be sure; if you please.

Count A. I shall lock the chamber-door after me; and, that you may be fully justified, I'll make this other door fast. [Goes to SUSAN'S room-door; locks it, and takes the key.] Now, [showing the key to the Countess] I am sure nobody can get in or out of this room; and the Susan of the dressing-room must submit to be confined here till my return.

Countess. This behaviour is greatly to your honour, my lord. [Exeunt.]

Enter SUSAN from behind the bed; as they go off, she runs to the dressing-room door, and calls.

Susan. Hannibal! Hannibal! Open the door; quick, quick, it's I, Susan.

Enter Page, frightened.

Page. Oh! Susan.

Susan. Oh! my poor mistress.

Page. What will become of her?

Susan. What will become of my marriage?

Page. What will become of me?

Susan. Don't stand babbling here; but fly.

Page. The doors are all fast, how can I fly?

Susan. Don't ask me.—Fly!

Page. Here's a window open. [Runs to the window.] Below is a bed of flowers! I'll leap out.

Susan. [Screams.] You'll break your neck.

Page. Better that, than ruin my dear lady. [Gets upon a table at the window.] Give me one kiss before I go, Susan.

Susan. Was there ever such a young—[Page kisses her, and jumps out of the window; SUSAN shrieks at seeing him jump down.] Ah! [Looks out of the window.] He is safe; yonder he ruins, as light and as swift as the winds. If that boy does not make some woman's heart ache, one of these days, I'm mistaken. [SUSAN goes in at the dressing-room door, but peeps back as she is going to shut it.] And now, my good jealous Count, perhaps I may teach you to break open doors another time. [Locks herself in.]

Enter Count ALMAVIVA, with a wrenching-iron in one hand, and leading in the Countess with the other. Examines SUSAN'S room-door.

Count A. Yes, everything is as I left it. We now shall come at the truth. Do you still persist in forcing me to break open this door? I am determined to see who's within.

Countess. Let me beg, my lord, you'll have a moment's patience; hear me only, and you shall satisfy your utmost curiosity. Let me entreat you to be assured, that however appearances may condemn me, no injury was intended to your honour.

Count A. Then there is a man?

Countess. No; it is only—only—

Count A. Only—only who?

Countess. A child.

Count A. Let's see this child.—What child?

Countess. Hannibal.

Count A. The Page! This d—nable Page again.

The whole's unravelled. Come forth, viper!

Countess. Do not let the disorder in which you will see him—

Count A. The disorder! the disorder!

Countess. We were going to dress him in women's clothes for our evening's diversion.

Count A. I'll rack him! I'll—I'll make him a terrible example of an injured husband's wrath.

Countess. [Kneels.] Hold! my lord, hold!—Have pity on his youth, his infancy—

Count A. What? Intercede for him to me? [Runs to the dressing-room door.] Come forth, I say, once more. I'll rack him, I'll stab him, I'll—

[While the COUNT is speaking, SUSAN unlocks the dressing-room door, and bolts out upon him.

Susan. I'll rack him! I'll stab him! I'll—Ha, ha, ha!

[The COUNTESS hearing SUSAN's voice, recovers sufficiently to look round, is astonished, and turns back into her former position to conceal her surprise.

Count A. [After looking first at SUSAN, and then at the COUNTESS.] And can you act astonishment, too, madam? [To the COUNTESS.

Countess. I? My lord—

Count A. But, perhaps, she wasn't alone.

[Enters the dressing-room; the COUNTESS is again alarmed; SUSAN runs to her.

Susan. Fear nothing; he's not there. He has jumped out of the window.

Countess. And broken his neck!

Susan. Hush! [To the COUNTESS.] Hem! hem!

Re-enter Count ALMAVIVA, greatly agitated.

Count A. No, there's nobody there. I've been confoundedly in the wrong. [Approaching the COUNTESS.] Confusion, madam—Madam—Upon my soul, madam, you are a most excellent actress!

Susan. And am not I, too, my lord?

Count A. [Kneels to the COUNTESS.] You see my contrition. [Kisses her hand.] Be generous—

Susan. As you have been.

Count A. Hush! [Kisses SUSAN's hand.] Remember the garden to-night. [Turns to the COUNTESS.] My dear Rosina!—

Countess. No, no, my lord; I am no longer that Rosina whom you formerly loved with such affection: I am now nothing but the poor Countess of Almaviva—a neglected wife, not a beloved mistress.

Count A. Nay, do not make my humiliation too severe. But, wherefore have you been thus mysterious on this occasion?

Countess. That I might not betray that headlong thoughtless Figaro.

Count A. What, he wrote the anonymous billet, then?

Countess. But it was done, my lord, before I knew of it.

Susan. To suspect a man in my lady's dressing-room!

Count A. And to be thus severely punished for my suspicion—

Susan. Not to believe my lady, when she assured you it was her woman.

Count A. But what's the reason, you malicious little hussy, you did not come out when I called?

Susan. What, undressed, my lord?

Count A. But why didn't you answer, then?

Susan. My lady forbid me. And good reason she had so to do. Aside.

Count A. How could you, Rosina, be so cruel as to—

Enter FIGARO in a hurry; he stops on seeing the COUNT.

Fig. They told me, my lady was indisposed: I ran to inquire, and am very happy to find there was nothing in it.

Count A. You are very attentive.

Fig. It is my duty to be so, my lord. [Turns to SUSAN.] Come, come, my charmer, prepare for the ceremony; go to your bridesmaids.

Count A. But who is to take care of the Countess in the meantime?

Fig. Take care of her, my lord! My lady seems very well.

Count A. Who is to guard her from the gallant, who was to profit by my absence?

[SUSAN and the COUNTESS make signs to FIGARO.

Countess. Nay, nay, Figaro; the Count knows all.

Susan. Yes, yes; we've told my lord everything. The jest is ended, it's all over.

Fig. The jest is ended! And it's all over!

Count A. Yes, ended, ended, ended!—And all over! What have you to say to that?

Fig. Say, my lord?

Count A. Ay, say.

Fig. I—I—I wish I could say as much of my marriage.

Count A. And who wrote the pretty letter?

Fig. Not I, my lord.

Count A. If I did not know thou liest, I could read it in thy face.

Fig. Indeed, my lord? Then it's my face that lies, not I.

Countess. Psha! Figaro, why should you endeavour to conceal anything, when I tell you we have confessed all?

Susan. [Making signs to FIGARO.] We've told my lord of the letter, which made him suspect that Hannibal, the Page, who is far enough off by this, was hid in my lady's dressing-room, where I myself was locked in.

Fig. Well, well; since my lord will have it so, and my lady will have it so, and you all will have it so, why then so let it be.

Count A. Still at his wiles.

Countess. Why, my lord, would you oblige him to speak truth, so much against his inclination?

[COUNT and COUNTESS retire, talking familiarly.

Susan. Hast thou seen the Page?

Fig. Yes, yes; you have shook his young joints for him among you.

Enter ANTONIO, the gardener, half drunk.

Ant. My lord,—my good lord,—if so be as your lordship will not have the goodness to have these windows nailed up, I shall never have a nosgay fit to give to my lady. They break all my pots, and spoil my flowers; for they not only throw other rubbish out of the windows, as they used to do, but they have just now tossed out a man.

Count A. A man!

[The COUNT's suspicions all revive.

Ant. In white stockings.

[COUNT and SUSAN discover their fears, and make signs to FIGARO to assist them, if possible.

Count A. Where is the man?

Ant. That's what I want to know, my lord. I wish

I could find him. I'm your lordship's gardener; and though I say it, a better gardener is not to be found in all Spain; but if chamber-maids are permitted to toss men out of the window, to save their own reputation, what is to become of mine?

Fig. Oh, fie! What, setting so soon in a morning.
Ant. No; this is only the remains of last night.

Count A. On with your story, sir. What of the man? What followed?

Ant. I followed him myself, my lord, as fast as I could; but somehow, I unluckily happened to make a false step, and came with such a confounded whirl against the garden gate, that I—I quite for—forgot my errand.

Count A. And should you know this man again?

Ant. To be sure I should, my lord; if I had seen his face, that is.

Count A. Either speak more clearly, rascal, or I'll send you packing—

Ant. Send me packing, my lord? Oh! no; if your lordship has not enough—enough—[points to his forehead]—to know when you have a good gardener; I warrant I know when I have a good place.

Fig. There is no occasion, my lord, for all this mystery.—It was I that jumped out of the window into the garden.

Count A. You?

Fig. My own self, my lord.

Count A. Jump out of a one-pair of stairs window, and run the risk of breaking your neck?

Fig. The ground was soft, my lord.

Ant. And his neck is in no danger of being broken that way.

Fig. To be sure, I hurt my right leg a little in the fall; just here at the ankle. I feel it still.

Count A. But what reason had you to jump out of the window?

Fig. You had received my letter, my lord, (since I must own it,) and were come somewhat sooner than I expected, in a dreadful passion, in search of a man.

Ant. If it was you, you have grown plaguy fast within this half hour, to my thinking. The man that I saw did not seem so tall as you, by the head and shoulders.

Fig. Psha! Does not one always double one's self up when one takes a leap?

Ant. It seemed a great deal more like the Page.

Count A. The Page!

Fig. Oh! yes, to be sure, the Page has galloped back from Seville, horse and all, to leap out of the window!

Ant. No, no, my lord; I saw no such thing.—I'll take my oath, I saw no horse leap out of the window.

Count A. Drunkard! Boody!

[The Count seizes ANTONIO, and flings him on the bed.

Fig. Come, come, let us go, and prepare for our sports. [They are all going.

Ant. Well, since it was you, as I am an honest man, I ought to return you this paper which dropped out of your pocket, as you fell.

Count A. [Snatches the paper; the COUNTESS, FIGARO, and SUSAN are all surprised and embarrassed.] Now, if it were you, you doubtless can tell what this paper contains, [keeps the paper behind his back as he faces FIGARO] and how it happened to come into your pocket?

Fig. Oh! my lord, I've such quantities of papers. [Searches his pockets and pulls out a great many.] No, it is not this.—Hem!—This is a double love-letter from Marcelina, in seven pages.—Hem!—Hem! It would do a man's heart good to read it.—Hem! And this is a petition from the poor poacher in prison. I never presented it to your lordship, because I know you have affairs much more serious on your hands, than the complaints of such half-starved rascals. Ah!—Hem! This—this—no, this is an inventory of your lordship's sword-knots, ruffs, ruffles, and roses.—Must take care of this.

[Endeavours to gain time, and keeps glancing and hemming to SUSAN and the COUNTESS to look at the paper and to give him a hint.

Count A. It is neither this, nor this, nor that, nor t'other, that you have in your hand, but what I hold here in mine, that I want to know the contents of.

[Holds out the paper, in action, as he speaks; the COUNTESS catches a sight of it.

Countess. [Aside to SUSAN.] 'Tis the commission.

Susan. [Aside to FIGARO.] The Page's commission.

Count A. Well, sir; so you know nothing of the matter.

Ant. There, my lord says you know nothing of the matter.

Fig. Keep off, and don't come to whisper me. [He pushes ANTONIO out at the chamber door. Oh! lord, lord! [Pretending to recollect himself.] What a stupid fool I am! I declare it's the commission of that poor youth, Hannibal! which I, like a block-head, forgot to return him; he'll be quite unhappy about it, poor boy.

Count A. And how came you by it?

Fig. By it, my lord?

Count A. Why did he give it to you?

Fig. To—to—to—

Count A. To what?

Fig. To get—

Count A. To get what? It wants nothing.

Countess. [Aside to SUSAN.] It wants the seal.

Susan. [Aside to FIGARO.] It wants the seal.

Fig. Oh! my lord, what it wants, to be sure, is a mere trifle.

Count A. What trifle?

Fig. You know, my lord, when you make out a commission, it's customary to—

Count A. To what?

Fig. To affix your lordship's seal.

Count A. [Looks at the commission, and finds the seal is wanting.] The devil and all his imps!

[Exit at the chamber door.

Fig. Are you going, my lord, without giving orders for our wedding? [Exit, following the Count.

Susan. What shall we do now, madam? The Page is too much frightened ever to be employed in a second plot.

Countess. No more plots of Figaro's inventing! You see into what danger I've been brought by his fine concerted letter. Still, however, I wish I could convict my false husband of his infidelity to his face. Ha! a happy thought strikes me. I'll meet him in the garden, instead of you; and then nobody will be exposed but himself. But you must not mention one word of this, Susan, to anybody.

Susan. Except Figaro!

Countess. No, not even to Figaro; he'll spoil my design, by mixing some plot of his own with it.

Susan. Your project's a charming one, madam; and I shall yet have my Figaro. [Ereunt.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The Garden of the castle. Two Pavilions, one on each side of the stage.

Enter AGNES, with a little basket of refreshments in her hand.

Agnes. Now for that good-natured, merry little Hannibal; he hasn't half learnt me my part yet. Poor thing, he has had nothing to eat since he came; and the cross good-for-nothing cook would not give me a morsel for him; so I was obliged to ask the butler for some cakes and oranges. It cost me a good kiss on the cheek; but I know who'll repay it. Hannibal! Hannibal! He's not there, sure. Oh! dear, and here's somebody coming!

[Exit, into the pavilion on the left]

Enter FIGARO, disguised in a roquelaure, with BASIL and PEDRO.

Fig. I was mistaken; 'twas Agnes. What o'clock is it?

Ped. Almost near the moon's rising.

Basil. What a gloomy night! We look like so many conspirators.

Fig. You understand, gentlemen, why you come hither; it is to be witnesses of the conduct of the virtuous bride I am soon to espouse, and of the honourable lord who has graciously bestowed her on me. You'll see my suspicions are not without cause.

Basil. Ay; and I shall be up with my lord now, for not employing me in this assignation.

[BASIL and PEDRO retire.]

Fig. No, my worthy lord and master, you have not got her yet. What, because you're a great man, you fancy yourself a great genius! But as little a man as I may, perhaps, be revenged on you. Oh! Susan, Susan!

[Hearing a noise, he wraps himself up in his roquelaure, and retires a little.]

Enter softly, the COUNTESS and SUSAN, both veiled.

Susan. [Aside to the COUNTESS.] So, so, in spite of all our secrecy, Figaro has, somehow or other, discovered our intention, and will be here. But I'll teach him how to suspect me, I warrant. Now let us begin. [Speaks louder.] If you don't want me, madam, I'll walk and enjoy the fresh air.

Fig. [Aside.] Oh! the cockatrice!

Countess. It may give thee cold.

Susan. Oh no, my lady.

Fig. [Aside.] Oh! no; she'll not take cold tonight.

[Susan retires a little.]

Enter the Page.

Page. [Seeing the COUNTESS.] Is that Agnes yonder? [He approaches her.] No. Surely, it's Susan: it must be Susan. [Comes up and takes hold of the COUNTESS's hand.] Ah! my dear Susan.

Countess. Let me go. [In a feigned voice.]

Page. Come, Susan, Susan, don't be so coy.—I know it isn't Figaro you're waiting for, it is my lord the Count. What, didn't I hear this morning when I was behind the great chair?

Susan. [Aside.] The babbling little villain!

Enter Count ALMAVIVA.

Count A. Is not that somebody with Susan? Advances close up to them, and draws back in a fury.] 'Tis that infernal Page again.

[Susan keeps out of the way, silently laughing.]

Page. 'Tis in vain to say no.—Since thou art going to be the representative of the Countess, I am determined to give thee one kiss for thyself, and a hundred for thy beautiful lady. [The COUNTESS draws back to avoid being kissed by the Page; the COUNT advances into her place; the Page, taking the COUNT's hand, perceives he is discovered, and suddenly retreats, crying in an under voice.] Oh! the devil! The Count again!

Count A. [Thinking he speaks to the Page.] Since you are so fond of kissing, take that.

[Strikes FIGARO.]

Fig. I've paid for listening.

[SUSAN laughs.]

Count A. [Hears her laugh.] What, do such salutations make the impudent rascal laugh?

Fig. [Aside.] It would be strange, if he should cry this time.

[COUNT and COUNTESS approach each other.]

Count A. But let us not lose the precious moments, my charming Susan! Let these kisses speak my passion!

[Kisses the COUNTESS.]

Fig. [Aside.] Oh, oh, oh!

Count A. Why dost thou tremble?

Countess. [Continuing her feigned voice.] Because I am afraid—

Count A. Thou seemest to have a cold. [Takes the Countess's hand between his own, and kisses it.] What a sweet, delicate, angel's hand! How smooth and soft! How long and small the fingers! What pleasure in the touch! Ah! how different is this from the Countess's hand.

Countess. [Sighing.] And yet you loved her once.

Count A. Yes, yes,—I did so; but three years of better acquaintance, have made the marriage state so respectable—Besides, wives think to ensure our fidelity by being always wives: whereas they should sometimes become—

Countess. What?

Count A. Our mistresses. I hope, thou'lt not forget this lesson.

Countess. Oh! no, indeed; not I.

Susan. [Aloud.] Nor I.

Fig. [Aloud.] Nor I.

Count A. Are there echoes here?

Countess. Oh! yes.

Count A. And now, my sweet Susan, receive the portion I promised thee. [Gives her a purse, and puts a ring upon her finger.] And continue likewise to wear this ring for my sake.

Countess. Susan accepts your favours.

Fig. [Aside.] Was there ever so faithless a hussy!

Susan. [Aside.] These riches are all for us!

Countess. I perceive torches.

Count A. They are preparatory to thy nuptials. [The Countess pretends to be afraid.] Come, come, let us retire for a moment into the pavilion.

Countess. What! in the dark?

Count A. Why not? There are no spirits.

Fig. [Aside.] Yes, but there are; and evil ones too. [Countess follows the Count.] She is going! Hem! [In a great passion.]

Count A. Who goes there?

Fig. A man.

Count A. [Aside to the Countess.] It's Figaro.

[Exit the Countess, and the Count retires.]

Fig. [Desperate.] They're gone in. [Walks.] Let her go, let her go!

Susan. [Aside.] Thou shalt pay presently for these fine suspicions. [Susan advances and mimics the voice of the Countess.] Who is that?

Fig. [Aside.] 'Tis the Countess. What lucky chance conducted you hither, madam? You know not what scenes are this moment transacting.

Susan. Oh! yes, but I do, Figaro.

Fig. What, that the Count and my virtuous bride are this moment in yonder pavilion, madam?

Susan. [Aside.] Very well, my gentleman! I know more than thou dost.

Fig. And will you not be revenged?

Susan. Oh! yes; we always have our revenge in our own power.

Fig. [Aside.] What does she mean? Perhaps, what I suspect. That would be a glorious retaliation! [To Susan.] There is no means but one, madam, of revenging such wrongs; and that now presents itself.

Susan. [Aside.] What does the good-for-nothing fellow mean? Does it, Figaro?

Fig. Pardon my presumption, madam; on any other occasion, the respect I bear your ladyship would keep me silent; but on the present, I dare encounter all. [Falls on his knees.] Oh! excuse, forgive me, madam. Let not the precious moments slip! Grant me your hand.

Susan. [Gives him a slap on the face.] Take it.

Fig. I have it, I think. The devil! This is the day of stripes.

Susan. Susan gives it thee! [As soon as Figaro hears it is Susan, he laughs very heartily all the while she beats him.] And that, and that, and that for thy insolence; and that for thy jealousy, and that for thy infidelity.

Fig. Oh! happy Figaro. Take thy revenge, my dear, kind, good angel; never did man or martyr suffer with such ecstasy.

Susan. Don't tell me of your ecstasy! How durst you, you good-for-nothing, base, false-hearted man, make love to me, supposing me the Countess? But I'll be revenged.

Fig. Talk not of revenge, my love; but tell me what blest angel sent thee hither; and how—

Susan. Know, to thy confusion, that I and my lady, coming here to catch one fox, have entrapped two.

Fig. But who has entrapped the other poor fox?

Susan. Why, his own wife.

Fig. His wife! Go, hang thyself, Figaro, for wanting the wit to divine this plot! And has all this intriguing been only about his own wife, after all?

Count A. [Advances.] Susan! Susan!

Fig. [Aside to Susan.] There's my lord. A thought strikes me. Pr'ythee second me, Susan. [Speaks in a feigned voice, and kisses Susan's hand.] Ah, madam, let us not longer converse of love, but enjoy its treasures.

Count A. What's here? A man on his knees to the Countess! [Feels for his sword. Figaro and Susan still laughing.] And I unarmed!

Fig. Quickly, then, madam, let us repair the wrong which love this morning suffered by the impertinent intrusion of your lord.

Count A. This is not to be borne. [Darts between them, seizes Figaro by the collar, while Susan escapes.] Villain!

Fig. [Pretends amazement.] My lord!

Count A. How, rascal! And, is it you? Holloa! Holloa! Who hears me? Where are my people? Lights, lights!

Enter Servants with flambeaux. PEDRO and BASIL advance.

Count A. [To the Servants.] Guard all the passages, and seize this fellow.

Fig. You command with absolute authority over all present, my lord, except yourself.

Count A. Now, sir, be pleased to declare before this company, who the—the woman is, that just now ran into that pavilion.

Fig. Into that? [Going towards the pavilion on the right.]

Count A. [Stopping him.] No, prevaricating fiend! into that! [Pointing to the other.]

Fig. Ah! that alters the case.

Count A. Answer, or—

Fig. The lady,—is a young lady, to whom my lord once paid his addresses; but who, happening to love me better than my betters, has this day given me the preference.

Count A. The preference? the preference? 'Tis too true. Yes, gentlemen, what he confesses, I give you my honour. I just now heard from the very mouth of his accomplice.

Basil. His accomplice!

Count A. Come forth, madam! [Enters the pavilion on the left.] Come forth, I say, shew yourself. [Drags out the Page, still speaking, and not looking at him till he brings him to the rest of the company.]

All. The Page!

Count A. Again, and again, and everlastingly, this d—d diabolical Page! You shall find, however, he was not alone.

Page. Ah! no. My lot would have been hard indeed, then!

Count A. Enter, Pedro, and drag the guilty wretch before her judge.

Ped. Come, madam, you must come out; I must not let you go, since my lord knows you are here. [Pedro goes into the pavilion on the left, and brings out AGNES.]

All. Agnes! Ha, ha, ha!

Count A. I'll find her, I warrant. Where is this daughter of infamy, who thus evades my just fury?

Enter SUSAN, with her fan before her face, from the pavilion on the left.

Here she comes, at last; proving her own shame, and my dishonour. [Susan kneels to him, still hiding her face.]

All. Pardon, pardon, gracious lord!

Count A. No, no, no! [They all kneel.] No, no! Were the whole world to kneel, I would be deaf.

Enter the COUNTESS, from the pavilion on the right, and kneels to the Count, whose back is turned to her.

Countess. Let me, my lord, make one of the number. [Susan drops her fan; the Count hears the voice of the Countess, looks round, and suddenly conceives the whole trick they have been playing him.]

Count A. And—is it you, madam?

Countess. [Inclines herself, in token of affirmation.]

Count A. [Returning her bow with great confusion.]

Ah! Yes, yes! A generous pardon, though unmerited.

Countess. Were you in my place, you would exclaim, No, no, no! but I grant it, without a single stipulation.

Susan. And I.

Fig. And I. There are echoes here.

Count A. I perceive, I perceive—I have been rightly served.

Countess. Here, Susan, here is the purse and ring which my lord gave thee. He will remember thy sweet delicate fingers, so long and so small.

Susan. Thank your lordship. Here, Figaro, [Gives him the purse.]

Fig. It was devilish hard to get at.

Count A. Pray, how did your valour like the box on the ear I gave you just now?
Page. [With his hand on his sword.] Me, my colonel?
Fig. Which I kindly received.
Count A. Thou?

Fig. I: and thus do the great distribute justice.
Susan. Our errors past, and all our follies done,
Oh! that 'twere possible you might be won
 To pardon faults, and misdemeanors smother,
 With the same ease we pardon one another. [Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Street.

Enter Captain LOVEIT and PUFF.

Capt. L. This is the place we were directed to; and now, Puff, if I can get no intelligence of her, what will become of me?

Puff. And me, too, sir. You must consider I am a married man, and can't bear fatigue as I have done. But, pray, sir, why did you leave the army so abruptly, and not give me time to fill my knapsack with common necessities? Half a dozen shirts and your regimentals are my whole cargo.

Capt. L. I was wild to get away; and, as soon as I obtained my leave of absence, I thought every moment an age till I returned to the place where I first saw this young, charming, innocent, bewitching creature.

Puff. With fifteen thousand pounds for her fortune. Strong motives, I must confess. And now, sir, as you are pleased to say you must depend upon my care and abilities in this affair, I think I have a just right to be acquainted with the particulars of your passion, that I may be the better enabled to serve you.

Capt. L. You shall have them. When I first left the university, which is now seven months since, my father, who loves his money better than his son, and would not settle a farthing upon me—

Puff. Mine did so by me, sir.

Capt. L. Purchased me a pair of colours, at my own request; but before I joined the regiment, which was going abroad, I took a ramble into the country with a fellow collegian, to see a relation of his who lived in Berkshire.

Puff. A party of pleasure, I suppose.

Capt. L. During a short stay there, I became acquainted with this young creature; she was just come from the boarding-school, and though she had all the simplicity of her age and the country, yet it was mixed with such sensible vivacity, that I took fire at once.

Puff. I was tinder myself at your age. But, pray, sir, did you take fire before you knew of her fortune?

Capt. L. Before, upon my honour.

Puff. Folly and constitution! But, on, sir.

Capt. L. I was introduced to the family by the name of Rhodophil; (for so my companion and I had settled it;) at the end of three weeks, I was obliged to attend the call of honour in Flanders.

Puff. Your parting, to be sure, was heart-breaking.

Capt. L. I feel it at this instant. We vowed eternal constancy, and I promised to take the first opportunity of returning to her: I did so; but we found the house was shut up; and all the information, you know, that we could get from the neighbouring cottage was, that miss and her aunt were removed to town, and lived somewhere near this part of it.

Puff. And now we are got to the place of action, propose your plan of operation.

Capt. L. My father lives but in the next street; so I must decamp immediately for fear of discoveries; you are not known to be my servant, so make what inquiries you can in the neighbourhood, and I shall wait at the inn for your intelligence.

Puff. I'll patrol hereabouts, and examine all that pass; but I've forgot the word, sir: Miss Biddy—

Capt. L. Bellair.

Puff. A young lady of wit, beauty, and fifteen thousand pounds fortune. But, sir—

Capt. L. What do you say, Puff?

Puff. If your honour pleases to consider that I had a wife in town, whom I left somewhat abruptly half a year ago, you'll think it, I believe, but decent to make some inquiry after her first: to be sure, it would be some small consolation to me to know whether the poor woman is living, or has made away with herself, or—

Capt. L. Pr'ythee, don't distract me: a moment's delay is of the utmost consequence; I must insist upon an immediate compliance with my commands.

[Exit.]

Puff. The devil's in these fiery young fellows; they think of nobody's wants but their own. He does not consider that I am flesh and blood as well as himself. However, I may kill two birds at once; for I sha'n't be surprised if I meet my lady walking the streets. But who have we here? Sure, I should know that face.

Enter JASPER from a house.

Who's that? my old acquaintance, Jasper?

Jas. What, Puff! are you here?

Puff. My dear friend! Well, and now, Jasper, still easy and happy! Toujours le mème! What intrigues now? What girls have you ruined, and what cuckolds made, since you and I beat up together, eh?

Jas. Faith, business hath been very brisk during the war; men are scarce, you know; not that I can say I ever wanted amusement in the worst of times. But, harkye, Puff—

Puff. Not a word aloud, I am incognito.

Jas. Why, faith, I should not have known you, if you had not spoke first; you seem to be a little en dishabille, too, as well as incognito. Whom do you honour with your service now? Are you from the wars?

Puff. Piping hot, I assure you; fire and smoke will tarnish; a man that will go into such service as I have been in, will find his clothes the worse for wear, take my word for it: but how is it with you, friend Jasper? What, you still serve, I see. You live at that house, I suppose?

Jas. I don't absolutely live, but I am most of my time there; I have, within these two months, entered into the service of an old gentleman, who hired a reputable servant, and dressed him as you see, because he has taken it into his head to fall in love.

Puff. False appetite and second childhood! But, pr'ythee, what's the object of his passion?

Jas. No less than a virgin of sixteen, I assure you.

Puff. Oh, the toothless old dotard!

Jas. And he mumbles and plays with her till his mouth waters; and then he chuckles till he cries, and calls it his Bid and his Biddy, and is so foolishly fond—

Puff. Bidsy! what's that?

Jas. Her name is Biddy.

Puff. Biddy! What, Miss Biddy Bellair?

Jas. The same.

Puff. I have no luck, to be sure. [Aside.] Oh! I have heard of her; she's of a pretty good family, and has some fortune, I know. But are things settled? Is the marriage fixed?

Jas. Not absolutely; the girl, I believe, detests him; but her aunt, a very good, prudent old lady, has given her consent, if he can gain her niece's; how it will end I can't tell—but I am hot upon't myself.

Puff. The devil! not marriage, I hope.

Jas. That is not yet determined.

Puff. Who is the lady, pray?

Jas. A maid in the same family, a woman of honour, I assure you: she has one husband already, a scoundrel sort of a fellow that has run away from her, and listed for a soldier; so, towards the end of the campaign, she hopes to have a certificate he's knocked o' the head; if not, I suppose we shall settle matters another way.

Puff. Well, speed the plough. But, harkye! consummate without the certificate, if you can; keep your neck out of the collar, do: I have wore it these two years, and d—y galled I am.

Jas. I'll take your advice; but I must run away to my master, who will be impatient for an answer to his message which I have just delivered to the young lady; so, dear Mr. Puff, I am your most obedient humble servant.

Puff. And I must to our agent's for my arrears. If you have an hour to spare, you'll hear of me at George's, or the Tilt-yard. Au revoir, as we say abroad. [Exit JASPER.] Thus we are as civil and as false as our betters; Jasper and I were always the beau monde exactly; we ever hated one another heartily, yet always shake hands. But now to my master, with a head full of news and a heart full of joy.

[Going, starts.]

"Angels and ministers of grace defend me!" It can't be. By heavens! it is, that fretful porcupine, my wife. I can't stand it: what shall I do? I'll try to avoid her

Enter TAG.

Tag. It must be he. I'll swear to the rogue at a mile's distance; he either has not seen me, or won't know me: if I can keep my temper I'll try him further. Pray, good sir, if I may be so bold—

Puff. I have nothing for you, good woman; don't trouble me.

Tag. If your honour pleases to look this way—

Puff. The kingdom is over-run with beggars; I suppose the last I gave to has sent this; but I have no more loose silver about me; so, pr'ythee, woman, don't disturb me.

Tag. I can hold out no longer! oh! you villain, you! Where have you been, scoundrel? Do you know me now, varlet?

[Seizes him.]

Puff. Here, watch, watch! Zounds! I shall have my pocket picked.

Tag. Own me this minute, hang-dog! and confess everything; or by the rage of an injured woman, I'll raise up the neighbourhood, throttle you, and send you to Newgate.

Puff. Amazement! what, my own dear Tag? Come to my arms, and let me press you to my heart, that pants for thee, and only thee, my true and lawful wife. Now my stars have overpaid me for the fatigue and danger of the field; I have wandered about like Achilles in search of faithful Penelope, and the gods have brought me to this happy spot.

[Embraces her.]

Tag. The fellow's cracked, for certain. Leave your bombastic stuff, and tell me, rascal, why you left me, and where you have been these six months, eh?

Puff. We'll reserve my adventures for our happy winter's evenings. I shall only tell you now, that my heart beat so strong in my country's cause, and being instigated by either honour or the devil, (I can't tell which,) I set out for Flanders, to gather laurels, and lay them at thy feet.

Tag. You left me to starve, villain, and beg my bread, you did so.

Puff. I left you too hastily, I must confess, and often has my conscience stung me for it. I am got into an officer's service, have been in several actions, gained some credit by my behaviour, and am now returned with my master to indulge the genteeler passions.

Tag. Don't think to fob me off with this nonsensical talk; what have you brought me home besides?

Puff. Honour, and immoderate love.

Tag. I could tear your eyes out.

Puff. Temperance, or I walk off.

Tag. Temperance, traitor, temperance! What can you say for yourself? Leave me to the wide world—

Puff. Well, I have been in the wide world too, ha'n't I? What would the woman have?

Tag. Reduce me to the necessity of going to service. [Cries.]

Puff. Why, I'm in service, too, your lord and master, a'n't I, you saucy jade, you? Come, where dost live, hereabouts? Hast got good vails? Dost go to market? Come, give me a kiss, darling, and tell me where I shall pay my duty to thee.

Tag. Why, there I live, at that house.

[Pointing to the house JASPER came out of.]

Puff. What, there? that house?

Tag. Yes, there, that house.

Puff. Huzza! We're made for ever, you slut, you. Huzza! Everything conspires this day to make me happy. Prepare for an inundation of joy. My master is in love with your Miss Biddy over head and ears, and she with him: I know she is courted by some old fool, and her aunt is not against the match; but now we are come, the town will be relieved, and the governor brought over: in plain English, our fortune is made; my master must marry the lady, and the old gentleman may go to the devil.

Tag. Heyday! What's all this?

Puff. Say no more, the dice are thrown, doublets for us; away to your young mistress, while I run to my master; tell her Rhodophil—Rhodophil will be with her immediately; then, if her blood does not mount to her face like quicksilver in a weather-glass, and point to extreme hot, believe the whole to be a lie, and your husband no politician.

Tag. This is news, indeed! I have had the place but a little while, and have not quite got into the secrets of the family; but part of your story is true, and if you bring your master, and miss is willing, I warrant we'll be too hard for the old folks.

Puff. I'll about it straight—But, hold, Tag, I had forgot; pray, how does Mr. Jasper do?

Tag. Mr. Jasper! what do you mean? I—I—I—

Puff. What, out of countenance, child? Oh, fie! Speak plain, my dear; and the certificate, when comes that, eh, love?

Tag. He has sold himself and turned conjurer, or he would never have known it. [Aside.]

Puff. Are not you a jade? Are not you a Jezebel? Ar'n't you a—

Tag. O, ho! temperance, or I walk off.

Puff. I know I am not finished yet, and so I am easy; but more thanks to my fortune than your virtue, madam

Tag. Away to your master, and I'll prepare his reception within.

Puff. Shall I bring the certificate with me? [Exit.]

Tag. Go, you graceless rogue, you richly deserve it. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Chamber.

Enter BIDDY.

Bid. How unfortunate a poor girl am I! I dare not tell my secret to anybody, and if I don't I'm undone. Heigho! [Sighs.]

Enter TAG.

Pray, Tag, is my aunt gone to her lawyer about me? Heigho!

Tag. What's that sigh for, my dear young mistress?

Bid. I did not sigh, not I. [Sighs.]

Tag. Nay, never gulp them down, they are the worst things you can swallow. There's something in that heart of your's, that swells it, and puffs it, and will burst it at last, if you don't give it vent.

Bid. What would you have me tell you? [Sighs.]

Tag. Come, come, you are afraid I'll betray you; but you had as good speak, I may do you some service you little think of.

Bid. It is not in your power, Tag, to give me what I want. [Sighs.]

Tag. Not directly, perhaps; but I may be the means of helping you to it; as for example, if you should not like to marry the old man your aunt designs for you, one may find a way to break—

Bid. His neck, Tag?

Tag. Or the match; either will do, child.

Bid. I don't care which, indeed, so I were clear of him. I don't think I'm fit to be married.

Tag. To him, you mean: you have no objection to marriage, but the man; and I applaud you for it. But, come, courage, miss; never keep it in: out with it all.

Bid. If you'll ask me any questions I'll answer them; but I can't tell you anything of myself—I shall blush if I do.

Tag. Well, then: in the first place, pray, tell me, Miss Biddy Bellair, if you don't like somebody better than old Sir Simon Loveit?

Bid. Heigho!

Tag. What's heigho, miss?

Bid. When I say heigho! it means yes.

Tag. Very well; and this somebody is a young, handsome fellow?

Bid. Heigho!

Tag. And if you were once his, you would be as merry as the best of us?

Bid. Heigho!

Tag. So far so good; and since I have got you to wet your feet, souse over head at once, and the pain will be ever.

Bid. There then. [A long sigh.] Now help me out, Tag, as fast as you can.

Tag. When did you hear from your gallant?

Bid. Never since he went to the army.

Tag. How so?

Bid. I was afraid the letters would fall into my aunt's hands, so I would not let him write to me; but I had a better reason then.

Tag. Pray, let's hear that, too.

Bid. Why, I thought if I should write to him, and promise him to love nobody else, and should afterwards change my mind, he might think I was inconstant, and call me a coquette.

Tag. What a simple innocent it is! [Aside.] And have you changed your mind, miss?

Bid. No, indeed, Tag; I love him the best of any of them.

Tag. Of any of them! Why, have you any more?

Bid. Pray, don't ask me.

Tag. Nay, miss, if you only trust me by halves, you can't expect—

Bid. I will trust you with everything. When I parted with him I grew melancholy; so, in order to divert me, I have let two others court me till he returns again.

Tag. Is that all, my dear? Mighty simple, indeed!

[Aside.]

Bid. One of them is a fine blustering man, and is called Captain Flash; he's always talking of fighting and wars; he thinks he's sure of me, but I shall baulk him; we shall see him this afternoon; for he pressed strongly to come, and I have given him leave, while my aunt is taking her afternoon's nap.

Tag. And who is the other, pray?

Bid. Quite another sort of a man; he speaks like a lady for all the world, and never swears, as Mr. Flash does, but wears nice white gloves, and tells me what ribands become my complexion, where to stick my patches, who is the best milliner, where they sell the best tea, and which is the best wash for the face and the best paste for the hands; he is always playing with my fan, and shewing his teeth; and whenever I speak, he pats me, so—and cries, "The devil take me, Miss Biddy, but you'll be my perdition." Ha, ha, ha!

Tag. Oh, the pretty creature! and what do you call him, pray?

Bid. His name is Fribble, and you shall see him too; for, by mistake, I appointed them at the same time; but you must help me out with them.

Tag. And suppose your favourite should come too?

Bid. I should not care what became of the others.

Tag. What's his name?

Bid. It begins with an R—h—o—

Tag. I'll be hang'd if it is not Rhodophil.

Bid. I am frightened at you. You are a witch!

Tag. I am so, and I can tell your fortune, too. Look me in the face. The gentleman you love most in the world will be at our house this afternoon; he arrived from the army this morning, and dies till he sees you.

Bid. Is he come, Tag? Don't joke with me.

Tag. Not to keep you longer in suspense, you must know, the servant of your Strephon, by some unaccountable fate or other, is my lord and master; he has just been with me, and told me of his master's arrival and impatience—

Bid. Oh! my dear, dear Tag, you have put me out of my wits; I am all over in a flutter. I shall leap out of my skin—I don't know what to do with myself. Is he come, Tag? I am ready to faint. I'd give the world I had put on another dress to-day.

Tag. I assure you, miss, you look charmingly.

Bid. Do I, indeed, though? I'll alter my hair immediately.

Tag. We'll go to dinner first, and then I'll assist you.

Bid. Dinner! I can't eat a morsel. I don't know what's the matter with me; my ears tingle, my heart beats, my face flushes, and I tremble every joint of me. I must run in and look at myself in the glass this moment. [Erit.]

Tag. Yes, she has it, and deeply, too; this is no hypocrisy.

*Not art but nature now performs her part,
And every word's the language of the heart.* [Erit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Chamber..

Enter CAPTAIN LOVEIT, BIDDY, TAG, and PUFF.

Capt. L. To find you still constant, and to arrive at such a critical juncture, is the height of fortune and happiness.

Bid. Nothing shall force me from you; and if I am secure of your affections—

Puff. I'll be bound for him, madam, and give you any security you can ask.

Tag. Everything goes on to our wish, sir; I just now had a second conference with my old lady, and she was so convinced by my arguments, that she returned instantly to the lawyer to forbid the drawing out of any writings at all; and she is determined never to thwart miss's inclinations, and left it to us to give the old gentleman his discharge at the next visit.

Capt. L. Shall I undertake the old dragon?

Tag. If we have occasion for help, we shall call for you.

Bid. I expect him every moment; therefore, I'll tell you what, Rhodophil, you and your man shall be locked up in my bed-chamber till we have settled matters with the old gentleman.

Capt. L. Do what you please with me.

Bid. You must not be impatient, though.

Capt. L. I can undergo anything with such a reward in view; one kiss, and I'll be quite resigned. And now, shew me the way. [Erit with Biddy.]

Tag. Come, sirrah, when I have got you under lock and key I shall bring you to reason.

Puff. Are your wedding clothes ready, my dove? The certificate's come.

Tag. Go follow your captain, sirrah: march. You may thank heaven I had patience to stay so long.

[Erit with Puff.]

Re-enter BIDDY.

Bid. I was very much alarmed for fear my two gallants should come in upon us unawares; we should have had sad work if they had; I find I love Rhodophil vastly; for though my other sparks flatter me more, I can't abide the thoughts of them now. I have business upon my hands enough to turn my little head; but, egad! my heart's good, and a fig for dangers! Let me see:—what shall I do with my two gallants? I must, at least, part with them decently. Suppose I set them together by the ears? The luckiest thought in the world! For if they won't quarrel, (as I believe they won't,) I can break with them for cowards, and very justly dismiss them my service; and if they will fight, and one of them should be killed, the other will certainly be hanged or run away; and so I shall very handsomely get rid of them both.

Re-enter TAG.

Well, Tag, are they safe?

Tag. I think so; the door's double-locked, and I have the key in my pocket.

Bid. That's pure; but have you given them anything to divert them?

Tag. I have given the Captain one of your old gloves to mumble: but my Strephon is diverting himself with the more substantial comforts of a cold venison pasty.

Bid. What shall we do with the next that comes?

Tag. If Mr. Fribble comes first, I'll clap him up into my lady's store room; I suppose he is a great maker of marmalade himself, and will have an opportunity of making some critical remarks upon our pastry and sweetmeats.

Bid. When one of 'em comes, do you go and watch for the other; and as soon as you see him, run in to us and pretend it is my aunt, and so we shall have an excuse to lock him up till we want him.

Tag. You may depend upon me. Here is one of 'em.

Enter FRIBBLE.

Bid. Mr. Fribble, your servant.

Frib. Miss Biddy, your slave. I hope I have not come upon you abruptly; I should have waited upon you sooner, but an accident happened that discomposed me so, that I was obliged to go home again to take drops.

Bid. Indeed you don't look well, sir. Go, Tag, and do as I bid you.

Tag. I will, madam.

[Exit.]

Bid. I have set my maid to watch my aunt, that we mayn't be surprised by her.

Frib. Your prudence is equal to your beauty, miss; and I hope your permitting me to kiss your hands will be no impeachment to your understanding.

Bid. I hate the sight of him. [Aside.] I was afraid I should not have had the pleasure of seeing you; pray let me know what accident you met with, and what's the matter with your hand? I sha'n't be easy till I know.

Frib. Well, I vow, Miss Biddy, you're a good creeter: I'll endeavour to muster up what little spirits I have, and tell you the whole affair. Hem! But, first, you must give me leave to make you a present of a small pot of my lip-salve; my servant made it this morning; the ingredients are innocent, I assure you; nothing but the best virgin-wax, conserve of roses, and lily of the valley water.

Bid. I thank you, sir, but my lips are generally red, and when they a'n't, I bite 'em.

Frib. I bite my own sometimes, to pout 'em a little; but this will give them a softness, colour, and an agreeable moister. Thus let me make an humble offering at that shrine where I have already sacrificed my heart.

[Kneels, and gives the lip-salve.]

Bid. Upon my word, that's very prettily expressed; you are positively the best company in the world. I wish he were out of the house. [Aside.]

Frib. But to return to my accident, and the reason why my hand is in this condition,—I beg you'll excuse the appearance of it, and be satisfied that nothing but mere necessity could have forced me to appear thus muffled before you.

Bid. I am very willing to excuse any misfortune that happens to you, sir.

[Curtseys.]

Frib. You are vastly good, indeed. Thus it was:—Hem! You must know, miss, there is not an animal in the creation I have so great an aversion to, as those hackney-coach fellows. As I was coming out of my lodgings, says one of 'em to me, "Would your honour have a coach?" "No, man," said I, "not now," with all the civility imaginable. "I'll carry you and your doll, too," said he, "Miss Margery—for the same price." Upon which, the masculine boasts about us fell a laughing; then I turned round in a great passion, "Curse me," says I, "fellow, but I'll trounce thee." And as I was holding out my hand in a threatening poster, thus, he makes a cut at me with his whip, and striking me over the nail of my little finger, it gave me such exquisite torter that I fainted away; and while I was in this condition, the mob picked my pocket of my purse, my Mecca smelling-bottle, and my huswife.

Bid. I shall laugh in his face. [Aside.] I am afraid you are in great pain; pray sit down, Mr. Fribble; but I hope your hand is in no danger? [They sit.]

Frib. Not in the least, ma'am; pray don't be apprehensive; a milk poultice, and a gentle sudorific to-night, with a little manna in the morning, I am confident will relieve me entirely.

Bid. But pray, Mr. Fribble, do you make use of a huswife?

Frib. I cau't do without it, ma'am: there is a club of us, all young bachelors, the sweetest society in the world; and we meet three times a-week at each others lodgings, where we drink tea, hear the chat of the day, invent fashions for the ladies, make models of 'em, and cut out patterns in paper. We were the first inventors of knotting, and this fringe is the original produce and joint labour of our little community.

Bid. And who are your pretty set, pray?

Frib. There's Phil Whiffle, Jacky Wagtail, my Lord Trip, Billy Dimple, Sir Dilberry Diddle, and your humble:—

Bid. What a sweet collection of happy creatures!

Frib. Indeed, and so we are miss; but a prodigious fracas disconcerted us some time ago, at Billy Dimple's—three drunken naughty women of the town burst into our club-room, curst us all, threw down the china, broke six looking-glasses, scalded us with the slop-basin, and scratched poor Phil Whiffle's cheek in such a manner, that he has kept his bed his bed these three weeks.

Bid. Indeed, Mr. Fribble, I think all our sex have great reason to be angry; for if you are so happy now you are bachelors, the ladies may wish and sigh to very little purpose.

Frib. You are mistaken, I assure you; I am prodigiously rallied about my passion for you, I can tell you that, and am looked upon as lost to our society already. He, he, he!

Bid. Pray, Mr. Fribble, now you have gone so far, don't think me impudent if I long to know how you intend to use the lady who has been honoured with your affections?

Frib. Not as most other wives are used, I assure you; all the domestic business will be taken off her hands; I shall make the tea, comb the dogs, and dress the children myself; so that, though I'm a commoner, Mrs. Fribble will lead the life of a woman of quality; for she will have nothing to do, but lie in bed, play at cards, and scold the servants.

Bid. What a happy creature she must be!

Frib. Do you really think so? Then pray let me have a little serious talk with you: though my passion is not of a long standing, I hope the sincerity of my intentions—

Bid. Ha, ha, ha!

Frib. Go, you wild thing. [Pats her.] The devil take me, but there is no talking to you. How can you use me in this barbarous manner? if I had the constitution of an alderman it would sink under my sufferings. Hooman nater can't support it.

Bid. Why, what would you do with me, Mr. Fribble?

Frib. Well, I vow I'll beat you if you talk so. Don't look at me in that manner—flesh and blood can't bear it. I could—but I won't grow indecent.

Bid. But, pray, sir, where are the verses you were to write upon me? I find, if a young lady depends too much upon such fine gentlemen as you, she'll certainly be disappointed.

Frib. I vow, the flutter I was put into this after noon has quite turned my senses; here they are, though, and I believe you'll like 'em.

Bid. There can be no doubt of it. [Curtisies.]

Frib. I protest, miss, I don't like that curtsy. Look at me, and always rise in this manner. [Rises.] But, my dear creature, who put on your cap to-day? They have made a fright of you, and it is as yellow as old Lady Crowfoot's neck. When we are settled, I'll dress your head myself.

Bid. Pray read the verses to me, Mr. Fribble.

Frib. I obey.—Hem! William Fribble, Esq. to Miss Biddy Bellair. Greeting:

*No ice so hard, so cold as I,
'Till warm'd and soften'd by your eye;
And now my heart dissolves away
In dreams by night, in sighs by day;
No brutal passion fires my breast,
Which loaths the object when possess'd;
But one of harmless, gentle kind,
Whose joys are center'd—in the mind;
Then take with me love's better part,
His downy wing, but not his dart.*

How do you like 'em?

Bid. Ha, ha, ha! I swear they are very pretty; but I don't quite understand 'em.

Frib. These light pieces are never so well understood in reading, as in singing; I have set 'em myself, and will endeavour to give 'em you. La, la! I have an abominable cold, and can't sing a note; however, the tune's nothing; the manner's all. [Sings.]

No ice so hard, &c.

Enter TAG, running.

Tag. Your aunt, your aunt, your aunt, madam!

Frib. What's the matter?

Bid. Hide, hide Mr. Fribble, Tag, or we are ruined.

Frib. Oh! for heaven's sake, put me anywhere, so I don't dirty my clothes.

Bid. Put him into the store-room, Tag, this moment.

Frib. Is it a damp place, Mrs. Tag? The floor is boarded, I hope?

Tag. Indeed it is not, sir.

Frib. What shall I do? I shall certainly catch my death! Where's my cambric handkerchief, and my salts? I shall certainly have my hysterics.

[Runs in.]

Bid. In, in, in. So now let the other come as soon as he will; I did not care if I had twenty of 'em, so they would but come one after another.

Re-enter TAG.

Was my aunt coming?

Tag. No, 'twas Mr. Flash, I suppose, by the length of his stride, and the cock of his hat. He'll be here this minute. What we shall do with him?

Bid. I'll manage him, I warrant you, and try his courage: be sure you are ready to second me; we shall have pure sport.

Tag. Hush! here he comes.

Enter FLASH, singing.

Flash. Well, my blossom, here am I! What hopes for a poor dog, eh? How! the maid here! then I've lost the town, d—e! Not a shilling to bribe the governor; she'll spring a mine, and I shall be blown to the devil.

Bid. Don't be ashamed, Mr. Flash; I have told Tag the whole affair, and she's my friend, I can assure you.

Flash. Is she? then she won't be mine, I am certain. [Aside.] Well, Mrs. Tag, you know, I suppose, what's to be done: this young lady and I have contracted ourselves; and so, if you please to stand bridemaid, why we'll fix the wedding-day directly.

Tag. The wedding-day, sir?

Flash. The wedding-day, sir! Ay, sir, the wedding-day, sir; what have you to say to that, sir?

Bid. My dear Captain Flash, don't make such a noise; you'll wake my aunt.

Flash. And suppose I did, child, what then?

Bid. She'd be frightened out of her wits.

Flash. At me, miss! frightened at me? Tout au contraire, I assure you; you mistake the thing, child; I have some reason to believe I am not quite so shocking. [Affectedly.]

Tag. Indeed, sir, you flatter yourself; but pray, sir, what are your pretensions?

Flash. The lady's promises, my own passion, and the best-mounted blade in the three kingdoms. If any man can produce a better title, let him take her; if not, the devil mince me, if I give up an atom of her.

Bid. He's in a fine passion, if he would but hold it. [Aside.]

Tag. Pray, sir, hear reason a little.

Flash. I never do, madam; it is not my method of proceeding; here is my logic. [Draws his sword.] Sa, sa—my best argument is carte over arm, madam, ha, ha! [Lunges.] and if he answers that, madam, through my small guts, my breath, blood, and mistress, are all at his service. Nothing more, madam.

Bid. This 'll do, this 'll do.

Tag. But, sir, sir, sir!

Flash. But, madam, madam, madam! I profess blood, madam! I was bred up to it from a child; I study the book of fate, and the camp is my university. I have attended the lectures of prince Charles upon the Rhine, and Bathiani upon the Po, and have extracted knowledge from the mouth of a cannon: I'm not to be frightened with squibs, madam, no, no.

Bid. Pray, dear sir, don't mind her; but let me prevail with you to go away this time. Your passion is very fine, to be sure; and when my aunt and Tag are out of the way, I'll let you know when I'd have you come again.

Flash. When you'd have me come again, child? And suppose I never would come again, what do you think of that now, eh? You pretend to be afraid of your aunt; your aunt knows what's what too well to refuse a good match when 'tis offered. Lookye miss, I am a man of honour; glory is my aim; I have told you the road I am in; and do you see here, child? [Shewing his sword.] No tricks upon travellers.

Bid. But pray, sir, hear me.

Flash. No, no, no; I know the world, madam; I am as well known at Covent-garden as the dial, madam; I'll break a lamp, bully a constable, bam a justice, or bilk a box-keeper, with any man in the liberties of Westminster. What do you think of me now, madam?

Bid. Pray don't be so furious, sir.

Flash. Come, come, come, few words are best; somebody's happier than somebody, and I am a poor, silly fellow, ha, ha! That's all. Lookye, child, to be short, (for I'm a man of reflection,) I have but a bagatelle to say to you: I am in love with you up to hell and desperation; may the sky crush me if I am not. But since there is another more fortunate than I, adieu Biddy! Prosperity to the happy rival, patience to poor Flash; but the first time we meet, gunpowder be my perdition, but I'll have the honour to cut a throat with him.

Bid. [Stopping him.] You may meet with him now, if you please.

Flash. Now may I?—Where is he?—I'll sacrifice the villain! [Aloud.]

Tag. Hush! he's but in the next room.

Flash. Is he? Ram me [low] into a mortar-piece, but I'll have vengeance; my blood boils to be at him. Don't be frightened, miss!

Bid. No, sir, I never was better pleased, I assure you.

Flash. I shall soon do his business.

Bid. As soon as you please; take your own time.

Tag. I'll fetch the gentleman to you immediately.

[Going.]

Flash. [Stopping her.] Stay, stay a little; what a passion I am in! Are you sure he is in the next room? I shall certainly tear him to pieces; I would fain murder him like a gentleman, too; besides, this family sha'n't be brought into trouble upon my account. I have it—I'll watch for him in the street, and mix his blood with the puddle of the next kennel. [Going.]

Bid. [Stopping him.] No, pray, Mr. Flash, let me see the battle; I shall be glad to see you fight for me; you sha'n't go, indeed. [Holding him.]

Tag. [Holding him.] Oh! pray let me see you fight; there were two gentlemen fought yesterday, and my mistress was never so diverted in her life. I'll fetch him out. [Exit.]

Bid. Do; stick him, stick him, Captain Flash; I shall love you the better for it.

Flash. D—n your love; I wish I were out of the house. [Aside.]

Bid. Here he is; now speak some of your hard words, and run him through—

Flash. Don't be in fits now. [Aside to Biddy.]

Bid. Never fear me.

Re-enter TAG, with FRIBBLE.

Tag. [To Fribble.] Take it on my word, sir, he is a bully, and nothing else.

Frib. [Frightened.] I know you are my good friend; but, perhaps, you don't know his disposition.

Tag. I am confident he is a coward.

Frib. Is he? Nay, then, I'm his man.

Flash. I like his looks; but I'll not venture too far at first.

Tag. Speak to him, sir.

Frib. I will. I understand, sir—hem!—that you—by Mrs. Tag, here—sir—who has informed me—hem!—that you would be glad to speak with me—D—e! [Turns off.]

Flash. I can speak to you, sir, or to anybody, sir; or I can let it alone, and hold my tongue, if I see occasion, sir—D—e! [Turns off.]

Bid. Well said, Mr. Flash, be in a passion.

Tag. [To Fribble.] Don't mind his looks; he changes colour already; to him, to him. [Pushes him.]

Frib. Don't hurry me, Mrs. Tag, for heaven's sake! I shall be out of breath before I begin, if you do.—Sir, [to Flash.] if you can't speak to a gentleman in another manner, sir, why then I'll venture to say, you had better hold your tongue. Oons!

Flash. Sir, you and I are of different opinions.

Frib. You and your opinion may go to the devil. Take that. [Turns off to Tag.]

Tag. Well said, sir, the day's your own.

Bid. What's the matter, Mr. Flash? Is all your fury gone? Do you give me up?

Frib. I have done his business. [Struts about.]

Flash. Give you up, madam! No, madam, when

I am determined in my resolutions I am always calm; 'tis our way, madam; and now I shall proceed to business. Sir, I beg to say a word to you in private.

Frib. Keep your distance, fellow, and I'll answer you. That lady has confessed a passion for me; and as she has delivered up her heart into my keeping, nothing but my heart's blood shall purchase it. D—n!

Tag. Bravo! bravo!

Flash. If those are the conditions, I'll give you earnest for it directly. [Draws.] Now, villain, renounce all right and title this minute, or the torrent of my rage will overflow my reason, and I shall annihilate the nothingness of your soul and body in an instant.

Frib. I wish there was a constable at hand to take us both up; we shall certainly do one another a prejudice.

Tag. No, you won't indeed, sir; pray bear up to him; if you would but draw your sword, and be in a passion, he would run away directly.

Frib. Will he? [Draws his sword.] Then—I can no longer contain myself.—Hell and the furies! Come on, thou savage brute!

Tag. Go on, sir. [Here they stand in fighting postures, while Biddy and Tag push them forward.]

Flash. Come on.

Bid. Go on.

Frib. Come on, rascal.

Tag. Go on, sir.

Enter Captain LOVEIT and PUFF.

Capt. L. What's the matter, my dear?

Bid. If you won't fight, here's one that will. Oh! Rhodophil, these two sparks are your rivals, and have pestered me these two months with their addresses; they forced themselves into the house, and have been quarrelling about me, and disturbing the family; if they won't fight, pray kick them out of the house.

Capt. L. What's the matter, gentlemen? [They both keep their fencing posture.]

Flash. Don't part us, sir.

Frib. No, pray, sir, don't part us; we shall do you a mischief.

Capt. L. Puff, look to the other gentleman, and call a surgeon.

Bid and Tag. Ha, ha, ha!

Puff. Bless me! how can you stand under your wounds, sir?

Frib. Am I hurt, sir?

Puff. Hurt, sir! why you have—let me see—pray stand in the light—one, two, three, through the heart; and let me see—hum!—eight through the small-guts! Come, sir, make it up the round dozen, and then we'll part you.

All. Ha, ha, ha!

Capt. L. Come here, Puff. [Whispers, and looks at Flash.]

Puff. 'Tis the very same, sir.

Capt. L. [to Flash.] Pray sir, have I not had the pleasure of seeing you abroad?

Flash. I have served abroad.

Capt. L. Had not you the misfortune, sir, to be missing at the last engagement in Flanders?

Flash. I was found among the dead in the field of battle.

Puff. He was the first that fell, sir; the wind of a cannon-ball struck him flat upon his face; he had just strength enough to creep into a ditch, and there he was found after the battle in a most deplorable condition.

Capt. L. Pray, sir, what advancement did you get by the service of that day?

Flash. My wounds rendered me unfit for service, and I sold out.

Puff. Stole out, you mean. We hunted him by scent to the water side; thence he took shipping for England; and, taking the advantage of my master's absence, has attacked the citadel which we are luckily come to relieve, and drive his honour into the ditch again.

All. Ha, ha, ha!

Frib. He, he, he!

Capt. L. And now, sir, how have you dared to shew your face in open day, or wear even the outside of a profession you have so much scandalized by your behaviour? I honour the name of a soldier, and as a party concerned, am bound not to see it disgraced. As you have forfeited your title to honour, deliver up your sword this instant.

Flash. Nay, good Captain—

Capt. L. No words, sir. [Takes his sword.]

Frib. He's a sad scoundrel; I wish I had kicked him.

Capt. L. The next thing I command, leave this house, change the colour of your clothes and fierceness of your looks; appear from top to toe the wretch, the very wretch thou art. If e'er I meet thee in the military dress again, or if you put on looks that belie the native baseness of thy heart, be it where it will, this shall be the reward of thy impudence and disobedience. [Kicks him, he runs off.]

Bid. Oh! my dear Rhodophil!

Frib. What an infamous rascal it is! I thank you, sir, for this favour; but I must after and cane him.

[Going, he is stopped by the Captain.]

Capt. L. One word with you, too, sir

Frib. With me, sir?

Capt. L. You need not tremble; I won't use you roughly.

Frib. I am certain of that, sir; but I am sadly troubled with weak nerves.

Capt. L. Thou art a species too despicable for correction; therefore, begone; and if I see you here again, your insignificance sha'n't protect you.

Frib. I am obliged to you for your kindnesses: well, if ever I have any thing to do with intrigues again!— [Exit.]

All. Ha, ha, ha!

Puff. Shall I ease you of your trophy, sir?

Capt. L. Take it, Puff, as a small recompense for thy fidelity; thou canst better use it than its owner.

Puff. I wish your honour had a patent to take such trifles from every pretty gentleman that could spare 'em; I would set up the largest cutler's shop in the kingdom.

Capt. L. Well said, Puff.

Bid. But pray, Mr. Fox, how did you get out of your hole? I thought you were locked in.

Capt. L. I shot the bolt back when I heard a noise; and, thinking you were in danger, I broke my confinement without any other consideration than your safety. [Kisses her hand.]

Bid. I'm afraid the town will be ill-natured enough to think I have been a little coquettish in my behaviour; but I hope, as I have been constant to the Captain, I shall be excused diverting myself with pretenders.

*Ladies, to fops and braggarts ne'er be kind,
No charms can warm 'em, and no virtues bind;*

Each lover's merit by his conduct prove;

Who fails in honour, will be false in love. [Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The House of Mr. Mordent.

Enter MORDENT and DONALD.

Don. Gin the black de'il glower at me, I'ze tell ye my mind! Discharge me, an ye wull: I ha' been nae mair but thirty years i' the family. I care nae for yeer cankered girns! An ye wad nae hear fashus tales, ye munna be guilty o' fou' deeds!

Mor. Will you speak in a lower key? Earth is wholly inhabited by harpies, and I am eternally haunted by the most malignant of them!

Don. An I get nae tidings of her to-day, I'ze advertize for her i' the public papers: ay, and I'ze gar yeer name be imprinted at full length.

Mor. [Terrified.] Print my name?

Don. The de'il hike me on his horns, gin I dunna!

Mor. Demon! I'll blow your brains out!

Don. Fiz, wi' your flash i' the pan! I dunna fear ye! Yeer rash and mad enoch! Sham betide ye! a father abandon his child!

Mor. Leprosy seize your licentious tongue! will you speak lower? Did I abandon her?

Don. Ye wad nae acknowledge her; wad nae see her; never frae the time that she war a wee tot at the knee. Gin ye had a hairt ye wad nae aixpose her tul—

Mor. What?

Don. Tramp the streets! Aixpald the warld of onesty by her ain father! And why, trow? she is a naitural child! To beget children, and then turn them adrift to bag, steal, or stairve, is a d—d un-naitural deed!

Mor. Prophet of evil! would you tell all the family? Expose me to my wife?

Don. I'ze aixpose ye tul the whole warld, gin I dunna find her. And what the muckle better shall I be gin I do? A thrawart poverty maun be her lot! Ye ha' diced, and drabbed, and squandered, and mortgaged, till ye wull nae ha' a bawbee tul yeersal.

Mor. Cease your croaking, raven! Do you govern this house, or I?

Don. Govern, trow! Balzebub himsal is the governor! There is yeer pet steward—an auld whilly wha! Tak warning! I ha' tould ye aforetime, and I tell ye again, he's a rascal!

Mor. Viper, 'tis false! If the earth holds an honest man, Mr. Item is he.

Don. Onest? A juggling loon o' hell! He feigns to borrow the siller for ye, wetch he lends himsel; and the walthy possessions ye lang syne held, wull, eftsoon, be aw his ain.

Mor. I say 'tis false! His truth, integrity, and zeal are unexampled.

Don. Marcy o' God! ye're bewitched!

Mor. What a den of misery is this world! Swarming with one set of fiends that raise the whirlwind of the passions, and with another that beset and tantalize the bewildered wretch for having been overtaken by the storm!

Don. Poor Joanna! winsom lassy! I'ze keep my ward!

Mor. Can nothing stop your pestiferous tongue? Have I not fifty times descended to explanation, and shewn you that I must not, cannot own her?

Don. Dare not! Ye hanna the hairt to be onest! Ye bogle at shadows!

Mor. Pertinacious devil! The public clamour and disgrace, the affected sufferings and insulting forbearance of Lady Anne, the resentment of her imperious family, are these shadows?

Enter Mrs. SARNET.

Mrs. S. What is it you are pleased to be talking, pray, about my lady, Mr. Scotch Donald?

Don. Troth, Mrs. English Sarsnet, nae ward o' ill.

Mrs. S. Ill, truly! No, sir; my lady may defy her worst enemies; though there are folks, who ought to adore the very ground she treads upon, that use her like a Turk.

Mor. How now?

Mrs. S. I name no names.

Mor. Who sent for you here, mistress?

Mrs. S. My lady sent me here, sir.

Mor. And did she bid you behave with impertinence?

Mrs. S. She, indeed! A dear suffering saint! She bid me always behave with affability and decorum; and so I would, if I could. But it would provoke an angel!

Mor. And what is it your wisdom thinks so provoking?

Mrs. S. To see a sweet lady sit for hours, and pine and grieve; and, then, when some folks are in sight, pretend to smile, and be all contentment, when all the while her poor heart is ready to break.

Mor. Then she complains to you?

Mrs. S. I said no such thing, sir! No; she complains to no christian soul! I wish some folks had a little of my spirit; other folks, mayhap, mut find the difference.

Don. Troth, an yee wad nae be speaking o' that, Mrs. Sarsnet.

Mrs. S. A poor, weak woman, who can only take her own part by crying and fainting.

Don. Yee forget, Mrs. Sarsnet, there are some poor, weak women that ha' tongues and nails.

Mrs. S. Have they, Mr. Snapshort? Why, then, if I had you for a husband, mayhap, I would let you see that I could use them.

Don. The muckle de'il may doubt yee!

Mrs. S. It's a shame, Mr. Donald, for you to be getting into corners, and whispering, and peering, and plotting to my lady's dishonour!

Don. I plotting? How dare yee, Mrs. Sarsnet—

Mrs. S. You ought to be ashamed of making yourself a spy, and a skip-jack go-between!

Don. I a skip-jack? Varra weel! Yee hear, sir, what are my thanks. 'Tis unco well! I ha' but my desarts! True enoch, I am a go-between!

Mrs. S. Yes; we know that well, Mr. Donald.

Don. But nae sic go-between as yee, Mrs. Malapert, may think me. I ha' been a trust-worthy caterer tul the family; [to MORDENT] a slave tul yeer revels, and yeer roots, and yeer banquetings. 'Tis lang syne ye made me yeer purveyor; but nae man ever yet made me his pander.

Mor. Begone! See if Mr. Item is returned.

Don. Skip-jack! Go-between! Mag's malison o' yeer spitefu' tongue-gab! [Exit.]

Mor. Did your lady, I say, instruct you to behave with this insolence?

Mrs. S. You know very well, sir, my lady is the best of wives! she sent me on a civil message, and bid me speak with propriety; and so, if speaking one's mind and telling the truth be a fault, it's all my own.

Mor. I'll put an end to this.

Mrs. S. Oh! to be sure; you may tell my lady and get me turned away, if you please. Because, I know very well, if you bid her, she will do it.

Mor. Prometheus and his vulture is no fault!

Mrs. S. But, as it is all for love of my lady, I am sure the Earl of Oldcrest, her father, will give me a situation. He knows, mayhap, more than you may think; so does the viscount, her brother, too; her aunt, Lady Mary, and her uncle, the bishop: and everybody is not obliged to be so blind and so tame as my lady.

Mor. What is it they know?

Mrs. S. That's more than I can say; but they have all been here, and my lady desires to speak with you.

Mor. [Aside.] Indeed!—I have no leisure.

Mrs. S. Ah! I told my lady so.

Mor. Begone! inform your lady I have tormentors enough, and have no inclination to increase the number. [Erit.]

Mrs. S. I prognostified the answer! A good-for-nothing chap! I know very well what is becoming of a husband. He should love his wife dearly, by day and by night: he should wait upon her; and give her her own way; and keep her from the cold and the wet; and provide her with everything comfortable; and if she happen to be in an ill-humour, should coax her, and bear a little snubbing patiently. The fellows! what are they good for? [Exit.]

SCENE II.—The Steward's Room.

Enter ITEM and GRIME meeting.

Item. [Eagerly.] My dear Grime, I am glad you are come. Well, is the deed prepared?

Grime. Ready for sealing. Mr. Mordent never examines what he signs; he trusts all to you.

Item. We cannot be too safe. But this other affair, this Joanna; what have you done? Have you decoyed her to Mrs. Enfield's?

Grime. Really, Mr. Item, she is so fine a creature that, when I consigned her over, I am not a true Christian, if I did not feel such a twinge here—

Item. Curse your twinges! Is she safe? Did she suspect nothing?

Grime. No, no! The poor innocent blessed herself to think what a kind protectress Providence had sent her.

Item. That is well! that is well!

Grime. But I do not yet understand why you should seek the ruin of this lovely creature?

Item. I? You mistake; 'tis Mr. Mordent.

Grime. What! wish destruction to his child?

Item. No, no: we neither of us seek her harm, but our own safety.

Grime. Which way?

Item. He has various tormentors: his wife, or rather her proud relations, are among the chief; and he dreads they should come to the knowledge of this secret. But his strongest terror is of being detected in having for years disowned a child, who, if now produced would be his everlasting disgrace.

Grime. Then he does not know that his daughter is now in the house of Mrs. Enfield?

Item. Not a word. His plan, for the present, is to settle her in some profession; for this he will bestow a thousand pounds, which—ha, ha, ha!—I am to expend.

Grime. Or keep?

Item. [Aside.] Plague! I have said too much.

Grime. [Aside.] Oh, oh! A thousand pounds?

Item. That, my dear Grime, would be a paltry motive.

Grime. [Aside.] I'll have my share.

Item. Mr. Mordent has been all his life squandering, like a blockhead, what I have been prudently picking up.

Grime. And pretty pickings you have had, Mr. Item.

Item. [Exulting.] I have him in the toils! Interest accumulating upon interest, and all in arrear. I can foreclose upon him, when I please, for all except the Berkshire estate; and by this second mortgage, agreeably to the deed you have brought, equity of redemption will be forfeited, and that as well as the rest will then be mine.

Grime. If he had but signed and sealed—

Item. Which he shall do this very day.

Grime. Still, why are you the enemy of Joanna? What have you to fear from her?

Item. Much! An action of recovery.

Grime. How so? She has no title: she is illegitimate.

Item. Would she were! No, no; a lawful daughter, born in wedlock: her mother, poor but virtuous, and died in childbed. Fearful it should injure his second marriage with Lady Anne, he never produced the infant; but told his man, Donald, it was a natural daughter, and by his intermission, secretly maintained and had her educated.

Grime. Why not employ the same agent still?

Item. Because this Donald has got the fool's disease—pity; and threatens to make Mordent own his daughter, or impeach.

Grime. And was it prudent to place her beyond Donald's knowledge?

Item. It was.

Grime. Ah! 'tis a strange world! Well, now, Mr. Item, give me leave to say a word or two on my own affairs.

Item. To be sure, my dear friend. Speak, and spare not.

Grime. There is the thousand pounds you mentioned.

Item. [Aside.] Hem!

Grime. Then the premium on this mortgage.—In short, Mr. Item, I do all your business, stand in your shoes—

Item. You are my right hand, the apple of my eyes!

Grime. Ay, but—

Item. The dearest friend I have on earth!

Grime. The division of profits—

Item. Don't mention it. Am not I your friend? I shall not live for ever.

Grime. No, nor I neither. Friendship—

Item. Don't think of it. You can't distrust me! the first and best friend you ever had!

Grime. Fine words—

Item. [Evading.] Yonder is my nephew. [Calls.] Clement!

Enter CLEMENT.

Clem. Sir?

Item. Fetch the title-deeds of the Berkshire estate from my good friend, Mr. Grime's.

Grime. Well, but—

Item. Any time to-day.

Clem. Very well, sir.

Grime. Once again, Mr. Item—

Item. And, Clement—

Grime. I say, the division—

Item. [Listens.] Hark! I hear Mr. Mordent!

Grime. [Aside.] It shall not pass off thus. I begin to know you.

Item. I would not have you seen just now. My dear Grime! my kind friend! Through this door!—Some other opportunity—Pray oblige me.

Grime. Well, well! [Aside.] The next time we meet, you shall know more of my mind. [Exit.]

Item. The rascal begins to grow troublesome. Take care of the steps, good Mr. Grime! [Exit.]

Enter MORDENT.

Mor. What is life? a continual cloud, pregnant with mischief, malignity, disease, and death. Happiness? an ignis-fatuus. Pleasure? a non-entity. Existence? a misfortune, a burthen. None but fools condescend to live. Men exert their whole faculties to torture one another: animals are the prey of animals: flowers bloom to be plucked and perish: the very grass grows to be torn and eaten; trees to be mangled, sawed, rooted up, and burned. The whole is a system of exquisite misery, and I have my full proportion. Oh! this girl! Why am I thus perturbed concerning her? She can but be wretched; and wretchedness is the certain fate of all!

Re-enter ITEM.

Well, my good Mr. Item, this poor Joanna! What have you done? Can you secure her happiness? Psha! fool! Can you lighten her misery? I can think of nothing but her; though distraction is in every thought.

Item. 'Tis a serious affair: you ought to do nothing lightly.

Mor. Turned adrift! rejected of all! no relation, no friend! never acknowledged, never!

Item. My advice, you know, sir, was, at once boldly to produce her as your daughter. No matter for the impertinent clamours and questions of who her mother was, and what became of her? why the child was never owned? where she had been concealed, and for what purposes?

Mor. Ay, ay, ay! The malignant sneers of friends, the cutting calumny of enemies, the reproaches of Lady Anne, the insults of her pompous family!

Item. For my part, I obey your commands, but I cannot approve them.

Mor. My late ward, Mr. Cheveril, should he hear of it, what would he think? Then this Berkshire mortgage!

Item. Ay, there again! Totally opposite to my advice.

Mor. Can you shew me any other possible way of paying my debts?

Item. The danger of signing it is extreme.

Mor. 'Tis ruin! But what matter? Is not the whole one mass of wretchedness?

Item. Young Cheveril, I own, has demands.

Mor. Which must be paid.

Item. Then the out-standing bills—tradesmen are very insolent.

Mor. Ay, ay! They, like the rest, have their appointed office to torture.

Item. Well, remember I have given you fair warning.

Mor. Certainly: you do your part, and with the best intentions; goad and sting, and add your quantum to the sum of suffering. The consistency of evil is amazing: good and bad all concur. Is the deed ready?

Item. I must first read it through.

Mor. Do so: I leave it all to you.

Item. But that will not take ten minutes.

Mor. I will be back presently. The gulph is before me; plunge I must, and to plunge blindfold will be to cheat the devil of some part of the pain.

Item. Nay, if you will not be warned, it is not my fault. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—The Dressing-room of Lady Anne.

Lady ANNE and Mrs. SARNET discovered.

Mrs. S. I told your ladyship he would refuse.

Lady A. What reason did he give?

Mrs. S. Reason, forsooth! Husbands never have any reason.

Lady A. [Aside.] Unkind man! Why does he thus wish to avoid me?

Mrs. S. He keeps his distance both day and night: but I would teach him to sleep in two beds! A pretty fashion, truly! I would tell him I was afraid of ghosts; and so I married because I could not, nor I would not, lie alone. So let him remember that.

Lady A. Why were you so long in bringing the message back?

Mrs. S. Why, that is what I have to tell your ladyship. If there is not bad doings, say I am no witch.

Lady A. What do you mean?

Mrs. S. Your ladyship must not be angry; but you know I can't help having a sharp eye and a quick ear of my own.

Lady A. What have you been doing now?

Mrs. S. So, I saw my master go into the steward's room—

Lady A. Psha! folly! What of that?

Mrs. S. So I had all my seven senses and my eye-teeth about me—

Lady A. Pray, have done!

Mrs. S. So, I clapped my ear to the key-hole; and, then, I heard a—whuz, buz—

Lady A. This was very improper.

Mrs. S. So, I could only catch up a word here and there; and the first was summut about—of a child—

Lady A. A child?

Mrs. S. And a mother, my lady! Though for the matter of that, where there is a child, one's own natural penetrality will tell one there must be a mother.

Lady A. Of what weakness am I guilty?

Mrs. S. And I thought I caught the sound of Mr. Item of a fathering the child; and I'm posituve he said it wuz against his conscience.

Lady A. Who said so?

Mrs. S. Mr. Item, my lady. And so, a little bit after, my master called somebody a poor injurious girl, and a prodigality of wit and beauty. So, then, I heard somebody's foot on the stairs, and I wuz fain to scamper.

Lady A. I know not why I listen to this indecent prattle. My over-anxious curiosity betrays me, and you are much too forward to profit by my weakness.

Mrs. S. Because you know, my lady, I love you in my heart; and it is all for your own good.

Lady A. A child! an injured child! Yet why do I feel agitation? His infidelities have been too open for me to be ignorant of them. And who has been to blame; he or I? Oh! doubtful and difficult question!

Mrs. S. But I'll come at the truth, I warrant me, in all its particlers.

Lady A. Suffering, perhaps, under the consciousness of error, which the sight of me might increase, he flies from additional anguish. Oh! that I had the power to sooth and reconcile him to himself! Why will he not receive consolation from me?

Mrs. S. I'll rummage about!

Lady A. If I am unhappy, how must I be certain that it is not my own fault? Where there is unhappiness, neither party can be wholly blameless.

Mrs. S. He ought to love and adore such a lady; and clothe her in satin and gold.

Lady A. Shall I tyrannize over the affections that I cannot win? If I want the power to please, let me correct my own defects, and not accuse my husband of insensibility. Oh! nothing is so killing to a husband's love, as a discontented, irksome, wailing wife! let me be anything but that.

Mrs. S. He is a barbarian Turk; and so I as good as told him. If any fellow was to use me so, I know what I would do.

Lady A. Yet have I not lost his love? Dreadful doubt! My family advise a separation; and, if this fatal loss be real, how is it to be avoided? Yet I will not lightly yield: let me hope my efforts will not all be ineffectual. Would this agonizing contest were ended. [Exit.]

Mrs. S. She may say what she will, but I know very well she is the most miserablest lady alive, and I could tear his eyes out. Husband, indeed! And so, because I listened to the fellow's love, and non-sense-stuff, and took pity on him when he was going to hang or drown himself, he must think, as soon as he has got me safe, to be my lord and master: I'd tell him another story. My lord and master, truly! [Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The House of Mrs. Enfield.

Mrs. ENFIELD and BETTY discovered.

Mrs. E. And, mind me, treat her with great kindness and deference.

Betty. I'll be careful.

Mrs. E. Keep her in continual good-humour; don't let her ask for anything twice; and, above all things, listen to her complaints, and pity them.

Betty. My white handkerchief shall be at her service.

Mrs. E. Is the messenger returned?

Betty. Yes, madam; and there is no answer from Mr. Mordent; but Mr. Lennox sent word he will soon be here.

Mrs. E. Send her to me.

Betty. Yes, madam. [Exit.]

Mrs. E. She is young, and ignorant of the town; but I can see she has a quick and courageous spirit.

Enter JOANNA.

Well, my sweet Joanna, do you think you can love me, and follow my advice?

Joanna. Are you not my benevolent protectress? and will it not be my duty?

Mrs. E. Why, that's a precious! Ay, ay; do but as I desire you, darling, and then—

Joanna. Oh! that I will. Come, set me to work.

Mrs. E. Ah! I won't kill you with work. Pretty dear! those delicate arms were not made for work!

Joanna. Fie! You must not tell me that. My mother is dead, and my father—But I must bear my fate with fortitude. Labour is no punishment.

Mrs. E. Labour! Oh! the beauty! Chicken-gloves, my lamb, for those white hands! A noble looking-glass, to see that sweet form! a fine chariot, to shew off your charms! These you ought to have, and a thousand other fine things; ay, and if you will take my advice, have them you shall.

Joanna. Fine things! chariots! No, no; not for me. To work, to work! But I'll willingly take your advice; for you are so kind, it cannot be ill.

Mrs. E. Ill! Heaven protect me! I advise a dear, sweet, handsome creature to ill!

Joanna. Handsome! Fie! an orphan! fatherless!

Mrs. E. Ay, very true. Ill! No, no; think me your parent.

Joanna. Dear lady!

Mrs. E. Ah! my tender lamb! Think of joy; think of pleasure.

Joanna. Be not so kind. You should not soften, but steel my heart: teach it to have neither fear nor feeling of wrong; to laugh when others weep.

Mrs. E. Do not think of it.

Joanna. Did you never see your father?

Mrs. E. Anan, dear!

Joanna. I never saw mine; do not even know his name. I had a strange desire to see him once, but once, and I was denied. I am a high-spirited girl, but I would have kneeled to him; would have kissed his feet; and was refused. No matter.

Mrs. E. Forget it.

Joanna. Well, well! Courage! You must let me work: I'll earn what I eat. I love you for your kindness, but I will not be dependent.

Mrs. E. Since you will—You say you can draw?

Joanna. It has been my delight. I have studied the human countenance; have read Lavater.

Mrs. E. Will you copy the engraving I shewed you?

Joanna. What, the portrait of that strange—

Mrs. E. Mr. Mordent. [Handing down a frame.]

Joanna. Mordent?

Mrs. E. Of Portland-place.

Joanna. He's a wicked man.

Mrs. E. Nay—

Joanna. A wild eye. I hope he is not your relation?

Mrs. E. No; but has been a very good friend.

Joanna. Take care of him.

Mrs. E. Can you judge so certainly?

Joanna. Looking at such a face, who can fail? [Examining Mrs. E.] You are a worthy lady; a kind lady; your actions bespeak it: and yet—don't be angry—there is something about your features that I don't like.

Mrs. E. Bless me, dear!

Joanna. I must be wrong, because you are good: but you have not a good countenance. That's strange; I never saw such a thing before. And the more I look, the less I like.

Mrs. E. [Aside.] Does she suspect me?

Joanna. If ever I draw your face, I'll alter some of the lines. I'll make them such as I think virtue ought to have made them; open, honest, undaunted. You have such a number of little artful wrinkles at the corners of your eyes—You are very cunning.

Mrs. E. [Aside.] What does she mean?

Joanna. But what of that? You are kind to me; and I fear no cunning, not I. You found me friendless, have given me work, and I would die to serve you; so I'll copy that wild man's portrait.

Mrs. E. Wild!

Joanna. Nay, for that matter, you need not fear him: but if you know any vain, foolish, young girls, that love flaunting, and will listen to fine promises, bid them beware of him.

Mrs. E. [Aside.] A little witch.

Enter BETTY.

Betty. Mr. LENOX is below, madam. [Exit.]

Mrs. E. I am glad of that. My sweet Joanna, I'll introduce you to him.

Joanna. Me, madam?

Mrs. E. Ay, child, that I will. Everybody shall know what an angel my dear young friend is.

Joanna. Consider, madam—

Mrs. E. Nay, I am sure you will not refuse me this pleasure.

Joanna. You are too kind.

Mrs. E. Come, my precious!

Joanna. Well, I commit myself to your trust. Friendless and fatherless, you will be my guardian. You are too generous to injure the helpless and the forlorn; and the lines in your face are false. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—An Ante-chamber in Mordent's House.

MORDENT and CHEVERIL discovered.

Chev. Grumble no more, guardy! I have done with prognosticating evil. 'Tis all in vain: your gloomy reign is ended: I am of age!—

Mor. To play the fool.

Chev. I'm free! I'm alive! I'm beginning to exist!—

Mor. Like a wretch at the stake, when the flames first reach him!

Chev. The whole world is before me; its pleasures are spread out, and I long to fall on. The golden apples of delight hang inviting me to pluck, eat, and—

Mor. Be poisoned.

Chev. Ha, ha, ha!

Mor. As your guardian, I—

Chev. D—n guardianship! I have been guarded too long. Years out of number have I been fed with lean Latin, crabbed Greek, and an abominable olio of the four faculties: served up with the jargon of Aristotle, the quirks of Thomas Aquinas, and the quibbles and quodlibets of Doctor Duns Scotus—

Mor. Take warning—

Chev. Fined for Horace; horsed for Homer; and plucked because I could not parrot over their premises and predicates, majors and minors, antecedents and consequents. My brain was a broker's shop; the little good furniture it contained all hid by lumber.

Mor. Let me tell you, young sir—

Chev. Not now: your day is done. I am my own man! I breathe! I am abroad! I am on the wing to visit the regions of fruition and Paradise; to banquet with the gods, and sip ambrosia from the lips of Venus and Hebe, the loves, and the graces!

Mor. You are a lunatic!

Chev. No; I am just come to my senses—for I am just come to my estate. High health, high spirits, eight thousand a-year, and one-and-twenty.

Mor. Youth! riches! Poor idiot! Health, too! What is man but a walking hospital? You, boy! you, little as you suspect it, include within yourself a whole pharmacopœia of malady and mischief!

Chev. Zounds! he'll persuade me presently I am Pandora's box.

Mor. So you are.

Chev. Why, guardy, you are mad!

Mor. True, or I should take the shortest way to get rid of misery, and instantly go hang myself.

Chev. What a picture!

Mor. Equal it in accuracy, if you can.

Chev. Why, I am but a young artist; however, I can dash my brush at the canvass as daringly as you have done. So, what think you of mirth, songs, and smiles; youth, beauty, and kisses; friendship, liberty, and love; with a large, capacious soul of benevolence, that can sooth the afflicted, succour the poor, heal the sick, instruct the ignorant, honour the wise, reform the bad, adore the good, and hug genius and virtue to the heart?

Mor. Every feature a lie!

Chev. Curse me, but I say the likeness is, at least, as good as your's: and I am sure the colouring is infinitely more delightful.—[Enter DONALD.]

Don. I've ganging about the business of the poor lassy, ken ye me? Gin ye want me, I've be back in a blink.

Mor. Go to the devil, if you will; so that you do not torment me.

Chev. Ah! friend Donald, don't you know that I'm of age? Won't you revel and roar, my boy? Why do you look so glum, old honesty?

Don. Troth, ye mistake the maitter, young gentleman; I am an auld go-between.

Chev. Ha, ha, ha!

Don. It's varra true; wetch makes me unco blate
A helpless bairn has been cast upo' the wide warld
by a hairless faither, and I am a pairt o' the cause.

Mor. Again, imp?

Chèv. A child deserted by the father!

Don. Ye well may shew the gogle o' yer eyn.

Chèv. Is he poor? is he penniless?

Don. Much thereabout, an I dunna miss my ken.

Chèv. Bring the child to me; bring it to me, old rueful! I'll be its father. I never fathered a child in my life, and I long to begin.

Don. Ye seem, truly, to ha' mair human affection than some fathers.

Mor. Begone! Leave us, blood-sucker! goblin!
vampire!

Don. Yas; I'ze gang where I tow'd ye; and, gin
I dunna hear o' her, ye'ze hear o' me. [Erit.]

Chèv. Bring me the baby, Donald. Zounds! how it would delight me to father all the fatherless children in the world. Poor little dears! I should have a plentiful brood. And so, guardian, I want money.

Mor. What, to purchase destruction wholesale?

Chèv. I have five hundred good, wicked, spirited, famous projects on hand. You have seventeen thousand pounds of mine, hard cash: I want it—

Mor. Seventeen thousand plagues!

Chèv. Every farthing.

Mor. Your money, sir, is locked up in mortgages.

Chèv. Locked up? Oh, d—e! I'll unlock it. I'll send honest Grime to ye; he carries a master-key.

Mor. Have you no regard to my convenience?

Chèv. I'll pay the premium; and, if you want security, you may have mine. I must have money!
The world must hear of me; I'll be a patron, and a subscriber, and a collector, and an amateur, and a connoisseur, and a dilettante! I'll hunt, I'll race, I'll disse! I'll grub, plant, plan, and improve! I'll buy a stud, fell a forest, build a palace, and pull down a church! [Erit.]

Mor. Mr. Cheveril! He is flown! Why, ay, with spirits equally wild, wanton, and ignorant of evil,
I began my career. I have now lived long enough to discover that universal nature is universal agony.
Oh! this rejected Joanna! Miserable girl! Well, am not I miserable too? Who is not? The dangers to which she may be exposed! the cruelty of utterly abandoning her! Never shall I again be at peace with myself!

Lady A. [Without.] Where is your master?

Mor. Hark! my wife! She tortures me with her silent sufferings and her stifled sighs. Passion, bitter reproach, and violent menace, would be infinitely more supportable. In short, I have not deserved her kindness, and cannot endure it. [Erit.]

Enter Lady ANNE.

Lady A. Mr. Mordent! Thus does he continually shun me. Why, then, do I haunt him? why intrude myself upon him? Must this have no end? Fond, foolish heart, these aches and pains are fruitless:
sleep in forgetfulness, cease to feel, and be at peace!

Mrs. S. [Without.] I tell you, I can't stay.

Lady A. The stories, too, with which this kind but officious creature torments me—

Enter Mrs. SARNSET, hastily.

Mrs. S. I've got it, my lady! I've got it!

Lady A. What is the matter now?

Mrs. S. Why, I'll tell your ladyship. A queer, quandary kind of person brought my master a letter, which I knew was suspicious. So, my master's coat was all powder, over here: how he came by it,

I don't know.

Lady A. Psha! Pray don't tease me.

Mrs. S. So, my lady, he took it off, and ordered one of the fellows to give it a brush. So, making a pretence, I was close at his heels—

Lady A. At whose heels?

Mrs. S. The footman's, my lady. So, while he was brushing, he had a wrangulation with the cook;
and turned about to gabble footman's gibberish with she; so I, having a hawk's-eye, twirled my hand behind me, so; and felt in the pocket, and there I found this written letter, which I slyly slipped under my apron, so.

Lady A. Take a letter out of your master's pocket?

Mrs. S. Yes, my lady; because, being broke open, I read the contents, and found that it was from one Mrs. Enfield, to appoint an assassination between my master and a young girl.

Lady A. Give it me.

Mrs. S. Yes, my lady; I was sure you could not but wish to see it.

Lady A. Mistress Sarnset, I have frequently cautioned you against practices like these; which are mean and dishonest.

Mrs. S. My lady!

Lady A. To have robbed your master of his money would have been less culpable than to steal from him the knowledge of transactions which, because of their impropriety, he has not the courage to avow.

Mrs. S. It's very hard, because I can't bear your lady—ladyship's ill usage; and—and—and always feel as if my very stays were a-bursting, to see your —your treatment, time after time, that I should get myself ill—ill—ill—will, because I love you from the very bottom of my heart.

Lady A. I have winked at these liberties too often; I'll suffer them no longer.

Mrs. S. Very—very well. Since your ladyship is so angry, you may turn—turn me away, if you please, and quite break—break—break my heart.

Lady A. No; the fault is more than half my own:
but, from this time, I seriously warn you against such improper, such base actions.

Mrs. S. Very—very well, my lady, I'll be deaf, and dumb, and blind; and when I see you treated worse than a savage, I'll burst twenty laces a-day before I'll speak a word.

Lady A. [With great kindness.] What you have done has been affectionately meant. I am sorry to have given you pain, and to have excited your tears;
but I must earnestly desire you will commit no more such mistakes. They are wrong in themselves, and every way fatal to my peace.

Mrs. S. [Kisses her hand.] You are the tenderest and best of ladies! and I know who is an unfeeling brute! [Erit Lady A.]

Enter LENNOX and CHEVERIL.

Len. Pray, Mrs. Sarnset, is Mr. Mordent within?

Mrs. S. Indeed, sir, I don't know. [Muttering.]
Mr. Mordent is a good-for-nothing chap! [Erit.]

Len. I'll bet you a thousand, Cheveril, your charmer does not equal the girl I have this moment left.

Chèn. Done, for ten thousand.

Len. You would lose.

Chèv. You never beheld so peerless a beauty!

Len. How did you become acquainted with her?

Chèv. We are not yet acquainted; and I fear we never shall be.

Len. Oh, oh!

Chèv. I met her three times in the Green Park.

The first moment I gazed at her with admiration—as soon as she was gone by!

Len. Gone by?

Chev. Good manners, you know, would not let me stare her in the face. Such a shape! such elegance! The next time I determined to speak to her, and approached as resolutely as Hercules to the Hydra.

Len. A good simile for a beauty.

Chev. I had studied a speech; but, somehow, there was such a sweet severity in her looks, I—I had not the power to utter a word.

Len. Courageous lover!

Chev. The third time, however, it being alittle darker, (for it was always in the evening,) I was more undaunted: so, fully determined to throw myself at her feet, and declare my passion, up I marched; but, as the devil would have it, she turned and looked me full in the face; and her beauty, and—and virtue, and—and modesty, were so awful, that my heart sank within me.

Len. Ha, ha, ha!

Chev. It is now a fortnight since; and although I have walked the Green Park, morning, noon, and night, every day, I could never once again set eyes on her. Intolerable booby that I was, to lose three such precious opportunities—

Len. Of making love to a lady's-maid.

Chev. Oh! for one momentary glance, that I might give vent to the passion that devours me!

Len. Ha, ha, ha!

Chev. What, you think I dare not?

Len. Ha, ha, ha! Look you, Cheveril; I know you: a lighted match and the mouth of a cannon could not cow you like the approach of a petticoat.

Chev. I afraid of women! D—me! I don't understand having my character attacked and traduced. Make a Master Jackey of me? I am a wicked one.

Len. Ha, ha, ha! Wicked! you are as conscientious as a drunken methodist, or a dying miser. You are not only afraid of the woman, but of the sin.

Chev. Why, if—no, d—me! 'tis not true. I have no more conscience than yourself.

Len. Me! I have a deal of conscience. Pleasure, I own, can tempt me; but I make no pretensions, like you, to the sin for the sake of reputation.

Chev. Sir, I make no such pretensions. I am, indeed, resolved to be a fellow of enterprise, pith, and soul; but not by vile, rascally methods. I'll love all the women, and, perhaps, trick some of the men; but not seduce wives, ruin daughters, and murder husbands and fathers. No; if I cannot be wicked without being criminal, d—me, if I do not live and die an honest, dull dog! [Exit.]

Enter MORDENT, searching his pockets.

Mor. Curse the letter! it's gone! Careless booby!

Len. What's the matter?

Mor. A thousand to one but it has fallen into the hands of Lady Anne.

Len. What have you lost?

Mor. A d—d epistle from—

Enter LADY ANNE

Lady A. Mr. Mordent, I am glad to meet with you.

Mor. Glad! Is the thing so difficult?

Lady A. I did not say so; I meant nothing unkind.

Mor. Ha, ha, ha!

Lady A. Indeed, I did not. I wish to speak to you.

Mor. [To Lennox retiring.] Stay where you are, Lennox. What, man, you are in no fear of soothing insult! You are not married.

Len. I'll return in five minutes.

[Exit.]

Lady A. Pray, Mr. Mordent—

Mor. Psha! I know I am a bear at the stake: don't shorten my tether.

Lady A. I have a paper— [Shewing the letter.]

Mor. Ay, ay; I know it. Come, I am prepared.

Lady A. It fell into my hands by the reprehensible but unauthorized curiosity of my woman.

Mor. Ha, ha, ha!

Lady A. Indeed, I have never opened it.

Mor. Nor she either?

Lady A. Yes; but that is not my fault.

Mor. Your's, indeed! Impossible!

Lady A. The heart, which I cannot secure by affection, I will not alienate by suspecting.

Mor. Psha! Meekness is but mockery; forbearance, insult.

Lady A. How shall I behave? Which way frame my words and looks, so as not to offend? Would I could discover!

Mor. You never complain! You have no jealousy!

Lady A. Indeed, I've been very obstinately blind.

Mor. Ay, ay! "Patience on a monument!"

Lady A. Reproach has never escaped my lips.

Mor. Ha, ha, ha! As if lips were the only instruments of upbraiding! No deep-fetched sighs? no pale, melancholy glances? no obvious hiding of the ever-ready tear?

Lady A. I fear I have been to blame. Indeed, I am sorry that my sensations have been so acute.

Mor. You accuse! You give a husband pain! Insolent supposition!

Lady A. I sincerely wish, my dear, you gave no more than I intend to give.

Mor. There! Did not I say so? Ha, ha, ha! You accuse!

Lady A. I am wrong; I forgot myself. Pray, forgive me. Why am I subject to these mistakes?

Mor. You are all angel—

Lady A. Would I were!

Mor. And I all demon!

Lady A. Do not, Mr. Mordent, by the dear affection you once bore—

Mor. There there! The affection I once bore!

Lady A. Heavens! must I ever be fated to wound, when it is most the wish of my soul to heal?

Mor. Why was the Earl of Oldcrest here this morning? Why are these family consultations held?

Lady A. They are contrary to my wish.

Mor. A separation, I hear, is the subject of them.

Lady A. But not countenanced by me.

Mor. Pretending in pity to spare me yourself, they are to be set upon me.

Lady A. Never! Heaven be my judge, never!

Mor. I am to be subjected to their imperious dictates.

Lady A. I own they have lately been very urgent with me to return to my father; but, were you only kind, their solicitations would be vain, indeed. Oh! take pity on yourself and me, and teach me to regain your lost affections! or, if that be too great a blessing to hope, there is still one evil which I would suffer any other torture to escape: think, if you can, that I no longer love; treat me with unkindness; neglect, accuse, do any thing—but hate me! Let me not endure that last stage of misery! But, oh, heavens! if our former endearments must end in that, have mercy, and retard or conceal it as long as you can. [Exit.]

Mor. Ha, ha, ha! What are barbs, and stings, and poisoned arrows? Pitiful instruments! Thou, triumphant wretchedness, usest these but on small occasions; they want pungency.

Enter LENNOX.

Len. May I come in?

Mor. Ay, ay! Now am I ripe for mischief.

Len. You seem out of temper. What has happened?

Mor. Trifles, trifles! She has got the letter.

Len. From whom?

Mor. Mrs. Enfield.

Len. Zounds!

Mor. An invitation to a new sample of beauty. She has seen it; returned it; has graciously forgiven; has racked, has driven me mad!

Len. And do you mean to go?

Mor. Ay, will I! Since devil I am, devil let me be! It will be some, though but a petty vengeance for prying.

Len. You must not.

Mor. Indeed but I will.

Len. We have long been friends, and fellow-sinners; but, in these affairs, we have always behaved honourably.

Mor. What then?

Len. I have seen the girl.

Mor. Where?

Len. At Enfield's.

Mor. Did she write to you, too?

Len. She did. An angel, Mordent!

Mor. Ha, ha, ha! Marry her, and make wretchedness secure.

Len. No! but I am fixed for life. Such animation! such soul! The finest creature my eyes ever beheld!

Mor. I'll see her.

Len. No; I cannot consent.

Mor. Why so? I'll aid you to carry her off.

Len. Are you serious?

Mor. As malice can make me. The sex have been worse to me than plague, pestilence, and famine.

Len. And what have you been to them?

Mor. No matter; I'll have my revenge.

Len. And you will aid me in this business?

Mor. I will.

Len. Solemnly? on your word and honour?

Mor. I tell you I will!

Len. Why, then, see her you shall; but in my company, observe.

Mor. Ha, ha, ha! Right; anticipate your tortments!

Len. On this condition, I shall thank you for your assistance and advice.

Mor. Why, ay! Advice! I, too, fool that I am—knowing the impotence of man to avert mischief, I wish for advice! I—[Aside.]—There may be danger in telling him.

Len. Well?

Mor. A—a friend of mine has a child; suppose it a—a natural child, that he knows not how properly to dispose of.

Len. A natural child, that he knows not how properly to dispose of?

Mor. Yes.

Len. Could not he sell it to the kidnappers?

Mor. Psha!

Len. There are honest overseers that will take it, fifty pounds down.

Mor. Not an infant; twenty years of age.

Len. Oh! then, indeed—there are crimp sergeants.

Mor. When I put a serious question, I expect a serious answer.

Len. Serious! And ask what a man is to do with his child!

Mor. Suppose he should have legitimate offspring?

Len. Oh, oh! Legitimate! Ah! Made of other metal! a different manufacture!

Mor. You won't hear. He provided for her—

Len. A female, too?

Mor. Would have continued to provide, but she rejected his assistance—

Len. How so?

Mor. Unless he would see her, embrace her; that is, whine over, acknowledge her, and bestow his blessing.

Len. And he refused?

Mor. Why not? Of what benefit are blessings? Where all is evil, why torment conscience concerning the mode?

Len. He is a monster!

Mor. But, sir, appearances—

Len. D—n appearances!

Mor. Friends—

Len. D—n his friends!

Mor. A wife—

Len. D—n his wife! He has friends, appearances, and a wife; but he has no heart.

Enter DONALD, in great agitation.

Don. She is gone! she is lost for aye! I've e'en red wud!

Mor. [Aside to Don.] How now, herald of malice and mischief?

Don. I canna forgether her! Fair fa' yeer hairt! I've ne'er set eyes o' her mair.

Mor. Peace, hound!

Don. I tell you I wunna! Misca' me an ye wull, the de'il ma' care! A father turn his back o' his bairn!

Len. Oh, oh! What, it was yourself, your own daughter, you were talking of?

Don. Gin earth haud her, I've ha' her yet; ay, and I've gar ye do her recht. She laft a message for ye.

Mor. What message?

Don. Tell him, gin he wunna gi' his child ane kess, ane scrimpet blessing, that child wull wark, stairve, and die, ore she wull leve like a parish pauper on scraps and alms. Tell him she has a pridefool spirit, that wunna bag, gin she canna win: and, gif he scorn his dochtor, she scorn's aksap his charity. [Going.]

Len. So, you commit crime, and then invent a system for its justification? Excellent philosopher!

Don. Why dunna ye spier a'ter her yeersal? Eh, waesucks! Ye dunna ken yeer ain bairn!

Len. How?

Don. Ye never saw the face o' her, sin she lung a wee giglet at the breast. Weel, weel! Nothing comes more surely tul licht than that which is long hidden. An ill life, an ill end! [Erit.]

Mor. Wolves, tigers, serpents, were first created, and then man.

Len. You are truly a high fellow, Mordent; and you spend your fortune, wrong your wife, and disown your child: that is, you inflict misery, and then tell us all are miserable.

Mor. I act and I am acted upon: the precept and the proof go together.

Len. You are incorrigible! But come; we must about this business. My heart is deeply interested.

Mor. My affairs are at a crisis; and, if I augur rightly, it will soon be all over with me.

Len. Hope better. Come, come with me to Enfield's.

Mor. I'll meet you there in half an hour.

Len. Do not fail. I am all impatience. [Erit.]

Mor. Just so are curs fighting, and thieves in the act of plundering. Man is ever eager on mischief. With what infernal ardour do two armies prepare in the morning to exterminate each other before noon! Are they not wise? What is it but compressing the sum of evil within an hour, which trembling cowardice would protract through an age? [Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The House of Mordent.

CHEVERIL and GRIME discovered.

Chev. You must let me have the cash directly

Grime. That is impossible.

Chev. I say, you must. When I have wants and wishes, nothing shall be impossible.

Grime. [Aside.] What if I were to tell him of Joanna? He would pay well.

Chev. Twelve hours have I been free, and have not had a taste of pleasure yet. If I do not make haste, I shall grow old before I begin.

Grime. [Aside.] I shall make him my friend: 'tis a rare thought!

Chev. Why do you ruminate? Do you doubt me?

Grime. Mr. Cheveril!

Chev. Well, sir?

Grime. Do you love innocence, youth, and beauty?

Chev. Do I? 'Sdeath! I am dying for them.

Grime. I know where they are to be found.

Chev. You?

Grime. The rarest creature!

Chev. Where, where?

Grime. Such pure white and red!

Chev. Ay!

Grime. Such moist, ripe, ruddy lips!

Chev. 'Sdeath! don't drive me mad. Tell me where, where?

Grime. At a certain convenient—

Chev. No, no; I have no taste for beauties of that kind.

Grime. See her, and then judge.

Chev. [Aside.] Besides, I'll not be unfaithful to my angelic incognita of the Green Park.

Grime. She is a young, untutored thing.

Chev. Untutored?

Grime. That I can assure you.

Chev. Then depend upon it I'll not be her instructor. How came she in such a place?

Grime. She knows nothing of the place, nor in the least suspects she is in bad company.

Chev. Poor, dear soul! What rascals sent her there?

Grime. Hem! Why, that is—it—it—it was a kind of accident.

Chev. She is not for me. I want to be a famous wicked fellow, but not by ensnaring the helpless.

Grime. Nay, if you will neither ensnare nor accept the already ensnared, you must e'en marry, or starve.

Chev. That is d——d hard!

Grime. Eusnared she will be.

Chev. Curse me, but she shall not!

Grime. What will you do?

Chev. Snatch her from danger; provide for her, cherish her.

Grime. Ay, now you say something.

Chev. Zounds! Here have I been an age in the possession of eight thousand a-year, and have not done one famous, good, wicked thing yet. It's a d——d shame!

Grime. You will fall in love with her the moment you see her.

Chev. To be sure I shall. No; on recollection, I can't love two at a time. Then, if she should tempt me to be wicked—I mean vicious? I love wickedness, but I hate vice. 'Tis a dirty whirlpool, in which, if once a man set his foot, he is soon up to his chin.

Grime. 'Tis in Dover-street. I'll furnish you with an introduction.

Chev. You are abundantly civil. An introduction from an usurer to a—Hem! I shall come to preferment.

Grime. This is the address. [Gives a card.]

Chev. Dover-street?

Grime. Yes; Mrs. Enfield.

Chev. [Reads.] "Number!"—'Sblood! Why do I stand prating here? I, who have been kept fasting from happiness and pleasure so long? Another day will be over, and I shall not get a taste of pleasure.

Grime. Nay, I am telling you of a banquet.

Chev. Are you? Why, then, I have a keen appetite, and a most devouring wish to fall to: so here goes! [Exit.]

Enter MORDENT.

Mor. So, Mr. Grime!

Grime. Every thing is prepared, sir: we wait your good leisure.

Mor. You will find Mr. Item in his own room.

Grime. I shall attend you there: we can do no business till you come. [Exit.]

Enter CLEMENT.

Clem. My uncle desires me to inform you, sir, that he has examined the deed, and it is ready for signing.

Mor. I am coming.

Clem. Had I but any influence with you, sir, I would entreat, I would conjure you not to execute it.

Mor. Why?

Clem. A sudden demand may be made by the first mortgagee; you may be unprovided for payment; equity of redemption will be forfeited; he will foreclose, and the estate will be his, at a valuation made fifty years ago, at less than half its present worth.

Mor. Ha, ha, ha! 'Twill become his incumbrance, as it has been mine.

Clem. Money-lenders neglect no advantage.

Mor. And, as for conscience or honour—

Clem. Some of them, I am afraid, sir, have very little of either.

Mor. 'Tis in the order of things. Your uncle, indeed, is a man of integrity; he knows them to be rogues, and warns me of them.

Clem. Sir, he—he may be a mistaken man, like others. I once again conjure you, sir, to re-consider the consequence. It's a very serious affair.

Mor. Mr. Clement, you are young: you cherish the fond hope of alleviating misery. Ah!

Clem. Sir, I—My situation is a painful one; but every feeling of honesty and duty compel me to inform you, that when once you have signed this deed, you will be wholly in the grasp of mercenary men, who will pay no respect to former profits, the benefits they have received, or the feelings and disinterests of him by whom they have acquired wealth, power, and pride. [Exit.]

Mor. The nephew and the uncle, poor fools! have the misfortune to be honest. Grime is more cunning, and will not forfeit his hope of cutting evil short at the gallows. The deed must be signed; for the money must be had. Yet these cautionings do but strengthen an aversion, which, in spite of necessity, I have always felt against this last act of despair.

Enter ITEM.

Mr. Item, you are right: this mortgage is a d—d affair. Delay is dangerous; thought is vain; yet I am inclined to think again before I sign.

Item. By all means, sir. I like that; I approve of that. Act with your eyes open; take no rash step. 'Tis what I always say—But mine is a thankless office. Like other officious fools, I can give counsel, but no help. I'm sorry to tell you, the upholsterer is below, who is very insolent, and declares, if he be not paid immediately, he will have an execution in the house before night.

Mor. Could not you put him off for a week?

Item. He has been put off too often.

Mor. Are there no means by which you might advance me that sum yourself?

Item. Oh! that I could; it would make me the happiest man on earth!

Mor. Affectionate soul!

Item. Riches would now, indeed, be welcome!

Mor. Mr. Item, you make me as great a fool as yourself.

Item. As to the deed, again and again I warn you not to sign it.

Mor. Then I will not. Ruin and wretchedness are certain; but the mode of being wretched is in my own choice, and I will not.

Item. Yet, what the devil I shall say to all your other tradesmen, I don't know: they are every man of them as clamorous as the upholsterer. I don't believe one of them will wait two days.

Mor. Was ever man so pestered?

Item. Here, too, is a long account I have just received from your groom at Newmarket; who says he shall soon want even a wisp of hay. For my part, I have not a guinea in hand: I wish I had. Then the impatience of Cheveril! and what the malignant world will say of the defalcation of a guardian, there is no foreseeing! Sign you must not!

Mor. At least I will take an hour or two to think of it. Misfortune, disgrace, and approaching infamy, sit mocking at me; and I shall soon attain the acme of misery. [Ereunt.]

SCENE II.—The Street.

Enter CHEVERIL.

Chev. This is the street! it must be somewhere hereabout! What a fatiguing affair pleasure-hunting is! Oh! that I could once more meet my lovely angel! my Green-park deity! This is the number.

Enter LENNOX from Mrs. Enfield's House.

Heyday! Lennox coming from—You, who preach refinement of pursuit and delicacy of enjoyment?

Len. Oh! we preach one thing, and practice another. Beside, were you but to see her—

Chev. Her! who?

Len. The girl I told you of. The divinest creature—

Chev. What, here? In this house?

Len. Yes; but she shall not remain there half-an-hour. I am going to prepare every thing. I am determined to secure her.

Chev. [Aside.] Honest Grime has given him an introduction, too.

Len. Hush! there she is! [Pointing to a window.]

Chev. Where? I see nobody.

Len. Ah! she is gone again.

Chev. Oh! but I'll— [Preparing to run.]

Len. [Seizing him.] Where are you going?

Chev. To leap through the window.

Len. No, Cheveril; that must not be.

Chev. Why not?

Len. She is mine!

Chev. Your's?

Len. I have bought an exclusive right to her; paid a hundred pounds down.

Chev. Pooh!

Len. I tell you she is, and shall be mine!

Chev. Well, well; if so—

[Going.]

Len. [Preventing him.] Come with me.

Chev. No; I can't.

Len. Why not?

Chev. Good b'ye!

[Exit in haste.]

Len. Zounds! my d—d blabbing tongue—[Looking after him.] There he flies, the whirligig! Ah! he is out of sight, and all is safe. I must have Mordent's assistance. Where the devil does he loiter? I'll soon be back, though, for fear of accidents. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—The House of Mrs. Enfield.

Enter MRS. ENFIELD.

Mrs. E. [Calling] Betty!

Betty. [Without.] Ma'am?

Mrs. E. Who is that bounced through the back-door in such haste?

Enter BETTY.

Betty. I don't know, ma'am: a young—Hem! [Exit.]

Enter CHEVERIL.

Chev. I am safe here: I have tricked him! Your humble servant, madam. Your name is—

Mrs. E. Mrs. Enfield, at your service, sir.

Chev. You keep a—modish magazine, I think?

Mrs. E. Magazine!

Chev. Of ready-made beauty?

Mrs. E. Well, sir?

Chev. Your acquaintance, honest Mr. Grime, informed me you have a sample of a fine sort.

Mrs. E. Ah! you are too late.

Chev. My friend, Lennox, has paid you one hundred pounds. Don't stare! I know the whole. Bring me to the lady, and, if I like her—

Mrs. E. I am very sorry, sir, but I cannot; my honour won't let me.

Chev. Prodigious virtue! Come, come! Lennox is cunning forty; I am foolish one-and-twenty. He is too old to be a lavish paymaster.

Mrs. E. Ah! sir, that is your mistake! He is too young. He will pay better as he grows older.

Chev. I have eight thousand a-year, and am determined to be a—a—a wicked dog.

Mrs. E. Ah! lord love you.

Chev. So, see her I must. This is my proof.

[Shows a bank-bill.]

Mrs. E. As Mr. Lennox is your friend, perhaps you have his permission?

Chev. Permission! Oh! yes—No! I'll be wicked, but not unprincipled: I won't lie; that is a paltry scoundrel vice; no soul in it. Lookye! if that sum will not content you, tell me what will?

Mrs. E. Why, sir, you are such a handsome, charming, pleasant young gentleman, that—if you could spare me another such—

Chev. To settle accounts with your honour. Well, there.

Mrs. E. Observe, sir; it is only a short conversation.

Chev. Nothing more.

Mrs. E. No injury to Mr. Lennox?

Chev. Never fear.

Mrs. E. But you must be wary: young as she is, I never saw so acute a one.

Chev. Never fear! I tell you, I understand such affairs; or soon shall do, at least. I'm a young beginner, but a devilish apt scholar. [Exit Mrs. E.] Now, if she be worth carrying off, and I could outwit Lennox—I—Oh! I should establish my character for spirit, soul, and intrepidity for ever. I'll not be out of countenance. No, d—e, I am determined! I'll—P'll speak, and to the purpose, too! I'll be a d—d forward, prating, impudent, wicked dog.

Re-enter Mrs. ENFIELD, leading JOANNA.

Mrs. E. Ah! my lamb, pray oblige me! He is one of my best friends.

Joanna. What then?

Mrs. E. You are so sweet a cherub, I must procure my friends the pleasure of your acquaintance. Ah! there's a dove! there's a beauty! Dear! I forgot my knotting. I'll be back in a moment. [Exit.]

Chev. [Calls.] Mrs. Enfield! She is gone. I should have felt bolder, had she been present.

Joanna. It is very strange.

[Aside.]

Chev. What does she say?

Joanna. First one man, and then another—

Chev. [Listening.] Eh! Hem!

Joanna. Her friends, too, are all men—

Chev. Where the devil, now, is all my impudence flown?

Joanna. But she is so kind, so winning, that I have not the power to deny.

Chev. If I could but turn round—One plunge, and it would be over! [Turns by degrees.] Ma—Heavens! [Stands astonished.]

Joanna. [Aside.] Mercy! It is he!

Chev. [Aside.] The very beauty of the Green-park!

Joanna. [Aside, and sighs.] I had almost hoped never to have seen him more.

Chev. [Aside.] This is the luckiest—Lucky!—To find her here!

Joanna. [Aside.] I have thought of him much too often.

Chev. [Aside.] A creature so divine! Looks of such conscious modesty! And in this place!

Joanna. Sir—

Chev. Madam—[Aside.] Oh! that I might but touch her lips—

Joanna. Mrs. Enfield informs me you are one of her best friends.

Chev. Me, madam?

Joanna. Yes, sir.

Chev. Why—That is—[Aside.]—No; I'll not deceive her. [Aloud.] I—I never saw Mrs. Enfield before in my life.

Joanna. Never?

Chev. Never: and I don't care if I never see her again.

Joanna. Bless me!

Chev. Very true, madam. And I—

Joanna. [Calling.] Mrs. Enfield!

Chev. Stop, madam! Pardon my presumption, but—I—you—you have so much beauty, and modesty, and merit, and I am such a faltering, bashful booby, that, if you leave me, I shall run mad!

Joanna. Mad, sir?

Chev. Upon my soul I shall, madam. I can't help it. I never was so enchanted, enraptured, and ravished in all my life; and I am very sorry to find you—

Joanna. Sorry to find me?

Chev. No, no, no, madam! Glad to find you; in finitely glad; but not in this house.

Joanna. And why, sir?

Chev. I was frantic to think I had lost you.

Joanna. How so, sir? We are not acquainted.

Chev. I am sorry for it, madam; b—b—but I hope we shall be. I have been a very Bedlamite! I could neither eat, drink, nor sleep! I have dreamed of you every night! You have been in my head, in my heart, in my arms—

Joanna. Your arms, sir?

Chev. Oh, lord! no, madam; no, no; I—I am talking in my sleep now. I mean—that is—I would not offend you, madam, no, not for ten thousand thrones. Though to find you here is the greatest torment—

Joanna. Torment?

Chev. B—b—bliss! I—I—I would say bliss, madam; bliss ineffable! And if you would but leave this wicked place—

Joanna. I do not understand you, sir.

Chev. Purity of heart is the characteristic of your countenance; I am sure you are innocent; or, if not, I would give worlds that you were.

Joanna. This, sir, is the first time we have ever spoken together: what have you heard or seen of me, that should authorize you to doubt?

Chev. Nothing, madam; on my soul, nothing! Every motion, word, and look, speak virtue void of blemish. I would lay down my life to prove it, and to rescue you from this bad woman.

Joanna. From Mrs. Enfield?

Chev. An odious, vile—

Joanna. You make me half suspect you are as frantic as you describe yourself. She is the most benevolent of women.

Chev. Forgive me if I appear intruding; indeed my intention is good; but how long have you been in this house?

Joanna. Not four hours.

Chev. And how long acquainted with this woman?

Joanna. To-day was the first time I ever saw her.

Chev. She's innocent! she's innocent!

Mor. [Without.] I tell you, I will see her!

Chev. [Alarmed.] 'Sdeath! I hear my guardian.

Mor. [Without.] Lennox will be here presently.

Chev. [Looking round.] I must not be seen; but, for heaven's sake, let me speak to you once more.

[Retires into a closet, from which he occasionally speaks.]

Enter MORDENT.

Mor. [Surveying JOANNA.] Your humble servant, madam. [Aside.] She is, indeed, beautiful.

Joanna. [Aside.] This is the man of the portrait.

Mor. You are acquainted, I believe, with my friend, Mr. Lennox?

Joanna. I, sir? Not to my knowledge.

Mor. Did he not converse with you this morning?

Joanna. I have conversed with two gentlemen this morning: you are the third.

Mor. [Aside.] Lovely creature! Can she, too, be an instrument of malevolence? [Aloud.] I mean a fair gentleman, about forty.

Joanna. Well, sir, what of him?

Mor. Did he not make proposals?

Joanna. To me?

Mor. Ay, madam; on the common subject, the promoting of ill?

Joanna. You speak riddles. He talked idly; and, perhaps, was more unprincipled and insulting than I supposed.

Mor. [Aside.] By heavens, she is an innocent! Nay, her countenance would half persuade me there are beings capable of happiness.

Chev. [From the closet.] Zounds! He looks as if he, too, would fall in love with her.

Mor. Pardon my intrusion, madam; I am a stranger to you, but—

Joanna. Not entirely.

Mor. Not?

Joanna. I have been studying you all the morning.

Mor. Me? You never saw me before?

Joanna. Yes, I have.

Mor. When? where?

Joanna. [Pointing to the picture.] Here! in effigy.

Chev. What are they about?

Mor. My portrait! [Aside.] How dare the old beldam hang it up in her house?

Joanna. It speaks volumes; yet not so much as the original.

Chev. Oh! that I could hear them!

Mor. Indeed! And what does it say, madam? If it speak good, it lies.

Joanna. Either it indicates falsely, or you have flattered, promised, deceived, and betrayed—

Mor. [Aside.] Astonishing! Who?

Joanna. More poor girls than one.

Mor. [Aside.] Her eyes penetrate to the heart. [Aloud.] Evil is everywhere, therefore in me.

Chev. How she gazes at him! 'Sdeath!

Joanna. There is a mixture; traits that struggle to be just and good; occasional marks of virtue, but more of moody remorse.

Mor. [Aside.] Is this real? You judge and speak freely, madam: I applaud your sincerity.

Joanna. What should I fear? Besides, you have not the features of revenge.

Mor. [Aside.] Her understanding and discernment surpass her beauty.

Chev. Will they never have done?

Joanna. This eye, how often must it have assumed the same deceiving form and meaning, to have impressed these deep lines of artful seduction! How frequently must health, wealth, and principle, have been sacrificed, to gratify dishonest passions!

Mor. [Aside.] Amazing! So young, too!

Joanna. You are an unhappy man: for you have not the apathy of folly; you have a sense, a feeling of what you have done.

Chev. I shall go mad!

Mor. I have never had faith in sorcery: is it your profession?

Joanna. I have no profession. I am nobody; the child of nobody; a branch lopped off and cast away, that might have grown, but that could find no root. Misfortune and an active spirit, struggling to shake off oppression, have quickened me a little. Other than this, I am but a simple girl; and my whole art is to note what I see, and to speak what I think.

Mor. Whoever you are, come but with me; and, while I have a morsel, a home, or a heart, you shall share them!

Chev. [Runs from the closet.] D—e if she shall!

Mor. Why, Mr.—

Chev. She shall have my morsel, my home, and my heart!

Mor. You in this house, sir?

Chev. Nay, sir; you in this house, sir! Madam, put no faith in him. You are very right, he is a seducer. I love you, heart, body, and soul. I'll offer you no wrong. Every proof that the most ardent, purest passion can give, feel, or imagine, shall be your's.

Joanna. This house! What is it you mean, gentlemen? Is there contamination in this house?

Chev. Vile! detestable! A place of intrigue!

ACT. DRAMA.—NOS. 67 & 68.

Joanna. Heavens!

[Exit in haste.]

Mor. How came I, sir, to find you here?

Chev. Zounds! sir, how came I to find you here?

Enter Mrs. ENFIELD.

Mrs E. What have you done, gentlemen, to alarm the young creature in this manner? A little more, and she had escaped us all.

Mor. Hark you, Mrs. Enfield! at your peril, keep her safe and free from insult till my return. [Exit.]

Chev. Insult! If you breathe impurity in her presence, I'll make a general massacre. Let any one take her away, speak to her, or even look at her, while I am gone, and I'll grind you all to powder. [Goes, and hastily returns.] Here, here are all the bills I have; I'll be back in five minutes; keep her safe, and I'll give you a thousand pounds. My name is Cheveril—ten thousand! [Returns.] Cheveril—I say, my whole estate! [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The House of Mordent.

ITEM and GRIME discovered.

Grime. [Enraged.] Once for all, Mr. Item, it will not do; so be of a sweet temper.

Item. Why, you grumbling old blockhead, what would you have? May you not thank me for every shilling you are worth in the world?

Grime. Don't tell me, Mr. Item, I am but your scavenger, and you put me to a deal of dirty work.

Item. Here's gratitude! Why, Mr. Grime—

Grime. Well, Mr. Item?

Item. Did I not first find you in a miserable garret in Fullwood's Rents, where you was starving in rags and wretchedness?

Grime. Well!

Item. Did I not take you to Monmouth-street make you cast your beggar's skin; transform you into something almost human; hire you apartments in the Temple; and pass you on my master for a rich usurer?—a d—d rogue!

Grime. Very true: but you would not let me act my part. You took care to be the d—d rogue yourself.

Item. Have I not trusted you, tutored you, taught you your trade, and furnished the tools?

Grime. What then?

Item. And do you pretend to bargain, wrangle, and prescribe terms to me?

Grime. Yes; I do.

Item. You do?

Grime. I do. Help yourself how you can.

Item. Here's a villain!

Grime. You tutored me, you know; you taught me my trade, and furnished the tools.

Item. You viper! Sting the bosom that fostered you?

Grime. I follow your own example: Mr. Mordent fostered you! There's morality in it.

Item. Oh! d—n your morality!

Grime. Be of a sweet temper! Time was I was your slave; you now are mine.

Item. Oh! the rascal!

Grime. I am too deep in your secrets for you to dare to discard me; so, I'll have my share.

Item. Your—

Grime. Ay, my—my full share. So, be sweet tempered.

Item. And who is to find the money?

Grime. You.

Item. And who is to run the risk?

Grime. You.

Item. And who is to be prosecuted for usury and collusion—

Grime. Cast, perhaps, for perjury, whipped, imprisoned, and put in the pillory? You.

Item. And you to run away with half the profits?

Grime. Yes.

Item. Here's justice! Oh! what a d—d world do we live in!

Grime. Your fortune is made; you must now help to make mine.

Enter DONALD, unperceived.

Item. Here's a villain!

Grime. You must, or I tell.

Item. What will you tell?

Grime. All; all the usurious tricks you have practised on Mordent: the arts by which you have cheated him of his estates, pretending that I am the man; your intention to foreclose; your neglect in not paying yourself interest, purposely to rob according to law; your plots to ruin Cheveril; all, all!

Item. You will tell all this?

Grime. I will.

Item. Why, you fiend! you superlative villain! you cut-throat!

Grime. [Seeing DONALD.] Hem! [Pause.]

Don. What the hornie de'el do ye stop at? What gars ye swither? I'ze haud my whisht! Yeer confabulation is unco entertaining.

Item. Ah! good Mr. Donald! here is my old friend, Mr. Grime, has—has—[Aside to Grime.]—You see what your villainy has done! [Aloud.] He is a good-natured soul, as you know—Scoundrel! [aside to Grime] and he—I—I—

Don. Ye! yas; yeer a sweet nut, gin ye war well crackt.

Item. I—I—I was bantering him: trying to—to—Villain! [aside to Grime] but nothing can put him in a passion—Oh! curse you! [aside to Grime.] nothing!

Don. The fient! Wow! but yeer a pauky Gilligapus!

Item. Do you want our good master, Mr. Donald?

Don. Aiblins yeer right, auld Clottie.

Item. He is gone out. Nothing but a joke, Mr. Donald: nothing else.

Don. [Aside.] Noo could I gi' him sic an a gowf o' the haffet!

Item. Can I—can my dear friend Mr. Grime—O, you thief! [aside to Grime] do you any service?

Don. Haud yeer blether, mon.

Item. Can we oblige you any way in the world?

Don. Yas.

Item. [Fawning.] How? how?

Don. Tak compassion o' the boodels o' yeer brother, Jack Ketch, and be yeer ain hangman! [Exit.]

Item. There, villain! you see what you have done.

Grime. Is it my fault? I tell you again, you had better be sweet-tempered. I shall say no more: you know my mind. [Going.]

Item. [Aside.] Oh! that I could poison him. [Aloud.]

Mr. Grime, Mr. Grime!

Grime. Well, Mr. Item?

Item. This quarrelling is very foolish.

Grime. Oh, ho!

Item. We are necessary to each other.

Grime. I know it.

Item. Your hand?

Grime. There.

Item. We are friends?

Grime. If you please.

Item. Well, well—[Aside.] D—n him! How I hate the dog—Concerning this Berkshire mortgage—

Grime. Ay?

Item. You shall have twenty per cent. on the premium.

Grime. That won't do.

Item. Thirty?

Grime. It won't do. Half; the full half.

Item. [Aside.] Hell take him! Well, my dear Grime, the half be it.

Grime. Together with my moiety of the thousand given with Joanna.

Item. Your—Hem! [Sighs.] You shall, you shall! Are you satisfied?

Grime. On those conditions.

Item. Where is the deed?

Grime. In that bag.

Item. Mordent is coming. I know he will, for I know he shall, sign. But that is not all.

Grime. What more?

Item. This d—d Scotchman will assuredly betray us to him; and Lady Anne's jointure prevents his being so entirely destitute as is necessary.

Grime. But how is that to be helped?

Item. Easily enough. You must convey information to her father and relations that he has a daughter.

Grime. Nay, but—

Item. Hush! Here he comes! I will give you my reasons and instructions when we are alone. Where is the deed?

Grime. Here, ready.—

Enter MORDENT.

Mor. [In anger.] What is the meaning, Mr. Item, that I see that upholsterer, and two other ill-looking followers with him, below?

Item. Nay, why ask me? why knit your brows at me? Can I coin?

Mor. Excuse me; I am a hunted bull, and butt at friends and foes.

Item. The insolent fellow insisted on taking possession; so, thinking you would not wish Lady Anne to know, I prevailed on him and the officer to remain in the hall, till I could speak to you. If I have done amiss, shew me in what.

Mor. No, no; I know your zeal. Why will you not advance two thousand pounds, for that and other immediate purposes, and delay signing, Mr. Grime? I ask only a day.

Item. Ay, Mr. Grime, why will you not?

Grime. [With great gravity.] Impossible

Item. Don't tell me; impossible, indeed! You ought to consent; it is your duty; nay, you shall consent.

Grime. I cannot; must have security.

Mor. Ha, ha, ha! Villain! Where is the deed?

Item. So, you will not, Mr. Grime? you will not?

Grime. I wish I could. But I am myself a borrower: the money is not my own.

Item. Hem!

Mor. Ha, ha, ha! D—n your rascally hypocrisy! Give me the pen.

Item. [Holding his arm.] Why, you will not sign, sir, will you?

Mor. Peace, fool! Cannot you see a wretch on the wheel, but that your bones too, must ache?

Item. [Mor. signs.] Ah! it is always thus: I may advise, but my advice is never followed.

Mor. [Seals.] "I deliver this as my act and deed." Here, implement of hell! I know your thirst, blood-hound! 'Tis ready-mixed destruction: take, quaff, and burst! Begone!

Item. [Seizing the deed.] Come, sir. My good master has sufficient reason to be angry with you. It was very unfriendly, sir, to refuse. You teach Mr. Mordent what he has to expect. [Aside.] All is now secure. [Exeunt Item and Grime.]

Enter DONALD, looking earnestly after them.

Don. Ha' ye signed? ha' ye signed?

Mor. Ask no question; yes.

Don. Weel, weel! Stark deed has nae remed. Twa wolves may worry ane sheep. I kam to tal ye that year glib gabbit steward, and his compeer, Grime, are two scoondrels.

Mor. Psha! Fool!

Don. I tell ye, they are twa d—d villains!

Mor. Grime, fellow—Grime—a paltry, gold-loving, ravenous rascal! But Item, a worthy man!

Don. He wordy! that fient! Marcy o' my soul! he is the prime cock deel o' the blackest pit o' hell! The malison curse catch 'em aw! 'Tis nae stick and stow sax minutes sin I heard aw their murgulied gab.

Mor. Hear?

Don. Yas, hear!

Mor. What did you hear?

Don. Item himsal confess that he had fletthered ye of aw yer estates; that Grime is nae nair but his flunkie; that it is his intantion to foreclose; that he has willfully neglected to pay himsal interest, for that he may claw ye according tul law; that there ha' been sham deeds; and that a plot is laid to felch Maister Cheveril of aw his walth.

Mor. Ha, ha, ha! You heard all this?

Don. Wi' my ain ears.

Mor. Ha, ha, ha! Item! Are you sure you heard this precious mischief?

Don. When did Donald tell ye a lie?

Mor. Ha, ha, ha! Item! I am glad on't! 'Tis right! 'tis consistent! 'tis delightful! Ha, ha, ha! Abraham's rejected prayer: not one honest man.

Don. Hoot awa! Nae onst? Nor ye nor the black clawed Lucifer himsal canna deny but that Donald is onest.

Mor. Item! Ha, ha, ha! Inestimable villain! And, I, too, thought him just and good! Oh! gull, gull, gull! Ha, ha, ha! [Recollecting.] Tell Mr. Clement I wish to speak with him.

Don. Noo the steed is stolen, ye wad steck the door. [Exit.]

Mor. Oh! the sharp-fanged wolf! Ha, ha, ha!

Enter LENNOX.

Len. Mordent! How now? How you look.

Mor. I am an ass; a most ineffable ass!

Len. What is the matter?

Mor. Ha, ha, ha! 'Tis proved upon me!

Len. Your mirth is of a strange kind.

Mor. The man whom I have trusted through life, ha, ha, ha! he whose rigid honesty—do you mark me? Ha, ha, ha! Honesty!

Len. Well?

Mor. Ha, ha, ha! whose honesty made me sometimes doubt the truth of the self-evident system of evil—ha, ha!—He's a rascal! A double-leagued hell-dog!

Len. Your steward?

Mor. Item. A deep, d—d, thorough-paced villain; that can bully, cajole, and curse—fawn, flatter, and felch. Ha, ha, ha!

Len. Be patient.

Mor. Oh, I am delighted! Ha, ha, ha!

Len. Be calm. You knew yourself to be in the power of a villain, and tis little matter whether his name be Grime or Item.

Mor. How? Ha, ha, ha! In a world of rascality, are not two rascals better than one?

Len. Nay, but attend to me. I want your help instantly, in Dover-street.

Mor. Dover-street?

Len. Yes.

Mor. It must not be.

Len. Eh! What's the freak now?

Mor. You can have no help of mine.

Len. Indeed, but I must!

Mor. I would not commit an injury on that girl, for worlds.

Len. Why, what conscientious mummery is this? You neglect your own child, and pretend to interest yourself for a stranger.

Mor. If the stranger be an angel of light, a beneficent being, why not?

Len. Beneficent! What, in this system of evil?

Mor. An exception to the rule. A rare exception.

Len. Like Item?

Mor. Psha! Hell!

Len. And may not your deserted daughter be equally an angel?

Mor. May she? If she should—I'll have no concern in the ruin of that girl.

Len. Harkye! Mordent, you are plotting.

Mor. I?

Len. No distress can cure you of your old propensities. You mean to trick me of her.

Mor. Ha, ha!

Len. 'Tis evident. Do you not affirm she cannot remain innocent in the house into which she is decoyed?

Mor. Granted.

Len. Marriage excepted, which would be madness, am I a man to treat her vilely?

Mor. Not worse than the malignity of fate ordains.

Len. Pooh! Cant! Cheveril, in the fervour of youth, is lunatic enough rather to marry than lose her.

Mor. Ay, ay; he is horn-mad to begin his career of wretchedness.

Len. And you, his guardian, from pretended pity to a stranger, will guide and spur him to the course?

Mor. Even so it is. Mischief here, mischief there; turn which way you will, mischief.

Len. Your word and honour are solemnly pledged. If you really wish the lovely creature's welfare, would preserve your ward, and prove your friendship and honest intentions, you will aid me.

Mor. Well, well, I am blind; I am but the tool of destiny; so be it.

Len. Your authority will oblige Mrs. Enfield to yield her to me.

Mor. No; my credit there is on the decline. Stratagem, stratagem!

Len. But how? What?

Mor. Convey a disguise to the girl.

Len. And so she will escape us all.

Mor. Escape! No, no; malevolence is the element of man, and I have an apt alacrity: I will instruct you. Come this way. Having her safe, you may post away with her to my commodious house in Park-lane. Fear not me. When Belial is busy, shall his progeny be idle?

Re-enter DONALD.

Don. Maister Clement is nae i' the hoose.

Mor. No matter!

Len. Come, come!

Mor. Oh! what an excellent gull is this image of the gods, this thing called man! [Exit with Len.]

Don. Ah! Wae's me! This poor lassy! I canna rest. I hirlie here, and gang hilyching there, till I'ze e'en ramfzeezled wi' the ripples. I wist nae where tul spier niest. My dool and thole will be my deeth! I' Gode's name, and wi' aw my hairt; for I'ze recht weary o' life!

Enter CHEVERIL in great haste, searching.

Don. Hoot, man! what is the bang?

Chev. My dear Donald, can you direct me where Mr. Item or Mr. Grime may be found?

Don. Donald diract ye tul sic an a pair o' scoondrels? Father Balzebub! but I wad at anes gar ye o'er-catch plague, pastilence, and famine.

Chev. 'Sdeath! they are both dead and buried, I believe; for they are neither here, nor there, nor anywhere else. Can you tell me where I can borrow a few thousands?

Don. Sir! Do ye tak me for a thief, or a steward?

Chev. I shall go mad. Oh! Donald, I left the most angelic girl your eyes ever beheld, at a wicked house. She must be friendless and fatherless, or she could not have been there.

Don. What's that ye red of angil and fatherless?

Chev. I am sure she is innocent. Vile as the house is, she is innocent.

Don. Wha? what she? what hoose?

Chev. I can't stay—I saw her first in the Green Park.

Don. Green Pairk?

Chev. She is now at Enfield's. A divine girl!

Don. What? Hoo? A menzfou' maikless lass?

Chev. Not twenty; yet with the penetration, wit, and understanding of the seven sages.

Don. The Green Pairk? Maircy misgi' me! Enfield's?

Chev. In Dover-street.

Don. I ken the place! A hoose o' hell! Gin it be—Quick, Donald, quick! [Exit, hastily.]

Chev. What is the matter with the honest soul? I don't know what sum that old harridan will require, but I can do nothing without money. I must have enough too, for I must make sure. I'll place her in safety and splendour: she shall be my queen.

Enter ITEM.

Ah! my dear, dear Item! I am the luckiest fellow on earth. I am in instant want of money.

Item. So am I: I have been in want of it all my life.

Chev. You must furnish me with ten thousand pounds.

Item. Ah! I wish I could.

Chev. 'Sblood! don't stand wishing, but give me the money.

Item. If my friend Grime were but here—

Chev. 'Sdeath and the devil, give me the money! I shall lose her! She'll be gone! I'll make over the seventeen thousand that is in Mordent's hands. I will, by heaven!—on the word and honour of a gentleman.

Item. The seventeen thousand?

Chev. I will.

Item. It is true, I have cash in hand; but not my own.

Chev. Zounds! never mind whose it is: let me have it.

Item. Why, if I could but manage the matter—I am but a poor old man, and it would be a little lift.

Chev. D—n your poverty and your cant!

Item. You are sure you understand—the seventeen thousand?

Chev. I tell you, yes.

Item. The risk will be very great.

Chev. Do you doubt my word?

Item. No, no; but—

Chev. But what?

Item. Your hand-writing on a stamp would be a memorandum.

Chev. You shall have it. Write a receipt for seventeen thousand; I'll sign it.

Item. [Takes out an account book, lays it down; then takes out another book, finds a stamp, and writes.] Ay, this is the thing. You remember the risk? otherwise, it might be thought—

Chev. Give it me, give it me! I have no time for thinking. [Signs.]

Item. I must borrow to replace it.

Chev. Will you come away, and let me have the money? Come, come, man. 'Sdeath! will you de-spach?

Enter CLEMENT.

Clem. Do you know where Mr. Mordent is, sir?

Item. No, sir. [Cheveril hurries Item off; who puts up his receipt in one book, but forgets the other.]

Clem. Mr. Mordent has asked for me; and, unfortunately, I cannot find him. I fear he has signed the mortgage. Oh, this uncle! Never was situation so excruciating as mine. Must I cast off all ties of blood, become his accuser, and, as the world would call it, betray my benefactor? Beside, what have I to reveal? my fears and my suspicions: unconnected facts, that can alarm, but not relieve. And who is it that I should thus impotently accuse? my own uncle. [Sees the book.] Ah! what have we here? As I live, his private account-book! The very thing he so carefully has concealed from all inspection. What shall I do? Deliver it to Mordent? What may be the consequences? Disgrace, infamy, and—Dreadful thought! I must not be rash. Hark! he's here. I must consider well. [Exit.]

Re-enter ITEM and CHEVERIL.—ITEM searches every place for his account-book.

Chev. You see there is no book here.

Item. I am certain I had it in my hand.

Chev. We have not quitted the room a minute; nobody can have been here since.

Item. We left my nephew here.

Chev. Well, if he has it, it is safe enough.

Item. I don't know that! If I have lost it, I shall never sleep again.

Chev. Come away; you have it somewhere, locked up safe.

Item. No; I laid it down here: I am positive of it.

Chev. Nay, but you see that is impossible. Come!

Item. If it be gone, I shall go mad.

Chev. Is it so valuable?

Item. I would not lose it for all I am worth in the world.

Chev. Come, come. What did it contain?

Item. My soul! my secrets!

Chev. Well, it certainly is not here. You must go! you shall go! I'll indemnify you.

Item. You can't.

Chev. I tell you, I will. [Pushing him off.] It is in your own room.

Item. [Turning back.] I hope so, I hope so! But my heart misgives me. Oh, lord! I'm undone!

Chev. [Pushing him.] Will you go?

Item. [Turning.] I am wretched!

Chev. [Pushing him again.] You won't?

Item. [Turning.] I'm ruined!

Chev. [Still pushing him.] Will you, or—

Item. [Turning.] I'm lost! I'm dead! I'm—

Chev. [Pushes him with more violence.] Furies and fire, begone. [Exeunt.

Enter MORDENT.

Mor. [Calls.] Mr. Cheveril! Mr. Cheveril! 'Tis impossible to stop him; but no matter, the plan cannot fail: Lennox, by this time, has her safe. Why, ay; I have advised, I have plotted, I have aided! And in what? why the ruin of an innocent; who, while I looked and listened to her, I would have lost my life to defend.

Enter Mrs. SARNET.

Mrs. S. My lady, sir, desires to know if she may have the honour to see you?

Mor. What is the matter now?

Mrs. S. Oh! as to that, let my lady speak; I have got ill-blood enough, because I would not take somebody's part. But that is all over.

Mor. What is over?

Mrs. S. I have told my lady, often and often, how a gentleman's proud spirit might be brought down; but she would never listen to my consultation before.

Mor. Before?

Mrs. S. "For, (said I,) my lady, you would be as merry as May, if you would but pluck up a spirit to take the earl's advice, and leave all base seducers to their own course."

Mor. You said so?

Mrs. S. Yes, I did! I should be no woman, if I would not take part with my sect! So we are all ready for moving; seeing as we are resolved. "For, (said I,) if he should fall at my feet, and cry his eyes out, I would not hear a word."

Mor. Indeed!

Mrs. S. Not but I have as tender a heart as another; but, then, I would sooner break his heart than my own.

Mor. What does this insolent gabble mean?

Mrs. S. Why, it means that my lady is coming to take her leave; and that, then, we shall be gone; and, then, it will be seen who will have most cause to repent.

Mor. [Aside.] Is it possible?

Mrs. S. I am sure, if I could have made folks happy, I would have done it with all my heart and soul: but the secret is out at last, and all is settled. Not but, for all I'm so glad, I can't say but I'm sorry in the main; for I'm sure some folks will be miserable enough; and, though they richly deserve it, one can't help feeling for them in one's heart. And so, sir, as, perhaps, I shall never see you no more, God bless you, and mend you [Exit.

Enter Lady ANNE.

Lady A. Mr. Mordent, I am driven upon an agonizing task, which a too painful sense of duty only could oblige me to execute.

Mor. Proceed, madam; apologies for feeling, or for inflicting pain, are quite unnecessary.

Lady A. Forgive me. Would it were to be avoided—You have a daughter?

Mor. Whence gain you that intelligence?

Lady A. From the Earl of Olderse.

Mor. And what is his authority?

Lady A. I know not: but I, it seems, have innocently been the cause that she is disowned and abandoned. Of such an act I cannot knowingly consent to be a moment guilty. The fatal period is come; that separation which I so much have dreaded, is inevitable.

Mor. And you support your fate with patience.

Lady A. Cruel man! do I deserve this parting reproach?

Mor. You deserve! Who shall dare insinuate it?

Lady A. Happy days and past endearments rush upon my mind with sensations unutterable!

Mor. I know, I know I am the vilest of men!

Lady A. Far from saying, far from thinking so, I take my full share of blame. How do I know that the fault is not wholly mine?

Mor. [Agitated.] Madam, I—I—I request I may be tortured by anything but your candour.

Lady A. I know I have lost the envied art of making myself intelligible to your feelings: and how? you once were happy, tender, and prone to smile at every look and word of mine. Of what fatal errors have I been guilty, that should have wrought this change?

Mor. Oh, exquisite! Continue! my nerves are strung.

Lady A. To despair of recovering those inestimable blessings was quite sufficient; but to be the cause of banishing a child from a father's arms and heart—to cast it an orphan on a tempestuous world! No; whatever my other mistakes may have been, of that no tongue shall accuse me.

Mor. Right; let the guilt be all my own.

Lady A. And now, I have one last request to make, which I conjure you, by all our former affection, not to deny.

Mor. To ask favours, where there is neither the power to grant, nor the desire to be thanked, is fruitless.

Lady A. I am but too well acquainted with the state of your affairs—

Mor. A humane motive for parting. [Aside.

Lady A. The settlements you made on me, in our early days of love, were ample. In the sincerity of affection, I vowed, if ever they should be necessary to your happiness, that moment they should again be your's.

Mor. [Greatly agitated.] Madam!

Lady A. Pardon and endure this proof of my fidelity. The deeds are now in Mr. Clement's possession: he will restore them to you.

Mor. [Indignantly.] Never!

Lady A. Stop! Beware of rashness! You are a father, and have a father's sacred duties to fulfil. Take home your daughter: make her what amends you can for the desertion of a parent's love.

Mor. 'Tis too much! Scorpions could not sting like this!

Lady A. On this last occasion, suffer a gleam of former kindness once more to warm your bosom. Money is a poor vehicle for the affections of the soul—a contemptible token of the love I have borne you; but, such as it is, for that love's sake, give it welcome. A cold adieu I cannot take. It freezes my very heart. From my soul, I ever have loved, and ever shall love. Had I a heaven of happiness to bestow, would you but deign to accept it from me, it should be your's. [Exit.

Mor. Why, so, so, so! It rages! it bursts! it is complete! Let fate or fiends increase the misery, if they can.

Enter DONALD.

Don. It's past! it's aw o'er! My forebodings are fulfilled!

Mor. [Alarmed.] Have you not found her yet?

Don. Yes, yes; I ha' found her.

Mor. Have you? Where?
Don. I've noo, indeed, a rasca' go-between! But what are ye?

Mor. You say you have found her?

Don. She is gone! she is ruined! Ye're a wratch; the most meeserable o' wratches!

Mor. Tormenting demon! What? who? where have you been?

Don. To Dover-street.

Mor. [Alarmed.] Dover—

Don. Tul the elritch limmer Enfield.

Mor. [With terror.] What do you say?

Don. I was too late. A maister secondrel, ee'n as wecked as her ain father, had decoyed her intul his net.

Mor. Decoyed?

Don. Lennox, yeer friend, yeer crony!

Mor. From Enfield's?

Don. Ha' not I toud ye?

Mor. Lennox? Dover-street? Joanna?

Don. Hear it, gin ye can and live: Joanna! yeer child! yeer guileless Joanna!

Mor. [Distractedly.] Misery of hell! And was that Joanna? that my child? Celestial creature! and I the pit-digger! [Pause.]

Don. Sir!—Sir!—Maister!

Mor. [Starting.] I the pander! I cast her shrieking on the bed of infamy, and chain her in the arms of lust! Her father do this? [Pause.]

Don. Maister!—Dear maister!—Maister Mordent!—Dear maister Mordent! Speak! I've forgi' ye! Why, maister! I've pray for ye! I've die for ye! I've forgi' ye!

Mor. Fly! Summon the servants! Arm yourselves! follow me to Park-lane. [Exit.]

Don. William! Sandy! Jock! [Exit, calling.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—The Green Park.

Enter MORDENT and LENNOX.

Mor. We are now in private.

Len. I am glad we are.

Mor. And now, sir, I insist on a clear and explicit answer. Where have you lodged Joanna?

Len. Nay, sir, where have you lodged Joanna?

Mor. Mr. Lennox, I will not be trifled with: where is she?

Len. Nor will I be trifled with, Mr. Mordent: I say where is she? The contrivance was your own. I know you. The moment you set your eyes on her, you began your cursed plots to secure her for yourself; and, when you found I would not give her up at your persuasion, you put them in practice, while you treacherously pretended to secure her to me. I tell you, I know you.

Mor. This will not serve, sir; it is all evasion.

Len. Ay, sir, it is evasion! cunning, base, d—d evasion! and I affirm she is in your possession.

Mor. Mr. Lennox, I am at this moment a determined and desperate man, and must be answered. Where is she?

Len. Sir, I am as determined and as desperate as yourself, and I say where is she? For you alone can tell.

Mor. 'Tis false!

Len. False?

Mor. Ay, false!

Len. [Going up to him.] He is the falsest of the false that dares whisper such a word.

Mor. Harkye, sir! I understand your meaning, and came purposely provided. [Draws a pair of pistols.] Take your choice: they are loaded.

Len. Oh! with all my heart! Come, sir!

Mor. [Approaching sternly.] Nigher!

Len. As high as you please.

Mor. [Placing himself.] Foot to foot!

Len. [Both presenting.] Muzzle to muzzle!

Mor. Why don't you fire?

Len. Why don't you unlock your pistol?

Mor. [After unlocking it.] There!

Len. Why do you turn it out of the line? [Pause.] I see your intention, Mordent; you are tired of life, and want me to murder you. D—n it, man, that is not treating your friend like a friend. Kill me if you will, but don't make me your assassin.

Mor. Nay, kill me, or tell me where you have lodged the wretched girl!

Len. Fiends seize me if I have lodged her anywhere, or know what is become of her.

Mor. Your behaviour tells me you are sincere; and to convince you at once that I am no less so, know—she is my daughter!

Len. Your daughter!

Mor. The honest, indefatigable Donald discovered her at Enfield's.

Len. Murder my friend, and debauch his daughter!

Mor. We are sad fellows. Again and again, it is a vile world!

Len. I'll seek it through with you to find her. Forgive me!

Mor. Would I could forgive myself!

Len. But it seems, then, she has escaped, and is, perhaps, in safety.

Mor. Oh! that she were! Donald used to meet her here, in the Green Park, about this time of the evening. [Listens.] I hear the sound of feet. 'Tis not a woman. Let us retire among the trees, and keep on the watch.

Enter CHEVERIL.

Chev. She is not here! she is gone! for ever gone! I shall never more set eyes on her! I'll fire that infernal Dover-street! I'll pistol Lennox! I may perambulate here till doomsday, and to no purpose. She would have been here, had she been free. Ay, ay; she is in thralldom; perhaps in the very gripe of vice. Furies!—Lennox is a liar! I'll cut his throat! I'll hack him piecemeal! I'll have her, or I'll have his heart! [Walks among the trees.]

Enter JOANNA, in man's clothes.

Joanna. Whither shall I run? where shall I hide? How fly the pursuits of wicked men, and women still more depraved? I have neither house, home, nor friend on earth; and the fortitude that can patiently endure is my only resource. What then? Have I not escaped the dens of vice? Oh, happiness! I have, I have! And rather than venture in them again, welcome hunger, welcome cold, welcome the bare ground, the biting air and the society of brute beasts.

Chev. [Advancing.] What can that youth want? Why is he watching here? [Walks round JOANNA.]

Joanna. As I live, the young gentleman I saw this morning. What reason can he have for being in this place? [Aside.]

Chev. He eyes me with curiosity. [Aside.]

Joanna. His intentions seemed good, for he first warned me against that wicked woman. [Aside.]

Chev. Who can say?—he may know her. He is a smart, handsome, dapper fellow: I don't like him.

Joanna. I am not now confined by walls and bolts:

there can be no danger. I'll speak. [Aside.] Pray, sir—

Chev. Well, sir?

Joanna. Have you seen a young person—

Chev. A lady?

Joanna. Yes.

Chev. With blue eyes, auburn hair, aquiline nose, ivory teeth, carnation lips, ravishing mouth, enchanting neck, a form divine, and an angel face?

Joanna. Have you seen her?

Chev. Are you acquainted with that lady?

Joanna. I am acquainted with a lady, but not an angel.

Chev. Ah! then it is not her. Perhaps you are her—her lover?

Joanna. Humpf! I—I love her.

Chev. You do? [Aside.] I'll be the death of him. And she loves you?

Joanna. Why—yes.

Chev. [Aside.] I'll put an end to him. Are you married?

Joanna. No.

Chev. You—you mean to marry her?

Joanna. No.

Chev. Is she, then, lost to virtue?

Joanna. Who dare suppose it?

Chev. Ay, who dare? I'll cut the villain's throat that dares.

Joanna. She has endured insult, constraint, and violence; but not guilt.

Chev. Guilt! no; not wilful guilt. Impossible! But, then, is she safe? is she safe?

Joanna. Dismayed by her family, exposed to the snares of vice, hopeless, helpless, not daring to approach the wicked haunts of men, she wanders forlorn and desolate, willing to suffer, disdaining to complain.

Chev. Tell me where! I will rescue, defend, protect, cherish, love, adore, die for her!

Joanna. Is your heart pure? Have you no selfish, dishonest purposes?

Chev. How came you to imagine, sir, that I, or any man, durst couple her and dishonesty, even in a thought?

Joanna. Meet me here to-morrow at ten.

Chev. You?

Joanna. You shall see her.

Chev. See her? Shall I?

Joanna. You shall.

Chev. My dear friend! I'll make your fortune! At nine?

Joanna. Ten.

Chev. Could not I see her to-night?

Joanna. To-morrow Joanna will meet you.

Chev. Joanna! Is that her dear name?

Joanna. It is.

Chev. Delightful sound! The sweet Joanna! the divine Joanna! My heart's best blood is not so precious as Joanna!

Joanna. But, pray, where do you live?

Chev. Joanna—In Portland-place.

Joanna. Your name?

Chev. Joanna—Cheveril: Hans Cheveril. Joanna—Be sure you don't forget.

Joanna. I'll be punctual. Who's here?

[Hides behind a tree.]

Chev. Joanna!—At eight did you say?—Where is he gone? Sir! Sir!

[Exit.]

Mor. [Appearing.] I heard the name repeated. [Aloud.] Who is it here that knows Joanna?

Joanna. [Appearing.] I do.

Mor. Sir! Do you? Well, and what? where? Is she safe?

Joanna. I hope so.

Mor. But where, sir, where?

Joanna. [Aside.] 'Tis Mr. Mordent. Why do you inquire?

Mor. For heaven's sake, sir, do not torment me by delay, but tell me where she is.

Joanna. I must not.

Mor. [Seizes her.] But, sir, I say you must, and shall.

Joanna. Sir, you mistake, if you suppose menaces can prevail.

Mor. Excuse me; I would give my right hand to know what it appears you can tell.

Joanna. I can tell nothing till I am first made acquainted with your true motives.

Mor. And will you inform me, then?

Joanna. Provided I am certain of their purity.

Mor. Know, then, that I pant for a sight of her once more, to do her the little justice that is yet in my power. Know, the wrongs she has received from me are irreparable, vile; such as could not have happened but in this worst of worlds. Know that I, her natural guardian, have been her actual persecutor; that I drove her to the abode of infamy; that I became the agent of her ruin, the plotter against her chastity, and that, when I had set the engines of darkness and hell at work to ensure her everlasting wretchedness, I then discovered—she was my daughter!

Joanna. Sir!—Your daughter? You—you my father?

Mor. How!

Joanna. [Falling at his feet.] Oh!

Mor. Can it be? My child? my Joanna? It is! it is!

Joanna. My father!

Mor. My child! And innocent?

Joanna. As your own wishes; or the word father should never have escaped my lips. This dress was the disguise conveyed to me, by which I effected my escape. I can suffer anything but dishonour.

Mor. A father! Oh! I do not deserve thee! Once again let me fold thee to my heart.

Len. [Without.] Zounds! sir!

Chev. [Without.] I insist, sir!

Joanna. I hear voices.

[They retire.]

Enter CHEVERIL and LENNOX.

Chev. Oh! for swords, daggers, pistols—

Mor. [To Joanna.] This way. [Exit with JOANNA.]

Len. Confound your impertinent freaks; they have stopped my mouth this half hour. I would have told you all I knew instantly, but for your insulting passion.

Chev. Did not you say you would not tell me where she is?

Len. I said I could not.

Chev. Why, then now!

Len. But I suspect I can tell more at present, if you will but hear.

Chev. 'Sdeath! then why don't you?

Len. Will you be silent? I had a glimpse of Mordent, this moment, in conversation with a youth.

Chev. Well?

Len. It was the identical dress I sent as a disguise to Joanna.

Chev. How!

Len. And I suspect that very youth to be Joanna herself.

Chev. [Recollecting.] By heaven, and so it is! In the possession of Mordent?

Len. Be patient; there is a secret. His claims supersede all others.

Chev. His claims! By every power of heaven and hell—

Len. Be patient, I tell you—she is his daughter!

Chev. Joanna! my sweet Joanna! his daughter?

Len. Even so.

Chev. His daughter! Huzza! My dear Lennox! [In ecstasy.] Huzza! Oh, lord! oh, lord! Huzza! His daughter! Huzza, huzza, huzza! [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The House of Mordent.

CLEMENT and Mrs. SARNET discovered.

Clem. Are you sure it was Mr. Mordent?

Mrs. S. I tell you, sir, I was on the watch, and opened the door myself. Take care, my dear, said he, to the sham gentleman-lady; and handed her in as lovingly—The monster! My lady is bewitched! she is fabricated! she can't quit the house. I am sure he must have nailed an invisible horse-shoe to the threshold.

Clem. But how do you know this pretended youth to be a woman?

Mrs. S. Did not I hear? I held the candle full flare in her face; it was a perfect picter! I never saw the like. So she is to brought home, truly! Such maguanimous impudence! But I'll go to my lady.

Clem. Be cautious; you may do mischief.

Mrs. S. I don't care; I am resolved to stabilate and confound facts. So, then, having a sufficient dearth of proofs, we shall sail off in the charut, and be properly received by the earl, the viscount, and the bishop; and be squired into the hall; and be kissed for joy; and shall swim up stairs into the bosom of the family. [Exit.]

Enter CHEVERIL, hastily.

Chev. Dear Clement, have you seen Mr. Mordent?

Clem. No; I am in search of him, on affairs of the utmost importance.

Chev. So am I.

Clem. No less than the recovery or total loss of his mortgaged lands.

Chev. How?

Clem. I am in great need of advice, and should be glad to consult you.

Chev. Consult! 'Sdeath! man, I am in a hurry. I cannot rest till I have found him.

Clem. Nay, but on the decision of the moment his ruin or safety depends.

Chev. Indeed! If so, my impatience must wait. What is it?

Clem. I hear footsteps. This way. [Exeunt.]

Enter MORDENT and JOANNA.

Mor. Yes, dear girl, your rare endowments surpass my hopes; and, convinced as I am, that beauty is destructive, and wisdom impotent, I joy to find you thus adorned.

Joanna. Wait to know me better. I fear you should prize me above my worth.

Mor. How shall I reward it? Fool that I am, madman that I have been!

Joanna. This is my rich reward. [Kissing him.]

Mor. I have told you, in part, my desperate situation. If Grime would but give honest evidence—But of that there is little hope.

Joanna. My greatest fear arises from what you have said of Lady Anne. I must not, will not be the cause of separation.

Mor. Let me do her justice; she is a miracle of forbearance. I have hated and spurned at the kindness I did not deserve. Her perseverance in good has been my astonishment and my torture.

Joanna. Oh! that I could see you reconciled! Oh! that I could gain the love of such a lady.

Mor. Of that, sweet girl, you are certain. Lennox is with her; and by this, she knows your story; and I am sure adores your virtue.

Lady A. [Without.] Where is she?

Mor. I hear her.

Enter LADY ANNE.

Lady A. Oh! noble girl! [Embraces Joanna.] Forgive this rude tumult of affection, which I cannot restrain.

Joanna. Is it possible?

Lady A. Mr. Mordent, you are now a millionfold more dear to me.

Mor. I cannot bear it!

Lady A. Will you be my daughter?

Joanna. Oh, madam!

Lady A. Will you?

Joanna. Adversity I could endure, but this unhopd-for tide of blessings overpowers me.

Mor. Oh! how I hate myself.

Lady A. And why? Can you be ignorant of the virtuous struggles which have caused the conflict you have felt? The strength of these sensations shew how fitted you are to be great and good.

Mor. To be a—I dare not think!

Lady A. Indeed you are wrong. Had I not been guilty of a thousand errors, you never would have had occasion for this self-reproach. Like cowards, we both have shunned inquiry. Let us be more courageous; let us affectionately communicate our mutual mistakes, and while we examine we shall correct the mind, expand the heart, and render ourselves dear to each other, and beneficent to the whole world.

Mor. Oh! shame, shame!

Lady A. Nay, my love—

Joanna. My dear father!

Mor. Well, well, I will endure existence a little longer, if it be but to hate myself.

Enter CHEVERIL, who runs to JOANNA.

Chev. My life! my soul! my precious Joanna!

Mor. They will persuade me presently that happiness is possible. [Aside.] You have cause, child, to thank Mr. Cheveril.

Joanna. Oh! yes; he has a heart of the noblest stamp.

Mor. Ay, all angels except myself! I am cast into the shade; a kind of demon, grinning in the dark.

Chev. Come, guardian, dismiss those sombre familiars; they have plagued you long enough. Clement is in eager search of you, to communicate secrets of the utmost importance concerning his uncle.

Mor. The villain!

Chev. Yes; he is below, foaming with rage, and accusing every servant in the house with having stolen his book. I hear him: pray, keep back, my sweet Joanna! but for a moment. [Exeunt.]

Enter ITEM

Item. 'Tis gone! 'tis lost! I am undone! I am murdered! I am betrayed! I shall be prosecuted, pilloried, fined, cast in damages, obliged to pay all, to refund all! All, all, all! I'll hang myself! I'll drown myself! I'll cut my throat! Mordent has got it! All my secrets, all my projects, all my rogueries —past, present, and to come! Oh! that I had never been born! Oh!

Enter CLEMENT.

Have you seen my book? Give it me! Where is my book?

Clem. What book?

Item. My account-book! my secrets! my soul! [Feels CLEMENT's coat pocket.] 'Tis here! I feel it!

Clem. Yes, sir; 'tis here! be pacified.

Item. I won't, I won't! I'll have it! Give it me! I'll swear a robbery! I'll have you hanged!

Clem. [Shews a book.] This book, sir, I consider as a sacred trust; part with it to you I must not.

Item. You shall part with it, villain! I'll have your soul! 'Tis mine! I'll have your heart! 'Tis mine! I will have it! [Striking CLEMENT.

Clem. You shall have heart, life and soul, first.

Item. [Kneels.] My dear nephew! my kind Clement! I'll supply all your wants; I'll pay all your debts; I'll never deny anything you ask; I'll make you my heir!

Clem. You are the agent of Mr. Mordent, whom, I fear, you've deeply wronged. I've a painful duty to perform; but justice must he obeyed: nothing must or shall bribe me to betray an injured man.

Item. I'll give you ten thousand pounds! I'll give you twenty! I'll give you fifty! Would you rob and ruin your uncle? would you see him hanged? [Seizes him.] Villain, I will have it! 'Tis mine! I will, I will!

Enter MORDENT, LADY ANNE, LENNOX, CLEMENT, GRIME, DONALD, CHEVERIL and JOANNA.

Mor. [With the book.] I am glad, Mr. Item, that your inattention, and your nephew's inflexible honesty, have afforded me the means of doing myself justice: that is all I require.

Len. Here is double testimony; your hand-writing and your agent.

Item. [To GRIME.] Have you impeached, then?

Grime. I am a villain, a rascal, a cut-throat!

Mor. Mr. Clement, your worth and virtue are beyond my praise.

Clem. If my conduct escape censure, it is more than I expect.

Mor. If it meet not retribution, all sense of justice is lost.

Joanna. [To DONALD.] My watchful guide! my never-failing friend!

Chev. Your hand, old boy! you and I must settle accounts. I am I know not how many score pounds a-year in your debt.

Mor. What, then, am I?

Joanna. And I?

Don. Hoot awa! Gin ye wad pay Donald, it mun nae be wi' yeer dirty siller; it mun be wi' yeer affactions.

Joanna. True, my noble protector!

[Kisses his hand.

Don. Why, ay, noo, that's a receipt in foo! It makes my hairt gi' sic an a bang!

Mor. Honest, worthy soul! and now to reconcile—

Chev. Come, come! make no speeches: I'll settle the business: I am the proper person. I have eight thousand a-year, and ten thousand in my pocket—Ten!—[to ITEM.] Is it ten or seventeen?

Item. Seventeen.

Chev. Joanna shall be queen of joy, pleasure, and happiness. Honesty, here, shall settle all his ill-gotten gains on his nephew; Lennox, as a bachelor's penance, shall marry his housemaid; you, guardian, shall change your system of evil for practical good; Lady Anne shall become more patient and kind—if she knows how; and old Moloch [to GRIME.] shall go and hang himself.

Len. Spoken like an oracle.

Chev. Why, then, toss up your caps! farewell to folly! long life to one and twenty! and mirth, health, and happiness to all!

Lady A. How strange are the vicissitudes of fortune! How have the storms of this memorable day risen, and increased even to horror! and now how bright the prospect, and how glowing the hope that it excites! Cherish it, kind friends, with your smiles; and, in the gentle slumbers of the night, let us joyfully dream that we still merit, and still obtain, your willing favour. [Exeunt.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The Hall of an hotel, with a spacious staircase.

Enter the Master and JENKINS meeting.

Master. Why, where are all the fellows, Jenkins? Don't you hear the bell No. 9?

Jenk. Tom is gone up to answer it, sir.

Master. Who occupies that apartment?

Jenk. The handsome youth and girl, that arrived late last night.

Master. Just as I was going to bed?

Jenk. Yes, sir.

Master. He is quite a boy.

Jenk. Razor has never robbed him of a hair.

Master. Some stripling, perhaps, that has run away with his mother's maid.

Jenk. They ordered separate beds.

Master. Well, see what they want.

Jenk. Yes, sir.

Master. And, harkye! be attentive the moment you hear Lord and Lady Vibrate, or their daughter, stirring. People of quality must never be neglected.

Jenk. Oh! no, sir. Here is Doctor Gosterman.

[Exit.

Enter Doctor GOSTERMAN.

Master. Good morrow, Doctor.

Doctor. Coot morgen, my tear friend. Is de Fiprate family fisible to see?

Master. Not yet.

Doctor. My lordtship und my latyship was sharge me to mit dem betime.

Master. You are a great favourite there, Doctor.

Doctor. Ya, sair. Dat I am eferyvere.

Master. You act in a double capacity: physician and privy-counsellor.

Doctor. Und I am as better in de von as in de oder.

Master. Why, ay, Doctor, you have a smooth pleasant manner.

Doctor. Ya, sair. Dat is my vay. I mix de syrup mit all my prescription.

Master. Ay, ay, you are a useful person.

Doctor. Ya, sair. Dat is my vay. I leave Yarmany, and com at Englandt mit little money, und great cunning in de art und de science. I shall af de essence, und de cream, und de balsam, und de syrup, und de electric, un de magnetic, und de mineral, und de vegefable, und de air, und de carse, und de sea, and all dat vas subject under my command. So I make de nation benefit, und myself rich. Dat is my vay.

Master. Yes; you can tickle the guineas into your pocket.

Doctor. Ya, sair. Dat is my vay.

Master. You have had many patients?

Doctor. Ya, sair. I af cure tousand und tousand. Dat is my vay.

Master. And how many have you killed, Doctor?

Doctor. Der teufel, sair! Kill! Ven my patient vas die, dat vas nature dat vas kill. Ven dey vas cure, dat vas Doctor Von Gostermans. Dat is my vay. No sair; Doctor Von Gostermans vas kill himself, dat oder people may live.

Master. How do you mean kill yourself, Doctor?

Doctor. Der teufel, sair! Vas I not be call here? Vas I not be call dere? Vas I not be call eferywhere? I af hundred und tousand patient dat die efery day till I vas com. So I vas drive to de city; und dere I vas meet my besten friend, de gout, de apoplexy, und de asthmatica: und den I vas drive to de inn of court, und de lawyer; und dere I vas find more of my besten friend; de hydropica, de rheumatica, und de paralytica.

Master. What, Doctor, the lawyers and inns of court paralytic?

Doctor. Ya, sair.

Master. I wish they were, with all my soul!

Doctor. Und den I vas drive und make my reverence mit de Lordt, und mit de Duke, und mit de Grandee; und dere I vas meet mosh oder of my besten friend; de hypochondriaca, de spasmodica, de hysteric, de marasma, de morbid affection, de tremor, und de mist before de eye.

Master. Morbid affections, tremors, und mists before de eyes, de diseases of the great?

Doctor. Ya, sair. Und dey vas grow vorse und vorse efery day.

Master. Well, well, they have chosen a skilful doctor.

Doctor. Ya, sair. I shall do all deir business, efery von. Dat is my vay. I shall af de essence, und de cream, und de balsam, und de syrup, und de electric, und de magnetic, und de mineral, und de vegetable, und de air, und de earse, und de sea, und all dat vas subject under my command. Dat is my vay. Bote dat is as noting at all. Ah! sair, my liebste; you vas my besten friend. You make me acquaint myself mit all de patient dat vas come to your house; and so I vas your besten friend, und I vas gif de physic for yourself, und de physic for your shile, und de physic for your vife.

Master. For which my wife will never more thank you, Doctor.

Doctor. No; your vife vas die, und you vas tank me yourself. So now you tell me: af you any new customer dat vas com?

Master. Yes; a youth, and a girl that looks like a waiting-maid, arrived late last night.

Doctor. Which it vas a person of grandeur?

Master. Oh! no; wholly unattended.

Doctor. Ah, ha! Which it vas a lofing couple, den?

Master. It seems not.

Doctor. A poy and a vaiting-vomans! Dere shall be someting mystery in dat.

Master. So I think. Here comes de girl.

Doctor. Ah, ha! Let me do. I shall talk to her. I shall begin by make acquaintance mit her.

Enter Lucy.

Lucy. Pray, sir, desire de waiter to make haste with breakfast.

Master. Here, Jenkins! Breakfast to No. 9. Be quick.

Jenk. [Without.] Yes, sir.

Master. Tea or coffee, madam?

Lucy. Tea.

Doctor. How do you do, my tear? You vas pretty young frau; fery pretty girl, my tear. Perhaps you vas stranger, my tear?

Lucy. Perhaps I am.

Doctor. Ah! Vat is your name, my tear?

Lucy. That which my godmother gave me.

Doctor. Your mastair af made de long journey, my tear.

Lucy. Has he?

Doctor. From vat country you com, my tear?

Lucy. Hem!

Doctor. I ask, from vat country you com, my tear?

Lucy. Ask again.

Doctor. From de town of—eh!

Lucy. Ay. How do you call it?

Doctor. Dat is vat I vant you shall tell.

Lucy. I see you do.

Doctor. Your mastair is fery young, my tear.

Lucy. Thank you, sir.

Doctor. For vat you tank me?

Lucy. For your news.

Doctor. Ah, ha! You are fery vitty and pretty, my tear.

Lucy. More news. Thank you again.

Doctor. Vat vas you call de young yentleman's name?

Lucy. I will ask, and send you word.

Doctor. How long shall he be stay in town?

Lucy. Till he goes into de country.

Doctor. Vat is your capacity, my tear?

Lucy. Like your's, little enough.

Doctor. You not understandt me, my tear. Vat is your post, your office?

Lucy. To answer rude questions.

Doctor. Your mastair is a man of family?

Lucy. Yes. He had a father and mother, and uncles and aunts.

Doctor. Und tey vas tead?

Lucy. I am not a tombstone.

Doctor. Com, com, my tear, let you make me answer.

Lucy. Anan!

Enter Waiter.

Waiter. Here is the breakfast, madam.

Lucy. Take it up stairs. [Exit with Waiter.]

Doctor. Der teufel! A cunning yipsey! She has make me raise my curiosity. My tear! My tear! Com pack, my tear!

Re-enter Lucy.

Do my compliment to your mastair, und I shall make me mosh happy if I shall af de honneur to make me acquaintance mit him. My name is call Docteur Von Gostermans. I shall af de essence, und de cream, und de balsam, und de syrup, und de electric, und de magnetic, und de mineral, und de vegetable, und de air, und de earse, und de sea, und all dat vas subject under my command. I shall af de best recommendation for de honest docteur dat vas possible. My Lordt und my Laty Fiprate vas my besten friend. I vas practice mit all de piggest family in de uniferse. Docteur Von Gostermans vas know eferypody; und eferypody vas know Docteur Von Gostermans. You tell him dat, my tear.

Lucy. Tell him that! I cannot remember half of it. Are you, sir, acquainted with Lord Vibrate's family?

Doctor. Ya, my tear. I vas make friendship mit dem more as many year.

Lucy. And do you know where they are?

Master. To be sure he does. They are in this—

Doctor. Hush! Silence your tongue! Dere is something mystery. [Aside to Master.] If you shall make me introduce to your mastair, my tear, I shall tell him eferyting und more as dat, my tear. Vill you, my tear?

Lucy. I will go and enquire.

Doctor. Thank you, my tear. You are fery pretty girl, my tear; fery vitty, pretty—Ah! you are so sly, cunning, little yipsey, my tear. Ah, ha!

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Chamber.

MARIA discovered, in man's clothes, with a letter in her hand, and walking with anxiety. The Waiter enters and leaves breakfast.

Maria. [Reading the letter.] "Dear sister,—The letter I now write is almost needless, for I shall leave Italy and follow it immediately; having at last obtained intelligence of your faithless lover. I am sorry to inform you that, in addition to your unpardonable wrongs, I have my own to vindicate. But I have threatened too long. You have heard of the Earl of Vibrate. He and his family are by this arrived in England; your betrayer accompanies them, and I am in close pursuit.—Paul Delaval.—In what will this end? Must they meet? Must they fight? Must one or both of them fall? Oh, horror! Shall I be the cause of murder? And whose blood is to be spilled? That of the most generous of brothers, or of the man on whom my first and last affections have been fixed. Is there no safety? no means?

Enter Lucy.

Lucy. Why, look here now, madam, you are letting the breakfast grow cold. You have been reading that letter again. I do believe I shall never get you to eat any more. Come now, pray, do take some of this French roll; and I'll pour out the tea. Do, pray do; pray do.

Maria. I cannot eat, Lucy; I am eaten. Terror and despair are devouring me.

Lucy. Dear, dear! What will all this come to? Did not you promise me that as soon as you had got safe to London in your disguise, you would be better?

Maria. Can it be? My kind, my gentle, my true-hearted George!

Lucy. True-hearted! No, no, madam, he was never true-hearted; or he could not so soon have changed, because his ill fortune changed to good. Everybody knows true love never changes.

Maria. What have I done? How have I offended? His caresses, his protestations, his tender endearments! Is then the man in whom my soul was wrapt, a vil—Oh!

Lucy. I declare, madam, if you take on this way, you will break my heart as well as your own. Besides, you forget all the while what you put on this dress and came up to London for.

Maria. Oh! no. It was, if possible, to prevent mischief—murder! They have never met; they do not know each other. But how shall I discover Sir George? Of whom shall I inquire?

Lucy. If you would but eat your breakfast, I do think I could put you in the way.

Maria. You?

Lucy. Yes.

Maria. By what means?

Lucy. Will you eat your breakfast, then?

Maria. I cannot eat. Speak.

Lucy. Why, I have just been talking to an outlandish comical Doctor, that says he is acquainted with Lord Vibrate.

Maria. Indeed! Where is this Doctor?

Lucy. He is waiting without; for I knew you would wish to speak to him.

Maria. Shew him in immediately.

Lucy. I'll tell him you are not well; which is but too true; though you must remember, madam, you are a man. So, dry your eyes, forget your misfortunes, and, there, cock your hat o' that fashion, and try to swagger a little, or you will be found out. You stand so like a statue, and look so pitiful! Lord! that's not the way. If you are timorous, and silent, and bashful, nobody on earth will take you for a youth of fortune and fashion. [Exit.]

Maria. If they should meet—Heavens! They must not.

Re-enter LUCY, with Doctor GOSTERMAN.

Lucy. My master is not very well: he eats neither breakfast, dinner, nor supper; and gets no sleep.

Doctor. He noder eat, noder drink, noder sleep! Dat is pad; fery pad. But dat is as noting at all, my tear. Let me do. You shall see presently, py and py, vat is my vay.

Maria. Your servant, sir.

Doctor. Sair, I vas your mosh oblishe fery omple saifrant, sair. My name is call Docteur Von Gostermans. I shall af de best recommendation for de honest Docteur dat vas possible. I vas practice mit all de piggest family in de uniferse. Docteur Von Gostermans is know eferybody; and eferybody is know Docteur Von Gostermans. De pretty coquine young frau tell me dat you not fery fell. You not eat, you not drink, you not sleep. Dat is pad; fery pad. Bote dat is as noting at all. You tell me de diagnostic and de prognostic of all vat you vill ail; and I shall make you prescribe for de anodyne, oder de epipastic, oder de balsanic, oder de narcotic, oder de diaphoretic, oder de expectoratic, oder de restoratif, oder de emulsif, oder de incisif; which is eferyting so shveet and so delectable as all vat is possible.

Maria. Your pardon, sir, but I wish to see you on business of another nature.

Doctor. Ah, ha! Something of de prifate affair? Dat is coot. I shall be as better for dat as for de oder. I vas know de vorl. I vas know eferybody, and eferybody vas know me. Dat is my vay.

Maria. Perhaps, then, you happen to know Sir George Versatile?

Doctor. Oh! der teufel, sair! Ya, ya. Sair Shorge is my besten friend. Which it vas six month dat he vas succeed to his title and estate; und den I vas make acquaintance mit him. Dat is my vay.

Maria. But he has been abroad since.

Doctor. Ya, sair. Ven he vas poor, he vas fall in lofe mit fery pretty young frau. Bote so soon as he vas become rish paronet, dat vas anoder ting. So, his relation und his friend vas sent him to make de gran tour.

Maria. And he was easily persuaded.

Doctor. Ya, sair. He vas vat you call fery coot nature; he vas alway comply.

Maria. Compliance with him is more than a weakness; I fear it is a vice.

Doctor. So, he vas make acquaintance mit Lordt and mit Lady Fiprate; und den he vas tink no more of de pretty young frau, because he vas fall in lofe mit anoder.

Maria. Sir! Another! What other?

Doctor. Vat you shall ail, sair? You shange couleur.

Maria. With whom has he fallen in love?

Doctor. Mit te taughter of Lordt Fiprate.

Maria. With Lady Jane?

Doctor. Ya, sair; mit Laty Shane. My Cot! sair, vat you shall ail? You not make fall in lofe yourself mit Laty Shane?

Maria. No, no. They are, no doubt, to be married.

Doctor. My Cot! sair, you so pale as death. My Cot! you shall faint.

Lucy. Faint, indeed! Bear up, madam. [Aside.] My master is too much of a man to faint. I'll run for a glass of water. [Exit.]

Maria. The charming Lady Jane! Where is she?

Doctor. My Lordt und my Laty Fiprate und my Laty Shane vas all in de house here.

Maria. In this house?

Doctor. Ya, sair.

Maria. And is Sir George here, too?

Doctor. He is cum und go alway sometime efery tay.

Maria. Are they to be married?

Doctor. My Cot! sair, you af de ague fit.

Maria. Are they to be married?

Doctor. My Laty Fiprate vas mosh incline to Sair Shorge; und my Lordt vas sometime mosh incline too; und den he vas sometime not mosh incline; und den he vas doubt; und den he vas do me de bonneur to consult mit me.

Maria. And what is your advice?

Doctor. My Lord Fiprate vas my besten friends, und I vas adifice dat he shall do all as vat he please: und Sair Shorge vas my besten friends, too, und I vas adifice dat he shall do all as vat he please; und my Laty Fiprate vas petter as my besten friends, und den I vas more adifice dat she shall do all as vat she please.

Maria. But Lady Jane had another lover.

Doctor. Ya, sair. Mr. Delafal vas make lofe mit her. He vas com from de East Indie, und he vas lofe her fery mosh; und she vas go mit de family to Italy, und my Laty Fiprate vas make acquaintance mit Sair Shorge, because he vas so mosh pleasant und coot humeur, und he say all as vat she say; which vas de vay to alway make agreeable.

Maria. Could you do me the favour to introduce me to Lady Jane?

Doctor. Ya, sair, I shall do all as vat shall make agreeable. Dat is my vay.

Re-enter LUCY, hastily.

Lucy. [Aside to MARIA.] Oh! madam, don't be terrified, but I declare I have spilled almost all the water.

Maria. What is the matter?

Lucy. He is come.

Maria. Who? Sir George?

Lucy. No; don't be frightened: Mr. Delaval, from abroad.

Maria. My brother! Heavens! Did he see you?

Lucy. No. I had a glimpse of him, and whisked away just as he stepped out of the post-chaise.

Maria. Should he meet me in this disguise, what will he say?

Lucy. Send away the Doctor, and let us lock ourselves up.

Maria. [To the Doctor.] I must beg you will excuse me, sir; but it is necessary, at present, I should be alone. With your permission I will see you again in the afternoon; and, in the meantime—

[Gives him money.]

Doctor. Oh! sair, I vas your mosh oblishe fery omple sairfant, sair. I shall make you mosh more fit; und den you shall tell me de diagnostic und de prognostic of all vat you vill ail.

Lucy. Yes, yes; another time.

Doctor. Und I shall af de essence, und de cream, und de balsam, und de syrup, und de electric, und de magnetic, und de mineral, und de vegetable, und de air, und de earse, und de sea, und all dat vas subject under my command.

Lucy. You have told us all that before.

Doctor. Und I shall make you prescribe for de anodyne, oder de epipastie, oder de balsamic, oder de soporific, oder de narcotic, oder de diaphoretic, oder de expectoratif, oder de restoratif, oder de emulsif, oder de incisif, which is eferyinging so shweet und delectable as all vat is possible.

Lucy. Was ever anything so provoking? [Aside.] Pray, sir, make haste.

Doctor. You shall make remembrance of Docteur Von Gostermans. I am practice mit all de piggest family in de uniferse. Sair, I vas your mosh oblishe fery omple sairfant, sair. [Ereunt.]

SCENE III.—The Hall of the Hotel.

Enter DELAVAL, WILLIAMS, Master, and JENKINS.

Del. Is the portmanteau safe?

Wil. Yes, sir.

Del. And the trunks?

Wil. All right.

Del. Have you paid the postillions?

Wil. Yes, sir.

Master. [To DEL.] This way, if you please, sir.—
Jenkins!

Jenk. Coming, sir.

Master. Shew the damask room. What will you please to have for breakfast, sir?

Del. Nothing.

Master. Sir?

Del. Anything.

Master. Bring tea, coffee, and new-laid eggs.

Jenk. In a minute, sir.

Del. [To WIL.] Observe the directions I gave you. Inquire immediately, and find if the Vibrate family be in town.

Wil. I will be careful, sir. Eh! Sir, sir!

Del. Well?

Wil. Look! Here comes Lord Vibrate's secretary.

Enter THOMPSON.

Del. Mr. Thompson!

Thom. Ah! Mr. Delaval, I am heartily glad to see you in England.

Del. Thank you, my good friend. But how is this? Where is the family? Where is Lady Jane?

Thom. I thought that would be your question. They are all in this house.

Del. Indeed!

Thom. I knew, when Lady Jane left Italy, your stay there would be short.

Del. Ay, ay; the follies and frenzies of the madman are visible to all eyes except his own.

Thom. I see you are dissatisfied.

Del. Tortured, till my thoughts and temper are so changed that I am almost as odious to myself as the world is become hateful to me.

Thom. I own you have some cause.

Del. Would my injuries were all! But there are other and still deeper stabs. It is not yet ten months since I returned from India; my heart how light, my eye how cheerful, and my hand prompt at any commendable act. I could then be moved to joy, and sorrow, and every sympathising passion. Smiles and mock courtesy passed current on me; the word of man and woman was taken on trust, and I lived in the sunshine of an open, unsuspecting soul. But I am now otherwise taught. I am changed. My better part is brutalized; and the wrongs that lie ranking here have stripped me of human affections, and made me almost savage.

Thom. What can be said? Patience is the—

Del. Talk not of patience: I must act. I may then, perhaps, inquire whether I have acted rightly. But I must first see Lady Jane, and Lord Vibrate.

Thom. Shall I inform his lordship of your arrival?

Del. By no means. Having injured, he may wish not to see me; and I would not afford him time to invent excuses, and avoid giving me a hearing. Though my wrongs must be endured, they shall be told.

Thom. I own they are great.

Del. Those that you know are heavy; yet, severe as the struggle would be, 'tis possible they might be hushed to rest; but there are others which blood only can obliterate; which can only sleep in death. Such is the road I must travel. Not long since nature was jocund, the azure heavens were bright, and pleasure was in every path, but now darkness, fathomless gulphs, guilty terrors, and all the dreadful phantoms of meditated desolation, lie before me. [Ereunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.

Lord VIBRATE discovered at a table, reading a book.

Lord V. The ancient sceptics doubted of everything, affirmed nothing, and kept the judgment always in suspense. All things, said they, are equally indifferent, uncertain, and indeterminate. The mind is never to assent to anything; that it may never be astonished, or disturbed, but enjoy a perfect calm. [Rises, with important wisdom in his looks.] Such were the maxims of Pyrrho, and his disciples; those renowned sages of antiquity! Well! And such, too, have been my maxims, practically. All my life have I been wavering, uncertain, and indeterminate. A sagacious sceptic without knowing it; and, as it were, by instinct. It was but lately I discovered what a wise man I am. And yet, it seems to me as if I were scarcely half wise enough, for I am told that I am to doubt of everything, which I find rather difficult. For example: that my wife Lady Vibrato is an extravagant, racketty, rantipole woman of fashion; can I doubt that? No. That she squanders my money, disturbs my peace, and contradicts for contradiction's sake; can I doubt that? No. Then, have I not a daughter to marry, a law-suit to begin, and a thousand perplexing affairs, so that I do not know which way to turn? Why, all this appears true to me; but the sceptics teach that appearances deceive, and that nothing is certain. I may be Lord Vibrato, or I may be the Grand Turk. These doctrines are prodigiously deep. [Considers.] But I must think of something else just now. I have a thousand things to do, and know as little where to begin as where they will end. Ay; all is uncertainty. [Rings.] Harry! Edward!

Enter JENKINS.

Jenk. Did your lordship call?

Lord V. Where are my servants? I want some of my plagues.

Jenk. They are ready at hand, my lord. Here is your lordship's secretary. [Exit.]

Enter MR. THOMPSON.

Lord V. What is the reason, Mr. Thompson, that nobody waits? Here am I, fretting myself to a mummy for the good of my family, while everybody about me is as drowsy as the court of common-council after dinner. Have they taken laudanum? Are they in a lethargy? Are they all dead?

Thom. If they were, your lordship would have the goodness to raise them.

Lord V. Don't you know how many people I have to see, and places I have to go to?

Thom. No, my lord.

Lord V. Why, did not I tell you?

Thom. Yes, my lord.

Lord V. Then how can you say you don't know?

Thom. Because I venture to presume, my lord, you do not know yourself.

Lord V. I am distracted with doubts. Harry!

Enter HARRY.

Harry. Did your lordship call?

Lord V. Where are you all? What are you about? I think you have lived long enough with me to know my way.

Harry. Yes, my lord; we know it very well.

Lord V. If you are not more attentive, I'll discharge you every one.

Harry. Oh! no; you will not do that. [Aside.]

Lord V. What are you muttering, sirrah?

Harry. Only, my lord, that we know your way.

Lord V. Order the coach at eleven.

Harry. Yes, my lord.

Lord V. No; order it at one.

Harry. Yes, my lord.

Lord V. Come back. Order it in ten minutes, and remember I am not at home. Come back. Don't order it at all.

Harry. Must visitors be admitted?

Lord V. Yes—No—I cannot tell. I will consider. Be within call. Thompson! [Exit Harry.]

Thom. My lord?

Lord V. Step to that picture-dealer. I will have the Guido. Yet, 'tis a great sum. No—it is a master-piece. I must have it. Why don't you go?

Thom. The picture is sold, my lord.

Lord V. Sold! Gone! Have I lost it? This is always the way. I am for ever disappointed. Harry!

Re-enter HARRY.

Harry. My lord.

Lord V. Did you go with the message to the stable-keeper, last night?

Harry. Yes, my lord.

Lord V. Let me know when he comes.

Harry. He will come no more, my lord.

Lord V. Come no more?

Harry. No, my lord.

Lord V. Why so?

Harry. He says you never know your own mind, my lord.

Lord V. Insolent fellow!

Harry. Doctor Gosterman is below.

Lord V. Admit him.—Stay.—I cannot see him yet. In half-an-hour. In ten minutes. By-and-by. [Exit Harry.] I must not waste my time in these trifles. I must attend to this law business. I wish I could determine. What am I to do, Thompson?

Thom. In what, my lord?

Lord V. The affair of the ejectment. If I once embroil myself in law, there will be no end; and if I do not, the consequences are still worse.

Thom. Then they are bad, indeed, my lord.

Lord V. 'Tis strange that I can come to no resolution on this subject.

Thom. [Aside.] Nor on any other.

Lord V. I must decide this very day, or the time will be elapsed.

Thom. A lawyer, I should suppose, my lord, would give you the best advice.

Lord V. How? Are you mad, Thompson? A lawyer give good advice?

Thom. The present possessor has held the estate twenty years.

Lord V. Not till to-morrow. I have time still to make my claim. How shall I act? Shall I never leave this hotel? Has the builder been here?

Thom. No, my lord.

Lord V. I can get nothing done. My whole life long I have been distracted with the multiplicity of my affairs.

Thom. And so, I am afraid, my lord, you always will be.

Lord V. Why so, sir?

Thom. Because your lordship undertakes so much, and does so little.

Lord V. So, he has not been here?

Thom. No, my lord.

Lord V. Nor the lawyers?

Thom. No, my lord.

Lord V. Nor my steward?

Thom. No, my lord.

Lord V. Nor Sir George?

Thom. No, my lord.

Lord V. Where is Lady Vibrate? Where is Lady Jane? Are they all in their graves? Have none of them shewn signs of life yet?

Thom. Not one. Your lordship is the only person in the family who begin your miseries so soon in a morning.

Lord V. The crosses and cares that prey upon me are enough to make any man on earth miserable.

Thom. Pardon me, my lord, but if you would care less, both yourself and your servants would sleep the more. My lady cares for nothing; and she can sleep when she is in bed; and sing, and dance, and laugh at your lordship's cares and fears when she is up.

Lord V. She will drive me mad.

Thom. Ah! here she is, as it were, for the purpose.

Lord V. Tell Harry to admit the Doctor—No; not just yet. Yes. In five minutes. I don't know when.

[Exit Thompson.]

Enter LADY VIBRATE.

Lady V. Upon my honour, my lord, you are the most insupportable person imaginable. You vociferate worse than the man who calls when my carriage stops the way. Is anybody dying? Is the house on fire? Is the world at an end?

Lord V. By the life your ladyship leads, I should suppose it is pretty near.

Lady V. You always give me such shocking headaches of a morning.

Lord V. You always give me such shocking heart-aches of an evening.

Lady V. Did not I send to you last night, to request your lordship would not disturb me?

Lord V. It has been your ladyship's amusement to disturb me all your life.

Lady V. Your lordship knows I love amusement.

Lord V. I have not slept a wink since.

Lady V. You had slept quite enough before. Pray, how long are we to remain in this hotel? Your lordship should remember, it is degrading for a man of rank to doze away life in the style of a colonel reduced to half-pay.

Lord V. Your ladyship should remember, it is degrading for a woman of rank to riot away life, and reduce her creditors to live without pay.

Lady V. Psha! That is the old story.

Lord V. But it is a very true story. It is a great misfortune that persons so opposite should pair.

Lady V. A terrible one, indeed. I am all gaiety and good humour; you are all turmoil and lamentation. I sing, laugh, and welcome pleasure wherever I find it; you take your lantern to look for misery which the sun itself cannot discover.

Lord V. I am overwhelmed by crosses and vexations; and you participate in none of them.

Lady V. No. Heaven be praised!

Lord V. Will you attend to me, my lady, for half-an-hour?

Lady V. Mercy! Attend to you for half-an-hour? You, my lord, may think proper to be as miserable as Job; but I am not Job's wife.

Lord V. I insist, Lady Vibrate, on a serious answer. How ought I to act? What should I do, in this law affair?

Lady V. I cannot tell what you ought to do; but I know what you will do.

Lord V. Do you? What?

Lady V. Nothing.

Lord V. The recovery of this property would enable me to give my daughter a portion suitable to her rank. If it be lost, she will be almost destitute of fortune.

Lady V. You should have thought of that before, my lord.

Lord V. Before! Why, I have thought of nothing else for years. I have asked everybody's advice.

Lady V. And followed nobody's.

Lord V. It shall be so. The ejectment shall be served: proceedings shall commence.

Lady V. Ha, ha, ha!

Lord V. I say they shall. I am determined.

Lady V. Ha, ha, ha! I know you, my lord.

Lord V. You know! I say they shall, if it be only to prove that you know nothing of the matter.

Lady V. Ha, ha, ha! A pleasant motive! But even that will not be strong enough.

Lord V. But it will, my lady.

Lady V. But it won't, my lord.

Enter Doctor GOSTERMAN.

Lord V. I say it will, my lady.

Lady V. I say it won't, my lord.

Doctor. Coot morgen, to my coot lordt und my coot laty.

Lord V. For heaven's sake, Doctor, stop my lady's tongue.

Lady V. For heaven's sake, Doctor, give my lord a quieting draught.

Doctor. I shall do eferyting as vat you desire, my coot lordt und my coot laty.

Lord V. Can nothing silence you, Lady Vibrate? Shall I never have a quiet hearing? I wanted to talk with you and the Doctor on a thousand things.

Lady V. Yes; you wish to have all the talk to yourself.

Lord V. On the marriage of our daughter.

Lady V. Oh! with all my heart. A marriage, at least, begins with music, feasting, and dancing. So say on.

Lord V. I am not yet determined in favour of Sir George.

Lady V. But I am. [While they speak, the Doctor gesticulates in favour of each.]

Lord V. Mr. Delaval is an objectionable gentleman; and he was the first suitor.

Lady V. Sir George can sing; Sir George can dance; Sir George has air, grace, fashion, and fortune.

Lord V. Psha! His best qualities are prudence, and attention to his own concerns. Ask the Doctor.

Doctor. He has fery mosh prudence, my coot lordt.

Lady V. Ha, ha, ha! I vow, Sir George is the most airy, thoughtless, pleasant person living, except myself.

Doctor. Ya, Sir Shorge is fery mosh pleasant; und my latyship is fery mosh more pleasant.

Lord V. Absurd! His humour is calm, cold, and serious.

Doctor. Fery serious, inteed.

Lady V. Whimsical, animated, delightful.

Doctor. Fery animate, fery tightful, upon my vordt.

Lord V. I never met a more discreet, sensible man in my life.

Lady V. True: for he thinks of nothing but his pleasures.

Lord V. His affairs, you mean.

Lady V. I tell you, my lord, he is exactly what I wish: the very soul of levity, whim, and laughter.

Lord V. I tell you, my lady, he is exactly like myself; prudent, and full of sage hesitation. He considers before he acts. Does he not, Doctor?

Doctor. Dat vas all yust as vat you say, my coot lordt.

Lady V. He never considers at all. Does he, Doctor?

Doctor. Dat vas all yust as vat you say, my coot laty.

Lord V. How so? We cannot both be right.

Doctor. You shall please to make me parton, my coot lordt. Sair Shorge vas all as vat you say; und all as vat my coot laty say. Mit my laty, he vas merry; mit my lordt he vas sad. Mit my laty he vas laugh, und vas sing, und vas tance; und he vas make melancholy, und misery, und vas do all dat shall make agréable mit my lordt.

Lord V. Is he so variable?

Doctor. Ya, he vas fery mosh comply; fery mosh coot humeur. He vas alway make agréable. Bote vas my lordship und my latyship know dat Mr. Delafal vas com from Italy?

Lady V. Come where? To England?

Doctor. He vas in de house below. I vas see und speak mit his falet.

Lord V. In this hotel?

Doctor. He vas yust arrife, und vas demandt dat he shall see my lordship; oder my latyship.

Lady V. I am very sorry he is here. He is a dun of the most disagreeable kind, and shall not see me; and I hope, my lord, you will no longer permit his addresses to Lady Jane. My word is given to Sir George. Come with me, Doctor. [Exit with the Doctor.]

Enter MR. DELAVAL.

Del. Pardon me, my lord, if I intrude with too little ceremony. Something, I hope, will be allowed to a mind much disturbed, and a heart deeply wounded, and impatient to ease its pangs.

Lord V. Which way deeply wounded, Mr. Delaval?

Del. Can your lordship ask? Was it not with your permission I paid my addresses to Lady Jane? And was the ardour of my affection or the extent of my hopes unknown?

Lord V. Why, I did permit, and I did not. I had my doubts.

Del. My visits were daily, their purpose was declared, and I should imagine I spoke more respectfully to say, that you permitted, than that you con- vined at them.

Lord V. True: but still I had my doubts.

Del. Those doubts have stung me to the soul; and I could wish you had expressed them more decidedly.

Lord V. Impossible! Doubts here, doubts there, doubts everywhere. No rational man can be decided on any point whatever. My doubts are my continual plagues; my whole life is consumed by them.

Del. It appears, my lord, you have conquered them on one subject.

Lord V. Ay, indeed. I wish to heaven I had! What subject is that?

Del. You have affianced your daughter to Sir George Versatile.

Lord V. Humph! Yes, and no. I have and I have not. I cannot determine. Sir George is a prudent man, his estate is large, and the Versatiles are an ancient race. But your family is ancient, you are prudent, and the wealth left by your uncle is at least equal. What can I say? What can I do? I don't know which to take nor which to refuse. I am everlastingly in these difficulties. I am harassed night and day by them; they are the nightmare, they sit upon my bosom, oppress me, suffocate me. I cannot act. I cannot move.

Del. This, my lord, may be an apology to yourself, but the consequence to me is misery. Your daughter lived in my heart; with her I had promised myself ages of happiness; and had cherished a passion, impatient, perhaps, but ardent and pure as her own thoughts. This passion your conduct authorized. My fortune, my life, my soul, were devoted to her. Mine was no light or wanton dalliance; nor did I expect a light and wanton conduct from the noble family of which your lordship is the head.

Lord V. What do you mean, Mr. Delaval? I told you I was undecided; and so I am still. My lady, you know, was never much your friend. Sir George is her favourite.

Del. And is Lady Jane equally changeable?

Lord V. I don't know. She is my daughter; and, judging by myself, I should suppose she is perplexed and doubtful. She never, I believe, declared in your favour.

Del. Not expressly, my lord. She referred me to time and you. 'Tis true, I flattered myself her affections were wholly mine. Should she prefer Sir George, or any other man, be my feelings what they will, I am then silenced. My heart could not be satisfied with cold compliance; oh! no; 'tis of a different stamp. I am told she is not at home. I hope, however, she will not have the cruelty to deny me a last interview: till then I take my leave. Only suffer me to remark that, had you discovered in me any secret vice, any defects dangerous to the happiness of the woman I adore, you then were justified in your present conduct. But, if you have no such accusation to prefer, I must do my feeling the violence to declare, I cannot but think it highly unworthy of a man of honour. [Exit.]

Lord V. Mr. Delaval! Insolent! Highly unworthy of a man of honour! I will challenge him. He shall find whether I am a man of honour, or no. I will challenge him. Harry!

Enter HARRY.

Harry. My lord.

Lord V. Run, tell that Mr. Delaval—Hold—Yes, fly; tell him—Stay; get me pen, ink, and paper: I will teach him to insult—No; I will not do him the honour to write. Order him back.

Harry. Order who, my lord?

Lord V. He shall give me satisfaction. In that, at least, I am determined. He shall give—And yet, what is satisfaction? Is it to be run through the body? shot through the head? A man may then, indeed, be said to be satisfied. I had forgotten my doubts on duelling. Tell my lady I wish to speak to her. No—

Harry. She is here, my lord.

[Exit.]

Enter LADY VIBRATE and DOCTOR GOSTERMAN.

Lady V. What is the matter, my lord? You seem to be even in a worse humour than usual.

Lord V. Mr. Delaval has treated me disrespectfully.

Lady V. Have not I a thousand times told you he is a disagreeable impertinent person?

Lord V. Why, God forgive me, but I really find myself of your ladyship's opinion. 'Tis a thing, I believe, that never happened before.

Lady V. And a thing, I believe, that will never happen again. I hope, my lord, you are now determined in favour of Sir George.

Lord V. Positively. Finally. I pledge my honour.

Lady V. You hear, Doctor?

Doctor. Ya, my coot laty; I vas hear.

Lord V. I say, I pledge my honour. I authorise you, my lady, to deliver that message to the baronet; and, that I may not have time to begin to doubt, I will instantly begone. [Exit.]

Lady V. This is fortunate.

Doctor. Oh! fery mosh fortunate; fery mosh.

Lady V. Had Mr. Delaval married my daughter, we should have had a continual sermon on reason, common sense, and good order. And these and such like antediluvian notions must have been introduced to our family.

Doctor. Ah! dat shall be pad; fery pad, intee, my coot lady.

Lady V. Now that Sir George is the man, the danger is over.

Doctor. Dat is creat plessing.

Lady V. But what, think you, are my daughter's thoughts? I fear she has a kind of esteem for Delaval. He was her first lover.

Doctor. Ya; she vas fery mosh esteem Mr. Delaval, my coot lady.

Lady V. But I observe she listens with great pleasure to the gay prattle of Sir George.

Doctor. Oh! fery creat, intee, my coot lady.

Lady V. We must second the rising passion; for we must get rid of that solemn sir.

Doctor. Dat vas all just as vat you say, my coot lady.

Lady V. Go to her, Doctor; convince her how intolerable it will be to have a husband whom she cannot quarrel with nor reproach. Paint, in the most lively colours, the stupid life she must lead with so reasonable a man.

Doctor. I shall do eferyting as vat shall make agréable, my coot lady. Dat is my vay. My laty, I vas your mosh oblishe fery omple saifrant, my laty. Ereunt.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The hall of the hotel.

LUCY discovered, speaking to the Master of the hotel.

Enter WILLIAMS and HARRY.

Wil. All you say is very true, Mr. Harry. Our masters suppose we have neither sense nor feeling; yet exact every thing that requires the five senses in perfection. They expect we should know their meaning before they open their lips, yet won't allow we have common understanding.

Harry. More shame for them. I warrant, for all that, we can game, run in debt, get in drink, and be as proud and domineering as they are for their lives.

Wil. Yes, yes; let them but change places, and they would soon find out we could rise to their vices, and they could sink to ours, with all the ease imaginable.

Harry. They have no such notion though, Mr. Williams.

Wil. That is their vanity, Mr. Harry. I have lived with Mr. Delaval ever since he returned from India; and though he is a good—[sees LUCY.—Eh! surely it must be her. Do you know that young woman, Mr. Harry?

Harry. No; but I have heard a strange story about her.

Wil. Ay, it is—What—I am sure it is Lucy.—What strange story have you heard?

ACT. DRAMA.—NOS. 69 & 70.

Harry. Why, then she came here late last night with a young gentleman, now above, pretending to be his waiting-maid.

Wil. With a gentleman! [Aside.] Oh! the jilt! Waiting-maid to a man? I never heard of such a thing.

Harry. Nor anybody else.

Wil. [Aside.] The deceitful hussey!

Harry. [Bell rings.] That's my lord's bell: I told you he is never easy. I must go.

Wil. [Aside.] I am glad of it. By all means, Mr. Harry. Good day! [Exit HARRY.] Run away with a gentleman! Oh!

Lucy. [Coming forward.] I declare, there is Mr. Williams.

Wil. [Aside.] What a fool was I to believe she loved me!

Lucy. [Aside.] How my heart beats! Dear, dear! I could wish to speak to him; but then, if any harm should come of it!

Wil. [Aside.] She shall not escape me.

Lucy. [Aside.] I should like to ask him how he does. But I must not betray my dear lady. [Going.]

Wil. [Placing himself in her way.] I beg pardou, madam.

Lucy. [Aside.] Does not he know me?

Wil. I thought I had seen you before; but I find I am mistaken.

Lucy. [Aside.] What does he mean?

Wil. You are very like a young woman I once knew.

Lucy. [Aside.] How angry he looks!

Wil. But she was a modest, pretty-behaved person; and not an arrant jilt.

Lucy. Who is a jilt, Mr. Williams?

Wil. One Lucy Langford, that I courted and promised to marry, but I know better now.

Lucy. You do, Mr. Williams?

Wil. I do, madam.

Lucy. It is very well, Mr. Williams; it is very well. Pray, let me go about my business.

Wil. Oh! to be sure. I have no right to stop you. Lucy. You have no right to speak to me as you do, Mr. Williams.

Wil. No, no. Ha, ha, ha! I dare say, I have not.

Lucy. No, you have not; and so I beg you will let me pass. My mistress—I mean—

Wil. Ay, ay; you mean your master.

Lucy. Do I, sir? Well, since you please to think so, so be it.

Wil. All the servants know it is a man. Would you deny it?

Lucy. I deny nothing, Mr. Williams; and, if you are minded to make this an excuse for being as treacherous as the rest of your sex, you are very welcome, Mr. Williams. I shall neither die nor cry at parting.

Wil. I dare say not. The young gentleman above stairs will comfort you.

Lucy. [Bursts into tears.] It is a base, false story. I have no young gentleman above stairs, nor below stairs neither, to comfort me; and you ought to know me better.

Wil. Did you or did you not come here last night?

Lucy. What of that?

Wil. With a young gentleman?

Lucy. No—Yes. Don't ask me such questions.

Wil. No. You are ashamed to answer them.

MARIA appears above.

Maria. Lucy!

Lucy. Ma'am—Sir? Coming, sir.

Wil. There, there! I will see what sort of a spark it is, however.

Lucy. [Struggling.] Be quiet, then. Keep away. You sha'n't.

Maria [Descending.] What is the matter? Who's molesting you?

Lucy. [To MARIA.] Go back, sir; go back.

Wil. I will see, I am determined.

DELAVAL appears at a room-door.

Del. Williams!

Wil. I tell you I will. [Looking at MARIA.] Eh! Bless me!

Maria. Why, Lucy—Mr. Williams!

Wil. My young lady, as I live!

Del. Why do not you answer, Williams?

Wil. Coming, sir.

Maria. Mercy! It is my brother's voice: what shall I do?

Lucy. Hide your face with your handkerchief, madam. Pull down your hat.

Maria. Pray, do not betray me, Mr. Williams.

Lucy. If you do, I will never speak to you as long as I have breath to draw.

Wil. How betray?

Lucy. Don't say you know us. Mind! Not for the world. [Erit with MARIA.]

Del. What is it you are about, Williams?

Wil. Nothing, sir.

Del. What do you mean by nothing? Whom were you wrangling with?

Wil. Me, sir? Wrangling, sir?

Del. Why are you so confused?

Wil. Why, sir, I—I committed a small mistake. I was asking—asking after a gentleman—that proved not to be a gentleman—that is, not—not the gentleman that I supposed.

Del. Why did you not come back with your message? Have you learnt the address of Sir George?

Wil. Yes, sir; he lives in Upper Grosvenor-street; his name is on the door.

Del. Well, be in the way. The day shall not pass before I see him. My own wrongs I could forgive. He, it seems, is preferred; and, perhaps, I have no right to complain: but for his injuries to my sister he shall render me a dear account. [Erit.]

Wil. What can be the reason of Miss Delaval's disguise?

Lucy. [Above.] Hist, hist! Mr. Williams!

Wil. Is it you? Oh! now I shall know. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.

Lady VIBRATE and Lady JANE discovered.

Lady V. Really, daughter, I cannot understand you.

Lady J. No wonder, madam; for I do not half understand myself.

Lady V. Is it possible you can hesitate? The good-humour and complaisance of Sir George might captivate any woman.

Lady J. They are very engaging, but they are dangerous.

Lady V. Which way?

Lady J. His character is too pliant. If others are merry, so is he; if they are sad, he is the same. Their joys and sorrows play upon his countenance; but, though they may slightly graze, they do not penetrate his heart. Even while he relieves, he scarcely feels them.

Lady V. Psha! He is a delightful man.

Lady J. I grant he does his utmost. But it is a folly to be the slave even of an endeavour to please.

Lady V. Ha, ha, ha! Upon my honour, you are a whimsical young lady. Afraid of marrying a man because of his assiduous endeavours to please! As if that were a husband's failing! You can prefer no such accusation against Mr. Delaval.

Lady J. I own he is of a very different character. Firm and inflexible, he imagines he makes virtue his rule and reason his guide.

Lady V. Firm, indeed! No, no: ferocious, obstinate, perverse. Sir George tries to be agreeable, and is successful; Mr. Delaval has no fear of offending, and does not miss his aim.

Lady J. Heaven help us! We all have faults and follies enough.

Lady V. Mr. Delaval never was approved by me; and this morning he has insulted your father.

Lady J. Insulted! How do you mean, madam? Mr. Delaval is abroad. Has he written?

Lady V. No. He is here.

Lady J. Here! And has he not thought proper to let me know of his arrival?

Lady V. No, no. The haughty gentleman has only thought proper to reproach Lord Vibrate for admitting the pretensions of Sir George. He is too proud to endure a competitor.

Lady J. Indeed! Such pride is the very way to ensure his competitor success. Insulted my father!

Lady V. I will leave you to judge how deeply, when I tell you that, fluctuating and undecided as Lord Vibrate always is, he was so offended that he pledged his honour in favour of Sir George.

Lady J. Insult my father, and not deign to let me know of his arrival?

Lady V. I hope, when Sir George comes, you will admit him.

Lady J. Certainly, madam; certainly.

Lady V. And that Mr. Delaval will be denied.

Lady J. It seems I need give myself no concern about that; the gentleman will not even take the trouble to send up his name.

Lady V. I am glad you feel it properly.

Lady J. Pardon me, madam, I will not condescend to feel it in the least. It shall not affect me; no, not for a moment. I had, indeed, conceived a very different opinion of Mr. Delaval. I am glad I have discovered my error before it is too late. I could not have believed it possible. But it shall not disturb me. It shall give me no uneasiness. I will keep myself perfectly cool and unconcerned, and—ungenerous, unfeeling man! [Erit.]

Lady V. She is delightfully piqued, and Sir George will succeed.

Sir G. [Without.] Are the ladies above?

Foot. [Without.] Yes, sir.

Lady V. I hear him. The very sound of his voice inspires mirth.

Enter SIR GEORGE VERSATILE.

Sir G. Ah! my dear lady.

Lady V. I am infinitely glad to see you, Sir George; you are come at a lucky moment.

Sir G. Is, then, my fate decided?

Lady V. It is, it is.

Sir G. Happy tidings!

Lady V. But first tell me—

Sir G. Anything—everything. Speak.

Lady V. Are you not of my opinion?

Sir G. To be sure I am. What is it?

Lady V. That pleasure is the business of life.

Sir G. Oh! beyond all doubt.

Lady V. That inspecting accounts—

Sir G. Is vulgar drudgery.

Lady V. And looking after our affairs—

Sir G. A vile loss of time.

Lady V. That care in the face denotes—

Sir G. The owner a foo.

Lady V. And that sorrow is a very ridiculous thing.

Sir G. Fit only to excite laughter.

Lady V. Why, then, Sir George, I am your friend.

Sir G. Ten thousand thousand thanks! But, what says my lord?

Lady V. Would you believe it? He consents, has pledged his honour, and sent the message by me.

Sir G. Rapture, enchantment!

Lady V. Yes. The reign of pleasure is about to begin.

Sir G. Light, free, and fantastic; dancing an eternal round.

Lady V. No domestic troubles—

Sir G. No grave looks!

Lady V. No serious thoughts—

Sir G. We will never think at all!

Lady V. No cares, no frowns—

Sir G. None, none, by heavens, none! It shall be spring and sunshine all the year.

Lady V. Then our appearance in public!

Sir G. Splendid, dazzling! Driving to the opera!

Lady V. Dressing for Ranelagh!

Sir G. A phaeton to-day.

Lady V. A curriole to-morrow.

Sir G. Dash over the downs of Piccadilly, descend the heights of St. James's, make the tour of Pall-mall, coast Whitehall—

Lady V. Back again to Bond-street—

Sir G. Scour the squares, thunder at the doors.

Lady V. How do you do? How do you do? How do you do?

Sir G. And away we rattle, till stone walls are but gliding shadows, and the whole world a galanty show.

Lady V. You are a charming man, Sir George; and Lady Jane is your's.

Sir G. My dear lady, your words inspire me: I am all air, spirit, soul! I tread the milky way, and step upon the stars.

Lady V. But you must not, before the marriage, talk thus to lord Vibrate. Silly man! He and you will never agree.

Sir G. Oh! yes, but we shall. I—I—I like his humour.

Lady V. Do you?

Sir G. Prodigiously. Whenever I am in his company, I am as grave as Good Friday.

Lady V. Indeed!

Sir G. He is full of sage reflection: so am I. Doubtful of everything: so am I. Anxious for the present, provident for the future: so am I. Overflowing with prudential maxims; sententious, sentimental, and solemn: so am I.

Lady V. You sentimental!

Sir G. As grace before meat in the mouth of an alderman.

Lady V. You solemn!

Sir G. As the black patch on a judge's wig.

Lady V. I must tell you, Sir George, I hate sentiment.

Sir G. Oh! so do I.

Lady V. Solemnity is all a farce.

Sir G. And those that act it buffoons. I know it.

Lady V. I love mirth, pleasantry—

Sir G. Humour, whim, wit, feasting, revelry, shout, song, dance, and joke. So do I, so do I, so do I!

Lady V. The very mention of duties and cares makes me splenetic.

Sir G. Curse catch duties! I hate them. Give me life, the wide world, the fair sun, and the free air.

Lady V. I say, give me midnight, the rattling of chariot-wheels, and the lighted flambeaux.

Sir G. Ay, a rout! A crash of coaches—a lane of footmen—a blazing staircase—a squeeze through the antichamber—card-tables—wax-lights—patent lamps—Bath stoves and suffocation! Oh, lord! oh, lord!

Lady V. Exquisite! You are a delightful man.

Sir G. Am I?

Lady V. You enter perfectly into all my ideas.

Sir G. Do I?

Lady V. And describe them even better than I myself can.

Sir G. Oh! my dear lady.

Lady V. Yes, you do.

Sir G. No, no.

Lady V. But, then—Ha, ha, ha!—That you should be able to fall in with my lord's absurdities so readily!

Sir G. Nothing more easy: I have one infallible rule to please all tempers. I learnt it of our friend the Doctor.

Lady V. Sure! What is that?

Sir G. I prove that everybody is always in the right.

Lady V. Prove my husband to be in the right. Do, if you can.

Sir G. My lord loves to be restless, and doubtful, and distressed; he delights in teasing and tormenting himself; and why should I interrupt his pleasures?

Lady V. Ha, ha, ha! Very true.

Sir G. I fall in with his humour. I shew him how rational it is; afford him new arguments of discontent, and encourage him to be miserable.

Lady V. Ha, ha, ha! Oh! you malicious devil!

Sir G. My dear lady, you mistake: I do it from pure compassion. It makes him happy. Every child delights in the squeaking of its own trumpet; and shall I have the cruelty to break the toy? A well-bred person is cautious never to contradict. It is become a very essential requisite to say ay and no in the most complying manner possible.

Lady V. Ah! Sir George, you are one of the dear inimitable few.

Sir G. Only a copy of your charming self.

Lady V. You and I must totally reform our stupid family. Amusement shall be our perpetual occupation.

Sir G. Day and night.

Lady V. We will commence with your marriage. It shall be a splendid one.

Sir G. A fête, a concert, a ball! The whole town shall ring with it.

Lady V. I hate a private wedding. A small select party is my aversion.

Sir G. Oh! nothing is so insipid! Pleasure cannot be calm.

Lady V. I wish to be seen and heard—

Sir G. And talked of, and paragraphed, and praised, and blamed, and admired, and envied, and laughed at, and imitated!

Lady V. I live but in a crowd.

Sir G. Give me hurry, noise, embarrassment—

Lady V. Confusion, disorder—

Sir G. Tumult, tempest, uproar, elbowing, squeezing, pressing, pushing, squeaking, squalling, fainting!

Lady V. Exquisite! transporting!

Sir G. You remember I receive masks this evening.

Lady V. Can I forget?

Sir G. You will be there?

Lady V. There! Ay; though I should come in my coffin.

Sir G. Ha, ha, ha! An excellent idea! I never yet saw a mask in the character of a memento mori.

Lady V. Ah! Turn about, and you will see a memento mori without a mask!

Sir G. What, my lord?

Lord V. [Without.] I cannot tell. I will consider, and send an answer.

Lady V. Here he comes, to interrupt our delightful dreams: a very antidote to mirth and pleasure. He will give you a full dose of the dismal. But you must stay and speak to him. Remember, his honour is pledged: insist upon that. I pity, but cannot relieve you. [Exit.

Enter Lord VIBRATE.

Lord V. I have been too sudden. I ought not to have pledged my honour. This is the consequence of hasty determination; of not doubting before we decide. Shall I never correct myself of that fault? [Sees Sir G. They look full at each other, till Sir G. catches the same dismal kind of countenance.] Ah! Sir George, here am I, brimful of anxiety and turmoil!

Sir G. Alas! man was born to trouble.

Lord V. Perplexed on every side; thwarted in every plan; no domestic comfort, no friend to grieve with me, no creature to share my miseries.

Sir G. Melancholy case!

Lord V. One crossing me, another blaming me, and my wife driving me mad!

Sir G. Distressing situation!

Lord V. My cares laughed at, my vigilance mocked, my sufferings insulted! And why? Because I am cautious! because I doubt! because I am provident! What is man without money?

Sir G. A fountain without water.

Lord V. A clock without a dial.

Sir G. What is it that buys respect, and honour, and power, and privilege, and houses, and lands, and wit, and beauty, and learning, and lords, and commons, and—

Lord V. Why none!—Then the manners of this dissipated age—

Sir G. They are truly shocking! They—they—they are absurd, ridiculous, odious, abominable.

Lord V. And to what do they lead?

Sir G. To everything that is horrid! To loss of peace, loss of property, loss of principle, loss of respect; bankruptcy, ruin, contempt, disease, and death!

Lord V. [Aside.] Yes, yes: he's the man! I do not think I repent. Heaven be praised! Sir George, you are a man of understanding; an economist. You will regulate your family and affairs to my heart's content.

Sir G. Oh! it shall be my study; my daily practice, my duty, my delight!

Lord V. You make me happy. And yet I cannot but wonder, being so rational a man, how you and my lady should agree so well.

Sir G. Dear, my lord, why so? Women are the most manageable good creatures upon earth.

Lord V. Women good?

Sir G. Indubitably; when they are pleased.

Lord V. So they say is the devil.

Sir G. The sweet angels deserve to be humoured. Their smiles are so enchanting! And, should they frown, who can be angry when we know the dear wayward sirens will only look the more bewitching, as soon as they are out of their pouts? It is so delightful to see the sun breaking from behind a cloud.

Lord V. Psha! When a woman begins to grow old—

Sir G. Hush! The sun—the sun never grows old. I grant you that, formerly, there used to be old women; but there are none now!

Lord V. Then you think me a fool for being wretched at my wife's thoughtlessness, caprice, and impertinence?

Sir G. No, I don't. Every body tells us that wives were born to be the plague of their husbands.

Lord V. And mine is the greatest of plagues!

Sir G. What is a wife's duty? To obey her lord and master. 'Tis her marriage promise, and the law binds her to it. She is the minister of his pleasures, the handmaid of his wants, his goods, his chattels, his vendible property.

Lord V. Ay; we find the husband may take the wife to market in a halter.

Sir G. In which I should hope he would afterwards hang himself!

Lord V. My lady thinks of nothing but revelling, and racketing, and turning the world upside down!

Sir G. 'Tis a great pity.

Lord V. Her tongue is my torment.

Sir G. The perpetual motion! It never ceases.

Lord V. Then how can you like her company?

Sir G. She is not my wife.

Lord V. No, or you would not be such good friends. Did she say anything concerning the marriage?

Sir G. Oh! yes. She delivered your lordship's kind message.

Lord V. What, that I had pledged my honour?

Sir G. Irrevocably.

Lord V. I was very rash. Hasty resolutions bring long repentance. She insists that the nuptials shall be public.

Sir G. Does she, indeed?

Lord V. For my part, I hate any display of vanity.

Sir G. It is extremely ridiculous! What would our ostentation, pomp, and magnificence be, but advertising ourselves to the world as fools and coxcombs?

Lord V. Is that a rational use of money?

Sir G. Should it not be applied to relieve the aged, comfort the poor, succour the distressed—

Lord V. What?

Sir G. Reward merit, encourage industry, and promote the public good?

Lord V. Promote a farce!

Sir G. Very true; the public good is a farce!

Lord V. The true use of money is to defend our rights—

Sir G. Revenge our wrongs, purchase for the present, provide for the future, secure power, buy friends, bid defiance to enemies, and lead the world in a string!

Lord V. Ay; now you talk sense. So, if I should consent, the wedding shall be private.

Sir G. Calm; tranquil.

Lord V. No feasting.

Sir G. No dancing, no music, no pantomime pleasures; but all silent, serene, pure, and undisturbed.

Lord V. We will just invite a select party.

Sir G. A chosen few.

Lord V. None but our real and sincere friends.

Sir G. And then we shall be sure the house will hold them.

Enter HARRY.

Harry. My lord, the builder desires to know if you will see him?

Lord V. I am coming. I will be with him in five minutes.

Harry. He says he can stay no longer.

Lord V. Then let him go. I will be with him presently.

Harry. The lawyers have sent word they are waiting for your lordship, at Counsellor Demur's chambers.

Lord V. Very well. There let them wait. The law is slow, and every man ought to be slow who is going to law. Come with me, Sir George; I have some papers to consult you upon.

Harry. The tradespeople, too, are below.

Lord V. Thus it is: I am eternally besieged; I never have a moment to myself.

Harry. This is the tenth time they have been here, by your lordship's own appointment.

Lord V. What of that?

Harry. They are become quite surly. They all abuse me: and some of them don't spare your lordship.

Lord V. Do you hear, Sir George?

Sir G. Oh, shocking! Your tradespeople are a sad unreasonable set. You cannot convince them that, if we were to keep our own appointments, be punctual in our payments, and know what we do want, and what we do not, we should no longer be persons of fashion.

Enter THOMPSON.

Thom. I am just come from the lawyers, my lord. The courts are sitting, their clients waiting; and if your lordship do not go immediately, they will be gone.

Lord V. Very true; and this last opportunity of serving an ejection will be lost. I have a thousand things to attend to. Would you be kind enough, Sir George, to go and—Hold! no; I don't know what to do! The estate is valuable: but law is damnable. I may lose the cause: it may cost even more than it is worth. Writs of error!—Brought into Chancery!—Carried up to the Lords!

Sir G. Then the stupidity of juries; the fictions of law; the chicanery of lawyers, their tricking, twisting, turning, lying, wrangling, browbeating, cajoling!

Lord V. Their frauds, collusions, perjuries, robberies—

Sir G. Ay! Detinue, replevin, plea, imparlance, replication, rejoinder, rebutter, surrejoinder, surrebutter, demurrer—

Lord V. Take breath! We ought both to demur: for it is the devil's dance, and both plaintiff and defendant are obliged to pay the piper. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The Apartments of Lord Vibrato.

Lady JANE, her Woman, Doctor GOSTERMAN, and a Footman, discovered.

Lady J. [To Footman.] Tell the young gentleman I wait his pleasure. [Exit Footman.] It is very singular! men, I believe, do not often travel attended by waiting-maids!

Doctor. Dat is de mystery, my Latty Shane.

Lady J. What can he want to say to me?

Doctor. Dat is de more mystery, my Latty Shane. He vas fery mosh young, und fery mosh handsome, und he has fery mosh make fall in love mit you, my Latty Shane.

Lady J. Nonsense!

Doctor. My Latty Shane vas so full of de beauty, dat you vas make sharm efery body, my Latty Shane! Und as your name vas make mention, my Latty Shane, he vas all so pale as deaths!

Lady J. [Aside to her Woman.] You are sure, you say, Mr. Delaval made inquiries, and sent up his name?

Woman. [Apart to Lady J.] La! my lady, could you think he would not? I saw him before ten o'clock; just as you sent me where I was kept so long. And, goodness! had you beheld what a taking he was in! I warrant you, my lady, he asked a hundred and a hundred questions in a breath, and all about you!

Lady J. Well, go now where I desired you.

Woman. Yes, my lady. [Exit.]

Enter a Footman, who introduces MARIA, and exit.

Maria. [Aside.] Why do I tremble thus?

Lady J. [To Doctor.] What a charming countenance!

Doctor. Oh! fery mosh sharming!

Lady J. How prepossessing his appearance!

Doctor. Ya; he vas fery mosh possess.

Re-enter Footman.

Foot. Sir George has sent this domino and mask to know if they meet your ladyship's approbation.

Lady J. Ha, ha, ha! Italian refinement, copied after some Venetian cicisbeo. Put them down.

Maria. [Aside Regarding the domino and mask.] Here his presents, and here his affections are now directed! How shall I support the scene?

Lady J. You wish, sir, to speak to me.

Maria. [Faltering.] Embarrassed by the liberty I have taken—

Lady J. Let me request you to wave all apology, and tell me which way I can oblige or serve you.

Maria. You are acquainted with Sir George—I— you—Pray pardon me. I am overcome. My spirits are so agitated—

Lady J. [Reaching a chain.] Sit down, Sir. You are unwell. Bless me! Doctor—

Doctor. [To Lady J.] I vas tell my Latty Shane vat it vas.—Here, sair, you smell mit dat elixir; und I shall make your neck-bandit tie loose und— [Going to loosen her neckcloth.]

Maria. [Alarmed.] Pray, forbear!

Doctor. [Aside. Imitates a woman.] Ah, ha! Der teufel! he vas a voman!

Lady J. Are you better?

Maria. A moment's air. [Goes to the window.]

Doctor. [Aside.] Dat vas de someting mystery!

Maria. [To Lady J.] If you will indulge me a few minutes in private—

Lady J. By all means. Doctor— [Whispers.]

Doctor. Ya, ya; my Latty Shane, I vas understand: und I vas do efery ting as vat shall make agrable. Dat is my vay.—Sair, I vas your mosh oblishe fery omple sairfant, sair. I vas understand. My Latty Shane, I vas your mosh oblishe fery omple sairfant, my Latty Shane.— [Aside.]— Ha, ha!

[Exit.]

Lady J. Take courage, sir.

Maria. I am unequal to the task. This disguise sits ill upon me.

Lady J. What disguise?

Maria. I am not what I seem. I—

Lady J. Speak!

Maria. I am a woman.

Lady J. Heavens!

Maria. Distressed—

Lady J. By poverty?

Maria. Oh! no; I come to claim your counsel.

Lady J. In what way?

Maria. To prevent mischief—the shedding of blood.

Lady J. The shedding of blood?

Sir G. [Without.] I will be with you again presently, my lady.

Maria. Mercy! it is Sir George! What shall I do? He must not see me! This way—[Puts on the domino and mask.] Aid me, dear lady, to conceal myself; and excuse conduct which I cannot now explain. [Retires.]

Lady J. Depend upon me, madam. [Aside.] This is as unaccountable as it is alarming!

Enter Sir GEORGE VERSATILE

Sir G. I come, my charming Lady Jane, flying, and full of business, to consult you on a thousand important affairs!

Lady J. Surely! What are they?

Sir G. Upon my soul, I don't know!

Lady J. Heyday!

Sir G. They have every one slipped my memory.

Lady J. Miraculous!

Sir G. Whenever I have the inexpressible pleasure of enjoying your smiles, I can think of nothing else.

Maria. [Aside.] Perjured man!

Lady J. My smiles! Ha, ha, ha! What if I should happen to frown?

Sir G. Impossible! no lowering clouds of discontent dare ever shade the heavenly brightness of your brow.

Maria. [Aside.] Oh!

Lady J. Very prettily said, upon my word. Where did you learn it?

Sir G. From you: 'tis pure inspiration, and you are my muse.

Lady J. No; 'tis a flight beyond me. I love plain prose.

Sir G. So do I. A mere common-place, matter-of-fact man, I! The weather; the time of the day; the history of where I dined last; the names and titles of the company; the dishes brought to table; the health, sickness, death, birth, and marriage, of my acquaintance, and such like toothpick topics, for me! I am as literal in my narratives as any town-crier, and repeat them as often.

Lady J. Yet I should wish to talk a little common sense.

Sir G. Oh! so should I, I assure you: I am for pros and cons, and whys and wherefores. Your Aristotles, and Platos, and Senecas, and Catos, are my delight; I honour their precepts, venerate their cogitations, and adore the length of their beards!—which luckily reminds me of the masquerade. Is my domino to your taste?

Lady J. Ha, ha, ha! Ancient sages, dominos, and taste!

Sir G. Did you not notice the colour?

Lady J. Oh! the taste of a domino is in its colour?

Sir G. Why, no; but there may be meaning.

Lady J. Explain.

Sir G. Mine is saffron.

Lady J. What of that?

Sir G. Cruel question!—Hymen and his robe.

Lady J. Oh! oh!

Maria. [Aside.] She is pleased with his perfidy.

Lady J. A very significant riddle, truly!

Maria. [Advances.] Are you so soon to be married, sir?

Sir G. Bless me! Lady Jane, what frolicsome gentleman is this? In masquerade so early, and my domino!

Maria. Permit me once more to ask, if you are soon to be married?

Sir G. Your question, sir, is improperly addressed. Put it, if you please, to that lady.

Maria. [Aside to Sir G.] Is that the lady to whom the question ought to be put?

Sir G. [Aside.] What does he mean? Will you indulge me, sir, by taking off that mask?

Maria. No, sir.

Sir G. 'Tis mine; and I am induced to claim it, from the great curiosity I have to see your face.

Maria. Do you not adore this lady?

Sir G. [Aside.] An odd question!—More than language can express.

Maria. [Aside.] Oh, falsehood!—Then I put myself under her protection.

Sir G. You know guardian angels when you see them. Pray, however, let us become acquainted.

Maria. For what reason?

Sir G. 'Twould gratify me. I should like you.

Maria. Oh! no.

Sir G. I certainly should. There is something of pathos and music in your voice, which—which—I never heard but one to equal it.

Maria. And whose voice was that?

Sir G. Oh! that—that was a voice so ingenuous, so affectionate, so fascinating—

Maria. But whose voice was it?

Lady J. [Aside.] What does this mean?

Maria. Tell me, and you shall see my face.

Lady J. Astonishing!

Sir G. I must not, I dare not—I shall never hear it more!

Maria. [Aside.] My feelings so overpower me, I shall betray myself.—[To Lady J.] Permit me to retire.

Lady J. You have alarmed and strangely moved me! I hope you will return?

Maria. Oh! yes; and most happy to have your permission.

Sir G. Why do they whisper?—[To MARIA, going.] Will you not let me know who you are?

Maria. No.

Sir G. Why?

Maria. Because—I am one you do not love.

Sir G. One I do not love!

Lady J. [Aside.] This is incomprehensible!

Re-enter MARIA, hastily.

Maria. [Apart to Lady J.] Oh, madam!

Lady J. What more is the matter?

Maria. For your life, do not mention the names of either of these gentlemen to the other!

Lady J. What gentlemen?

Maria. He is coming! They do not personally know each other: if they should, there would be murder! I dare not stay. For the love of God, beware! [Exit.]

Enter DELAVAL.

Sir G. [Calling.] Harkye! sir, come back! My domino! I shall want it in an hour or so.—Who have we here?

Del. [Agitated.] Your ladyship's very humble servant.

Lady J. Oh! How do you do? How do you do? [Aside.] Who can that lady be? She knows them both, it seems; and knows their rivalry! Her terror is contagious! Is their hatred so deadly? I shall certainly betray them to each other.

Del. [Aside.] What a strange behaviour she puts on! Does she affect to overlook me? [Seeing Sir GEORGE.] Who is this?

Lady J. Are you just arrived?

Del. This very morning: sooner, I fear, than—than was desired.

Lady J. Do you think so? [To Sir G.] Why don't you go to Lady Vibrate? She is waiting.

Sir G. 'Tis the fate of forty.

Lady J. What?

Sir G. To wait.—[Looking at DELAVAL.—Aside.] Who can this spark be, that she wants me gone?—Pray, what is the name of the youth that has made so free with my domino and mask?

Lady J. I really don't know.

Sir G. Don't know!

Lady J. I can't answer questions at present. I am flurried; out of humour—

Del. I fear, at my intrusion.

Lady J. I wish you had come at another time.

Del. I expected my visit would be unwelcome: let me request, however, to say a few words.

Lady J. Well, well; another time, I tell you: when I am alone.

Sir G. [Aside.] Oh! oh!

Del. They were meant for your private ear.

Sir G. [Aside.] Were they so?

Del. [Aside.] By her confusion and his manner, I suspect this to be the base betrayer of my sister's peace: the man, whose bare image makes my heart sick, and my blood recoil.

Lady J. [Aside.] Will neither of them go?—Why do you loiter here, Sir G.—[Coughs.]

Sir G. I must stay till the gentleman brings back my domino and mask, you know.—[Aside.] I'll not leave them.

Del. [Aside.] I am persuaded it is he.—Excuse me, sir; would you indulge me with the favour of your name?

Sir G. My name, sir! My name is—

Lady J. [Aside to Sir G.] Hush! don't tell it.

Sir G. [To Lady J.] Why not?

Lady J. I insist upon it!

Sir G. Nay, then—My name, sir, is a very pretty name. Pray, what is yours?

Del. [Aside.] Yes, yes; it must be he.—Have you any reason to be ashamed of it?

Sir G. Sir! Did you please to speak? Upon my honour, you are a very polite, pleasant person.

Del. [Aside.] If I should be mistaken!—I acknowledge, sir, there is but one man, whose name I do, but whose person I do not know, to whom that question would not have been rude in the extreme. Should you not be the man, I ask your pardon.

Sir G. Should I not! Sir, that I may be sure I am not, allow me to ask his name.

Del. His name is—

Lady J. [Screams.] Oh!

Del. Good heavens!

Sir G. What has happened?

Del. Are you ill?

Sir G. Is it cramp, or spasm?

Del. Surely, you have broken a blood-vessel!

Sir G. Shall I run for a physician?

Lady J. Instantly.

Sir G. I fly! Yet I must not leave you.

Lady J. No delay, if you value my life.

Del. Your life! I will go.

Lady J. [Detaining him.] No, no.

Sir G. I fly! I fly!

[Exit.]

Enter Lady JANE'S Woman.

Woman. Dear, my lady, what is the matter?

Lady J. Lead me directly to my own room.

Del. Shall I carry you?

Lady J. No; only give me your arm, and come with me. I want to talk to you. I wish to hear what you have to say.—[Aside to her Woman.] When Sir George comes back, tell him I am partly recovered, but must not be disturbed. It is my positive order.

Del. [Aside.] What does she whisper?

Lady J. Stay! The doctor may come in; but not Sir George. Mind, on your life! not Sir George.—Come, sir.

Del. [Aside.] This sudden change is mysterious.

Lady J. Come, come. [Exit, with DELAVAL.]

Woman. I purtest, it has put me in such a flutter, that I am quite all of a twitter!

Enter Sir GEORGE VERSATILE, followed by Doctor GOSTERMAN.

Sir G. Come along, Doctor! Make haste! Where is Lady Jane?

Woman. In her own room.

Sir G. Is she worse?

Woman. No, sir; much better. But she must not be disturbed.

Sir G. Nay, nay; I must see her.

Woman. Indeed, sir, I can let nobody in but the Doctor.

Sir G. Why so? Is not the gentleman I left here now with her?

Woman. I suppose so, sir.

Sir G. And I not admitted?

Woman. On no account whatever.

Sir G. He allowed, and I excluded! Indeed, I shall attend the Doctor.

Woman. Upon my honour, sir, you must not.

Sir G. Upon my honour, I will! My rival shall not escape me!

Doctor. Ha, ha! De rifal! Ha, ha, ha! Dat is coot! De young fer dat vas mit Laty Shane vas make you shealousy? Ha, ha, ha! Dat is coot! Bote dat is as noting at all. I shall tell you de something mystery. He vas no gentlemen. Ha, ha! He vas a voman!

Sir G. A woman!

Doctor. Ya, sair. He vas make acquaintance mit me, und I vas make acquaintance mit him; und he vas make faint, und I vas tie loose de neckbandt, und den, ha, ha! I vas discover de maus vas a voman!

Sir G. You astonish me!

Doctor. Ya, sair; I vas make astonish myself.

Woman. Won't you go to my lady, Doctor?

Doctor. Ya, my tear. Let me do. Laty Shane is fery pad; und I shall af de essence, und de cream, und de balsam, und de syrup, und de electric, und de magnetic, und de mineral, und de vegetable, und de air, und de earse, und de sea, und all, &c.

[Exit, talking.]

Sir G. I should never have suspected a woman! A stout, tall, robust figure! And for what purpose disguise herself? That may be worth inquiry. I will wait; and, if possible, have another look at the lady.

Enter Lord VIBRATE and Mr. THOMPSON.

Lord V. Two hundred and forty pounds! 'Tis a very large sum, Mr. Thompson.

Thom. So large, my lord, that I have no means of paying it. I must languish out my life in a prison.

Lord V. No, Mr. Thompson, no; you shall not do that. I will—And yet, two hundred—A prison—

I don't know what to say. If I pay this money for you, I shall but encourage all around me to run in debt.

Thom. It is a favour too great for me to hope.

Lord V. You are a worthy man, and a prison is a bad place. I—you—Pray, what is your opinion, Sir George? Is it not dangerous for a man to have the character of being charitable?

Sir G. No doubt, my lord. It is the very certain way for his house to be besieged by beggars.

Lord V. The master who pays the debts of one domestic, makes himself the debtor of all the rest.

Sir G. He changes a set of servants into a set of duns. He first encourages them to be extravagant, and then makes it incumbent upon himself to pay for their follies and vices: he not only bribes them to be idle and insolent, but to waste his property as well as their own.

Lord V. It is, as you say, a very serious case.—I—I am sorry for your misfortune, Mr. Thompson, very sorry; but really—

Sir G. Misfortune! What misfortune?

Lord V. He has foolishly been bound for his sister's husband, and must go to prison for the debt.

Sir G. To prison!

Lord V. You have shewn me how dangerous it would be for me to interfere.

Sir G. Very true, very true. He has lived with your lordship several years?

Lord V. He has; and I esteem him highly.

Sir G. A worthy man, whom it would be no disgrace to call your friend?

Lord V. None. Still, however, consequences must be weighed. I must take time to consider: 'tis folly to act in a hurry.

Sir G. Very true. Caution, caution. Is it a large sum?

Lord V. No less than two hundred and forty pounds!

Sir G. Caution is a very excellent thing—Two hundred and forty—A fine virtue—Two—I would advise your lordship to it by all means—hundred and forty—[Looks round.] Will you permit me just to write a short memorandum; a bit of a note? [Goes to a table.] I must send to a certain place. [Writes.] Excuse me a moment.

Lord V. What can be done in this affair, Mr. Thompson?

Thom. Nothing, my lord. I am resigned. When I assisted my brother, I did no more than my duty. Those who lock me up in a prison may, for aught I know, do theirs; yet, though they are at liberty, and I shall be confined, I would neither change duties nor hearts with them. [Going.]

Sir G. Harkye! harkye! Mr. Thompson, will you just desire this to be taken as it is directed? [Apart.] Don't say a word; 'tis a draft on my banker. Discharge your debt, and be silent.—You are very right, my lord; we cannot be too considerate, lest, by mistaken benevolence, we should encourage vice.

Thom. Sir George—My lord—

Sir G. Why now, will you not oblige me, Mr. Thompson? Pray, let that be delivered as it is directed. You, surely, will not deny me such a favour.—For you know, my lord, if we give—

Thom. Indeed, I—

Sir G. Will you be gone? Will you be gone? [Pushes him kindly off.—If we give without—without—

Lord V. Poor fellow! I suppose he is afraid of being taken.

Sir G. Oh! Is that it?—If we give, I say, with too—Psha! I have lost the thread of my argument.

Lord V. I must own, this is a dubious case. Perhaps I ought to pay the money. [Calls.] Mr. Thompson!—I don't think I ought to let him go to prison. What shall I do, Sir George?

Sir G. Whatever your lordship thinks best.

Lord V. But there is the difficulty.—Mr. Thompson! He is gone! How foolish this is now! [As he is going off.] Harry! Run after Mr. Thompson, and call him back. One would think a man going to prison, would, like me, be wise enough to doubt, and take time to consider of it. [Erit.]

Enter Lady VIBRATE.

Lady V. I assure you, Sir George, I am very angry. I have been waiting an age, expecting you would come and give your opinion on my masquerade dress.

Sir G. Why did not your ladyship put it on?

Lady V. On, indeed! It has been on and off twenty times. I have sent it to have some alteration. Besides, it is growing late; masks will be calling in on you, in their way to the Opera-house, and you not at home to receive them!

Sir G. I ask ten thousand pardons; but you know I am the most thoughtless creature on earth.

Lady V. So I would have you. Were you like the sober, punctual Mr. Delaval, I should hate you: but then—

Re-enter DELAVAL.

Here the wretch comes!

Aside.

Sir G. [Aside.] So, so! Now I shall interrogate the lady. She has a very masculine air! [DELAVAL bows to Lady V.] A tolerable bow that for a woman!

Lady V. [Aside.] He wishes, I suppose, to sermonize me; but I shall not give him an opportunity.—Are you coming, Sir George?

Del. [Aside.] Ha!

Sir G. I will follow your ladyship in a minute.

Del. [Aside.] I was right! it is he!

Sir G. [Aside.] She eyes me very ferociously!

Lady V. I shall just call in upon you; or, if not, we shall meet afterwards. I expect you to be very whimsical and satiric upon all my friends; so, pray, put on your best humour. Grave airs, you know, are my aversion. [Erit.]

Del. [Aside.] That was intended for me. Now for my gentleman.

Sir G. [Aside.] She really has a very fierce look! a kind of threatening physiognomy, and would make no bad grenadier!

Del. I understand your name is Sir George Versatile?

Sir G. [Aside.] A bass voice, too!—At your service, sir, or madam; I really cannot tell which.

Del. Cannot!

Sir G. No, I cannot, upon my soul! [Aside.] A devilish black chin!

Del. I have an account to settle with you, sir.

Sir G. Have you? [Aside.] What the plague can she mean?

Del. When can I find you at leisure, and alone?

Sir G. Alone?

Del. Yes, sir; alone.

Sir G. Must this account, then, be privately settled, madam?

Del. Madam!

Sir G. I beg your pardon, sir, since you prefer it.
Del. If you know me, sir, your insolence is but a confirmation of the baseness of your character!

Sir G. I beg a million of pardons; I really do not know you.

Del. Then, sir, when you do, you will find cause to be a little more serious.

Sir G. [Aside.] What a Joan of Arc it is! There is danger she should knock me down.

Del. Be pleased to name your time.

Sir G. [Aside.] Zounds! She insists upon a tête-à-tête!—I hope you will be kind enough to excuse me; but I am just now so pressed for time, that I have not a moment to spare. Company is waiting. I must begone to the masquerade. You, I presume, are for the same place, and are ready dressed. I am your most obedient—

Del. [Seizing him.] Sir, I insist upon your naming an hour, to-morrow; and an early one.

Sir G. Why, what the plague! Here must be some mistake! Permit me to ask, do you know Dr. Gosterman?

Del. Yes, sir.

Sir G. Was you not just now in danger of fainting?

Del. Faint! I faint!

Sir G. It would, I think, be a very extraordinary thing! But, so he told me; with other particulars.

Del. Absurd! Doctor Gosterman has not seen me for several months.

Sir G. He said, sir, you were a woman; and, perhaps, from that error I may have, unconsciously, provoked you to behaviour which would else have been rather strange. Have I given you any other offence?

Del. Yes, sir; a mortal one.

Sir G. Mortal!

Del. And mortal must be the atonement.

Sir G. If so, the sooner the better. Let it be immediately.

Del. No: I have serious concerns to settle, so have you. 'Tis time you should think of things very different from masquerading. Name your hour to-morrow morning; then, take an enemy's advice, retire to your closet, and make your will.

Sir G. To whom am I indebted for this high menace, and this haughty warning? Your name, sir?

Del. That you shall know when next we meet; not before.

Sir G. What age are you, sir?

Del. Age!

Sir G. Such peremptory heroes are not usually long-lived.

Del. You are right, sir; my life is probably doomed to be short. But this is trifling: name your hour.

Sir G. At ten to-morrow morning.

Del. The very time I could wish. I will be with you at your own house; inform you who I am; and then—

Sir G. So be it.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The House of Sir George Versatile.—A suit of apartments richly decorated.

Sir GEORGE VERSATILE, Lady VIBRATE, and numerous Masks, discovered.

Lady V. What is the matter with you, Sir George? You are suddenly become as dull, and almost as intolerable, as my lord himself.

Sir G. I own, I had something on my spirits; but it is gone. Your ladyship's vivacity is an antidote to splenetic fits.

Lady V. Oh! if you are subject to fits of the spleen, I renounce you.

Sir G. No, no! Heigho! Ha, ha, ha! Let me go merrily down the dance of life!

Lady V. Ay; or I will not be your partner.

Sir G. As for recollections, retrospective anxieties, and painful thoughts, I—I—I hate them. They shall not trouble me. For, if a man, you know, were to be sprung on a mine to-morrow,—ha, ha, ha!—it were folly to let that trouble him to-day.

Lady V. Sprung on a mine! You talk wildly.

Sir G. True. I am a wild, unaccountable non-descript. I am anything, everything, and soon may be—

Lady V. What?

Sir G. Nothing. Strange events are possible; and possible events are strange.

Lady V. Come, come; cast off this disagreeable humour, and join the masks.

Sir G. With all my heart. A mask is an excellent utensil, and may be worn with a naked face.

Lady V. [Retiring.] Why don't you come? you used to be all compliance.

Sir G. So I fear I shall always be. 'Tis my worst virtue. Call it a vice, if you please; and perhaps it is even then my worst.

Lady V. I really do not comprehend you.

Sir G. No wonder. Man is an incomprehensible animal! But no matter for that; we will be merry still, say I—at least, till to-morrow.

Lady V. [Joins the masks.] Yonder is Lady Jane.

Sir G. Nay, then, I am on the wing!

Maria. [Advancing.] Whither?

Sir G. Ah! Have I found you again! So much the better. I have been thinking of you this half hour.

Maria. Ay? That must have been a prodigious effort!

Sir G. What?

Maria. To think of one person for so great a length of time.

Sir G. True. Were you my bitterest enemy, you could not have uttered a more galling truth. I am glad I have met with you, however.

Maria. So am I. 'Tis my errand here.

Sir G. You now, I hope, will let me see your face?

Maria. I might, perhaps, were it but possible to see your heart.

Sir G. No, no; that cannot be: I have no heart.

Maria. I am sorry for it.

Sir G. So am I. But come, I wish to be better acquainted with you.

Maria. And I wish you to be better acquainted with yourself: you know not half your own good qualities.

Sir G. Ha, ha, ha! My good qualities! Heigho!

Maria. Your fame is gone abroad. Your gallantry, your free humour, your frolics in England and Italy, your—Apropos: I am told, Lady Jane is captivated by the ardour and delicacy of your passion! Is it true?

Sir G. Are you an inquisitor?

Maria. Are you afraid of inquisitors?

Sir G. Yes.

Maria. I believe you.

Sir G. You may. Keep me no longer in this suspense. Let me know who you are.

Maria. An old acquaintance.

Sir G. Of mine?

Maria. Of one who was formerly your friend.

Sir G. Whom do you mean?

Maria. You must have been a man of uncommon worth; for I have heard him bestow such praises upon you, that my heart has palpitated if your name was but mentioned.

Sir G. Of whom are you talking?

Maria. Lord! that you should be so forgetful!

That can only have happened since you became a person of fashion; for no man once remembered his friends better. It is true, they were then useful to you.

Sir G. Sir, I—Be warned! Pursue this no further.

Maria. You little suspected, at that time, you were on the eve of being a wealthy baronet. Oh, no! And to see how kind and grateful you were to those who loved you! No one would have believed you could so soon have become a perfect man of the mode; and, with so polite and easy an indifference, so entirely have forgotten all your old acquaintance! I dare say you scarcely remember the late Colonel Delaval.

Sir G. Sir!

Maria. His daughter, too, has utterly slipped your memory?

Sir G. I insist on knowing who you are!

Maria. How different it was when, your merit neglected, your spirits depressed, and your poverty despised, you groaned under the oppression of an unjust and selfish world! How did your drooping spirits revive by the fostering smiles of the man who first noticed you, took you to his house and heart, and adopted you as his son!—Poor Maria! Silly girl, to love as she did! Where is she?

Sir G. This is not to be endured!

Maria. What was her offence? You became a baronet! Ay; true, that was her crime. Yet, when your fortunes were low, it was not imputed to you as guilt.—

Sir G. [Aside.] D—n!

Maria. Are your new friends more affectionate than your old? Fortune smiles, and so do they. Poor Maria! Has Lady Jane ever heard her name? Will you invite her to your wedding? [Her voice continually faltering.] Do. She should have been your bride; then let her be your bride-maid. She is greatly altered—she will be less beautiful, now, than her fair rival. Her birth is not quite so high; but if a heart—a heart—a heart—

[Struggling with her feelings, sinks into Sir GEORGE'S arms, and her mask falls off.]

Sir G. Heaven and earth!—'Tis she!—Help!—'Tis Maria!—Who waits?

Enter Lady JANE.

Lady J. What is the matter?

Sir G. Help, help!—Salts, hartshorn, water!—Help!

Lady J. Bless me! this lady again.

Sir G. Is she, then, known to you?

Lady J. No. Who is she?

Sir G. Quick, quick!

Lady J. Nay, but tell me.

Sir G. I cannot, must not!

Lady J. Must not?

Sir G. Dare not!—She revives; and, to my confusion, will soon tell you herself. Maria! Are you better, Maria?

Maria. I am very faint.

Lady J. My carriage is at the door. Will you trust yourself to me?

Maria. Oh! yes. I am weak; very weak, and very foolish! But I shall not long disturb your happiness; I hope soon to be past that.

Sir G. Past! Oh! Maria, I have no utterance. Lady Jane, you will presently know of me what to know of yourself is—Oh!—No matter. Not, then, for my sake, but for pity, for the love of suffering virtue, be careful of this lady; whom, when you know, as soon you must, you will despise and abhor the lunatic, the wretch, that could—Maria—I—
[Exit.]

Enter DELAVAL.

Del. What is the matter? Any accident? Was not that Sir George?—Good God! my sister!

Lady J. Your sister!

Del. How comes this? Why this dress? And with that apostate! that wretch! Speak, Maria!

Maria. I cannot.

Lady J. Mr. Delaval, be more temperate. Your sister's spirits and health ought not to be trifled with by your violence. I do not know, though I think I guess, her story. I hope you have a brother's tenderness for her?

Del. That shall be shortly seen. A few hours will show how dear she is to my heart.

Lady J. I fear you cherish bad passions; such as I never can love, and never will share.

Del. Well, well, Lady Jane, that is not to be argued now. I am a man, and subject to the mistakes of man. There are feelings which can, and feelings which cannot be subdued. I must run my course, and take all consequences.

Maria. Oh, God! in what will they end?

Lady J. No more of this, Mr. Delaval. Come with me: lead your sister to my carriage. She shall be under my care. She can inspire those sympathies, which your too stubborn temper seems to despise.

Del. Indeed, indeed, you wrong me! [Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.

MARIA in her own dress, Lady JANE, and LUCY, discovered at breakfast. Footmen waiting.

Lady J. Remove those things. We have done.

[Exeunt Footmen.]

Maria. What is it o'clock?

Lady J. Just struck ten, ma'am.

Lucy. Lady Vibrate is a sad rake! She did not leave the masquerade till five this morning.

Maria. And Sir George not there!

Lady J. After the discovery of last night, could you suppose he would be seen revelling at such a place?

Maria. I dread another and more horrible cause! My brother!

Lady J. Mr. Delaval, you know, slept in this house.

Maria. But he has been out these two hours.

Lucy. What then, ma'am? Is not Mr. Williams on the watch? You know, ma'am, you may trust Mr. Williams with your life.

Maria. If all were safe, he would be back.

Lady J. Pray, calm your spirits.

Maria. Nay, nay—But Mr. Williams must have been here before this, if something fatal had not happened.

Lucy. I am sure, ma'am, you frighten me to death! Lady J. [Aside.] Her terrors are but too well founded!

Maria. [Footsteps without.] What noise is that?

Lucy. Bless me!

Lady J. See who it is.

Lucy. [After opening the door.] La! ma'am, I declare it is Mr. Williams.

Enter WILLIAMS.

Lucy. Well, Mr. Williams; everything is right; is not it? All is as it should be?

Wil. That is more than I know.

Maria. Why, then, the worst is past.

Wil. No, ma'am; I can't say that, either.

Lady J. Nay—But what news do you bring? Speak.

Wil. Why, you know, my master, last night, made enquiries how to find the chambers of Counsellor Demur; so, when he went out this morning, I observed your directions, and followed him. He went to the counsellor's in Lincoln's-inn, and there I left him, and hurried away to Sir George's, to inquire and hear all I could; though it was rather unlucky that I was not acquainted in the family.

Lady J. Did not you make use of my name?

Wil. Oh! yes, my lady. Besides, servants, your ladyship knows, are not so suspicious as their masters; they soon become friendly together; so, in five minutes, Sir George's valet and I were on as intimate a footing as we could wish.

Maria. And what did he say? Tell me.

Wil. Why, ma'am, he said, that Sir George did not leave his own house last night, after the fainting of the young gentleman.

Lucy. That was you, you know, ma'am.

Wil. And, what is more, that he did not go to bed; but walked up and down the room till daylight in the morning; and then called, I don't know how often, to warn the servants that he should not be at home to anybody whatever, except to a strange gentleman.

Maria. My brother!

Wil. Why, yes, ma'am; according to the description, it could be nobody else.

Lady J. And at what hour was Mr. Delaval to be there?

Wil. [Aside.] Zooks! I forgot to ask.—That—that, my lady, I did not learn. So, this being all the servants told me, I ran post haste to make my report to you.

Maria. The worst I foreboded will happen!

Lady J. What can be done?

Wil. Perhaps it will be better for me to go back to Sir George's; wait for the arrival of my master; and, if he should come, hasten away as fast as I can to inform you of it.

Lucy. That is a good thought, Mr. Williams. Is not it, madam? A very good thought, indeed! Don't you think it is, my lady?

Lady J. I know not what we can do better.

Maria. Nay, but while Williams is bringing us the intelligence, everything we most dread may happen.

Lucy. Dear! so it may.

Wil. Suppose, then, madam, I should stay at my post, and despatch Sir George's valet to you with the news?

Lucy. Well, that is the best thought of all! I am sure you will own it is, madam.

Maria. I know not what to think.

Lady J. We must resolve; or, while we are deliberating—

Maria. Merciful God! Run, Williams! Fly! Save my brother! Save Sir George!

Lady J. Succeed but in this, and command all we have to give.

Wil. I will do my best.

Lucy. That I am sure he will. [Ereunt.]

SCENE II.—An apartment in the House of Sir George Versatile.

SIR GEORGE VERSATILE discovered walking, and greatly agitated.

Sir G. [Looking at his watch.] He will soon be here. Five minutes, but five minutes, and then—[Walks again; throws himself on a sofa; takes up a book, throws it away, and then rises.] What is man's first duty? To be happy. Short-sighted fool! The happiness of this hour is the misery of the next! [Walks again, and looks at his watch.] What is life? A tissue of follies! inconsistencies! Joys that make reason weep, and sorrows at which wisdom smiles. Psha! There is not between ape and oyster so ridiculous or so wretched a creature as man! [Walks.] Oh, Maria!—[Looking at his watch.] I want but a few seconds: my watch, perhaps, is too fast. [Rings.]

Enter a Footman.

Sir G. Has nobody yet been here?

Foot. No, sir

Sir G. 'Tis the time to a minute. [Loud knocking.] Fly! If it be the person I have described, admit him. [Exit Footman.] Now let the thunder strike!

Enter DELAVAL.

Sir G. Good morning, sir!

Del. You recollect me?

Sir G. Perfectly.

Del. 'Tis well.

Sir G. I have been anxious for your coming. Your menace lives in my memory; and I shall be glad to know the name of him who has threatened such mortal enmity.

Del. A little patience will be necessary. I must preface my proceedings with a short story.

Sir G. I shall be all attention. Please to be seated. Wave ceremony, and to the subject. [They sit.]—Now, sir.

Del. About six years ago, a certain youth came up from college, poor, and unprotected. He was a scholar, pleasing in manners, warm and generous of temper, of a respectable family, and seemed to possess the germ of every virtue.

Sir G. Well, sir?

Del. Hear me no. My praises will not be tedious. Chance made him known to a man who desired to cherish his good qualities; and the purse, the experience, and the power of his benefactor, such as they were, he profited by to the utmost. Received as a son, he soon became dear to the family; but most dear to the daughter of his friend, whose tender age and glowing affections made her apt to admire the virtues she heard her father so ardently praise and encourage. You are uneasy?

Sir G. Be pleased to continue.

Del. The assiduities of the youth to gain her heart were unabating; and his pretensions, poor and unknown as he then was, were not rejected. The noble nature of his friend scorned to make his poverty his crime. Why do you bite your lip? Was it not generous?

Sir G. Sir!

Del. Was it not?

Sir G. Certainly! Nothing could—equal the—generosity.

Del. The health of his benefactor was declining fast; and the only thing desired of the youth was, that he should qualify himself for the cares of life by some profession; he, therefore, entered a student in the Temple; and the means were furnished by his protector, till the end was obtained. Was not this friendship?

Sir G. It was.

Del. The lady, almost a child when first he knew her, increased in grace and beauty faster than in years. Sweetness and smiles played upon her countenance. She was the delight of her friends, the admiration of the world, and the coveted of every eye. Lovers of fortune and fashion contended for her hand; but she had bestowed her heart; had bestowed it on a—Sit still, sir; I shall soon have done. I am coming to the point. Five years elapsed, during which the youth received every kindness friendship could afford, and every proof chaste affection had to give. These he returned with promises and protestations that seemed too vast for his heart, I would say for his tongue.—Are you unwell, sir?

Sir G. Go on with your tale.

Del. His benefactor, feeling the hand of death steal on, was anxious to see the two persons dearest to his heart happy before he expired; and the marriage was determined upon, the day fixed, and the friends of the family invited. The intended bridegroom appeared half frantic with his approaching bliss. Now, sir, mark his proceeding. In this short interval, by sudden and unexpected deaths, he becomes the heir to a title and large estate. Well! Does he not fly to the arms of his languishing friend? Does he not pour his new treasures and his transports into the lap of love? Coward and monster!—

Sir G. [Both starting up.] Sir.

Del. Viler than words can paint! Having robbed a family of honour, a friend of peace, and an angel of every human solace, he fled, like a thief, and concealed himself from immediate contempt and vengeance in a foreign country. But contempt and vengeance have at length overtaken him: they beset him: they face him at this instant. The friend he wronged is dead: but the son of that friend lives, and I am he.

Sir G. 'Tis as I thought!

[Aside.]

Del. You are—I will not defile my lips by telling you what you are.

Sir G. I own that what I have done—

Del. Forbear to interrupt me, sir. You have nothing to plead, and much to hear. First say; did my sister, by any improper conduct, levity of behaviour, or fault, or vice whatever, give you just cause to abandon her?

Sir G. None! none! Her purity is only exceeded by her love.

Del. Then, how, barbarian, how had you the heart to disgrace the family and endanger the life of a woman, whose sanctified affection would have embraced you in poverty, pestilence, or death; and who, had she possessed empires, would have bestowed them with an imperial affection?

Sir G. Sir, if you ask, have I committed errors?—call them crimes if you will—yes. If you demand, will you justify them?—no. If you require me to atone for them, here is my heart: you have wrongs to revenge, strike: and, if you can, inflict a pang greater than any it yet has known.

Del. Justice is not to be disarmed by being braved. To the question. It can be no part of your intention, and certainly not of mine, that you should marry my sister. Something very different must be done.

Sir G. What? Name it.

Del. You must give me an acknowledgment, written and signed by yourself, that you have basely and most dishonourably injured, insulted, and betrayed Maria Delaval: and this paper, immediately as I leave your house, I shall publish in every possible way, till my sister shall be so appeased, and honor so satiated, that vengeance itself shall cry, hold!

Sir G. Written by me! Published! No. I will sign no such paper.

Del. So I supposed; and the alternative follows. Here I am: nor will I quit you, go where you will, till you consent to retire with me to some place from which one of us shall never return. Should I be the victor,—flight, banishment from my native country, and the bitterest recollections of the villainies of man, must be the fate of me and my sister. If I fall,—you then may triumph, and she languish and die unrevenged. This, or the written acknowledgment. Consider, and choose.

Sir G. What can I answer? The paper you shall not have. My life you are welcome to: take it.

Del. Have you not brought disgrace enough on my family? Would you make me an assassin? My sister and my father loved you. Let me, if possible, feel some little return of respect for you.

Sir G. Having wronged your sister, would you have me murder the brother? Already the most guilty of men, would you make me worst of fiends? Though an enemy, be a generous one.

Del. Plausible sophist! The paper, sir: or man to man, and arm to arm, close the scene of my dishonour or your own. The written acknowledgment. Determine. [Walks away and views the pictures.]

Sir G. [Apart.] Why, ay! 'Tis come home! I have sought it, deserved it—'tis fallen, and the rock must crush the reptile! Then welcome ruin. The sword must decide. [Goes to take his sword, but stops.] The sword? What! Betray the sister and assassinate the brother? Oh, God! And such a brother! Stern, but noble-minded: indignant of injury, peerless in affection, and proud of a sister whom the world might worship; but whom I, worthless wretch, in levity and pride of heart, have abandoned. [Aloud.] Mr. Delaval!

Del. Have you resolved to sign?

Sir G. Hear me.

Del. The written acknowledgment!

Sir G. My behaviour to your sister is—what I cannot endure to name.—'Tis hateful! 'Tis infamous! My obligations to your most excellent father, the respect you have inspired me with, and my love for Maria—

Del. Insolent, insufferable meanness! The paper, sir!

Sir G. Angry though you are, Mr. Delaval, you must hear me. I say, my love, my adoration of Maria has but increased my guilt. It has made me dread her contempt. I durst not face the angel whom I had so deeply injured.

Del. Artifice! Evasion! Cowardice!—Your signature!

Sir G. [Snatching up his sword from the table.] You shall have it. Follow me.

Del. Fear me not.

Sir G. [Stopping short.] Hold, Mr. Delaval. Justice is on your side. If your firmness be not a savage spirit of revenge, if you do not thirst for blood, you will feel my only resource will be to fall on your sword. I cannot lift my arm against you.

Del. Then sign the acknowledgment.

Sir G. Can you, in the spirit even of an enemy, ask it? Do you not already despise me enough? Think for a moment: am I the only man that ever erred? Is it so wonderful, that a giddy youth, whose habitual failing was compliance, by sudden accident elevated to the pinnacle of fortune, surrounded by proud and selfish relations, of whose approbation I was vain; is it so strange, that I should be overpowered by their dictates, and yield to their entreaties? Your friendship or my death is now the only alternative. Suppose the latter: will it honour you among men? At the man of blood the heart of man revolts! Will it endure you to Maria? Kind, forgiving angel, and hateful to myself as her affection makes me, I last night found that affection still as strong, still as pure, as in the first hour of our infant loves. Lady Jane—

Del. Forbear to name her! 'Tis profanation from your lips! No more casuistry! No subterfuge! The paper!

Sir G. Can no motives—

Del. None!

Sir G. My future life—my soul, shall be devoted to Maria.

Del. The paper!

Sir G. Obdurate man! [Reflects a moment.] You shall have it. [Goes to the table to write, during which DELAVAL remains in deep thought, and much agitated.] Here, sir! since you will not be generous, let me be just. 'Tis proper I remove every taint of suspicion from the deeply wronged Maria. [Gives the paper.]

Del. [Reads with a faltering voice.] "I, GEORGE VERSATILE, once poor and dependent, since vain, fickle, and faithless, do, under my hand, acknowledge I have perfidiously—broken my pledged promise—to the most deserving, lovely, and—"

[Begins in much agitation to tear the paper.]

Sir G. Mr. Delaval!

Del. Damu it—I can't—I can't speak. Here! Here!

[Striking his bosom.]

Sir G. Mr. Delaval!

Del. My brother!

Sir G. [Falls on his neck.] Can it be? My friend!

Del. This stubborn temper—always in extremes! The tiger or the child.

Sir G. Oh, no! 'Twas not to be forgiven! Best of men!

Del. Well, well; we are friends.

Sir G. Everlastingly! brothers!

Del. Yes; brothers.

Enter WILLIAMS, hastily.

Wil. Sir!—

Del. How now?

Wil. I beg your pardon, but Lady Jane and your sister are below. They insist on coming up, and the servants are afraid to—

Sir G. Maria! Let us fly. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—The apartments of Lord VIBRATE.

Lady VIBRATE and Doctor GOSTERMAN discovered.

Doctor. Ya, my coot laty; dat vas efery vordt so true as vat I say. I vas discover it vas a voman; und Sair Shorge, und my Laty Shane, und de vaiting-vomans vas discover to me all as vat I say more.

Lady V. Ay, ay; that was the reason Sir George was not at the masquerade.

Doctor. Ya, my coot laty.

Lady V. I observed he was in a strange moody humour.

Doctor. My Lordt Fiprate vas fery mosh amazement, ven I vas make him discover all as vat I vas make discover mit my coot laty.

Lady V. Sir George has behaved very improperly.

Enter Lord VIBRATE.

Lord V. So, so, so! All I foreboded has come to pass: the day has slipped away, a new one is here, and every possibility of recovering the estate is gone.

Lady V. Ha, ha, ha!

Lord V. Do you laugh?

Lady V. Ha, ha, ha! I do indeed.

Lord V. Is your daughter's loss the subject of your birth?

Lady V. Ha, ha, ha! No, no; not her loss, but your positive determination to prove I did not know you. Ha, ha, ha! When I told you that even that motive would not be strong enough, how you stormed! "But it will, my lady. But it won't, my lord. I say it will, my lady. I say it won't, my lord." Ha, ha, ha! Will you believe that I know you now?

Lord V. What shall I do? Advise me, Doctor.

Doctor. I vas adfice, my coot lordt, dat you shall do eferyting as vat you please.

Lady V. Ay, think; ask advice. Ha, ha, ha! Now that you can do nothing, the inquiry will be very amusing.

Enter THOMPSON.

Lord V. Well, Thompson, what says Counsellor Demur? Has the time absolutely elapsed?

Thom. Absolutely, my lord.

Lady V. How wisely your lordship doubts before you decide! Eh! Doctor?

Thom. I have good news, nevertheless.

Lord V. Good news! Speak: of what kind?

Thom. The honesty of the opposite party.

Lord V. What, the holder of the land?

Thom. Yes, my lord.

Lord V. Which way? Explain.

Thom. He has engaged to Mr. Demur, I being present, that, if your lordship will only shew the legality of your late title, he will resign the estate.

Lord V. Is it possible?

Lady V. It cannot be: the last purchaser is in India.

Thom. The last purchaser is dead; and it has descended to one whom you, my lord and lady, little suspect to be its possessor.

Lord V. Who?

Lady V. Who?

Thom. Mr. Delaval.

Lady V. Mr. Delaval!

Lord V. Mr. Delaval resign it on exhibiting the legality of my title?

Thom. He will, my lord.

Lord V. Did he make no conditions?

Thom. None.

Lord V. What, did he not mention Lady Jane?

Thom. Her name did escape his lips; but rising passion, and, if I rightly read his heart, emotions of the most delicate sensibility, immediately closed them; as if he would not endure the love he bore her to be profaned by any the slightest semblance of barter and sale.

Lord V. What do you say to that, Lady Vibrate? What do you say to that?

Lady V. The proceeding is honourable, I own.

Lord V. Did I not always tell you, Mr. Delaval was a man of honour?

Lady V. You tell me, my lord? Why, you were going to challenge him yesterday morning.

Lord V. He is no such weathercock as your favourite, Sir George.

Lady V. You mistake: Sir George is no favourite of mine. Is he, Doctor?

Doctor. Dat vas all yust as vat you say, my coot laty.

Lord V. What, he did not come to make a buffoon of himself, for your diversion, at the masquerade last night? Eh! Doctor?

Doctor. Dat vas all yust as vat you say, my coot lordt.

Lady V. His perfidious treatment of Miss Delaval is unpardonable.

Doctor. Dat vas pad ; fery pad, inteet.

Lord V. Ay, ay ; he has plenty of words, but he has no heart.

Doctor. Dat is pad ; fery pad, inteet.

Thom. Pardon me, my lord ; Sir George may have committed mistakes, but to the goodness of his heart I am a witness.

Lady V. You ?

Lord V. How so ?

Thom. By his benevolence I was yesterday relieved from the disgrace and the horrors of a prison.

Lord V. Indeed !

Lady V. Which way ?

Thom. He paid a debt, which, had I been confined, I never could have discharged ; and, for this unexpected act of humanity, he would not suffer so much as my thanks.

Lord V. Did Sir George pay the two hundred and forty pounds, Mr. Thompson ?

Thom. The note, which he pretended to write and send by me, was a draft on his banker for three hundred.

Lord V. Why, he confirmed all my arguments against it ; and added twice as many of his own.

Doctor. Sair Shorge vas alway make agréable. Dat vas his vay.

Lady V. I own, nowever, I am still more surprised at the unexampled generosity of Mr. Delaval.

Enter WILLIAMS.

Where is your master, Mr. Williams ?

Wil. They are all coming, my lady.

Lady V. Who is coming ?

Wil. Mr. Delaval, Lady Jane, Miss Delaval, and Sir George. There has been sad work ; but it is all over and they are now so happy ! Here they are.

Enter Mr. DELAVAL leading Lady JANE, and Sir

GEORGE VERSATILE with MARIA, followed by LUCY.

Lord V. Mr. Delaval, I have great obligations to you. Thompson has been telling me of your disinterested equity.

Del. The obligation, my lord, was mine. Your lordship well knows that the first of obligations is to be just.

Lord V. Well, well ; but the estate you are so willing to resign will still, I hope, be your's.

Del. Nay, my lord.

Lord V. Dubious as all things are, that is a subject on which I protest I do not believe I shall ever have any doubts. What say you, Lady Jane ? But now I have my doubts again.

Lady J. What doubts, my lord ?

Lord V. I doubt whether you understand me ?

Lady J. Would your lordship teach me to dissemble ?

Lord V. Hum ! I doubt whether that would be much for your good.

Del. I hope Lady Vibrate will not oppose our union ?

Lady V. No, Mr. Delaval. Your last generous action has charmed me ; and Sir George—

Sir G. Has declined in your good opinion. But you cannot think so ill of me as I do of myself ; and if ever again I should recover my own self-respect, I shall be indebted for it to this best of men, and to this most incomparable and affectionate of women.

Maria. My present joys are inexpressible—

Del. Which my impetuous indignation threatened for ever to destroy. How dangerous are extremes ! Sometimes we doubt, and indecision is our bane ; at others, hurried away by the sudden impulse of passion, our course is marked with misery. One man is too compliant ; another too intractable. Yet happiness is the aim of all. Since, then, all are so liable to be misled, let gentle forbearance, indulgent thoughts, and a mild forgiving spirit, be ever held as the sacred duties of man to man. [Exeunt.]

MISS TURNBULL
MRS. TRIP.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—Sir Harry Portland's House.

CLARA and MELISSA discovered.

Clara. Well, my dear Melissa, you will be a happy woman.

Mel. I have no doubt of it. The attention which Mr. Osborne has shewn me was not that of a man eager to gain the affection of his mistress by humouring her caprices, praising her beauty, and flattering her follies. He is obliging and well-bred, but sincere; yet his disapprobation is delivered with a delicacy that makes it more agreeable than some people's compliments.

Clara. If time, instead of mellowing the strokes, should wear away this smooth varnish, and discover a harsh outline, should you not be offended at the severity of his manner, think you?

Mel. Believe me, dear Clara, there is no danger; for if there be one man on earth more capable of making a woman happy than another, it is Mr. Osborne.

Clara. It would be heresy in you, my dear, to hold any other opinion; and I have no doubt but you will continue orthodox after marriage.

Mel. Yes; I shall die in that faith.

Clara. Your brother, Sir Harry, I believe, is of your religion, too.

Mel. Entirely. The friendship of Mr. Osborne and my brother is as sincere as the commencement of it was remarkable. Have you ever heard their story?

Clara. Never. You know my acquaintance with your family is but just begun; but I hope you will not think them words of course when I assure you that, short as it is, I feel myself interested in its happiness.

Mel. Oh! I am sure you are sincere; I know it by sympathy. Well, then, I'll tell you: Harry and Osborne happened to be both abroad at the same time. As my brother was going to Italy, and passing through the mountainous part of Savoy, he came to a hollow way, among the rocks, surrounded by trees and caverns; all on a sudden, at a turning in the road, he beheld Osborne and his servants, attacked by six banditti, and ready to sink under their wounds.

Clara. Was Sir Harry alone? [Alarmed.]

Mel. He had his governor, two servants, and the postilion. My brother instantly leaped from his carriage, snatched up his sword and pistols, and flew to the place of action.

Clara. I declare you terrify me.

Mel. He was not seen by the combatants, and took care to advance so near before he fired, that he could not fail to do execution. He laid two of the banditti dead; and their companions, who had discharged their fire-arms, and beheld Sir Harry's people running to the attack and levelling their pieces, fled.

Clara. Thank you for that, my dear; you have given me breath.

Mel. The intrepidity with which Sir Harry saw Osborne defend himself, and the fortitude he discovered when he was informed (as it was at first believed) that his wounds were mortal, attached my brother so powerfully to him, that he resolved not to leave him in the hands of strangers, but anxiously waited while he was under cure.

Clara. This was a noble generosity.

Mel. It was; and Osborne was so sensible of it, that, though he was going the other way, he would return with Sir Harry into Italy; and their friendship has continued ever since.

Clara. But is it not strange, my dear, that he cannot detach his friend from the gaming-table?

Mel. My brother is infatuated. It is his greatest, almost his only weakness.

Clara. But the report is, that Mr. Osborne takes advantage of this weakness; and, in fact, has half ruined Sir Harry himself.

Mel. The report of malice, my dear.

Enter Sir HARRY PORTLAND and Mr. OSBORNE.

Sir Harry. Ladies, your obedient. Pray, when did you arrive in town, madam? [To CLARA.]

Clara. Yesterday. But how came you to quit Bath so suddenly, gentlemen?

Sir Harry. Mr. Osborne, madam, was horriblement ennuyé; dull as an alderman at church, or a fat lap-dog after dinner; thinking on marriage, Melissa, and other important matters; and so—

Osborne. Come, come, Sir Harry, this is mighty ingenious; but you were, at least, as willing to be gone as myself. The truth, madam, is, my modest friend here heard you were to set off in a day or two; and from that moment was continually giving hints, and asking me how I, as a lover, could exist so long without a sight of my mistress; and, in short, began, all at once, to talk so sympathetically about absence and ages, that I, who had made the excursion purely to oblige him, was, I acknowledge, exceeding happy to find I could oblige him by returning.

Clara. What say you to this, Sir Harry? But, I know your politeness: you will confess it all to be true, and begin to say civil things upon the subject, that will only put me to the trouble of blushing and curtsying; so we'll suppose them all, if you please. But come, tell me: what's the news of the day?

Mel. News! Oh! that's true. Look here, my dear. I thought I had something to tell you. [Reads a paragraph in a newspaper.] "We hear, from very good authority, that an hymeneal treaty is concluded between a certain beautiful ward, not a mile from St. James's-square, and her old guardian; and that the lady is expected in town from Bath, every hour, to sign and seal."

Sir Harry. What say you to this, madam?

Clara. Say! I protest I don't know what to say; except that these newsmakers are a very pleasant, ingenious kind of people.

Mel. But aren't you angry?

Clara. Angry! no, indeed. I am sure I am very much obliged to them for thinking of me: I shall be so stared at! I'll go into public continually, and my guardian shall go with me.

Mel. But is there any foundation for this report, my dear?

Clara. Nay, I am sure I can't tell. I have suspected the matter a great while, by my guardian's smirking and squeezing my hand so often. He read, the other day, in the Annual Register, of a man, at Inverness, who lived to the age of one hundred and seventeen; and he has been talking ever since of purchasing a country-seat in the Highlands.

Sir Harry. That would be pleasant.

Clara. Very. Then we should have a flock of goats, I suppose.

Sir Harry. Dorastus and Faunia.

Clara. Oh! yes; quite in the Damon and Philida way.

Osborne. You are very happy in a lover, madam.

Clara. Oh! quite proud of my conquest. There is no such great miracle in bringing a young fellow, whose passions are all afloat, to die at one's feet. The thing's so natural that one does it every day. But to thaw the icy blood of a grave old gentleman; to see him smirker, sigh, dance minuets, and look ridiculous for one—Oh! there is, positively, no flattery equal to it.

Sir Harry. He will make your winter evenings in the Highlands quite entertaining, with relating the wild pranks he committed, and the deeds of prowess he was guilty of, in his youth; then you will be so delighted with listening to his raptures, and tasting his panado, and—

Clara. Oh! yes, yes, yes—Ha, ha!—I—I think I see him now, with his venerable bald head, his shrivelled face, and his little pug nose, that looks as red and as bright as the best Dutch sealing-wax, rising from his chair, by the help of his crutch-headed stick, to breathe forth vows of love and everlasting fidelity. Ha, ha, ha!

Mel. It's whimsical enough.

Clara. Yes. Oh! now you talk of whimsicality, I was accosted by an old gentleman the night before I left Bath, in the Rooms, who was the drollest being I ever met with. I thought he would have made love to me; swore I was an angel, and said a thousand civil things.

Osborne. Oh! madam, the old men are the only polite men of this age.

Clara. Upon my word, I begin to think so.

Osborne. The young ones, taught in the modern school, hold a rude familiarity to be the first principle of good breeding.

Clara. Manners, like point-ruffles, are now most fashionable when they are soiled.

Sir Harry. No, no; they only hang the easier for being deprived of starch. But who was this old gentleman, pray, madam?

Clara. A relation of yours, sir.

Sir Harry. Of mine, madam?

Clara. I should suppose so, for he mentioned his nephew, Sir Harry Portland.

Mel. Our uncle, Sir Hornet Armstrong.

Sir Harry. It is. I found a letter from him when I came to town, in which he informed me he should arrive in Bath the very day we left it.

Enter a Servant, with a letter.

Who brought this?

Serv. It came by the post, sir.

[Exit.]

Clara. I die to be better acquainted with him. I must have him in my train of sighing swains.

Osborne. You seem astonished, Sir Harry.

Clara. Some unkind billet from his mistress, I suppose.

Sir Harry. No, indeed; it is the most unaccountable epistle I ever received, and from my unaccountable uncle, too. There, read, read.

[To OSBORNE.]

Osborne. [Reads.] "Dear Harry,—You know, you dog, how your old uncle loves you. You will say so when you are thoroughly acquainted with the occasion of this. In brief, I met with a young lady at Bath, the most extraordinary, take her altogether, I ever beheld. She is a nonpareil, a phenix! But you will judge for yourself: she is coming up to town with her brother; who, by-the-by, is a country booby—but that's no matter. I saw her only once, and that was in the rooms; but once is sufficient. They intend coming up to London, by way of seeing the town, for they are country people, I find; though the sister has more accomplishments, ease, and good-breeding, than I ever yet saw in the drawing-room. I proposed a match to the brother, and he seemed happy at the offer. They will arrive nearly as soon as this, for they set out before it; and I shall follow, maugre the gout, as fast as I can.—Hornet Armstrong.—P.S. I forgot to mention their name is Turnbull."—Turnbull! why, what, in the devil's name, is Sir Hornet mad?

Sir Harry. In one of his right ancient whims, I suppose Sir Hornet has had many such in his time

Mel. But pray, who is this miraculous lady, Mr. Osborne? for you seem to know something of her.

Ob. Do you remember, Sir Harry, a gawky girl, that stalked round the rooms, and stared prodigiously?—she that was stuck to the side of a bob-wigged country 'squire?

Clara. Oh! what, the—the girl with her arms dangling, her chin projecting, and her mouth open, that looked as if she were afraid of being lost.

Sir Harry. Yes; or, as if she dared not trust herself alone, out of her own parish, lest somebody should catch her, put her in a sack, and send her for a present to the king of the cannibals.

Ob. The same; that is the accomplished Miss Turnbull.

Sir Harry. How!

Ob. That is the easy, well-bred, drawing-room lady.

Sir Harry. Is it possible?

Clara. Ha, ha, ha! Well, [with affected gravity.] and I don't doubt but she would make a sort of a—a—very good wife. Understands the art of brewing, baking, pickling of pork, curing of hung beef, darning of stockings, and other branches of housewifery, in perfection. Believes in ghosts, and has got the Wandering Prince of Troy, the Babes in the Wood, and the entertaining dialogue of Death and the Lady, by heart.

Ob. Such, and so numerous, are the wife-like properties of Miss Barbara Turnbull.

Clara. Turnbull, too! Well, that is such a delightful name for a country lady; so pastoral!

Ob. The father was one of the greatest graziers in the west of England; and was so intent on getting money, that he bred his children in the most stupid ignorance. He is lately dead, and the son has commenced gentleman and 'squire, by virtue of the father's industry and a pack of fox-hounds; and though he has scarcely knowledge enough of articulate sounds to hold a dialogue with his own geese, yet does he esteem himself a devilish shrewd fellow, and a wit. His conversation is vociferous, and patched up of proverbs and out-of-the-way sayings, which he strings together without order or connection; and utters, upon all occasions, and in all companies, without respect to time, place, or person.

Clara. Well, well, Sir Harry, I shall have to wish you joy soon, I suppose; but I must be gone; fifty visits to make this morning—time flies—but agreeable company, and all that, you know—Oh! Sir Harry, you mean to attend the spring meeting this year at Newmarket? I am told you understand the turf; I think of sending a venture of five hundred by somebody. But I shall see you often enough before then. Adieu. [Exit with MELISSA.]

Sir Harry. Well, what do you think of this lady, Osborne?

Ob. I think her a very amiable, accomplished lady; and one that, under an assumed levity, observes and understands everything about her.

Sir Harry. I am entirely of your opinion. If I may judge from an acquaintance of such short date, she is the first woman in the world.

Ob. Except one, Sir Harry.

Sir Harry. You, Osborne, may make exceptions, if you please; I am not so captious. She has beauty without vanity, virtue without prudery, fashion without affectation, wit without malice, gaiety without coquetry, humour—

Ob. Hold, hold! stop to breathe. How was it? Vinegar without acid, fire without heat, light without shade, motion without matter, and a likeness without a feature!

Sir Harry. "Spite, by the gods! proud spite and burning envy!"

Ob. But did you observe her Newmarket hint, Sir Harry; and the concealed significance with which it was delivered?

Sir Harry. I did.

Ob. Which being faithfully done into English, bears this interpretation: "I, Clara Forrester, a beautiful, elegant, sensible girl, with a fine fortune, should like to take you, Harry Portland, with youth, spirit, and certain et ceteras, but!"

Sir Harry. "But that I am afraid of indulging a partiality for any man who is so intolerably addicted to gaming." Is not that the conclusion of your speech?

Ob. Oh, fie! No, no: gaming! That man has a body without a soul, that never felt an inclination to gaming.

Sir Harry. Perhaps so; but that man has the greatest soul who can best resist that inclination.

Ob. Psha! Gaming is the essence of fashion, and one of your strongest recommendations. Clara is a girl of spirit; and what girl that comes under that description, would ever place her affections on a sneaking, sober, prudent fellow? a mechanical scoundrel, that knows the day of the month, sips tea, keeps a pew in the parish church, writes memorandums, and goes to bed at eleven o'clock. Pho! absurd!

Sir Harry. Curse me, Osborne, if I know what to make of you. You are a riddle that I cannot expound. You have such an awkward way of praising gaming, that it always has the appearance of satire.

Ob. Satire! How so? Do you think I'd satirize myself? Who sports more freely than I do?

Sir Harry. Why, there's the mystery. You are as eager, to the full, as I am. If I get a hundred on a back hand, you offer a thousand; nay, had I the fortune of a nabob, and were to stake it all, you would be the first man to cry "covered!" and be d—d mad if any one wanted to go a guinea: not because you have not generosity, but in the true and inveterate spirit of gaming.

Ob. Certainly. Gaming! why, gaming is the best sal volatile for the spleen: it rouses the spirits, agitates the blood, quickens the pulse, and puts the whole nervous system in a continual vibration. No man ever yet died of apoplexy, that loved a box and dice.

Sir Harry. But they have died as suddenly.

Ob. Oh! ay, ay; but that's a fashionable disease, an influenza; that's to make your exit with éclat; that's to go out of the world with a good report.

Sir Harry. True, true; and, indeed, as to a few years more or less, that is, in reality, a mighty insignificant circumstance.

Ob. A bagatelle! Let us live while we do live, and die when we can't live any longer.

Sir Harry. That's my comfort, that's my comfort. Yes, yes; a pistol—a pistol is a very certain remedy for the choleric. Nobody but a pitiful scoundrel would go sighing, and whining, and teasing other people with his griefs and complaints. When a man is weary, what should he do but go to sleep?

Ob. To be sure. Life itself is but a dream. 'Tis only sleeping a little sounder.

Sir Harry. What! live to be pitied! Ha, ha! A decayed gentleman! No, no, no. A withered branch; a firelock without a flint? And yet—heigho! this Clara—d—n it, its provoking. Youth, beauty, affability—she's a bewitching girl!

Ob. She is, indeed.

Sir Harry. A lovely girl!

Osb. Ay, enough so to make any man, that might hope to be in her favour, in love with life.

Sir Harry. Any man, any man but me—no, no—Undone, undone, undone!

Osb. Well, but, seriously, since you have such bad success, why don't you renounce play?

Sir Harry. 'Tis too late. I have sunk eighty thousand; my resources almost all exhausted, my estates all mortgaged to Jews and scoundrels.

Osb. All?

Sir Harry. All; except the estate in Kent.

Osb. Well then, if you cannot content yourself with your present loss, your best way will be to make another vigorous push.

Sir Harry. That's exactly what I am determined to do; and, unless the devil possesses the dice, I think I may expect, without a miracle, that fortune should change hands.

Osb. One would think so, indeed. Will you dine, then, at my house? There will be the Chevalier, the Baron, and the usual set. They have engaged to dine with me. They are spirited fellows, and will play for any sum.

Sir Harry. I don't know. Suspicion is a cursed meanness; and yet, I cannot help having my doubts of some among that company. Nay, had you not so often assured me you were perfectly acquainted with them all—

Osb. Why, I tell you again and again, so I am. I will be answerable for their conduct, and that's more than I would say for any other set of gamblers upon earth.

Sir Harry. Well, well; I'll meet you there.

Osb. We dine early; at five.

Sir Harry. Agreed.

Osb. And then, hey for a light heart and a heavy purse. [Exit.]

Sir Harry. No, no; no light heart for me: I am sunk, degraded in my own opinion. Gaming alters our very nature. Osborne used to hate it; he was then an open-hearted, generous fellow; he now appears to have contracted an insatiable love for money, and a violent desire to win, he cares not of whom—of me as soon as another. Were I in his situation, and he in mine, I think I should find an aversion to increase his distress; he knows mine, yet has no such aversion. Perhaps he thinks my ruin certain, and that he may as well profit by it as another. I know him to have the most refined and strictest sense of honour: I have lost most of my money to him and in his company, and, therefore, have not been duped out of it. That is some comfort, however. [Exit.]

SCENE II.

Enter Mr. OSBORNE and TIMID.

Osb. Well, Mr. Timid, has Sir Harry sent to you for a further supply?

Timid. Lackaday! sir, yes; and a very large supply, too. He wants five thousand pounds immediately. Lackaday! I asked him how he thought it possible for me to raise such sums as he called upon me for every day; reminded him what a bad way his affairs were in, and what an usurious rate I was obliged to borrow all his money at.

Osb. What said he?

Timid. Lackaday! not much: seemed chagrined; said it must have an end, one way or another, soon; and demanded whether I could or could not raise the money. Lackaday! I told him I was no longer master of ways and means; and he said then he must positively employ another prime minister, for supplies he must have.

Osb. Why did you tell him that? Go to him, inform him you have met with a tender-hearted Jew, who knows nothing of the situation of his affairs, that will lend him ten thousand pounds directly, if he want it.

Timid. Ten thousand! on what terms?

Osb. Oh! the mortgage of the Kentish estate.

Timid. The Kentish estate! Lackaday! but suppose he should go to gaming, and lose it to somebody else instead of you.

Osb. Oh! I'll take care of that.

Timid. Lackaday! It must not be Benjamin Solomons who lends this?

Osb. True; no—humph! Isaac Levi, agent to a private company at Amsterdam.

Timid. [Writes in a pocket-book.] "Isaac Levi, agent to a private company at Amsterdam." I ack aday!

Osb. Well, go you to him, and inform him that the money shall be ready in about half-an-hour.

Timid. Lackaday! good young gentleman! Heaven pardon me, I had like to have said d—the dice! You'll be a true friend?

Osb. Be under no apprehensions. This old fool is become suspicious, I must be sudden. [Aside.]

Timid. Had not we better inform him of all, before he goes any further?

Osb. By no means; leave that to me.

Timid. Lackaday! Well, the remembrance of a good deed is grateful on a death-bed.

Osb. Do you be expeditious; I'll instruct the Jew, and he shall meet you here. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The same.

SIR HARRY PORTLAND and MELISSA discovered.

Sir Harry. Heavens! what romance! I can scarcely believe my eyes. Did you ever hear of so strange an affair?

Mel. Strange! it's miraculous. Quixotism! And our good uncle is the prince of madmen.

Sir Harry. To send a foolish, illiterate, country dowdy, and her blockhead brother, a visiting on such an errand! What can I say to them? I declare I don't know how to behave: never was so embarrassed in my life. Where are they?

Mel. He has made an acquaintance with the groom, and is gone to the mews, which seems to be his proper element, to examine the horses; and I left her with my woman, staring, like a Dutch doll, at everything she fixed her eyes on. Here she comes.

Enter Miss TURNBULL.

Miss T. My gracious! Here be a power of voine —[staring about.]—I wonder if that be he that be to be my husband. [Aside.]

Sir Harry. I hope, madam, the fatigue of your journey has not injured your health.

Miss T. Zir?

Sir Harry. I hope you are pretty well after your journey.

Miss T. Pretty well, thank you, zir. Iveck! he's a handsome man. [Aside.]

Mel. This is the oddest affair.

Sir Harry. [Aside.] I don't know what to say to her. I am afraid, Miss Turnbull, you wou'd find the town so agreeable as the Elysian fields of Somersetshire.

Miss T. Lysian fields! There be no such yields in our parts. There be only corn yields and hay yields.

Mel. My brother, madam, means to say, you are not so well pleased with the town as with the country, perhaps.

Miss T. Oh! yes, but I be though, and ten times better. [They stand silent for some time.] Pray, miss, when did you see Zekel Turnbull, my uncle?

Mel. I have not the honour to know him.

Miss T. My gracious! What, don't you know Zekel?

Mel. No, indeed.

Miss T. Why, he do come to London zity your times every year.

Sir Harry. Is he in parliament?

Miss T. Parliament!

Sir Harry. Yes.

Miss T. What, a parliament-man?

Sir Harry. Yes.

Miss T. No; he be a grazier. [Silence again.] Pray, miss, have you been to see the lions and the wax-work to-day?

Mel. To-day?

Miss T. Ees.

Mel. I never saw them in my life.

Miss T. My gracious! What, never saw the kings and the queens, and the tomb-stones?

Mel. No.

Miss T. Merciful vather! Well, let's go and see 'em now, then.

Mel. People of fashion never go to those kind of places.

Miss T. Never!

Mel. Never.

Miss T. My gracious! But I am sure I will go every day, while I be in London zity, if I can vind the way. Pray, be this vair-time here? Where be all those volk gwin, and where do they all come fro?

Turn. [Without.] Barbara, Barbara! Where beest, Barbara?

Miss T. I be here.

Enter 'Squire TURNBULL.

Turn. Well, Zir Harry, here we be. Madam, your zervant. I zupped wi' Zir Hornet three nights ago, an' a zaid you be a vine lass: what, though I had never zeen you, but I gave you, miss, in a bumper, an' Zir Hornet swore that, except Barbara, a didn't know one to match you.

Mel. He did me great honour.

Turn. Why, to be zure a did. What, though a was wrong—I zee a was wrong; Barbara is well enough; but vor all the length of her spurs, she won't do, pitted against this vine ginger pullet.

Mel. Your compliments quite overpower me, sir.

Turn. Compliments! No, no. What, though vather be dead, an' I ha' three thousand a year, and the best pack of vox dogs in Zomersetshire, I ha' no need make compliments; I would as zoon override the hounds, or vell oak zaplings vor vire-wood. Barbara, mayhap, understands zic things, her reads kademy o' compliments; vor my part, I ha' no time vor zic trash—

Miss T. I'm zure it be a very pretty book.

Turn. Hold thy tongue, Barbara, an' then nobody will know thee beest a vol. Lookye me, miss: I do want a wife, and I should like hugely vor you an' I to zet our horses together, as the zaying is.

Mel. Sir, I don't understand—

Turn. Vor my part, I am none o' your half-bred ones. What, though shilly-shally and no thank you are always hungry—a lame tongue gets nothing, and the last wooer wins the maid—a bad hound may start a hare, but a good one will catch her.

Sir Harry. I believe, sir, you never saw my sister before.

Turn. Why, no, to be zure. What though, love and a red nose can't be hid—if you cut up the goose, I'll eat it—The hare starts when the hound least expects it.

Sir Harry. Very true, sir; but here is a disagreeable misunderstanding—

Turn. Why, to be zure, I do know it. We misunderstand the thing partly well: it be very disagreeable, an' I be glad of it. I ha' brought Barbara to London to see the lions, buy ribands, an' be married. But, what though, liking's liking, an' love's love; myself bevore my zister. If the mountain won't go to the man, the man mun go to the mountain—an' vaint heart never won vair lady.

Sir Harry. Don't you think, sir, that were my zister's affections totally disengaged, this abruptness were very unlikely to gain them? Is it not too violent, think you, for female delicacy?

Turn. Why, to be zure—female delicacy! I hate it; and as vor your abruptness, why, gi' me the man that speaks bolt outright: I am vor none o' your abruptness. What though, he must ha' leave to speak that can't hold his tongue.

Mel. Your proverb is quite apropos, sir.

Turn. Why, to be zure; dogs bark as they are bred.

Sir Harry and Mel. Ha, ha, ha!

Turn. I am a staunch hound, miss, and seldom at vault; an' zo, wi' your leave, I'll—

[Offers to kiss MELISSA.]

Mel. I beg, sir—

Turn. Nay, don't be bashful; I like fruit too well to play long at bob-cherry—a's a vol, indeed, that can't carve a plum-pudding.

[Offers to kiss again, and is prevented by Sir H.]

Sir Harry. I am sorry to be obliged to inform you, that you are entirely mistaken, both with respect to the affections of my sister and myself. As a friend of my uncle's, sir, I shall be happy to shew you every respect, but nothing farther can possibly take place between the families.

[Enter a Servant, and delivers a card to MELISSA.—Exit MELISSA.]

Serv. Mr. Timid desired me to tell you, sir, that Mr. Levi is quite tired of waiting; and says, if you can't come now, he will call again to-morrow.

Sir Harry. Oh! tell him he must not go; I beg Mr. Levi's pardon, I'll be with him in a minute. [Exit Servant.] Sir Hornet has been exceedingly precipitate in this business, sir: he is coming to town, and must apologize for his error. As to my sister, I have no doubt but she has every respect for your merits they deserve; but her affections are pre-engaged, the nuptials fixed, and are soon to be celebrated. While you remain in town, however, I beg you will command my house and services. [Exit.]

Turn. Well, Barbara, what dost think on un?

Miss T. Why, a be well enough; but I daunt rightly know what a means.

Turn. What a means! thee beest a vol; thee dost na' know the London tongue, thee means: a zaid, in a kind o' round-about way, that it's all right.

Miss T. Did a?

Turn. Did a! why to be zure a did; didst na' zee how zivil a were, an' what a low bow a made ? But thee has no contagion in thee ; thee will never learn what's what.

Miss T. Why, where be I to learn zic things ? I ha' never been no where.

Turn. Never been no where ! Well, what o' that ? Where have I been ? I ha' never been no where. What though, I do know how to ztir my broth without scalding my finger—I can zee an owl in an oven as zoon as another.

Miss T. But when be us to go and zee the zights ?

Turn. Oh ! we'll go all together on the wedding-day.

Miss T. My gracious ! I wish it were here.

Turn. Ay, ay ; I daunt doubt thee : women, pigs, and poultry, be never zatisfied.

Miss T. An' be you to be married as well ?

Turn. Be I to be married as well ! Why, to be zure I be. Isn't vather dead ? an' ha' not I three thousand a-year, an' the best pack o' vox dogs in Zomerzethire ? An' didst na' hear me tell miss 'at I would marry her ? What though, I do know how to catch two pigeons wi' one pea ; shew a dog a bone, and he'll wag his tail ; he that is born a beauty is half-married, an' like will to like.

Miss T. Well, then, take me to parliament-house, an' shew me the king, an' the queen, and the lord mayor, an' th' elephant, an' the rest o' th' royal vamily.

Turn. I tell thee, thee sha'n't.

Miss T. My gracious ! What zignification's my coming to London zity, an' I must be moped up a this'n ? I will go, zo I will.

Turn. I tell thee, thee sha'n't.

Miss T. Why, then, an' I unmutt zee the king, I'll go into next room and zee his picter, that I will.

[Exit.]

Turn. Ahoic ! Barbara, Babara ! The helve after the hatchet—He that holds a woman, mun ha' a long rope an' a strong arm—Women an' mules will go their own road in zpite of riders or ztinging-nettles.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—The House of Mr. Vandervelt.

Enter VANDERVELT.

Vand. Clara is very beautiful, but mankind is very censorious. They will tell me that sixty-seven is too late in life to undertake the begetting, bringing up, and providing for a family. What of that ? Must I go out of the world as I came into it—nobody to remember me ? Must the name of Vandervelt be forgotten ? Must I leave no pretty picture of myself ? Sixty-seven is but sixty-seven. Have not we a thousand examples of longevity upon record ? And then, as to cuckolds, I cannot be persuaded that they are as common now as they were when I was a youngster. Times, men, and manners alter. Children are born wittier, and the world gets more sedate : I myself am a living proof of it : I never go to bagnios now ; I never break lamps, beat watchmen, and kick constables now. I have no such wicked inclinations.

Enter CLARA.

Clara. Ah ! mon cher papa ! What, ruminating ?

Vand. Ah ! turtle. But why do you always call me papa ? you know I don't like that word, turtle.

Clara. And why, papa, do you always call me turtle ? Have not I told you, fifty times, it puts me in mind of calipash, and aldermen, and other ugly animals.

Vand. Calipash ! Thou art sweeter, more tender, delicate, delightful, and delicious, than all the calipash and calpee in the universe. A gem, a jewel, that all the sultans, grand signiors, and great moguls of the whole earth have not riches enough to purchase.

Clara. You are so gallant ! You do say the most obliging things.

Vand. Say the most obliging things ! Ay, and will—no matter—Deeds, title-deeds, rent-rolls, India bonds—Well, death and the day of judgment will make strange discoveries.

Clara. Oh ! yes : I know you wise men often meditate on these serious subjects.

Vand. Ay, life is treacherous ground ; one foot firm, and the next in a pit.

Clara. But why so melancholy, papa ?

Vand. I have no friends ; that is, no relations, no children ; have made a great fortune by care, and labour, and anxiety, and debarring myself the pleasures and comforts of life in my youth ; and why should not I sit down and enjoy it ?

Clara. Very true ; and why don't you ?

Vand. Because men are fools, and laugh they don't know why. I hate ridicule ; nobody loves to be thought ridiculous. The world has got false notions : a man of fifty is called old, and must not be in love, for fear of being pointed at ; whereas, some men are older at thirty, than others at threescore.

Clara. Certainly.

Vand. What is threescore ?

Clara. A handful of minutes,—

Vand. That vanish like a summer shower,—

Clara. Melt like a lump of sugar in a dish of tea—

Vand. That come you don't know how,—

Clara. And go you don't know where.

Vand. Surely, a man of sixty may walk through a church-yard without fear of tumbling into a grave ?

Clara. If he can jump over it.

Vand. True : and I was once an excellent jumper. Sixty ! why, Henry Jenkins, the Yorkshire fisherman, lively to a hundred and sixty-nine. So that a man of sixty, even in these degenerate days, has a chance to live at least a hundred years.

Clara. Well, I declare, papa, you are quite a blooming youth ; forty years younger, in my opinion, than you were a quarter of an hour ago.

Vand. Forty ?

Clara. At least.

Vand. Why, then, by dad, as thou sayest, I am a blooming youth. Ah ! turtle, I could tell you something that would surprise you ; I could tell you—Think what I could tell you. [Sings.] “ ‘Tis joy to wound a lover”—hem !—“ how much more to give him ease.”

Clara. [Sings.] “ When his passion we discover”—

Vand. “ Oh ! how pleasing 'tis to please !” Oh ! I could tell—but no, no ; you are sniggering, laughing in your sleeve : ay, ay, I perceive it ; you're a wit, and I am an old fool : sneering, ridiculing me ; I hate wit and ridicule.

Clara. Me a wit ! Lord ! papa, I would not be such an animal for the world. A wit ! Why, a wit is a kind of urchin, that every man will set his dog at, but won't touch himself, for fear of pricking his fingers. A wit is a monster with a hideous long tongue and no brains ; a dealer in paradoxes ; one that is blind through a profusion of light ; walks upon metaphor, is always seen in a simile, vanishes if you come too near him, and is only to be laid by a cudgel.

Vand. Frightful, indeed! Thank heaven, nobody can say I am a wit.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Mr. Codicil, the attorney, desires to speak with you, sir.

Vand. Very well; I am coming.

Serv. Mrs. Trip, madam, is in the housekeeper's room, and says she hopes your ladyship is well.

Clara. Desire her to walk up. [Exit Servant.]

Vand. Who is Mrs. Trip, turtle?

Clara. A person that lived several years in our family. She is, at present, lady's-maid to Melissa, Sir Harry Portland's sister. She will divert me with her fine language; besides that, I wish to ask her how she likes Sir Harry's family.

Vand. I know Sir Harry's uncle, Sir Hornet Armstrong, very well; an old friend.

Clara. Indeed! I never saw him here.

Vand. Why, no, I don't know how it has happened, but I have not seen him above twice these two years myself; he's an odd mortal; a whimsical old gentleman. Well, b'ye, b'ye!

Clara. Adieu!

Vand. B'ye, b'ye! [Exit.]

Clara. This Sir Harry runs continually in my head; ay, and I am afraid has found a place in my heart: yes, yes; there's no denying that: but that friend, that Mr. Osborne—If I have any penetration, that man wears a most suspicious, hypocritical face.

Enter Mrs. TRIP.

So, Mrs. Trip, how have you done this long time?

Mrs. T. Pretty well, thank you, madam, except that I am subject to the historicals, and troubled with the vapours; being, as I am, of a dilikut nervous system, whereof I am so giddy, that my poor head is sometimes quite in a whirlpool; and if I did not bathe with my lady, the doctor tells me I should decline into a liturgy, and so fall down and die, perhaps, in a fit of apostacy.

Clara. And how long have you lived in Sir Harry's family, Mrs. Trip?

Mrs. T. I came soon after my poor dear lady, your mamma, died, and was interrogated; whereof I was at her funeral. My lady is a very good lady; that is, I mean, ma'am, my future lady that I live with at present: she is to be married soon to Mr. Osborne, and may Hydra, the god of marriage, tie the gorgon knot; whereof I heard your ladyship is to be one of the ceremonials.

Clara. I am invited, and shall be there. But, pray, Mrs. Trip, what is your opinion of Mr. Osborne?

Mrs. T. Oh, lard! ma'am, consarning Mr. Osborne—I heard a small bird sing.

Clara. A small bird sing!

Mrs. T. Yes, ma'am.

Clara. Of what feather was this fowl?

Mrs. T. Foul! No, I assure you, your ladyship; as fair a speechified person as any in England; whereof he has a great valiation for me.

Clara. Well.

Mrs. T. And so, the secret is, that Mr. Osborne has won almost all Sir Harry's estate.

Clara. Indeed!

Mrs. T. And, moreover, has pretended to be a synagogue, and a Jew, and has lent money in other people's names, on mortgagees and nuitants, whereof my friend has been a party consarned.

Clara. Good heaven, what villainy! [Aside.] And pray, who is your friend, Mrs. Trip?

Mrs. T. Oh! ma'am, I hope your ladyship won't intoxicate me on that head, for I know Mr. Timid too well to—

Clara. Oh! it was Mr. Timid?

Mrs. T. Why—that is, ma'am—I didn't mean—Mercy! what have I said?

Clara. You may assure yourself, Mrs. Trip, I shall be careful not to do you any prejudice.

Mrs. T. I am sure, I am supinely obliged to your ladyship. [Exit.]

Clara. Poor Sir Harry! He has a heart that does honour to mankind, that does not merit distress; yet, if I augur right, it must shortly feel the severest pangs false friendship can inflict. Ungrateful Osborne! I must warn Melissa to beware of him, and, if possible, to detach Sir Harry from the gambling-table. [Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—Sir Harry Portland's House.

Enter SIR HARRY PORTLAND, CLARA, MELISSA, and VANDERVELT.

Clara. Ha, ha, ha! Sir Harry, you are a happy man.

Vand. Ay, Sir Harry, you are a happy man.

Mel. Such an accomplished spouse!

Clara. And so kind an uncle!

Sir Harry. Upon my soul, I can't help laughing; and yet the more I reflect on the affair, the more I am amazed; Sir Hornet is whimsical, 'tis true, but no fool.

Vand. Fool, Sir Harry! no, no; he is always the readiest to spy the fooleries of other people: many a time have I laughed at his whims and jokes; an odd mortal he is.

Clara. Nay, if he be so fond of a joke, who knows but he may have sent them on this errand for the joke's sake?

Vand. By dad, turtle, thou hast hit it. As sure as can be, that's it; it is for the joke's sake.

Sir Harry. Impossible: the affair is too serious to be intentional caprice.

Mel. But I thought, when I left you, you were coming to an eclairsissement.

Sir Harry. Coming to an eclairsissement! Why, I told them, as plain as I could speak, that no alliance whatever could take place between the families.

Mel. 'Tis certain they have not understood you, then.

Sir Harry. Well, there the matter must rest till I can find an interpreter, for I can't make myself more intelligible.

Clara. And you have not had one tender love-scene yet?

Sir Harry. Not one. I am amazed at the girl's simplicity, it equals her ignorance; she speaks and looks so totally unconscious of impropriety, so void of intentional error, that I don't know how to reply.

Clara. Suppose, then, you were to practice a little. Come, I'll stand up for the young lady.

Sir Harry. I shall still find a difficulty to speak.

Clara. Surely!

Sir Harry. In very truth, ma'am. But it will be from a quite different motive.

Clara. Oh! for the love of curiosity, Sir Harry, explain your motive.

Vand. Ay, Sir Harry, explain your motive.

Sir Harry. I cannot, sir.

Vand. Cannot! Sir Harry, why so?

Sir Harry. For reasons, sir, which are far more easily imagined than described.

Vand. Nay, don't be afraid, Sir Harry. My turtle knows how to answer interrogatories; you won't find her a simpleton, I warrant.

Sir Harry. No, sir; the danger is that she might find me one.

Vand. I fancy, Sir Harry, you are a little like me; cautious with the ladies, lest you should be made ridiculous. I am very circumspect in those matters.

Sir Harry. You are very right, sir; it is not every one who has the gift of wearing a fool's-cap with a grace.

Clara. Ay, but notwithstanding all this, Sir Harry, I should like to have a love-scene with you.

Vand. How, turtle!

Clara. In the character of Miss Turnbull.

Vand. Oh! ay, do, Sir Harry, have a love-scene with my turtle.

Sir Harry. Anything to oblige you, sir.

Vand. Come, then, begin. [Clara sets herself in an awkward, silly attitude.] Ha, ha, ha! Look, look at my Turtle lovey-dovey.

Sir Harry. [Addressing Clara.] My uncle, Sir Hornet Armstrong, madam, is desirous that I should gain the inestimable blessing of your hand.

Clara. Anan!

Vand. Ha, ha, ha!

Sir Harry. And give me leave to say, madam, however unworthy I may be of the happiness and honour intended me, no person can be more sensible of them.

Clara. What! that be as much as to say you want ha' me, I suppose. [Whimpers.]

Vand. Ha, ha, ha! Nay, but don't cry in earnest, lovey-dovey.

Sir Harry. Oh! dry those heavenly eyes, madam, and believe me, when I call every sacred power to witness my affection, I love, I adore, I die for you. Suffer me to wipe away those pearly tears that hide the beauties of your cheek. [Offering to salute her.]

Clara. Hold, hold, Sir Harry!

Vand. Ay, hold, hold, Sir Harry.

Sir Harry. Why so, sir? 'Tis quite in character.

Clara. Deuce take you, Sir Harry, you—you are too passionate in your feigned addresses; so warm and pressing—

Vand. Ay, so warm and pressing.

Clara. One was not aware.

Sir Harry. I was taken by surprise myself, madam. The bounteous god of love kindly contrived an opportunity which my profound adoration, and a conscious want of merit, had totally deprived me of. Pardon me, if, for a moment, I forgot that respect which every one, who beholds you, cannot help feeling.

Vand. Why, what's this, Sir Harry? You are not in downright earnest, are you?

Sir Harry. Sincere as dying sinners imploring mercy.

Vand. What, in love with my turtle?

Clara. Pooh! Why, no, to be sure. We were only acting a supposed scene.

Vand. Supposed! By dad, I think it was devilishly like a real scene. You both did your parts very naturally.

Sir Harry. Oh! sir, no actor who feels as forcibly as I do, can ever mistake his character.

Vand. Feels forcibly! Your feelings are forcible, indeed.

Mel. Come, come, let us adjourn to the drawing-room; I want to have your opinions on a painting of Coreggio's that my brother has made me a present of.

Vand. Favour me with your hand, young lady; and, Sir Harry, do you take my turtle's; but don't you let your feelings be too forcible. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The Hall in Sir Harry Portland's house.

Enter Sir HORNET ARMSTRONG and Servant.

Sir Hor. Are the trunks safe, sirrah George?

Serv. Yes, sir.

Sir Hor. And did you order that dog of a postilion to take care of the poor devils the horses?

Serv. I did, sir.

Sir Hor. And of himself?

Serv. I did, sir.

Sir Hor. You did, sir? Why, then, do you go and take care of yourself, you rascal.

Serv. I will, sir.

Sir Hor. And d'ye hear, George?

Serv. Sir?

Sir Hor. If I find you disobey my orders, I'll break your bones.

Serv. I'll be very careful, sir, I assure you. [Exit.]

Enter TIMID and SCRIP.

Timid. Brokerage comes rather heavy, Mr. Scrip, when the sum is large.

Scrip. Heavy! no, no; a d—d paltry pittance; five-and-twenty pounds only, you see, selling out twenty thousand. Get more by one lucky hit than fifty of these would produce.

Timid. Ay!

Scrip. Oh! yes; jobbing—stock-jobbing, between you and I, is the high road to wealth.

Timid. Lackaday! may be so. Well, good day.

[Scrip is going, but seeing Sir Hornet, stops to listen.]

Sir Hor. What, old Lackaday!

Timid. Ah! Sir Hornet.

[Sir Hor. What's the best news with you?

Timid. Ah, lackaday! the best news I know is scarcely worth relating.

Scrip. Beg pardon, sir, [To Sir Hor.] beg pardon—bad news in town, did you say?

Sir Hor. Bad, sir! not that I have heard.

Scrip. Exceedingly sorry for it.

Sir Hor. Sir?

Scrip. Never was more distressed for bad news.

Sir Hor. Distressed for bad news!

Scrip. Excessively! The reduction of Gibraltar, the taking of Jamaica, and the destruction of the grand fleet, one of the three would make me a happy man for life.

Sir Hor. The destruction of the grand fleet make you happy for life?

Scrip. Completely.

Sir Hor. Here's a precious scoundrel!

Scrip. No great reason to complain, to be sure; do more business than any three doctors of the college; generally of the sure side; made a large fortune, if this does not give me a twinge; rather overdone it; but any severe stroke, any great national misfortune, would exactly close my account.

Sir Hor. Hark you, sir!

Scrip. Sir?

Sir Hor. It is to be hoped—

Scrip. Yes, sir, it is to be hoped.

Sir Hor. That a halter will exactly close your account.

Scrip. Sir?

Sir Hor. You raven-faced rascal! Rejoice at national misfortunes! Zounds! I thought such language was nowhere to be heard from the mouth of an Englishman, unless he were a member of parliament.

Scrip. Lord! sir, you don't consider that I am a bear for almost half a million.

Sir Hor. You are an impudent villain! Rejoice at the distress of your country!

Scrip. Why, Lord! sir, to be sure; when I am a bear. There's not a bear in the Alley but would do the same. Were I a bull, indeed, the case would be altered.

Sir Hor. A bull!

Scrip. For instance, at the taking of Charles-Town, no man was merrier, no man more elate, no man in better spirits.

Sir Hor. How so, gentle sir?

Scrip. Oh! dear sir, at that time I was a bull to a vast amount, when, very fortunately for me, the news arrived; the guns fired, the bells clattered, the stocks mounted, and I made ten thousand pounds. Enough to make a man merry. Never spent a happier night in my life.

Sir Hor. Aha! then, according to that arithmetic, you would be as merry and as happy to-night, could you accomplish the destruction of this said British fleet.

Scrip. Happier, happier by half! for I should realize at least twice the sum—twice the sum.

Sir Hor. Twice the sum!

Scrip. Ay, twice the sum. Oh! that would be a glorious event, indeed. Never prayed so earnestly for anything since I was born; and who knows—who knows what a little time may do for us?

Sir Hor. Zounds! how my elbow aches! [Aside.]

Scrip. I shall call on some leading people—men of intelligence—of the right stamp.

Sir Hor. You shall?

Scrip. Yes, sir.

Sir Hor. Why, then, perhaps you will be able to destroy the British fleet between you.

Scrip. I hope so, I hope so—do everything in my power. Oh! it would be a glorious event.

Sir Hor. Hark you! sir, do you see that door?

Scrip. Sir?

Sir Hor. And this cane?

Scrip. Why, but, sir—

Sir Hor. Make your exit, you imp!

Scrip. But, sir—

Sir Hor. Get out of the house, you vile rascal, you diabolical—[Drives SCRIP off.] A son's son of a scoundrel! Who is he? What business had he here?

Timid. Lackaday! sir, he is a stock-broker, that Sir Harry employed, at his sister's request, to sell out for her; because she chooses to have her fortune in her own possession again to-morrow. I have been paying him the brokerage, and receiving the money, which I shall deliver to Madam Melissa directly.

Sir Hor. An incomprehensible dog! Pray for the reduction of Gibraltar, the taking of Jamaica, or the destruction of the British fleet!

Timid. Lackaday! sir, it is his trade.

Sir Hor. Trade! a nation will never flourish that encourages traders to thrive by her misfortunes. But come, tell me something of my own affairs: where is Harry? how does he go on?

Timid. Ah, lackaday!

Sir Hor. What, is he a wild young dog? Does he get into thy books?

Timid. Ah, lackaday!

Sir Hor. Ah, lackaday! Zounds! don't sigh, man: he won't die in thy debt.

Timid. Ah, lackaday! Sir Horner, he should be welcome to the last farthing I have in the world.

Sir Hor. Should he, old Truepenny? then give me thy hand; thou shalt be remembered in my codicil: but, what, he shakes his elbow, I suppose, eh? Seven's the main?

Timid. Ah, lackaday! Sir Horner, what between main and chance he has been sadly nicked.

Sir Hor. Has he? I'll score his losings upon his pate, a dog—that is, if he will let me. But where is Miss Turnbull? she'll soon reform him; her angelic smiles will teach him—

Timid. Sir?

Sir Hor. Sir! Zounds! you stare like the wooden heads of the twelve Cæsars. Miss Turnbull's charms, I say, will find employment for all his virtues and wean him from all his vices.

Timid. Will they, sir?

Sir Hor. Will they, sir! Yes, they will, sir.

Timid. Lackaday!

Sir Hor. Lackaday! What ails you?

Timid. Nothing, sir, nothing; only that I am afraid my eyes begin to grow dim.

Sir Hor. Your head, I believe, begins to grow very thick.

Timid. Ah, lackaday! sir, like enough, like enough.

Sir Hor. Be kind enough to answer me a few questions: is not Miss Turnbull a beautiful girl?

Timid. May I speak truth?

Sir Hor. May you speak truth! to be sure you may.

Timid. Then I answer no, sir.

Sir Hor. No!

Timid. No.

Sir Hor. Is she not an elegant girl?

Timid. No.

Sir Hor. Nor a witty girl?

Timid. No.

Sir Hor. Tol de rol lol! tititum! Pray, what is she, in your opinion?

Timid. A silly, ignorant, ill-bred, country girl, and very unfit for Sir Harry's wife.

Sir Hor. Tol de rol lol! laditum! Let me look in your face. Yes, yes; he has it; the moon's almost at full. Poor Lackaday! which is your right hand? [Timid holds it up.] Indeed! wonderful! And are you really in your sober senses?

Timid. Why, indeed, sir, I begin to be rather in doubt: I believe so; but lest I should lose them, I will wish your honour a good morning. [Exit.]

Sir Hor. Lackaday! Ha, ha! Not beautiful, nor witty, nor—tol de rol lol! The old fool has a mind to set up for a wit, and has begun by bantering me. Zounds! I was neither drunk nor mad; and to the best of my knowledge, I am not now in a dream. The brother, indeed, is a booby; and does not appear to be of the same family—hardly of the same species; though he had sense enough to snap at the offer immediately. I remarked he did not stand on ceremony. Surely, I have made no mistake in the business—'Sblood! if it prove so! Parson Adams the second! I shall—Eh! who's this? No, no, no—it is; 'tis she herself, in propria pers—

Enter CLARA.

Miss Turnbull, I most heartily rejoice to see you.

Clara. Miss Turnbull! [Aside.]

Sir Hor. Your presence has relieved me from one of the oddest qualms—but the sight of you has given me a cordial.

Clara. What do you mean, Sir Horner?

Sir Hor. Mean, my angel! why, here has been a bantering, lying, enigmatical son of a scoundrel, with a bundle of ironical, diabolical tales, railing at your beauty and accomplishments, till, egad! I began to fancy my fine-flavoured pine-apple a crab

Clara. This is delightful! But I cannot find in my heart to undeceive him. [Aside.] There is no answering for the difference of taste, sir.

Sir Hor. True. Asses prefer thistles to nectarines; but yet he must be an ass, indeed, who could not distinguish St. Paul's from the pillory.

Clara. Taste, Sir Hornet, is a sort of shot silk, and has a variety of shades: one says 'tis blue, another black, and a third is positive 'tis yellow. It would be a vain attempt, therefore, for Miss Turnbull to endeavour to please the whole world.

Sir Hor. An old booby! I would not give a hair of the pope's beard to please him. But how is it with Sir Harry? is he in raptures? is he dying for you?

Clara. No, sir; he eats and drinks as usual, and is, for aught I can discover, in tolerably good health.

Sir Hor. Is he? an audacious dog! in good health! If I find him in good health I'll pistol him. But you mistake the matter, perhaps: the rascal's proud, and not willing you should see his sufferings; he is a stricken deer, and sheds his tears in solitude and silence, mayhap. Do you discover no symptoms of the sighing swain? Does he never cut his fingers? or scald himself? or run against a post, and beg its pardon?

Clara. No, sir.

Sir Hor. I doubt he is a sad dog. But no, no; I am certain he adores you; 'tis impossible he should do otherwise. But there is another material point, about which I am not quite so certain.

Clara. What is that, sir?

Sir Hor. Has he found any place in your affections? 'Tis true, he's a fine fellow. I don't mean by that, one that is pickled in cosmetics; preserved in musk and marchal powder; and that will melt away, like Lot's wife, in the first hard shower! none of your fellows that are too valiant to give a woman the wall, and too witty to let her have the last word; but one that is—in short, his own manner will best describe what he is.

Clara. True, Sir Hornet, but the time has been so short.

Sir Hor. Short! Ah! madam, if he did not do the business with a coup d'œil, at once, I would not give a feather of a goose-wing for all the arrows his Cupid has in his quiver. But come, Miss Turnbull, I know you are above the silly prejudices that ordinary minds are swayed by; tell me sincerely, has he made any impression on your heart? Is he the man?

Clara. To speak ingenuously, Sir Hornet, that is a point entirely undetermined, at present.

Sir Hor. Undetermined! why, what—

Clara. Sir Harry's person is engaging, his manners delightful, and his understanding unexceptionable.

Sir Hor. Bravo! my dear girl! you charm me to hear you say so.

Clara. I will say more, Sir Hornet. I find my heart interested in his behalf, and sincerely believe I shall never see another man with whom I could be half so happy.

Sir Hor. My dear Miss Turnbull!

Clara. But yet I have too many reasons to fear it will be impossible we should ever be united.

Sir Hor. Impossible!

Clara. I firmly believe, Sir Harry possesses a thousand virtues, but they are all discoloured by a failing, which, if not as erroneous as some other vices, is more destructive than any.

Sir Hor. I understand you.

Clara. This will for ever deter a woman, who values her own peace, from cherishing a passion that must, in its consequences, be so fatal.

Sir Hor. But you, my angel, will soon cure him of this: it is not a rooted vice—

Clara. Permanently, or my intelligence says false.

Sir Hor. Well, but we have hopes that Mr. Osborne will find means to reclaim him; he is continually with him, continually warning him, and—

Clara. Mr. Osborne, Sir Hornet, is an interested physician, and would rather encourage than cure the disease.

Sir Hor. Heaven forbid! But who informs you of this?

Clara. Those who are in the secret, I assure you, sir. I am afraid Mr. Osborne is a wicked man; he is—what I dare not speak.

Sir Hor. I confess you alarm me, though I hope without cause. Osborne assumes every appearance of rigid virtue: and, if this were true, he would be the worst of villains. However, suspend your opinion awhile; I'll soon sift the affair: and in the meantime, let me beg of you to think as well of Sir Harry as your doubts will permit you.

Clara. I shall do that, Sir Hornet, without an effort. [Exit.]

Enter VANDERVELT.

Vand. [Sees Clara going off.] Why, turtle, why—Ah! Sir Hornet, I am glad to see you.

Sir Hor. Ah, ha! friend Van! why, you look tolerably well.

Vand. Tolerably well! Ay, to be sure. Why should I not?

Sir Hor. Why should you not! Let me see: there are, as near as I can guess, about seventy reasons why you should not.

Vand. Humph! Oh! what, my age? No, no: let me tell you, Sir Hornet, I—I am not an old man.

Sir Hor. No?

Vand. No; nor you neither.

Sir Hor. Indeed! I am exceedingly glad of that: and, pray, when did you make this discovery?

Vand. Make it! why, I have been making it these twenty years and upwards.

Sir Hor. Oh, ho! And how do you prove it?

Vand. By comparison and reflection. I'll tell you—hold! first, I'll shew you what I call my list of worthies: there, look at that.

[Gives a common-place book.]

Sir Hor. What the devil have we here? [Reads.] "Patrick O'Neal, married, for the seventh time, at the age of one hundred and thirteen; walks without a cane, never idle; children and great-grand-children to the number of one hundred and twenty-three."

Vand. There's a fellow! I warrant that man is alive and hearty at this moment.

Sir Hor. Humph! And, pray do you think to imitate this worthy, as you call him? Will you be married seven times, and have a hundred and twenty-three children?

Vand. That's more than I can tell.

Sir Hor. Ha! [Reads.] "Thomas Parr, being aged one hundred and twenty, fell in love with Catherine Milton."

Vand. Ay, and did penance in a white sheet, at the church-door.

Sir Hor. Humph! [Reads.] "Henry Jenkins"—

Vand. Ay, there's another: corrected his great-grandson, a youth of seventy, with his own hand, for being idle.

Sir Hor. [Reads.] "Johannes de Temporibus, or John of Times, armour-bearer to the emperor Charlemagne, died, aged three hundred threescore and one years."

Vand. Very well; now tell me; when you compare me to Johannes Temporibus, that is, when you compare sixty-seven to three hundred threescore and one, can you say I am an old man?

Sir Hor. An old man! By the beard of Methusalem, thou art scarce an infant; it will be, perhaps, these five years yet before thou art perfectly a child.

Vand. Nay, Sir Hornet, let me beg of you to be serious; you are an old friend, and know the world; I shall be glad of your advice: I ruminate on these things by myself, till I am quite melancholy; now, if I had but somebody to bear half my griefs, I should suppose they would be lessened.

Sir Hor. Why, true, as you say, one would imagine so.

Vand. Don't you think, then, if I were to take a handsome, young wife, I should, perhaps, find a cure for all my ills?

Sir Hor. An infallible one.

Vand. And this is, seriously, your opinion?

Sir Hor. Seriously.

Vand. Then tell me—you were talking with the young lady that went out as I entered—

Sir Hor. Well, what of her?

Vand. Is she not very beautiful?

Sir Hor. A divinity.

Vand. Finely accomplished?

Sir Hor. Beyond description.

Vand. That's right. You are a sensible, discerning man, Sir Hornet; and I am delighted to find you approve my choice.

Sir Hor. Your choice!

Vand. My choice. That is the young lady, you must know, to whom I intend to pay my addresses.

Sir Hor. Your what?

Vand. The lady I mean to marry.

Sir Hor. Ha, ha, ha!

Vand. Nay, Sir Hornet—

Sir Hor. Ha, ha, ha! all mad; every soul.

Vand. I don't understand.

Sir Hor. Most reverend youth, I beg your pardon. Ha, ha, ha!

Vand. You see things in a mighty strange light, Sir Hornet. Is it any miracle that a man should love a beautiful woman?

Sir Hor. Ha, ha, ha! Love! why thou'rt another Ætna—Cupid's burning mountain. Your nose has taken fire at your fancy, and become a beacon to warn all young gentlemen of threescore and ten, of the rocks and quicksands hidden in the sea of amorous desires.

Vand. Upon my word, Sir Hornet, this is exceedingly strange.

Sir Hor. Ha, ha, ha! You must excuse me. What a rosy youth! Harkye! friend Vandervelt, it's my opinion you have been bantering me.

Vand. Od! that's a good thought. [Aside].—Bantering you! why, ay, to be sure I have. Ha, ha, ha! [Forces a laugh].

Sir Hor. Oh! you have?

Vand. Certainly. Ha, ha, ha!

Sir Hor. Ha, ha, ha! [With the same tone].

Vand. Didn't you perceive that before? Ha, ha!

Sir Hor. No 'faith! Ha, ha, ha!

Vand. That's a good joke. Ha, ha, ha!

Sir Hor. Excellent! Ha, ha, ha! [During the laugh, Sir H. imitates Vandervelt].—Now let us be serious.

Vand. With all my heart.

Sir Hor. And I'll tell you a story.

Vand. Do.

Sir Hor. There was a certain ancient personage of my acquaintance, called Andrew Vandervelt—

Vand. What, is your story about me?

Sir Hor. Give me leave, young gentleman, and you shall hear.—Every body imagined him to be a prudent, sedate, grave person, with a moderate share of common sense—

Vand. Well!

Sir Hor. And, as it was evident his beard was grey, his limbs palsied, his skin shrivelled, and his sinews shrunk—

Vand. How, Sir Hornet?

Sir H. They naturally concluded, he had made his will, wrote his epitaph, and bespoke his coffin—

Vand. Mercy upon me!

Sir Hor. But instead of meditating, like a pious Christian, on the last four things, a crotchet takes him in the head, he buys a three-penny fiddle, scrapes a matrimonial jig, claps a pair of horns upon his head, and curvets through the town, the sport of the mob, derided by the young, pitied by the old, and laughed at by all the world.

Vand. Heaven deliver me, what a picture!—But you forget, Sir Hornet; didn't I explain to you that it was only a joke?

Sir Hor. Oh! true. Ah! witty rogue! Well, adieu. I'll remember the joke. Ha, ha, ha!

Vand. Ay do. Ha, ha, ha!

Sir Hor. Oh! for a song to the tune of "Room for Cuckolds!" [Exeunt].

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Chamber at Sir Harry Portland's.

Enter Sir HARRY PORTLAND.

Sir Harry. [Much agitated]. May the everlasting curse of heaven consume those implements of hell, those deceitful, infernal fiends! I'll never touch, never look on cards or dice again. If I ever make another bet, may all the horrors of a ruined fortune haunt me, sleeping and waking; may I be pointed at by children, and pitied by sharpers. Distraction! May I be—I am already ruined, past redemption.

Enter a Servant, who delivers a letter to Sir HARRY.

Sir Harry. [Breaks open the letter hastily]. Um—Um—Stay, sir. [To the Servant]. D—n! Is it possible? In league with sharpers! Who brought this letter, sir?

Servant. A porter, sir.

Sir Harry. Where is he?

Servant. Gone, sir; he ran off round the corner in a hurry.

Sir Harry. You may go, sir. [Exit Servant].

Enter OSBORNE.

Osborne. You seem moved, Sir Harry; may I enquire the cause?

Sir Harry. You are the cause, sir.

Osborne. I!

Sir Harry. Yes, you. There, read, sir.

Osborne. [Reads]. "Beware of a false friend; the person who gives you this caution, would sacrifice a life to preserve you from the destruction that threatens you. Mr. Osborne is in league with Jews and sharpers, and you are a victim to his avarice and duplicity." So, so. Well, Sir Harry, do you give any credit to this epistle?

Sir Harry. Nay, sir, you are to tell me how much or how little credit it deserves.

Obs. Why, look you, Sir Harry, I cannot, nor I will not, enter into explanations.

Sir Harry. Sir! Cannot, nor will not, enter into explanations!

Obs. No, sir.

Sir Harry. But I say, sir, you shall.

Obs. Shall!

Sir Harry. Yes, sir, shall.

Obs. Ay, sir? Who is he that shall make me?

Sir Harry. I am he, sir.

Obs. Indeed!

Sir Harry. Friendship, honour, honesty, ought to make you; but present appearances declare you void of these.

Obs. Present appearances declare you void of reason, sir, otherwise you would remember me for one of those who are not to be terrified by a loud tongue, or an angry brow. I repeat it, I will not now enter into explanations. I have played with you, I have staked my money, and won yours. Would it have been dishonourable had you won mine? I have disposed of that money as I thought proper. No matter whether with Jews or Christians; and, I should have supposed, your passion and suspicion would have required better proof, than the malevolent aspersion of an anonymous letter, ere they ought to have incited you to a quarrel with your friend.

Sir Harry. I beg your pardon, dear Osborne; I am to blame; nothing but the severity of my late losses can plead for me; I know you to be a noble-hearted, worthy fellow, and explanations, on such an accusation, are as much beneath you to give, as me to demand. Forget my silly warmth: it is my weakness.

Obs. Do you forget the cause of it, Harry, and it is forgot.

Sir Harry. It was madness—I am above suspicion—'tis ungenerous—'tis damnable—pray excuse—pray forgive me.

Obs. Well, well, think no more on't; only guard against suspicion for the future. [Exit.]

Sir Harry. No, no, it cannot be; there is an open fortitude in his manner, a boldness that can only result from innocence.

Enter MELISSA.

Mel. Oh! brother, I am glad I have found you. Why did you send these troublesome things to me? Why did not you take care of them for me? Trust a giddy girl, indeed, with a parcel of bank bills. Here, here, here they are, take 'em, take 'em, they will be safe with you; I have been in a panic, ever since they were in my possession, lest they should take wing, and fly through the key-hole, or in some other unaccountable way. I am unused to such large sums, and don't feel happy while they are about me.

Sir Harry. But what am I to do with them?

Mel. Keep them till to-morrow, and then, you know, when you give my hand to your friend, you may give them too, to make it the more acceptable; there are just twenty, of one thousand each. So, now I am easy—good bye: I am going to purchase a few knick-knacks. [Exit.]

Sir Harry. Well, but, sister! Melissa! She's gone, down on the light wings of innocence and happiness, while I, depressed by folly, feel a weight upon my heart, that hope itself cannot remove. What is a ruined gamester? An idiot, who begins for his amusement, who continues hoping to retrieve, and who is ruined before he can recollect himself; a wretch, deserted, solitary, forlorn; ashamed of society, yet miserable when alone; shunned by the prosperous; despised by the prudent; deservedly exposed to the poisoned shafts of insolence and envy; a by-word to the vulgar, and a jest to the fortunate; haunted by duns, preyed upon by usurers, persecuted and curst by creditors. Inexplicable infatuation!

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—Another Apartment.

Enter CLARA, MELISSA, and 'Squire TURNBULL.

Mel. Mr. Turnbull, I must beg, sir, you'll desist. Turn. Desist, why, to be zure; I'll go and buy license out o' hand, make hay while the zun do zhine, and don't lose the zheep for a ha'p'orth o'tar; what tho', the pepper-box must ha' a lid; a bushel o' words wunt vill a basket; when the owl goes a hunting, 'tis time to light the candle.

Clara. Ha, ha, ha! If you'll permit me, my dear, I think I can relieve you from this embarrassment.

Mel. Permit you! I am sure if you can, you shall be canonized, and have churches erected to your memory.

Clara. I'll talk to him in his own language, he can comprehend no other.

Turn. Well, vair lady.

Clara. Well, zir.

Turn. You do zee how the nail do drive. Be you to be one at bridal?

Clara. No.

Turn. No! Why zo? you'st be bride-maid.

Clara. No, but I wunt.

Turn. Wunt you?

Clara. No; nor you'st not be bridegroom, nother.

Turn. No?

Clara. No.

Turn. How zo?

Clara. Because you've zold the zkin avore you've caught the vox. You've reckoned your chickens bevore they be hatched.

Turn. Nay, nay; stop at the dike; zure I do knaw my own mind, an miss be agreed.

Clara. But miss ben't agreed.

Turn. No! That's a good joke; but she be, though.

Clara. But she ben't, though.

Turn. But I'm zure she be.

Clara. But I'm zure she ben't.

Turn. No! Why, miss, ben't you agreed?

Mel. No, sir.

Turn. No!

Clara. You may gape, but the cherry won't drop; too much mettle is dangerous in a blind horse; mis-reckoning is no payment; John would ha' wed, but Mary war na willing.

Mel. You seem surprised, sir; I can only say, it is without reason; you have deceived yourself, in supposing such an alliance possible, and I hope your own good sense will inform you, that, after this declaration, any renewal of your addresses to me must be considered an insult.

Turn. An' zo, then, the meaning of all this vine zpeech, I suppose, is, that you wunt ha' me?

Mel. It is.

Clara. "Make hay while the zun do zhine; don't lose the zheep for a ha'p'orth of tar; a bushel of words wunt vill a basket; when the owl goes a hunting, 'tis time to light the candle." Your most obedient, gentle 'squire. Ha, ha, ha

[Exit with MELISSA.]

Turn. Zo, then, it zeems I ha' been reckoning without my host here. Well, what though, zoon hot zoon cold; zoon got zoon gone; care's no cure; zorrow won't pay a man's debts; he wanted a zinging-bird, that gave a groat for a cuckoo; an' he that loses a wife and zixpence, has lost a tester.

Enter Miss TURNBULL.

Why, Barbara, what be's the matter wi' thee? Where hast thee been?

Miss T. Been! Why I ha' bin wildered.

Turn. What lost!

Miss T. Ees; an' if I had na' by good hap met wi' John, who has got direction in written hand, it were vive golden guineas to a brass varthin I'd been kidnapped an' zent to America, among the Turks.

Turn. Zerve thee right, thee must be gadding; but I ha' news vor thee, the cow has kicked down the milk; it's all off 'tween miss and I.

Miss T. Zure! rabbit me an I didn't guess as much.

Turn. Ees, the nail's clenched; zhe and I ha' zhook hands, an' parted.

Miss T. My gracious! What, won't yo' ha' zhe?

Turn. No, I wunt; her may whistle, but I zha'n't hear; her may beckon, but I zha'n't come; catch me an' ha' me, I'm no vool; zo, do you zee, an' you be minded to wed, zay grace an' vall to; vor I don't like your London tricks, an' zo I st leave it as vast as I can.

Miss T. An' when be I to be wed?

Turn. Why, I do vind Zir Hornet be come; zo, when yo' do zee Zir Harry, yo' may zettle 't; an', d'ye hear, Barbara, don't let me vind yo' at any o'these skittish off an' on vreaks; I ha' zeen too much on 'um lately. Oh! here be Zir Harry coming, an' zo I st leave you to make love your own way; I st not play my ace o'trumps out yet. [Exit.]

Enter Sir HARRY PORTLAND.

Sir Harry. So, here's my good whimsical uncle's nonpareil, as he calls her—his phœnix. All alone, Miss Turnbull?

Miss T. Ees; brother be just gone; a's vallen out wi' miss, an' a's plaguily frumped.

Sir Harry. Sure!

Miss T. Ees; a zaid, too, 'at yo' an' I be to make love.

Sir Harry. He did!

Miss T. Ees; and I do know his tricks; a'll be in a woundy rage, an I don't do as he bids me.

Sir Harry. What, will he be surly?

Miss T. Zurly! a'll snarl worser than our great dog, Jowler, at a beggar.

Sir Harry. He is ill-tempered, then?

Miss T. Oh! I'll zulk vor a vortnight round, an' when a comes about again, a'll make a believe to romp; an' then a' lumps, an' gripes, an' pinches, till I am quite a weary on't.

Sir Harry. Well you may, I think. Poor thing. [Aside.] And which way are we to make love?

Miss T. My gracious! don't you know?

Sir Harry. I believe I can give a guess; you, I suppose, are to hang down your head and titter.

Miss T. Ees.

Sir Harry. A—hem! and look sheepish.

Miss T. Ees.

Sir Harry. You gnaw your apron; I twirl my thumbs.

Miss T. He, he! Ees.

Sir Harry. You say—it's a very fine day, sir; and I answer, yes, ma'am, only it rains.

Miss T. He, he, he! Ees, iverk, that be vor all the world the very moral of our country vashion. Oh! but here be zomebody coming.

Enter Sir HORNET ARMSTRONG, CLARA, and VANDERVELT.

Sir Hor. Why, Harry, you dog, what, have you hid yourself, because you would not see me?

Sir Harry. Dear sir, I am exceedingly glad to see you, but it is not a quarter of an hour since I heard of your being in town; and I suppose, sir, you will scarcely be angry at finding me in this company.

[VAND., Sir HARRY, and Miss T. retires.]

Sir Hor. Finding you in—Zounds! what awkward cargo of rusticity has he got there?

[To CLARA.]

Clara. A young lady from Somersetshire, with a tolerably good fortune, that Sir Harry, it is thought by some, intends to marry.

Sir Hor. Marry! He should as soon marry the mummy of queen Semiramis.

Clara. She has been strongly recommended to the family, sir.

Sir Hor. Recommended! By whom?

Clara. By one you are very intimate with, and who has very great influence with Sir Harry, as well as with yourself.

Sir Hor. Ay! Who is that?

Clara. Pardon me there, Sir Hornet.

Sir Hor. Certainly the fellow cannot be foolish enough to admire her; but I shall soon discover that, by what he thinks of you. Harkye, Harry!

Sir Harry. Sir.

Sir Hor. I cannot, upon the whole, tell very well what to make of you. Are you thoroughly convinced that you are, at this instant, legally capable of making your will?

Sir Harry. My will, sir!

Sir Hor. Ay, are you of sound mind?

Sir Harry. I believe so, sir.

Sir Hor. Then pray tell me, now we have you face to face, what is your opinion of Miss Turnbull?

Sir Harry. Sir, that is by no means a question proper to be answered in this company.

Sir Hor. Psha! D—n your delicacy. Make your panegyric, and I'll blush for her and you, too.

Sir Harry. Sir, I have no panegyric to make.

Sir Hor. Sir!

Sir Harry. Even so.

Sir Hor. Why you impudent, confounded—Have you the barefaced effrontery, with such a picture before your eyes, to—

Sir Harry. You have applied the torture, and my own ease requires confession.

Sir Hor. Humph! And so you—Now, pray, all be attentive, for Bacon's brazen head is going to utter. So you do not think Miss Turnbull a most engaging—[Sir HARRY smiles.]—Why, you intolerable—

Sir Harry. I am concerned to see you so serious on the subject. I must acknowledge, that in this case, sir, I have either a most perverse or stupid imagination, and, cannot, for the soul of me, discover the latent wonders in the young lady, which your better sight has so distinct a view of.

Sir Hor. Ha!

Sir Harry. I am, however, exceedingly willing to try the utmost strength of my faith, to believe as much as I can, and take the rest for granted; provided you will not inflict the punishment of a wife upon my superstition.

Sir Hor. Obliging youth! [Bows.] Inflict the punishment of a wife upon your superstition! And so you think, no doubt, a wife a burthen much too heavy for the back of so fine and pretty a town-made gentleman as yourself.

Sir Harry. With the addition of Miss Turnbull's accomplishments, I most undoubtedly do, sir.

Sir Hor. You do! Humph! Pray, most civil sir, permit me to ask—perhaps there may be some other lady in this good company, to whom your profound penetration would give the preference?

Sir Harry. If such preference could, in the least, make me deserving of her, I have no scruple to say there is.

Sir Hor. Miracle of modesty! There is?

Sir Harry. Most assuredly. But, though to possess the lady you hint at, would make me blessed beyond description, I have never dared to declare so much before, because I am conscious of being unworthy of such a profusion of charms and accomplishments.

Clara. Generous diffidence!

[Aside.

Sir Hor. Charms and—What the devil is all this? Where am I, at sea, or on shore? Have I a calen- ture in my brain, or is this my nose! They—they call you Sir Harry Portland, don't they, sir?

Sir Harry. And your nephew, sir.

Sir Hor. No; that's rather dubious. Well, then, Mr. Harry, or Sir Harry, or what you please, you are pretty well convinced, I suppose, that I have had some slight regard for you?

Sir Harry. Perfectly, sir, and remember it with gratitude.

Sir Hor. That remains to be proved, friend. Ever since your father's death, if I don't mistake, I have been tolerably busy, a little active, or so, in forming your mind and manners, and moulding you into a sort of being, a man might behold without blushing.

Sir Harry. It is impossible, sir, I should ever forget your goodness, though I am happy to be reminded of it.

Sir Hor. That's a lie, I believe. However, sir, among the rest of my cares, I was anxious to find a woman worthy of you; nay, so solicitous was I about adjusting preliminaries, that though the gout had laid an embargo upon a parcel of my fingers and toes, I resolved to forego my own ease, and set sail immediately, that I might convoy you safe into the harbour of happiness.

Sir Harry. I am very sensible of the benevolence of your intentions, sir, and only wish you had done me the honour to—

Sir Hor. Well, I have only a word or two more to say on the subject: I have been an enthusiastic old blockhead, 'tis true, and was fool enough to think all men had eyes; however, if you have not either the complaisance, the wit, or the love, to hit upon some expedient to make your peace with Miss Turnbull, I will never see, never know, never speak to you again. And now, sir, you will act as your great wisdom shall direct.

Sir Harry. Indeed, sir, I am distressed to see you so intent upon this business; I am exceedingly unhappy to do the least thing to incur your displeasure, at this moment especially: I have a thousand reasons to be dissatisfied with myself, and am grieved to add your anger to the list. I would do anything in my power to preserve your friendship and affection; but this is too severe a task; I cannot totally forget common sense: I cannot entirely command so delicate a passion as that of love. A little time will discover whether I am ever to think of love or happiness again! of this, however, I am certain, I never can possess either with Miss Turnbull. [Exit.

Sir Hor. Indeed, youngster! so resolute!

Clara. What a noble fortitude!

[Aside.

Sir Hor. We shall see who will first read their re-cantation. An insensible, blind puppy! I'll be a greater torment to him than a beadle to a beggar, a cat to a rat, or a candle to a moth: I'll singe his wings; I'll plague him worse than Moses did the Egyptians.

Clara. Oh! Sir Hornet, you'll soon be of another opinion.

Sir Hor. Never, never, never!

Enter 'Squire TURNBULL, unperceived.

However, let him act as he will, Miss Turnbull shall have no cause to repent her coming to London.

Miss T. What! will yo' take me to zee the zights?

Turn. Who the devil bade that goose cackle?

Sir Hor. A cursed idiot, or I have no skill in physiognomy.

Turn. What, Barbara! Ees, that her be, though no vool, neather: her do know better than to thatch her house wi' pancakes.

Sir Hor. Psha! Miss Turnbull! [To CLARA.

Miss T. Ees, I be here.

Sir Hor. Again! [Takes CLARA by the hand.]

Give me leave, I say, dear Miss Turnbull, to—

Vand. Eh! Sir Hornet!

Clara. Ha, ha, ha!

Sir Hor. Why, what—

Vand. You don't take my turtle for Miss Turnbull, sure?

Sir Hor. Your turtle! I don't know what you mean by your turtle; but I take this young lady for Miss Turnbull, sure.

Vand. You do?

Sir Hor. Yes, I do. [VAND. and CLARA laugh.]

Why, what the devil—Eh!—why, sure—

Vand. Ha, ha, ha! This is a good joke.

Sir Hor. A good joke! Why, madam—'Squire—

Zounds!—

Vand. Ha, ha, ha! I would not have missed this for a thousand pounds, in new coined guineas.

Sir Hor. Mr. Turnbull, sir, is not this your sister, sir?

Turn. Zister!

Sir Hor. Yes.

Turn. What thic?

Sir Hor. Yes.

Turn. Thic Barbara?—

Sir Hor. Zounds! yes, I tell you.

Turn. Why, no, to be sure. Thic be Barbara!

Clara. Ha, ha, ha!

Vand. Ha, ha, ha! the biter bit; the fleecer fleeced.

Sir Hor. [Whistles.] Thic be Barbara!

Turn. Ees, thic be Barbara!

Miss T. Ees, I be Barbara.

Vand. Why, what a numskull your nephew is, Sir Hornet.

Sir Hor. Do you think so?

Vand. A blind, insensible puppy!

Sir Hor. Is he?

Vand. But you'll torment him; you'll singe his wings; you'll plague him worse than Moses did the Egyptians. What a discovery!

Sir Hor. Oh! yes; I have made more discoveries.

Vand. Ay, what are they?

Sir Hor. Why the first is, you're an old fool; the next is, I am another; and the third is, that we are not the only fools in company.

[Exit, followed by CLARA and VAND.

Turn. Barbara!

Miss T. Ees.

Turn. How does thee like London?

Miss T. I knaw not; it do zeem a strange place.

Turn. A strange place!

Miss T. Ees, I do think it be.

Turn. Thee dost?

Miss T. Ees.

Turn. An' zo do I; whereby, dost zee, I'll get out on't as vast as I can. A pretty chace, as the man zaid that rode vifty miles a'ter a wild goose. London! An this be London, the devil take London. Come, pack up thy ribbands an' vlappets, an' make thyzel ready.

Miss T. Neca, zure; you wunt go zo zoon.

Turn. Wunt I? An' I stay in thic town to-night, I'll eat it vor breakfast to-morrow.

Miss T. My gracious!

Turn. Come, come, don't stand mauxing and dawdling, but make thyzel ready.

Miss T. Lard! why I a' zeen nothing yet.

Turn. No, nor nothing thee zhalt zee, that I promise thee; zo stir thy stumps, I tell thee.

Miss T. My gracious! Mun I go down into t' country again like a vool, an' ha' nothing to zay vor myzel?

Turn. Why, look thee, Barbara; come along; vor thee have come up like a vool, zo there can be no harm in thy going down like a vool. [Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Library in Sir Harry Portland's House.

Sir HARRY PORTLAND and TIMID discovered.

Timid. Indeed, sir, you have always been the best of masters to me.

Sir Harry. No, Timid, no; I have been a very weak, idle, fellow; and have put it out of my power to be a good master to any one.

Timid. Lackaday! Sir, don't say so; I am afraid I have been a bad servant; a very bad servant.

Sir Harry. Never.

Timid. Lackaday! Sir, you don't know, you don't know! Lackaday! I thought all for the best.

Sir Harry. You have only done what I commanded.

Timid. To be sure, sir. But, lackaday!—I wish I dared to open my mind to him. I am terrified; he will never believe me innocent. [Aside.]

Sir Harry. My ruin is all my own work. Here, Mr. Timid, take this ring, and remember me; it may be the last present I shall ever make you.

Timid. Pray don't say so, sir. I am terrified.

Sir Harry. I am going to Mr. Osborne's.

Timid. To Mr. Osborne's!

Sir Harry. Yes; if you should not see me to-morrow morning; if any accident should happen—

Timid. Lackaday!

Sir Harry. Give the state of my affairs, which I ordered you to draw up, to my uncle, and this picture to Clara, the young lady that is with him.

Timid. Sir! What do you mean?

Sir Harry. Oh! nothing, nothing; I'm not very well; I—a slight swimming in my head, that's all; but there is no knowing what may happen.

Timid. Lackaday! Sir, you terrify me; you talk like a dying man making his will.

Sir Harry. No, no, not so; I have nothing to leave: and, as to dying, men must die; live as long as they can, they must all die at last.

Timid. Shall I go for Sir Hornet, or your sister, or the young lady?

Sir Harry. No; no young ladies for—Oh!

Timid. Lackaday! my heart aches.

Sir Harry. I am going to Mr. Osborne's presently.

Timid. Lackaday!—I wish he knew: I'll take the mortgage of the Kentish estate; Mr. Osborne ordered me to bring it: I'll lay it open on Mr. Osborne's table. I hope my dear master will see it; I hope he will discover all. [Aside.]

Sir Harry. Heigho!

Timid. Dear sir, don't sigh so; don't look so: tell me what I can do to serve you, to oblige you, to make you happier?

Sir Harry. Nothing, nothing; past hope, past cure; quite, quite—

Timid. Lackaday!

Sir Harry. A thoughtless, profligate, idle, dissipated fellow. Oh! my head, my head!

Timid. I cannot bear to see him so. I'll hurry to Mr. Osborne's; I'll try if I can yet persuade him to be a true friend; I'll beg, I'll pray, I'll go down on my knees; I'll do anything. [Exit.]

Sir Harry. Clara! an angel! a cherub! And what am I? Well, well, it will soon be all over; there will be a sudden stop—a speedy end. [Laughing without.] So happy—Heaven—Heaven increase your joys! mine are for ever fled—light laughter, innocent smiles, and social mirth are fled for ever, for ever Oh, folly! Oh, madness! [Exit.]

Enter Sir HORNET, VANDERVELT, and CLARA, laughing.

Sir Hor. Ay, ay, pray laugh, laugh heartily, I beseech you; I deserve, and I desire no mercy.

Clara. It is one of the oddest adventures.

Vand. How the deuce could you mistake that blowzabel, Miss Turnbull, for my turtle?

Sir Hor. Why, true, as you say, friend Van; but that happens to be a blunder which I never did, nor ever could make. I should as soon take myself for a king, or you for a conjuror. I only mistook this lady to be Miss Turnbull, not Miss Turnbull to be this lady.

Vand. Mistook Miss Turnbull and this lady, and—I don't understand it.

Clara. Be kind enough, Sir Hornet, to explain the matter.

Sir Hor. You remember, madam, I had some conversation with you in the Rooms at Bath.

Clara. Perfectly.

Sir Hor. And you could not but perceive how forcibly I was struck with your wit, beauty, and accomplishments.

Clara. I recollect you were very polite, sir, and were pleased to say abundance of obliging things.

Sir Hor. Not half so many as I thought, I assure you, madam.

Vand. Well said, Sir Hornet. My old friend is quite enamoured with you, turtle.

Sir Hor. Yes, sir, so I am; though I do not intend to marry the lady.

Vand. Hem!

Sir Hor. My grand object, the thing that, of all others, I have most at heart, is to see my nephew, Sir Harry, happy; as for myself, I feel I am growing old apace, and am almost tired of the farce of life.

Vand. Why so, Sir Hornet? I am sure you play your part excellently.

Sir Hor. No, no; I am rolling down hill apace, and as the first steep declivity may precipitate me to the bottom, there are certain affairs I wish to see finished, one of which is the marriage of Sir Harry.

Clara. So the person you asked concerning me, when I went out of the rooms, mistook the question, and thought you meant Miss Turnbull?

Sir Hor. So it appears, madam; and I was too much enraptured to stay to rectify mistakes. When I negotiated the affair with 'Squire Turnbull, I studiously avoided an interview with his supposed sister, for fear the business should wear a face of precipitate delicacy; and I thought if I could once bring you and Sir Harry together, I would leave the contingent possibilities to love, and the superior good qualities and penetration of the parties, which I, rationally enough, concluded could not fail to produce the desired effect.

Clara. But, Sir Hornet, how did it happen that you did not enquire of me myself who I was?

Sir Hor. Why, 'faith! madam, I had been so particular with you, and had spoken so freely on the subjects of love and matrimony, that I was afraid, if I made those kind of inquiries, you would mistake the matter, perhaps, and think I wanted to make love to you in my own proper person. Hey, young Van?

[Aside.

Vand. Heigho!

Clara. Oh! no, Sir Hornet, I assure you, I had a better opinion of your understanding.

Vand. Hem!

Sir Hor. Certainly, had I been capable of such a whim, I should have made myself curiously ridiculous. Hey! young Van?

[Aside.

Clara. Beyond dispute!

Vand. Heigho!

Enter TIMID, looking wild and frightened.

Sir Hor. Heyday! What's the matter with you, old Lackaday?

Timid. I'm terrified, I'm terrified, I'm terrified!

Sir Hor. Terrified! What's the matter? Zounds! why don't you speak?

Timid. Lackaday! I can't, I can't speak.

Sir Hor. Make signs then.

Timid. I'm a miserable old man; I ran all the way to tell you—

Sir Hor. What?

Timid. Mr. Osborne!

Sir Hor. Mr. Osborne! What of him?

Timid. Lackaday! Sir Harry!

Clara. Heavens! A duel.

Timid. I have put my trust in man, and am deceived; I have leaned upon a reed, and am fallen; I have seen the shadow of friendship, and—

Sir Hor. Curse light on your metaphors; come to facts: What of Osborne? What of Sir Harry? Where are they? What have they done? What are they doing?

Timid. Gambling!

Sir Hor. How!

Timid. I was at Mr. Osborne's when Sir Harry came; I was there with the mortgage of the Kentish estate.

Sir Hor. Of what?

Timid. It was executed this very day; I am a miserable old man—all lost!

Sir Hor. Lost!

Timid. Lackaday! that's not all; I went into the next room and heard Sir Harry go to gaming with a gang of sharpers that were there on purpose; Sir Harry had lost everything he had in the world; Mr. Osborne has got all—the mortgages of all his estates: I saw 'em, left 'em all in a box on his table.

Sir Hor. Mortgages of all his estates! Perdition! How did he get them? How came you to know?

Timid. Lackaday! I am terrified, I dare not tell;

I am an accomplice! A wicked, innocent, miserable old man.

Sir Hor. D——n! Order the coach, there! I'll tear him to atoms; I'll rend him piecemeal—my poor boy—an intolerable villain! Dear madam, you don't know what I feel.

Clara. Pardon me, Sir Hornet, if you knew my heart, you would not say so; I detest the treachery of Mr. Osborne as much as you do; and, woman as I am, would risk my life to see it properly punished.

Sir Hor. A smooth-tongued, hypocritical villain, that owes his life to my boy.

Clara. Dear Sir Hornet, excuse my weakness; I am in the utmost terror—in dread of consequences still more fatal.

Timid. Lackaday! sir, so am I; I am terrified. Sir Harry gave me this ring for a remembrance, and bade me deliver this picture to you, madam.

Clara. [Bursts into tears.] It is his own.

Timid. He looked so melancholy, and so furious; he had his pistols.

Clara. His pistols! Oh! for pity's sake, Sir Hornet, let us fly.

Sir Hor. Instantly.

Timid. I'm a miserable old man. [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—Mr. Osborne's House.

Enter Sir HARRY PORTLAND excessively agitated, followed by OSBORNE with a brace of pistols that he had wrested from him.

Osborne. How now, Sir Harry; what is the cause of this sudden phrenzy? Why expose your want of temper and fortitude thus to the company? You have driven them away, they are all going—

Sir Harry. Oh! horror!

Osborne. If you must wreak vengeance on yourself, let it be a becoming one at least.

Sir Harry. Insupportable horror!

Osborne. Fie, fie, recover your temper; be, or seem to be a man. What!—you knew you were ruined before this event.

Sir Harry. Oh, Osborne! Oh, Melissa! I cannot speak—I cannot utter it; I'm a wretch—a villain, the meanest, the worst of villains; and infamy, eternal infamy is mine.

Osborne. Why, what have you done?

Sir Harry. Ruined you, ruined my sister.

Osborne. How!

Sir Harry. And branded myself, everlastingly, a villain.

Osborne. Ruined me! ruined your sister! which way?

Sir Harry. The money I have lost within—

Osborne. Well?

Sir Harry. Is her's—Is your's.

Osborne. Mine!

Sir Harry. Melissa's—her fortune—she put it into my hand this very day.

Osborne. D——n!

Sir Harry. Have compassion on me, give me the pistols, let me at once put an end to my misery and shame.

Osborne. Thoughtless, weak man! Do you think the momentary pang of death a sufficient punishment for the ruin and destruction you have entailed upon all those who have had the misfortune to love, or to be related to you? Do you think that to die, and to forget, at once, your infamy and crimes, is a compensation for the havoc you have made with the peace and property of those who were dearest to you, who must live to feel the effect of your vices, and bear, unjustly, the reproach of your abandoned conduct.

Sir Harry. Oh! torture!

Os. Was it not enough that you had reduced yourself, from affluence and honour, to contempt and beggary, but you must wantonly, wickedly sport with what was not your own; and involve the innocent and unborn in your wretchedness? Shall not your sister's offspring, whom your intemperance shall have reduced to poverty and misery, detest your memory, and imprecate curses on your name?

Sir Harry. Oh, hell!

Sir HORNET ARMSTRONG speaks without, and afterwards enters, followed by CLARA and TIMID.

Sir Hor. Where are they? which is the room? So, Mr. Lucifer—could you decoy your friend to no other place to rob him, but your own house?

Os. Did you address yourself to me, Sir Hornet?

Sir Hor. Yes, I did, Sir Satan, and if—

Sir Harry. Dear sir, forbear; I alone am the proper object of anger—of vengeance—a wretch—a despised and miserable outcast; and bitterness and despair are deservedly my portion.

Sir Hor. You are a dupe, a poor fascinated fool; you have beheld the serpent's mouth open, have felt the influence of his poisonous breath, yet stupidly dropped into his ravenous jaws, and sung a requiem to your own destruction.

Os. You are liberal, sir, of your epithets and accusations. What do you mean by them?

Sir Hor. Horrible impudence! Have you not taken a vile, a rascally advantage of the want of temper in the man for whom you professed the most perfect friendship? Have you not stripped him of his estate, by the most villainous arts, by plotting with Jews and scoundrels?

Os. You talk loud, sir.

Sir Harry. Osborne plotting! the letter then was true.

Sir Hor. Yes, plotting! He is the principal, the leader of the hellish gang that has been plundering you.

Os. Well, sir! suppose it—What then?

Sir Hor. What then! Halts!

Os. Why so, sir? He has persisted in bringing destruction upon himself, and must suffer the effects of his obstinacy. What crime was there in my receiving what he was resolved to throw away? He had not been a month returned from his travels, before his passion for play made him the jest of every polite sharper in town. They saw there was an estate to be scrambled for, and every one was industrious to obtain a share. After squandering a part of his fortune among these adventurers, he engaged at play with me, and after losing one sum, was never easy till he had lost another. Am I, then, to be accountable for his folly?

Sir Harry. Infernal treachery! Dares he avow it?

Os. Dare! Yes, sir, I dare.

Clara. Righteous heaven! is there no peculiar, no quick vengeance for ingratitude? [Aside.]

Sir Hor. The deeds, the annuities you have granted, the mortgages you have made, are in his possession; he owns he has them all.

Sir Harry. He!

Os. Yes, sir, I.

Sir Harry. Madness! Remember and beware, remember and tremble! though I have no longer the fortune of Sir Harry Portland, I have still Harry's spirit, and dare chastise insolence and perfidy.

Os. No doubt; the man who is rash enough to risk his estate upon the chance of a die, has, generally, valour enough to wish to cut the winner's throat. Friendship is no protection.

Clara. Friendship! Monstrous prostitution! Friendship! Deeds, Mr. Osborne, are the best proofs of friendship, and that preacher will gain but little credit who is a detected villain, while he is describing the fitness and beauty of moral virtue.

Sir Hor. Friendship! Where are the deeds, the mortgages?

Os. There they are, sir. [Points to a box.] They are mine; the annuities he has granted, and the mortgages he has made, are mine; his effects are mine, his houses are mine, his estates are mine, his notes are mine, his all is mine, except his poverty and spirit, which, as he says, are his own.

Sir Harry. Heavens! must I bear this?

Sir Hor. Oh! for ratsbane or hemp.

Os. Nay more, sir: [To Sir HARRY.] I was not only aware, but certain of my own superior address, or I had not been weak enough to have risked any part of my fortune. I have not yet acquired your heroic contempt for riches; as it was, I used every art to stimulate and incite you to play; took every advantage, studied every trick, improved every lucky chance, and rejoiced at every and all of your losses, till I had you totally in my power; I beheld distress accumulating on your head, and was happy at it; remarked the agitation of your mind, and increased it; saw the infirmity of your temper, and aggravated it.

Sir Harry. D—n! Are you a man?

Os. Try me.

Sir Harry. Dare you give me the satisfaction—the revenge of a man?

Os. I'll give it you instantly, sir. [As Sir Harry offers to go, Osborne seizes his arm, and before he speaks, his countenance changes from assumed anger and contempt, to the most tender and expressive friendship.] There, there lies your revenge! there is your satisfaction! Take them; remember your former folly, and be happy.

Sir Harry. Sir!

Sir Hor. What?

Clara. Astonishment!

Os. Why do you seem surprised? My heart is your's, my life is your's! I owe you everything; a debt which never can be repaid, and never will be forgotten. When sinking beneath the murderous hand of villainy, it was the benevolent ardour of your soul, it was the intrepid valour of your arm that rescued me!

Sir Harry. Generous friend!

Os. In that box is contained all that I have ever won of you, and almost all you have ever lost. I have become an associate with sharpers to protect you from them; and, by sacrificing a little, have preserved the rest. I have worn the mask till it is become too painful, and now gladly cast it off. If my conduct have yet a dubious appearance, I have a witness that will be instantly credited.—[Goes to the chamber-door, and calls Melissa.—MELISSA enters, and runs to Sir Harry.]

Mel. My brother!

Sir Harry. Sister! Osborne!

Clara. Oh, my heart!

Sir Hor. [After a pause.] Tol de rol!

Timid. Lackaday! I'm a happy old man! He's a friend, he's a true friend! I'm a happy old man!

Sir Harry. Can you, too, sister, forgive my folly? you that I have injured so unpardonably?

Mel. Dear brother, you are not so guilty as you suppose. It was a plot upon you; you were led into it, to shew you what a losing gamester is capable of.

Sir Hor. Harkye, sir! [To Osborne.] All the mortgages and deeds are there, you say?

Osborne. All, sir; together with whatever money that has, at any time, been won of him, since I have been concerned in this transaction.

Sir Hor. All in that box?

Osborne. All.

Timid. I'm a happy old man!

Sir Harry. My dear uncle!

Sir Hor. Let me alone—Tol de rol!—[Goes to Osborne, and takes his hand.] Will you forgive me, Osborne? will you—will you forgive my boy?

Sir Harry. [Takes Osborne's other hand.] Osborne!—I cannot speak—

Clara. Indeed, Mr. Osborne, I don't know how to tell you what I think. Esteem, admiration, are poor expressions to convey my feelings. I have been mistaken and to blame. I trembled for Sir Harry; I condemned you; and wrote a letter—

Sir Harry. Dear madam, was that letter your's?

Clara. It was.

Sir Harry. How much obliged am I to you, and to you all.

Clara. I am sorry; I was to blame.

Osborne. Nay, madam; nobody was to blame. And now, dear Harry, suffer me to say one word: let this transaction be a powerful, an everlasting memento to you. Remember the blood that has been spilt in the moment of passion and distress, in consequence of indulging in this shocking vice; remember the distracted wife and widow's curse, the sting of desperation, and the red and impious hand of suicide! Despise the folly that made the practice fashionable; oppose its destructive course; and for ever shun, for ever abominate, the detestable vice of gaming.

Sir Harry. Professions of resolutions from me, Osborne, come with an ill grace. I am ashamed of my folly: I despised, even while I practised it; but the punishment you have inflicted has been so judicious, so severely generous, I think I can safely say there is no probability of a relapse.

Sir Hor. Well, but, Harry, turn about—look at this lady; surely, you have not forgotten Miss Turnbull, have you?

Sir Harry. Your Miss Turnbull, sir, I shall never forget.

Sir Hor. Oh! what you have heard the renowned history of my Bath adventure?

Sir Harry. I have, sir.

Sir Hor. Well, and what say you to—eh! my cherub? You told me, you know, you had no aversion to the fellow.

Clara. Nay, Sir Hornet, is that the part of a confidant?

Sir Hor. Why, yes, it is; for, as I take it, a confidant is but a kind of a go-between to bring the parties together—And here comes the blooming youth—

Enter VANDERVELT.

here comes Johannes de Temporibus, to second the motion.

Vand. To second what motion, Sir Hornet?

Sir Hor. An hymeneal motion.

Vand. Can't tell. Who are the candidates?

Sir Hor. Harry Portland and Clara Forester.

Vand. Hold, hold! Sir Hornet, not so fast! that lady is my ward.

Sir Hor. Yes, and may, if she please, be your wife.

Vand. Nay, I—I did not say so, Sir Hornet.

Sir Hor. No, but I did, young Van. But harkye! [takes him aside] resign all your silly pretensions peaceably, throw your worthies into the fire, and give up the lady to her lover; or you shall be held up, in terrorem, an object of ridicule, to frighten all the dangling, whining, old fools in Christendom, who are turned of three-score.

Vand. Well, well, speak in a lower key.

Sir Hor. May I be certain of your consent, then?

Vand. Why, yes, yes—Heigho!

Sir Hor. Dear madam, this worthy old gentleman, your guardian, most humbly implores you would have pity upon Sir Harry.

Clara. Did you say so, papa?

Vand. Me! no.

Sir Hor. How?

Vand. Not in those exact words; but something very like it, turtle. Heigho!

Mel. Come, my dear Clara, let me have the happiness to call you sister.

Osborne. Let me intercede, madam.

Clara. Psha! here is everybody interceding, but him that can intercede most to the purpose.

Sir Harry. Forgive me, dearest Clara! my fate is suspended on your lips; and I am so conscious of unworthiness, and so much affected by the fear of a severe sentence, that I have not power to plead for mercy.

Clara. Yes; but you have a partial, tender-hearted judge.

Sir Hor. Ay, "and a wise young judge," too.

Clara. Well, well! I cannot dissemble. A generous heart, a noble mind, are seldom met and seldom merited. When happiness like this presents itself, to reject is not to deserve it. [Exeunt.]

THE SCHOOL FOR ARROGANCE;

A COMEDY, IN FIVE ACTS,

BY THOMAS HOLCROFT.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

COUNT CONOLLY VILLARS
SIR PAUL PECKHAM
SIR SAMUEL SHEEPY
DORIMONT
EDMUND
MAC DERMOT
PICARD EXEMPT.

LADY PECKHAM
LUCY
LYDIA
Servants.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The House of Sir Paul Peckham.

Enter LYDIA, followed by MAC DERMOT.

Lydia. Once again, Mr. Mac Dermot, have done with this nonsense.

Mac D. Arrah! and why so scoffish? Sure, now, a little bit of making love—

Lydia. Pshā! Do me the favour to answer my questions. The Count, your master, is in love with Miss Lucy Peckham?

Mac D. 'Faith! and you may say that.

Lydia. Is he really well born?

Mac D. Oh! as for that, honey, let him alone. The noblest blood of France, ay, and what is better, of Ireland, too, trickles to his fingers' ends. The Villars, and the O'Counollies.

Lydia. And he wishes to marry into the family of the Peckhams?

Mac D. The devil a bit, my dear:

Lydia. How?

Mac D. He is very willing to marry the young lady, but not her family. His pride and his passion have had many a tough battle about that, d'ye see. Only think! a direct descendant of the former kings of Ireland, and collateral cousin to a present peer of France, to besmear and besmoulder his dignity by rubbing it against porter butts, vinegar casks, and beer barrels.

Lydia. Miss Lucy is, indeed, a lovely girl; animated to excess, and sometimes apparently giddy and flighty: but she has an excellent understanding, and a noble heart; and these are superior to birth, which is indeed a thing of mere accident.

Mac D. 'Faith! and that it is. I, a simple Irishman, as I am—why now, I would have been born a duke, had they been civil enough to have asked my consent.

Lydia. The Count fell in love with her at the convent, to which she was sent to improve her French.

Mac D. And where I think you first met with her?

Lydia. Yes; she saw me friendless, and conceived a generous and disinterested affection for me. He has followed her to England; has taken apartments in our neighbourhood, and lives in splendour—yet is not rich.

Mac D. Um, um! No; but, then, he is a colonel in the Irish brigade; and, besides his pay, has sacrit supplies.

Lydia. From whom?

Mac D. 'Faith! and I don't believe he knows that himself.

Lydia. That's strange! His pride is excessive.

Mac D. To spake the truth, that now is his failing. An' if it was not for that, oh! he would be the jewel of a master! He trates his infiarors with countimp, keeps his distance with his aquals, and values the rubbishing dust of his great-grandfathers above diamonds!

Lydia. His character is in perfect contrast to that of his humble rival, Sir Samuel Sheepy; who, even when he addresses a footman, is all bows and affability; whose chief discourse is, "Yes, if you please," and, "No, thank you;" and who, in the company of his mistress, stammers, blunders, and blushes, like a great boy.

Mac D. What is it you till me? He the rival of the Count my master! that old—

Lydia. A bachelor, and only fifty; rich, of a good family, and a great favourite with Lady Peckham, by never having the courage to contradict her.

Mac D. Why, there now! You talk of the Count's pride! Here is this city lady as proud as ten Counts! Her own coach-horses, ready harnessed, don't carry their heads higher! And then she is as insolent, and as vulgar, and—Hem!

Enter Lady PECKHAM and Sir SAMUEL SHEEPY, followed by two Footmen, in very smart morning-jackets.

Lady P. Here, fellows! go with these here cards. [Footmen receive each a parcel of large cards, and are going.] And, do you hear? When you comes back, get those dismal heads of yours better powdered; put on your noo liveries, and make yourselves a little like Christians. These creeters are no better nor brootes, Sir Samooel! They are all so monstrous low and vulgar? I have a party to-night; I hopes you will make von?

Sir S. Certainly, my lady.

Lady P. So, miss, is Sir Paul come to town?

Lydia. I have not seen him, madam.

Lady P. Sir Paul generally sleeps at our country seat, at Hackney.

Sir S. A pleasant retreat, my lady!

Lady P. Wastly! A wery paradise!—Where is my daughter, my son?

Lydia. I don't know, madam.

Lady P. And why don't you know? Please to go and tell her Sir Samooel is here. [Exit LYDIA.]—A young purson that my daughter has taken under her pertuction.

Sir S. Seems mild and modest, my lady.

Lady P. Not too much of that, Sir Samooel. [Surveying MAC DERMOT.] Who, pray—who are you, young man?

Mac D. I!—Faith? my lady, I—I am—mysilf: Mac Dermot.

Lady P. Who?

Mac D. The Count's gentleman.

Lady P. Gentleman! Gentleman, indeed!—Count's gentleman! Ha! a kind of mungrel Count, Sir Samooel; half French, half Irish! As good a gentleman, I suppose, as his footman here. I believes you have seen him, though?

Sir S. I think I once had the honour to meet him here, my lady.

Lady P. An honour, Sir Samooel, not of my seeking, I assure you. Aspires to the hand of Miss Looey Peckham! He! An outlandish French foriner! I hates 'em all! I looks uppon none on 'em as no better nor savages! What do they vant with us? Why, our money, to be sure! A parcel of beggars! I wishes I was queen of England for von day only! I would usher my orders to take and conquer 'em all, and transport 'em to the plantations, instead of negurs.

Sir S. I have heard, my lady, that the Count was my rival.

Lady P. He your rival, Sir Samooel! He! A half-bred, higglety-pigglety, Irish, French fortun-hunter, rival you, indeed!—

Enter LYDIA.

Vell, miss, where is my daughter?

Lydia. In her own apartment, madam, dressing.

Lady P. She'll be down presently, Sir Samooel. —Gentleman indeed! The Count's gentleman! Ha! Pride and poverty. [Exit with Sir S.]

Mac D. [Highly affronted.] Pride! By the holy footstool, but your ladyship and Lucifer are a pair!

Lydia. [Knocking.] Here comes Sir Paul.

Mac D. Then I will be after going.

Lydia. No, no; stay where you are.

Enter Sir PAUL PECKHAM.

Sir P. Ah! My sweet, dear Liddy! You are the angel I wished first to meet! Come to my—[Run- ning up to her.]—Why, how now, hussy? Why so shy?

Lydia. Reserve your transports, sir, for Lady Peckham.

Sir P. Lady?—But who have we here?

Lydia. Mr. Mac Dermot, sir.

Sir P. Oh! I remember; servant to the Count, my intended son-in-law.

Mac D. The viry same, sir.

[Bows.]

Sir P. I hear an excellent character of your master. They tell me he is a fine, hearty, dauntless, swaggering fellow! If so, he is a man of family, and the very husband for my Lucy.

Mac D. Faith! then, and he is all that.

Sir P. As for this Sir Samuel Sheepy, he shall decamp. A water-drinker! A bowing, scraping, simpering, ceremonious sir! Never contradicts anybody! D—e! An old bachelor! And he! he have the impudence to make love to my fine, young, spirited wench!—But he is my lady's choice! Is she within?

Lydia. Yes, sir.

Sir P. I suppose we shall have a fine breeze on this subject. But, what! am I not the monarch, the Grand Seigneur of this house? Am I not absolute? Shall I not dispose of my daughter as I please? Do you hear, young man? Go, present my compliments to the Count, and tell him, I mean to give him a call this morning.

[LYDIA makes signs to MAC DERMOT to stay.]

Mac D. I am waiting for him here, sir.

Sir P. Waiting for him here, sir! No, sir! You cannot wait for him here, sir!

Mac D. But, sir—

Sir P. And, sir! Why don't you go?

Mac D. The Count bid me, sir—

Sir P. And I bid you, sir, pack! Begone!—[Exit MAC DERMOT.]—Now we're alone, my dear Lydia—Why, where are you going, hussy?

Lydia. Didn't you hear my lady call?

Sir P. Call! No. And if she did, let her call.

Lydia. Surely, sir, you would not have me offend her?

Sir P. Offend! Let me see who dare be offended with you in this house! It is my will that you should be the sultana.

Lydia. Me, sir?

Sir P. You, my queen of hearts! You! My house, my wealth, my servants, myself, all are yours!

Lydia. You talk unintelligibly, sir.

Sir P. Do I? Why, then, I'll speak plainer: I am in love with you! You are a delicious creature, and I am determined to make your fortune! I'll take you a house up in Mary-le-bone; a neat snug box: hire you servants, keep you a carriage; buy you rings, clothes, and jewels, and come and sup with you every evening! Do you understand me now?

Lydia. Perfectly, sir!

Sir P. Well, and—eh!—Does not the plan tickle your fancy? Do not your veins tingle, your heart beat, your—eh? What say you?

Lydia. I really, sir, don't know what to say, except that I cannot comply, unless a lady, whom I think it my duty to consult, should give her consent.

Sir P. What lady? Who?

Lydia. Lady Peckham, sir.

Sir P. My wife! Zounds! are you mad? Tell my wife

Lydia. I shall further ask the advice of your son and daughter, who will wonder at your charity, in taking a poor orphan like me under your protection.

Sir P. Pooh! Nonsense!

Lydia. A little farther off, if you please, sir.

Sir P. Nearer, angel! nearer!

Lydia. I'll raise the house, sir.

Sir P. Psha!

Lydia. Help!

Sir P. My handkerchief! You sweet—

Enter EDMUND.

Edmund. Lydia! sir!

Sir P. How now, sir! [Aside to LYDIA.] Hem! say it was a mouse.

Edmund. What is the matter, sir?

Sir P. What's that to you, sir? What do you want, sir? Who sent for you, sir?

Edmund. I perceive you are not well, sir!

Sir P. Sir?

Edmund. How were you taken?

Sir P. Taken! [Aside.] Young scoundrel!—Take yourself away, sir!

Edmund. Impossible, sir! You tremble! Your looks are disordered! your eyes wild!

Sir P. [Aside.] Here's a dog!

Edmund. Be so obliging, Miss Lydia, as to run and inform Lady Peckham how ill my father is.

Sir P. Why, you imp! [Stopping LYDIA.] Lydia, stay where you are. You audacious! Will you begone?

Edmund. That I certainly will not, sir, while I see you in such a way!

Sir P. Way, sir!—Very well, sir! very well!

Edmund. I'll reach you a chair, sir. Pray, sit down; pray, cool yourself.

Sir P. Oh! that I were cooling you in a horse-poult.

Edmund. You are growing old, sir.

Sir P. You lie, sir!

Edmund. You should be more careful of yourself. Shall I send for a physician?

Sir P. [Aside.] D—e, but I'll physic you; I'll—[Muttering as he goes off.] A sly, invidious—The demure dog has a mind to her himself. Yes, yes; oh! d—e, pitiful Peter! but I'll fit you. [Exit.]

Lydia. You see, sir—

Edmund. [Shrugging.] I do.

Lydia. I must leave this family

Edmund. Leave! Why, charming Lydia, will you afflict me thus? Have I not declared my purpose?

Lydia. Which cannot be accomplished. You promise marriage; but your father will never consent.

Edmund. Then we will marry without his consent.

Lydia. Oh! no. Do not hope it. When I marry, it shall be to render both my husband and myself happy: not to embitter, not to dishonour both.

Enter a Footman.

Foot. A person, who calls himself Mr. Dorimont, inquires for you, madam.

Lydia. Heavens! Can it be? Shew him up instantly. [Exit Footman.]

Edmund. You seem alarmed!

Lydia. No, no; overjoyed!

Edmund. Who is it?

Lydia. I scarcely can tell you. A gentleman who used to visit me in the convent.

Edmund. Have you been long acquainted?

Lydia. Little more than two years; during which he was my monitor, consoler, and guide.

Edmund [Seeing DORIMONT before he enters.] His appearance—

Lydia. Is poor; but his heart is rich in benevolence. Pray leave us. [Exit EDMUND.]

Enter DORIMONT.

[Rushing to meet him.] Ah! sir—

Dori. I am happy to have found you once again.

Lydia. What, sir, has brought you to England?

Dori. Business; part of which was to see you.

Lydia. You have been always generous and kind: yet I am sorry you should see me thus.

Dor. Why? What are you?

Lydia. An humble dependant—a lady's companion.

Dor. Alas! Why did you leave the convent without informing me?

Lydia. 'Twas unexpected. You had forborne your visits; and I feared death, or some misfortune. At my mother's decease, the young lady with whom I live having an affection for me, and seeing me deserted, offered to take me with her to England, promising I should rather be her friend than her companion.

Dori. And has she kept her word?

Lydia. On her part, faithfully, tenderly

Dori. That is some consolation.

Lydia. But—

Dori. What?

Lydia. She has a mother, who does not fail to make inferiority feelingly understand itself.

Dori. [With some emotion.] Indeed! [Collecting himself.] But with whom were you in such earnest conversation when I entered?

Lydia. The brother of my young lady—a gentleman worthy your esteem.

Dori. And worthy yours? You blush.

Lydia. Do you blame me for being just?

Dori. No; he is rich, young, and handsome. Do you often meet?

Lydia. We do.

Dori. You are lovely, inexperienced, and unprotected.

Lydia. Fear nothing; I shall not easily forget myself.

Dori. [Earnestly.] I hope not. But what does he say?

Lydia. That he loves me.

Dori. Is that all?

Lydia. No; he offers me secret marriage.

Dori. Secret marriage!

Lydia. I see the danger, and wish to shun it. You may find me some place of refuge in France.

Dori. Can you so easily renounce all the flattering prospects love has raised?

Lydia. Yes; and not only them, but love itself, when it is my duty.

Dori. Noble-minded girl! Remain where you are; nay, indulge your hopes; for know, your lover will be honoured by your hand.

Lydia. Sir!—Honoured?

Dori. Honoured! By birth you are greatly his superior.

Lydia. Can you be serious? Oh! trifle not with a too trembling heart. Why did my mother conceal this from me? Oh! if true, why die and leave it unrevealed?

Dori. There was reason: she was not your mother.

Lydia. Oh! sir, you have conjured up ten thousand busy thoughts. Is my mother living?

Dori. No.

Lydia. My father?

Dori. He is.

Lydia. Why has he so long forsaken me?

Dori. That must be told hereafter. Be patient; wait the event. You are acquainted with Count Conolly Villars?

Lydia. He visits here.

Dori. I have business with him.

Lydia. Ah! sir, I fear you will meet a cool re ception. Your humble appearance and his pride will but ill agree.

Dori. Fear not; my business is to lower his pride.

Lydia. Sir? he may insult you.

Dori. Humble though I am myself, I hope to teach him humility. To visit you, and to accomplish this, was the purport of my journey. Adieu for the present. Think on what I have said; and, though by birth you are noble, remember, virtue alone is true nobility. [Exit.]

Enter LUCY: her dress more characteristic of the girl than the woman; and her manner full of life, but tempered by the most delicate sensibility.

Lucy. Well, Lydia, any news for me?

Lydia. Mr. Mac Dermot has been here with the Count's compliments; but, in reality, to see if Lady Peckham was at home. You know how he wishes to avoid her.

Lucy. Yes; and I don't wonder at it. She has just been with me, ushering her orders, as she calls it. "I desires, miss, you will receive Sir Samooel Sheepy as your intended spouse." And so she has sent me here to be courted; and the inamorato is coming, as soon as he can take breath and courage.

Lydia. But why, my dear, do you indulge yourself in mocking your mamma?

Lucy. Lydia, I must either laugh or cry; and, though I laugh, I assure you it is often with an aching heart.

Lydia. My dear girl!

Lucy. I hope, however, you will own there is no great harm in laughing a little at this charming Adonis, this whimsical lover of mine.

Lydia. Perhaps not.

Lucy. What can his reason be for making love to me?

Lydia. There's a question! Pray, my dear, do you never look in your glass?

Lucy. Um—yes. But does he never look in his glass, too?

Lydia. Perhaps his sight begins to decay. But are you not alarmed?

Lucy. No.

Lydia. Do not you love the Count?

Lucy. Um—Yes.

Lydia. Well, and you know how violent and prejudiced Lady Peckham is.

Lucy. Perfectly. But I have Sir Paul on my side; and, as for Sir Samuel, he was dandled so long in the nursery, and is still so much of the awkward, bashful boy, that he will never dare to put the question directly to me; and I am determined never to understand him till he does.

Lydia. Here he comes.

Lucy. Don't leave me.

Enter Sir SAMUEL SHEEPY.

Sir S. [Bowling with trepidation.] Madam—Hem! Madam—

Lucy. [Curtsying and mimicking.] Sir—Hem! Sir—[Aside to LYDIA.] Count his bows.

Sir S. Madam, I—Hem! I am afraid—I am troublesome.

Lucy. Sir—Hem! A gentleman of your merit—Hem!

Sir S. [Continues bowling through most of the scene.] Oh! madam, I am afraid—Hem!—You are busy.

Lucy. [Curtsying to all his bows.] Sir—Hem!

Sir S. Do me the honour to bid me begone.

Lucy. Surely, sir, you would not have me guilty of rudeness?

Sir S. [Aside.] What a blunder! Madam—Hem! I ask ten thousand pardons.

Lucy. Good manners require—Hem!

Sir S. That I should begone without bidding.

[Going.]

Lucy. Sir!

Sir S. [Aside.] I suppose I'm wrong again.

Lucy. I didn't say so, sir.

Sir S. [Turning quick.] Didn't you, madam?

Lucy. A person of your politeness, breeding, and accomplishments—Hem!—

Sir S. [Aside.] She's laughing at me.

Lucy. Ought to be treated with all reverence.

[Curtsying with ironic gravity.]

Sir S. [Aside.] Yes; she's making a fool of me.

Lucy. Sir! Were you pleased to speak, sir? Hem!

Sir S. Hem!—Not a word, madam.

Lydia. This will be a witty conversation.

Lucy. I presume, sir—hem!—you have something to communicate.

Sir S. Madam!—Hem!—Yes, madam—I mean no, madam. No, nothing—Hem!

Lydia. Nothing, Sir Samuel!

Sir S. Hem!—Nothing; nothing.

Lucy. Then may I take the liberty, sir, to inquire—hem!—what the purport of your visit is?—hem!

Sir S. The—the—the—hem!—the—purport is—hem!—I—I have really forgotten.

Lucy. Oh! pray, sir, take time to recollect yourself.—Hem! I am sure, Sir Samuel—hem!—you have something to say to me. Hem!

Sir S. Yes; no, no; nothing.

Lydia. Fie! Sir Samuel, nothing to say to a lady?

Sir S. No.—Hem! I never had anything to say to ladies in my life. That is—Yes, yes; I own—I have something of the—the utmost—hem!

Lucy. Indeed!

Sir S. A thing which—lies at my heart.—Hem!

Lucy. Mercy! Sir Samuel!—Hem!

Sir S. Which I—hem!—have long—But I will take some other opportunity. [Offering to go.]

Lucy. By no means, Sir Samuel. You have quite alarmed me! I am impatient to hear! I am afraid you are troubled in mind.—Hem!

Sir S. Why,—hem!—Yes, madam,—rather—hem!

Lucy. I declare, I thought so. I am very sorry. Perhaps you are afraid of death?

Sir S. Madam!

Lucy. Yet you are not so very old.

Sir S. Madam!

Lucy. But I would not have you terrify yourself too much.—Hem!

Sir S. Madam!

Lucy. I perceive I have guessed it.

Sir S. Madam!—Hem!—No, madam

Lucy. What, then, is this important secret? Nay, pray tell me. Hem!

Sir S. Hem! N—n—n—n not at present, madam.

Lucy. Nay, Sir Samuel—

Sir S. Some other time, madam.—Hem!

Lucy. And can you be so cruel to me? Can you? I declare I shall dream about you: shall think I see you in your winding-sheet; or some such frightful figure; and shall wake all in a tremble.—Hem!

Sir S. A tremble, indeed, madam!

Lucy. And won't you tell me, Sir Samuel? Won't you?

Sir S. N—n—n—n not at present, madam.—Hem!

Lucy. Well, if you won't, Sir Samuel, I must leave you; for what you have said has absolutely given me the vapours.—Hem!

Sir S. I, madam? Have I given you the vapours?
 Lucy. Yes, you have, Sir Samuel; and shockingly, too. You have put such gloomy ideas into my mind—

Sir S. Bless me, madam—hem!

Lucy. Your salts, Lydia!—Hem!

Sir S. I hope, madam, you—you are not very ill.
 Lucy. Oh! I shall be better in another room.—Hem!

Sir S. [Aside.] Yes, yes; 'tis my company that has given her the vapours. [Aloud.] Shall I—

[Confusedly offering his arm.]

Lucy. No, no; stay where you are, Sir Samuel.

Sir S. [Aside.] She wants to be rid of me.—Hem!

Lucy. Only, remember, you are under a promise to tell me your secret.—Hem!—If you don't, I shall certainly see your ghost. Remember—Hem! [Exit.]

Sir S. Madam—I—[To LYDIA.] Miss Lydia—Hem!

Lydia. Sir?

Sir S. If you would—hem!—be so civil, I—

Lydia. Oh! sir, I have the vapours as bad as Miss Lucy. [Exit.]

Sir S. Have you?—Hem! Bless me! the vapours! My old trick. I always give young ladies the vapours; I make 'em ill. They are always sick of me—hem! 'Tis very strange, that I can't learn to talk without having a word to say; a thing so common, too. Why can't I give myself monkey airs; skip here and there; be self-sufficient, impertinent, and behave like a puppy; purposely to please the ladies? What! Is there no such thing to be found as a woman who can love a man for his modesty? This foreign count, now, my rival, is quite a different thing! He, [imitating]—he walks with a straight back, and a cocked-up chin, and a strut, and a stride, and stares, and takes snuff, and—Yes, yes; he's the man for the ladies! [Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in the House of Sir Paul Peckham.

Enter LYDIA.

Lydia. I cannot forget it. My father alive, and I of noble descent! 'Tis very strange! Hope, doubt, and apprehension, are all in arms! Imagination hurries me beyond all limits of probability.

Enter EDMUND.

Edmund. Why do you thus seek solitude?

Lydia. To indulge thought.

Edmund. Has your friend brought you bad news?

Lydia. No.

Edmund. What has he said?

Lydia. Strange things.

Edmund. Heavens! What?

Lydia. You would think me a lunatic, were I to repeat them.

Edmund. Lydia, you are unjust.

Lydia. Am I? Well, then, I am told—would you believe it?—I am told that my family is illustrious.

Edmund. Good heavens! 'tis true!—I feel it is true! Charming Lydia, [kneeling] thus let love pay you that homage which the blind and malignant world denies.

Lydia. Rise, Edmund! Birth can, at best, but confer imaginary dignity: there is no true grandeur, but of mind.

Edmund. Some one is coming.

Lydia. Ay, ay; get you gone.

Edmund. I am all transport!

Lydia. Hush! Away!

Edmund. My angel!

[Kisses her hand, and exit hastily.]

Enter Footman, introducing DORIMONT.

Foot. A gentleman to you, madam.

Lydia. This sudden return, sir, is kind.

Dori. I have bethought me. The moment is critical, and what I have to communicate, of importance. Are we secure?

Lydia. We are: this is my apartment. [LYDIA goes and bolts the door.] Have you seen the Count, sir?

Dori. No; but I have written to him anonymously.

Lydia. And why anonymously!

Dori. To rouse his feelings, wound his vanity, and excite his anger. His slumbering faculties must be awakened. Is he kind to you?

Lydia. No; yet I believe him to be, generally, benevolent, and of noble heart; though his habitual haughtiness gives him the appearance of qualities the very reverse.

Dori. Worthy, kind girl! You were born for the consolation of a too unfortunate father!

Lydia. Again you remind me that I have a father. Why am I not allowed to see him? Why am I not suffered to fly into his arms?

Dori. He dreads lest his wretched and pitiable condition should make you meet him with coldness.

Lydia. Oh! how little does he know my heart! Yet speak: tell me, what monster was the cause of his misery?

Dori. The monster, pride.

Lydia. Pride?

Dori. Your mother's pride, which first squandered his wealth, and next endangered his life.

Lydia. How you alarm me!

Dori. A despicable dispute for precedence was the occasion of a duel, in which your father killed his antagonist, whose enraged family, by suborning witnesses, caused him to be convicted of murder; obliged him to fly the kingdom; and, with your mother, wander under a borrowed name, a fugitive in distant countries.

Lydia. Heavens! But why leave me ignorant of my birth?

Dori. That, being unfortunate, you might be humble; that you might not grieve after happiness which you seemed destined not to enjoy. 'Twas the precaution of a fond father, desirous to alleviate, if not to succour, your distress.

Lydia. Oh! how I burn to see him. Is he not in danger? Is his life secure?

Dori. He himself can scarcely say. His enemies have discovered him; are hot in pursuit; and fertile in stratagems and snares. They know that justice is now busied in his behalf; but justice is slow, and revenge is restless. Their activity, I hear, is redoubled.

Lydia. Guard, I conjure you! guard my father's safety! Let me fly to seek him; conduct me to his feet!

Dori. He wished you first to be informed of his true situation; lest, knowing him to be noble, you should expect to see him in all the pomp and affluence, instead of meeting a poor, dejected, forlorn old man.

Lydia. His fears are unjust; injurious to every feeling of filial affection and duty. The little I have,

I will freely partake with him. My clothes, the diamond which my supposed mother left me, whatever I possess, shall instantly be sold for his relief: my life shall be devoted to soften his sorrows. Oh! that I could prove myself worthy to be his daughter. Oh! that I could pour out my soul to secure his felicity.

Dori. Forbear! let me breathe! Affection cannot find utterance! Oh! this melting heart! My child!

Lydia. Sir?

Dori. My Lydia!

Lydia. Heavens!

Dori. My child! my daughter!

Lydia. [Falling at his feet.] Can it be?—My father! Oh, ecstasy!

Dori. Rise, my child! Suffer me to appease my melting heart!—Oh! delight of my eyes! Why is not your brother like you?

Lydia. My brother! Who? Have I a brother?

Dori. The Count is your brother.

Lydia. 'Tis too much!

Dori. He is not worthy such a sister.

Lydia. The sister of the Count! I? Ah! Nature, thy instincts are fabulous; for, were they not, his heart would have beaten as warmly towards me, as mine has done for him.

Dori. I will make him blush at his arrogance. You shall witness his confusion, which shall be public, that it may be effectual.

Lydia. Would you have me avoid explanation with him?

Dori. Yes, for the present. I mean to see him. Our meeting will be warm; but he shall feel the authority of a father.

Lydia. If you be a stranger to him, I fear lest—

Dori. No, no; he knows me, but knows not all his obligations to me. I have secretly supplied him with money, and gained him promotion; which he has vainly attributed to his personal merits. But I must be gone. My burthened heart is eased. Once more, dear child of my affections, be prudent. I have much to apprehend; but, should the present moment prove benign, my future days will all be peace.

[Knocking heard at the chamber-door.]

Lydia. [Alarmed.] Who's there?

Sir P. [Without.] 'Tis I! Open the door.

Lydia. I am busy, sir.

Sir P. Psha! Open the door, I tell you.

Dori. Who is it?

Lydia. Sir Paul.

Dori. And does he take the liberty to come into your apartment?

Lydia. Oh! sir, he will take any liberty he can.

Sir P. Why don't you open the door?

Dori. You are surrounded by danger and temptation.

Lydia. Have no fears for me, sir.

Sir P. Will you open the door, I say?

Dori. Let him come in. [LYDIA unbolts the door.]

Enter Sir PAUL PECKHAM.

Sir P. What is the reason, you dear little baggage, that you always shut yourself up so carefully?

Lydia. You are one of the reasons, sir.

Sir P. Psha! you need not be afraid of me.

Lydia. I'm not afraid of you, sir.

Sir P. Why, that's right. I'm come to talk matters over with you. My lady's out a-visiting. [Mimicking.] The coast is clear. I have secured my graceless dog of a son. I suspect—

Lydia. What, sir?

Sir P. But it won't do. Mind! take the hint; I've heard of an excellent house—

Lydia. You are running on as usual, sir.

Sir P. With a convenient back door. I'll bespeak you a carriage. Choose your own liveries; keep as many footmen as you please; indulge in everything your heart can wish. Operas, balls, routs, masquerades; Rotten-row of a Sunday; town house and country house! Bath, Bristol, or Buxton! Hot-Wells, or cold wells! Only—Hem! Eh?

Lydia. Sir, I must not hear such ribaldry.

Sir P. Indeed but you must, my dear! How will you help it? You can't escape me, now! I have you fast. No scapegrace scoundrel of a—[MR. DORMONT comes forward.] And so—

Dori. And so, sir!

Sir P. Zounds! [Pause.] And so! [Looking round.] Locked up together! You were busy.

Dori. Well, sir?

Sir P. Oh! very, sir. Perhaps you have a house yourself, sir—

Dori. Sir?

Sir P. With a convenient back door?

Dori. So far from offering the lady such an insult, I am almost tempted to chastise that impotent effrontery which has been so daring.

Sir P. Hem!—You are very civil, sir; and, as a return for your compliment, I am ready to do myself the pleasure, sir, to wait on you down stairs.

Lydia. I'll spare you the trouble, sir.

Dori. Though this lady's residence here will be but short, I would have you beware, sir, how you shock her ears again, with a proposal so vile.

Sir P. Your caution is kind, sir.

Dori. I am sorry it is necessary, sir. What! The head of a house; the father of a family! Oh! shame! He who, tottering on the brink of the grave, would gratify appetites which he no longer knows, by reducing the happy to misery, and the innocent to guilt, deserves to sink into that contempt and infamy, into which he would plunge unwary simplicity. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—An elegant Apartment at Count Villars'.

Enter MAC DERMOT, and PICARD with a letter in his hand, meeting.

Mac D. So, Mr. Picard, what have you got there?

Picard. Un lettre for Monsieur le Comte.

Mac D. Well, give it me, and go about your business.

Picard. No; I not go about my bisaness. My bisaness is to speaka to you.

Mac D. To me! And what is it you want?

Picard. Mon argent; my vage an my congé! My dismiss!

Mac D. How, man alive?

Picard. You are de—de factotum to de Count. He suffare no somebody to speaka to him; so I am come speaka to you.

Mac D. Arrah, now! and are you crazy? Quit the sarvice of a Count! Your reason, man?

Picard. My raison is you talka too mosh enough; he no talk at all. I follow him from France; I yet live vid him by-and-by four month, he no speaka to me four vord.

Mac D. What then?

Picard. Vat den!—Je suis François, moi! I ave de tongue for a de speaka; I mus speaka; I vila speaka! He not so mosh do mee de faveur to scold a me! I ave leave de best madame in Paris for Monsieur le Comte.—Quelle femme!—Her tongue vas nevare still; nevare! She scold and she clack, clack, clack, clack, clack, from all day an all night! Oh! it was delight to hear.

Mac D. And so you want to be scolded?

Picard. Oui; I love to be scold, I love to scold: to be fall out an to be fall in. C'est mon gout. De plaisir of my life. J'irai crever! If I no speak I burst.

Mac D. And is it you, now, spalpeen! that would chatter in the prisence of the Count?

Picard. Shatter, shatter! Ha! Vat you mean shatter?

Mac D. Have not you roast beef and plum-pudding?

Picard. Vat is roas beef, vat is plom-boodin, got tam! if I no speaka? I ave a de master in France dat starva me, dat pay me no gage, dat leave a me tout en guenilles; all rag an tattare; yet I love him better as mosh! Pourquoi? [Affectionately.] Helas! J'étois son cher ami! His dear fren! He talka to me, I talka to him. I laugh at his joke, he laugh aussi, an I am both togeder so happy as de prince. But, de Count! Oh! he as proud!—Ha!—Comme ça.

[Mimicking.]

Mac D. Poh! Now, my good fellow, have patience.

Picard. Patience! Moi? I no patience. If I no speak, I am enragé. I am French; I am Picard. Ven de heart is full, de tongue nus run. I give you varu. Let my masta speak, or I shall dismisssa my masta!

Mac D. Here comes the Count. Stand back, man, and hould your tongue.

Enter Count CONOLLY VILLARS, followed by two Footmen in handsome liveries, who place themselves in the back ground. MAC DERMOT comes a little forward.

Count. The more I reflect on my own infatuation, the more I am astonished!

Mac D. My lord—

Count. [Walking about.] A man of my birth! My rank! A brewer's daughter!

Mac D. My lord—

Count. [Gives him a forbidding look.] The world contains not a woman so lovely!—Neither do they condescend to court my alliance!—I must petition, and fawn, and acknowledge the high honour done. No; if I do—Yet, 'tis false! I shall—I feel I shall be thus abject.

Mac D. If—I might be so bould—

Count. Well, sir!

Mac D. A letter for your lordship.

Count. Oh! What, from the ambassador?

Mac D. No, 'faith, my lord.

Count. Ha? The Duchess?

Mac D. No, my lord; nor the Duchess neither.

Count. Who then, sir?

Mac D. 'Faith, my lord, that is more than I can say. But, perhaps, the letter itself cau tell you.

Count. Sir!—Who brought it?

Picard. Un pauvre valet footman, mee lor. His shoe, his stocking, his habit, his chapeau, vas all patch an piece. And he vas—

Mac D. [Aside, interrupting him.] Bo!

Count. [Throwing down the letter, blowing his fingers, and dusting them with his white handkerchief.] Poh! Open it, and inform me of the contents.

Mac D. Yes, my lord.

Picard. His visage, mee lor—

Count. How now!

Picard. Mee lor—

Mac D. 'Sblood, man!

[Stopping his mouth, and pushing him back.]

Count. [Makes signs to the footmen, who bring an arm-chair forward, and again submissively retire.] She is ever uppermost! I cannot banish her my thoughts! Do you hear? Dismiss those—

[Waving his hand.]

Mac D. Yes, my lord.—Hark you, spalpeens! [Waving his hand with the same air as the Count.]

[Exeunt Footmen.]

Picard. [Advancing.] Monsieur le Comte—

Count. [After a stare.] Again!

Picard. I ave von requête to beg—

Count. Pay that fellow his wages, immediately.

Mac D. I tould you so. [Pushing him away.]

Hush! Silence!

Picard. Silence! I am no English. I hate silence. I—

Mac D. Poh! Boderation! Be aisy!—I will try now to make your pace. [Pushes him off, and then returns to examining the letter.]

Count. Insolent menial! Well, sir, the contents?

Mac D. 'Faith, my lord, I am afraid the contents will not please you?

Count. How so, sir?

Mac D. Why, as for the how so, my lord, if your lordship will but be pleased to rade—

Count. Didn't I order you to read?

Mac D. To be sure you did, my lord; but I should take it as a viry particular grate favour, if that your lordship would but be pleased to rade for yoursilf.

Count. Why, sir?

Mac D. Your lordship's timper is a little warm; and—

Count. Read!

Mac D. Well, if I must I must.—“The person who thinks proper, at present, to address you”—

Count. Sir!

Mac D. My lord!

Count. Be pleased to begin the letter, sir!

Mac D. Begin! Soira the word of beginning is here—before or after—

Count. “The person?”

Mac D. Yes, my lord.

Count. Mighty odd! [Throws himself in the arm-chair.] Proceed, sir.

Mac D. [Reads.] “The person who thinks proper, at present, to address you, takes the liberty to inform you that your haughtiness, instead of being dignified, is ridiculous—”

Count. [Starting up.] Sir!

Mac D. Why now, I tould your lordship—

Count. [Walking about.] Go on!

Mac D. [Reads, with hesitating fear.] “The little—merit—merit—you have—”

Count. The little merit I have? The little? The little? [Mac Dermot holds up the letter.] Go on!

Mac D. [Reads.] “The little merit you have, cannot convince the world that your pride—is not—is n t—is not—”

Count. Is not what?

Mac D. [Reads.] “Impertinent.”

Count. [Striking Mac Dermot.] Rascal!

Mac D. Viry well, my lord! [Throwing down the letter.] I humbly thank your lordship. By Jasus! but I'll remember the favour.

Count. [More coolly.] Read, sir.

Mac D. To the divel I pitch me, if I do!

Count. [Conscious of having done wrong.] Read, Mac Dermot.

Mac D. No, my lord; Mac Dermot is a man! An Englishman! Or, an Irishman, by Jasus, which is better still! And, by the holy poker, if but that your lordship was not a lord, now—[Pulling down his sleeves, and clenching his fist with great agony.]

Count. [Carelessly letting his purse fall.] Pick up that purse, Mac Dermot.

Mac D. 'Tis v'ry well!—Oh!—Well, well, well! [Lays the purse on the table.]

Count. You may keep it, Mac Dermot.

Mac D. What! I touch it! No, my lord, don't you think it: I despise your guineas. An Irishman is not to be paid for a blow!

Count. [With increasing consciousness of error, and struggling with his feelings.] I—I have been hasty—

Mac D. Well, well!—'Tis v'ry well!

Count. I am—I—I am sorry, Mac Dermot.

Mac D. My lord!

Count. [Emphatically.] Very sorry—

Mac D. My lord!

Count. Pray, forget it! [Taking him by the hand.] I cannot forgive myself.

Mac D. By the blessed Mary, then, but I can. Your lordship is a noble gentleman. There is many an upstart lord has the courage to strike, when they know their poor starving dependants' hands are chained to their sides, by wretchedness and oppression; but few, indeed, have the courage to own the injury!

Count. I will remember, Mac Dermot, that I am in your debt.

Mac D. 'Faith, and if you do, my lord, your misery will be better than mine. I have lived with your lordship some years; and, though not always a kind, you have always been a generous, master. To be sure, I never before had the honour of a blow from your lordship; but, then, I never before had the satisfaction to be quite sure that, while you remembered yourself to be a lord, you had not forgotten poor Mac Dermot was a man.

Count. Well, well! [Aside, and his pride returning.] He thinks he has a license, now, to prate.—There is no teaching servants; nay, indeed, there is no teaching any one a sense of propriety.

Mac D. Did your lordship spake? [Bowing kindly.]

Count. Give me that letter. And—take the money: it is yours.

Mac D. Your lordship will be pleased for to pardon me, there. If you think proper, you may give me twice as much to-morrow; but the divel a doit I'll touch for to-day!

Count. Wait within call.

Mac D. [Going.] I never before knew he was all together such a jewel of a master. [Erit.]

Count. 'Tis this infernal letter that caused me to betray myself thus, to my servant! And who is this insolent, this rash adviser? May I perish if I do not punish the affront! Here is no name! A strange hand, too! [Reads.] "The friend who gives you this useful lesson, has disguised his hand, and concealed his name"—Anonymous coward!—"His present intention being to awaken reflection, and make you blush at your own own bloated vanity."—Intolerable!—"Or, if not, to prepare you for a visit from one who thinks it his duty to lower your arrogance; and who will undertake the disagreeable task this very day."—Will he? will he?—Mac Dermot!

Enter MAC DERMOT.

Mac D. My lord!

Count. If any stranger inquire for me, inform me instantly.

Mac D. Yes, my lord

Enter EDMUND.

Edmund. Good-morrow, Count.

Count. [Slightly bowing, and with vexation to MAC

DERMOT.] Why, where are my fellows? Nobody to shew the gentleman up?

Edmund. Oh! you are too ceremonious by half, Count.

Count. A little ceremony, sir, is the essence of good breeding.

Edmund. Psha!

Count. Psha, sir!

Edmund. Ceremony, like fringe hiding a beautiful face, makes you suspect grace itself of deformity.

Count. Do you hear, Mac Dermot!

Mac D. My lord!

Count. See that those rascals are more attentive.

Edmund. Why, what is the matter with you, Count?

Count. [Muttering and traversing.] Count! Count!

Edmund. You seem out of temper.

Count. Oh dear! No, no!—Upon my honour, no! You totally mistake; I assure you, you mistake. I'm very glad to see you; I am, indeed!

[Taking him eagerly by the hand.]

Edmund. I'm very glad you are. Though you have an odd mode of expressing your joy. But you are one of the unaccountables. Cast off this formality—

Count. [Aside.] Very fine! [Biting his fingers.] Formality, sir!

Edmund. Give the heart its genuine flow; throw away constraint, and don't appear as if you were always on the tenter-hooks of imaginary insult.

Count. I! [Aside.] This is d—d impertinent! [Struggling to be over-familiar.] You entirely misconceive me; my character is frank and open. No man has less constraint; I even study to be, as it were, spontaneous.

Edmund. Ha, ha, ha! I perceive you do.

Count. Really, sir—[Aside.] Does he mean to insult me?

Edmund. I thought to have put you in a good humour.

Count. I am in a good humour, sir! I never was in a better humour, sir!—never, sir! S'death! A good humour, indeed!—some little regard to propriety, and such manners as good breeding prescribes to gentlemen—

Edmund. Ha, ha, ha! Well, well, Count, endeavour to forget the gentleman, and—

Count. Sir! No, sir: however you may think proper to act, that is a character I shall never forget.

Edmund. Never, except at such moments as these, I grant, Count.

Count. By—

Edmund. Well gulped! I had a sort of message; but I find I must take some other opportunity, when you are not quite in so good a humour. [Going.] I'll tell my sister what—

Count. Sir! Your sister! My divine Lucy!—A message!

Edmund. So, the magic chord is touched.

Count. Dear sir, I—I—I am afraid I am warm. Your sister, you said—I doubt, I—that is—

Edmund. Well, well; make no apologies.

Count. Apologies! No, sir, I didn't mean—that is—yes, I—my Lucy—my Lucy—What message?

Edmund. Nay, I cannot well say myself. You know the madcap. She bade me tell you, if I happened to see you, that she wanted to give you a lecture.

Count. Indeed! I'm lectured by the whole family. [Aside.] On what subject?

Edmund. Perhaps you'll take pet again?

Count. I, sir? Take pet! My sense of propriety, sir—

Edmund. Why, ay, your sense of propriety—which, by-the-by, my flippancy sister calls your pride—is always on the watch to catch the moment when it becomes you to take offence.

Count. You—you are determined I shall not want opportunities.

Edmund. You mistake, Count; I have a friendship for you. Why, what a forbidding stare is that, now! Ay, a friendship for you.

Count. Sir, I—I am not insensible of the honour—

Edmund. Yes, you are.

Count. [With great condescension.] Sir, you are exceedingly mistaken; very exceedingly; indeed you are. As I am a man of honour, there is no gentleman whom I should think it a higher—that is—upon my soul—

Sir P. [Without.] Is the Count at home, young man?

Footman. [Without.] Yes, sir.

Edmund. I hear my father: we have had a fracas; I must escape. If you will come and listen to my sister's lecture, so. Good morrow! [Exit.]

Count. 'Tis insufferable! Never, sure, did man of my rank run the gauntlet thus! No respect, no distinction of persons! But with people of this class 'tis ever so: "Hail, fellow, well met!"

Enter Sir PAUL PECKHAM.

Sir P. Ay, "hail, fellow, well met!" eh! you jolly dog? [Shaking him heartily by the hand.]

Count. Hem! Good—good morrow, sir. Here is another family lecturer. [Aside.]

Sir P. Was not that young Mock-modesty that brushed by me on the stairs?

Count. It was your son, sir.

Sir P. "Good morning, sir!" said the scoundrel, when he was out of my reach. D—e! [Feigns to kick.] I would have shewn him the shortest way to the bottom. Well—eh! you have elegant apartments here.

Count. Very indifferent, sir.

Sir P. I shall remain in town for a fortnight, and am glad you live so near. We'll storm the wine-cellar—I hear you are no flincher—eh! When shall we have a set-to, eh? When shall we have a rorytory? A catch, and a toast, and a gallon a man? But, eh! what's the matter? a'n't you well?

Count. [With sudden affability.] Oh! yes, Sir Paul; exceedingly well, Sir Paul; never better, Sir Paul.

Sir P. Why, that's right. I thought you had been struck dumb.

Count. Oh! by no means, Sir Paul. I am very happy to see you; extremely happy; inexpressibly—

Sir P. I knew you would. What say you to my Lucy, eh?

Count. Say! That she—she is a phoenix.

Sir P. D—e; so she is. What is a phoenix?

Count. I adore her.

Sir P. That's right!

Count. The day that makes her mine will be the happiest of my life.

Sir P. So it will; for I'll make you as drunk as an emperor. Hallo, there! get your master's hat. Come, come; you shall dine with me.

[Taking him by the arm.]

Count. Sir?

Sir P. D—e! I'll make you drunk to-day.

Count. Did you speak to me, sir?

Sir P. To you? Why, what the devil! do you think I spoke to your footman? [Quitting his arm.]

Count. [Again endeavouring to be affable.] Oh! no, Sir Paul; no, I—pardon me—I—I was absent.

Sir P. Absent! I smell a rat: your dignity took miff.

Count. No, Sir Paul; by no means. No, I—that is—I will acknowledge, I am not very much accustomed to such familiarities.

Sir P. Are you not? Then you soon must be.

Count. Sir?

Sir P. Ay, sir; a few lessons from me will cure you.

Count. Sir, I—

Sir P. I am the man to make you throw off. I'll teach you to kick your stateliness down stairs, and toss your pride, as I do my wig, behind the fire.

Count. Good breeding, sir—

Sir P. Good breeding, sir, is a blockhead, sir. None of your formal Don Glums; none of your grand pas for me. A friend, good fellowship, and t'other bottle: that's my motto.

Count. People of my rank distinguish—

Sir P. D— distinctions!

Count. They make it a condition, sir—

Sir P. Indeed! Look you, my dear Count, either unbridle, or you and I are two. You tell me you love my daughter: she is the finest girl in England; and I believe the slut has taken a fancy to you. The match pleases me, because it displeases my wife; and, except when you are riding your high horse, I like you, Count. Dismount, and it's a match; if not, turn the peg, and prance; I'm your humble.

Count. [Aside.] I'll not endure it: racks shall not make me bend to this.

Sir P. Lucy is a wench after my own heart. No piping, no pining, no sobbing for her. I have a fine fellow in my eye—

Count. [Alarmed.] Sir?

Sir P. None of your Sir Ramrod Grumble-gizzards.

Count. By heavens! I would cut the villain's throat who should dare impede my happiness.

Sir P. Why, ay, d—e! now you talk.

Count. The loss of my Lucy would render me the most wretched of beings.

Enter MAC DERMOT with the COUNT's hat.

Sir P. To be sure. [Taking the Count by the arm.] Come, come. [Claps the Count's hat on his head.]

Dinner is waiting: I smell the haunch; it perfumes the whole street. Come along. I hate the shackles of ceremony. A smoking table and a replenished sideboard soon put all men on a level. Your hungry and thirsty souls for me! He that enters my house always deposits his graudere, if he have any, at the door. [Sings.] "This brown jug, my dear Tom, which now foams with mild ale."

Mac D. Well said, old Toby! Oh!

[The Count makes disconcerted attempts to preserve his stateliness, wishing to be familiar, but scarcely knowing how to behave; MAC DERMOT not enjoying the COUNT's embarrassment.]

[Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The Drawing-room of Sir Paul Peckham, elegantly furnished, but hung all round with prints, chiefly caricatures.

EDMUND and LYDIA discovered.

Edmund. I shall never recover from my surprise.

Lydia. Hush!

Edmund. The Count your brother? My sister, my family, must be informed.

Lydia. Not on your life, Edmund. So implacable are his enemies, that my father informs me an exempt, bribed by them, has followed him to England.

Edmund. Impotent malice! The laws will here protect him.

Lydia. Oh! who can say? The wicked cunning of such life-hunters is dreadful. I insist, therefore, upon your promise.

Edmund. My angel! fear nothing.

[Kissing her hand.]

Enter Lucy, unperceived.

Lucy. [Placing herself beside EDMUND.] Turn about. Now me. [Holding her hand.]

Edmund. Oh! sister, I am the happiest of men.

Lucy. And you appear to be very busy, too, with your happiness.

Edmund. Did you but know—

Lucy. Oh! I know a great deal more than you suspect; but not but you seem to be taking measures to inform the whole house.

Edmund. Of what?

Lucy. [Placing herself between them.] That you two are never easy apart.

Edmund. Sister, I—I must insist that you speak of this lady with—with every respect.

Lucy. Brother!

Lydia. Edmund!

Edmund. Sister, I don't understand. Are you narrow-minded enough to suppose this young lady unworthy the hand of—

Lucy. Of my brother? No; to call my Lydia sister [Taking her hand.] is one of the things on earth I most fervently wish.

Lydia. My generous friend!

Edmund. My charming girl!

Lucy. But, then—

Edmund. There are now no buts; it will be an honour. I say, sister, you—you don't know—in short, I must very earnestly solicit you to treat Miss Lydia with all possible delicacy. I—I—I cannot tell you more at present; but I once again request, I conjure,—nay, I—

Lydia. Hem!

Lucy. Hem! Humph!

Edmund. You—you understand me, sister. [Exit.]

Lucy. Indeed, I don't. There now goes one of your lords and masters. Take care of him: he'll make an excellent grand Turk. "Treat Miss Lydia, I say, with all possible delicacy." [Imitating.] And have I, Lydia, have I shewn a want of delicacy to my friend?

Lydia. Oh! no; my heart throbs with an oppressive sense of your generous, your affectionate attention to me.

Lucy. Oppressive! Well, this is the proudest world—

Lydia. Nay, I didn't mean—

Lucy. Oh! no matter.

Lydia. Have you had any conversation with the Count?

Lucy. No; there has been no opportunity yet to-day. I am really afraid his pride is quite as absurd as that of my good mamma.

Lydia. And your affection begins to cool.

Lucy. Hum! I—I can't say that. Heigho! He has his faults.

Lydia. I hope he has his virtues, too.

Lucy. So do I. But how to cure those faults?

Lydia. If incurable, 'twould break my heart.

Lucy. Your ardour surprises me. But, hush!

Enter COUNT CONOLLY VILLARS.

Count. [Bowing.] I was afraid, madam, love would not have found so much as a moment to speak its anxieties; nay, even now—

[Looking haughtily towards Lydia.]

Lydia. Sir, I—I am sensible of my own unworthiness. [Exit.]

Lucy. That lady, sir, is my friend.

Count. Madam?

Lucy. Why are you surprised?

Count. Madam? No, no; not surprised—there is a maxim, indeed, which says, "Friendship can only subsist between equals."

Lucy. But where is the inferiority?

Count. Madam?

Lucy. You are above the poor, the pitiful idea, that wealth confers any claims?

Count. Perhaps it does not, madam. But beauty, understanding, wit—in short, the mind confers ten thousand; and in these I never beheld your peer.

Lucy. Very prettily spoken, indeed! And I am almost persuaded that you love me very dearly.

Count. Madam, I adore you.

Lucy. Yes, you are continually thinking of my good qualities.

Count. Eternally, madam; I think of nothing else

Lucy. True; you never remember your own.

Count. Were I totally insensible of my own, madam, I should be unworthy of you.

Lucy. You admire me even in my representatives, my relations, and friends. Affable to all, good-humoured to all, attentive to all, your politeness, ease, and urbanity, extend to every person for whom you think my heart is any way interested. Your passions are all subservient to love.

Count. Yes, madam, subservient is the very word; they are all subservient to love.

Lucy. You never recollect the dignity of your descent, nor accuse mine of meanness. You have too much understanding to plume your thoughts with turgid arrogance; or to presume on the imaginary merit of an accident, which none but ignorance, prejudice, and folly, are so besotted as to attribute to themselves.

Count. Mankind have agreed, madam, to honour the descendants of the wise and the brave.

Lucy. They have so; but you have too much native merit to arrogate to yourself the worth of others. You are no jay, decked in the peacock's feathers; you are not idiot enough to imagine that a skin of parchment, on which are emblazoned the arms and acts of one wise man, with a long list of succeeding fools, is any honour to you. Responsible to mankind for the use or the abuse of such talents as you feel yourself endowed with, you think only of how you may deserve greatly; and disdain to be that secondary thing, that insignificant cipher, which is worthless, except from the situation.

Count. The feelings of injured honour, madam, perhaps, may be too irritable: they shrink from insult, and spurn at contamination. Yet honour is the source of a thousand virtues; the parent of ten thousand glorious deeds. Honour is generous, sincere, and magnanimous; the protector of innocence, the asserter of right, the avenger of wrong. Yes; honour is the patron of arts, the promoter of science, the bulwark of government, the defender of kings, and the saviour of nations: indulge me, then, in cherishing a sentiment so noble.

Lucy. Indulge! Applaud, you mean. Honour with you never degenerates into ostentation! is never presumptuous; is no boaster; is eager to earn, but scorns to extort pre-eminence. Your honour is not that abject, inflated phantom which usurps contested claims, exacts submission which it does not merit, offends, irritates, and incites disgust, nay, tarnishes even virtue itself. You do not, under the word honour, seek a miserable cobweb covering for exorbitant pride.

Count. Madam, accusation so pointed, so—

Lucy. Nay, now, have not I been reading your panegyric?

Enter a Footman.

Foot. My lady desires you will come to her immediately, madam.

Lucy. Very well. [Exit Footman.] I am a thoughtless, flighty girl. What I say can have but little meaning; else, indeed, I would have ventured to have given you a word of advice. But—'tis no matter.

Count. Madam, you have stung me to the soul. If I be, indeed, what you describe, 'twere time I should reform.

Lucy. I must begone. I have, I own, been wildly picturing something to myself, which I greatly fear I could not love. [Exit.]

Count. And is it my likeness? Sure! it cannot be! Could not love? Excruciating thought! [Exit.]

Enter EDMUND, hastily, and LYDIA, from an inner chamber, meeting.

Edmund. Where is the Count?

Lydia. This moment gone.

Edmund. Which way?

Lydia. Through that door.

Edmund. [Running, stops at the door.] Ah! 'tis too late; the footman is telling him.

Lydia. Why are you so much alarmed?

Edmund. The clouds are collected, and the storm is coming.

Lydia. What do you mean?

Edmund. Lady Peckham has watched her opportunity: Sir Paul has dropped asleep in his armchair; she has ordered my sister to her apartment, and has sent to the Count to come and speak with her; that is, to come and be insulted, here in the drawing-room.

Lydia. What can be done?

Edmund. I know not. I dread her intolerable tongue.

Lydia. Perhaps, were you to retire, and, when they grow warm, to interrupt them at the proper moment, the presence of a third person might be some restraint on the workings of pride; of the violent ebullitions of which I am in great apprehension.

Edmund. Had I but met the Count before he had received the message—

Lydia. Here comes Lady Peckham. Begone!

[Exit EDMUND.]

Enter Lady PECKHAM, followed by a Footman.

Foot. I have delivered your ladyship's message, and the Count is coming.

Lady P. Wery vell. Go you about your business, feller. [Exit Footman.] Your company is not wanted, miss. [Exit LYDIA.]

Enter Count CONOLLY VILLARS, bowing.

So, sir, they tells me, sir, that you and my foolish husband are colloquing together, for to marry my daughter: is this true, sir?

Count. [With polite haughtiness.] If it were, madam—

Lady P. Do you know who Miss Looey Peckham is, sir?

Count. Not very well, madam.

Lady P. Sir?

Count. Except that she is your daughter.

Lady P. And do you know who I am, sir?

Count. I have been told, madam—

Lady P. Told, sir, told! What have you been told? What have you been told, sir?

Count. That your ladyship was an honest wax-chandler's daughter.

Lady P. Yes, sir, the debbdy of his vard, sir. A common-councilman, and city sword-bearer. Had an aldermand's gownd von year, vus chosen sheriff the next, and died a lord mayor elect. And do you know, sir, that I designs Sir Samooel Sheepy, an English knight and barrowknight, for the spouse of my daughter? A gentleman that is a gentleman—a person of honour and purtensions, and not a papish jesubite.

Count. Of his honours and pretensions I am yet to be informed, madam.

Lady P. Vhat, sir! do you mean for to say, sir, or to insinivate, sir, that Sir Samooel Sheepy is not your betters?

Count. If Sir Samuel himself, madam, had put such a question to me, I would have replied with my sword; or, more properly, with my cane.

Lady P. Cane! Wery vell, sir; I'll let Sir Samooel know that you threatens to cane him. I'll take care to report you. Cane, quotha! He shall talk to you.

Count. Let him, madam.

Lady P. Madam, madam! at every vord. Pray, sir, do you know that Sir Paul Peckham has had the honour to be knighted by the king's own hand?

Count. I have heard as much, madam.

Lady P. Madam, indeed! And for you for to think for to look up to my daughter.

Count. Up, madam!

Lady P. Yes, sir; up, sir. Pray, sir, vhat are your purtensions?

Count. [With great agitation.] Madam?

Lady P. Who are you, sir? Where do you come from? Who knows you? Vhat parish do you belong to?

Count. Madam, I am of a family known to history, known to Europe, known to the whole universe.

Lady P. Ah! I believes you are better known nurr trusted.

Count. The names of Conolly and Villars, madam, never before were so degraded as they have been in my person.

Lady P. Oh! I makes no doubt but you are a purson that would degurade any name.

Count. Insult like what I have received from you, madam, no man that breathes should utter, and escape death; but you are—

Lady P. Vhat, sir? Vhat am I, sir?

Count. A woman!

Lady P. A voman, indeed! Sir, I would have you to know, sir, as how I am a lady. A lady, sir, of his majesty's own making. And moreover, sir, don't you go for to flatter yourself that I shall bestow the hand and fortin of Miss Looey Peckham upon any needy, outlandish Count Somebody-nobody. My daughter, sir, is for your betters.

Count. Madam, though scurril—[Recollecting himself.]—I say, madam, though such vul—such accusations are beneath all answer, yet I must tell you that, by marrying your daughter—if after this I should sink myself so low—I say, by marrying your daughter, madam, I should confer an honour on your family, as much superior to its expectations, as the splendour of the glorious sun is to the twinkling of the worthless glow-worm.

Lady P. Vhat, vhat!

Enter EDMUND.

Marry come up! An Irish-French foriner! Not so good as von of our parish porpers. And you—you purtend to compare yourself to the united houses of the Peckhams and the Pringles! Your family, indeed! Youm! Where's your settlement? Youm? Vusn't my great uncle, Mr. Peter Pringle, the cheesemonger of Cateaton-street, a major in the train-bands before you vas born or thought of?

Edmund. [Aside.] So, so! I'm too late. [Aloud.] Let me entreat your ladyship—

Lady P. Vhat! hasn't I an ownd sister at this day married to Mr. Poladore Spragges, the tip-toppest hot-presser in all Crutched Friars? Isn't my maiden aunt, Miss Angelica Pringle, vorth thirty thousand pounds, in the South Sea funds, every day she rises? And doesn't I myself go to bed, and get up, the greatest lady in this here city? And for to purtend for to talk to me of his family! hisn!

Edmund. [With warmth.] I must tell you, my lady, you strangely forget yourself, and expose your family to ridicule.

Lady P. You must tell me, sir! Why, sir, how dare you have the temeracity for to come for to go for to dare for to tell me! Here's fine doings! henpecked by my own chicken!

Edmund. The Count, madam, is a man of the first distinction in his native country!

Lady P. Vhat country is that, sir! Whoever heard of any country but England? A Count among beggars! How much is his countship vorth?

Count. I had determined to be silent, madam; but I find it is impossible.—[With warmth.] And, I must inform you, my family is as ancient, as exalted, and as renowned, as you have proved yours to be—what I shall not repeat. That I am the heir to more rich acres than I believe your ladyship ever rode over; that my father's vassals are more numerous than your ladyship's vaunted guineas; that the magnificence in which he has lived, looked with contempt on the petty, paltry strainings of a trader's pride and that in his hall are daily fed—[Stops short, and betrays a consciousness of inadvertent falsehood, but suddenly continues with increasing vehemence.]—Yes, madam, are daily fed,—now, at this moment, madam, more faithful adherents, with their menials and followers, than all your boasted wealth could, for a single year, supply!

Edmund. Are? At this moment, say you, Count?

Count. Sir, I—I have said—

Edmund. I know you to be a man of honour, and that you cannot say what is not.

Count. I—I—I have said, sir—

[Walks about, greatly agitated.]

Lady P. You have said more in a minute, nur you can prove in a year.

Edmund. [With warmth.] Madam, I will pledge my life for the Count's veracity.

Lady P. You pledge! Vhat do you know about the matter? I pledge that he has been telling a pack of the most monstrous—

Edmund. Forbear, madam! Such insult is too gross to be endured, almost, from an angry woman.

—Dear Count,—

Lady P. Voman again! Wery fine! wery pretty! Voman, quotha! To be called a voman by my own vitals!

Count. [Aside.] What have I done?—[With agony.] A lie!

Lady P. As for you, sir, I doesn't believe von vord you say! I knows the tricks of such sham she-valeers as you too vell!

Count. [Walking away from her.] Torture!

Lady P. But I'll take care to have you prognosticated.

Count. [Aside.] D—n!

Lady P. I'll have you karakatoored in your troo colours; I'll have you painted in your father's hall; you and your vooden shoe shrug-and-snuffle scarecrows! I'll depicter you! I'll not forget your vassals!

Count. [Aside.] I can support it no longer.—

[Going.]

Edmund. [Catches him by the hand.] My dear Count,—

Count. Sir, I am a dishonoured villain! [Exit.]

Lady P. There, there! He tells you himself he is a willin! His conscience flies in his face, and he owns it!

Edmund. [With great ardour and feeling.] Madam, he is a noble-hearted gentleman. His agonizing mind deems it villany to suffer insult so gross. Sorry am I, madam, to be obliged to tell you that, humble though your family is, the disgrace with which you have loaded it is indelible: with anguish of heart you force me to repeat, I blush while I listen to you. [Exit.]

Lady P. Why, who ever heard the like of this here, now? Here's a prodigal son! here's a regenerate reprobate! here's a graceless gog-magog! to purtend as how he's ashamed of me! Me! a purson of my carriage, connexions, and breeding. I! whose wery entrance, of a ball-night, puts Haberdashers'-hall all in a combustion!

Re-enter Count CONOLLY VILLARS, greatly agitated.

[Seeing the Count.] Marry my daughter, indeed! Faugh!

[Exit.]

Count. Into what has my impetuous anger hurried me? Guilty of falsehood! I! To recede is impossible. What, stand detected before this city madam! whose tongue, itching with the very scrofula of pride, would iterate liar in my ear! No; falsehood itself is not so foul. Mac Dermot!

Enter MAC DERMOT.

Mac D. My lord?

Count. Mac Dermot, I—you—you have heard of the state which, formerly, my father held; of his household grandeur, of the hinds and servants whom he daily fed, and the train by which he was attended.

Mac D. To be sure I have, my lord. Here, your dukes and your peers know nothing at all of style; abroad, some hundreds starve, that one may ate; but, in England, they have learnt the trick of aich man ating for himsilf.

Count. Psha! Listen: the—the misfortunes that since have befallen us, are little known in this country.

Mac D. To be sure they are not, my lord.

Count. Nor—nor—hem! nor would I have them—a—hem! Do you understand me, Mac Dermot?

Mac D. My lord?

Count. I—I would not be exposed to the insolent taunts of upstart wealth.

Mac D. Faith! then, my lord, you must not live in this city.

Count. Nay, but—attend to me—I—I would—I would have them think—

Mac D. What, my lord?

Count. [Walking backwards and forwards.] Mac Dermot, there are situations—I say, it may, sometimes, be wise, at least, prudent, and—and excusable—Have not you remarked, Mac Dermot, that Lydia—

Mac D. Oh! to be sure, I have remarked, my lord, that she is a sweet crater, that Miss Liddy.

Count. Nay, but her influence in the family—

Mac D. Oh! yes, my lord.

Count. Now, if—if—suppose you were to take—an opportunity—Is she proud?

Mac D. Mild as mother's milk, my lord.

Count. If she were persuaded—I say—our family misfortunes—that is—no, no; the family magnificence—Do you comprehend me?

Mac D. My lord?

Count. Psha! D—n!

[Exit.]

Mac D. [Stands some time amazed.] Why, now, am I Mac Dermot, or am I not? The devil! He would have me take an opportunity with Miss Liddy! 'Faith! and I would very willingly do that. And persuade her—Oh! honey, but she is not so easy to be persuaded. To be sure he must mane something. Oh! hona mon dioul! but I have it! Ahoo! What a thickskull have I been all this while! He is a little bit ashamed to be thought poor among this tribe of Balifurnians, who have nothing but their dirty guineas to boast of. And so he would have me persuade—Oh, ho! let me alone. There she goes: I will be alter—Boh! frustration! there is that Mr. Edmund, now, close at her heels. The young royster is always getting the sweet crater up in a corner. Take an opportunity! Sarra the opportunity there is for me to take. [Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—An Apartment at Count Villars's.

DORIMONT and MAC DERMOT discovered.

Dori. Pray, sir, is the Count within?

Mac D. The Count, sir? And pray, why may you ask?

Dori. I want to speak with him, sir.

Mac D. Spake! Oh! the Count is not so easy to be spoken with. Plase to deliver your message to me.

Dori. Inform him I am come for an answer to my letter.

Mac D. Letter, sir! What, the letter brought by a shabby footman?

Dori. Ay, ay; has he read it?

Mac D. Read it! 'Faith! and it has been very well read. But, pray, sir, now, are you the writer?

Dori. I am.

Mac D. There take my advice: make your escape. 'Tis very well for you my master is not at home.

Dori. Why so?

Mac D. Why so, man alive! Have you a mind to be murdered?

Dori. Fear nothing.

[Knocking heard.]

Mac D. By the holy phial, but there he is! Why, will you begone now?

Dori. No; I will not.

Mac D. Marcy upon my soul! For the Lord's sake, sir—Why, sir, I tell you he'll have your blood. And won't you begone now?

Dori. No, sir.

Mac D. Lord Jasus! what will I do? If he comes into this room, here will be murder.

Dori. Go; tell him I am waiting for him.

Mac D. Me tell him! I warn you to begone. Remember, I wash my hands of your blood. Make off; make off, I tell you, while I go and keep him to his own apartment. [Exit.]

Dori. [To a Footman crossing.] Hark you, young man: to tell the Count, your master, that the stranger who wrote the anonymous letter to him is here, waiting for an answer.

Foot. Yes, sir.

[Exit.]

Dori. The fears of the servant strongly speak the anger of the master: but that was what I partly feared, and partly wish.

Count. [Without.] Where is the rash, the audacious—

Enter Count CONOLLY VILLARS.

The insolent wretch, who—My father! [Aside.]

Dori. I scarcely could have expected so kind a welcome, sir: 'tis exemplary.

Count. Passion, sir, is sometimes guilty of improprieties. Pray, pardon me.

Enter MAC DERMOT, behind.

Count. I imagined—[Seeing MAC DERMOT.]—How now, sir! Begone!

Dori. Why so? Let him stay.

Count. Begone! or—

Dori. Stay, I say.

Count. And, do you hear? I am not at home.

Mac D. [Aside.] Oh lord, oh lord! here will be murder. [Exit.]

Dori. What should that mean, sir?

Count. Sir, there are reasons—I ought not to expose my father's safety.

Dori. Rather own, you ought not to blush at your father's poverty. Is this my reception? This the warm welcome of a duteous son?

Count. 'Tis so sudden: yet my heart feels an affection—

Dori. Which is stifled by your vanity. Your father is contemned, because he is unfortunate.

Count. No, sir; I do not merit a reproach so cruel. Contemn my father! You know me not. Tell me, which way can I prove my respect and love?

Dori. By openly acknowledging me: not by concealment; not by disavowing me in the day of my distress.

Count. Think, sir, of your own safety.

Dori. What danger is there with people of honour? Present me to the family of Sir Paul.

Count. Impossible, sir.

Dori. Impossible!

Count. Let me conjure you not to be too precipitate. You know not the vulgar pomp of newly-made gentry; whose suffocating pride treats indigent merit, nay birth itself, with the most imperious disdain.

Dori. Talk not of their pride, but of your own. You complain of others' haughtiness! You! In whom the vice is so intolerable, that you willingly would disown your father.

Count. Sir, you wrong me.

Dori. But, determined to be known for what I am, since you refuse, I'll introduce myself.

Count. For heaven's sake, sir! I entreat—I supplicate—on my knees, I conjure you to forbear.

Dori. Yes; pride, kneeling, conjures a father in poverty to suffer himself to be disclaimed. Your mother's pride was my house's downfall: this she has bequeathed to you.

Count. Sir—

Sir P. [Without.] I tell you, I know he is at home.

Mac D. [Without.] Upon my soul, Sir Paul—

Sir P. [Without.] Zounds! Why, I saw him from my own window.

Count. Here is Sir Paul! You know not, sir, how much is at stake. I have not time to tell you now; but let my intreaties—

Dori. Oh! how humble are the proud! But, remember, I consent only on condition that you restrain your arrogance. If, while I am present, any symptom— [Retires back.]

Enter Sir PAUL PECKHAM.

Sir P. Sblood! I knew you were at home. But to instruct servants how to lie with the most cool, composed, and barefaced impudence, is one branch of modern education.

Count. I am sorry, Sir Paul—

Sir P. Psha! D—n apologies! I have good news for you.

Count. Sir?

Sir P. I do believe (God forgive me!) that my wife is growing reasonable.

Count. Does she consent?

Sir P. Yes; to permit you to ask her pardon.

Count. Sir? Ask pardon?

Dori. Yes, sir; ask pardon.

Sir P. Hem! Zounds! Again! Why, what the plague can he do here? [Aside.]

Dori. Your servant, sir.

Sir P. Sir, your very humble.

Count. [Aside.] What can this mean?

Dori. You seem surprised, sir.

Sir P. Yes; you have a trick of taking people by surprise.

Count. [Aside.] Does he know him?

Sir P. Odd enough! [Aside.] Who is this queer old fellow?

Count. All is safe. [Aside.] Sir, the—the gentleman—[To Sir P.] What shall I say? [Aside.] A gentleman, sir, who— [To Sir P.]

Sir P. A gentleman!

Count. Yes—that is—

Sir P. What, some poor relation, I suppose?

Count. Yes, sir; a relation. The—the family estates have been under his management.

Sir P. Oh! your steward?

Count. No, not absolutely my—my steward—

Sir P. What, your land-bailiff, then?

Count. No, sir; no—that is—

Sir P. Does not seem to have made his fortune by his office. A little weather-beaten.

Count. He is a man of the strictest probity, sir.

Sir P. Nay, his appearance is the pledge of his honesty.

Dori. [Aside.] I can perceive he is practising deceit. Oh, vanity! But I will restrain my anger. The moment of open punishment is not yet come.

Count. [To Dori.] Let me request you, sir, not to reveal yourself.

Dori. Well, sir.

Count. [To Sir P.] His economy and good management are equal to his fidelity.

Sir P. Confounded odd, all this, though. [Aside.] Well, Count, I have exerted my whole authority with Lady Peckham; and her son Edmund, who has more influence over her than anybody else, is your friend. So, be wary; do your duty, and the day is your own.

Count. My duty, sir?

Dori. Yes, sir; your duty, sir.

Sir P. A d—d strange fellow! [Aside.] Is it not your duty, Count, to serve yourself?

Dori. And would you contend about a word?

Sir P. Very true, sir: you seem a—a plain spoken—a—hem!

Dori. Yes; I think it my duty to tell vice and folly the truth.

Sir P. Hem! You hear, Count?

Dori. His punctilious pride is contemptible.

Count. Sir?

Dori. And, sir! I repeat: do your duty, sir.

Sir P. The most unaccountable—Hem! [Aside.]

Count. [Aside.] I am on the rack: he will betray himself.

Sir P. [To the Count.] The old gentleman does not mince matters.

Count. [Aside to Dori.] You will ruin me.

Dori. Do as he requires, or I will feign no longer.

Sir P. Lady Peckham is expecting you. Come, come; try whether you cannot put on a winning, submissive air.

Count. I shall burst.

[Aside.]

Dori. Submissive, sir! Remember.

Count. I shall not forget, sir.

Sir P. You approve my advice, don't you, sir?

Dori. Entirely. The lesson you gave him, sir, is a useful and a necessary one. I know him.

Count. Fiends!

[Aside.]

Sir P. What, sir—you—have lived long in the family?

Dori. Sir?

Sir P. Nay, don't be affronted.

Count. [To Sir P.] Let us begone, sir. I am ready to attend you.

Sir P. [Aside.] The bluntest, drollest—

Count. We are losing time, sir.

Sir P. Well, well; in a moment.—Pray, under favour, what may be the amount of the Count's rent-roll? [To Dori.]

Dori. Sir! His rent-roll, sir?

Sir P. Ay, his rent-roll: the nett produce of his estates.

Dori. Why that question to me, sir?

Count. For heaven's sake, Sir Paul, let us go.

Sir P. Sblood! What a violent hurry you're in all of a sudden.

Count. [Endeavouring to force Sir P. away.] Lady Peckham is waiting, sir; I beg, I entreat—

Sir P. [Aside.] The mystery thickens!

Dori. Pray, sir, has the Count—

Count. [Interrupting.] For the love of mercy, sir, answer no questions; hear none, ask none, I am frantic.

Dori. Silence, sir! [To the Count.] Has the Count ever talked of his estates? [To Sir P.]

Sir P. Oh! yes.

Count. [Aside.] D—n!

Dori. And told you the amount?

Sir P. No, no; but, as you—

Count. I must insist, sir, on going. [To Sir P.]

Dori. I'm not prepared, sir, just now to answer your question of the rent-roll. I have business, and must leave you; but I will shortly give you the information you require. In the meantime, young gentleman, think on what has passed; observe Sir Paul's advice, and act as becomes you. Put off your vanity: be humble, and know yourself. [Exit.]

Count. [Aside.] Thank heaven he is gone!

Sir P. Your steward is an odd one.

Count. Sir, I—I tell you he is not my steward.

Sir P. No?

Count. No, sir.

Sir P. What is he, then?

Count. Sir, I—

Sir P. I thought you taught everybody to keep their distance; but he treats you with as little ceremony as—as he did me. [Aside.] Come, come; Lady Peckham is waiting.

Count. I must own, Sir Paul, I meet with many mortifications. Your daughter is an angel; but solicitation, Sir Paul, does not become me; it is a thing I have not been accustomed to. Do you speak for me. Say all, say everything you please. Your mediation will, I presume, be sufficient.

Sir P. D—, if this is not beyond all human patience! After all I have done in your behalf! What! would you have me and my whole family approach your footstool, there present my daughter, and kneeling, beg your highness to accept her? No, my haughty Count; either my daughter is worth asking for, or not worth having. Carry your pomp to a better market; I'll stoop to it no longer. Your servant, sir. [Erit.]

Count. Nay, Sir Paul—Must I endure this? Must I—I, the descendant of an ancient race; the rightful lord of a thousand vassals? What! wait, and fawn on madam; and act the skipjack, and chatter to her parrot, and be of her opinion, and fetch and carry, and praise her taste, and join her scandal, and laugh when she laughs, and kiss her monkey? And to whom? Oh! [Erit.]

SCENE III.—The House of Sir Paul Peckham.

MAC DERMOT and LYDIA discovered.

Mac D. Oh! yes: stabling for a hundred horses; open house all the year about; servants five-and-twenty to the score; all making work for one another.

Lydia. Then the Count, your master, should be immensely rich.

Mac D. Should be? To be sure he is. Don't I tell you—

Lydia. Yes; you tell me one thing at night, and another in the morning. You had forgotten the colonel's pay, and the secret supplies.

Mac D. [Aside.] 'Faith! and so I had.

Lydia. And, pray, was this all your own invention?

Mac D. Why, as to that—And is it me, now, that you would have to betray my master?

Lydia. What, then, he bid you spread this report.

Mac D. Arrah! now, did I say that? Did I say that? I tell you he bid me no such thing! What, and did you think, now, you could get that out of me? By St. Patrick, but I would bite off my tongue if it should dare to blunder out one word against so good a master.

Lydia. [Aside.] Honest, affectionate fellow!

Mac D. [Aside.] Oh, blarney! She wants to be too cunning for me, the sweet crater! and so, for fear of—Miss Liddy, your servant. [Erit.]

Lydia. I almost love him myself, for his love to his master.

Enter SIR PAUL PECKHAM, followed by EDMUND.

Sir P. I tell you, I have done with him. He is a pompous, insolent coxcomb! The Great Mogul himself is a fool to him.

Edmund. All men have their foibles, sir.

Sir P. D—his foibles! I have enough to do with my own. And, do you hear, sir? don't let me be troubled with any of your foibles, either. You understand me. I'll not be trifled with. [Erit.]

Lydia. What has put him into so ill a humour?

Edmund. The cursed supercilious haughtiness of the Count: he has insulted Sir Samuel Sheepley, too.

Enter LUCY.

Lucy. Well, brother, have you succeeded with my mamma?

Edmund. I believe so; I can't tell. Where is the Count?

Lucy. I hear him on the stairs.

Edmund. Well, warn him to be careful. [Erit.]

Lucy. What's the matter?

Lydia. The old story: the Count's pride. If he should quarrel again with Lady Peckham, all will then be over.

Lucy. You have put me quite in a tremor.

Enter COUNT CONOLLY VILLARS.

I will inform my mamma, sir, that you are here; and she will be with you immediately.

Count. May I not, madam, be indulged with one previous word?

Lucy. Yes, sir; one, and but one. Instead of conciliating, I find your manners offend and disgust every one. Either cast away your hauteur, regain the affections and consent of my friends, and, above all, make your peace with Lady Peckham, or this shall be the last meeting of our lives. [Erit.]

Lydia. Are you aware, sir, of your danger? Sir Samuel, Sir Paul, Lady Peckham, all affronted! nay, your best friend, Edmund, has this moment left the room to avoid you. Oh! think on that lovely lady; and if you have any affection for her, for yourself, or for your father, recal your reason, discard your folly, and act with a little common sense. [Erit.]

Count. This is strange! My father! She know my father? And why am I schooled and tutored thus? The last meeting of our lives! They will absolutely drive me mad among them.

Enter Lady PECKHAM.

Madam, [Bowing.] when I last had the honour of a—an interview with your ladyship, I—I am afraid I might, possibly, be inadvertently betrayed into some warmth—

Lady P. Why, sir, seeing as how my son tells me you are a real nobleman, and not von of the ruffraff fortin-hunting fellers, if so be as you think fit to make proper 'pologies, why, sir, I—I—

Count. To a lady, madam, every apology may be made: any concessions, therefore—

Lady P. Oh! sir, as for that there, I vants nothing but what is upright and downright. And I supposes, sir, you are wery villin to own that an outlandish foriner must think himself highly honoured by a connexion with an English family of distinction: because that, I am sure, you cannot deny. And that it vus a most perumpatory pureeedin in you, being as you are but a Frenchman, or of an Irish generation at best, to purtend to the hand and fortin of Miss Looey Peckham, without my connivance.

Count. Madam?

Lady P. As I tells you, sir, I am upright and downright. So do you, or do you not?

Count. Madam, I am ready to acknowledge that the charms of your daughter's mind and person are equal to any rank.

Lady P. Her mind and person, indeed! No, sir; her family and fortin. And I believes, sir, now you are come to your proper senses, you vill own, too, that no outlandish lord whatever can uphold any compargement with the Peckham family and connexions.

Count. [With warmth.] Madam, though I am ready to offer every excuse which can reasonably be required, for any former inadvertency; yet, madam, no consideration whatever shall lead me—I say, madam, my own honour, a sense of what is due to my own honour, a sense of what is due to my ancestors, myself, and to truth—that is, madam—no; the world, racks, shall not force me to rank my family with your's.

Lady P. Vhy, sir, what is it that you are talking of? Rank my family with yourn, indeed! Marry come up! No, to be sure. I say rank! I knows very vell what is my doo; and that there, sir, is the thing that I would have you for to know: and I insist upon it, sir, that you shall know it; and shall own that you knows it; or, sir, I rewoke everything I have condescended to specify with my son. So do you, sir, or do you not?

Count. Madam—What, madam?

Lady P. Do you depose that outlandish foriners are all beggars and slaves; and that von Englishman is vorth a hundred Frenchmen?

Count. Madam, whatever you please.

Lady P. Oh! very vell. And do you perdict that this here city is the first city in the whole world?

Count. I—I believe it is, madam.

Lady P. Oh! very vell. And that the moniment, and the tower, and Lunnun bridge, are the most magnanimous and superfluous buildings?

Count. Madam—

Lady P. I'll have no circumbendibus. Are they, or are they not?

Count. Your ladyship is pleased to say so.

Lady P. To be sure I does; because I knows it to be troo. And that the wretches in forin parts are all fed upon bran; seeing as how there is no corn?

Count. As your ladyship thinks. [Bows.]

Lady P. And that the whole country could not purvide von lord mayor's feast?

Count. I—certainly not, madam they have few tittle and no aldermen.

Lady P. Ah! a pretty country, indeed! No aldermen! And that it would be the hite of persumption in you for to go for to set yourself up as my equal? Do you own that?

Count. [Passionately.] No, madam.

Lady P. Sir?

Count. No force, no temptation shall induce me so to dishonour my great progenitors.

Lady P. Vhy, sir!

Count. My swelling heart can hold no longer. Honour revolts at such baseness. Patience itself cannot brook a fallacy so glaring. No: though destruction were to swallow me, I would assert my house's rights, and its superior claims.

Lady P. Wery vell, sir; wastly vell, sir! And I would have you for to know, sir, while my name is Lady Peckham, I vill dissent my house's rights, and claims: that I despises all—Ha, ha, ha! Wery fine, indeed! Am I to be sent here to be hectorred, and huffed, and bluffed, and bullied, and bounced, and blustered, and brow-beat, and scoffed, and scouted, and—Ha!

Count. [Recovering his temper and interceding.] Madam—

Lady P. I ha' brought my hogs to a fine market. But I'll let 'em know who's at home.

Count. My warmth, madam—

Lady P. Your honour and glory, indeed! And for to pretend for to send for me here, to pelaver me over as I supposed—

Count. I am ready to own, madam—

Lady P. But I'll rid the house of you: I'll take good care you shall have no daughter of mine. You may post off to your father's hall, and there starve in state. Varm it with a blaze of dried leaves, and stop up the gaps in the shattered vindows and old groaning doors vith clay; then send your shivering wassals, that stand jabbering behind your von armed vooden chair, to skin the sheep that died of hunger and the rot, to make you a varm vinter surtout.

Count. Madam—

Lady P. My daughter, indeed! I'll karakatoor you. [Exit.]

Count. Flames and fury! [Following, is met by Sir SAMUEL SHEEPY, who shuts the door, and prevents the Count from passing.] How now, sir?

Sir S. [Bowing.] Sir, your humble servant.

Count. What does this mean, sir? Let me pass.

Sir S. A word or two first, if you please, sir.

Count. Let me pass.

[Putting his hand to his sword.]
Sir S. [Bowing, but resolutely guarding the door.] Sir, I most humbly entreat—

Count. D—n! What is it you want with me, sir? Who are you, sir!

Sir S. My name is Sheepy, sir. [Bowing.]

Count. Sheepy! So, so, so! Hell and the devil! At such a moment as this! [Aside.]

Sir S. I am told, sir, I have some obligations to you, which it becomes me to discharge.

Count. Well, sir?

Sir S. Not quite so well, sir, as I could wish.

Count. [Aside.] Was ever man so tormented!

Sir S. I am informed, sir, that you have condescended to mention me, in my absence.

Count. And so, sir?

Sir S. You did me an honour, sir. [Bowing.]

Count. Either speak your business, and suffer me to pass, or I will nail you to the door.

Sir S. Dear sir, you are so warm! I have been told you were so good as to threaten to cane me.

Count. Ay, sir; by whom?

Sir S. By Lady Peckham, sir.

Count. Indeed! Well, suppose it.

Sir S. 'Twas kind of you! Unluckily, I have not been much used to threatening messages, and am really afraid I shall not be very prompt at submission.

Count. Oh! do not doubt yourself, sir.

Sir S. Humble though I am, I do not find that a swaggering look— [Bowing.]

Count. Sir?

Sir S. Moderate your anger, kind sir. I have a petition to you. [Putting on his white gloves.]

Count. D—n your sneer, sir! speak.

Sir S. Bless me, sir, you are so warm! It is only that you would kindly do me the favour either to cut my throat, or suffer me to cut your's.

[Draws and flourishes.]

Count. [With his hand to his sword.] Are you mad, sir? Do you recollect where you are? In whose house?

Sir S. Gadso! true, sir: I should be sorry to be interrupted. Luckily, my carriage is at the door; and I know a snug room in a neighbouring tavern, where this business may be effectually settled, as quietly, as coolly, and as privately as possible.

Count. 'Twere well for you, sir, had you chosen another opportunity: but come.

Sir S. Oh! sir, I know my place; after you.

Count. Away, sir! [Bowing.]
[Exit.]

SCENE IV.—The Count's Apartment.

[A noise of footsteps without, and voices heard calling "Here, here! This way! Up, up! Follow!"

Enter DORIMONT, hastily.

Dori. I am pursued, beset, and cannot escape!

Enter MAC DERMOT.

Mac D. Blood and thunder! Why, what's all this? Oh! and is it you, sir?

Dori. Where is the Count?

Mac D. 'Faith! and that is more than I can tell. [Voices without, "Here, here, I tell you! This room!"'] Why, what the devil—

Dori. I am hunted: my liberty, perhaps, my life, is in danger.

Mac D. Why, sure, the Count would not—

Dori. Here; take, hide this packet from the eyes of my pursuers: don't lose it; but, if you have any sense of worth and honesty, deliver it safe into the hands of Sir Paul Peckham.

Mac D. Niver fear me, honey!

Enter an EXEMPT and two Bailiffs.

Exempt. That's the man. Seize him!

1 Bail. Sir, you are our prisoner.

Dori. On what authority, sir?

1 Bail. Authority, sir! The authority of law, sir.

Dori. For what crime?

1 Bail. As to crime, sir, I can't tell; but for a trifling debt of fifty thousand pounds.

Dori. At whose suit?

Exempt. At mine, sir.

Dori. Your's! Vile wretch! Gentlemen, he is a spy: the creature of a foreign court. I never had dealings with him in my life.

1 Bail. We know nothing of that, sir. He has sworn to the debt.

Exempt. No parleying; take him away.

1 Bail. Ay, ay; come, sir. [They drag him out.

Dori. [Without.] Help, rescue, false imprisonment!

Mac D. Why, what is all this now? Poor ould gentleman! [Voices without, "Rescue, rescue! Help!"] Where is my shillalagh? Oh! by St. Peter and his crook, but I will be one among you, scoundrels!

[Exit.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—The House of Sir Paul Peckham.

Enter LYDIA and EDMUND.

Edmund. Be pacified; you are too much alarmed.

Lydia. If Sir Paul should have let them pass, what dreadful consequences may have followed! Where can he be?

Edmund. He is here!

Enter Sir PAUL PECKHAM.

Lydia. Oh! sir, where are they? Has anything happened?

Sir P. Happened! D—e! I could not believe my own ears. A silky Simon! The Count was in a right humour—'Sblood! I had a great mind to have let him kill the old fool.

Lydia. Then they have not fought. Are they safe, sir?

Sir P. Yes, yes; they are safe enough. But do you know? the amorous swain, his blood being heated, could only be pacified on condition that he might have another interview with Lucy. I'm glad on't. I'll go and give her a lesson.

Edmund. Oh! sir, leave him to my sister, she needs no instructions.

Sir P. No? 'Gad! I believe not. She's my own girl: but clear the coast; he's coming.

Edmund. I will go to Lady Peckham; and do you, Lydia, watch for the Count.

Sir P. Ay, ay; he is suddenly grown humble; apologized to me, and promised to come and plead with my lady. But away.

[Exit EDMUND and LYDIA.

Enter Sir SAMUEL SHEEPY

Well, Sir Samuel, you are here.

Sir S. Yes, sir.—And I half wish I wish I was anywhere else, already.

Sir P. And so you absolutely have the courage to attack my Lucy? Ha, ha, ha! Why, you are quite a hero! you fear neither man nor woman.

Sir S. [Aside.] I wish I didn't.

Sir P. Nay, but don't begin to look so pitiful: she'll be here in a minute. Don't flinch; stand to your guns! she'll not easily strike. Ha, ha, ha! Dio hard, my old boy!

[Exit.

Sir S. What is the matter with me? I declare he has talked me into a tremble. Why should I be so terrified at a harmless woman? I can't help it: a pair of beautiful eyes are flaming swords, which no armour can resist.

Enter LUCY.

Lucy. So, Sir Samuel!

Sir S. [Aside.] Bless me, my heart is in my mouth.

Lucy. You seem taken by surprise.

Sir S. Madam—hem!—no, madam—yes, madam.

[Bowing.

Lucy. My papa informed me you were waiting purposely to disclose this important secret.

Sir S. Madam—hem!—yes, madam.

Lucy. Do you know that I have had you in my mind I don't know how often since I saw you?

Sir S. Hem! have you madam?

Lucy. Yes, I have. 'Tis a pity, nay, indeed a shame, that so famous an English family as that of the Sheepy's should become extinct.

Sir S. Hem! There is no danger of that, madam.

Lucy. No? Why, it is too late in life for you to marry, Sir Samuel.

Sir S. Hem! Yes, madam—no, madam.

Lucy. Indeed! So you—Well, I should like to know your choice: some staid body, I imagine.

Sir S. Madam—hem!—

Lucy. But I would not have her too old and disagreeable.

Sir S. Hem! I can assure you, madam, she—hem!—she is a very beautiful young lady.

Lucy. You surprise me. Oh! then perhaps she is some low-born girl, who has more pride than understanding, and is willing to sacrifice her youth and beauty to the silly vanity of riding in a coach?

Sir S. Quite—hem!—quite the contrary, madam.

Lucy. Then she must be poor, and must think of marrying you for the sake of your riches, hoping you will die soon.

Sir S. Madam!—Hem! She is very rich.

Lucy. Is it possible?

Sir S. And I should flatter myself would not expect me to die too soon.

Lucy. Oh! but she will. Young women never marry old men but with a wish to dance over their graves.

Sir S. Hem!

Lucy. Perhaps the poor girl may—may have made a faux pas?

Sir S. Hem! Her virtue is unspotted, madam.

Lucy. You amaze me! Young, rich, beautiful, and virtuous! What can her reason be for making choice of you? Why does not she rather marry some youth, whose rare qualities resemble her own? Oh! I've found the secret, at last: she's an idiot.

Sir S. Hem! No, madam, no—Hem!—I am afraid she has too much wit. [Aside.]

Lucy. Nay, then, Sir Samuel, you are the most fortunate gentleman I ever heard or read of. But are you sure she is in love with you?

Sir S. Hem! Not very, madam.

Lucy. No! Oh, oh! I have unriddled it, at last. You have been bargaining for her with her father, or mother, or—Ay, ay! the poor young lady's consent has never been asked. And would you be so selfish as to seek your own single gratification, and be contented to see her condemned to misery, pining to death for the youth she loves, and justly detesting the sight of you, as the wicked author of her wretchedness?

Sir S. Hem! [Looking towards the door.] Madam, I—Hem!—I wish you a good evening.

Lucy. [Preventing him from going.] Another word, Sir Samuel. Have you ever talked to the young lady on the subject?

Sir S. Hem! No, Madam.

Lucy. But, why?

Sir S. I—I—Hem!—I can't very well tell.

Lucy. But I can. With much folly and depravity, there is still some virtue in you.

Sir S. Madam! [Looking how to escape.]

Lucy. Though you could form so unjust a project, you never had the courage to insult the lady, by an avowal of your guilt.

Sir S. Hem! Guilt, madam!

Lucy. Yes, sir, guilt. However, sir, she has perfectly understood your insinuations.

Sir S. Madam!

Lucy. She has infinite respect for filial duties. But, though she would be aware of offending her parents, I know her to be equally determined never to entail misery on herself; nor to accept a husband whom she could neither esteem, admire, nor love.

Sir S. Madam, I—I—Hem!—Your servant, madam.

Lucy. [Placing herself between him and the door.] Not till you promise—

Sir S. [Forgetting his fear.] I'll promise anything, madam.

Lucy. That you will not render yourself more ridiculous, by persevering in so absurd, so unjust a pursuit.

Sir S. No, madam; I'm quite ridiculous enough already.

Lucy. Nay, more; that you will not seek some less friended, more enslaved, or more timid young creature, whom your misapplied wealth might command.

Sir S. Whatever you please, madam.

Lucy. But, that you will rather apply your superfluous hoards to the protection of youthful innocence.

Sir S. Suffer me but to depart, madam, and I will bequeath my estates in perpetuity, as you shall direct; I'll entail them on the Magdalen; or I'll advertise for marriageable men and maids, and you shall portion out my money among them—I'll—I'll do anything, except marry, or go a courting.

Lucy. Why, then, Sir Samuel—[Kissing his hand.] There, that be your reward.

Sir S. Madam, your humble servant

[Exit.]

Lucy. Ha, ha, ha! Poor Sir Samuel! This is the first time he ever forgot his bow.

Enter Count CONOLLY VILLARS.

Well, sir, have you effectually made your peace with my mamma?

Count. I have done my endeavour, madam.—[Aside.] Would I were at peace with myself!

Lucy. And are you still, sir, under the dominion of prejudice so weak? Do you still repent of what you so long have deemed your condescension?

Count. Far otherwise, madam. There are beings so peculiarly favoured of heaven, and endowed with such high perfections, both of body and of mind, that they are superior to all the distinctions of men, among whom they walk angels upon earth. You are one of these; and my misery is, I never can deserve you.

Lucy. You may have stumbled; but this self-condemnation shows it was but to rise with ten-fold strength. Persevere, and we will be severed only by death.

Enter EDMUND.

Edmund. At length, my dear Count, Lady Peckham is pacified. To stoop to her ill-placed pride, to overlook her prejudice, and to petition as you did, was noble in you. I have seconded your efforts, have pledged myself for your honour, and guaranteed your veracity.

Count. Then, sir, you have struck a dagger to my heart! I have been guilty of falsehood. That very pride, and that exalted, or, I fear, extravagant sense of honour, which should have preserved me from a stain so hateful, has dashed me down the precipice!

Edmund. You amaze me!

Count. 'Tis true; 'twas inadvertent; but ranking vanity, strengthened by a purer motive,—the trembling alarms of love,—induced me to persist; nay, a second time, to aid deception.

Lucy. You did wrong. But which of us can say they never erred?

Edmund. Ay, who will stand forth and affirm, that, amid the rude whirl, the confused doubts, or the terrors of passion, they never once have been betrayed into your crime? For a crime, I own it is; and, with consequences so wide, so pernicious, and so fatal, that, when it shall be extirpated from the earth, that moment man will be perfect! But, in this poor world's present state, it is so far venial, that—[painful, humiliating thought!]—no; the noblest, the purest of us all, cannot strike his heart, and say—I never was a liar! But what have you said that—

Enter Sir PAUL PECKHAM.

Sir P. Come, come, we must strike while the iron is hot. We must take my lady while she is in the humour, since she must necessarily be a party in our deeds. And first, I have agreed, as you know, Count, that my daughter's portion shall be eighty thousand pounds: the remainder will chiefly rest with you. What settlement do you intend to make? and on what estates?

Count. None, sir

Sir P. None!

Count. I have no estates.

Sir P. Sir!—Why, what—Zounds!—After the inquiries I made, I cannot be so deceived. Are not you Count Conolly Villars?

Count. I am, sir.

Sir P. A colonel in the armies of the most Christian king?

Count. I am, sir.

Sir P. Recommended to me by Messieurs Devigny, the great merchants at Marseilles?

Count. The same, sir.

Sir P. Why, then, what do you mean?

Count. When I first paid my addresses to this lady, I imagined my rank and family were a sufficient counterpoise to wealth.

Sir P. Ha! Gold in one scale, honour in t'other. Flimsy ware!—No, no; kick the beam—

Count. But, ardent, violent, and eternal, as my love for your angelic daughter is, and must be, even the loss of her shall not tempt me, any longer, to practise the least imposition.

Sir P. Well, but,—'Sblood! The steward!—the family estates!

Count. I have told you the truth, sir.

Enter LYDIA.

Lucy. What's the matter, Lydia?

Lydia. Poor Mr. Mac Dermot—

Count. What of him? Any harm?

Lydia. He has been in some fray, and is so bruised.

Count. Bruised! Where is he?

Lydia. Below, with a packet, which he wants to deliver to Sir Paul.

Sir P. To me?

Lydia. Yes, sir. Pray go to him.

Sir P. A packet for me! [Going.] I shall never hear the last of this from my lady. [Exit.]

Lucy. Brother, go to my mamma, and endeavour to keep her in temper.—[To the Count.] Be not dejected; I know my father's affection for me, and do not yet despair. [Exit.]

Count. Charming, generous girl! This poor Mac Dermot,—

Lydia. He is afraid of seeing you. He says you will never pardon him, for having taken the part of a man, whom you threatened to murder.

Count. I! I threatened to murder no man.—Will you, madam, be so kind as to tell him I am here, and that I insist on seeing him?

Lydia. With pleasure. [Exit.]

Count. Kingdoms should not tempt me to pass another day like this.

Enter MAC DERMOT, with his left arm in a sling.

How now, Mac Dermot! Where have you been? What's the matter with you?

Mac D. No great matter, my lord; only a little bit of a joint here. [Pointing to his arm.]

Count. Broken?

Mac D. A double tooth or two; not much, my lord.

Count. Much! How? What have you been doing?

Mac D. [Pitifully.] I hope your lordship won't be angry—[Enraged.] But the rascals sazed him neck and heels!

Count. Seized who?

Mac D. [Passionately.] He was as innocent as the babe unborn, my lord; and he tould 'em so, the dirty rascallions!

Count. Who are you talking of?

Mac D. [Pitifully.] To be sure, he sent your lordship a— a viry impertinent letter.

Count. How?

[The Count's perplexities and passions are here effectually roused, and increase through the scene.]

Mac D. There were three of them. Nivir did your lordship set your two good-looking eyes on such a pair of thieves!

Count. For heaven's sake! tell your story straight forward. What letter do you mean? Who?

Mac D. [With great emotion.] I hope your lordship will forget and forgive. It would have moved the bowels of your compassion to have seen the ould gntleman.

Count. Is it possible? What can he mean?—What ould gentleman?

Mac D. [Enraged.] The dirty shaberoons took him by the throat—My viry blood boiled—Upon my soul, my lord, I could not bear it! I hope you will forgive me! By the merciful father, I could not bear it!

Count. Tell me this moment who you mean.

Mac D. He came running back, out of breath, and asked for your lordship; and so, my lord, seeing a fillow-crater in distriss—

Count. Came where?

Mac D. A couple of as ill-looking Tyburn-turn-pike bum-bailiffs as your lordship could wish, with a cowardly complotter at their back. It was he that came behind me with his shillalee, while I was hard at work with both. But the brave ould gentleman stepped in; and, by the virgin's night-cap! but he gave him his dose.

Count. Once more, tell me, instantly, what ould gentleman?

Mac D. Considering his age, he is as active and as brave a fillow, as ever handled a fist.

Count. [Aside.] He cannot, surely, mean my father!—Mac Dermot, I entreat, I command you to tell me of whom you are talking.

Mac D. If your lordship had but seen the noble ould soul, I'm sure you would have forgiven me.

Count. But what letter?

Mac D. Oh! the divel burn the letter! Now, my lord, don't mention it; pray, don't remember it, your lordship; pray, don't! By my soul, now, my lord, he is a fine ould fillow! Oh! how he laid about him!

Count. Was it the person who came this afternoon?

Mac D. My lord,—

Count. Fear nothing. Speak!

Mac D. Why, then, my lord,—To be sure, it was he himself.

Count. And is he safe? Did you free him from them?

Mac D. Why, my lord, I could not hilp it! I could not hilp it! By the holy footstool, but I couldn't!

Count. Mac Dermot,— [Taking him by the hand.]

Mac D. My lord?

Count. Well, well! a time will come—

Mac D. My lord?

Count. Are you much hurt, Mac Dermot?—Here, hallo!

Enter a Footman.

Call a chair! Run for a surgeon and a physician! the best that can be procured.

Mac D. For me, my lord?

Count. For you, my noble fellow!

Mac D. Spare yourself the labour, young man.

Count. Go! do as I order you, instantly.—[Exit Footman.]—Mac Dermot, you must be put to bed.

Mac D. To bed, my lord!

Count. And lose some blood.

Mac D. 'Faith, my lord, that will be a little too much; I've lost quite blood enough already.

Count. Pray,—I request,—I must have you do as I desire. I would not have any ill happen to you, for the world.

Mac D. Oh! and the divle of ill or harm cau happen to Mac Dermot, the while he has such a generous prince-royal of a master! though, I believe, the best thing that could happen to me, just now, would be a good supper, and a hearty tiff of whisky-punch.

Count. Not for the Indies!

Mac D. Faith, my lord, it was hard work, and has given me a very craving kind of a call.

Re-enter Footman.

Foot. The chair is waiting, sir.

Count. Go, my good fellow! Obey me but this once, and I'll never act the master to you more.

Mac D. Well, well, my lord,—But I hope your lordship won't quite kill me with kindness. [Exit.]

Enter Sir PAUL PECKHAM and LUCY.

Sir P. [With the packet opened.] So, Count, I find, after all your pretended raptures, you never wished to marry my daughter.

Count. Sir!

Sir P. Why did not you retract like a man, and not make a paltry, false excuse of poverty?

Count. Sir, I made no false excuse.

Sir P. How, sir! Shall I not believe my eyes? Have I not bills here in my hand, drawn in your favour, for five hundred thousand crowns?

Count. In mine!

Sir P. In your's; given me this moment by your own servant.

Count. Impossible, sir!

Sir P. Impossible, is it? Why, look you, here are the bills. And, hallo!—

Enter Footman.

Go you, sir, and desire Mr. Mac Dermot to come back.

Count. Stir not for your life, on such an errand! He must not, shall not be disturbed.

Sir P. Nay, my word, it seems, is not to be believed; nor, perhaps, the bills themselves. But, sir, though you vaunt so highly of being a man of honour, the trick was beneath a man of honesty.

Enter Lady PECKHAM and EDMUND.

Lady P. Here's a komakul kind of an obstreperous person, that says he must speak to the Count. You may come in, mister.

Enter DORIMONT and LYDIA.

Sir P. Ah! what, my friend, the steward! I am glad you are come. Never was so amazed in my life. Your master, here, has been telling me he has no estates.

Lady P. How!

Dori. My master, sir!

Count. The feelings of man cannot support this open shame! [Going.]

Dori. Whither now, sir?

Sir P. Ay, talk to him. I'm in a mist.

Count. Suffer me to pass, sir. [Going.] Speak the truth; render me contemptible,—abhorrent; but make me not a witness of my own disgrace!

Dori. Stay, sir!

Count. I cannot.

Dori. Stay; or, dread a father's malediction!

Sir P. [Aside.] His father! The plague!—Hem!—

—Lydia!

Lydia. Hush!

Lady P. Father, indeed! What he! So, so! Here's a wirago; here's a chouse!

Sir P. My lady—

Lady P. I thought what would be the upshot on't!

Edmund. Madam! [Takes her aside.]

Dori. Spurred on by suppositions and conceits

the most absurd; wholly intent upon yourself; contemning others; exacting respect you did not merit; refusing ceremony where 'twas due; protuberant with pride, yet poorly carping at and holding idiot warfare with the pride of others; forgetful of the dignity of reason, but, with tenacious grasp, clinging to the ludicrous dignity of birth; the heir, indeed, and first-born of folly, ignorance itself has mocked and taunted at you!

Lady P. Wery troo. Give him his own!

Sir P. Zounds! My lady, I wish he would give you your own a little: not but it's right enough.

Lady P. To be sure! I knows wery vell I am right.

Dori. Your father, too, has been avoided, nay, disowned; your father, who, for years, has lived in indigence, that he might secretly supply your wants, support you in splendour, and preserve you from all the misery of which he made himself the willing victim.

Count. Sir,—You?—Was it you? Oh! ingratitude!

Dori. Your father was offensive to your sight. And what was it you despised! Why, this poor garb. You wished no kindred with virtuous poverty. Had I appeared in all my former state, though knave or fool had been blazoned on my brow, yet, decked in the trappings of magnificence, I had received an open welcome. But, blessed be my penury, since it has been your punishment.

Count. Sir, wrung as my heart is by remorse, and guilty as I know myself—for I have still increase of guilt—no words can mitigate my crimes. Yet, though I have erred, I feel I have something in me capable of good; and strong propensities to all the tender ties, the filial duties, and the severer virtues, which I have seemed to want; a mind, which, once convinced, has strength to shun and to subdue its master passion, renounce its folly, and abhor its turpitude. Deep is my offence against you and nature; but let nature plead in my behalf. Here, at your feet, repentant for my faults, I claim that pity, which a father so good, and so affectionate, will not refuse.

Dori. Oh! no; for now you speak like the son of my heart, the image of my brightest hopes. You have stood the fiery trial, and are pure.

Lady P. Why, but, hark you me, mister,—why, what! you are not a count, too, to be sure!

Dori. No, madam.

Lady P. Why, then,—

Dori. If a title can flatter your ladyship, mine is something higher.

Lady P. How!

Dori. I am a marquis.

Lady P. A marquis! You! Vell!—[Aside] For an outlandish marquis!

Edmund. My lady—

Sir P. Well, but the bills? [Holding them out.]

Dori. They are mine.

Count. Your's, sir!

Dori. Remittances for some recovered arrears. But, where is my brave protector,—my hero!

Count. Safe, sir. Every care is taken of the generous fellow. Is the physician come?

Sir P. Yes, yes; I have taken care of that. I have sent him my own physician.—Hem!—[Aside.] My cook!

Count. You know not half his worth.

Dori. Which shall not go unrewarded.

Count. No; by heaven!

Dori. We have now the means; we no longer are oppressed and poor.

Count. Yet, are you not in present danger?

Dori. No; malice has spent its last effort. Our ambassador has just sent me the final decision of the judges: my sentence is reversed, my whole estates are restored, and the power of my persecutors is at an end.

Count. Oh, fortune! Oh, my father!—And, may I hope it? My Lucy, may I?

Lucy. Yes; hope every thing.

Count. Mine?

Lucy. Yours; heart and soul.

Sir P. She is a brave wench!

Lady P. Hold a blow, if you please! What! am I nobody?

Count. Madam, to you a thousand excuses are due.

Lady P. To be sure they are!

Count. I am conscious of my past ridicule, and will no more contend with your ladyship for prejudices so false and weak.

Lady P. I knoo I vus right; I knoo you made yourself ridiculous; I told you so often enough!

Sir P. Well said, my lady. But, hark you, Miss Lydia,—And, sir,—

Dori. Count.—[Aside.] How shall I tell him?—My son, look at this charming, this virtuous young lady.

Sir P. [Aside.] Zounds! what now?

Count. I am conscious of having treated her with proud unkindness, at the very moment, too, when I perceived she was sincerely my friend.

Dori. Your friend! Look at her. Does not your heart throb? Feel you not sensations more tender? Are you not all doubt, all hope, all fear, all perturbation?

Count. Sir!—What!—Who!

Dori. Can you not imagine? Look at her, I say; behold her agitation!

Count. Mercy!

Dori. Open your arms, your heart, to receive her.

Count. Sir!—Madam!—Who?

Dori. Your sister.

Count. My sister!

Lydia. My dearest, best of brothers! [Running into his arms.]

Lucy. My friend! my Lydia!

Count. Oh! how culpable have I been!

Sir P. [Aside.] 'Sblood! here's a pretty piece of business!

Lady P. What's that you say, sir? Miss Liddy the Count's sister!

Edmund. 'Tis very true, madam.

Lady P. Truo! Vell, I purtest, I'm quite in a quandary.

Dori. [To Sir P.] And now, sir,—

Sir P. [Aside.] Yes, 'tis my turn, now!—Yes, sir.

Dori. While labouring to reclaim the follies of youth—

Sir P. Yes, sir.

Dori. We ought not to forget the vices of age.

Sir P. Hem!—We'll talk of them after supper, sir. [Looking round at Lady Peckham and the Company.]

Dori. Well, sir, on condition—

Sir P. Oh! any condition you please, sir.

Edmund. [Leading LYDIA.] My dear father!—

Sir P. My kind son!—[Aside.] Sly rascal!

Lydia. [To Sir P.] We shall want a house, sir.

Sir P. Hem!—Ay, ay!

Lydia. Somewhere in Mary-le-bone.

Sir P. Very well.

Lydia. With a—

Sir P. Zounds!—[Apart to LYDIA.] Hush! don't mention the back door.

Lydia. [Apart to Sir P.] Then we are all friends?

Sir P. [Apart.] To be sure. But, you may as well not tell Scapegrace.

Lydia. [Apart.] Never fear.

Sir P. [Apart.] Not a word of the new liveries.

Lydia. [Apart.] Depend upon my honour.

Count. My sister and my friend! Can it be?

Edmund. Would you not wish it thus?

Count. Oh! most ardently!

Dori. Chequered are the scenes of life; pleasure and pain, joy and grief, austerity and laughter, intermingling, weave a motley web. Our prejudices are our punishments: they cling about us, warp our actions, distort our manners, render us the food of satire, the mockery of fools, and torture us, as wailing urchins are tormented to make sport for boys. Error and folly impede the progress of perfection. Truth alone can make men wise and happy. Myself the sacrifice of falsehood and mistake, feebly have I striven to stem the torrent; and here my task, and here, I hope, my troubles end. [Exeunt.]

SEDUCTION;

A COMEDY, IN FIVE ACTS,

BY THOMAS HOLCROFT.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

LORD MORDEN
GENERAL BURLAND
SIR FREDERICK FASHION
WILMOT LAPELLE
Bailiffs
Servants.

LADY MORDEN
MRS. MODELY :
MRS. PINUP
HARRIET :
EMILY.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Drawing-room at Lord Morden's.

Enter LAPELLE.

Lap. [Looking at his watch.] Twenty minutes past ten; a shameful time of the morning for a gentleman's gentleman to be disturbed. My lord has lost his money, can't sleep himself, and won't suffer others to take their natural rest.

Enter Mrs. PINUP.

Mrs. P. I declare, upon my honour, this is a most monstrous time of night for a lady's gentlewoman to be kept up; dozing over a dull novel, or nodding in an antichamber and an arm-chair, while others are taking their pleasure, and losing their estates, among their friends.

Lap. Good morrow, Mrs. Pinup.

Mrs. P. Good morrow, Mr. Lapelle! Good night, you mean. I have not been in bed yet.

Lap. No!

Mrs. P. That vile, bed-side bell! They'll wear me haggard before I am old. Knew I should not rest long, so threw myself down in my clothes; and, just as I was got into a sound sleep, tingle, tingle, tingle; up I must get to dress my lady, who for my part, I believe, never sleeps at all.

Lap. Why, yes; your fashionable folks are a kind of ghosts, that walk of nights, and greatly trouble the repose of valets and ladies' maids; and late hours, like white paint, are excellent promoters of cracked complexions

Mrs. P. I declare, upon my honour, I am as tired as—as—

Lap. A hackney-coach horse, on a rainy Sunday.

Mrs. P. Yes; and as drowsy as—

Lap. An alderman at an oratorio. Your lady had a deal of company at her rout. Was Sir Frederick Fashion there?

Mrs. P. To be sure.

Lap. He is a prodigious favourite with your lady, I think.

Mrs. P. Favourite! There are strange doings in this world!—Staid, I know not how long, after every body else was gone.

Lap. What! alone with your lady?

Mrs. P. Alone, with my lady.

Lap. Indeed! Was Mrs. Modely at the rout?

Mrs. P. Yes. But don't ask me any questions; it's impossible I should say ten words more: I am talking in my sleep, now. When I get up, in the morning, (that is, about three o'clock in the afternoon,) I'll tell you all. So, good night. [Exit.]

Lap. A wonderful change in a short time! Lady Morden, young, handsome, and full of spirits, was, not a month ago, reserved in her conduct, fond of her husband, contented with home,—and, indeed, a miraculous kind of exception among wives of quality; whereas, now, she has suddenly turned fantastical in dress, capricious in temper, free of speech, and, what we half-bred folks should call, light of carriage. She games with the women, coquettes with the men; and seems, in every respect, ambitious to become a woman of fashion. As for my lord, why, he is a—man of fashion.

Enter General BURLAND.

General. Is your lady up, Mr. Lapelle?

Lap. Yes, sir; I believe she has never been in bed.

General. Who? what do you mean?

Lap. My lady had a rout last night.

General. A rout! and never in bed! Impossible.

Lap. Yes; but it's very true, sir.

General. Lady Morden! she whom, but a few weeks since, I left so singular, so eminent an example of simplicity and purity of manners.

Lap. Sir Frederick Fashion was here.

General. Sir Frederick Fashion!

Lap. He staid after every body else had retired.

General. What! alone with Lady Morden?

Lap. So her ladyship's woman, who is scarcely yet undressed, informed me.

General. Why, then, all hopes of goodness, in this world, are vanished! Go; bid my daughter, my Emily, to come to me.

Lap. She is not stirring, I fancy, sir.

General. But I fancy she is, sir; I am sure she is. What, sir, she had not a rout to keep her up all night!

Lap. She was of my lady's party, I believe, sir.

General. Go, go; pray, go, and do as I bid you.

[Exit LAPELLE.]

What will this town, this world, come to! The only perfectly amiable, the only enchantingly virtuous woman I knew, fascinated, at last, and sinking into the gulph of depravity! She will drag down my Emily too. No; I'll hide her in a forest, seclude her in a cave, rather than suffer her to be infected by the pestiferous breath of this contagious town. But is she not already tainted? Of my lady's party! she that I left her with as a pattern; commanded her to observe, to study, to imitate, in all things!

Re-enter LAPELLE.

Well, where is my daughter?

Lap. I have called her woman, and she will call Miss Emily.

General. I'll call her myself; and it shall be the most ungentele call she has long heard from me. [Ex.]

Enter HARRIET, disguised.

Lap. Who comes here? Some foreign sharper, I dare say; one of my lord's morning duns for last night's debts.

Har. [With the brogue.] Harkye! young man, may I be asking you where I will find my Lord Morden?

Lap. He is not come down, sir.

Har. Oh! that, I suppose, is because he is not up.

Lap. My lord told me he expected a gentleman or two would call; but he has had so many calls lately—

Har. That he is a little slow in answering.

Lap. Rather. Riches, regularity, and roast beef, will soon, I fear, take their leave of our house.

Har. Faith! and that may viry will be; for they are all three become great vagabonds. Riches is turned American pedler; regularity a Prussian grenadier; and, as for roast beef, why, the Frinch are now so fond of good ould English fashions, that poor roast beef is transported alive to Paris.

Lap. My lord, I believe, is a little out of cash, at present.

Har. Will, now, that is viry prudent of him to put it out; for, whin a man finds he can't keep his cash himself, he is viry right to lit odther people keep it for him.

Lap. Nay, then, I don't know a more careful gentleman.

Har. Careful! Why, sure, always whin a man of spirit begins to take care of his money, 'tis because he has none.

Lap. Well, sir, if you will please to leave your card, his lordship, I suppose, will know who has called.

Har. Indeed, and he won't.

Lap. How so, pray, sir?

Har. Faith, for a viry good raison,—he niver saw me in his life.

Lap. Who, then, shall I say?

Har. And is it my name you would know?

Lap. If you please.

Har. Let me see: what the white divle is my name, now? Oh! Char-les Phelim O'Fireaway: an Irishman by accident; a gentleman by policy; and a captain of croats in the Austrian sarvis, by design. Do you understand that riddle, now?

Lap. Not clearly.

Har. [Aside.] I did not intend you should.—What time can I see my lord?

Lap. Most likely, about one.

Har. Will, then, give him this litter, and inform his lordship I will take the liberty of calling, this afternoon, to bid him a good-morrow. [Exit.]

Enter LORD MORDEN.

Lord M. [Speaking as he enters.] Lapelle!

Lap. [Aside.] So, here he comes already.—My lord?

Lord M. What time is it?

Lap. Eleven o'clock, my lord.

Lord M. What a d—d night have I passed! Is my coffee ready?

Lap. I'll go and see, my lord. [Exit.]

Lord M. [Throws himself on the sofa.] This headache!—No rest!—Oh! for half an hour's sleep! A cursed, silly course of mine! But, there is no accounting in the morning for the conduct of overnight.

Re-enter LAPELLE, with coffee.

This is not half strong enough. Get me some as strong as possible.—Any message? [Rises.]

Lap. This letter, my lord.

Lord M. From Lady Westbrook, I see.—[Reads.] Um—"A young Lady in disguise—Um—will relate her own story.—Um, um—Rely on your honour to keep her secret, and serve her cause.—Would have addressed myself to Lady Morden, but for reasons which you shall know hereafter."

Enter LAPELLE, with more coffee.

Who brought this letter?

Lap. An Irish gentleman, in a foreign dress.

Lord M. A gentleman!

Lap. Said he would call about one o'clock, my lord.

Lord M. Shew him into my room, and inform me the instant he comes.

Lap. General Burland is here.

Lord M. [Aside.] General Burland! Zounds!

Lap. Came to town late last night, my lord.

Lord M. Tell him I am come down.

[Exit Lapelle.]

Must not let him see the present temper of my mind. My guardian once, he is determined never to think me of age. I need not his reproof to increase my present chagrin; my own follies, and Lady Morden's unexpected, unaccountable reverse of conduct, are sufficient. He will lay it all to me; and, perhaps, with reason. Heigho! Here he comes. Really, one of these very prudent, plain-speaking friends, is a very disagreeable person, in these our moments of folly. Well, I must assume a cheerfulness I don't feel, and ward off his wisdom with raillery.

Enter General BURLAND.

General. Good morrow, my lord.

Lord M. General, good morrow.

General. You seem scarcely awake.

Lord M. [Stretching.] Slept ill; troubled with the night-mare.

General. Your troubles, I am afraid, are rapidly increasing.

Lord M. How so, General?

General. Lady Morden had a rout last night.

Lord M. Oh! and forgot to send you a card, I suppose. Is that my fault?

General. You are merry, my lord; but, he who drinks poison, out of a frolic, will soon be glad to send for a physician, out of fear; and the chances are, the doctor will come too late.

Lord M. Trope and figure!

General. My lord, my lord! this levity is unseasonable: blushes and shame would better become you.

Lord M. They are out of fashion.

General. Yes, you leave your friends to blush for your faults.

Lord M. My friends are very good; nay, indeed, generous; for, were they but to spare a single blush for each of their own faults, they would have none to bestow on mine.

General. Fie! The mirth of a madman is sport only to boys. I was your guardian, I wished to prove myself your friend. 'Twas I first discovered that, then, angelic woman, who is, now, Lady Morden; I was the cause of her union with you; and I am, therefore, accountable to myself, to her, and to society, for her conduct.

Lord M. That is, you are a kind of second-hand sponsor; godfather-in-law, as it were.

General. Very well, sir, proceed. Despise reproof; ridicule advice.

Lord M. Nay, good doctor, you really wrong me; 'tis not the advice, but the physic, I hate: at least, I hate the form under which it is administered.—But, pray, tell me: when last you saw Lady Morden, did you perceive any symptoms of that degeneracy in her ladyship, you now complain so loudly of?

General. None: I thought it impossible.

Lord M. And is it not rather extraordinary, then, that my example should so suddenly subdue what, within this month, seemed so invulnerable?

General. [With great surprise and energy.] It is extraordinary, my lord; most extraordinary! but not less true; and, had you any sense of your duty to yourself, your family, or society, the truth of it would make you tremble.

Lord M. See how differently different people understand things. My acquaintance are, every day, wishing me joy of her ladyship's reformation, and telling me how surprisingly she has retrieved her character in the world.

General. And Sir Frederick Fashion, no doubt, among the rest!

Lord M. [Endeavouring to conceal his feelings.] Hem!—yes—yes. He is one of our very first men, you know; and he is quite in raptures with her: swears she was born to lead and outshine us all.

General. [With continued irony.] The approbation of so great an adept must give you vast pleasure!

Lord M. Hem!—a—infinite!—Not but this sudden change has rather surprised me.

General. How so?

Lord M. Just as you left town, her ladyship's melancholy seemed increasing; wandering over the house, like a perturbed spirit, as the play says, mournfully clanking her chains, and frightening the gentle smiles and pleasures from her, she seemed to way-lay me; and, with moving look and melting eye, entreat compassion; till, egad! I really, at last, began to pity her.

General. You did?

Lord M. Yes. But suddenly forsaking the pen-seroso, she broke in upon me, one morning, and, with an air of levity and good humour, and a small tincture of reproach, then and there read a very pretty, wife-like remonstrance.

General. To which you listened with a truly pick-tooth insensibility.

Lord M. Yes, you know my way.

General. And what was the subject of her discourse?

Lord M. Why, chapter the first was a recapitulation of my agreeable follies, and her own perverse virtues. She was no partaker in my pleasure; I had forgotten every endearment. She was left to dine, sup, and sleep, by herself; I dined, supped, and slept, nobody knew where. She more recluse than the abbess of a convent; I more uncertain than the price of stocks, or the place of prime minister.

General. [With earnest concern.] And what did you say to this?

Lord M. [Aside.] I must face it out.—Say! What could I say to such a simple woman?

General. You did not attempt to deny the charge, then?

Lord M. What should I deny? 'Twas every syllable true; and every syllable in my praise.

General. Humph!—Then you do not think the sweets of affection ought, sometimes, to alleviate the bitterness of neglect.

Lord M. Sweets! Psha! they are too cloying to the stomach, and ought to be taken sparingly. I am fond of sweet music, but too much of it sets me to sleep. Besides, a wife, like a barrelled organ, can only play one set of tunes.

General. [Sighs.] Well, sir, but the conclusion.

Lord M. A very unexpected one, I assure you. I misunderstood this for a declaration of war; and, with a smile, was very obligingly about to entreat her ladyship would hatch her melancholy into mischief her own way; when, turning short upon me, she curtsied, seemed abashed, began to apologize, applaud my conduct, ridicule the silliness of her own, and promised to become as fashionable a lady as I, or any lord in Christendom, could wish.

General. Your increase of happiness is, then, prodigious?

Lord M. Hem!—a—unspeakable. Lady Morden, I own, was, certainly, a kind of demi-angel, though my wife; but, then, her—her goodness seemed to throw one at such a distance, so much in the back-ground, that there was only one figure noticed in the picture.

General. 'Tis well, sir, you are so perfectly satisfied.

Lord M. Nay, General, I will own I have often felt a kind of inclination, a sort of wish, as it were, to become very prudent, and wise, and—and all that; but, really, one has so much to do, that one does not know where to begin. Besides, you very good kind of people, you—upon my honour, you are, in many respects, the most queer, precise, particular species of beings, and have such notions! Instead of taking one's pleasure, and doing just what one likes best, which, you know, is so natural, one must live for the good of one's country, love one's wife and children, pay tradesmen, look over accounts, reward merit, and a thousand other of the—the most ridiculous whims; and what nobody—absolutely, nobody does.

General. Intolerable profligacy! I have listened to you, my lord, with grief, vexation, astonishment, and pity! Your mind is degraded; and the more dangerously so, because you believe your worst vices to be your greatest merits. You have had honour, happiness, and pleasure, of the most perfect kind, within your power; and you have rejected them, to clasp their shadows! To merit pity by misconduct is humiliating; but, by misconduct to incur contempt, is, to a manly spirit, insupportable; and the latter will, I fear, be suddenly your lordship's fate. Did not the remembrance of your noble father affect me, I should look upon your approaching punishment with apathy; because you willfully have plunged to perdition; but, for your lady, if I cannot retrieve, if I cannot save her, I shall mourn indeed!

[Exit.

Lord M. 'Faith! this good general is, like a cuckoo, always in a tune. [Sighs.] He has reason. I have laboured to laugh at my own follies; but the farce is over, the forced jest forgotten, and the sorceress recollection conjures up the ugly phantom disgust. Why, what a child am I! Oh! Lady Morden—Psha! absurd! I will not make myself the butt, and by-word, of my acquaintance. I—I—I will laugh—ha, ha, ha!—laugh at my lady's gallantries. I jealous! I! that have daily made jealousy a standing jest; the criterion of an ill-bred, vulgar mind!—No, no, no.—[Sees Lady Morden and Sir Frederick Fashion coming, and is seized with a suspicious anxiety, which he endeavours to conceal.]

Enter LADY MORDEN in an undress, followed by SIR FREDERICK FASHION.

Lady M. [Speaking as she enters.] No, no; Sir Frederick, you are partial.

Sir F. Not in the least, madam.

Lady M. Yes, you are—Good morrow to your lordship—Yes, you are. I feel, I still retain a leaven of former silly prejudices; but, a little collision, among you people of superior fashion, will soon wear these asperities smooth, and bring them to bear a proper polish.

Sir F. Ah! madam, you have a leaven of something celestial, which we inferior people wonder at, but cannot imitate.

Lord M. [Aside.] So!

Lady M. [Taps Sir Frederick Fashion with her fan.] Fie, flatterer! But you are always saying civil things; and that, I fancy, makes you so agreeable.

Sir F. No, Lady Morden, you wrong me; my tongue is forced to give utterance to the effusions of my heart. By heaven, you are an angel! and I am, involuntarily, obliged to repeat, and repeat, and repeat, that you are an angel! You must not be angry with me, for I cannot help it.

Lady M. No, no; angry! no. Though, I really believe, I do improve—don't I, my lord?

Lord M. Certainly, madam, certainly!

Lady M. Yes, I have discovered that one of my most capital errors, formerly, was being too sensible of my own defects. I find that to wear, on one's countenance, an open and avowed consciousness that one possesses every grace and perfection, is the grand secret of really possessing them; or, at least, of persuading the world one really does, which is the same thing.

Sir F. Your ladyship is very right; nothing can put a face of real fashion out of countenance: the placid features are all fixed.

Lady M. Oh! immovable. Like the owners' names, cut in brass, and nailed to their doors.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! Charming!

Lady M. Do but observe one of our well-bred beaux, at a public assembly, and you will see him enter, plant himself in a spot, elevate his eye-brows, fix his eyes, half open his mouth, and stand like an automaton, with its head turning on a pivot.

[Mimicking.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! Charming, charming!

Lord M. [Smiling.] But, don't you think this a little tending to the ridiculous, madam?

Lady M. Oh dear! no. Nothing can be ridiculous that's fashionable.

Sir F. Oh! no; impossible!

Lady M. Formerly, I should have blushed, if stared at; but now, I find, the only way is to stare again, without looking—that is, without betraying the least indication of knowing whether one is looking towards the man, or the wall:—thus.

Lord M. [With forced pleasantry.] Ha, ha, ha! Your ladyship is very right: modesty—modesty is an obsolete bugbear.

Lady M. Yes; and, like the—the ghost in the tragedy, has been stared out of doors.

Sir F. Oh! the very Quakers despise it, at present.

Lady M. Yes; 'tis a shabby fellow, whose acquaintance every body wishes to drop. To be sure, I was a most absurd creature,—was not I, my lord?

Lord M. I—upon my honour, madam, I—you—no, no; not absurd—no.

Lady M. Oh, fie! not absurd! Why, do you know, Sir Frederick,—ha, ha, ha!—I—ha, ha, ha! I was downright in love with his lordship.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! In love with his lordship!

Lady M. Ha, ha, ha! Upon my honour, 'tis true, is it not, my lord?

Lord M. Ha, ha, ha! Ye—ye—yes, madam, yes.

Lady M. Thought him the most charming man in the whole world!

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! Is that possible?

Lady M. Why, it—it is scarcely credible; but such is the fact. Nay, I doated on him, and continually reproached myself for wanting power and attractions to obtain my lord's affection. For I never blamed him—ha, ha, ha!—I—ha, ha, ha!—I used to sit whole nights, while my lord was out, watching and weeping; and whole days studying which way I could regain his love.

Sir F. Regain, Lady Morden! Why, was his lordship ever so unfashionable as—as—

Lady M. As to love his wife? Why, yes, really, I—I do believe he was so singular, for—for a whole fortnight.

Sir F. Why,—ha, ha, ha!—Why, were you, Lord Morden?

Lord M. Ha, ha, ha!—I—I—I don't know, sir, what I was. [With chagrin.

Lady M. Nay, don't be out of countenance, my lord! You hear I have the justice to relate my own foibles, as well as your lordship's; and mine—mine were infinitely the greater. It is exceedingly strange, but so fascinated was I, that—ha, ha, ha!—I—ha, ha, ha!—[Suddenly becoming very serious.] I am verily persuaded, I could have died with pleasure to have insured his affection.

Lord M. Ha, ha, ha! [Aside.] I cannot bear it.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! These things are unaccountable.

Lady M. [Resuming her levity.] Aye, one wonders how one could be so weak!—Oh! Sir Frederick, I am going to Christie's. There is a painting I have a mind to purchase: they tell me 'tis very fine.

Sir F. What is the story, madam?

Lady M. The Metamorphosis of Actæon.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! A fashionable subject.

Lady M. Yes! that—that—that is the very reason I wish to have it. Poor Actæon is taken at the precise moment when the—the change is taking place.

Sir F. In his forehead?

Lady M. Yes. I am going down there, now.—Will you go with me, Sir Frederick?

Sir F. With pleasure, madam. Ha, ha, ha! Poor Actæon!

Lady M. Ay, poor Actæon!—Adieu, my lord!

[Exit with Sir F.]

Lord M. Madam! [Following, stops short.]—'Sdeath! what am I about? Shall I, at last, sink into one of the vulgar, and become jealous?—Wretched about a—oh, no! Actæon! [Striking his forehead.] Sure, all men are idiots, and never know the value of that most inestimable jewel, a lovely and a loyal wife, till in danger of having it purloined.

[Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The same.

LAPELLE discovered coming from the door of the antichamber, as if he had been listening.

Lap. So, Mr. Irishman by accident! A lady in disguise! That's the riddle, is it? But, hush!

Enter Lord MORDEN and HARRIET.

Lord M. [To LAPELLE.] Leave the room. [Exit LAPELLE.] I am sorry we were disturbed. Your story, madam, has interested me deeply. Though too reprehensible for the irregularities of my own conduct, I cannot but condemn the licentious libertinism of this Sir Frederick. Indeed, I—I have reason, perhaps, to dread it.

Har. A man of honour, among men, the ruin of woman he thinks as necessary to his fame as to his pleasure; and, like too many others of your cruel sex, holds it no crime to make war upon those who cannot defend themselves.

Lord M. But, what do you propose by this disguise, madam?

Har. There is a contract, which I, indeed, refused, but which he forced upon me, to demonstrate, as he said, the purity of his intentions, wherein he bound himself in a penalty of ten thousand pounds, to marry me within a month; for, in his fictitious raptures, he protested no sum, no proofs, could sufficiently express the ardour and sanctity of his affection.

Lord M. And have you this contract?

Har. Oh! no. The day preceding that on which it was my good fortune to discover his real designs, he asked to see, and artfully exchanged it for a counterfeit copy.

Lord M. This contract you wish to regain?

Har. If possible; or some other unequivocal means of detection.

Lord M. And force him to marry you?

Har. Oh! no. To own the truth, I have a generous and a constant lover, who, perhaps, has been a little ill used.

Lord M. As most generous and constant lovers are.

Har. 'Tis too true. To avenge him, and humble the pride of one who thinks himself too cunning for our whole sex, is my determination.

Lord M. Well, madam, ours is a common cause; but, as we have both been imprudent, and invited misfortune, we must both endeavour to conceal our true feelings, mask our suspicions, and—Hush! here he comes: and with him a lady, whose principles are as free as his own; but who has had the art so well to conceal her intrigues, and preserve appearances, that she is everywhere received in society. I will introduce you in your assumed character.

Har. Not now; let us withdraw; when he is alone. The fewer eyes that are on me, the less liable I shall be to a discovery. [Ereunt.]

Enter Mrs. MODELY and Sir FREDERICK FASHION.

Mrs. M. Really, Sir Frederick, there is no accounting for the strangeness of your present taste. I pity you; I foresee the downfall of your reputation. What, you, who have vanquished so many elegant coquettes, and driven so many happy lovers mad; you, who were the very soul of our first societies, and whose presence made palpitate the hearts of belles and beaux,—the first with hope and delight, the latter with fear and envy; you, sighing at the feet of a prude, and become the rival of a husband!

Sir F. [Laughing.] Deplorable!

Mrs. M. Have not you, for this month past, buried yourself in Lady Morden's sober society, and dozed over crown whist with her, night after night? Nay, have not you attended her even to church; and there, with a twang, joined the amen chorus of charity-children, paupers, and parish-clerks; sitting with your face drawn as long as its shadow at sun-set; and a look as demure and dismal—

Sir F. As poor Doctor Faustus, waiting for the devil to come and fetch him! Ha, ha, ha!—Granted.

Mrs. M. And what do you think has been said of you, meanwhile, in the polite circles you have abandoned? Your very best friends have been the very first to condemn you.

Sir F. That's natural. When we are guilty of any folly, our very best friends are always the very first to condemn us; to shew they neither advise nor countenance us.

Mrs. M. I thought the gay, young beauty, besieged by pleasures, surrounded by flatteries, who believes herself the goddess she is painted, to fix her wandering fancy, to humble and bring her to a sense of frailty; or, to supplant the happy, the adored lover, while yet the breath is warm that vows eternal constancy; these I imagined were the only achievements worthy Sir Frederick Fashion!

Sir F. These have their éclat. But, to initiate a youthful, beauteous wife, who, from her childhood, has been accustomed to say her prayers, believe in virtue, and rank conjugal infidelity among the most heinous of the seven deadly sins; to teach her to doubt, fear, wish, tremble, and venture; to be a witness, afterwards, of her repentance; her tears involuntarily falling, her eyes motionless, her form fixed, and the severe saint transformed to a statue of weeping sin; to read her fall in the public papers; be praised, reproached, admired, and cursed, in every family in England; in short, to be for ever immortalized in the annals of gallantry, and the hero of the tea-table for a whole month,—for this will be no common vulgar wonder,—this were glory equal to my ambition! And, this glory I am determined to acquire; nay, it is already within my grasp. This day, or, rather, this night, shall I gain the greatest of all my victories!

Mrs. M. Insulting!

Sir F. Nay, my dear Mrs. Modely, you know my enthusiasm, and must not take exceptions; nor can I, surely, be blamed. Lady Morden is a concealed hoard of native sweets, that delights the senses; while the made-up beauties we commonly meet, like artificial flowers, are all shew, and no fragrance.

Mrs. M. Raptures!

Sir F. Inferior to her, in form and perfection, as the Venus of a Dutch image-hawker to the genuine Grecian antique!

Mrs. M. It matters not wasting your rhetoric on this topic; for I will not give my consent to your pursuing this affair any further, Sir Frederick.

Sir F. You will not?

Mrs. M. I will not.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! Don't provoke me, my dear Mrs. Modely; don't provoke me!

Mrs. M. Nay, no threatening.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! Well, to arms, then; war is the word.

Mrs. M. The choice remains with you.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha!

Mrs. M. Lady Morden is my relation; and, though I despise prudery, and know the world,—Sir F. [Aside.] That you do, indeed.

Mrs. M. Yet, you can hardly suppose I will silently acquiesce in her ruin.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! You—you forget yourself, dear madam: these qualms would do vastly well, in some places; but, to me—

Mrs. M. And, why not to you, sir? Though I do allow myself a little liberty of conscience,—

Sir F. [Aside.] Not a little.

Mrs. M. And, though you—you know I do, must I—In short, I have another favourite project, which I am determined not to give up.

Sir F. [Aside.] Oh, ho! But, it will be best to avoid a rupture.—May I ask what this favourite project may be?

Mrs. M. You know the public affront General Burland gave me, last winter; and you cannot suppose I have forgotten it.

Sir F. [Aside.] No; I know you better.—Oh! the General is an eccentric mortal; licensed to say anything; and, instead of being listened to, is laughed at.

Mrs. M. Yes; but I am determined he shall be punished.

Sir F. Which way?

Mrs. M. His daughter Emily is a pretty, simple girl; I mean, untutored in the world.

Sir F. [Conceiving her design.] True.

Mrs. M. To see her married to a man of fashion, would, at least, break his heart.

Sir F. [Laughs.] Infallibly!

Mrs. M. Your fortune, I believe, Sir Frederick, like your family seat, begins to want repairs; and she is a rich heiress, with twenty thousand pounds at her own disposal, besides the General's estate, which must be hers—Why do you laugh so?

Sir F. Oh! the delights of anticipation!

Mrs. M. An—an—anticipation!

Sir F. [Still laughing.] It is a part of my plan to carry her off,—I mean, to let her carry me off this very night.

Mrs. M. Who, Emily?

Sir F. Emily.

Mrs. M. To-night?

Sir F. This active, this important, this blissful night!

Mrs. M. Lend me your eau de luce, you divel!

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! This surprise from you, Mrs. Modely, is the supreme of panegyric.

Mrs. M. And have you made any advances to Emily?

Sir F. Yes, yes,—ha, ha, ha!—I made advances to her, and she made advances to me. The conquest was too easy. Were it not for the circumstance of the elopement, which will give the sauce a flavour the food wants, it would scarcely invite my appetite.

Mrs. M. But, Lady Morden—

Sir F. Is mine, whenever I please to make my final attack. I am no bad orator, in general; but, in company with her, I seem inspired; am, absolutely, astonished at my own eloquence; nay, I have several times spoken with such energy, enthusiasm, and momentary conviction, in praise of virtue, that I have, actually, been in imminent danger of making a convert of myself.

Mrs. M. In praise of virtue?

Sir F. In praise of virtue. There is no making one of these virtuous visionaries rational, but by flattering their bigotry, and pretending to adore their idol; by pursuing which method, I have inured her to, and made her as familiar with, what is prudishly called vice and vicious sentiments, as she is with her own thoughts.

Mrs. M. Yes, yes, vile rake!—But, remember, I'll have no concern in this affair. I—

Sir F. Oh, pooh!—Ay, ay, that is understood. You wink, and know nothing of the matter.

Mrs. M. Nay, but, I here publicly protest against your proceedings.—

Sir F. [Aside.] And will privately do your utmost to promote them.

Mrs. M. I exclaim against such licentiousness.

Sir F. I know you do. But, if you are thus tender of her ladyship's reputation, you will feel no repugnance at assisting me to irritate his lordship's sensibility.

Mrs. M. What do you mean?

Sir F. To confess the truth, I am a little piqued at Lord Morden's want of feeling. I wish I could make him jealous.

Mrs. M. Jealous! Fie! he is too well bred.

Sir F. That's unfortunate. The antics of a jealous husband add highly to the enjoyment as well as the reputation of an amour. The poor man is so injured, so enraged, so distressed, so industrious to publish his calamity, and is so sincerely pitied and laughed at—must, positively, rouse my lord to a sense of his misfortune, or it will want poignancy: a turtle-feast without French wines!

Mrs. M. Well, should I find any opportunity of aiding you—

Sir F. Ay, ay; I have no doubt of your zeal in the cause.

Mrs. M. Nay, but, don't mistake me: I only mean as far as teasing his lordship is concerned.

Sir F. Oh! certainly, certainly.

Mrs. M. If his lordship had any real cause for jealousy, I should, for Lady Morden's sake, be the—the—the most miserable creature upon earth.

Sir F. To be sure.

Mrs. M. But, you seem mighty secure of your conquest.

Sir F. I am no novice; I can tell when a woman's time is come. Besides, her ladyship has granted me a rendezvous.

Mrs. M. When?

Sir F. Why, this very evening, to be sure.

Mrs. M. Where?

Sir F. Here, in this very house.

Mrs. M. Since you are so very certain, how came you not to take advantage of being alone with her after the rout?

Sir F. I did: that is, should have done, had we not been interrupted.

Mrs. M. By whom?

Sir F. A new footman; an odd kind of—Oh! here the very fellow comes.

Enter GABRIEL, loitering and leering.

Mrs. M. What does the rude lout leer at?

Sir F. Country curiosity.

Gab. [Attempting to go once or twice, then pausing and turning back.] Did—did—did your ladyship's honour call?

Mrs. M. No.

Gab. I—thought, mayhap, you wanted my lord.

Mrs. M. What should I want you for, think you, friend?

Gab. Nay, marry, that's more nur I can tell.

Sir F. What is your name?

Gab. Gabriel, an't please you. In my last place, they used to call me the Sly Simpleton.

Mrs. M. And who did you live with last?

Gab. Why, you an' heard of my lady's brother, the rich nabob, that be just come over fro' the Eastern Indies?

Sir F. Mr. Wilmot?

Gab. Ees; I do come fro' his estate, out o' Staffordshire.

Sir F. You are part of the live stock?

Gab. Anan!

Mrs. M. Were you in his service?

Gab. N—e—es.

Mrs. M. How long?

Gab. Better nur a week.

Sir F. What sort of a man is he?

Gab. Humph! A be well enough when a's pleased; though I canno' say as I do like him much for a measter.

Mrs. M. Why so?

Gab. Because a'll neither let a servant tell lies nor take money.

Sir F. Indeed!

Gab. No, a wo'not; whereof, here, I find, I can no' please my lady, if I do no' tell lies; and, I am sure, I canno' please myself if I do no' take money.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha!

Mrs. M. Ha, ha, ha! So, he did not suit you?

Gab. No; a's too high flown, as 'twere, in's notions.

Sir F. Which way?

Gab. A makes a great case o' what a calls friendship, and honour, and honesty, and such like; and, you know, if a poor sarvant gi's heed to that there sort o' stuff, a's not likely to get rich.

Mrs. M. Upon my word!

Sir F. So, Mr. Wilmot's head is full of such nonsense, is it?

Gab. Oh! a's brimful o' such nonsense, and so were I, while I lived wi' he; which wur the reason, as I do suppose, that they called me a simpleton; but I am not so simple as folk think me.

Sir F. [To Mrs. M.] My dear Mrs. Modely, leave me for a moment with this fellow. You'll be upon the watch, to throw in any hints or aids you happen to see necessary, and apropos.

Mrs. M. Yes, yes; that is, for Emily and the elopement: but be cautious; a defeat would turn the tables upon us, and make us the jest of the whole town, friends and enemies.

Sir F. How can you fear it?

Mrs. M. Nay, I do not; I know my sex, and I know you. [Exit.]

Sir F. Gabriel is your name, you say?

Gab. Ees.

Sir F. You seem a sharp kind of fellow, and one that understands his own interest.

Gab. Ees; I understand my own interest.

Sir F. Are you, if occasion should offer, willing to do me a piece of service?

Gab. Humph! What will you gi' me.

Sir F. I see you are a sensible fellow, and come to the point at once.

Gab. Ees; I love to come to the point.

Sir F. And you would not betray me to anybody?

Gab. Why, not unless somebody were to pay me better.

Sir F. Upon my honour, thou art the honestest rogue I ever met with.

Gab. Ees, that I be.

Sir F. Here, here is money for thee; and, observe, as thou seemest perfectly to understand a bargain, thou shalt have more in proportion to thy fidelity and capacity; and, moreover—Canst thou read and write?

Gab. Ees.

Sir F. Well, then, be faithful, and I will get thee a place in the excise: and now, observe, I—I have a very great respect and friendship for your lady.

Gab. Ees, ees; as we sen i' the country, you have more nur a month's mind to her.

Sir F. How, sirrah! Dare you suppose I have?

Gab. Nay, now, belike you think me a simpleton, too. Your great folk supposen a sarvant has neither ears nor eyes; but, lord! they are mistaken: ecod! their ears are often plaguy long. What, mun, I wur no' so fast asleep as you thought me, i'the passage, this morning.

Sir F. [Aside.] The rascal!

Gab. Belike, because I be a country lad, you reckon I should think it strange, like, that one gentleman should teak a liking to another gentleman's wife; but, lord! I know well enough that's nought here. I ha' learned a little o' what's what.

Sir F. Nay, friend Gabriel, I am more and more convinced thou art a clever, acute fellow.

Gab. Lord! mun, your worship need no' be so shy, like; you do know, you ha' promised me a place; an' places that are no' bought one way, mun be bought another.

Sir F. Well said, friend Gabriel!

Gab. An' as for keeping o' family secrets, do no' you fear me; because why, I do find they be a sarvant's best parkisites; for, an' it wur no' for family secrets, how should so many poor country Johns so very soon become gentlemen?

Sir F. This fellow's thoughts run all in one channel; his ruling passion is money; the love of that sharpens his intellects, and opens his eyes and ears.

[Aside.] Well, Gabriel, you shall find me generous as a prince, provided—here's somebody coming—go into the next room; I'll speak with you presently.

Gab. Ees; but I do hope your honour's worship wanna' forget the place, like?

Sir F. Never fear.

[Exit GABRIEL.]

Enter EMILY.

My angel! my life!—

Emily. Hush! My papa is coming, and wants to take me away with him home.

Sir F. Away!

Emily. Yes; hush! take no notice.

Enter GENERAL BURLAND.

General. Come, Emily, are you ready?

Emily. I am always ready and happy to obey my dear papa; but surely, sir, you will not let me leave Lady Morden without so much as bidding her adieu?

General. I'll write a card of thanks to her ladyship, with your respects, and as many compliments as you please.

Emily. Nay, but, dear sir, consider; it will seem too abrupt. Lady Morden is so good, so kind! I would not give her a moment's pain for the world. Besides, I have so many obligations to her ladyship.

General. I begin to be afraid, child, lest you should have too many obligations to her ladyship.

Emily. Let me only stay to-night, and to-morrow morning I will go with all my heart, and as early as you please, if you desire me.

Sir F. I protest she is bantering him. Oh! the charming, malicious little angel! [Aside.] Ay, General, let Emily stay to-night; I will answer for her she will go to-morrow morning as soon as you please, if you desire her.

General. You will answer for her!

Sir F. Yes; won't you permit me, Emily?

Emily. My dear papa knows I never attempt to break my word.

General. Yes, my child, I do know you have, hitherto, been unspotted and pure as the morn-blown lily; and my anxiety that you should remain so makes me thus desirous of your quitting this house. When I brought you here, these doors did not so easily fly open at the approach of such fine, such accomplished gentlemen, as Sir Frederick Fashion.

Sir F. [Aside.] By heavens, he anticipates his misfortunes!

Emily. [Takes the General's hand.] Do, my dear papa, consent only for to-day; I don't ask any longer.

Sir F. [Aside.] I could hug the charming hypocrite!

General. Well, well, Emmy; you know I never deny you anything; for, indeed, you never yet asked anything that could give the most anxious and affectionate father a moment's pain.

Emily. [Kisses his hand.] I thank you, dear, dear sir; you have made me happy.

Sir F. By my life, I shall find this a much more agreeable affair than I hoped. [Aside.] Yes, General—you are a very good papa.

General. You think so?

Sir F. Yes, I do, upon my soul!

General. Then I am what you, I am afraid, will never be. [Exit with EMILY.]

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! He does not suspect we are so soon to be so nearly related. Ha, ha, ha! I should like to be present when he first hears the news. He—he will foam and bounce like a cork from a bottle of champagne.

Enter Lord MORDEN.

Lord M. Well, Sir Frederick, is her ladyship returned?

Sir F. Yes; she is dressing for dinner. She bought the Actæon.

Lord M. She did?

Sir F. Oh! yes. She is a charming woman! the eyes of the whole room were upon her. There were some smart things said: one observed a likeness between me and Actæon; another thought it bore a far greater resemblance to your lordship.

Lord M. Ha, ha, ha! About the head, no doubt?

Sir F. For my part, I said I thought the likeness was very capable of being improved.

Lord M. You were very kind.

Sir F. Oh! pray, have you heard that Sir Peter Fry is going to sue for a bill of divorce?

Lord M. No.

Sir F. 'Tis very true. I should not have suspected Sir Peter of such vulgar revenge; but, I find, our married men of fashion are far less liberal in their sentiments than the ladies.

Lord M. Ha, ha, ha! Yes; they often want a woman's philosophy in these matters.

Sir F. Yes; they are wasps that fly and feed wherever they can find honey, but retain a sting for any marauder that shall approach their nests.

Lord M. Somewhat selfish, I own.

Sir F. Much more liable to be jealous than the women; and jealousy, your lordship knows, is the most ridiculous, ill-bred, contemptible thing in nature.

Lord M. Ha, ha, ha! Yes, yes. Ha, ha, ha! Perfectly despicable.

Sir F. Oh! nothing so laughable as the vagaries of a jealous husband: no creature suffers so much, or is pitied so little.

Lord M. Ha, ha, ha! Ay, the thefts of love are applauded, not punished.

Sir F. Yes; and the poor, robbed husband, watchman-like, twirls his rattle, alarms the neighbourhood, and collects assistants, who never fail to aid the thief, and laugh at him and his loss.

Lord M. Ye—ye—yes.—Ha, ha, ha!—A husband is a very strange, ignominious animal.

Sir F. A jealous husband!

Lord M. A paltry, mechanical—

Sir F. Without an idea of life or manners!

Lord M. Ha, ha, ha! Very true. But come with me; there's a young gentleman in the antichamber, of a good family, who wishes to be introduced to you. A very pretty fellow! Has an ambition to do something which shall give him éclat, and is, therefore, desirous of being known to us men of the world.

Sir F. Well, I am your's for a few minutes; but I must attend Lady Morden at her toilette presently. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The Same.

Enter Lord MORDEN, and GABRIEL introducing General BURLAND.

General. Well, my lord, is Lady Morden to be seen?

Gab. Oh! ees, your worship, hur will be, anon; for yonder is Sir Frederick, helping the maid to dress her ladyship.

General. Helping to dress her ladyship?

Gab. Ees; they sent me for some milk of roses, here; [shows the phial] and would you believe it? I wur sich an oaf, I had never heard before that roses gave milk.

General. Ah! you are some half-taught country booby.

Gab. Why, so I do find; for, in the country, the folk do only clear-starch their aprons and ruffles; but here, ecod! they clear-starch their faces.

General. Well, go, carry in your milk; and informing her ladyship I am waiting her leisure. [Laughing within.]

Gab. Ecod! here they all come, your honour; and rare and merry they be! but your Londoners do lead a rare ranting life! [Exit.]

Enter Sir Frederick FASHION, Lady MORDEN, and Mrs. MODELY.

Lady M. Ha, ha, ha! Oh! you whimsical toad, you! Ha, ha, ha! You have half-killed me! I am glad to see you in town, General. We have been drawing the characters of our acquaintance! and Mrs. Modely and Sir Frederick Fashion have been so droll and so satirical!

General. Ah! no doubt.

Lady M. I could not have thought there was so much satisfaction in remembering the failings of one's friends.

Mrs. M. Oh! it makes one so cheerful!

Sir F. And keeps one so charmingly in countenance!

General. [Aside.] Which you stand in very great need of.

Sir F. I assure your ladyship, you have an exquisite turn for satire; you cut with excessive keenness, and yet, with a dexterity that makes the very patient tingle with pleasure.

Lady M. You are partial.

Lord M. I think you had not much company last night.

Lady M. Your lordship was so well-bred, and made your visit so short, else you would have found a great deal.

Mrs. M. Oh! yes, they poured in from all quarters.

Sir F. Sir Nathan Neaptide, the yellow admiral, came.

Lord M. An agreeable guest!

Lady M. Oh! rude as his own boatswain.

Mrs. M. That makes him so much respected.

Lady M. Yes; like a chimney-sweeper in a crowd, he makes his way by being dirty.

Sir F. I protest, your ladyship is prodigiously brilliant to-day.

Lady M. No, no; though I am a vast admirer of wit. A person of wit has one very peculiar and enviable advantage.

Lord M. What is that, madam?

Lady M. Long life.

Lord M. Long life!

Lady M. Yes; a wit has more ideas, consequently lives longer, in one hour, than a fool in seven years.

Sir F. For which reason, your ladyship is already three times the age of old Parr.

Lady M. Dear Sir Frederick, that is so gallant!

Mrs. M. And so new!

General. Why, yes; this is the first time I ever heard a lady told she was old, and receive it as a compliment.

Lord M. But, your visitors—Who had you next?

Mrs. M. There was Sir Jeremy Still-life.

Lady M. And his bouquet. He primmied himself up in one corner, and seemed to think that, like the image of a saint on a holyday, he was powdered and painted on purpose to be adored.

Mrs. M. He was not singular in that.

Lady M. Oh! no; there was a whole row of them, that, like jars and mandarins on a mantel-piece, looked vastly ornamental, and served charmingly to fill up vacancies.

General. Every trifle has its use.

Mrs. M. Lord Index came, and stalked round the rooms, as if he had been loaded with the wisdom of his whole library.

Lady M. Yes, he looked as solemn as a monkey after mischief.

Sir F. [Mimicking.] And drew up his face in form, like a writ of inquiry into damages, with a "Take notice" engrossed in front.

Lord M. He would not stay late, for his lordship is as careful of his health as he is vain of his under-standing.

Lady M. And yet, he is but a kind of rush-candle; he may glimmer a long while, but will never give much light.

Lord M. It seems strange that your people who have acquired a little knowledge, always think they possess an infinite deal; while those who are the best informed appear continually conscious of wanting more.

General. Not strange at all, my lord. Amassing knowledge is like viewing the sun through a telescope; you enlarge the object, but you destroy the glare.

Mrs. M. Did not you observe that, notwithstanding the pearl-powder, my Lady Bloom's neck looked remarkably fallow?

Lord M. Oh! as a Jew's face under a green umbrella.

Sir F. The widow Twinkle, as usual, talked a vast deal about reputation.

Lady M. One is apt to admire a thing one wants.

Lord M. She always takes infinite pains to place her reputation, like broken china in a beaufet, with the best side outward.

Lady M. She may plaster and cement, but will never bring it to bear handling.

Mrs. M. Mr. Pensive, the poet, came in, too.

Sir F. Yes; but as nobody took any notice of him, he presently went out again.

General. A great proof of his good sense.

Sir F. Your poets and sheriffs' officers are a kind of people everybody has heard of, but that nobody chooses to know.

Lady M. Or, if you are under the necessity of receiving a private call from them, now and then, it would be quite disgraceful to be seen with them in public.

Lord M. Your ladyship used to be very partial to Mr. Pensive.

General. Yes; her ladyship used to have many singular partialities. She was once partial to merit and virtue wherever she found them; she had a partiality for order, economy, and domestic duties, likewise; nay, she even went so far as to cherish a partiality for your lordship.

Lady M. Ha, ha, ha! Odious partialities!

Sir F. and Mrs. M. Ha, ha, ha!

Lord M. Ma—ma—madam! Odious?

Lady M. Ha, ha, ha! To be sure, sir: is it not odious to be unfashionable?

Mrs. M. Certainly. Ha, ha, ha!

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! I protest, General, you are too severe.

General. Am I?

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! You are, really.

Mrs. M. Ha, ha, ha! Yes, you are, indeed, General.

Lady M. Ha, ha! Yes, yes; you absolutely are.

General. Humph! Why don't you laugh, my lord?

Lord M. I do. Ha, ha, ha! I—I do, General: though, as to severity, I own I—I don't see it in that light.

General. No?

Lord M. No; I cannot accuse myself of any fault; unless the love of pleasure be one.

General. Ha! And your catalogue of pleasures, I fancy, is pretty extensive.

Lord M. Not half so extensive as one could wish.

General. A dice-box, for instance, is one.

Lord M. A very principal one.

Lady M. My short experience hardly entitles me to venture an opinion, but I find a wonderful similarity between gaming and a cold bath: you have a—*a tremor, a—*a hesitation, at first; but, having once plunged in, you are thrown into the most delightful glow!

Lord M. Oh! an ardent tingling—

General. Beware, sir, that a shivering fit does not succeed.

[Mrs. M. and Lady M. laugh.]

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! You really have no mercy, General. You hit so often, and so hard, egad!

Lord M. I'm vastly happy to see you all so merry, though, upon my soul, I can't find out the jest.

General. That is strange, when you yourself make it.

Lady M. Not in the least: there is many a professed joker who does not understand his own wit.

General. I am tired, disgusted with this mixture of folly and wickedness. [Aside.] May I intrude so far upon your ladyship as to obtain half an hour's private conversation?

Lady M. Why, upon my word, General, I—I have so many affairs on hand to-day, that I must beg you to excuse me: to-morrow you may command me, for as long as you please.

Sir F. Ay, do, General, have the complaisance to wait till to-morrow, when my lady will be more at leisure.

General. Well, madam, I did not use to be thought an intruder by your ladyship, and will not begin now; but since I cannot have the honour to tell you privately, I still think myself bound to do my duty, and inform you publicly, you are in the hands of sharpers, "who will filch from you your good name;" nay, perhaps, you are on the very eve of destruction. Oh, guile!—Can it be?—My heart is full!—Lady Morden, I have no utterance; but if there be such a thing as sympathy, some small portion of the horror I now feel will communicate itself to you.

[Exit.]

Lady M. The—General has the strangest way of affecting and harrowing—Has not he, my lord?

Lord M. Ye—yes; upon my honour, he—he—I don't know how—

[Putting his hand to his heart.]

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! The General—the General is a true Don Quixote. He first creates giants, and then kills them.

Lady M. Yes. Ha, ha, ha! His head is full of—of windmills to grind moral sentiments. But, come, Mrs. Modely, you have not seen my new purchase.

Mrs. M. Oh! what, the Actæon?

Sir F. Is it come home?

Lady M. Oh! yes; I could not rest till I had it.

Mrs. M. Come, my lord; I long to see it.

Lady M. The tints are charming!

Mrs. M. So I hear. The grouping excellent!

Lady M. Oh, delightful!

[Eseunt Lord and Lady M. and Mrs. M.]

Enter HARRIET.

Har. Hist! Sir Frederick!

Sir F. [Turning back.] Oh! well, sir, how proceeds your amour? I thought you had been busied in schemes about that affair.

Har. Faith! and I am so; but I don't believe I can succeed without your assistance.

Sir F. Perhaps you are a little scrupulous about the means.

Har. Me! Indeed, and you have mistaken your man. Why, you don't think, Sir Frederick, I regard the complaints or tears of women? You and I, sure, seek our own gratification, not their happiness; for, if the love of man sought only the happiness of woman, 'faith! there would be nothing but dull marriages, fond husbands, and legitimate children; and we should lose all the satisfaction of seducing wives, ruining daughters, and of bringing so many fine, sweet, innocent craters upon the town.

Sir F. Oh! it would strangely reverse the order of things.

Har. Order! 'Faith! and it would occasion a blessed confusion in Doctors' Commons.

Sir F. For my part, present pleasure is my pursuit; I never disturb my imagination with dismal conjectures on future consequences.

Har. 'Faith! and you are right: for, as you say, it would be dismal enough to trace these consequences into—into streets, and hospitals, and places that the imagination sickens at.

Sir F. Marriage, you say, is not your object?

Har. Oh! no; I don't like that said matrimony music.

Sir F. A mortgaged rent-roll, only, can make it supportable. A wife is like a child's whistle, which every breath can play upon, but which no art can make melodious.

Har. 'Faith! and you have very proper notions about wives. So, when the dare crater gave a marriage hint, why, I told her a dale of boister, consarnin an old cross father, and being under age, and that I could not marry these three months. For, you know, one does not stand for a good double handful of oaths and lies, when one wants to ruin a sweet, kind angel that one loves.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! Suppose you were to make a sham marriage.

Har. A sham marriage! 'Faith! and I would make that, if there were not a parcel of low rascals that make balsters.

Sir F. Psha! That's a paltry, mechanical fear.

Har. But you—you were telling me, you know, of a scheme—

Sir F. Oh! the contract.

Har. Ay, 'faith! the contract. You said you would shew it me.

Sir F. I will; I have brought it for that purpose. I lately found it an efficacious expedient.

Har. And successful?

Sir F. Would have been, but for an unlucky accident.

Har. But there is one small impediment.

Sir F. What is that?

Har. Westminster-hall.

Sir F. Psha! A house of cards.

Har. Oh! and that it is; for 'tis supported by knaves, and full of tricks.

Sir F. Here—here is the very contract I myself gave.

[Producing it.]

Har. Ay!

Sir F. And here a counterfeit copy, with a few slight, but essential, alterations.

Har. I understand!—to put the charge upon her. [With an anxious eye continually toward the contract.]

Sir F. Which you may easily take, or make, an opportunity to do.

Har. Will, then, find them both to me; and, 'faith! you shall see fine diversion.

Sir F. No, I—I'll have them copied for you. This is signed and sealed.

Har. Arrah! what of that! Ha, ha, ha! Sure, you are not afraid you would be obliged to marry a man?

Sir F. No; the only danger in trusting them to you is that of losing them. And even then, there could be no ill consequence, except by falling into the hands of one who is far enough from London.

Har. Ay, ay; let me have them. I give you my honour to make a proper use of them.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! You are a promising youth, and it would be a pity such talents should be baulked, so, here—here.

Har. Promising! Oh, 'faith! and I hope to surprise even you, yourself. You shall presently hear of the success of your schemes. [Exit.]

Enter GABRIEL.

Gab. [Looking after HARRIET.] There a' goes! Hop, step, and jump! Ecod! she does it fealty!

Sir F. She! What's that you say?

Gab. How a' skipped into the carriage! There! Off it drives! Whur! Rattling away!

Sir F. What does the fellow mean? 'Sdeath!—Sure—Who are you talking of?

Gab. Why, of that Irish gentleman-like lady.

Sir F. Lady!

Gab. I wur coming straight to tell you. There is a plot, mun, against you.

Sir F. A plot! [Runs toward the door.]

Gab. Nay, you are too late; a's gone; three streets off by this.

Sir F. Confusion!

Gab. Ees, she means to breed a confusion.

Sir F. Who?

Gab. Miss Harriet.

Sir F. Harriet! By heavens, 'tis she!

Gab. Ees, 'tis she.

Sir F. Secure fool! Ineffable idiot! And, yet, in that disguise, Lucifer himself could not have discovered her. And who told you?

Gab. Why, his worship's gentleman, Mr. Lapelle; a' o'erheard her tell my lord aw her plot.

Sir F. What course shall I take?

Gab. Suppose I wur to watch, and, when she comes back, let your worship know?

Sir F. Do so; but be very careful, and be very secret.

Gab. Ees, ees; I remember the place, mun.

Sir F. Away; be watchful, and be rewarded. [Exit GABRIEL.] This is a thunder-stroke! Lord Morden in the plot, too! It will come to Lady Morden's ears; I shall be blown, all my plans disconcerted, myself laughed at, and my reputation eternally ruined. [Walks about.] Ha! There is one way to prevent the mischief yet:—by heavens, it cannot fail!—I will go to Lady Morden, and, with feigned penitence, tell her every circumstance myself; only making her believe I knew Harriet when I returned the contract. She will admire my candour, think my contrition real, and thus will I turn this seeming disaster to excellent account, by making it an additional proof of sincerity and affection for her ladyship. Dear wit, I thank thee! thou never forsakest me at a crisis! Indeed, my lord, and my young lady! Ah, ha! But you shall find one, perhaps, who can plot as deeply as yourselves. [Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The same.

Enter Lord MORDEN and LAPELLE.

Lord M. Into what an abyss of evils have I plunged through inexperience, want of reflection, and an absurd imitation of fashionable follies!—Lapelle!

Lap. My lord?

Lord M. Is the young—young gentleman returned?

Lap. No, my lord.

Lord M. I am on the rack! The liberties in which Lady Morden permits this Sir Frederick are insupportable! Unable to be silent, and ashamed to complain, I am tortured by contending passions. [Aside.] Lapelle, let me know the instant the—

the young gentleman comes back.

Lap. Yes, my lord. [Going.]

Lord M. Stay!—What if I were to inform Lady Morden of this affair? Surely, she could not shut her eyes against such a palpable, such an unprincipled attempt at seduction! [Aside.] Go, and tell your lady I beg to speak with her a moment. [Exit LAPELLE.] What an absurd being is man! Not a fortnight ago, Lady Morden was totally indifferent to me; and now I am in danger of losing her, I find I love her—to distraction love her. Yet to sink into a civil, sober, domestic man; to become the standing jest of all those high-spirited companions whose society I have courted, whose maxims I have pretended to admire—

Enter Lady MORDEN.

Lady M. So, my lord, in melancholy contemplation; and at home, too!

Lord M. Yes, madam.

Lady M. Lud! I wonder how your lordship can endure home! Of all places in the world, home is, certainly, the most disagreeable.

Lord M. Did not your ladyship meet Lapelle?

Lady M. Lapelle! No.

Lord M. I—I wished to see your ladyship.

Lady M. To see me! What can your lordship possibly want with me?

Lord M. To speak to you.

Lady M. Speak to me! You perfectly surprise me.

Lord M. On a subject which I—I scarcely know how to begin.

Lady M. Ha, ha, ha! What can have made your lordship so serious? Ha, ha, ha! I declare, I never saw you look so grave before. This must be some very important secret, that can occasion your lordship to look so very dismal. I vow, I am quite impatient. Come, my lord, why don't you proceed?

Lord M. I—I begin to find I have been very foolish.

Lady M. Ha, ha, ha! Is that the secret?

Lord M. I—I feel I have been to blame.

Lady M. To blame, my lord! How? Which way? Or, if you have, how does it concern me?

Lord M. Your ladyship used to think our interests inseparable.

Lady M. For which your lordship always laughed at me; and, I freely own, I was a very silly, out-of-the-way woman.

Lord M. Perhaps not, madam.

Lady M. How, my lord! not? Your lordship is very polite, but you know very well I was.

Lord M. Lady Morden, you once loved me. You yourself, not long since, kindly owned you did.

Lady M. Very true, my lord; but why—why, now, should you reproach me with my follies?

Lord M. I feel the severity of your reproof; it is no more than I merit.

Lady M. [Affecting surprise.] I really don't understand your lordship; I—I meant no reproof. We loved each other as long as it was agreeable to us, and if my passion happened to outlast your lordship's, that was none of your fault. These are the principles of all rational people, you know, my lord.

Lord M. They are principles, madam, that from my soul I wish I had never heard.

Lady M. Upon my honour, you astonish me. Have not I learnt them from yourself?

Lord M. Unjustifiable, madam, as my conduct may have been, I never carried them to the same excess as Sir Frederick Fashion.

Lady M. Sir Frederick Fashion, may, perhaps, be as capable of reformation as your lordship.

Lord M. Your ladyship may—may be partial.

Lady M. Partial!

Lord M. Who so great a libertine as this Sir Frederick?

Lady M. Has been. He has candour enough to confess it.

Lord M. Has been! Madam, there exists a present proof of deliberate seduction: an injured lady—

Lady M. Oh! what, the—the croat?

Lord M. Madam!

Lady M. What's your surprise, my lord? Don't I tell you he has confessed all his follies to me?

Lord M. But, madam, did he mention the contract?

Lady M. To be sure: and the counterfeit copy; with the generous manner in which he, just now, returned Harriet the original; though she thought he did not know her.

Lord M. I am petrified! Lady Morden, I perceive I have lost your affections.

Lady M. My lord, I am above dissimulation. Yes, I own I have a passion, too permanent to be shaken; and the satisfaction of a self-assurance that he who, at present, possesses my heart, will not so soon be weary of me as he who had it before.

Lord M. You cut me to the soul! Did you know what I feel—

Lady M. Feel, my lord! Ha, ha, ha! Oh, fie! Your lordship is a man of fashion, not of feeling.

Lord M. Hovering mischief, madam, has quickened benumbed nature in me. [Kneels and takes her hand.] Oh! let me conjure you, Lady Morden, to reflect on your present situation! I have conducted you to the horrid precipice of guilt and destruction! Oh! suffer me to save, to snatch you from danger. [Lady M. laughs.]

Enter Sir FREDERICK FASHION.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! How now, my lord! Ha, ha, ha! Making love to your wife?

Lady M. Ha, ha, ha! Oh! Sir Frederick, if you had but come a little sooner, you would have heard the most delightful morality.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! Morality from my lord?

Lord M. Yes, sir, morality from my lord.

Lady M. Ha, ha, ha! Nay, I assure you, he is quite serious. [Retires coquetting with Sir F.]

Lord M. Rejected, ridiculed, despised! their sport, their scorn! their subject for open sarcasm, laughter, and contempt! Oh, insupportable! [Exit.]

Lady M. Ha, ha, ha! My lord has a mind to fall in love with me once more.

Sir F. Nobody but my lord, madam, would ever have ceased a moment to love you.

Lady M. Well, Sir Frederick, and may I, then, at last, flatter myself I have found that sympathy of soul for which I have so long sighed?

Sir F. Alas! madam, I dare not rank myself your equal; no, I dare not. There is such infinitude of perfection in your every thought, look, and expression, that to merit you, were to be, as you are, something celestial. Yet, such virtue as mere humanity may arrive at, I will exhaust nature with endeavours, and weary heaven with prayers, to acquire.

Lady M. There is, surely, some secret charm in your words.

Sir F. Did I think the gratification of any sinister passion influenced my present conduct; were it not my hope to remove you from the cold embrace of satiated apathy, to the sweet and endless transports of love, founded on, permit me to say, on a congeniality of soul and sentiment; did I not feel an innate conviction that there already subsists between us a tie of the most indissoluble nature, an immaculate tie, a marriage of the mind, superior infinitely to all human institutions; did I not think and feel thus, I would instantly, dreadful as the image is to thought, renounce that heaven which I have had the presumption to contemplate, nay, aspire to possess.

Lady M. And if, after all this, you should prove false, Sir Frederick?

Sir F. False, madam! Oh! let me conjure you to inflict any punishment on me, rather than that of suspecting my sincerity. Thus, kneeling, on this angelic hand, I vow—

Enter Lord MORDEN.

Lord M. I cannot resist the impulse which—How, Sir Frederick!

Sir F. [Rising.] My lord?

Lord M. So, madam—

Lady M. So, sir!

Lord M. You can listen to morality from others, madam, if not from me.

Lady M. Oh! I—I have no dislike to a sermon when I admire the preacher.

Lord M. Madam, if you have no respect for my honour, you might have some for my feelings, and—

Lady M. A—a—hold, hold, my lord! You are beginning your discourse again; but I am in a hurry, and will hear you draw your conclusions some other opportunity.

Lord M. Madam—

Lady M. Nay, I will, upon my honour. [Exit.]

Lord M. Hold! sir, a word with you, if you please.

Sir F. With me, my lord?

Lord M. With you.

Sir F. Willingly. Your lordship seems in so pleasant a humour—

Lord M. Sir, I am in a humour neither to be trifled with nor sneered at.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! I can assure you—Ha, ha, ha!—your lordship, no man is happier to see you in your present temper than I am.

Lord M. Look you! Sir Frederick, you and I have been too long of the same school for me to be ignorant of your principles; but I begin to detest them. [Sir F. laughs.] They are now, at this very moment, rending my heart. They have planted a nest of adders in my bosom. In short, sir, you must forbear your visits to Lady Morden.

Sir F. My lord—

Lord M. I am serious—determined.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! When her ladyship gives me this advice, it may, perhaps, be followed.

Lord M. It must and shall be followed, sir, when I give it. [Sir F. laughs.] Ridiculous as it may appear to you, and such as you, I feel and will assert a husband's rights.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! I congratulate your lordship on the keenness and delicacy of your feelings; they give me great pleasure; infinite pleasure, upon my soul. Ha, ha, ha! As to a husband's rights, I have no doubt you will very shortly be in full possession of them all.

Lord M. Sir, I will have you know, I am, at present, in full possession of them all.

Sir F. May be so, egad!

Lord M. And can no longer forbear telling you I believe you to be a villain.

Sir F. Ah! now your lordship is perfectly explicit. [They draw and fight.]

Enter GABRIEL, who runs fearlessly between them, and looks first at one, then at the other.

Lord M. How now, sirrah! How dare you take this liberty?

Gab. Nay, ecod! there do seem to be some danger in it; an' I had not dared to dare, but that I thought your lordship would na stick I.

Lord M. Begone, sirrah!

Gab. Nay, but my lady sent me, and would be glad to speak wi' your honour's worship.

Lord M. With me?

Gab. Oh! no; not wi' your lordship's honour's worship; but wi' his worship's honour, Sir Frederick Fashion.

Sir F. This is no place, my lord; we'll settle this business to-morrow. To-morrow, my lord, to-morrow. [Exit.]

Lord M. D——n!—Torture! To-morrow!—He has some concealed meaning. How now, sirrah! What do you stand gaping at? How dare you come between us?

Gab. Why, ecod! I knew that, wi' us, i'th' country, murder would have been against the commandments; and I had forgotten that here, in town, you have no commandments.

Lord M. [Aside.] This fool can see the excesses of passion in their true light.

Gab. I'm sorry 'at I angered your lordship's worship; because as why, I wur determined to do like the rest of my neighbours; for, sartinly, wur a body to keep the commandments, while every body else is breaking them—a'd be a poor devil, indeed. [LORD MORDEN walks about.] Belike, your lordship be a bit jealousy, like?

Lord M. How, sirrah!

Gab. Nay, I should no' a'wondered an you wur, an I had no' been told that your Londoneers be never jealousy, like.

Lord M. Should not have wondered! Why not, sirrah?

Gab. Nay, ecod! I munna tell.

Lord M. Tell what?

Gab. Nay, that's it. As I said, I munna tell.

Lord M. [Puts his hand to his sword.] Speak all you know, instantly, or—

Gab. [With half serious and half sulky reproof.] Nay, nay, donna be in a passion, your worship: I be no goose, you munna spit me.

Lord M. Speak, I say; I'll have your secret, or your soul.

Gab. Ecod! I believe your worship will be puzzled to find either—though that Sir Frederick be an old fox, a's used to steal chicken.

Lord M. Be explicit. What has he done?

Gab. Done! Oh! a's—

Lord M. What?

Gab. Promised me a piece.

Lord M. Zounds!

Gab. And, moreover, a' ga' me a purse; which is better still: for, your worship's grace do know that an egg in hand is better nur a hen in expectation

Lord M. Suppose, sirrah, I give you my purse, too.

Gab. Nay, ecod! an you gi' it me, I b'lieve, I shall—I shall take it.

Lord M. There, sir.

Gab. Thank your worship's lordship. [GABRIEL puts up the purse and walks leisurely off.]

Enter HARRIET.

Lord M. [Following GABRIEL.] Why, hark you, sirrah!—Come back!—Why, rascal!

Har. [Calling.] Hist! My Lord! My Lord!

Lord M. [Looking back to HARRIET, and then recollecting GABRIEL.] Astonishing effrontery!

Har. My lord!

Lord M. [Returning.] Oh! madam, I am distracted.

Har. Have patience, but for one quarter of an hour, and I hope to rid you of all your fears, and inflict that punishment on the author of them, which he dreads most.

Lord M. How, madam?

Har. By exposing him; making him what he delights to make others—a subject of laughter and contempt.

Lord M. Which way, madam?

Har. We may be overheard. Step with me into the antichamber, and I'll inform you. [Exit.]

Enter GABRIEL.

Gab. [Peeping after LORD MORDEN and HARRIET, and then calling.] Sir Frederick! Sir Frederick!

Sir F. Well, what's the matter? How camest thou off with his lordship?

Gab. Off!—Ecod! I—wish you may come off as well.

Sir F. I?

Gab. Ees. Why, mun, there be the bailiffs below.

Sir F. Bailiffs!

Gab. Ees; sent by the Irish gentleman,—lady I mean, after your worship. Ecod! hur is determined to ha' you, safe.

Sir F. The devil! What's to be done! Is she with them?

Gab. No; hur be come back, and is gone into the antichamber wi' my lord.

Sir F. And has not seen them?

Gab. Likely not.

Sir F. Here! quick, change clothes with me, and tell them you are Sir Frederick Fashion.

Gab. Me!—Ecod! thank you for that. No, no; I would na' be in your coat for fifty pound.

Sir F. Fool! they dare not detain you.

Gab. I'll take care they sha'n't.

Sir F. 'Sdeath! What's to be done?

Gab. Ecod! Suppose—suppose I wur to go, and tell the Irish gentleman somebody wanted hur; and so make 'em arrest she?

Sir F. Ha! exquisite fellow, I conceive. Away, send her instantly.

Enter two Bailiffs.

Bailiff. Is your name Sir Frederick Fashion, sir?

Sir F. No, sir; but Sir Frederick will be here directly: if you have any business with him.

Bailiff. [Aside to his companion.] Have your handkerchief ready, should he make any noise, for fear of a rescue. This is a very serious affair.—[To Sir FREDERICK.] Pray, sir, what kind of person is Sir Frederick?

Sir F. Um—a handsome—agreeable little gentleman, and very young.

Bailiff. May I ask, sir, how he is dressed?
Sir F. [Aside.] Gad! well remember'd.—[To the Bailiffs.] Dressed!—Oh! he is dressed for—for the masquerade. Here he comes.

[The Bailiffs retire a little upon the watch.]

Enter HARRIET.

[To HARRIET.] Well, Sir Frederick! Ha, ha, ha! How goes your scheme?

Har. Oh, ho! Faith! and are you so jocular?

Sir F. I have been thinking this is a dangerous business, and would advise you not to give the girl that contract; it may bring you into trouble.

Bailiff. [Aside to his companion.] You hear.

Har. Oh! faith! and she has it safe enough.

Bailiff. [Advances.] Sir Frederick Fashion,—[Touches HARRIET on the shoulder.]—you are my prisoner, sir. I have a special writ against you.

Har. Ha, ha, ha! Against me! Arrah, frind, but you are making a bit of a bull, here.

Bailiff. We know what we are about, sir. My carriage is below; you shall be treated like a gentleman; but we must beg you to go with us instantly, and without a noise.

Har. [Alarmed and forgetting the brogue.] I tell you, friend, you mistake the person.

Enter GABRIEL.

Gab. [Goes up to HARRIET.] Here, Sir Frederick, here be card from Colonel Castoff, wi' his compliments.

Har. Sirrah! Me!

Gab. [With pretended astonishment.] Ees, to be sure.

Bailiff. Sir, we must be gone.

Har. This is a concerted trick. Here!

[As soon as HARRIET begins to call, the Bailiffs clap the handkerchief over her mouth, and hurry off with her.]

Gab. Did not I do it rarely?

Sir F. Do! I could wonder and worship thee. In half a year, thou wouldest make an ass of Machiavel. Oh! that I could but retrieve that cursed contract.

Gab. I do think I could get it.

Sir F. Ay! Nay, I do, almost, begin to believe in miracles. Which way?

Gab. No matter for that. What will gi' me?

Sir F. Whatever thou canst wish: a hundred guineas—

Gab. And the place in the excise?

Sir F. Anything, everything!—Run, try, fly!—Think, succeed, and I'll make an emperor of thee.

Gab. Ees; I'll be emperor of excise-men. [Exit.]

Sir F. The shrewdness and abilities of this fellow are amazing.

Enter Mrs. MODELY, followed by EMILY.

Mrs. M. [Speaking as she enters.] Yes, my sweet little Emily, the greatest beauty in London would be envied, had she made such a conquest.

Emily. Ah! you say so.

Mrs. M. Say! why, to-morrow morning, the whole town will be in a flame.

Emily. Well, that will be pure!

Mrs. M. Oh! Sir Frederick—

Sir F. [Runs to EMILY.] My life! my soul! my transport.

Emily. [To Mrs. MODELY.] What sweet words!

Mrs. M. You are very much obliged to me, I assure you. I have been speaking to my sweet, dear, little Emily here in your behalf.

Sir F. Then, madam, I am inexpressibly obliged to you.

Emily. Yes; Mrs. Modely is very much your friend, and very much my friend—a'n't you, Mrs. Modely?

Mrs. M. Yes, my little dear, I am, indeed, very much your friend: and, if I had not the best opinion in the world of Sir Frederick, would not have spoken as I have.

Emily. Well, Sir Frederick, have you ordered the chaise and four?

Sir F. [Pretending to be afraid Mrs. MODELY should overhear.] Yes. Hush!

Emily. Nay, you may say anything before Mrs. Modely. I have told her all; for, you know, she is my friend.

Mrs. M. Yes, yes, Sir Frederick; be assured I will not betray any secret, the keeping of which will make my dear Emily so happy.

Emily. Yes, we shall be so happy! You know, Sir Frederick, you swear to marry me.

Sir F. Solemnly.

[All through the scene he looks anxiously round, at intervals, fearful of being surprised.]

Emily. Well, but, swear it again; now, before Mrs. Modely.

Sir F. By all the saints—

Emily. Saints! Psha! you should swear by—by my bright eyes that dim the stars.

Sir F. Oh! By those bright eyes, that dim the blazing sun.

Emily. And—and, my beauties that eclipse the blushing moon!

Sir F. Ay, by those, and all your burning charms, I swear.

Emily. To marry me the moment we come to Scotland?

Sir F. The moment we come to Scotland.

Emily. And, if we be pursued—

Sir F. To fight for you! die for you!

Emily. Oh! that will be delightful.

Sir F. [Aside.] The devil it will!

Emily. Come, let us set off! My band-box is ready.

Sir F. That is impossible, my angel.

Emily. Impossible!

Sir F. I have not ordered the chaise till ten o'clock.

Emily. Oh, dear! What, two whole hours longer?

Sir F. They are two ages, I grant. [Looking round.] Forgive my fears, my dearest Emily; but, though the pleasure of your company is the most precious thing on earth—a—a—yet—

Emily. What, you want me gone?

Sir F. Rather than you should think so unkindly, I will run the hazard of being surprised, and eternally separated from you.

Emily. Will you? I am sure you don't love me, then. However, I'll go. You will be sure to be ready, the moment the clock strikes ten. [Exit.]

Sir F. Time is precious. Here have been such plots against me.

Mrs. M. Plots!

Sir F. Oh! I have escaped Scylla and Charybdis: but wind and tide are now both with me. Lady Morden is to meet me here in half an hour. Through that door is her chamber.

Mrs. M. Oh! you vile creature.

Sir F. What prude, to-morrow, will dare pretend that woman and education are a match for man and nature?

Mrs. M. And so you will persist in your wickedness, in spite of my persuasions.

Sir F. Lady Morden has still all the rhodomontade of love in her brain: thinks of nothing but cooing-constancy, and eternal raptures.

Mrs. M. Simple woman!

Sir F. Except, indeed, tormenting her husband; which seems to give the sin a double sweetness.

Mrs. M. Or she would be no wife.

Sir F. So, as soon as I am gone off with Emily, I will have a consolatory epistle delivered to her.

Mrs. M. Compassionate toad!

Sir F. Here it is, ready written; and, if I don't flatter myself, a master-piece.

Mrs. M. Let me see! let me see!

Sir F. No, you shall hear. [Reads.] "Dear madam,—Though you are an angel, if there be other angels, am I to blame?"

Mrs. M. Certainly not.

Sir F. [Reads.] "If man is naturally inconstant, and if I am a man, am I to blame?"

Mrs. M. Certainly not.

Sir F. [Reads.] "If nature has made variety the highest enjoyment, am I to blame?"

Mrs. M. Certainly not.

Sir F. [Reads.] "If, since happiness is the pursuit of us all, I am happy as often as I can, am I to blame?"

Mrs. M. Certainly not.

Sir F. [Reads.] "Farewell, madam; circumstances, as you will find, force me, thus suddenly, from your arms, in which, I own, I found heaven centred; but, if you should call me cruel, perjured, and ungrateful, because I act naturally, and therefore rationally, am I to blame?"

Mrs. M. Certainly not. Well, as I live, this is a master-stroke! Perfectly as I thought I knew you, you have astonished me.

Sir F. Yes; 'tis the true Socratic mode. But, now, my dear Mrs. Modely, go you to Emily, prevent her disturbing us, and keep her in readiness.

Mrs. M. Well!—remember, everything is at stake, and be yourself.

Sir F. Fear me not; that prescience, which, they say, is the forerunner of all great events, gives me a happy assurance of success; a confidence, that makes success certain.

[Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—The same.

General BURLAND discovered.

General. I cannot keep from this house! There is a foreboding of mischief which haunts and perturbs my imagination; and, I fear, with reason. The malignant joy, the smothered exult, the obscure, ironical, satire, which ran through the discourse of that Sir Frederick, were not without a meaning. I wish I had not consented to let Emily stay. He sneered, I remember, at the moment: nay, it seemed the sneer of triumph. I wish she were safe, at my own house. Poor Lady Morden! And, is it possible? Such rectitude of heart, such purity of sentiment! I wish Emily were at home. Should my child, my darling fall, I were a wretch indeed!

Enter Lord MORDEN.

Lord M. I am miserable! distracted! racked! The thunderbolt has struck before I heard it. Oh! that its exterminating power had been final! But it has maimed, and deformed, and left a full feeling of wretchedness.

General. How now, my lord?

Lord M. General, I am a wretch! an irretrievable, eternal wretch!

General. What! and are you come to a sense of this, now it is too late?

Lord M. There's the misery!—The curse is accomplished, and hope is fled!

General. Why, ay; such is the infatuation of folly and vice, they will not believe vengeance has an arm, till its fatal gripe is felt!

Lord M. I cannot support these tortures.—Oh! that it were possible—

General. What?

Lord M. To reclaim Lady Morden.

General. What, then? Another month, and Sir Frederick Fashion, or any other libertine of fashion, might take her.

Lord M. Never, never! Were her affections once again mine, the stroke of death only should separate us.

General. Well, my lord, if you are, at last, convinced of the immensity of your loss,—I pity you!

Lord M. Oh! would you could relieve!

General. Would I could! But, you were a witness how ineffectual my endeavours were. However, walk with me into the antichamber, and let us consult what is best to be done. Her principles, I fear, are shaken; the only rock on which virtue can stand secure.

Lord M. Sapped, destroyed! She avows her intents; unblushingly avows them! And recapitulating my errors, my crimes, dares me to complain of or notice her's! Scorns and contemns me, and justly, too, that such a thing as I should pretend to repeat, or respect, the word virtue.

General. It is what every husband, every father of a family must expect. His smallest foibles will stand as precedents for a swarm of follies; and, if he have any vices, they will propagate a hideous brood, that shall extirpate his name from the earth, or overwhelm it with obloquy.

[Exeunt.]

Enter GABRIEL and Sir FREDERICK.

Gab. Come, mun!—Your worship, come!

Sir F. Are they gone?

Gab. Ees.

Sir F. Well, what hast thou done? Where is Harriet?

Gab. Oh! I ha' her safe.

Sir F. Thou?

Gab. Ees, mun; for, when the bailiffs found out a wur a woman, they wur partly ravenous.

Sir F. And let her go?

Gab. Ees.

Sir F. 'Sdeath!

Gab. But, I secured her.

Sir F. Secured! Impossible! How?

Gab. Nay, never do you mind how; I tell'ee, I ha' her safe.

Sir F. But where are the bailiffs?

Gab. In this house.

Sir F. The devil they are!

Gab. Ees, they be; waiting for your worship.

Sir F. Death and destruction!

Gab. But what o'that? I ha' got the contract, mun.

Sir F. Hast thou?

Gab. Ees, here it is.

Sir F. Precious fellow! I could worship thee!—Give it me.

Gab. Nay, hold there; I wanna do that.

Sir F. Won't?

Gab. No, I wanna.

Sir F. Psha! make no words, but deliver it;—and, here—here is—

Gab. Nay, put up your paper; for I wanna part w' mine.

Sir F. 'Sdeath, fellow!

Gab. Nay, be mild tempered!—Stand where you be; for an you stir another step, I'll call the bailiffs.

Sir F. [Aside.] Cunning scoundrel! He has me in his power, and time presses.—Well, Gabriel, be faithful, and, depend on't, I'll make thee a clever fellow.

Gab. Why, ecod! I think I am like a Monmouth-street coat—ready made.

Sir F. Thou rememberest the instructions I gave thee?

Gab. Parfitly.

Sir F. The chaise is to wait at the corner of the street.

Gab. Ees.

Sir F. Thou art to convey Emily's bandbox away, privately; and, if any questions be asked, to say it is Lady Morden's.

Gab. Ees.

Sir F. Hast thou taken care of the letter I gave thee?

Gab. Care! Ees, ees; I a' ta'en good care on't.

Sir F. Observe, thou art to deliver it to Lady Morden, half an hour after we are departed.

Gab. Half an hour before you are departed?

Sir F. Zounds! No, half an hour after, man.

Gab. Oh! Ees, ees; half an hour after.

Sir F. Now begone.

Gab. But—but how will your worship get by the bailiffs?

Sir F. 'Sdeath, that's true!—Is there no disguise?

Gab. Why—ees—there be a long great-coat i'the hall.

Sir F. Ay, true.—Bring it me.

Gab. Nay, nay; I'll put it on first, and let 'em see me; so, then, when they see you, they'll think it be I.

Sir F. Excellent! Where are Lord Morden and the General?

Gab. I'th' t'other chamber.

Sir F. Unlucky! I wish they were any where else.

Gab. Oh! an that be all, I'll soon make 'em budge.

Sir F. How?

Gab. Nay; lord, you're so quisitive!—I tell you, I'll do't. I'll saunter through this door, lock it, and send 'em packing through t'other.

Sir F. Thou art the prince of plotters. Away! be vigilant.

Gab. Oh! never do you fear me! [Exit.]

Enter LADY MORDEN.

Sir F. This fellow would outwit a whole conclave of cardinals!

Lady M. Well, Sir Frederick, here I am, you see; punctual to my promise.

Sir F. [With vast insinuation, seeming sincerity, and humble rapture, all through the scene.] Oh! madam, how can I repay this bounty!—this condescension!—Never!—My life were a poor sacrifice, to such sweetness and such charms!

Lady M. Sir Frederick, this is a trying, a decisive moment! I am going to be either the most happy or the most wretched of women! You tell me, it is your wish, your resolution, to be no longer that general lover, that man of the world, you have, hitherto, been thought.

Sir F. Say not, dear lady, it is either my wish or resolution! Heaven can testify, I have not the power to be any thing, but what it shall please you to make me!

Lady M. I have owed to you, that the levity I have lately affected is not natural to me! that my heart sighs for an acquaintance, a mate, that, like itself, is subject to all the sweet emotions of sensibility!—Yes, it was the first wish of my soul to find this correspondent heart. A heart beating with the same ardour, vibrating to the same sensations, panting for the same pleasures, shrinking from the same pangs; pliant, yet firm; gentle, yet aspiring; passionate, yet pure!—Such I once thought Lord Morden's. Should I a second time be deceived—

Sir F. I am poor in proofs of sincerity! I have none to offer! My former errors are present punishments! To deny or even palliate them would imply intentional deceit; and this is a moment in which I would wish for men and gods to be witnesses of my truth! I have had, I must own, most libertine opinions of your gentle sex; but these I, now, solemnly renounce! Had I, before, met with a Lady Morden, I should, before, have made this renunciation! But, perhaps, the women it has been my misfortune to know, deserved, in part, the light esteem in which I held them. Never, till now, did I find one who could mutually inspire such passion and respect! Such agitated, burning hopes! Such excruciating fears, or thoughts so sanctified, as those I, this moment, feel!

Lady M. Yet, Sir Frederick, I cannot help observing your conversation, in society, seems still tinged with the impurity of your former libertine principles.

Sir F. I own, Lady Morden, with confusion own, I have not hitherto had the courage, or, perhaps, I have wanted strength to stem the torrent: but, aided by you, I feel, I dare promise any thing!

Lady M. I confess, Sir Frederick, the mind finds some difficulty in rooting out fears, planted in it by reiterated accusations. The stories the world tells of you are dreadful. And, yet, there is such heartfelt conviction attends your present words that, to me, it is impossible to listen and retain a doubt.

Sir F. This generous confidence transports me, fills me with gratitude, and inspires rapturous hope! [Clasps her round the waist.] Oh, gently suffer me to conduct you, where love lies, in panting, breathless ecstasy—

Enter GABRIEL, abruptly, in a great-coat, stands fixed, and staring.

[Sternly.] How now!

Gab. [Deliberately.] Belike, you dunna want company?

Sir F. No, sir.

Gab. I thought as much.

Sir F. [Laying hold of him.] Begone, instantly!

Gab. Nay! hands off! [Throws him from him.] I sha'n't stir till I have delivered my message.

Sir F. What message? what have you to say?

Gab. [Aloud.] Why, the chaise and four be come.

Sir F. How?

Gab. [Still louder.] The bandbox ready.

Sir F. Infernal booby!

Gab. Miss Emily waiting.

Sir F. [Violently.] Begone, I say.

Gab. Gone! Nay, sartinly, you would no' ha' I run away w' her.

Lady M. [With contempt.] Ha, ha, ha!

Sir F. Lady Morden!

Lady M. Ha, ha, ha!—Why, surely, you—the never failing victor, the fertile-brained Sir Frederick Fashion, who knows not defeat, and who never, yet, was at a loss for stratagems!—though you are taken somewhat unawares, you cannot want invention!

Sir F. You'll pardon me, madam, if I want understanding to comprehend your meaning.

Lady M. Indeed!—Well, if you be so dull of apprehension—"am I to blame?"

Sir F. Madam!

Lady M. Oh!—Do you recollect this letter?

Sir F. How!—Faithless fiend! [Goes to assault GABRIEL, who throws back his great-coat and appears dressed as a gentleman.]

Gab. Keep off, or dread the chastisement I am prompted, instantaneously, to inflict!

Sir F. Chastisement!—What is this? Who are you?

Gab. A man!—You are—

Lady M. For heaven's sake, brother—

Sir F. Brother!

Gab. Gabriel Wilmot; whose head is so full of the nonsense of friendship, honour, and honesty.—

Sir F. I'll be revenged, however. [Attacks WILMOT again.]

Enter LORD MORDEN and GENERAL BURLAND.

Lord M. Turn, wretch, and receive your punishment from this arm! [Sir FREDERICK turns on Lord MORDEN.]

General. [Beating down their swords.] Oh! for shame!—Look to the lady.

Lady M. Oh, general!—Oh! my Lord! [Runs to Lord MORDEN and falls on his neck.]

Lord M. My life! my ecstasy! my saviour!

Enter MRS. MODELY and EMILY.

Mrs. M. Bless me, what uproar!—Heyday!—[Aside.] So, so! Here is a very pretty denouement to our plot, indeed!—[Aloud.] I see, good folks, you are all embroiled here; and, as it is a very disagreeable thing to be present at family disputes, I'll—[Is going; the General plants himself against the door.]

General. Pray, madam, stay, and receive the compliments of the company: mine, and your friend Emily's in particular.

Mrs. M. Oh, with pleasure!

Lord M. Mr. Wilmot! My best brother; though you have, in part, acquainted me with what is past, yet, it is so sudden—and you, my dearest lady, to find you still the same is joy unspeakable.

Lady M. The task of making you suppose I had effectually become what I seemed, was, indeed, most painful; but the loss of your affection were not pain—twere horror! I told you my passion was too permanent to be shaken.—Ah! how could you imagine I meant another? Or, think it possible I ever could forget that chaste, that ardent, that eternal love, I have so repeatedly avowed?

Lord M. Oh! for words!—I am all love, gratitude, rapture, and amazement!

General. And so is Sir Frederick apparently; nay, even you, madam, seem a little surprised. [To MRS. MODELY.]

Mrs. M. Me! Oh, dear! no.

Lady M. [To Sir FREDERICK.] Dear sir, though you are a deep and excellent plotter, if there have been counterplots—"am I to blame?" [Curtseys.]

Mrs. M. [With affected candour.] Certainly not.

Lady M. If man is sometimes vain, presumptuous and unprincipled, and if you are a man—"am I to blame?"

Mrs. M. Certainly not.

Wil. If I assumed a mean disguise, that I might aid a sister to detect and expose the mean machinations of seduction—"am I to blame?"

Mrs. M. Certainly not.

Emily. If, following the advice of this dear lady, [to Lady MORDEN] simplicity has made cunning outwit itself, "am I to blame?" [Curtysing first to Sir FREDERICK, and then to Mrs. MODELY.]

General. [With vast pleasure.] Certainly not.

Lady M. If, since happiness is the pursuit of us all, I wish to be as happy as possible—[Most affectionately taking Lord MORDEN's hand.] "am I to blame?"

Omnes. Certainly not.

Sir F. [With affected ease.] Certainly not—So, the catechism being ended, the scholars may depart.

Wil. Certainly not.

Sir F. Sir!

Wil. You forget the bailiffs.

Lady M. Besides, Sir Frederick, before you go, you must give me leave to introduce you to—

Enter HARRIET in woman's clothes, presented by LADY MORDEN.

—This lady.

Sir F. Harriet!

Har. Yes, sir; that Harriet, whom, hearing, she had happiness in view, and proportioning your ideal triumph to the weight of misery you might entail, you raised heaven and earth to bring to wretchedness and ruin.

Mrs. M. Upon my honour, you—you are a sad man, Sir Frederick!—A very sad man! [The company by their looks show they understand Mrs. MODELY's real character.]

Har. But your vanity is humbled; you, now, stand detected; and, instead of envied, you will be sneered at by the depraved, pitied by the good, and henceforth, avoided by the credulous young creatures you, so manfully, have delighted to involve in guilt and destruction!

Mrs. M. A very dangerous man, indeed, Sir Frederick!

General. [Ironically.] Ay, beware of him, madam.

Mrs. M. Oh! I—I will.

Har. Yes, sir, the finger of scorn points where it ought: you are exposed, and my resentment is appeased.

Sir F. Then, madam—the—the contract—

Har. There it is, sir. [Returns it.] I never meant to make any other use of it than what has been better effected, by different means. [Curtysing to Lady MORDEN and Mr. WILMOT.]

Sir F. Madam!—

Har. No thanks, sir.

General. No; they would sit a little awkwardly.

Lady M. And now, Sir Frederick, if, after this lesson, you should still retain your former principles and practices, and, hereafter, receive a still severer punishment, I hope you will acknowledge—we are "not to blame." [Eceunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Court-yard before Kno'well's House.

Enter KNO'WELL and BRAINWORM.

Kno. A goodly day toward, and a fresh morning.
Brainworm,

Call up young master. Bid him rise, sir.
Tell him I have some business to employ him.

Brain. I will, sir, presently.

Kno. But hear you, sirrah,
If he be at his book, disturb him not.

Brain. Well, sir.

[Exit.]

Kno. How happy, yet, should I esteem myself,
Could I, by any practice, wean the boy
From one vain course of study he affects!
He is a scholar, if a man may trust
The liberal voice of fame in her report,
Of good account in both our universities;
Either of which have favour'd him with graces;
But their indulgence must not spring in me
A fond opinion, that he cannot err.

Enter Master STEPHEN.

Cousin Stephen,

What news with you, that you are here so early?
Step. Nothing; but e'en come to see how you do, uncle.

Kno. That's kindly done: you are welcome, coz.
Step. Ay, I know that, sir, I would not ha' come else. How doth my cousin Edward, uncle?

Kno. Oh! well, coz; go in and see: I doubt he be scarcely stirring yet.

Step. Uncle, afore I go in, can you tell me an' he have e'er a book of the sciences of hawking and hunting? I would fain borrow it.

Kno. Why, I hope you will not a hawking now, will you?

Step. No wosse, but I'll practise against the next year, uncle. I have bought me a hawk, and a hood, and bells, and all; I lack nothing but a book to keep it by.

Kno. Oh! most ridiculous!

Step. Nay, look you now, you are angry, uncle. Why, you know, an' a man have not skill in the hawking and hunting languages, now-a-days, I'll not give a rush for him. They are more studied than the Greek or the Latin. What, do you talk on it? Because I dwell at Hogsden, I shall keep company with none but citizens! A fine jest, i'faith! 'Slid! a gentleman mun shew himself like a gentleman. Uncle, I pray you, be not angry. I know what I have to do, I trow; I am no novice.

Kno. You are a prodigal, absurd coxcomb! go to! Nay, never look at me, it's I that speak.

Take't as you will, sir, I'll not flatter you.

Ha' you not yet found means enow, to waste

That which your friends have left you, but you must go cast away your money on a kite,

And know not how to keep it, when you've done?

So, now you're told on it, you look another way.

Step. What would you ha' me do?

Kno. What would I have you do? I'll tell you, kinsman;

Learn to be wise, and practise how to thrive;

That would I have thee do; and not to spend

Your coin on every bauble that you fancy,

Or every foolish brain that humours you.

Who comes here?

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Save you, gentlemen!

Step. Nay, we do not stand much on our gentility, friend; yet, you are welcome; and I assure you, mine uncle here is a man of a thousand a-year Midlesex land: he has but one son in all the world; I am his next heir at the common law, Master Stephen, as simple as I stand here; if my cousin die, as there's hope he will. I have a pretty living o' my own too, beside, hard by here.

Serv. In good time, sir.

Step. In good time, sir! Why? And in very good time, sir. You do not flout, friend, do you?

Serv. Not I, sir.

Step. Not you, sir! You were not best, sir; an' you should, here be them can perceive it, and that quickly, too. Go to! And they can give it again soundly, too, an' need be.

Serv. Why, sir, let this satisfy you: good faith, I had no such intent.

Step. Sir, an' I thought you had, I would talk with you, and that presently.

Serv. Good Master Stephen, so you may, sir, at your pleasure.

Step. And so I would, sir, good my saucy companion, an' you were out o' my uncle's ground, I can tell you; though I do not stand upon my gentility neither in't.

Kno. Cousin, cousin! will this ne'er be left?

Step. Whoreson, base fellow! A mechanical serving-man! By this cudgel, and 'twere not for shame, I would—

Kno. What would you do, you peremptory gull?

If you cannot be quiet, get you hence.

You see the honest man demeans himself

Modestly towards you, giving no reply

To your unseason'd, quarrelling, rude fashion:

And still you huff it, with a kind of carriage

As void of wit as of humanity.

Go, get you in; 'fore heaven! I am asham'd

Thou hast a kinsman's interest in me. [Exit STEP.]

Serv. I pray you, sir, is this Master Kno'well's house?

Kno. Yes, marry, is't, sir.

Serv. I should inquire for a gentleman here, one Master Edward Kno'well. Do you know any such, sir, I pray you?

Kno. I should forget myself else, sir.

Serv. Are you the gentleman? 'Cry you mercy, sir, I was required by a gentleman i'the city, as I rode out at this end of the town, to deliver you this letter, sir.

Kno. To me, sir? [Reads.] "To his most selected friend, Master Edward Kno'well." What might the gentleman's name be, sir, that sent it?

Serv. One Master Wellbred, sir.

Kno. Master Wellbred! A young gentleman, is he not?

Serv. The same, sir; Master Kitley married his sister: the rich merchant i'the Old Jewry.

Kno. You say very true. Brainworm!

Re-enter BRAINWORM.

Brain. Sir?

Kno. Make this honest friend drink here. Pray you, go in. [Exeunt BRAIN and Serv.]

This letter is directed to my son:

Yet I am Edward Kno'well too, and may, With the safe conscience of goodmanners, use The fellow's error to my satisfaction.

Well, I will break it ope; old men are curious.

What's this? [Reads.]

"Why, Ned, I beseech thee, hast thou forsworn all thy friends in the Old Jewry? or dost thou think us all Jews that inhabit there? Leave thy vigilant father alone, to number over his green apricots, evening and morning, o'the north-west wall: an' I had been his son, I had saved him the labour long since; if taking in all the young wenches that pass by, at the back door, and coddling every kernel of the fruit for 'em would ha' served. But, pr'ythee, come over to me quickly this morning: I have such a present for thee. One is a rhymers, sir, o' your own batch, your own leaven; but doth think himself poet-major o'the town; willing to be shewn, and worthy to be seen. The other—I will not venture his description with you till you come, because I would ha' you make hither with an appetite. If the worst of 'em be not worth your journey, draw your bill of charges as unconscionable as any Guildhall verdict will give it you, and you shall be allowed your viaticum.—From the Windmill."

From the Burdello, it might come as well!

The Spital! Is this the man,

My son hath sung so, for the happiest wit,

The choicest brain, the times hath sent us forth?

I know not what he may be in the arts,

Nor what in schools; but, surely, for his manners,

I judge him a profane and dissolute wretch.

Brainworm!

Re-enter BRAINWORM.

Brain. Sir?

Kno. Is the fellow gone that brought this letter?

Brain. Yes, sir, a pretty while since.

Kno. And where's your young master?

Brain. In his chamber, sir.

Kno. He spake not with the fellow, did he?

Brain. No, sir, he saw him not.

Kno. Take you this letter, seal it, and deliver it my son; [liffe.]

But with no notice that I have open'd it, on your Brain. Oh, lord! sir, that were a jest, indeed!

Kno. I am resolv'd I will not stop his journey;

Nor practise any violent means to stay

The unbridled course of youth in him: for that,

Restrain'd, grows more inpatient.

There is a way of winning more by love,

And urging of the modesty, than fear:

Force works on servile natures, not the free:

He, that's compell'd to goodness, may be good;

But 'tis but for that fit; where others, drawn;

By softness and example, get a habit,

Then if they stray, but warn 'em; and the same

They would for virtue do, they'll do for shame.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Young Kno'well's Study.]

Enter YOUNG KNO'WELL and BRAINWORM.

Young K. Did he open it, say'st thou?

Brain. Yes, o'my word, sir, and read the contents,

Young K. That's bad. What countenance, pray thee, made he i'the reading of it? Was he angry or pleased?

Brain. Nay, sir, I saw him not read it, nor open it, I assure your worship.

Young K. No! how know'st thou, then, that he did either?

Brain. Marry, sir, because he charged me, on my life, to tell nobody that he opened it; which, unless he had done, he would never fear to have it revealed.

Young K. That's true; well, I thank thee, Brainworm. [Exit.]

Enter Master STEPHEN.

Step. Oh, Brainworm, didst thou not see a fellow here in a what-sha'-call-him doublet? He brought mine uncle a letter, e'en now.

Brain. Yes, Master Stephen; what of him?

Step. Oh! I ha' such a mind to beat him—where is he? canst thou tell?

Brain. Faith! he is not of that mind: he is gone, Master Stephen.

Step. Gone! Which way? When went he? How long since?

Brain. He is rid hence. He took horse at the street-door.

Step. And I staid i'the fields! Whoreson, Scanderbeg rogue! Oh! that I had but a horse to fetch him back again!

Brain. Why, you may ha' my master's gelding to save your longing, sir.

Step. But I have no boots, that's the spite on't.

Brain. Why, a fine whisp of hay, rolled hard, Master Stephen.

Step. No, faith! it's no boot to follow him now; let him e'en go and hang. Prythee, help to truss me a little. He does so vex me—

Brain. You'll be worse vexed when you are trussed, Master Stephen; best keep unbraced, and walk yourself till you be cold, your choler may founder you else.

Step. By my faith, and so I will, now thou tell'st me on't. How dost thou like my leg, Brainworm?

Brain. A very good leg, Master Stephen; but the woollen stocking does not commend it so well.

Step. Foh! the stockings be good enough, now summer is coming on, for the dust: I'll have a pair of silk against the winter, that I go to dwell i'the town. I think my leg would shew in a silk hose.

Brain. Believe me, Master Stephen, rarely well.

Step. In sadness, I think it would; I have a reasonable good leg.

Brain. You have an excellent good leg, Master Stephen; but I cannot stay to praise it longer now; I am very sorry for't. [Exit.]

Step. Another time will serve, Brainworm. Gramercy, for this.

Re-enter YOUNG KNO'WELL.

Young K. Ha, ha, ha!

Step. 'Slid! I hope he laughs not at me; an' he do—[Aside.]

Young K. Here was a letter, indeed, to be intercepted by a man's father! He cannot but think most virtuously both of me and the sender, sure, that make the careful coster-monger of him in our familiar epistles. I wish I knew the end of it, which now is doubtful, and threatens—What, my wise cousin? Nay, then I'll furnish our feast with one gull more toward the mess. He writes to me of a brace, and here's one, that's three; oh! for a fourth! Fortune, if ever thou'lt use thine eyes, I entreat thee—[Aside.]

Step. Oh! now I see who he laughs at. He laughs at somebody in that letter. By this good light, an' he had laughed at me—[Aside.]

Young K. How now, cousin Stephen, melancholy?

Step. Yes, a little. I thought you had laughed at me, cousin.

Young K. Why, what an' I had, coz, what would you ha' done?

Step. By this light, I would ha' told mine uncle.

Young K. Nay, if you would ha' told your uncle, I did laugh at you, coz.

Step. Did you, indeed?

Young K. Yes, indeed.

Step. Why, then—

Young K. What then?

Step. I am satisfied; it is sufficient.

Young K. Why, be so, gentle coz. And I pray you, let me entreat a courtesy of you. I am sent for this morning, by a friend i'the Old-jewry, to come to him; it's but crossing over the fields to Moorgate: will you bear me company? I protest it is not to draw you into bond, or any plot against the state, coz.

Step. Sir, that's all one, an' 'twere; you shall command me twice so far as Moorgate to do you good in such a matter. Do you think I would leave you? I protest—

Young K. No, no, you shall not protest, coz.

Step. By my fackins! but I will, by your leave; I'll protest more to my friend than I'll speak of at this time.

Young K. You speak very well, coz.

Step. Nay, not so, neither; you shall pardon me: but I speak to serve my turn.

Young K. Your turn, coz! Do you know what you say? A gentleman of your sort, parts, carriage, and estimation, to talk o'your turn i'this company, and to me alone, like a water-bearer at a conduit! Come, come, wrong not the quality of your desert with looking downward, coz; but hold up your head so; and let the idea of what you are, be portrayed i'your face, that men may read i'your physiognomy,—“here, within this place, is to be seen, the true and accomplished monster,” or “miracle of nature,” which is all one. What think you of this, coz?

Step. Why, I do think of it; and I will be more proud, and melancholy, and gentleman-like, than I have been, I'll assure you.

Young K. Why, that's resolute, Master Stephen! Now, if I can but hold him up to his height, as it is happily begun, it will do well for a suburb humour: we may hap have a match with the city, and play him for forty pounds. [Aside.] Come, coz.

Step. I'll follow you.

Young K. Follow me! you must go before.

Step. Nay, an' I must, I will. Pray you, shew me, good cousin. [Ereunt.]

SCENE III.—The Street before Cob's house.

Enter Master MATTHEW.

Mat. I think this be the house. What, ho!

Enter Con, from the house.

Cob. Who's there? Oh! Master Matthew, gi' your worship good morrow.

Mat. What, Cob! How dost thou, good Cob? Dost thou inhabit here, Cob?

Cob. Ay, sir; I and my lineage ha' kept a poor house here in our days.

Mat. Cob, canst thou shew me of a gentleman, one Captain Bobadil, where his lodging is?

Cob. Oh! my guest, sir, you mean.

Mat. Thy guest! alas!—Ha, ha!

Cob. Why do you laugh, sir? do you not mean Captain Bobadil?

Mat. Cob, pray thee, advise thyself well; do not wrong the gentleman and thyself too. I dare be sworn, he scorns thy house. He! he lodge in such a base, obscure place as thy house! Tut! I know his disposition so well, he would not lie in thy bed, if thou'dst gi' it him.

Cob. I will not give it him, though, sir. Mass! I thought somewhat was in't, we could not get him to bed all night. Well, sir, though he lie not o' my bed, he lies o' my bench. An't please you to go up, sir, you shall find him with two cushions under his head, and his cloak wrapped about him, as though he had neither won nor lost; and yet, I warrant, he ne'er cast better in his life, than he has done to-night.

Mat. Why, was he drunk?

Cob. Drunk, sir! you hear not me say so. Perhaps he swallowed a tavern-token, or some such device, sir; I have nothing to do withal. I deal with water, and not with wine. Gi' me my bucket there, ho! God b'w'i' you, sir, it's six o'clock; I should ha' carried two turns by this. What, ho! my stopple, come!

Mat. Lie in a water-bearer's house! A gentleman of his havings! well, I'll tell him my mind. [Aside.] Enter Tib.

Cob. What, Tib, shew this gentleman up to the Captain. [Tib shews Master Matthew into the house.] You should ha' some now, would take this Mr. Matthew to be a gentleman at the least. His father is an honest man, a worshipful fishmonger, and so forth; and now does he creep and wriggle into acquaintance with all the brave gallants about the town, such as my guest is. Oh! my guest is a fine man! he does swear the legiblest of any man christened: by Saint George—the foot of Pharaoh—the body of me—as I am a gentleman and a soldier—such dainty oaths! And, withal, he does take this same filthy roguish tobacco, the finest and cleanliest! it would do a man good to see the fume come forth out at's tunnels! Well, he owes me forty shillings, my wife lent him out of her purse by sixpence a time, besides his lodging: I would I had it. I shall ha' it, he says, the next action. Helter-skelter, hang sorrow, care'll kill a cat, up-tails all, and a louse for the hangman! [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—A Room in Cob's house.

CAPTAIN BOBADIL, discovered upon a bench. Enter Tib.

Capt. B. Hostess, hostess!

Tib. What say you, sir?

Capt. B. A cup o'thy small beer, sweet hostess.

Tib. Sir, there's a gentleman below would speak with you.

Capt. B. A gentleman! Odso! I am not within.

Tib. My husband told him you were, sir.

Capt. B. What a plague—what meant he?

Mat. [Within.] Captain Bobadil!

Capt. B. Who's there? Take away the basin, good hostess. Come up, sir.

Tib. He would desire you to come up, sir. You come into a cleanly house here. [Exit.]

Enter Master MATTHEW.

Mat. Save you, sir; save you, Captain.

Capt. B. Gentle Master Matthew, is it you, sir? Please you, sit down.

Mat. Thank you, good Captain; you may see I am somewhat audacious.

Capt. B. Not so, sir. I was requested to supper last night, by a sort of gallants, where you were wished for, and drunk to, I assure you.

Mat. Vouchsafe me, by who, good Captain.

Capt. B. Marry, by young Wellbred and others. Why, hostess, a stool here for this gentleman.

Mat. No, haste, sir; 'tis very well.

Capt. B. Body o'me! it was so late ere we parted last night, I can scarcely open my eyes yet; I was but newly risen as you came. How passes the day abroad, sir? you can tell.

•Mat. Faith! some half-hour to seven. Now, trust me, you have an exceedingly fine lodging here; very neat and private.

Capt. B. Ay, sir; sit down. I pray you, Master Matthew, in any case, possess no gentlemen of our acquaintance with notice of my lodging.

Mat. Who, I, sir? No.

Capt. B. Not that I need to care who know it, for the cabin is convenient; but in regard I would not be too popular and generally visited, as some are.

Mat. True, Captain; I conceive you.

Capt. B. For, do you see, sir? by the heart of valour in me, except it be to some peculiar and choice spirits, to whom I am extraordinarily engaged, as yourself, or so, I could not extend thus far.

Mat. Oh, lord! sir, I resolve so. [Pulls out a paper and reads.]

Capt. B. I confess, I love a cleanly and quiet privacy, above all the tumult and roar of fortune. What new piece ha' you there? Read it.

Mat. [Reads.]

*"To thee, the purest object of my sense,
The most refined essence heaven covers,
Send I these lines, wherein I do commence
The happy state of turtle-billing lovers."*

Capt. B. 'Tis good; proceed, proceed. What's this?

Mat. This, sir? a toy o'mine own, in my nonage; the infancy of my muses. But, when will you come and see my study? Good faith! I can shew you some very good things I have done of late.—That boot becomes your leg passing well, Captain, methinks.

Capt. B. So, so; it's the fashion gentlemen now use.

Mat. Troth, Captain, and now you speak o'the fashion, Master Wellbred's elder brother and I are fallen out exceedingly: this other day I happened to enter into some discourse of a hanger, which I assure you, both for fashion and workmanship, was most peremptory beautiful and gentleman-like; yet he condemned, and cried it down, for the most pried and ridiculous that ever he saw.

Capt. B. 'Squire Downright, the half-brother, was't not?

Mat. Ay, sir, George Downright.

Capt. B. Hang him, rook! He! Why, he has no more judgment than a malt-horse. By St. George! I wonder you'd lose a thought upon such an animal! The most peremptory, absurd clown of Christendom, this day, he is holden. I protest to you, as I am a gentleman and a soldier, I ne'er changed words with his like. By his discourse he should eat nothing but hay. He was born for the manger, pannier, or pack-saddle. He has not so much as a good phrase in his belly, but all old iron and rusty proverbs; a good commodity for some smith to make hob-nails of.

Mat. Ay, and he thinks to carry it away with his manhood still; where he comes, he brags he will gi' me the bastinado, as I hear.

Capt. B. How? He, the bastinado? How came he by that word, I trow?

Mat. Nay, indeed, he said, cudgel me; I termed it so, for my more grace.

Capt. B. That may be; for I was sure it was none of his word. But when? when said he so?

Mat. Faith! yesterday, they say; a young gallant, a friend of mine, told me so.

Capt. B. By the foot of Pharaoh! an' 'twere my case now, I should send him a challenge presently. The bastinado! a most proper and sufficient dependence, warranted by the great Caranza. Come hither, you shall challenge him. I'll shew you a trick or two, you shall kill him with at pleasure; the first stoccata, if you will, by this air.

Mat. Indeed, you have absolute knowledge i'the mystery, I have heard, sir.

Capt. B. Of whom? of whom ha' you heard it, I beseech you?

Mat. Troth, I have heard it spoken of by divers, that you have very rare and un-in-one-breath-utterable skill, sir.

Capt. B. By heaven! no, not I; no skill i'the earth; some small rudiments i'the science, as to know my time, distance, or so. I have professed it more for noblemen and gentlemen's use than mine own practice, I assure you. I'll give you a lesson. Look you, sir! exalt not your point above this state, at any hand; so, sir, come on! Oh! twine your body more about, that you may fall to a more sweet, comely, gentleman-like guard. So, indifferent. Hollow your body more, sir, thus. Now, stand fast o' your left leg; note your distance; keep your due proportion of time. Oh! you disorder your point most irregularly! Come, put on your cloak, and we'll go to some private place, where you are acquainted, some tavern or so—and have a bit—What money ha' you about you, Mr. Matthew?

Mat. Faith! I ha' not past a two shillings, or so.

Capt. B. 'Tis somewhat with the least; but come, we will have a bunch of radishes, and salt, to taste our wine; and a pipe of tobacco to close the orifice of the stomach; and then we'll call upon young Wellbred. Perhaps we shall meet the Corydon, his brother, there, and put him to the question. Come along, Mr. Matthew. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Warehouse belonging to Kitley.

Enter KITELY, CASH, and DOWNRIGHT.

Kite. Thomas, come hither.

There lies a note within, upon my desk:
Here, take the key—It is no matter, neither.
Where is the boy?

Cash. Within, sir, i'the warehouse.

Kite. Let him tell over straight that Spanish gold,

And weigh it with the pieces of eight. Do you
See the delivery of those silver stuffs
To Mr. Lucar. Tell him, if he will,
He shall ha' the programs at the rate I told him;
And I will meet him on the Exchange anon.

Cash. Good, sir. [E. B.]

Kite. Do you see that fellow, brother Downright?

Down. I, what of him?

Kite. He is a jewel, brother.

I took him of a child, up, at my door,
And christened him: gave him my own name,
Thomas;

Since bred him at the hospital; where proving
A toward imp, I call'd him home, and taught him
So much, as I have made him my cashier;

And find him, in his faith, so full of faith,
That I durst trust my life into his hands.

Down. So would not I, in any bastard's brother,
As it is like he is, although I knew
Myself his father. But you said you'd somewhat
To tell me, gentle brother. What is't! what is't?

Kite. Faith! I am very loath to utter it,
As fearing it may hurt your patience;
But that I know your judgment is of strength
Against the nearness of affection—

Down. What need this circumstance? Pray you, be direct. Come to the matter, the matter!

Kite. Then, without further ceremony, thus:

My brother Wellbred, sir, I know not how,
Of late is much declin'd in what he was,
And greatly alter'd in his disposition.
When he came first to lodge here in my house,
Ne'er trust me, if I were not proud of him:
But now his course is so irregular,
So loose, affected, and depriv'd of grace;
He makes my house here common as a mart,
A theatre, a public receptacle
For giddy humour, and diseased riot;
And here, as in a tavern or a stew,
He and his wild associates spend their hours
In repetition of lascivious jests;
Swear, leap, drink, dance, and revel night by night;
Control my servants, and indeed what not.

Down. 'Sdains! I know not what I should say to him i' the whole world! He values me at a cracked three-farthings, for aught I see. It will never out of the flesh that's bred i' the bone! I have told him enough, one would think, if that would serve.
Well! he knows what to trust to, for George. Let him spend and spend, and domineer, till his heart ache; an' he thinks to be relieved by me, when he is got into one o' your city pounds, the counters, he has the wrong sow by the ear, i' faith! and claps his dish at a wrong man's door. I'll lay my hand on my halfpenny, ere I part with't to fetch him out, I'll assure him.

Kite. Nay, good brother, let it not trouble you
thus.

Down. 'Sdeath! he made me—I could eat my very spur-leathers for anger! But, why are you so tame? Why do you not speak to him, and tell him how he disquiets your house?

Kite. Oh! there are divers reasons to dissuade, brother;

But, would yourself vouchsafe to travail in it,
(Though but with plain and easy circumstance,)
It would both come much better to his sense,
And savour less of stomach or of passion.
You are his elder brother, and that title
Both gives and warrants you authority:
Whereas, if I should intimate the least,
It would but add contempt to his neglect:
Nay, more than this, brother, if I should speak,
He would be ready, from his heat of humour
And overflowing of the vapour in him,
To blow the ears of his familiars
With the false breath of telling what disgraces
And low disparagements I had put on him:
Whilst they, sir, to relieve him in the fable,
Make their loose comments upon ev'ry word,
Gesture, or look, I use; mock me all o'er;
And, out of their impetuous, rioting phant'asies,
Beget some slander that shall dwell with me.
And what would that be, think you? Marry, this:
They would give out, because my wife is fair,
Myself but newly married, and my sister
Here sojourning a virgin in my house,

That I were jealous; nay, as sure as death,
That they would say. And how that I had quarrell'd
My brother purposely, thereby to find
An apt pretext to banish them my house. [to do it.
Down. Mass! perhaps so: they're like enough
Kite. Brother, they would believe it: so should I
Try experiments upon myself:
Lend scorn and envy opportunity
To stab my reputation and good name.

Enter Master MATTHEW and Captain BOBADIL.

Mat. I will speak to him—
Capt. B. Speak to him! Away! by the foot of Pharaoh! you shall not; you shall not do him that grace.
Kite. What's the matter, sirs?
Capt. B. The time of day to you, gentleman o'the house. Is Mr. Wellbred stirring?
Down. How then? what should he do?
Capt. B. Gentleman of the house, it is you: is he within, sir?
Kite. He came not to his lodging to-night, sir, I assure you.

Down. Why, do you hear, you?
Capt. B. The gentleman-citizen hath satisfied me. I'll talk to no scavenger. [Exit with Matthew.
Down. How, scavenger? Stay, sir, stay!
Kite. Nay, brother Downright.
Down. 'Heart! stand you away, an' you love me.
Kite. You shall not follow him now, I pray you, brother; good faith! you shall not. I will overrule you.

Down. Ha! scavenger! Well, go to, I say little; but, by this good day, (God forgive me I should swear) if I put it up so, say I am the rankest coward ever lived. 'Sdains! an' I swallow this, I'll ne'er draw my sword in the sight of Fleet-street again, while I live; I'll sit in a barn with Madge Howlet, and catch mice first. Scavenger!

Kite. Oh! do not fret yourself thus, never think on't.
Down. These are my brother's comforts, these! these are his comrades, his walking mates! he's a gallant, a cavaliero, too; right hangman-cut! Let me not live, an' I could not find in my heart to swinge the whole gang of 'em, one after another, and begin with him first. I am grieved it should be said he is my brother, and take these courses. Well, as he brews, so he shall drink, for George again. Yet he shall hear on't, and that tightly, too, an' I live, i'faith!

Kite. But, brother, let your reprehension, then, Run in an easy current; not o'er high Carried with rashness, or devouring choler; But rather use the soft persuading way, More winning than enforcing the consent.

Down. Ay, ay, let me alone for that, I warrant you. [Bell rings.]

Kite. How now? Oh! the bell rings to breakfast. Brother, I pray you, go in, and bear my wife Company till I come: I'll but give order For some despatch of business to my servant.

Down. I will. Scavenger, scavenger! [Exit.

Kite. Well, though my troubled spirit's somewhat eas'd,

It's not repos'd in that security
As I could wish; but I must be content,
Howe'er I set a face on't to the world.
Would I had lost this finger, at a venture,
So Wellbred had ne'er lodged within my house.
Why 't cannot be, where there is such resort
Of wanton gallants and young revellers,
That any woman should be honest long.
Well, to be plain, if I but thought the time

Had answered their affections; all the world
Should not persuade me but I were a cuckold!
Marry, I hope they ha' not got that start;
For opportunity hath balk'd 'em yet,
And shall do still, while I have eyes and ears
To attend the impositions of my heart

Enter Dame KITELY.

Dame K. Sister Bridget, pray you, fetch down the rose-water above in the closet. Sweetheart, will you come in to breakfast?

Kite. An' she overheard me now! [Aside.

Dame K. I pray thee, good Muss, we stay for you.

Kite. By heav'n! I would not for a thousand angels. [Aside.

Dame K. What ails you, sweetheart? are you not well? Speak, good Muss.

Kite. Troth, my head aches extremely, on a sudden.

Dame K. Oh, the lord!

Kite. How now? what?

Dame K. Alas! how it burns! Muss keep you warm; good truth, it is this new disease, there's a number are troubled withal. For love's sake, sweetheart, come in out of the air.

Kite. How simple and how subtle are her answers!

A new disease, and many troubled with it!
Why, true! she heard me, all the world to nothing.

[Aside.

Dame K. I pray thee, good sweetheart, come in; the air will do you harm, in troth.

Kite. I'll come to you presently; 'twill away, I hope.

Dame K. Pray heav'n it do! [Exit.

Kite. A new disease! I know not, new or old, But it may well be call'd poor mortals' plague; For, like a pestilence, it doth infect The houses of the brain. Well, I will once more strive,

In spite of this black cloud, myself to be,
And shake the fever off, that thus shakes me. [Exit.

SCENE II.—Moorfields.

Enter BRAINWORM, disguised as a soldier.

Brain. 'Slid! I cannot choose but laugh to see myself translated thus. Now must I create an intolerable sort of lies, or my present profession loses the grace; and yet the lie to a man of my coat, is as ominous a fruit as the fig. Oh! sir, it holds for good polity ever to have that outwardly in vilest estimation that inwardly is most dear to us. So much for my borrowed shape. Well, the truth is, my old master intends to follow my young, dry-foot, over Moorfields to London this morning: now I, knowing of this hunting-match, or rather conspiracy, and to insinuate with my young master, (for so must we that are blue waiters, and men of hope and service do,) have got me afore in this disguise, determining here to lie in ambuscade, and intercept him in the midway. If I can but get his cloak, his purse, his hat, nay, any thing to cut him off, that is, to stay his journey—"Veni, vidi, vici," I may say with Captain Cæsar; I am made for ever, i'faith! Well, now must I practise to get the true garb of one of those lance-knights, my arm here, and my—young master, and his cousin, Mr. Stephen, as I am a true counterfeit man of war, and no soldier! [Retires.]

Enter Young KNO'WELL and Master STEPHEN.

Young K. So, sir, and how, then, coz?

Step. 'Sfoot! I have lost my purse, I think.

Young K. How? lost your purse? Where? when had you it?

Step. I cannot tell: stay.

Brain. 'Slid! I am afraid they will know me: would I could get by them!

[Aside.

Young K. What! ha! you it?

Step. No, I think I was bewitched, I—

Young K. Nay, do not weep the loss; hang it! let it go.

Step. Oh! it's here. No, an' it had been lost, I had not cared, but for a jet ring mistress Mary sent me.

Young K. A jet ring! Oh! the poesy, the poesy!

Step. Fine, i'faith! "Though fancy sleep, my love is deep;" meaning that though I did not fancy her, yet she loved me dearly.

Young K. Most excellent!

Step. And then I sent her another, and my poesy was, "The deeper the sweeter, I'll be judged by St. Peter."

Young K. How by St. Peter? I do not conceive that.

Step. Marry, St. Peter, to make up the metre.

Young K. Well, there the saint was your good patron; he helped you at your need: thank him, thank him.

Brain. I cannot take leave of 'em so; I will venture, come what will. [Aside. Comes forward.] Gentlemen, please you change a few crowns for a very excellent good blade, here. I am a poor gentleman, a soldier, that in the better state of my fortunes, scorned so mean a refuge, but now it is the humour of necessity to have it so. You seem to be, gentlemen, well affected to martial men, else I should rather die with silence than live with shame; however, vouchsafe to remember, it is my want speaks, not myself. This condition agrees not with my spirit.

Young K. Where hast thou served?

Brain. May it please you, sir, in all the late wars of Bohemia, Hungaria, Dalmatia, Poland; where not, sir? I have been a poor servitor by sea and land, any time this fourteen years, and followed the fortunes of the best commanders in Christendom. I was twice shot at the taking of Aleppo; once at the relief of Vienna. I have been at Marseilles, Naples, and the Adriatic gulf; a gentleman-slave in the galleys thrice, where I was most dangerously shot in the head, through both thighs, and yet, being thus maimed, I am void of maintenance; nothing left me but my scars, the noted marks of my resolution.

Step. How will you sell this rapier, friend?

Brain. Generous sir, I refer it to your own judgment; you are a gentleman, give me what you please.

Step. True, I am a gentleman, I know that, friend; but what though, I pray you say, what would you ask?

Brain. I assure you the blade may become the side or thigh of the best prince in Europe.

Young K. Ay, with a velvet scabbard.

Step. Nay, and it be mine, it shall have a velvet scabbard, coz, that's flat: I'd not wear it as 'tis, an' you would give me an angel.

Brain. At your worship's pleasure, sir; nay, 'tis a most pure Toledo.

Step. I had rather it were a Spaniard. But tell me what shall I give you for it? An' it had a silver hilt—

Young K. Come, come; you shall not buy it. Hold! there's a shilling, fellow:—take thy rapier.

Step. Why, but I will buy it now, because you say so; and there's another shilling, fellow; I scorn to be outbidden. What, shall I walk with a cudgel, like a higgibottom, and may have a rapier for money?

Young K. You may buy one in the city.

Step. Tut! I'll buy this i'the field, so I will; I have a mind to't, because 'tis a field rapier. Tell me your lowest price.

Young K. You shall not buy it, I say.

Step. By this money but I will, though I give more than 'tis worth.

Young K. Come away; you are a fool. [Exit.

Step. Friend, I am a fool, that's granted; but I'll have it for that word's sake. Follow me for your money. He says I am a fool. [Exit.

Brain. The gentleman seems to know you, sir. I follow. [Exit.

Enter KNO'WELL.

* Kno. I cannot lose the thought yet of this letter Sent to my son; nor leave to admire the change Of manners and the breeding of our youth, Within the kingdom, since myself was one. When I was young, he liv'd not in the stews, Durst have conceiv'd a scorn, and utter'd it, On a grey head; and a man had then A certain reverence paid unto his years That had none due unto his life. But now we are fall'n; youth from their fear, And age from that which bred it, good example.

Re-enter BRAINWORM.

Brain. My master! Nay, faith! have at you; I am fleshed now, I have sped so well; though I must attack you in a different way. [Aside.] Worshipful sir, I beseech you respect the state of a poor soldier! I am ashamed of this base course of life, (God's my comfort,) but extremity provokes me to't—what remedy?

Kno. I have not for you now.

Brain. By the faith I bear unto truth, gentlemen, it is no ordinary custom in me, but only to preserve manhood. I protest to you, a man I have been, a man I may be, by your sweet bounty.

Kno. Pr'ythee, good friend, be satisfied.

Brain. Good sir, by that hand, you may do the part of a kind gentleman, in lending a poor soldier the price of two cans of beer, a matter of small value; the king of heaven shall pay you, and I shall rest thankful: sweet worship—

Kno. Nay, an' you be so importunate—

Brain. Oh! tender sir, need will have its course: I was not made to this vile use. Well, the edge of the enemy could not have abated me so much. [Weeps.] It's hard, when a man has served in his prince's cause, and be thus—Honourable worship, let me derive a small piece of silver from you; it shall not be given in the course of time. By this good ground, I was fain to pawn my rapier last night for a poor supper; I had sucked the hilts long before, I am a pagan else, sweet honour.

Kno. Believe me, I am taken with some wonder, To think a fellow of thy outward presence, Should, in the frame and fashion of his mind, Be so degenerate and sordid base! Art thou a man, and sham'st thou not to beg? To practise such a servile kind of life? Why, were thy education ne'er so mean, Having thy limbs, a thousand fairer courses Offer themselves to thy election; Either the wars might still supply thy wants,

Or service of some virtuous gentleman,
Or honest labour.

Brain. Faith! sir, I would gladly find some other course, if so—

Kno. Ay, you'd gladly find it, but you will not seek it.

Brain. Alas! sir, where should a man seek? In the wars there's no ascent by desert in these days, but—and for service, would it were as soon purchased as wished for!—The air's my comfort.—I know what I would say.

Kno. What's thy name?

Brain. Please you, Fitz-sword, sir.

Kno. Fitz-sword,

Say that a man should entertain thee now,
Wouldst thou be honest, humble, just, and true?

Brain. Sir, by the place and honour of a soldier—

Kno. Nay, nay, I like not those affected oaths!

Speak plainly, man; what think'st thou of my words?

Brain. Nothing, sir; but wish my fortunes were as happy, as my service should be honest.

Kno. Well, follow me; I'll prove thee, if thy deeds will carry a proportion to thy words. [Exit.]

Brain. Yes, sir, straight; I'll but garter my hose.—Oh! that my belly were hooped now, for I am ready to burst with laughing! Never was bottle or bagpipe fuller. 'Slid! was there ever seen a fox in years to betray himself thus? Now I shall be possessed of all his counsels; and by that conduct my young master. Well, he is resolved to prove my honesty: faith! and I am resolved to prove his patience. Oh! I shall abuse him intolerably! It's no matter; let the world think me a bad counterfeit, if I cannot give him the slip at an instant. Why, this is better than to have staid his journey. Well, I'll follow him. Oh! how I long to be employed! With change of voice, these scars, and many an oath, I'll follow son and sire, and serve 'em both. [Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—Stocks-market.

Enter Master MATTHEW, WELLBRED, and Captain BOBADIL.

Mat. Yes, faith! sir, we were at your lodging to seek you, too.

Well. Oh! I came not there to-night.

Capt. B. Your brother delivered us as much.

Well. Who? My brother Downright?

Capt. B. He. Mr. Wellbred, I know not in what kind you hold me, but let me say to you this: as sure as honour, I esteem it so much out of the sunshine of reputation to throw the least beam of regard upon such a—

Well. Sir, I must hear no ill words of my brother.

Capt. B. I protest to you, as I have a thing to be said about me, I never saw any gentleman-like part—

Well. Good Captain, [faces about] to some other discourse.

Capt. B. With your leave, sir, an' there were no more men living upon the face of the earth, I should not fancy him, by St. George.

Mat. Troth! nor I; he is of a rustical cut, I know not how; he doth not carry himself like a gentleman of fashion.

Well. Oh! Mr. Matthew, that's a grace peculiar but to few.

Enter Young KNO'WELL and Master STEPHEN.

Ned Kno'well! by my soul, welcome! How dost thou, sweet spirit, my genius? 'Slid! I shall love Apollo, and the mad Thespian girls, the better while I live for this, my dear fury. Now I see there's some love in thee. Sirrah, these be the two I write to you of. Nay, what a drowsy humour is this now? Why dost thou not speak?

Young K. Oh! you are a fine gallant; you sent me a rare letter.

Well. Why, was't not rare?

Young K. Yes, I'll be sworn, I was never guilty of reading the like. But I marvel what camel it was that had the carriage of it; for doubtless he was no ordinary beast that brought it.

Well. Why?

Young K. Why, sayest thou? Why, dost thou think that any reasonable creature, especially in the morning, the sober time of the day, too, could have mistaken my father for me?

Well. 'Slid! you jest, I hope.

Young K. Indeed, the best use we can turn it to, is to make a jest on't now; but I'll assure you my father had the full view o'your flourishing style, before I saw it.

Well. What a dull slave was this! But, sirrah, what said he to it, i'faith?

Young K. Nay, I know not what he said; but I have a shrewd guess what he thought.

Well. What, what?

Young K. Marry, that thou art some strange, dis-solute, young fellow, and I not a grain or two better for keeping thee company.

Well. Tut! that thought is like the moon in her last quarter, 'twill change shortly. But, sirrah, I pray thee, be acquainted with my two hang-bys here; thou wilt take exceeding pleasure in 'em, if thou hearest 'em once go: my wind-instruments. I'll wind 'em up. But what strange piece of silence is this? The sign of the dumb man?

Young K. Oh! sir, a kinsman of mine, one that may make your music the fuller, an' he please; he has his humour, sir.

Well. Oh! what is't, what is't?

Young K. Nay, I'll neither do your judgment, nor his folly that wrong, as to prepare your apprehensions. I'll leave him to the mercy o'your search, if you can take him so.

Well. Well, Captain Bobadil, Mr. Matthew, I pray you, know this gentleman here: he is a friend of mine, and one that will deserve your affection. I know not your name, sir, but shall be glad of any occasion to render me more familiar to you.

[To Master STEPHEN.]

Step. My name is Mr. Stephen, sir; I am this gentleman's own cousin, sir: his father is mine uncle, sir. I am somewhat melancholy; but you shall command me, sir, in whatsoever is incident to a gentleman.

Capt. B. I must tell you this, I am no general man; but for Mr. Wellbred's sake, (you may embrace it at what height of favour you please,) I do communicate with you, and conceive you to be a gentleman of some parts. I love few words.

Young K. And I fewer, sir. I have scarce enow to thank you.

Mat. But are you, indeed, sir, so given to it?

[To Master STEPHEN.]

Step. Ay, truly, sir, I am mightily given to melancholy.

Mat. Oh! 'tis your only fine humour, sir; your true melancholy breeds you perfect fine wit, sir. I am melancholy myself divers times, sir; and then I do no more but take a pen and paper presently, and overflow you half-a-score or a dozen of sonnets at a sitting.

Step. Cousin, it is well; am I melancholy enough?

[Apart to Young Kno'well.]

Young K. Oh! ay, excellent!

Well. Captain Bobadil, why muse you so?

Young K. He is melancholy, too.

Capt. B. Faith! sir, I was thinking of a most honourable piece of service was performed to-morrow, being St. Mark's day, shall be some ten years now.

Young K. In what place, Captain?

Capt. B. Why, at the beleag'ring of Strigonium, where, in less than two hours, seven hundred resolute gentlemen, as any were in Europe, lost their lives upon the breach. I'll tell you, gentlemen, it was the first, but the best leaguer that I ever beheld with these eyes, except the taking of—what do you call it? last year, by the Genoese! but that (of all others) was the most fatal and dangerous exploit that ever I was ranged in, since I first bore arms before the face of the enemy, as I am a gentleman and a soldier.

Step. So I had as lief as an angel, I could swear as well as that gentleman.

[Aside.]

Young K. Then you were a servitor at both, it seems; at Strigonium, and What-do-you-call-it?

Capt. B. Oh, lord! sir, by St. George! I was the first man that entered the breach: had I not effected it with resolution, I had been slain, if I had had a million of lives.

Young K. 'Twere pity you had not ten; a cat's and your own, i'faith! But was it possible?

Capt. B. I assure you, upon my reputation, 'tis true, and yourself shall confess.

Young K. You must bring me to the rack first.

Capt. B. Observe me judiciously, sweet sir; they had planted me three demi-culverins, just in the mouth of the breach: now, sir, as we were to give on, their master-gunner (a man of no mean skill and mark, you must think) confronts me with his linstock, ready to give fire: I, spying his intentment, discharged my petronel in his bosom, and with these single arms, my poor rapier, ran violently upon the Moors that guarded the ordnance, and put them all pell-mell to the sword.

Well. To the sword! to the rapier, Captain.

Young K. Oh! it was a good figure observed, sir. But did you all this, Captain, without hurting your blade?

Capt. B. Without any impeach o'the earth. You shall perceive, sir. It is the most fortunate weapon that ever rid on poor gentleman's thigh. Shall I tell you, sir? You talk of Morglay, Excalibur, Durindina, or so—Tut! I lend no credit to that is fabled of 'em; I know the virtue of mine own, and, therefore, I dare the bolder maintain it.

Step. I marvel whether it be a Toledo or no?

Capt. B. A most perfect Toledo, I assure you, sir.

Step. I have a countryman of his here.

Mat. Pray you, let's see, sir. Yes, faith! it is.

Capt. B. This a Toledo? 'Pish!

[Bends the blade double.]

Step. Why do you pish, Captain?

Capt. B. A Fleming, by heaven! I'll buy them for a guilder a-piece, an' I would have a thousand of them.

Young K. How say you, cousin? I told you thus much.

Well. Where bought you it, Mr. Stephen?

Step. Of a scurvy rogue soldier; he swore it was a Toledo.

Capt. B. A poor provant rapier, no better.

Mat. Mass! I think it be, indeed, now I look on't better.

Young K. Nay, the longer you look on't the worse. Put it up, put it up.

Step. Well, I will put it up; but by—I ha' forgot the Captain's oath—I thought to ha' sworn by it—[Aside.—an' e'er I meet him—

Well. Oh! 'tis past help now, sir; you must ha' patience.

Step. I could eat the very hilts for anger.

Young K. A sign of good digestion; you have an ostrich stomach, cousin.

Step. A stomach! I would I had him here, you should see an' I had a stomach.

Well. It's better as it is. Come, gentlemen, shall we go?

Enter BRAINWORM.

Young K. A miracle, cousin! look here, look here!

Step. Oh, god'slid! by your leave, do you know me, sir?

Brain. Ay, sir, I know you by sight.

Step. You sold me a rapier, did you not?

Brain. Yes, marry, did I, sir.

Step. You said it was a Toledo, eh?

Brain. True, I did so.

Step. But it is none.

Brain. No, sir, I confess it is none.

Step. Do you confess it? Gentlemen, bear witness he has confessed it. By God's will, an' you had not confessed it—

Young K. Oh! cousin, forbear, forbear!

Step. Nay, I have done, cousin.

Well. Why, you have done like a gentleman; he has confessed it; what would you more?

Step. Yet, by his leave, he is a rascal, under his favour, do you see?

Young K. Ay, by his leave he is, and under favour. Pretty piece of civility! Sirrah, how dost thou like him?

[Apart to WELLBRED.]

Well. Oh! it's a most precious fool! make much on him. I can compare him to nothing more happily than a drum; for every one may play upon him.

[Apart.]

Young K. No, no; a child's whistle were far the fitter.

[Apart.]

Brain. Sir, shall I entreat a word with you?

[To Young Kno'well.]

Young K. With me, sir? You have not another Toledo to sell, ha' you?

Brain. You are conceited, sir. Your name is Mr. Kno'well, as I take it?

Young K. You are i'the right. You mean not to proceed in the catechism, do you?

Brain. No, sir, I am none of that coat.

Young K. Of as bare coat, though. Well, say sir.

Brain. Faith! sir, I am but a servant to the drum extraordinary; and, indeed, this smoky varnish being washed off, and three or four patches removed, I appear your worship's in reversion, after the decease of your good father—Brainworm.

Young K. Brainworm! 'Slight! what breath of a conjurer hath blown thee hither in this shape?

Brain. The breath o'your letter, sir, this morning: the same that blew you to the Windmill, and your father after you.

Young K. My father!

Brain. Nay, never start; 'tis true! he has followed you over the fields by the foot, as you would do a hare i' the snow.

Young K. Sirrah, Wellbred, what shall we do, sirrah? My father is come over after me.

Well. Thy father! Where is he?

Brain. At Justice Clement's house here, in Coleman-street, where he but stays my return, and then—

Well. Who's this? Brainworm?

Brain. The same, sir.

Well. Why, how, i' the name of wit, comest thou transmuted thus?

Brain. Faith! a device, a device! Nay, for the love of reason, gentlemen, and avoiding the danger, stand not here: withdraw, and I'll tell you all.

Young K. Come, cousin. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The Warehouse.

Enter KITELY and CASH.

Kite. What says he, Thomas? Did you speak with him?

Cash. He will expect you, sir, within this half-hour.

Kite. Has he the money ready, can you tell?

Cash. Yes, sir, the money was brought in last night. [cloak.]

Kite. Oh! that's well: fetch me my cloak, my

Stay, let me see: an hour to go and come;

Ay, that will be the least; and then 'twill be

An hour before I can despatch him,

Or very near: well, I will say two hours.

Two hours! Ha! things never dreamt of yet,

May be contriv'd, ay, and effected too,

In two hours' absence. Well, I will not go.

Two hours! no, fleeing opportunity,

I will not give your subtlety that scope.

Who will not judge him worthy to be robb'd,

That sets his doors wide open to a thief,

And shews the felon where his treasure lies?

Again, what earthly spirit but will attempt

To taste the fruit of beauty's golden tree,

When leaden sleep seals up the dragon's eyes?

I will not go. Business, go by for once.

No, beauty, no; you are too, too precious

To be left so, without a guard, or open.

You then must be kept up close, and well watch'd!

For, give you opportunity, no quicksand

Devours or swallows swifter! He that lends

His wife, if she be fair, or time, or place,

Compels her to be false. I will not go,

The dangers are too many. I am resolv'd for that.

Carry in my cloak again. Yet stay—yet do, too,

I will defer going on all occasions.

Cash. Sir, Snare, your scrivener, will be there with the bonds.

Kite. That's true. Fool on me! I had clean forgotten it. I must go. What's o'clock?

Cash. Exchange time, sir. [here, too,

Kite. 'Heart! then will Wellbred presently be

With one or other of his loose consorts.

I am a knave if I know what to say,

What course to take, or which way to resolve.

My brain, methinks, is like an hour-glass,

Wherein my imagination runs, like sands

Filling up time: but then are turn'd and turn'd;

So that I know not what to stay upon,

And less to put in act. It shall be so.

Nay, I dare build upon his secrecy,

He knows not to deceive me. [Aside] Thomas!

Cash. Sir?

Kite. Yet now I have bethought me, I will not.

[Aside.]

Thomas, is Cob within?

Cash. I think he be, sir.

[him.]

Kite. But he'll prate, too; there's no speech of

No, there were no man o'the earth to Thomas,

If I durst trust him; there is all the doubt.

But should he have a chink in him, I were gone,

Lost i' my fame for ever; talk for th' Exchange.

The manner he hath stood with, till this present,

Doth promise no such change. What should I fear, then?

Well, come what will, I'll tempt my fortune once;

[Aside.]

Thomas, you may deceive me, but I hope—

Your love to me is more—

Cash. Sir, if a servant's

Duty, with faith, may be call'd love, you are

More than in hope; you are possess'd of it.

Kite. I thank you heartily, Thomas; gi' me your hand.

With all my heart, good Thomas. I have, Thomas,

A secret to impart to you—but

When once you have it, I must seal your lips up.

So far I tell you, Thomas.

Cash. Sir, for that—

[Thomas,

Kite. Nay, hear me out. Think I esteem you,

When I will let you in thus to my private.

It is a thing stir's nearer to my crest

Than thou'rt aware of, Thomas. If thou shouldst

Reveal it, but—

Cash. How! I reveal it?

Kite. Nay,

I do not think thou wouldst; but if thou shouldst,

'Twere a great weakness.

Cash. A great treachery.

Give it no other name.

Kite. Thou wilt not do't, then?

Cash. Sir, if I do, mankind disclaim me ever.

Kite. He will not swear; he has some reservation,

Some conceal'd purpose, and close meaning, sure;

Else, being urg'd so much, how should he choose

But lend an oath to all this protestation?

He's no fanatic; I have heard him swear.

What should I think of it? Urge him again,

And by some other way? I will do so. [Aside.]

Well, Thomas, thou hast sworn not to disclose—

Yes, you did swear.

Cash. Not yet, sir, but I will,

Please you—

Kite. No, Thomas, I dare take thy word;

But if thou wilt swear, do, as thou think'st good:

I am resolv'd without it, at thy pleasure.

Cash. By my soul's safety, then, sir, I protest

My tongue shall ne'er take knowledge of a word,

Deliver'd me in nature of your trust.

Kite. It is too much; these ceremonies need not;

I know thy faith to be as firm as rock.

Thomas, come hither, near; we cannot be Too private in this business. So it is.

Now he has sworn, I dare the safelier venture:

I have of late, by divers observations—

But whether his oath can bind him, there it is.

I will bethink me ere I do proceed. [Aside.]

Thomas, it will be now too long to stay,

I'll spy some fitter time soon, or to-morrow.

Cash. Sir, at your pleasure.

Kite. I will think. Give me my cloak. And, Thomas,

I pray you, search the books, 'gainst my return,

For the receipts 'twixt me and Traps.

Cash. I will, sir.

Kite. And, hear you; if your mistress' brother, Wellbred,

Chance to bring hither any gentlemen

Ere I come back, let one straight bring me word—

Cash. Very well, sir.

Kite. To the Exchange; do you hear?

Or here in Coleman-street, to Justice Clement's;

Forget it not, nor be out of the way.

Cash. I will not, sir.

Kite. I pray you, have a care on't.

Or whether he come or no, if any other

Stranger, or else, fail not to send me word.

Cash. I shall not, sir.

Kite. Be't your special business

Now to remember it.

Cash. Sir, I warrant you.

Kite. But, Thomas, this is not the secret, Thomas, I told you of.

Cash. No, sir, I do suppose it.

Kite. Believe me, it is not.

Cash. Sir, I do believe you.

[Thomas,

Kite. By heaven, it is not! That's enough. But,

I would not you should utter it, do you see?

To any creature living; yet I care not.

Well, I must hence. Thomas, conceive thus much;

It was a trial of you, when I meant

So deep a secret to you: I meant not this,

But that I have to tell you. This is nothing, this.

But, Thomas, keep this from my wife, I charge you,

Lock'd up in silence, midnight, buried here,

No greater hell than to be slave to fear.

[Exit.

Cash. Lock'd up in silence, midnight, buried here!

Whence should this flood of passion, trow, take head, eh?

Best dream no longer of this running humour,

For fear I sink. But soft,

Here is company; now must I—

[Exit.

Enter WELLBRED, Young KNO'WELL, BRAINWORM,

Master MATTHEW, Master STEPHEN, and Captain BOBADIL.

Well. Beshrew me, but it was an absolute good jest, and exceedingly well carried.

Young K. Ay, and our ignorance maintained it as well, did it not?

Well. Yes, faith! But wasn't possible thou shouldst not know him? I forgive Mr. Stephen, for he is stupidity itself. Why, Brainworm, who would have thought thou hadst been such an artificer?

Young K. An artificer! an architect! Except a man had studied begging all his life-time, and been a weaver of language from his infancy, for the clothing of it, I never saw his rival.

Well. Where got'st thou this coat, I marvel?

Brain. Of a Houndsditch man, sir; one of the devil's near kinsmen, a broker.

Re-enter CASH.

Cash. Francis! Martin! Ne'er a one to be found now? What a spite's this?

Well. How now, Thomas, is my brother Kitley within?

Cash. No, sir; my master went forth e'en now: but Master Downtight is within. Cob! What, Cob! Is he gone, too?

Well. Whither went your master, Thomas; canst thou tell?

Cash. I know not; to Justice Clement's, I think, sir. Cob!

[Exit.

Young K. Justice Clement! What's he?

Well. Why, dost thou not know him? He is a city magistrate, a justice here; an excellent good lawyer, and a great scholar; but the only mad and merry old fellow in Europe! I shewed you him the other day.

ACT. DRAMA.—NOS. 79 & 80.

Young K. Oh! is that he? I remember him now. Good faith! and he has a very strange presence, methinks; it shews as if he stood out of the rank from other men. I have heard many of his jests i' the university. They say, he will commit a man for taking the wall of his horse.

Well. Ay, or wearing his cloak on one shoulder, or serving of God. Anything, indeed, if it come in the way of his humour.

Re-enter CASH.

Cash. Gasper, Martin, Cob! 'Heart! where should they be, I trow?

Capt. B. Master Kitley's man, pr'ythee, vouchsafe us the lighting of this match.

Cash. Fire on your match! no time but now to vouchsafe? Francis! Cob!

[Exit.

Capt. B. Body of me! Here's the remainder of seven pounds since yesterday was seven night. 'Tis your right Trinidado! Did you never take any, Master Stephen?

Step. No, truly, sir! but I'll learn to take it now, since you recommend it so.

Capt. B. Sir, believe me, upon my relation, for what I tell you the world shall not reprove. I have been in the Indies, where this herb grows, where neither myself, nor a dozen gentlemen more, of my knowledge, have received the taste of any other nutriment in the world for the space of one-and-twenty weeks, but the fume of this simple only. Therefore it cannot be but 'tis most divine, especially your Trinidado. Your Nicotian is good, too. I do hold it, and will affirm it before any prince in Europe, to be the most sovereign and precious weed that ever the earth tendered to the use of man.

Young K. This speech would have done decently in a tobacco-trader's mouth.

[Aside.

Re-enter CASH, with COB.

Cash. At Justice Clement's he is, in the middle of Coleman-street.

Cob. Oh, ho!

Capt. B. Where's the match I gave thee, Master Kitley's man?

Cash. Here it is, sir.

Cob. By God's-me! I marvel what pleasure or felicity they have in taking this roguish tobacco! It's good for nothing but to choke a man, and fill him full of smoke and embers. [Captain BOBADIL beats COB with a cudgel; MATTHEW runs away.]

All. Oh! good captain! hold, hold!

Capt. B. You base scullion, you.

Cash. Come, thou must need be talking, too; thou'rt well enough served.

Cob. Well, it shall be a dear beating, an' I live! I will have justice for this.

Capt. B. Do you prate? Do you murmur?

[Beats COB off.

Young K. Nay, good Captain, will you regard the humour of a fool?

Capt. B. A whoreson, filthy slave, a dung-worm, an excrement! Body o' Cæsar, but that I scorn to let forth so mean a spirit, I'd have stabbed him to the earth.

Well. Marry, the law forbid, sir.

Capt. B. By Pharaoh's foot, I would have done it.

[Exit.

Step. Oh! he swears admirably! By Pharaoh's foot, body of Cæsar; I shall never do it, sure; upon mine honour, and by St. George; no I ha'n't the right grace.

[Aside.]

Well. But, soft, where's Mr. Matthew—gone?

Brain. No, sir; they went in here.

Well. Oh! let's follow them: Master Matthew is gone to salute his mistress in verse. We shall have the happiness to hear some of his poetry now. He never comes unfurnished. Brainworm!

Step. Brainworm! Where is this Brainworm?

Young K. Ay, cousin, no words of it, upon your gentility.

Step. Not I, body of me! by this air, St. George, and the foot of Pharaoh!

Well. Rare! your cousin's discourse is simply drawn out with oaths.

Young K. 'Tis larded with 'em: a kind of French dressing, if you love it. Come, let's in; come, cousin.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—A Hall in Justice Clement's house.

Enter KITELY and COB.

Kite. Ah! How many are there, say'st thou?

Cob. Marry, sir, your brother, Master Wellbred—
Kite. Tut! beside him: what strangers are there, man?

Cob. Strangers! let me see; one, two—Mass! I know not well, there are so many.

Kite. How, so many?

Cob. Ay, there's some five or six of them at the most.

Kite. A swarm, a swarm!

Spite of the devil, how they sting my head
With forked stings, thus wide and large! But Cob,
How long hast thou been coming hither, Cob?

Cob. A little while, sir.

Kite. Didst thou come running?

Cob. No, sir.

Kite. Nay, then I am familiar with thy haste!
Bane to my fortunes. What meant I to marry?
I, that before was rank'd in such content;

My mind at rest, too, in so soft a peace,
Being free master of my own free thoughts,
And now become a slave? What, never sigh!
Be of good cheer, man, for thou art a cuckold.

'Tis done! 'tis done! Nay, when such flowing store,
Plenty itself falls into my wife's lap,

The cornucopia will be mine, I know. But, Cob,
What entertainment had they? I am sure
My sister and my wife would bid them welcome, eh!

Cob. Like enough, sir; yet I heard not a word of it.

Kite. No; their lips were seal'd with kisses, and Drown'd in a flood of joy at their arrival,
Had lost its motion, state, and faculty.

Cob. Which of them was't that first kiss'd my wife?
My sister, I should say—my wife, alas!

I fear not her. Ha! who was it, say'st thou?

Cob. By my troth, sir, will you have the truth of it?

Kite. Ay, good Cob, I pray thee heartily.

Cob. Then I am a vagabond, and fitter for Bridewell than your worship's company, if I saw anybody to be kissed, unless they would have kissed the post in the middle of the warehouse; for there
I left them all at their tobacco, with a plague.

Kite. How! were they not gone in, then, ere thou cam'st?

Cob. Oh! no, sir.

Kite. Spite o'the devil! What do I stay here, then? Cob, follow me.

[Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Room in Kitley's house.

Enter DOWNRIGHT and Dame KITELY.

Down. Well, sister, I tell you true; and you'll find it so in the end.

Dame K. Alas! brother, what would you have me to do? I cannot help it. You see my brother brings 'em in here; they are his friends.

Down. His friends! his friends! 'Slud, they do nothing but haunt him up and down, like a sort of unlucky spirits, and tempt him to all manner of villany that can be thought of. Well, by this light, a little thing would make me play the devil with some of 'em. And 'twere not more for your husband's sake, than any thing else, I'd make the house too hot for the best of 'em. They should say, and swear, hell were broken loose ere they went hence. But, by God's will, 'tis nobody's fault but your's; for an' you had done as you might have done, they should have been parboiled and baked too, every mother's son, ere they should ha' come in, e'er a one of 'em.

Dame K. God's my life! did you ever hear the like? What a strange man is this! Could I keep out all them, think you? I should put myself against half a dozen men, should I? Good faith, you'd mad the patientest body in the world to hear you talk so, without any sense or reason.

Enter BRIDGET, Master MATTHEW, WELLBRED, STEPHEN, Young KNO'WELL, Captain BOBADIL, and CASH.

Brid. Servant, in troth, you are too prodigal
Of your wit's treasure, thus to pour it forth
Upon so mean a subject as my worth.

Mat. You say well, mistress; and I mean as well.

Down. Heyday, here is stuff!

Well. Oh! now stand close. Pray heaven she can get him to read; he should do it of his own natural impudence.

Brid. Servant, what is this same, I pray you?

Mat. Marry, an elegy! an elegy! an odd toy—I'll read it, if you please.

Brid. Pray you do, servant.

Down. Oh! here's no foppery. Death! I can endure the stocks better.

Young K. What ails thy brother? Can he not bear the reading of a ballad?

[To WELLBRED.]

Well. Oh! no; a rhyme to him is worse than cheese, or a bagpipe. But mark, you lose the protestation.

Capt. B. Master Matthew, you abuse the expectation of your dear mistress and her fair sister. Fie! while you live, avoid this prolixity.

Mat. I shall, sir. [Reads.]

"Rare creature, let me speak without offence;
Would heav'n my rude words had the influence
To rule thy thoughts, as thy fair looks do mine;
Then shouldst thou be his prisoner, who is thine."

[Master STEPHEN shakes his head.]

Young K. 'Slight, he shakes his head like a bottle, to feel an' there be any brain in it!

Well. Sister, what ha' you here? verses? Pray you, let's see. Who made these verses? They are excellently good.

Mat. Oh! Master Wellbred, 'tis your disposition to say so, sir. They were good i' the morning; I made 'em extempore this morning.

Well. How, extempore?

Mat. I would I might be hanged else; ask Captain Bobadil; he saw me write them at the—the Star yonder.

Step. Cousin, how do you like this gentleman's verses?

Young K. Oh, admirable! the best that ever I heard, coz.

Step. Body o'Caesar! they are admirable! The best that ever I heard, as I am a soldier.

Down. I am vexed; I can hold ne'er a bone of me still! 'Heart, I think they mean to build and breed here.

Well. Sister Kately, I marvel you get you not a servant that can rhyme and do tricks, too.

Down. Oh, monster! Impudence itself! Tricks! Come, you might practise your ruffian tricks somewhere else, and not here, I wuss. This is no tavern, nor drinking-school, to vent your exploits in.

Well. How now! Whose cow has calved?

Down. Marry, that has mine, sir. Nay, boy, never look askance at me for the matter; I'll tell you of it; ay, sir, you and your companions! Mend yourselves, when I ha' done!

Well. My companions?

Down. Yes, sir, your companions; so I say. I am not afraid of you nor them neither, your hangbys here. You must have your poets and your potlings, your soldados and foolados, to follow you up and down the city; and here they must come to domineer and swagger. Sirrah, you ballad-singer, and slops, your fellow there, get you out; get you home; or, by this steel, I'll cut off your ears, and that presently.

Well. 'Slight! stay, and let's see what he dare do. Cut off his ears! cut a whetstone. You are an ass, do you see; touch any man here, and by this hand, I'll run my rapier to the hilts in you.

Down. Yea, that would I fain see, boy. [They all draw, and they of the house part them.]

Dame K. Oh, Jesu! Murder! Thomas! Gasper!

Brid. Help, help! Thomas!

Young K. Gentlemen, forbear, I pray you.

Capt. B. Well, sirrah! you Holofernes! By my hand, I will pink your flesh full of holes with my rapier, for this; I will, by this good heaven. Nay, let him come, gentleman, by the body of St. George, I'll not kill him. [They offer to fight again, and are parted.]

Cash. Hold, hold! good gentlemen.

Down. You whoreson, bragging coistril.

Enter KITELY.

Kite. Why, how now! what's the matter? What's the stir here?

Put up your weapons, and put off this rage.

My wife and sister, they're the cause of this.

What, Thomas; where is the knave?

Cash. Here, sir.

Well. Come, let's go; this is one of my brother's ancient humours, this.

[Ereunt Master MATTHEW, Captain BOBADIL,

Young KNO'WELL, and WELLBRED.

Step. I am glad nobody was hurt by his ancient humour.

Kite. Why, how now, brother; who enforced this brawl?

Down. A sort of lewd rake. And they must come here to read ballads, and roguery, and trash! I'll mar the knot of 'em ere I sleep, perhaps; especially Bob there, he that's all manner of shapes; and songs and sonnets, his fellow. But I'll follow 'em.

[Erit.]

Brid. Brother, indeed you are too violent, Too sudden in your humour.

There was one, a civil gentleman,

And very worthily demean'd himself.

Kite. Oh! that was some love of your's, sister.

Brid. A love of mine? I would it were no worse, brother? You'd pay my portion sooner than you think for.

[Erit.]

Dame K. Indeed, he seemed to be a gentleman of exceeding fair disposition, and of very excellent parts. What a coil and stir is here!

[Erit.]

Kite. Her love, by heav'n! my wife's minion! Death, these phrases are intolerable!

Well, well, well, well, well!

It is too plain, too clear. Thomas, come hither.

What, are they gone?

Cash. Ay, sir, they went in.

My mistress and your sister—

Kite. Are any of the gallants within

Cash. No, sir, they are all gone.

Kite. Art thou sure of it?

Cash. I can assure you, sir.

Kite. What gentleman was it that they praised so, Thomas?

Cash. One, they call him Master Kno'well, a handsome young gentleman, sir.

[much.]

Kite. Ay, I thought so. My mind gave me as I'll die, but they have hid him in the house Somewhere; I'll go and search. Go with me,

Thomas;

Be true to me, and thou shalt find me a master.

[Ereunt.]

SCENE II.—Moorfields.

Enter Young KNO'WELL, WELLBRED, and BRAINWORM.

Young K. Well, Brainworm, perform this business happily, and thou makest a purchase of my love for ever.

Well. I'faith, now let thy spirits use their best faculties; by this time, and at my hand, remember the message to my brother; for there's no other means to start him out of his house.

Brain. I warrant you, sir; fear nothing. I have a nimble soul has waked all forces of my phantasy by this time, and put 'em in true motion. What you have possessed me withal, I'll discharge it amply, sir; make it no question.

[Erit.]

Well. Forth, and prosper, Brainworm. Faith! Ned, how dost thou approve of my abilities in this device?

Young K. Troth, well, howsoever; but it will come excellent if it take.

Well. Take, man! Why, it cannot choose but take, if the circumstances miscarry not. But tell me ingenuously, dost thou affect my sister Bridget, as thou pretendest?

Young K. Friend, am I worthy of belief?

Well. Come, do not protest. In faith, she is a maid of good ornament, and much modesty; and except I conceived very worthily of her, thou shouldst not have her.

Young K. Nay, that I'm afraid will be a question yet, whether I shall have her or no.

Well. 'Slid, thou shalt have her; by this light thou shalt.

Young K. I am satisfied; and do believe thou wilt omit no offered occasion to make my desire complete.

Well. Thou shalt see and know I will not.

[Ereunt.]

Enter FORMAL and KNO'WELL.

For. Was your man a soldier, sir?

Kno. Ay, a knave; I took him begging o'the way, This morning, as I came over Moorfields.

Re-enter BRAINWORM.

Oh! here he is.—You have made fair speed, believe me;

Where i'th name of sloth could you be thus—

Brain. Marry, peace be my comfort, where I thought I should have had little comfort of your worship's service.

Kno. How so?

Brain. Oh, sir! your coming to the city, your entertainment of me, and your sending me to watch—indeed, all the circumstances either of your charge, or any employment, are as open to your son as to yourself.

Kno. How should that be, unless that villain, Have told him of the letter, and discovered

All that I strictly charged him to conceal! 'Tis so!

Brain. I am partly o'that faith; 'tis so, indeed.

Kno. But how should he know you to be my man?

Brain. Nay, sir, I cannot tell; unless it be by the black art! Is not your son a scholar, sir?

Kno. Yes; but I hope his soul is not allied

Unto such hellish practice; if it were,

I had just cause to weep my part in him,

And curse the time of his creation.

But where didst thou find them, Fitz-sword?

Brain. You should rather ask where they found me, sir; for I'll be sworn, I was going along in the street, thinking nothing, when, of a sudden, a voice calls, "Mr. Kno'well's man!" another cries, "soldier!" and then, half a dozen of 'em, till they had called me within a house, where I no sooner came, but out flew all their rapiers at my bosom, with some three or four score oaths to accompany 'em; and all to tell me, I was a dead man if I did not confess where you were, and how I was employed, and about what; which, when they could not get out of me, as I protest they must have dissected me, and made an anatomy of me first, and so I told 'em, they locked me up into a room i'th top of a high house; whence, by great miracle, having a light heart, I slid down by a bottom of packthread into the street, and so escaped. But, sir, thus much I can assure you, for I heard it while I was locked up, there were a great many rich merchants' and brave citizens' wives with 'em at a feast; and your son, Mr. Edward, withdrew with one of 'em, and has 'pointed to meet her anon, at one Cob's house, a water-bearer, that dwells by the wall. Now, there your worship shall be sure to take him; for there he preys, and fail he will not.

[not.

Kno. Nor will I fail to break his match, I doubt Go thou along with Justice Clement's man, [thou? And stay there for me. At one Cob's house say'st Brain. Ay, sir, there you shall have him. [Exit Kno'WELL.] Yes! Invisible! Much wench, or much son! 'Slight! when he has staid there three or four hours, trawling with the expectation of wonders, and at length be delivered of air! Oh! the sport that I should then take to look on him, if I durst! But now I mean to appear no more before him in this shape. I have another trick to act yet. [Aside.] Sir, I make you stay somewhat long.

For. Not a whit, sir.

You have been lately in the wars, sir, it seems?

Brain. Marry have I, sir, to my loss, and expense of all, almost—

For. Troth, sir, I would be glad to bestow a bottle o'you, if it please you to accept it—

Brain. Oh! sir—

For. But to hear the manner of your services and your devices in the wars; they say they be very strange, and not like those a man reads in Roman histories, or sees at Mile-end.

Brain. No, I assure you, sir; why, at any time when it pleases you, I shall be ready to discourse with you all I know—and more too, somewhat.

[Aside.

For. No better time than now, sir. We'll go to the Windmill; there we shall have a cup of neat grist, as we call it. I pray you, sir, let me request you to the Windmill.

Brain. I'll follow you, sir; and make grist o'you, if I have good luck.

[Aside.—Exeunt.

Re-enter Young Kno'WELL, with Master MATTHEW, Captain BOBADIL, and STEPHEN.

Mat. Sir, did your eyes ever taste the like clown of him, where we were to-day, Mr. Wellbred's half-brother? I think the whole earth cannot shew his parallel, by this day-light.

Young K. We are now speaking of him. Captain Bobadil tells me he is fallen foul o'you, too.

Mat. Oh! ay, sir! he threatened me with the bastinado.

Capt. B. Ay, but I think I taught you prevention this morning for that. You shall kill him, beyond question, if you be so generously minded.

Mat. Indeed, it is a most excellent trick.

Capt. B. Oh! you do not give spirit enough to your motion; you are too tardy, too heavy! Oh! it must be done like lightning, boy! Tut! 'tis nothing, an't be not done in a punto.

Young K. Captain, did you ever prove yourself upon any of our masters of defence here?

Mat. Oh, good sir! yes, I hope he has.

Capt. B. I will tell you, sir. They have assaulted me some three, four, five, six of them together, as I have walked alone in divers skirts o'the town, where I have driven them before me the whole length of a street, in the open view of all our gallants, pitying to hurt them, believe me. Yet all this lenity will not overcome their spleen; they will be doing with the pismire, raising a hill a man may spurn abroad with his foot at pleasure. By myself I could have slain them all; but I delight not in murder. I am loath to bear any other than this bastinado for 'em; yet I hold it good policy not to go disarmed; for though I be skilful, I may be oppressed with multitudes.

Young K. Ay, believe me, may you, sir; and, in my conceit, our whole nation should sustain the loss by it, if it were so.

Capt. B. Alas! no. What's a peculiar man to a nation? Not seen.

Young K. Oh! but your skill, sir!

Capt. B. Indeed, that might be some loss; but who respects it? I will tell you, sir, by the way of private, and under seal, I am a gentleman, and live here obscure, and to myself; but were I known to his majesty and the lords, observe me, I would undertake, upon this poor head and life, for the public benefit of the state, not only to spare the entire lives of his subjects in general, but to save the one half, nay, three parts of his yearly charge in holding war, and against what enemy soever. And how would I do it, think you?

Young K. Nay, I know not; nor can I conceive.

Capt. B. Why, thus, sir: I would select nineteen more to myself, throughout the land; gentlemen they should be; of a good spirit, and able constitution; I would choose them by an instinct, a character that I have; and I would teach these nineteen the special rules, as your punto, your reverso, your stoccata, imbroccata, your passada, your montanto; till they could all play very near, or altogether as well as myself. This done, say the enemy were forty thousand strong; we twenty would come into the field the tenth of March, or thereabouts, and we would challenge twenty of the enemy; they could not in their honour refuse us. Well, we would kill them; challenge twenty more, kill them; twenty more, kill them, too; and thus would we kill every man his twenty a-day, that's twenty score; twenty score, that's two hundred; two hundred a day, five days a thousand; forty thousand; forty times five, five times forty; two hundred days kills them all by computation. And this I will venture to my poor gentleman-like carcass to perform, provided there be no treason practised upon us, by fair and discreet manhood; that is, civilly by the sword.

Young K. Why, are you so sure of your hand, Captain, at all times.

Capt. B. Tut! never miss thrust, upon my reputation with you.

Young K. I would not stand in Downright's state then, an' you meet him, for the wealth of any one street in London.

Capt. B. Why, sir, you mistake. If he were here now, by this welkin, I would not draw my weapon on him! Let this gentleman do his mind; but I will bastinado him, by the bright sun, wherever I meet him.

Mat. Faith, and I'll have a fling at him, at my distance.

Enter DOWNRIGHT, walking over the stage.

Young K. God's so! Lookye where he is; yonder he goes.

Down. What peevish luck have I; I cannot meet with these bragging rascals.

Capt. B. It's not he, is it?

Young K. Yes, faith, it is he.

Mat. I'll be hanged, then, if that were he.

Young K. I assure you that was he.

Step. Upon my reputation, it was he.

Capt. B. Had I thought it had been he, he must not have gone so; but I can hardly be induced to believe it was he yet.

Young K. That I think, sir. But see, he is come again.

Re-enter DOWNRIGHT.

Down. Oh! Pharaoh's foot, have I found you? Come, draw; to your tools. Draw, gipsy, or I'll thrash you.

Capt. B. Gentleman of valour, I do believe in thee, hear me—

Down. Draw your weapon, then.

Capt. B. Tall man, I never thought on't till now, body of me! I had a warrant of the peace served on me even now, as I came along, by a water-bearer; this gentleman saw it, Mr. Matthew.

[DOWNRIGHT beats CAPT. BOBADIL; MATTHEW runs away.]

Down. 'Sdeath! you will not draw, then?

Capt. B. Hold, hold! under thy favour, forbear.

Down. Prate again, as you like this, you whoreson foist you. You'll control the point, you? Your consort is gone; had he staid, he had shared with you, sir. [Exit.]

Young K. Twenty, and kill them; twenty more, kill them, too—ha, ha!

Capt. B. Well, gentlemen, bear witness; I was bound to the peace, by this good day.

Young K. No, faith, it's an ill day, Captain, never reckon it other; but say you were bound to the peace, the law allows you to defend yourself; that will prove but a poor excuse.

Capt. B. I cannot tell, sir. I desire good construction, in fair sort. I never sustained the like disgrace, by heaven. Sure, I was struck with a planet.

Step. No, Captain, you was struck with a stick.

Young K. Ay, like enough; I have heard of many that have been beaten under a planet. Go, get you to a surgeon. 'Slid! and these be your tricks, your passados and your montantos, I'll none of them.

Capt. B. I was planet-struck certainly. [Exit.]

Young K. Oh, manners! that this age should bring forth such creatures! that nature should be at leisure to make 'em! Come, coz.

Step. Mass! I'll have this cloak.

Young K. God's will, 'tis Downright's.

Step. Nay, it's mine now; another might have ta'en it up as well as I. I'll wear it, so I will.

Young K. How, an' he see it? He'll challenge it, assure yourself.

Step. Ay, but he shall not ha't; I'll say I bought it.

Young K. Take heed you buy it not too dear, coz. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—A Chamber in Kiteley's House.

Enter KITELEY and CASH.

Kite. Art thou sure, Thomas, we have pried into all and every part throughout the house? Is there no hy-place, or dark corner, has escaped our searches?

Cash. Indeed, sir, none; there's not a hole or nook unsearched by us, from the upper loft unto the cellar.

Kite. They have conveyed him then away, or hid him in some privacy of their own. Whilst we were searching of the dark closet by my sister's chamber, didst thou not think thou heard'st a rustling on the other side, and a soft tread of feet?

Cash. Upon my truth, I did not, sir; or if you did, it might be only the vermin in the wainscot; the house is old, and over-run with 'em.

Kite. It is indeed, Thomas. We should bane these rats. Dost thou understand me? We will—they shall not harbour here; I'll cleanse my house from 'em, if fire or poison can effect it: I will not be tormented thus. They gnaw my brain, and burrow in my heart: I cannot bear it.

Cash. I do not understand you, sir. Good now, what is't disturbs you thus? Pray, be composed. These starts of passion have some cause, I fear, that touches you more nearly.

Kite. Sorely, sorely, Thomas. It cleaves too close to me—oh, me! [Sighs.] Lend me thy arm—so, good Cash.

Cash. You tremble and look pale! Let me call assistance.

Kite. Not for ten thousand worlds! Alas, alas! 'tis not in medicine to give me ease—here, here it lies.

Cash. What, sir?

Kite. Why—nothing, nothing. I am not sick, yet more than dead; I have a burning fever in my mind, and long for that, which, having, would destroy me.

Cash. Believe me, 'tis your fancy's imposition. Shut up your generous mind from such intruders. I'll hazard all my growing favour with you; I'll stake my present, my future welfare, that some base whispering knave—nay, pardon me, sir—hath, in the best and richest soil, sown seeds of rank and evil nature! Oh! my master, should they take root—

[Laughing within.]

Kite. Hark, hark! Dost thou not hear? What think'st thou now? Are they not laughing at me? They are, they are! They have deceived the wittol, and thus they triumph in their infamy. This aggravation is not to be borne. [Laughing again.] Hark, again! Cash, do thou unseen steal in upon 'em, and listen to their wanton conference.

Cash. I shall obey you, though against my will. [Exit.]

Kite. Against his will! Ha! it may be so. He's young, and may be bribed for them; they've various means to draw the unwary in. If it be so, I'm lost, deceived, betrayed, and my bosom, my full-fraught bosom, is unlocked and opened to mockery and laughter! Heaven forbid! He cannot be that viper; sting the hand that raised and cherished him! Were this stroke added, I should be cursed. But it cannot be; no, it cannot be.

Re-enter CASH.

Cash. You are musing, sir. [why—]

Kite. I ask your pardon, Cash. Ask me not I have wronged you, and am sorry. 'Tis gone.

Cash. If you suspect my faith—

Kite. I do not—say no more; and for my sake let it die and be forgotten. Have you seen your mistress, and heard whence was that noise?

Cash. Your brother, Master Wellbred, is with 'em, and I found them throwing out their mirth on a very truly ridiculous subject: it is one Formal, as he styles himself, and he appertains, so he phrases it, to Justice Clement, and would speak with you.

Kite. With me? Art thou sure it is the Justice's clerk? Where is he?

Enter BRAINWORM, as FORMAL.

Who are you, friend?

Brain. An appendix to Justice Clement, vulgarly called his clerk.

Kite. What are your wants with me?

Brain. None.

Kite. Do you not want to speak with me?

Brain. No, but my master does.

Kite. What are the Justice's commands?

Brain. He doth not command, but entreats Master Kite to be with him directly, having matters of some moment to communicate unto him.

Kite. What can it be? Say I'll be with him instantly; and if your legs, friend, go not faster than your tongue, I shall be there before you.

Brain. I will. Vale. [Exit.]

Kite. 'Tis a precious fool, indeed! I must go forth. But first come hither, Thomas: I have admitted thee into the close recesses of my heart, and shewed thee all my frailties, passions, everything.

Be careful of thy promise, keep good watch. Will thou be true, my Thomas?

Cash. As truth's self, sir.

But be assur'd you're heaping care and trouble Upon a sandy base; ill-plac'd suspicion Recoils upon yourself. She's chaste as comely; Believe't she is. Let her not note your humour; Disperse the gloom upon your brow, and be As clear as her unsullied honour.

Kite. I will then, Cash—thou comfort'st me: I'll drive these Fiend-like fancies from me, and be myself again. Think'st thou she has perceiv'd my folly? 'Twere

Happy, if she had not—she has not:

They who know no evil, will suspect none.

Cash. True, sir; nor has your mind a blemish now.

This change has gladden'd me. Here's my mistress, And the rest; settle your reason to accost 'em.

Kite. I will, Cash, I will.

Enter WELLBRED, Dame KITELY, and BRIDGET.

Well. What are you a plotting, brother Kiteley, That thus of late you muse alone, and bear Such weighty care upon your pensive brow?

[Laughs.]

Kite. My care is all for you, good sneering brother,

And well I wish you'd take some wholesome counsel, And curb your headstrong humours; trust me, brother,

You were to blame to raise commotions here, And hurt the peace and order of my house.

Well. No harm done, brother, I warrant you, Since there is no harm done, anger costs A man nothing, and a brave man is never His own man till he be angry. To keep His valour in obscurity, is to keep himself, As it were, in a cloak-bag. What's a brave Musician, unless he play?

What's a brave man, unless he fight?

Dame K. Ay, but what harm might have come of it, brother?

Well. What, school'd on both sides! Prythee, Bridget, save me from the rod and lecture.

[BRIDGET and WELLBRED retire.]

Kite. With what a decent modesty she rates him! My heart's at ease, and she shall see it is. [Aside.]
How art thou, wife? Thou look'st both gay and comely;

In troth, thou dost. I'm sent for out, my dear, And I shall soon return. Indeed, my life, Business that forces me abroad grows irksome. I could content me with less gain and vantage, To have thee more at home, indeed I could.

Dame K. Your doubts, as well as love, may breed these thoughts.

Kite. That jar untunes me. [Aside.]

What dost thou say? Doubt thee?

I should as soon suspect myself. No, no;

My confidence is rooted in thy merit,

So fix'd and settled, that wert thou inclin'd

To masks, to sports, and balls, where lusty youth

Lead up the wanton dance, and the rais'd pulse

Beats quicker measures, yet I could with joy,

With heart's ease and security—not but

I had rather thou shouldst prefer thy home

And me, to boys and such like vanities.

Dame K. But sure, my dear,

A wife may moderately use these pleasures, Which numbers and the time give sanction to, Without the smallest blemish on her name.

Kite. And so she may; and I'll go with thee, child;

I will, indeed; I'll lead thee there myself,

And be the foremost reveller. I'll silence

The sneers of envy, stop the tongue of slander;

Nor will I more be pointed at, as one

Disturb'd with jealousy—

Dame K. Why, were you ever so?

Kite. What?—Ha! never—ha, ha, ha!

She stabs me home. [Aside.] Jealous of thee!

No, do not believe it. Speak low, my love,

Thy brother will overhear us. No, no, my dear,

It could not be, it could not be—for—for—

What is the time now? I shall be too late—

No, no; thou may'st be satisfied
 There's not the smallest spark remaining—
 Remaining! What do I say? There never was,
 Nor can, nor ever shall be—so be satisfied.
 Is Cob within there? Give me a kiss,
 My dear; there, there, now we are reconcil'd—
 I'll be back immediately. Good b'ye, good b'ye!
 Ha, ha! jealous. I shall burst my sides with laughing.

Ha, ha! Cob, where are you, Cob? Ha, ha!

[Exit—WELLBRED and BRIDGET come forward.]

Well. What have you done to make your husband part so merry from you? He has of late been little given to laughter.

Dame K. He laughed, indeed, but seemingly without mirth. His behaviour is new and strange. He is much agitated, and has some whimsy in his head, that puzzles mine to read it.

Well. 'Tis jealousy, good sister; and writ so largely, that the blind may read it; have you not perceived it yet?

Dame K. If I have, 'tis not always prudent that my tongue should betray my eyes; so far my wisdom tends, good brother, and little more I boast. But what makes him ever calling for Cob so? I wonder how can employ him.

Well. Indeed, sister, to ask how he employs Cob, is a necessary question for you that are his wife, and a thing not very easy for you to be satisfied in. But this I'll assure you, Cob's wife is an excellent procurer, sister, and oftentimes your husband haunts her house: marry to what end, I cannot altogether accuse him—imagine you what you think convenient—but I have known fair hides have foul hearts, ere now, sister.

Dame K. Never said you truer than that, brother; so much I can tell you for your learning. Oh, oh! is this the fruits of his jealousy? I thought some game was in the wind, he acted so much tenderness but now; but I'll be quit with him. Thomas!

Re-enter CASH.

Fetch your hat, Thomas, and go with me. [Exit CASH.] I would to fortune I could take him there, I'd return him his own, I warrant him! I'd fit him for his jealousy!

Well. Ha, ha! so e'en let 'em go; this may make sport anon.—What, Brainworm!

Enter BRAINWORM.

Brain. I saw the merchant turn the corner, and come back to tell you all goes well; wind and tide, my master.

Well. But how got'st thou this apparel of the Justice's man?

Brain. Marry, sir, my proper fine penman would needs bestow the grist o'me at the Windmill, to hear some marshal discourse, where I so marshalled him, that I made him drunk with admiration; and because too much heat was the cause of his distemper, I stripped him stark naked as he lay along asleep, and borrowed his suit to deliver this counterfeited message in, leaving a rusty armour, and an old brown bill, to watch him till they return; which shall be, when I have pawned his apparel, and spent the better part of the money, perhaps.

Well. Well, thou art a successful, merry knave, Brainworm; his absence will be subject for more mirth. I pray thee, return to thy young master, and will him to meet me and my sister Bridget at the Tower instantly; for here, tell him, the house is so stored with jealousy, there is no room for love to stand upright in. We must get our fortunes committed to some large prison, say: and then the Tower, I know no better air, nor where the liberty of the house may do us more present service. Away.

[Exit BRAINWORM.]

Brid. What, is this the engine that you told me of? What further meaning have you in the plot?

Well. That you may know, fair sister-in-law, how happy a thing it is to be fair and beautiful.

Brid. That touches not me, brother.

Well. Well, there's a dear and well respected friend of mine, sister, stands very strongly and worthily affected towards you, and hath vowed to inflame whole bonfires of zeal at his heart, in honour of your perfections. I have already engaged my promise to bring you where you shall hear him confirm much more. Ned Kuo'well is the man, sister. There's no exception against the party. What say you, sister? On my soul, he loves you; will you give him this meeting?

Brid. 'Faith, I had very little confidence in my own constancy, brother, if I durst not meet a man; but this motion of your's savours of an old knight adventurer's servant a little too much, methinks.

Well. What's that, sister?

Brid. Marry, of the go-between.

Well. No matter if it did; I would be such an one for my friend. But see, who is returned to hinder us.

Re-enter KITELY.

Kite. What villany is this? Called out on a false message! This was some plot. I was not sent for. Bridget, where's your sister?

Brid. I think she be gone forth, sir.

Kite. How! Is my wife gone forth? Whither, for heaven's sake?

Brid. She's gone abroad with Thomas.

Kite. Abroad with Thomas! Oh! that villain cheats me!

He hath discover'd all unto my wife: [I pray Beast that I was to trust him. [Aside.] Whither, You, went she?

Brid. I know not, sir. [she's gone.]

Well. I'll tell you, brother, whither I suspect

Kite. Whither, good brother? [counsel]

Well. To Cob's house, I believe; but keep my Kite. I will, I will.—To Cob's house! Does she haunt there?

She's gone on purpose now to cuckold me, With that lewd rascal, who, to win her favour, Hath told her all. Why would you let her go? Well. Because she's not my wife; if she were, I'd keep her to her tether.

Kite. So, so! now 'tis plain. I shall go mad With my misfortunes, now they pour in torrents. I'm bruted by my wife, betray'd by my servant, Mock'd at by my relations, pointed at by my neighbours,

Despis'd by myself—There is nothing left now But to revenge myself first, next hang myself; And then—all my cares will be over. [Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—Stocks-market.

Enter Master MATTHEW and Captain BOBADIL.

Mat. I wonder, Captain, what they will say of my going away, eh?

Capt. B. Why, what should they say? but as of a discreet gentleman; quick, wary, respectful of nature's fair lineaments, and that's all.

Mat. Why so? but what can they say of their beating?

Capt. B. A rude part, a touch with soft wood, a kind of gross battery used, lain on strongly, borne most patiently, and that's all. But wherefore do I wake their remembrance? I was fascinated, by Jupiter! fascinated! but I will be unwitched, and re-venged by law.

Mat. Do you hear? Is't not best to get a warrant, and have him arrested, and brought before Justice Clement?

Capt. B. It were not amiss; would we had it!

Mat. Why, here comes his man, let's speak to him.

Capt. B. Agreed. Do you speak.

Enter BRAINWORM, as FORMAL.

Mat. Save you, sir.

Brain. With all my heart, sir.

Mat. Sir, there is one Downright hath abused this gentleman and myself, and we determine to make ourselves amends by law; now if you would do us the favour to procure a warrant to bring him before your master, you shall be well considered of, I assure you, sir.

Brain. Sir, you know my service is my living; such favours as these, gotten of my master, is his only preferment, and therefore you must consider me, as I may make benefit of my place.

Mat. How is that, sir?

Brain. 'Faith, sir, the thing is extraordinary, and the gentleman may be of great account. Yet, be what he will, if you will lay me down a brace of angels in my hand, you shall have it, otherwise not.

Mat. How shall we do, Captain? He asks a brace of angels. You have no money. [Apart to Capt. B.]

Capt. B. Not a cross, by fortune. [Apart.]

Mat. Nor I, as I am a gentleman, but two-pence left of my two shillings in the morning for wine and radish. Let's find him some pawn. [Apart.]

Capt. B. Pawn! We have none to the value of his demand. [Apart.]

Mat. Oh! yes, I can pawn my ring here. [Apart.]

Capt. B. And, harkye, he shall have my trusty Toledo, too; I believe I shall have no service for it to-day. [Apart.]

Mat. Do you hear, sir? We have no store of money at this time, but you shall have good pawns. Look you, sir; I will pledge this ring, and that gentleman his Toledo, because we would have it despatched.

Brain. I am content, sir; I will get you the warrant presently. What's his name, say you? Downright?

Mat. Ay, ay, George Downright.

Brain. Well, gentlemen, I'll procure you the warrant presently. But who will you have to serve it?

Mat. That's true, Captain; that must be considered.

Capt. B. Body o'me, I know not! 'Tis service of danger!

Brain. Why, you were best get one of the varlets o'the city; a sergeant; I'll appoint you one, if you please.

Mat. Will you, sir? Why, we can wish no better.

Capt. B. We'll leave it to you, sir.

[Exit with MATTHEW.]

Brain. This is rare! Now will I go pawn this cloak of the Justice's man's, at the broker's for a varlet's suit, and be the varlet myself, and so get money on all sides. [Exit.]

- SCENE II.—The Street before Cob's house.

Enter KNO'WELL.

Kno. Oh! here it is; I have found it now. Ho! who is within here? [Tib appears at the window.]

Tib. I am within, sir. What's your pleasure?

Kno. To know who is within besides yourself.

Tib. Why, sir, you are no constable, I hope?

Kno. Oh! fear you the constable? Then I doubt not you have some guests within deserve that fear. I'll fetch him straight.

Tib. For heaven's sake, sir—

Kno. Go to! Come, tell me, is not young Kno'well here?

Tib. Young Kno'well! I know none such, sir, o'my honesty.

Kno. Your honesty, dame! It flies too lightly from you. There is no way but fetch the constable

Tib. The constable! the man is mad, I think.

Enter CASH and Dame KITELY.

Kno. Oh! this is the female copesmate of my son. Now shall I meet him straight. [Aside.]

Dame K. Knock hard, Thomas.

Cash. Ho, good wife!

Tib. Why, what's the matter with you? [door?]

Dame K. Why, woman, grieves it you to ope the Belike you get something to keep it shut.

Tib. What mean these questions, pray you?

Dame K. So strange you make it! Is not my husband here?

Kno. Her husband [Aside.]

Dame K. My tried and faithful husband, Master Kitley.

Tib. I hope he needs not be tried here.

Dame K. Come hither, Cash. I see my turtle coming to his haunts. Let us retire. [They retire.]

Kno. This must be some device to mock me withal.

Soft—who is this? Oh! 'tis my son disguised.

I'll watch him and surprise him

Enter KITELY, muffled in a cloak.

Kite. 'Tis truth, I see: there she skulks. But I will fetch her from her hold—I will—I tremble so, I scarce have power to do the justice Her infamy demands.

[As KITELY goes forward, Dame KITELY and KNO'WELL lay hold of him.]

Kno. Have I trapped you, youth? You cannot escape me now. [market?]

Dame K. Oh, sir! have I forestall'd your honest Found your close walks? You stand amaz'd Now, do you? Ah! hide, hide your face for shame! I'faith, I am glad I've found you out at last.

Kno. What mean you, woman? Let go your hold. I see the counterfeit. I am his father, And claim him as my own.

Kite. [Discovers himself.] I am your cuckold, and claim my vengeance.

Dame K. What, do you wrong me, and insult me too?

Thou faithless man!

Kite. Out on thy more than strumpet's impudence! Steal'st thou thus to thy haunts? And have I taken Thy bawd and thee, and thy companion, This hoary-headed lecher, this old goat,

Close at your villany, and wouldst thou excuse it
With this stale harlot's jest, accusing me?
Oh! old incontinent, dost thou not shame
To have a mind so hot, and to entice
And feed the enticement of a lustful woman?

Dame K. Out! I defy thee, thou dissembling wretch!

Kite. Defy me, strumpet! Ask thy pander, here;
Can he deny it, or that wicked elder?

Kno. Why, hear you, sir—

Cash. Master, 'tis in vain to reason while these passions blind you. I'm grieved to see you thus.

Kite. Tut, tut! never speak; I see through every Veil you cast upon your treachery; but I have Done with you, and root you from my heart for ever. For you, sir, thus I demand my honour's due; Resolv'd to cool your lust, or end my shame.

[Draws.
Kno. What lunacy is this? Put up your sword, and undeceive yourself. No arm that e'er poised weapon can affright me; but I pity folly, nor cope with madness.

Kite. I will have proofs—I will—so you, good wife-bawd, Cob's wife; and you, that make your husband such a monster; and you, young pander, an old cuckold-maker; I'll ha' you every one before the justice. Nay, you shall answer it; I charge you go. Come forth, thou bawd. [Goes into the house, and brings out Tib.]

Kno. Marry, with all my heart, sir; I go willingly. Though I do taste this as a trick put on me, To punish my impertinent search, and justly; And half forgive my son for the device.

Kite. Come, will you go?

Dame K. Go, to thy shame believe it. [betide,

Kite. Though shame and sorrow hath my heart Come on—I must and will be satisfied. [Ereunt.

SCENE III.—Stocks-market.

Enter BRAINWORM.

Brain. Well, of all my disguises yet, now am I most like myself, being in this sergeant's gown. A man of my present profession never counterfeits till he lays hold upon a debtor, and says he 'rests him; for then he brings him to all manner of unrest. A kind of little kings we are, bearing the diminutive of a mace, made like a young artichoke, that always carries pepper and salt in itself. Well, I know not what danger I undergo by this exploit; pray heaven, I come well off!

Enter Captain BOBADIL and Master MATTHEW.

Mat. See, I think yonder is the varlet, by his gown. 'Save you, friend; are not you here by appointment of Justice Clement's man?

Brain. Yes, an' please you, sir, he told me two gentlemen had willed him to procure a warrant from his master, which I have about me, to be served on one Downright.

Mat. It is honestly done of you both; and see where the party comes you must arrest. Serve it upon him quickly, before he be aware.

Enter Master STEPHEN, in Downright's cloak.

Capt. B. Bear back, Master Matthew.

Brain. Master Downright, I arrest you i'the queen's name, and must carry you before a justice, by virtue of this warrant.

Step. Me, friend; I am no Downright, I. I am Master Stephen; you do not well to arrest me, I tell you truly. I am in nobody's bonds or books, I would you should know it. A plague on you heartily, for making me thus afraid before my time.

Brain. Why, now you are deceived, gentlemen!

Capt. B. He wears such a cloak, and that deceived us. But see, here he comes, indeed! This is he, officer.

Enter DOWNRIGHT.

Down. Why, how now, seignior Gull? Are you turned filcher of late? Come, deliver my cloak.

Step. Your cloak, sir! I bought it even now in open market.

Brain. Master Downright, I have a warrant I must serve upon you, procured by these two gentlemen.

Down. These gentlemen! These rascals!

Brain. Keep the peace, I charge you in her majesty's name.

Down. I obey thee. What must I do, officer?

Brain. Go before Master Justice Clement, to answer what they can object against you, sir. I will use you kindly, sir.

Mat. Come, let's before, and make the Justice, Captain— [Exit.

Capt. B. The varlet's a tall man, before heaven! [Exit.

Down. Gull, you'll gi' me my cloak?

Step. Sir, I bought it, and I'll keep it.

Down. You will?

Step. Ay, that I will.

Down. Officer, there's thy fee; arrest him.

Brain. Master Stephen, I must arrest you.

Step. Arrest me! I scorn it; there, take your cloak, I'll none on't.

Down. Nay, that shall not serve your turn now, sir. Officer, I'll go with thee to the Justice's. Bring him along.

Step. Why, is not here your cloak; what would you have?

Down. I'll ha' you answer it, sir.

Brain. Sir, I'll take your word, and this gentleman's too, for his appearance.

Down. I'll ha' no words taken. Bring him along.

Brain. [Aside.] So, so, I have made a fair mash on't.

Step. Must I go?

Brain. I know no remedy, Master Stephen.

Down. Come along before me here. I do not love your hanging-look behind.

Step. Why, sir, I hope you cannot hang me for it. Can he, fellow?

Brain. I think not, sir. It is but whipping matter, sure!

Step. Why, then, let him do his worst, I am resolute. [Ereunt.

SCENE IV.—A Hall in Justice Clement's House.

Enter Justice CLEMENT, KNO'WELL, KITELY, DAME KITELY, TIB, CASH, COB, and Servants.

Just. C. Nay, but stay, stay, give me leave. My chair, sirrah. You, Master Kno'well, say you went thither to meet your son?

Kno. Ay, sir.

Just. C. But who directed you thither?

Kno. That did mine own man, sir.

Just. C. Where is he?

Kno. Nay, I know not now; I left him with your clerk, and appointed him to stay for me.

Just. C. My clerk! About what time was this?

Kno. Marry, between one and two, as I take it.

Just. C. And what time came my man with the false message to you, Master Kately?

Kite. After two, sir.

Just. C. Very good; but, Mrs. Kately, how chance it that you were at Cob's, eh?

Dame K. An' please you, sir, I'll tell you. My brother Wellbred told me, that Cob's house was a suspected place—

Just. C. So it appears, methinks: but on.

Dame K. And that my husband used thither daily.

Just. C. No matter, so he used himself well, mistress.

Dame K. True, sir; but you know what grows by such haunts, oftentimes.

Just. C. I see rank fruits of a jealous brain, Mistress Kately. But did you find your husband there, in that case, as you suspected?

Kite. I found her there, sir.

Just. C. Did you so? That alters the case. Who gave you knowledge of your wife's being there?

Kite. Marry, that did my brother Wellbred.

Just. C. How! Wellbred first tell her, then tell you after! Where is Wellbred?

Kite. Gone with my sister, sir, I know not whither.

Just. C. Why, this is a mere trick, a device; you are gulled in this most grossly, all! Alas, poor wench! wert thou suspected for this?

Tib. Yes, an't please you.

Just. C. I smell mischief here; plot and contrivance, Master Kately. However, if you will step into the next room with your wife, and think coolly of matters, you'll find some trick has been played you. I fear there have been jealousies on both parts, and the wags have been merry with you.

Kite. I begin to feel it: I'll take your counsel. Will you go in, dame?

Dame K. I will have justice, Mr. Kately.

[Exit with KITELY.]

Just. C. You will be a woman, Mrs. Kately, that I see. How now, what's the matter?

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Sir, there's a gentleman i'the court without desires to speak with your worship.

Just. C. A gentleman! What is he?

Serv. A soldier, sir, he says.

Just. C. A soldier! My sword, quickly. A soldier speak with me! Stand by; I will end your matters anon. Let the soldier enter. Now, sir, what ha' you to say to me?

Enter Capt. BOBADIL and Master MATTHEW.

Capt. B. By your worship's favour—

Just. C. Nay, keep out, sir, I know not your pretence; you send me word, sir, you are a soldier? Why, sir, you shall be answered here; here be them that have been among soldiers. Sir, your pleasure?

Capt. B. Faith! sir, so it is: this gentleman and myself have been most uncivilly wronged and beaten by one Downright, a coarse fellow about the town here; and, for my own part, I protest, being a man in no sort given to this filthy humour of quarrelling, he hath assaulted me in the way of my peace; despoiled me of mine honour; disarmed me of my weapons; and rudely laid me along in the open streets, when I not so much as once offered to resist him.

Just. C. Oh, God's precious! is this the soldier? Lie there, my sword, 'twill make him swoon, I fear; he is not fit to look on't, that will put up a blow.

Mat. An't please your worship, he was bound to the peace.

Just. C. Why, an' he were, sir, his hands were not bound, were they?

Serv. There's one of the varlets of the city, sir, has brought two gentlemen here; one upon your worship's warrant.

Just. C. My warrant?

Serv. Yes, sir; the officer says, procured by these two.

Just. C. Bid him come in. Set by this picture. What, Mr. Downright, are you brought at Mr. Freshwater's suit here?

Enter DOWNRIGHT, Master STEPHEN, and BRAINWORM.

Down. I'faith, sir! And here's another brought at my suit.

Just. C. What are you, sir?

Step. A gentleman, sir. Oh! uncle.

Just. C. Uncle! Who, Master Kno'well?

Kno. Ay, sir, this is a wise kinsman of mine.

Step. Uncle, I am wronged here monstrously; he charges me with stealing of his cloak; and would I might never stir, if I did not find it in the street by chance.

Down. Oh! did you find it, now? You said you bought it ere-while.

Step. And you said I stole it. Nay, now my uncle is here, I'll do well enough with you.

Just. C. Well, let this breathe awhile. You that have cause to complain there, stand forth. Had you my warrant for this gentleman's apprehension?

Capt. B. Ay, an't please your worship.

Just. C. Nay, do not speak in passion so. Where had you it?

Capt. B. Of your clerk, sir.

Just. C. That's well, an' your clerk can make warrants, and my hand not at'em! Where is the warrant? Officer, have you it?

[Capt. B. and MATTHEW steal off.]

Brain. No, sir; your worship's man, Master Formal, bid me do it for these gentlemen, and he would be my discharge.

Just. C. Why, Master Downright, are you such a novice to be served, and never see the warrant?

Down. Sir, he did not serve it on me.

Just. C. No; how then?

Down. Marry, sir, he came to me, and said he must serve it, and he would use me kindly, and so—

Just. C. Oh, God's pity! was it so, sir? He must serve it! Give me a warrant; I must serve one, too. You knave, you slave, you rogue! do you say you must, sirrah? Away with him to gaol. I'll teach you a trick for your must, sir.

Brain. Good sir, I beseech you, be good to me.

Just. C. Tell him he shall to the gaol; away with him, I say.

Brain. Ay, sir, if you will commit me, it shall be for committing more than this. I will not lose by my travel any grain of my fame certain.

[Throws off his disguise.]

Just. C. How is this?

Kno. My man, Brainworm!

Step. Oh! yes, uncle, Brainworm has been with my cousin Edward and I all this day.

Just. C. I told you all there was some device.

Brain. Nay, excellent Justice, since I have laid myself thus open to you, now stand strong for me, both with your sword and your balance.

Just. C. Body o'me! a merry knave! Give me a bowl of sack. [A Servant brings it him.] If he belongs to you, Master Kno'well, I bespeak your patience.

Brain. That is it I have most need of. Sir, if you'll pardon me only, I'll glory in all the rest of my exploits.

Kno. Sir, you know I love not to have my favours come hard from me. You have your pardon; though I suspect you shrewdly for being of counsel with my son against me.

Brain. Yes, 'faith! I have, sir; though you retained me doubly this morning for yourself; first, as Brainworm; after, as Fitz-sword. I was your reformed soldier. 'Twas I sent you to Cob's upon the errand without end.

Kno. Is it possible? Or that thou shouldst disguise thyself so as I should not know thee?

Brain. Oh! sir, this has been the day of my metamorphoses; it is not that shape alone that I have run through to-day. I brought Master Kiteley a message, too, in the form of Master Justice's man here, to draw him out o'the way, as well as your worship; while Master Wellbred might make a conveyance of Mistress Bridget to my young master.

Just. C. But, I pray thee, what hast thou done with my man, Formal?

Brain. 'Faith! sir, after some ceremony past, as making him drunk, first with story, and then with wine, but all in kindness, and stripping him to his shirt, I left him in that cool vein, departed, sold your worship's warrant to these two, pawned his livery for that varlet's gown to serve it in; and thus have brought myself, by my activity, to your worship's consideration.

Just. C. And I will consider thee in a cup of sack. Here's to thee; [drinks] which having drank off, this is my sentence, pledge me. Thou hast done, or assisted to nothing, in my judgment, but deserves to be pardoned for the wit o'the offence. Go into the next room; let Master Kiteley into this whimsical business; and if he does not forgive thee, he has less mirth in him than an honest man ought to have. [Exit BRAINWORM.] Call Master Kiteley and his wife there.

Re-enter KITELEY and Dame KITELEY.

Did not I tell you there was a plot against you? Did not I smell it out, as a wise magistrate ought? Have not you traced, have you found it, eh! Master Kiteley?

Kite. I have; I confess my folly, and own I have deserved what I have suffered for it. The trial has been severe, but it is past. All I have to ask now is, that as my folly is cured, and my persecutors forgiven, my shame may be forgotten.

Just. C. That will depend upon yourself, Master Kiteley; do not you yourself create the food for mischief, and the mischievous will not prey upon you. But come, let a general reconciliation go round, and let all discontents be laid aside. You, Mr. Down-right, put off your anger; you, Master Kno'well, your cares; and do you, Master Kiteley and your wife, put off your jealousies. [wife;]

Kite. Sir, thus they go from me: kiss me, my See what a drove of horns fly in the air, Wing'd with my cleansed and my credulous breath; Watch 'em, suspicious eyes, watch where they fall; See, see, on heads that think they've none at all. Oh! what a plenteous world of this will come, When air rains horns, all may be sure of some.

[Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The outside of the gate of Bruges.
Public-house on one side, with the sign of the "Right heir."

HIGGIN, PRIG, FERRET, and other Beggars discovered as having been drinking at a table.

GLEE AND CHORUS.

Well, brothers, our merry old king is dead;
What matters? we'll soon have another instead:

He would not have cried
Had you or I died.

Then mourn him no longer, but merrily sing,
Rest, rest to the bones of our merry old king.

Drain the can, brother;
Fill up another;
Drink till our eyes with tears shall swell;
Tears of brandy alone:
And the monarch that's gone
Shall be wept in the liquor he lov'd so well.

Hig. Well said, my masters, peace be to his rags!
His was a gold and silver reign; he, tyrant-like,
Did never force away your hens and bacon
When ye had ventur'd for't.

Prig. And in return
We've lent him Christian burial; in good sooth,
That's more than follows on your soldier's end.

Fer. The chance was his.

Hig. Ay, marry, was't. But mark,
The chance that laid him low did make him king,
And yet may crown us, too.

Prig. So't be in right
Of our old custom and election—law.

Hig. True, Prig; 'tis fit we do observe the laws.
Here is the table doth exact from all
A strict obedience, or expulsion. First,
Be perfect in your crutches and your feign'd hurts,
Then your torn passports; with the learned ways
To stammer and be dumb, and blind and lame.

Prig. Ay, and shed tears to move compassion.

Fer. Are not the halting paces all set down?

Hig. All in the learned language. Brother—

Prig. Peace! [Boors call from behind.
To your postures.

Enter three or four Boors, with pipes.

1 Boor. What, ho! mine host with the big belly!
beer!

Stark English beer! Well met, my merry souls.
What! your trade thrives, methinks, since Wolfort reigns

O'er prostrate Flanders, in despite of Bruges!
Your state doth grow in numbers; marry, why?
He now thrives best who hath the least to lose.

Hig. Bless you, masters, we suffer with the times.

2 Boor. Come, landlord, beer.

Enter Landlord from the house, with beer.

Land. Here's o'the right sort. [Florez.

1 Boor. Then here's to the right heir—the lost earl
Who is old Clause?
He gives respect and countenance to beggary;

An' ye make him your king, I'd call myself his subject. [eh!]

Hig. What, old solemnity, our grey-beard bishop?
Trig. See, here he comes!

Enter CLAUDE.

I Boor. Good morrow, worthy Claude:

How fares it with ye, man?

Claude. Not better than the times
Give token of: but for old Bruges here,
Whose charitable sons still feed our wants,
We had long fled this bleeding land,
Where tyrants do make beggars of ye all. [more—
I Boor. There thou say'st well! Our nobles are no
Our cities ruin'd, and the great wealth of Flanders
Center'd in Bruges. She alone defends
Her rights and liberty 'gainst Wolfort's power.
Here's to her burgomaster, old Vandunke.

[Beggars and Boors drink o' VANDUNKER.]

Claude. I will be with you straight; but first must hence

Awhile into the town. We'll meet anon. [Exit.

Hig. Let's forward then. Our doxies do repose
Under yon trees. Go some, and call them hither,
And then trudge gaily home to Beggar's Bush.

GLEE.

Men. Come, dories, come. The cheerful day
Is bright, and winds are hush.

Enter Women.

Women. Then take thy staff, and troll the lay,
And trudge to Beggar's Bush.
Our welcome home, a blithe one, too,
The thrush's song shall be;
And never duelt a merrier crew
Beneath the greenwood tree. [Ereunt.

SCENE II.—Presence-chamber of the Earl of Flanders.

Enter HUBERT disarmed and guarded, met by WOLFORT and train.

Wolf. What, Hubert stealing from me? Who disarm'd him?

'Twas more than I commanded; take your sword,
I am best guarded with it in your hand;
I've seen you use it nobly.

Hub. And will turn it
On my own bosom, ere it shall be drawn
Unworthily or rudely.

Wolf. Would you leave me
Without a farewell, Hubert? Fly a friend,
Unwearing in his study to advance you?
Who ever yet arriv'd to any grace,
Reward, or trust from me, but his approaches
Were by your fair reports of him prefer'd?
Nay, what is more, I've made myself your servant
In making you the master of those secrets, [me:]
Which not the rack of conscience could draw from Nor I, when I ask'd mercy, trust my pray'rs with.
Yet, after these assurances of love,
These ties and bonds of friendship, to forsake me!
Forsake me as an enemy! Come, you must Give me a reason.

Hub. Sir, and so I will,
If I may do't in private; and you hear it.

Wolf. All leave the room. [Ereunt Guards, &c.
You have your will; now speak,
And use the liberty of our first friendship.

Hub. Friendship! When you prov'd traitor first,
that vanish'd;
Nor do I owe you any thought but hate.

I know my flight hath forfeited my head,
And so I make you first to understand
What a strange monster you have made yourself:
I welcome it.

Wolf. To me this is strange language.

Hub. To you! Why, what are you?

Wolf. Your prince and master

The earl of Flanders.

Hub. By a proper title!

Rais'd to it by cunning, circumvention, force,
Blood, and proscriptions.

Wolf. And in all this wisdom

Had I not reason,—when the protector, Gerrard,
Who underhand had by his ministers
Detracted my great actions, made my faith
And loyalty suspected? in which failing,
He sought my life by practice.

Hub. With what forehead

Do you speak this to me? Who, as I know't,
Must and will say, 'tis false.

Wolf. Ha! my guard there. [hear,

Hub. You bade me speak, and promis'd you would
Which I now say you shall: not a sound more;
For I, that am contemner of mine own,
Am master of your life; then here's a sword
Between you and all aids: although you blind
The credulous beast, the multitude, you
Pass not these untruths on me.

Wolf. How! untruths?

Hub. Ay, and it is favourable language;
They'd been in a mean man lies and foul ones.
Were not those rumours,
Of being call'd unto your trial, spread
By your own followers? who, being suborn'd,
Came forth and took their oaths they had been hir'd
By Gerrard to your murder: this once heard
And easily believ'd, your well-taught slaves
Snatch'd hastily their arms, and barbarously kill'd
Such as were servants, or thought friends, to Gerrard,
Vowing the like to him.

Wolf. Will you yet end?

Hub. But he with his son Florez, (the true heir
By right unto this country from his mother,)
Forsook the city, and by secret ways,
As you give out, and we would gladly have't,
Escap'd their fury; though 'tis more than fear'd
They fell among the rest. Your cruelties since
So far transcend your former bloody ills,
As if, compar'd, they only would appear
Essays of mischief,—do not stop your ears,
More are behind yet.

Wolf. Repeat them not.

Hub. A prince in nothing but your princely lusts
And boundless rapines.

Wolf. Hold, I beseech you;

Thou art to me in this a greater tyrant
Than e'er I was to any.

Hub. I end thus

The general grief. Now to my private wrong:
The loss of Gerrard's daughter, Jaculin,
The hop'd for partner of my lawful bed,
Your cruelty hath frighted from mine arms.
Think you that I had reason now to leave you?
My life is irksome; here securely take it,
And do me but this fruit of all your friendship,
That I may die by you, and not your hangman.

Wolf. Oh! Hubert, these your words and reasons have

As well drawn drops of blood from my griev'd heart,
As from mine eyes these tears! Can you but think
Where Gerrard is, or your lost love, or Florez,
Whom in his infancy—

Hub. You stole; and since
Have kept conceal'd, the better to maintain
The usurpation of his seat.

Wolf. By heav'n!
I stole him not, nor know I where he is,
Nor if he lives; soon after my return
From Brabant, whither I was sent to treat
About a future match with our young earl,
He was at that time missing, and remains
Unheard of to this hour; if you can find him,
I will resign the earldom.

Hub. Sir, do not abuse

My aptness to believe.

Wolf. Suspect not you
A faith that's built upon so true a sorrow.
Make your own terms, ask for them all conditions
My power can grant, or your suspicion prompt.
Hemskirke, the partner of my secret'st councils,
Shall journey with you to this wish'd discovery.
I have of late receiv'd intelligence,
That some of Gerrard's friends are 'bout Bruges
To be found; which I did then interpret
The cause of that town's standing out against me.
But now am glad, it may direct your purpose
Of giving them their safety, and me peace.

Hub. Be constant to your promise, and you have it.

Wolf. Distrust me not; and prosp'rous be your search.

[Exit HUBERT.]

Let me but have them once within my grasp,
Their blood shall write the warrant of my peace.

[Exit.]

SCENE III.—A Street or Square in Bruges.

Enter three Merchants.

1 Mer. 'Tis much that you deliver of this Goswin.

2 Mer. He bears himself with such a confidence
As if he were the master of the sea,
And not a wind upon the sailor's compass
But from one point or other were his factor,
To bring him in the best commodities
Merchants e'er ventur'd for.

3 Mer. 'Tis strange!

2 Mer. Yet does he still continue a good man;
To doubt him would be held an injury,
Or rather, malice, with the best that traffic;
Yet this in him deserves the least of wonder,
Compar'd with other his peculiar fashions:
Is there a virgin of good fame wants dower,
He is a father to her: or soldier
That in his country's service, from the war
Hath brought home only scars and want, his house
Receives him, and relieves him with that care
As if what he possess'd had been laid up
For such good uses, and he steward on't.

1 Mer. I would not wish a better man to deal with.

2 Mer. Ne'er doubt it; he's your man. See, here he comes!

Enter GOSWIN, speaking to a Servant.

Gos. From England, said ye? bid him be welcome to my house.

[Exit Servant.]

2 Mer. Save you, Master Goswin!

Gos. Good day to all!

[dities.]

1 Mer. We bring you the refusal of more commo-
Gos. Are you the owner of the ship that last night put into the harbour?

1 Mer. Both of the ship and lading.

Gos. What's the freight?

3 Mer. Rich cloth of gold, brought from Cambal.

Gos. Some two hours hence I'll come aboard.

1 Mer. The gunner shall speak you welcome.

Gos. I'll not fail.

3 Mer. Good morrow!

[Exit with 1 Mer

2 Mer. Have you bethought ye further, sir,
On what I am to part with?

[prus,

Gos. I take it at your own rate, your wine of Cy-
But for the rest, I cannot save in them.

2 Mer. Make me offer of something near the price
That may assure me, you can deal for them.

Gos. And if I could,

I would not do't with too much loss.

[cheap.

2 Mer. 'Tis a rich lading; you know they are so

Gos. For which I were your chapman, but I am
Already out of cash.

[Going.

2 Mer. I'll give you day.

[Following him.]

Gos. Why, look you, there is now in prison

And at your suit, a pirate; and past hope

To live a week, if you should prosecute

What you can prove against him: set him free,

And you shall have your money to a stiver,

And early payment.

2 Mer. This is above wonder!

A merchant of your rank, that have at sea

So many bottoms in the danger of

These water thieves, should be a means to save 'em,

And stay the hand of justice that is ready

To fall on them.

Gos. You mistake me,

If you think I would cherish in this captain

The wrong he did to you, or any man.

But I was lately with him, being assur'd

A braver fellow never put from shore.

I read his letters granted from this state.

Since want of what he could not live without

Compell'd him to the pirate act he did,

I pity his misfortunes; and to work you

To some compassion of them, I come up

To your own price. Save him, the goods are mine;

If not, seek elsewhere; I'll not deal for them.

2 Mer. Well, sir, for your love, I will once be led
To change my purpose.

Gos. For your own profit rather.

2 Mer. I'll presently make means for his discharge.

[Exit.]

Gos. Heaven grant my ships a safe return before
The day of this great payment, as they are Expected hourly in port; my credit yet
Stands good with all the world.

Enter GERRARD.

Ger. Bless my good master!

The prayers of your poor beadsman ever shall

Be sent up for you.

Gos. God o' mercy, Clause!

There's something to put thee in mind hereafter
To think of me.

Ger. May He that gave it you,

Reward you for it with increase, good master!

Gos. I thrive the better for thy prayers.

Ger. I hope so;

For that I have fed upon your bounties,

And by the fire of your bless'd charity warm'd me:

And yet, good master, pardon that I'm bold

To make one suit more to you.

Gos. What is't? say on.

Ger. 'Tis not for money,

[me.

Nor clothes, good master; but your good word for

Gos. That thou shalt have, Clause; for I think thee honest.

[trouble

Ger. To-morrow, then, dear master, take the

Of walking early unto Beggar's Bush;

And, as you see me, among others, brethren

In my affliction, when you are demanded

Which you like best amongst us, point out me,
And then pass by, as if you knew me not.

Gos. But what will that advantage thee?

Ger. Oh! much, sir;

'Twill give me the pre-eminence of the rest,
Make me a king among 'em.

At your better leisure,
I will inform you further of the good
It may do to me.

Gos. 'Troth! thou mak'st a wonder:

Have you a king and commonwealth among you?

Ger. We have. And there are states are govern'd worse.

Gos. Ambition among beggars!

Ger. Many great ones

Do part with half their estates to have the place,
To cringe and beg in the first file, master.
Shall I be so bound unto your furtherance
In my petition?

Gos. That thou shalt not miss of,
Nor any worldly care make me forget it.
I will be early there. [Exit.]

Ger. Heaven guard my master! as it surely will,
To wrest the bloody sword from Wolfort's grasp,
And save himself the land he's born to rule.

My friends, ere long, shall see their long-lost prince;
And Flanders, to the latest ages shew,
A merchant's still the tyrant's deadliest foe. [Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.

HIGGIN, FERRET, PRIG, JACULIN, CLAUSE, SNAP,
GINKES, and other Beggars discovered.

Hig. Come, princes of the ragged regiment;
You o' the blood; what title e'er you bear,
I speak to all that stand in fair election
For the proud diadem of king of beggars.
Higgin, your orator, doth beseech you
All to stand forth, and put yourselves in rank,
That the first single comer may at view
Make a free choice.

Prig. First put a sentinel.

Hig. Thanks to my lord. The word's Fumbumbis.
[Exit SNAP.]

Per. Well; pray, my masters all, that Ferret be chosen:

You're like to have a mercifui mild priuce of me.

Prig. A very tyrant, I; an arrant tyrant,
If e'er I come to reign; therefore, look to't,
Except you do provide me mum enough,
And beer to booze with. I must have my capons,
And ducklings in the season, and fat chickens,
Or straight I seize on all your privilege,
Call in your crutches, wooden legs, false arms,
All shall be escheated; and then, someone cold night
I'll watch you, what old barn you go to roost in,
And there I'll smother you all i'th' musty hay.

Hig. Whew! This is tyrant-like, indeed.

Enter SNAP, preceding HUBERT and HEMSKIRKE, in cloaks.

Snap. Fumbumbis!

Prig. To your postures. Arm.

Hub. Yonder's the town, I see it.

Hig. Bless your good worships!

Per. One small piece of money.

Ginkes. Amongst us all, poor wretches!

Prig. Blind and lame!

Hig. Pitiful worships!

Snap. One little stiver.

Prig. Here be seven of us.

Hig. Seven, good masters! Oh! remember seven!
Seven blessings 'gainst seven deadly sins!

Prig. And seven sleepers.

Hems. There's, amongst you all.

Per. Heaven reward you!

Hig. The prince of pity bless thee!

Hub. Do I see right? or is't my fancy?

Sure, 'tis her face. Come hither, pretty maid.

Jac. What would you? Can you keep a secret?
You look as though you could. I'll tell you. Hush!

SONG.—JACULIN.

In ev'ry woodland, dale, and bower,

The fragrant roses blossom fair;

But where's the youth shall cull each flower,

To braid a garland for my hair?

Oh! he is far, far away,

And he knows not where I stray;

And should he e'er return

To his love, I'll answer nay.

My love in fight shall meet his doom

Or for some fairer maiden sigh;

And with the rose's with'ring bloom,

My hopeless, hopeless heart shall die.

Hub. Her voice, too, says the same! but, for my head,

I would not that her manners were so chang'd.

Hear me, thou honest fellow; what's this maiden,

That lives amongst you here?

Snap. Ao, ao, ao!

Hub. How! Nothing but signs? This is strange!

I would fain have it her—but not her thus.

Hig. He is deaf and dumb. [Stutters.]

Hub. 'Slid! they did all speak plain enough e'en
now.

Dost thou know this same maid?

Prig. She was born at the barn, yonder, [Stutters.]
By Beggar's Bush. Her name is—

Hig. So was her mother's, too. [Beggars retire.]

Hub. I must be better informed than by this way.

Here was another face, too, that I mark'd,

Of the old man's; I will come here again.

Protect us, our disguise now: pr'ythee, Hemskirke,

If we be taken, how dost thou imagine

This town will use us, that hath so long stood

Out against Wolfort?

Hems. Even to hang us forth

Upon their walls a sunning, to make crows' meat.

If I were not assur'd o' the burgomaster,

And had a pretty excuse to see a niece there,

I should scarce venture.

Hub. Come, 'tis now too late

To look back at the ports: good luck, and enter.

[Exit with HEMS.]

Hig. A peery dog, I warrant him. [mean?]

Ginkes. [To CLAUSE.] What could his question
Clause. I know not; yet 'twas time to fly, he grew
Too close in his inquiries 'bout my daughter.

Hig. Hang them, for disturbing our

Noble ceremonies. Shall we renew them?

Prig. Incontinently, noble brother.

Enter GOSWIN.

Hig. Oh! here a judge comes!

[Cry of "A judge!"]

Gos. What ails you, sirs? What means this outcry?

Hig. Master,

A sort of poor souls met, heav'n's tools, good master,
Have had some little variance amongst ourselves

Who should be honestest of us, and which lives Uprightest in his calling: now, 'cause we thought We ne'er should 'gree upon't ourselves, because Indeed, 'tis hard to say, we all resolv'd to put it To him that should come next, and that's your mastership:

Which does your worship think is he? Sweet master, Look on us all, and tell us: we are seven of us, Like to the seven wise masters, or the planets.

Gos. I should judge this, the man with the grey beard; [Pointing to CLAUSE.]

And if he be not, I would he were!
There's something, too, amongst you,
To keep you all honest.

Exit.

Clause. Heav'n go with you!

Snap. What is't?

Prig. A crown of gold.

Fer. For our new king—good luck! [Clause!]

Prig. King Clause! I bid, God save the first king
After this golden token of a crown,
Where's Higgen, with his gratulating speech
In all our names?

Fer. Here he is, pumping for't. [once more,

Ginkes. H' has cough'd the second time; 'tis but
And then it comes.

Hig. Thou art chosen, venerable Clause,
Our king and sov'reign; monarch o' th' maunders;
And who is he that did not wish thee chosen,
Now thou art chosen? Ask 'em; all will say so;
Nay, swear't. 'Tis sworn so every day;
The times do give it sanction. When t'other day
We sat lamenting o'er our buried prince,
Of famous memory, (rest go with his rags!)
I then presag'd thou shortly would'st be king,
And now thou art so. By that beard, king Clause,
Thou wert found out, and mark'd for sovereignty.
Oh! happy prince, and beard! long may it grow,
And thick, and fair, that who lives under it
May live as safe as under Beggar's Bush.
Of which this is the thing—that but the type.

[Coughs.]

Prig. On, good Higgen!

Hig. No impositions, taxes, grievances,
Lie lurking in this beard: but under him
Each man shall eat his own stol'n eggs and bacon
In his own shade: he will have no purveyors
For pigs, or poultry—

Clause. That we must have, my learned orator;
It is our will; and every man to keep
In his own path and circuit.

Hig. Do you hear?

You must hereafter maund in your own pads,
He says.

Clause. Besides, to give good words.

Hig. Do you mark?

To cut bien whids, that is the second law. [mon

Clause. And keep afoot the humble and the com-
Phrase of begging, lest men discover us.

We love not heaps of laws, where few will serve.

All. Oh! gracious prince! Save, save the good king Clause!

Hig. A song to crown him.

GLEE AND CHORUS.

Cast our caps and cares away,
This is beggars' holyday;
At the crowning of our king,
Thus we ever dance and sing.
In the world look out and see,
Where so happy prince as he,
Where the nations live so free
And so merry as do we?

Be it peace, or be it war,
Here at liberty we are.
And enjoy our ease and rest;
To the field we are not press'd;
Nor will any go to law
With the beggar for a straw:
All which happiness he brags,
He doth owe unto his rags.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Room in Vandunke's House.

Enter VANDUNKE, HUBERT, HEMSKIRKE, and MARGARET.

Vand. Captain, you're welcome; so is this your friend,

Most safely welcome; though our town stand out
Against your master, you shall find good quarters.
The truth is we love not him—Margaret, some wine.
Let's talk a little treason, if we can Talk treason 'gainst the traitors; by your leave,
We, here in Bruges, think he does usurp;
And, therefore, I am bold—

[Exit MARGARET, and returns with wine.]

Hub. Sir, your boldness
Haply becomes your tongue, but not our ears,
While we are his servants.

Vand. Good! let's drink, then;

That will become us all.
Here's to you with a heart, my captain's friend,
With a good heart; and if this make us speak
Bold words anon, 'tis all under the rose,
Forgotten; drown all memory when we drink.

Hub. 'Tis freely spoken; noble burgomaster,
I'll do you right.

Hems. Nay, sir, mynheer Vandunke
Is a true statesman.

[throat

Vand. Fill my captain's cup; oh! that your cut-
Master, Wolfort, had been an honest man!

Hub. Sir?

Vand. Under the rose—

Hems. Here's to you;

And how does my niece?

Almost a woman, I think; she was my errand.

Vand. Ay, a kind uncle you are—fill him his glass—
That in seven years could not find leisure—

Hems. No, 'tis not so much.

Vand. I'll bate you ne'er an hour on't.

It was before the Brabander 'gan his war,
For moonshine, i'the water there, his daughter
That ne'er was lost, yet you could not find time
To see a kinswoman; but she is worth the seeing, sir,
Now you are come: you ask if she were a woman?
She is a woman, sir—bring her forth, Margaret—
And a fine woman, and has suitors.

Hems. How! What suitors are they?

Vand. Bachelors; young burghers;
And one a gallant, the prince of merchants
We call him here in Bruges.

Hems. How! a merchant?

I thought, Vandunke, you had understood me better,
And my niece, too, so trusted to you by me,
Than to admit of such in name of suitors.

Vand. Such! he is such a such, as were she mine,
I'd give him thirty thousand crowns with her.

Hems. Sir, you may deal for your own wares, but know,

That the same things, sir, fit not you and me. [Exit.
Vand. Why, give's some wine, then, that will fit us all;

Here's to you still, my captain's friend; but still
I say, would Wolfort were an honest man!
Under the rose I speak it. But this merchant

Is a brave boy; he lives so, in the town here,
We know not what to think of him.
Your master is a traitor for all this,
Under the rose—here's to you—and usurps
The earldom from a better man.

Hub. Ay, marry, sir, where is this man?

Vand. Nay, soft! an' I could tell you,
'Tis ten to one I would not. Here's my hand—
I love not Wolfort—sit you still with that.
See, here my captain comes, and his fine niece,
And there's my merchant—view him well.

Enter HEMSKIRKE, GERTRUDE, and GOSWIN.

Hems. You must

Not only know me for your uncle now,
But obey me: you, to go cast yourself
Away upon a merchant? fie upon't! one
That makes his trade with oaths and perjuries.

Gos. If it be me you speak of, as your eye
Seems to direct, I wish you would speak to me, sir.

Hems. Sir, I do say she is no merchandise.
Will that suffice you?

Gos. Merchandise! good sir,
Though you be kinsman to her, take no leave thence
To use me with contempt. I ever thought
Your niece above all price.

Hems. And do so still;
Dost hear? her rate's at more than you are worth.

Gos. You do not know what a gentleman's worth;
Nor can you value him.

Hub. Well said, merchant.

Vand. Nay, let him alone.

Hems. A gentleman!

What, o'the woolpack, or the sugar-chest,
Or list of velvet? Which is't, pound or yard,
You vend your gentry by?

Hub. Oh! Hemskirke, fie! [Wolfort,

Vand. Come, do not mind 'em: drink; he is no
Captain, I advise you.

Hems. If 'twere the blood
Of Charlemagne, as't may for aught I know,
Be some good butcher's issue here in Bruges.

Gos. How!

Hems. Nay, I'm not certain on't; of this I am:
If you once buy and sell, your gentry's gone.

Gos. Ha, ha, ha!

Hems. You're angry, though you laugh.

Gos. Now do I smile in pity and contempt
Of your poor argument: do not you, the lords
Of land, if you be any, sell the grass,
The corn, the straw, the milk, the cheese?

Vand. And butter?

Remember butter, do not leave out butter.

Gos. The beefs and muttons that your grounds are stor'd with,

Beside the woods? Your empty honour, fetch'd
From the heralds A, B, C, and said o'er
With your court faces once an hour, shall ne'er
Make me mistake myself. Do not your lawyers
Sell all their practice, as your priests their prayers?
What is not bought and sold?

Hems. You now grow bold, sir.

Gos. I have been bred

Still with my honest freedom, and must use it.

Hems. Upon your equals, then.

Gos. Sir, he that will Provoke me first, doth make himself my equal.

Hems. No more.

Gos. Yes, sir; this little—

'Tshall be aside: then after as you please.

You appear the uncle, sir, to her I love
More than mine eyes; and I have heard your scorn

ACT. DRAMA.—NOS. 81 & 82.

With so much scoffing, and with so much shame,
As each striv'd which is greater: but believe me,
I suck'd not in this patience with my milk;
Cast no despites on my profession
For the civility and tameness of it.

A good man bears a contumely worse
Than he would do an injury.

I would approach your kinswoman

With all respect due to yourself and her!

Hems. Away companion! handling her!

[Pulls him from her.]

Gos. Nay, I do love no blows, sir.

[They fight; he gets HEMSKIRKE's sword, and throws it away.]

Hub. Hold, sir!

Gert. Help, my Goswin!

Vand. Let 'em alone; my life for one.

Gos. Nay, come,

If you have will.

Hub. None to offend you, sir.

Gos. He that had, thank himself! Not hand her?
And clasp her, and embrace her, and bear her

Through a whole race of uncles, arm'd;
And all their nephews, though they stood a wood
Of pikes, and wall of cannon. Kiss me, Gertrude;
Quake not, but kiss me.

Vand. Well said,

My merchant royal; fear no uncles; hang 'em,
Hang up all uncles!

Gos. In this circle, love,
Thou art as safe as in a tower of brass;
Let such as do wrong fear.

Vand. Ay, that's good.

Let Wolfort look to that.

Gos. Sir, here she stands,
Your niece and my belov'd; one of these titles
She must apply to; if unto the last,

Not all the anger can be sent unto her,
In frown or voice, or other art, shall force her,
Had Hercules a hand in't. Come, my joy,
Say, thou art mine, aloud, love—and profess it.

Vand. Do, and I drink to it.

Gos. Pr'ythee, say so, love.

[blushes.
Gert. 'Twould take away the honour from my
Do not you play the tyrant, sweet; they speak it.

Hems. I thank you, niece.

Gos. Sir, thank her for your life,
And fetch your sword within. [Exit with GERT.

Hub. A brave, clear spirit;
Hemskirke, you were to blame. A civil habit
Oft covers a good man; and you may meet
In person of a merchant, with a soul

As resolute and free, and always worthy
As else in any file of mankind. Pray you,
What meant you so to slight him?

Hems. 'Tis done now;

Ask me no more on't:

I was to blame, and I must suffer—[aside.—but yet
I'll be reveng'd. [Exit.

Hub. I'll to the woods

To find our much-wrong'd banish'd nobles,
And trace the lonely haunt where my lost love,
My Jaculin, laments her alter'd fortunes.
There I may chance to learn

Somewhat to help my inquiries further.

How now, brave burgomaster?

[dunke.
Vand. I love not Wolfort, and my name's Van-

Hub. Come, go sleep within. [Wolfort—

Vand. Earl Florez is right heir; and this same
Under the rose I speak it—

Hub. Very hardly.

[breath'd,
Vand. Usurps; and is a rank traitor as ever

And all that do uphold him. Let me go.

Do you uphold him?

Hub. No.

Vand. Then hold up me.

[Ereunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Wood.

Enter GOSWIN.

Gos. No wind blows fair yet! no return of monies, Letters, nor anything to hold my hopes up! Why, then, 'tis destin'd that I fall! Fall miserably! My credit I was built on sinking with me. The raging north wind blows still stubbornly, And on his boist'rous rack rides my sad ruin. To-morrow with the sun-set, sets my credit: To prison now! Well, yet there's this hope left me, I may sink fairly under this day's venture; And so to-morrow's cross'd, and all its curses. This is the place his challenge call'd me to; Now let me fall before my foe i'the field, And not at bar before my creditors. He has kept his word. [Enter HEMSKIRKE.]

Now, sir, your sword's tongue only,

Loud as you dare—all other language—

Hem. Well, sir,

You shall not be long troubled: draw!

Gos. 'Tis done, sir; and now have at ye.

Hems. Now! [Enter Boors who attack GOSWIN.]

Gos. Betray'd to villains! Slaves, you shall buy me dearly.

Enter GERRARD and Beggars.

Ger. Now upon 'em bravely, boys!

Down with the gentlemen.

Boors. Hold, hold!

['em!]

Ger. Down with 'em into the wood, and swinge

Conjure 'em soundly, boys! swinge 'em to jelly!

[Beggars beat off HEMSKIRKE and Boors.]

Blessings upon my master! thou art not hurt?

Gos. That heav'n, which sent thee to my aid, Still nerv'd my arm.

Ger. And let my wandering steps,

To where conceal'd I heard yon coward knave

Tutor his ruffian band to thy undoing.

Gos. I thank ye, Clause. Pr'ythee, now leave me, For, by my troth, I have nothing left to give thee.

Ger. Indeed, I do not ask, sir; only it grieves me To see you look so sad. Now goodness keep you

From troubles in your mind!

Gos. If I were troubled, [me.]

What could thy comfort do? Pr'ythee Clause, leave

Ger. Why, are ye sad?

Gos. Most true, I am so;

And such a sadness I have got will sink me! [ble]

What would the knowledge do thee good, so misera-

Thou canst not help thyself! canst thou work miracles?

Ger. You do not know, sir, what I can do.

Tell me your cause of grief; I must not leave ye.

Gos. How! [goodness,]

Ger. By what ye hold most precious, by heav'n's

As your fair birth may prosper, good sir, tell me;

My mind believes yet something's in my power

May ease you of this trouble.

Gos. I will tell thee:

For a hundred thousand crowns, upon my credit

Taken up of merchants to supply my traffic,

To-morrow, Clause—to-morrow, which must come, In prison thou shalt find me, poor and broken.

Ger. I cannot blame your grief, sir,

Gos. Now, what say'st thou?

[ye,]

Ger. I say, you should not shrink; for he that gave Can give you more. Are ye, good master, ty'd Within the compass of a day?

Gos. Even to-morrow.

But why do I stand mocking of my misery?

Is't not enough that floods and friends forsake me?

Ger. Have ye no friends left?

None that have felt your bounty worth the duty?

Gos. Friendship! thou know'st it not.

Ger. It is a duty; and as a duty, from those men have felt ye,

Should be return'd again; therefore, I'll do't.

Distrust not, but pull up your noble spirit;

For if the fortunes of ten thousand people

Can save ye, rest assur'd. You have forgot, sir,

The good you did; that was the pow'r you gave me.

You shall now know the king of beggars' treasure;

And let the winds blow as they list, the sea roar,

Yet here in safety you shall find your harbour.

Distrust me not, for if I live, I'll fit ye.

Gos. How fain I would believe thee!

Ger. If I fail, master, believe no man hereafter.

Gos. I will try thee; but He knows, that knows all.

Ger. Know me to-morrow:

And if I know not how to cure ye, kill me!

So pass in peace, my best, my worthiest master.

[Exit.]

Gos. Still blow'st thou there? and from all other parts

Do all my agents sleep, that nothing comes?

There's a conspiracy of friends and servants,

If not of elements, to ha' me break.

What should I think, unless the seas and sands

Had swallow'd up, or fire devour'd my ships,

I must ha' had some returns.

Enter first Merchant.

1 Mer. Save you, sir!

Gos. Save you!

1 Mer. No news yet o' your ships?

Gos. Not any yet, sir.

1 Mer. 'Tis strange!

[Exit.]

Gos. 'Tis true, sir. What a voice was here now!

This was one passing bell; a thousand ravens

Sung in that man now, to presage my ruin!

Enter second Merchant.

2 Mer. Goswin, good day! these winds are very constant.

Gos. They are so, sir—to hurt.

2 Mer. Ha' you had no letters

Lately from England, nor from Denmark?

Gos. Neither.

2 Mer. This wind brings them. Nor no news over lands

Through Spain, from the Straits?

Gos. Not any.

2 Mer. I am sorry, sir.

[Exit.]

Gos. They talk me down; and, as 'tis said of vultures,

That scent a field fought, and do smell the carcasses

By many hundred miles: so do these, my wrecks,

At greater distances. Then, heaven, thy will Come on, and be! For base, deceitful fortune

Shall never say, she's cut my throat in fear:

I am not broken yet; nor should I fall,

Methinks, with less than that; that ruins all.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—Another part of the Wood.Enter HUBERT, as a Huntsman.

Hub. Thus have I stol'n away disguis'd from
Hemskirke,

To try these people; for my heart yet tells me
Some of these beggars are the men I look for.
Appearing like myself, they have no reason
(Though my intent be fair,) but still to avoid me.
This is the wood they make their hidden home,
A fit place for concealment; where, till fortune
Crowns me with that I seek, I'll live amongst 'em.
They come: I'll couch awhile, and mark my time.
[Exit.]

Enter HIGGEN, PRIG, FERRET, GINKES, and the rest, with the Boors in custody.

Hig. Come, bring 'em out, for here we sit in justice;

Each man take a cudgel, a good cudgel:
And now attend our sentence. That you are rogues,
And mischievous, base rascals—there's the point
now—

I take it, is confess'd.

Prig. Deny it, if ye dare, knaves.

Boors. We are rogues, sir.

Hig. To amplify the matter, then; rogues ye are,
And cudgell'd ye shall be, ere we leave ye.

Boors. Yes, sir.

Hig. Why did ye this?

Were you drunk when ye did it?

Boors. Yes, indeed, we were.

Prig. You shall be beaten sober.

Hig. Was it for want ye undertook it?

Boors. Yes, sir.

Hig. Ye shall be swing'd abundantly.

Has not the gentleman (pray, mark this point,
Brother Prig,) reliev'd you often?

Boors. 'Tis most true, sir.

Hig. And as ye are true rascals,
Tell me but this: have ye not been drunk and often
At his charge?

Boors. Often, often.

Hig. There's the point, then:

They have cast themselves, brother Prig.
Proceed you now; I'm somewhat weary.

Prig. Can you do these things,
You most abominable scurvy rascals,
You turnip-eating rogues?

Boors. We're truly sorry. [presently]

Prig. To the proof, you knaves; to the proof, and Give us a sign you feel compunction.

Every man up with his cudgel, and on his neighbour
Bestow such alms, till we shall say sufficient.

Hig. You know your doom:

One, two, three, and about it.

[Boors beat each other off.]

Prig. That fellow in the blue has true compunc-tion.

Enter GERRARD.

Ger. Call in the gentleman:
His cause I'll hear myself.

Enter HEMSKIRKE, handcuffed.

Prig. With all due reverence
We do resign, sir.

Ger. Go fetch that paper was found upon him.
But, soft! who have we here? [Exit FERRET.]

Enter HUBERT.

Hub. Good ev'n, my honest friends!

Ger. Good ev'n, good fellow!

Hub. May a poor huntsman, with a merry heart,
A voice shall make the forest ring about him,
Get leave to live amongst ye? True as steel, boys;
That knows all chases, and can watch all hours,
Force ye the crafty reynard, climb the quick-sets,
And rouse the lofty stag; and with my bell-mourn
Ring him a knell, that all the woods shall mourn him,
Till in his funeral tears he fall before me.

Ger. Well spoke, my brave fellow.

Hub. [Aside.] What mak'st thee here?
Hemskirke, thou art not right, I fear.

Re-enter FERRET, with a paper.

Fer. Here is the paper.

Ger. Give it to me. You are sent here, sirrah,
To discover certain gentlemen; a spy knave!
And if you find 'em, if not by persuasion,
To bring 'em back—by poison to dispatch 'em!

Hub. By poison! ha!

Ger. Here is another.—Hubert. What is that Hubert, sir?

Hub. You may perceive there—

Ger. Here thou art commanded, when that Hubert
Has done his best and worthiest service this way,
To cut his throat; for here he's set down dangerous.

Hub. This is most impious!

Ger. Is not this true?

Hems. Yes. What are you the better? [dom;]

Ger. You shall perceive, sir, ere you get your free-
Keep him still bound: and, friend, we take thee
to us,

Into our company. Thou dar'st be true unto us?

Hig. Ay, and obedient, too?

Hub. As you had bred me.

[to us.]

Ger. Then take our hand; thou'rt now a servant
Welcome him all.

Hig. Stand off, stand off, I'll do't; [person,
We bid you welcome three ways: first, for your
Which is a promising person: next for your quality,
Which is a decent and a gentle quality;
Last, for the frequent means you have to feed us;
You can steal, 'tis presum'd?

Hub. Yes, venison; an' if you want—

Hig. 'Tis well you understand that, for you
Shall practise it daily; you can drink, too?

Hub. Soundly.

[cock;]

Hig. And ye dare know a woman from a weather-

Hub. If I handle her.

Ger. As earnest of thy faith and resolution

Wilt undertake to keep this rascal prisoner?

One who basely contriv'd to undermine

A noble life, dear to the state and us. [wonder,

Hub. Sirs, I have kept wild dogs, and beasts for
And made 'em tame, too. Give into my custody
This roaring rascal, I shall hamper him.

Oh! he smells rank o'th' rascal.

Ger. Take him to thee; but if he 'scape—

Hub. Let me be even hang'd for him.

Come, sir, I'll tie you to the leash.

Hems. Away, rascal!

[soundly,

Hub. Be not so stubborn: I shall swinge ye

An' ye play tricks with me.

Ger. So, now away;

But ever have an eye, sir, to your prisoner.

Hub. He must blind both mine eyes, if he get from me. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—A Room in Gertrude's House.

Enter GOSWIN and GERTRUDE.

Gert. Indeed, you're welcome; I have heard your 'scape,

And, therefore, give her leave, that only loves you,
To bid you welcome : what is't makes you sad ?
Why do you look so wild ? Is't I offend you ?
Beshrew my heart, not willingly.

Gos. No, Gertrude.

[for,

Gert. Is't the delay of that you long have look'd
A happy marriage ?

Gos. No news yet.

Gert. Do you hear, sir ?

Gos. Have I liv'd

In all the happiness that fortune could seat me ?

In all men's fair opinions ?

Gert. Do you love me ?

Gos. And can the devil,

In one ten days—that devil chance, devour me ?

Gert. You do not love me.

Gos. No star prosperous ! all at a swoop !

Gert. Goswin, you will not look upon me.

Gos. Can men's prayers,

Shot up to heaven with such a zeal as mine are,

Fall back like lazy mists, and never prosper ?

Gyves I must wear, and cold must be my comfort,
Darkness, and want of meat—alas ! she weeps, too,

Which is the top of all my sorrow—Gertrude !

Gert. No, no, you will know me.

Gos. The time grows on still,

And like a tumbling wave, I see my ruin

Come rolling over me. [slighting ?

Gert. Tell me but how I have deserv'd your

Gos. For a hundred thousand crowns !

Gert. Farewell !

[starts me !

Gos. Of which I have scarce ten—oh ! how it

Gert. And may the next you love, hearing my ruin—

Gos. I had forgot myself—oh ! my best Gertrude !
Crown of my joys and comforts.

Gert. Sweet, what ails ye ?

I thought you had been vex'd with me.

Gos. My mind, wench,

My mind, o'erflow'd with sorrow, sunk my memory.

Gert. Am I not worthy of the knowledge of it ?

And cannot I as well affect your sorrows

As your delights ? you love no other woman ?

Gos. No, I protest.

Gert. You have no ships lost lately ?

Gos. None that I know of. [innocence

Gert. I hope you have spilled no blood whose
May lay this on your conscience.

Gos. Clear, by heaven !

Gert. Why should you be thus, then ?

Gos. Good Gertrude, ask not.

Even by the love you bear me.

Gert. I am obedient.

Gos. Go in, my fair ; I will not be long from ye—

Nor long, I fear me, with thee. At my return

Dispose me as you please.

Gert. The good gods guide ye !

[Exit.

Gos. Now for myself, which is the least I hope for,
And when that fails, for man's worst fortune, pity.

[Exit.

Nor, if you give me patience, is it possible
All my adventures fail. You've ships abroad
Endure the beating both of wind and weather,
I'm sure 'twould vex your hearts to be protested :
Ye're all fair merchants.

1 Mer. And must have fair play.

There is no living here else ; for my part,
I would gladly stay ; but my wants tell me,
I must wrong others in't.

Gos. No mercy in ye ?

2 Mer. 'Tis foolish to depend on others' mercy.
Keep yourself right, sir ; you have yet liv'd here
In lord-like prodigality, high and open ;
Now ye find what 'tis.

1 Mer. Before your poverty,
We were of no mark, of no endeavour.

2 Mer. You stood alone ; and scarce a sail at sea
But laden with your goods. Now I hope, sir,
We shall have sea-room.

Gos. Is my misery

Become my scorn, too ? Have you no mercy,
No part of men left ? Are all my bounties
To you, and to the town, turn'd my reproaches ?

2 Mer. Well, get your monies ready ; 'tis but two hours ;

We shall protest ye else, and suddenly.

Gos. But two days—

2 Mer. Not an hour. Ye know the hazard.

[Exeunt Merchants.

Gos. How soon my light's put out ! Hard-hearted
Bruges !

Within thy walls may never honest merchant
Venture his fortune more !

Enter GERRARD.

Ger. Good fortune, master !

Gos. Thou mistak'st me, Clause

I am not worth thy blessing.

Ger. Still a sad man !

No belief, gentle master ?

Enter FERRET and GINKES, as porters.

Bring it in, then ;

And now believe your beadsman.

Gos. Is this certain ?

Or dost thou work upon my troubled senses ?

Ger. 'Tis gold ; 'tis there, a hundred thousand crowns ;

And, good, sweet master, now be merry. Pay 'em !
Pay the poor, pelting knaves, that know no goodness.
And cheer your heart up.

Gos. But, good Clause, tell me. [fully,

How cam'st thou by this mighty sum ? If wrong-
I must not take it of thee ; 'twill undo me !

Ger. Fear not ; you have it by as honest means,
As though your father gave it.

Gos. What great security ?

Ger. Away with that, sir ;

Were ye not more than all the men in Bruges,
And all the money, in my thoughts ?

Gos. But, Clause,
I may die presently.

Ger. Then this dies with you. [ments.

Pay when you can, good master ; I'll no parch-
Only this charity I entreat you,
Leave me this ring.

Gos. Alas ! it is too poor, Clause.

Ger. 'Tis all I ask ; and this withal, that when
I shall deliver't back, you shall grant me,
Freely, one poor petition.

Gos. There, I confirm it. [Gives the ring.

And may my faith forsake me when I shun it !

[Exit.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Street in Bruges.

Enter GOSWIN and two Merchants.

Gos. Why, gentlemen, 'tis but a week more ; I entreat you

But seven short days ; I am not running from you,

Ger. Away! take up the money,
And follow that young gentleman.

[Eseunt.]

SCENE II.—A Wood.

Enter JACULIN.

Jac. I surely cannot err. What borrow'd dress
Can hide my Hubert from me? How I wish,
Yet fear to be resolv'd. He went this way.
Shall I adventure? Oh! this dread suspense,
How it does load my heart!

Enter HUBERT.

Hub. I've lock'd my youth up close enough from gadding,
In an old tree, and set watch over him.
My schemes are almost ripe—Ha, Jaculin!
If through her means, I can but make discovery.
Come hither, pretty maid.

Jac. No, no; you'll kiss me.

Hub. So I will.

[Kisses her.]

What's your father's name?

Jac. He's gone to heaven!

Hub. Is it not Gerrard, sweet?

Jac. I'll stay no longer.

My mother's an old woman, and my brother
Was drown'd at sea.

[Going.]

Hub. Stay! do not fly me thus.

Jac. [Aside.] Oh! how my heart melts within me.

Hub. [Aside.] 'Tis certain she! Pray, let me see your hand, sweet.

Jac. No, no.

Hub. [Aside.] Sure, I should know that ring!

Jac. [Aside.] 'Tis certain he. I had forgot my ring, too.

Hub. Do you know me, chuck?

Jac. No, indeed; I never saw ye:

I must be married to-morrow, to a capper.

Hub. [Aside.] How fain she would conceal herself, yet cannot.

My pretty wanderer, will you love me,
And leave that man? I'll wait you through the vale,
And make you dainty nosegays.

Jac. And where put them?

Hub. Here, in thy bosom, sweet.

Jac. Can you love, then?

SONG.—JACULIN.

*Tho' he is far away,
And over land and sea;
He'll come some happy day,
And prove his truth to me.
And when my love's returning,
My secret known too well,
Tho' all my blushes burning,
Shall want no tongue to tell.*

Hub. One word more.

Did you ever know a maid call'd Jaculin?

Jac. Oh! I'm discover'd!

Hub. 'Tis she! Now I'm certain

They're all here. Turn, turn thee, lovely maid,
'Thy Hubert speaks to thee.

Jac. Alas! I am forbid! Why thus disguis'd?

Hub. For justice and for thee, love!

Meet me anon, I'll tell thee all my purpose.

Jac. And may I trust thee, Hubert?

Hub. As thine own soul.

Jac. But yet you must not know me. This, and be constant ever.

[Exit.]

Hub. Oh! blessed certainty!

Now for my other project.

To turn the cunning toils were laid for me
To Hemsikirke's ruin, and the tyrant's fall.

[Exit.]

SCENE III.—A House.

Enter VANDUNKE, followed by a Servant.

Van. With officers of justice, said ye? and Inquir'd for Goswin? Bid 'em come in. [Exit Serv.]
Now will I play upon this envious crew,
That fain would run a royal vessel down.
They're here as bidden to a feast, before their hour:
I'll whet and disappoint their hungry appetites.

Enter the four Merchants.

2 Mer. Good day, most worthy burgomaster.
Our visit was to the rich merchant, Goswin. [tics
Vand. I'm sorry for't. I fear his strong necessi-
Will bring him empty-handed.
You must be merciful.

1 Mer. Oh! but he'll come:

He's rich, or from his ventures should be so.

2 Mer. I only wish

His forwardness to embrace all bargains,
Sink him not in the end.

1 Mer. [To VAND.] Have better hopes;

For my part, I am confident.

[friends:]

Vand. [Aside.] Here's a set of smiling mouth

3 Mer. His noble mind and ready hand contend

Which can add most to his free courtesies.

Vand. A fable wolves!

[Aside.]

2 Mer. It was at his bidding,

I did free from prison a sea robber,

Who yet may live to pay him with his ruin.

What think you of that deed, burgomaster?

Vand. What think! as of a deed of noble pity:

And if that act did plunge him into ruin,

You may now share its glory, by relieving him;

And holding off your bonds.

2 Mer. I love and honour him,

But must not break my neck to heal his finger.

3 Mer. For my part, though his bounty has no eyes,
Yet my necessities compel me to some foresight.

Vand. Have ye not often profited by this man,

And reve'll'd at his cost?

2 Mer. Sir, we confess—

Vand. Do, that y're all base knaves and hypocrites.

See, here he comes to challenge a return

Of kindness from ye.

1 Mer. When our bonds be paid.

Enter Goswin, with men carrying bags of money.

Gos. Now, sirs, your bonds. Set down those bags of gold.

Your pardon, that you wait.

2 Mer. [Aside.] He deals in witchcraft!

1 Mer. Nay, sir, if it would do you courtesy,—

Gos. None at all, sir. [The Merchants bow.]

Vand. There's bending now of backs,

And jutting out of hips. [Aside.]

Gos. Take it, 'tis yours.

There's your ten thousand, sir. Give in my bills.

Your sixteen—

3 Mer. Pray, be pleas'd to make further use.

Gos. No.

Vand. That's plump! You're answered, I hope?

4 Mer. What I have, sir,

You may command. Pray, let me be your servant.

Gos. Put on your hats. I care not for your courtesies;

They're most untimely done, and no truth in 'em.
Vand. They're all lies, I'll vouch for 'em every one.

2 Mer. I have a freight of pepper.

Vand. Rot your pepper!

Gos. Shall I trust you again?—There's your ten thousand.

4 Mer. Or, if you want fine sugar, 'tis but sending.

Gos. No, I can send to Barbary; those people, That never yet knew faith, have nobler freedoms. How now?

Enter a Sailor.

Sail. Why, health to the noble merchant!

The Susan is returned.

Gos. Well?

Sail. Well, and rich, sir;

And now put in.

Vand. Do you mark that?

Gos. Heav'n, thou hast heard my prayers.

What news o'th' fly-boat?

Sail. If this wind hold till midnight,

She will be here, and wealthy.—'Scaped fairly.

Vand. D'ye hear that, too, knaves.

Gos. How, pr'ythee, sailor?

Sail. Thus, sir. She had fought

Seven hours together, with six Turkish galleys,

And she fought bravely; but, at last, was boarded,

And overlaid with strength; when, presently,

Comes bearing up i'the wind, Captain Vannoke,

That valiant gentleman you redeem'd from prison.

He knew the boat, set in, and fought it bravely;

Beat all the galleys off, sunk three; redeem'd her,

And, as a service to ye, sent her home, sir.

Gos. An honest, noble captain, and a thankful!

Vand. And this is he you would have hang'd,

Ye land pirates! [chant's health, sailor.

Gos. There's for thy news. Go, drink the mer-

Sail. Thank your bounty; and I'll do it to a do it.

Vand. Ay, drink till ye drown yourself,

Or you're no Englishman. [Exit Sailor.

Gos. This year, I hope, my friends, I shall 'scape prison,

For all your cares to catch me.

Vand. Come, sir, leave these pitiful knaves;

You must along with me:

Yonder is one who weeps and sobs.

Gos. Alas! how does she?

Vand. She will be better soon, I hope.

Gos. Why soon, sir?

Vand. Why, when you have her in your arms. This

My boy, she is thy wife:

I'll cheer thee up with sack,

And, when thou'rt joyous, fling thee to thy mistress.

Gos. With all my heart, I take her

You are paid, I hope?

2 Mer. You may please, sir,

To think of your poor servants in displeasure, Whose all they have—goods, moneys, are at your service.

Gos. I thank you;

And when I've need of you, I shall forget you.

[Exeunt.

SCENE IV.—A Wood.

Enter HUBERT and HEMSKIRKE.

Hub. You the Earl's servant? [him,

Hems. I swear I am near as his own thoughts to Able to do thee service. Release me, I'll make thee ranger over all the game. [too.

Hub. This may provoke me. Yet to prove a knave

Hems. 'Tis to prove honest; 'tis to do good service

For him thou'rt sworn to, huntsman; for thy prince.

Hub. Then thou shalt see, sir. I will do a service,

That shall deserve, indeed.

'Tis not your setting free, for that's mere nothing; But such a service, if the Earl be noble,

He shall for ever love me.

Hems. What is't, huntsman?

Hub. Do you know any of these people live here?

Hems. No. [cm,

Hub. You are a fool, then. Here be those, to have I know the Earl so well, would make him caper.

Hems. Any of the old lords, that rebell'd?

Hub. Peace!

All. I know 'em all, and can betray 'em.

Hems. But wilt thou do this service?

Hub. More than that, too.

Here's the right heir!

Hems. What, Florez? Oh! honest,

Honest huntsman!

Hub. Now, how to get them,

There's the matter.

Hems. By force.

Hub. Ay, that must do't.

And, with the person of the Earl himself,

Authority and might must come on 'em,

Or else in vain. And thus I would have you do't.

To-morrow night be here, the hour be twelve:

Now for a guide to draw ye on these persons,

The woods being thick, and hard to hit, myself

With some beside, will wait you by th' great oak.

Hems. Keep but thy faith, and such a shower of wealth—

Hub. I warrant ye. Miss nothing that I tell ye.

Away, away! for here come those will hold ye.

[Exit HEMSKIRKE

Enter GERRARD, HIGGEN, PRIG, GINKES, SNAP, FERRET, and others.

Ger. Now, what's the news in town?

Ginkes. No news but joy, sir.

Ev'ry man wooing of the noble merchant,

Who sends his hearty commendations to ye.

Fer. Yes; there's this news. This night he's to be married.

Ger. This night! He must not marry now.

Hub. Good sir,

By your leave, one word in private with ye.

Nay, do not start; I know ye.

Hubert speaks to ye, and you must be Gerrard,

The time invites you to it.

Ger. Challenge'd thus,

I throw aside disguise, and trust your honour.

Sir, I am Gerrard; say, how stand our hopes?

Hub. Fair, if you now pursue 'em. Hemskirke,

I've

Let go, and these my causes I'll tell ye

Privately, and how I have wrought on him,

Gull'd him, and sent him home as a decoy,

To bring Lord Wolfort hither, with his guards,

To seize (so he'll expect) the banish'd lords;

But, so my plan succeed, his very guards

Shall serve to crush the tyranny they rais'd,

And, at my voice, shall hail their lawful prince.

Till I can prove me honest to my friends,

Look on, and strictly follow these directions.

Snap. What! does he marry Vandunke's pretty daughter? [pies!

Prig. Oh! the puddings, the piping hot mince-

Hig. For the leg of a goose, now would I venture a limb:

I love a fat goose, as I love allegiance;

And plague upon the boors, too well they know't;

And, therefore, starve their poultry.

Prig. Brother Higgen,

What think you of a wassail?

Hig. Worthily;

And then I'll make a speech in praise of merchants.

Prig. And I'll so roar out songs and glees!

Ger. 'Tis passing well, I both believe and joy in't,
And will be ready. Hear me all; keep in Till this, your huntsman, call ye forth; then do
His bidding faithfully. I must awhile
Forsake ye. On mine anger, no man stir hence.

Prig. Not to the wedding, sir?

Ger. Not any whither.

[meat, too.]

Hig. The wedding must be seen, sir. We want
We're horribly out of meat.

Prig. Shall it be spoken,

Fat capons shak'd their tails at's in defiance?
Shall pigs, sir, that the parson's self would envy,
And dainty ducks—

Ger. Not a word more. Obey me!

[Erit.]

Hig. Why, then, come doleful death, this is flat tyranny!

And by this hand—

Hub. What?

Hig. I'll go to sleep upon't.

Hub. No sleep to-night for any that have hearts
To hunt with me the savage, bloody boar
That wastes the land. I have a scheme, my hearts,
Shall, by one night of watching, win a feast,
Whereat a royal host shall bid you welcome.

[Exeunt, crying "Long live our huntsman, Hubert!"]

SCENE V.—An entrance Hall in Bruges.

Enter Goswin, with a paper in his hand.

Gos. Such earnest bidding; nay, more like command,

To meet him here, on th' forfeit of my word,
In this the moment of my nuptial hour!
What this man is I know not, nor for what cause
He twice has thrust himself into my dangers.
But, sure, heav'n's hand is in't. By strange instinct,
Nature has taught me to behold his wants,
Not as a stranger's.—

Enter GERRARD.

My honest, my best friend, I have been careful
To see thy moneys—

Clause. Sir, that brought not me.

Do you know this ring again?

Gos. Thou hadst it of me.

[you gave me]

Clause. And do you well remember yet the boon
Upon the return of this?

Gos. Yes; and I grant it,

Be it what it will. Ask what thou canst, I'll do it,
Within my power.

Clause. You are not married yet?

Gos. No.

[turb ye.]

Clause. 'Faith, I shall ask you that, that will dis-

Gos. Do;

And if I faint and flinch in't—

Clause. Well said, master;

And yet it grieves me, too, and yet it must be.

Gos. Pr'ythee, distrust me not.

Clause. You must not marry.

That's part of the power you gave me.

Gos. Not marry, Clause?

Clause. Not if you keep your promise,

And give me power to ask.

Gos. Pr'ythee, think better.

I will obey, by heaven!

Clause. I have thought the best, sir.

[honesty?]

Gos. Give me thy reason. Dost thou fear her

Clause. Chaste as the ice, for anything I know, sir.

Gos. Must not marry?

Shall I break now, when my poor heart is pawn'd?

When all the preparation—

Clause. Now, or never.

Gos. Come, 'tis not that thou wouldst: thou dost but fright me.

Clause. You may break, sir;

But never more in my thoughts appear honest.

Gos. Didst ever see her?

Clause. No.

Gos. She is such a wonder

For beauty and fair virtue, Europe has not.

Why hast thou made me happy to undo me?

But look upon her, then if thy heart relent not,

I'll quit her presently. Who waits there?

Bid my fair love come hither.

Pr'ythee, be merciful; take a man's heart,

And look upon her truly: take a friend's heart,

And feel what misery must follow this. [promise.]

Clause. Take you a noble heart, and keep your
I forsook all I had to make you happy.

Enter GERTRUDE.

Can that thing call'd a woman stay your virtue?

Gos. Look, there she is. Now deal with me as thou wilt.

Didst ever see a fairer?

Gert. What ails my love?

Gos. Didst thou ever,

By the fair light of heav'n, behold a sweeter?

Gert. Sure, h'as some strange design in hand,

He starts so.

Clause. She is most goodly.

Gos. Is she a thing, then, to be lost thus lightly?

Her mind is ten times sweeter, ten times nobler,—

And but to hear her speak—a paradise.

And such a love she bears to me,—a chaste love,—

And ready now to bless me; the priest too, ready

To say the holy words, shall make us happy.

This is a cruelty beyond man's study;

'Twill be her death to do't.

Clause. Let her die, then.

Gos. 'Twill kill me, too; 'twill murder me. By heav'n, Clause, [me.]

I'll give thee half I have. Come, thou shalt save

Clause. Then you must go with me; I can stay no longer.

If you be true and noble, in the dark walk

Of aged elms, that opens to the plain,

You'll meet me in this hour.

Gos. Hard heart, I'll follow thee. [Exit CLAUSE.]

Pray ye, go in. I have a weighty business

Concerns my life and state, (make no inquiry,)

This present hour befall'n me. My cloak there!

Gert. Is this your ceremony? Why is this stop,
sir?

Gos. We must part,

Gertrude, we must!

Gert. Must! What voice enjoins?

What power commands?

Gos. We shall meet again.

Gert. Who is yon man, that rules so absolute

O'er Goswin's will? [sweet,]

Gos. Ask me no more. I can but tell thee this,
I'm ever thine. Farewell.

I know not why,

But to obey this man, to me seems now

As payment of some great religious debt

Nature stands bound for.

[Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—Woods.

Enter GERTRUDE and a Clown.

Gert. Lead, if we're right; thou said'st thou knew'st the way. [homeward!]

Clown. Fear nothing, I do know it. Would 'twere

Gert. Wrought from me by a beggar! at the time That most should tie him! 'tis some other love That hath a more command on his affections, And he that fetch'd him, a disguised agent, Not what he personated. Darkness shroud And cover love's too curious search in me; For yet, suspicion, I would not name thee. [dark.]

Clown. Mistress, it grows somewhat pretty and Gert. What then?

Clown. Nay, nothing. Do not think I am afraid, Although, perhaps, you are.

Gert. I am not. Forward! [fear nothing.]

Clown. Sure, but you are. Give me your hand—

What a fright one on's are in, you or I?

Gert. What ails the fellow?

Clown. Hark, hark! I beseech you.

Do you hear nothing?

Gert. No.

Clown. List! This wood is full of wolves, Of hogs, and such carnivorous vermin.

Hark! 'tis the howling of a wolf!

Gert. Of the wind, coward! [now!]

Clown. Help me to say my pray'rs. He's got me I cannot speak! Do I speak, mistress? Tell me.

Gert. A precious guide I've got. [One halloo.]

Clown. It thunders now. You hear that, mistress?

Gert. I hear one halloo! [lightning!]

Clown. 'Tis thunder, thunder! See, a flash of Are you not blasted, mistress?

'T has played the barber with me; I have lost My beard—I am shaven, mistress.

Gert. Pr'ythee, hold thy peace.

Both love and jealousy have made me bold.

Where my fate leads me, I must go. Hold off! [E.r.]

Clown. The Lord go with you, then, for I will not.

Enter WOLFORT, HEMSKIRKE, and Soldiers.

Hems. It was the fellow,—sure, he that should guide—

The huntsman that did halloo. Who goes there?

Clown. Mistress, I am taken.

Hems. Ah, mistress! Now look forth.

Wolf. What are you, sirrah?

Clown. Truly, all is left

Of a poor boor by day, nothing by night.

I'm none that will stand out, great sir.

You might have spar'd your guns and drum;

You may subdue me with a walking-stick,

E'en when you please, and hold me with a pack-thread.

Hems. What woman was't you call'd to?

Clown. I? None, sir.

Wolf. None! Did not you name a mistress?

Clown. Yes; but she's

No woman yet: she should have been this night,

But that a beggar stole away her bridegroom.

Enter Soldiers with GERTRUDE.

Hems. 'Tis she!

Gert. Ha! I am miserably lost!

Hems. This was a noble entrance to your fortune; That being thus upon the point of marriage, Upon her venture here, you should surprise her.

Wolf. I begin, Hemskirke, to believe my fate Works to my end.

Hems. Yes, sir; and this adds trust

Unto our guide, who did assure me Florez

Liv'd in some merchant's shape, as Gerrard did

In the old beggar's. [Shouts heard.] That's he again!

Wolf. Good! Go we forth to meet him.

Hems. Here's the oak, my lord. Come, madam, you must along with us. [Ereunt.]

Enter HUBERT, HIGGEN, PRIG, FERRET, SNAP, and GINKES, like Boors.

Hub. I like your habits well. They're safe! stand close!

Hig. But what's the action we are for now, eh? Robbing a ripper of his fish?

Prig. Or taking a poultener prisoner?

Hig. Without ransom?

Snap. Or cutting off a convoy of butter?

Prig. Oh! I could drive a regiment Of geese afore me, such a night as this, Ten leagues with my hat and staff, and not a hiss Heard, or a wing of my troop disorder'd.

Hig. Is it a fetching off a buck of clothes? We are horribly out of linen.

Hub. No such matter.

Hig. Let me alone for any farmer's dog: If you've a mind to the cheese-loft, 'tis but thus. And he's a silenc'd mastiff during pleasure.

Hub. Would it please you to be silent?

Hig. Mum!

Re-enter WOLFORT, HEMSKIRKE, and Soldiers.

Wolf. Who's there?

Hub. A friend, the huntsman.

Hems. 'Tis he, himself. [these?]

Hub. I have kept touch, sir. Which is the earl of Hems. This, my lord, 's the friend Hath undertook the service.

Hub. And I have don't.

I know to pitch my toils, drive in my game; For Florez, and his father Gerrard, and Jaculin, young Florez' sister, I'll have 'em all.

Wolf. We will double

Whatever Hemskirke now hath promis'd thee.

Hub. And I'll deserve it treble. What horse ha' you?

Wolf. A hundred.

Hub. That's well. Ready to take 'em on surprise?

Wolf. Yes.

Hems. Divide, then,

Your force into five squadrons; for there are So many outlets; of all which passages We must possess ourselves to round 'em in. And that they may be more secure, I'll use My wonted whoops and halloos, as I were A hunting for 'em; which will make them rest Careless of any noise, and be a direction To other guides, how we approach 'em still.

Wolf. 'Tis order'd well, and relisheth the soldier. Make the division, huntsman. You are my charge, My fair one, I'll look to you. [Ereunt.]

Clown. No one shall need to look to me, I'll look unto myself. [Erit.]

Hub. Now, comrades, is the promis'd hour at hand! Here, where the roads do meet, lie conceal'd; And, at the bugle's sound, rush forth to aid Lord Hubert, who then rings the knell Of Wolfort's power, and hails found Florez, prince. [Erit with Guards.]

Enter GERRARD and FLOREZ.

Flo. 'Tis passing strange!

Ger. When we fled from Wolfort,
I sent you into England, there plac'd you [win,
With a brave Flanders merchant, called rich Gos-
Who, dying, left his name and wealth unto you,
As his reputed son. But though I Should, as a subject, study you, my prince,
'Twill not discredit you to call me father.

Flo. Acknowledge you my father! Sir, I do;
And may impiety, conspiring with
My other sins, sink me, and suddenly,
When I forget to pay you a son's duty. [Kneels.

Ger. I pray you, rise;
And may those powers that see and love this in you
Reward you for it. Taught by your example,
Having receiv'd the rights due to a father,
I tender you th' allegiance of a subject,
Which, as my prince, accept of.

Flo. Kneel to me!
May mountains first fall down beneath their valleys,
And fire no more mount upwards, when I suffer
An act in nature so preposterous.

I am your son, sir; prouder to be so,
Than I shall ever of those specious titles,
Left to me by my mother.

Ger. I do believe it.—

By this time, sir, I hope you want no reasons
Why I broke off your marriage;
For now, as Florez, and a prince, remember,
The fair maid whom you chose to be your bride,
Being so far beneath you, even your love
Must grant she's not your equal.

Flo. In descent,
Or borrow'd glories from dead ancestors;
But for her beauty, chastity, and virtues,
A monarch might receive from her, not give,
Though she were his crown's purchase.

*Enter HUBERT, HEMSKIRKE, WOLFORT, BERTHA,
and Lords, with torches.*

Hub. Sir, here be two of 'em,
The father and the son.

Ger. Who's this? Wolfort? [treason.

Wolf. Impostor! ay, to charge thee with thy
In this disguise, that hath so long conceal'd you,
I must find Gerrard.

And in this merchant's habit, one call'd Florez,
Who would be earl.

Flo. And is, wert thou a subject.

Bertha. Goswin turn'd prince!

Oh! I am poorer by this greatness
Than all my former jealousies or misfortunes!

Flo. Gertrude!

Wolf. Stay, sir; hold, on your life!

Bertha. His life! oh! first take mine;
And since I cannot hope to wed him now,
Let me but fall a part of his glad ransom.

Flo. So proud a fiend as Wolfort!

Wolf. For so lost a thing as Florez!

Flo. And that be so,
Rather than she should stoop again to thee,—
There is no death, but's sweeter than all life,
When Wolfort is to give it. Oh! my Gertrude!

Wolf. This is no Gertrude, nor no Hemskirke's nice,

Nor Vandunke's daughter; this is Bertha, Bertha,
Heiress of Brabant, she that caus'd the war. [vice.

Hems. Whom I did steal to do great Wolfort ser-
Flo. Insolent villain!

Enter JACULIN.

Wolf. Who is this, huntsman? [Florez.

Hub. More, more, sir. This is Jaculin, sister to
Ger. How they triumph in their treachery!

Wolf. Why, here's brave game! this was sport royal!

Huntsman, your horn: first wind me Florez' fall,
Next Gerrard's, then his daughter, Jaculin's.

We'll hang 'em, Hemskirke, on these trees.

Hems. No here, my lord; 'twill spoil your triumph.

Hub. A public scaffold will shew better sport.

Flo. Wretch! art thou not content thou hast betray'd us,

But mock'st us, too?

Ger. False Hubert! this is monstrous!

Wolf. Hubert!

Hems. Who, this? [bert!

Ger. Yes, this is Hubert; false and perjurd Hu-
I hope he has help'd himself unto a tree.

Wolf. The first, the first of any; and most glad I have you, sir.

I'll let you go before, but for a train:

Is't you have done this service?

Hub. As your poor huntsman, sir. But now as
The wolf's a-foot, let slip. [Sounds his horn.

Enter VANDUNKE, Merchants, HIGGEN, PRIG, FERRET, SNAP, and Soldiers, who seize on WOLFORT and HEMSKIRKE.

Wolf. Betray'd!

Hub. No; but well catch'd; and I the huntsman.

Vand. How do you, Wolfort? Rascal! good knaue, Wolfort!

I speak it now without the rose: and Hemskirke,
Rogue Hemskirke! you that have no niece; this lady
Was stol'n by you, and ta'en by you, and now
Resigned by me, to the right owner here.

Take her, my prince.

Flo. Can this be possible?

Welcome, my love! my sweet, my beauteous love!

Gert. And shall we part no more? [better,

Vand. I ha' given you her twice; now keep her

And thank lord Hubert that compos'd the plot,

And in good Gerrard's name sent for Vandunke,

And got me out with my brave boys, to march

Like Caesar when he bred his commentaries;

So I to breed my chronicle, came forth,

Cæsar Vandunke, and veni, vidi, vici.

Hig. Captain Prig, sir!

Prig. And colonel Higgen!

Vand. Peace, rogues!

Give me my bottle, and set down my drums,
I'll sit in judgment on 'em: you stole the lady.

Wolf. Well, I can stand, and praise the toils that took me,

And laughing in them die! they were brave snares!

Flo. 'Twere truer valour, if thou durst repent

The wrongs th' hast done, and live!

Wolf. Who! I repent,

And say I am sorry! Yes; 'tis the fool's language,
But not for Wolfort.

Vand. Wolfort, thou art a devil, [longing!

And speak'st his language. Now, might I have my Under this row of trees here would I hang thee.

Flo. No; let him live

Banish'd from our state. That is thy doom.

Vand. Then hang this worthy captain here, this Hemskirke,

For profit of th' example.

Flo. No, let him

Enjoy his shame, too, with his conscious life,

To shew how much our innocence contemns
All practice from the guiltiest to molest us.
Away with them! [Exit WOLFORT guarded.]

Ger. Sir, you must help to join
A pair of hands, as they have done of hearts
And to their loves wish joys.

Flo. As to mine own—my gracious sister,—
Worthiest brother! [Embracing.]

Vand. Away with them! a noble prince!
And yet I'd fain some one were hang'd.

Ger. Sir, here be friends ask to be look'd on too,
And thank'd; who though their trade be none o'th' best,

Have yet us'd me with court'sy, and been true

Subjects unto me, while I was their king. [Bruges, Vand. Your grace command them follow me to They'll turn the wheel for Crab the rope-maker.

Flo. Do you hear, sirs?

Hig. We do; thanks to your grace. [a week.]

Vand. They shall beat hemp, and be whipp'd twice

Prig. Thank your good lordship.

Flo. No, I will take the care on me to find
Some manly and more profitable course,
To fit them as a part of the republic.

Be it our care to prove unto the world

Our better title o'er usurped favour,

In how much we shall use it for the good

Ev'n of the meanest subjects in our state. [Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—Harcourt's Lodgings.

HARCOURT and BELVILLE discovered sitting.

Har. Ha, ha, ha! and so you are in love, nephew; not reasonably and gallantly, as a young gentleman ought, but sighingly, miserably so; not content to be ankle-deep, you have sous'd over head and ears; ha, Dick?

Bel. I am pretty much in that condition, indeed, uncle. [Sighs.]

Har. Nay, never blush at it: when I was of your age I was asham'd too; but three years at college, and half a one at Paris, methinks, should have cured you of that unfashionable weakness—modesty.

Bel. Could I have released myself from that, I had perhaps been at this instant happy in the possession of what I must despair now ever to obtain. Heigho!

Har. Ha, ha, ha! very foolish indeed.

Bel. Don't laugh at me, uncle; I am foolish, I know; but, like other fools, I deserve to be pitied.

Har. Pr'ythee don't talk of pity; how can I help you? For this country girl of yours is certainly married.

Bel. No, no; I won't believe it; she is not married, nor she sha'n't be, if I can help it.

Har. Well said, modesty; with such a spirit you can help yourself, Dick, without my assistance.

Bel. But you must encourage and advise me too, or I shall never make anything of it.

Har. Provided the girl is not married; for I never encourage young men to covet their neighbours' wives.

Bel. My heart assures me, that she is not married.

Har. O, to be sure, your heart is much to be relied upon; but to convince you that I have a fellow-feeling of your distress, and that I am as nearly allied to you in misfortunes as in relationship, you must know—

Bel. What, uncle? You alarm me!

Har. That I am in love, too.

Bel. Indeed!

Har. Miserably in love.

Bel. That's charming.

Har. And my mistress is just going to be married to another.

Bel. Better and better.

Har. I knew my fellow-sufferings would please you; but now prepare for the wonderful wonder-of-wonders!

Bel. Well.

Har. My mistress is in the same house with yours.

Bel. What, are you in love with Peggy, too?

[Rising from his chair.

Har. Well said, jealousy. No, no; set your heart at rest; your Peggy is too young, and too simple for me. I must have one a little more knowing, a little better bred, just old enough to see the difference between me and a coxcomb, spirit enough to break from a brother's engagements, and choose for herself.

Bel. You don't mean Alithea, who is to be married to Mr. Sparkish?

Har. Can't I be in love with a lady that is going to be married to another, as well as you, sir?

Bel. But Sparkish is your friend?

Har. Pr'ythee don't call him my friend; he can be nobody's friend, not even his own. He would thrust himself into my acquaintance, would introduce me to his mistress, though I have told him again and again that I was in love with her; which, instead of ridding me of him, has made him only ten times more troublesome, and me really in love. He should suffer for his self-sufficiency.

Bel. 'Tis a conceited puppy. And what success with the lady?

Har. No great hopes; and yet if I could defer the marriage a few days, I should not despair; her honour, I am confident, is her only attachment to my rival: she can't like Sparkish; and if I can work upon his credulity, a credulity which even popery would be ashamed of, I may yet have the chance of throwing sixes upon the dice to save me.

Bel. Nothing can save me.

Har. No, not if you whine and sigh, when you should be exerting everything that is man about you. I have sent Sparkish, who is admitted at all hours into the house, to know how the land lies for you, and if she is not married already—

Bel. How cruel you are; you raise me up with one hand, and then knock me down with the other.

Har. Well, well, she shan't be married. [Knocking at the door.] This is Sparkish, I suppose; don't drop the least hint of your passion to him; if you do, you may as well advertise it in the public papers.

Bel. I'll be careful.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. An odd sort of a person, from the country, I believe, who calls himself Moody, wants to see you, sir; but as I did not know him, I said you were not at home, but would return directly; "And so will I too," said he, very shortly and surlily! and away he went, mumbling to himself.

Har. Very well, Will; I'll see him when he comes. [Exit Servant.] Moody call to see me! He has something more in his head than making me a visit; 'tis to complain of you, I suppose.

Bel. How can he know me?

Har. We must suppose the worst, and be prepared for him; tell me all you know of this ward of his, this Peggy—Peggy what's her name?

Be. Thrift, Thrift, uncle.

Har. Ay, ay, Sir Thomas Thrift's daughter, of Hampshire; and left very young, under the guardianship of my old companion and acquaintance, Jack Moody.

Bel. Your companion!—he's old enough to be your father.

Har. Thank you, nephew; he has greatly the advantage of me in years, as well as wisdom. When I first launched from the university into this ocean of London, he was the greatest rake in it; I knew him well for near two years, but all of a sudden he took a freak (a very prudent one) of retiring wholly into the country.

Bel. There he gain'd such an ascendancy over the odd disposition of his neighbour, Sir Thomas, that he left him sole guardian to his daughter; who forfeits half her fortune, if she does not marry with his consent. There's the devil, uncle.

Har. And are you so young, so foolish, and so much in love, that you would take her with half her value? Ha, nephew?

Bel. I'll take her with anything, with nothing.

Har. What! such an unaccomplish'd, awkward, silly creature? He has scarce taught her to write; she has seen nobody to converse with, but the country people about 'em; so she can do nothing but dangle her arms, look gawky, turn her toes in, and talk broad Hampshire.

Bel. Don't abuse her sweet simplicity; had you but heard her talk, as I have done, from the garden-wall in the country, by moon-light—

Har. Romeo and Juliet, I protest; ha, ha, ha! "Arise, fair sun, and kill the envious—" ha, ha, ha! How often have you seen this fair Capulet?

Bel. I saw her three times in the country, and spoke to her twice; I have leap'd an orchard-wall, like Romeo, to come at her; played the balcony scene, from an old summer-house in the garden; and if I lose her, I will find out an apothecary, and play the tomb scene too.

Har. Well said, Dick! this spirit must produce something; but has the old dragon ever caught you sighing at her?

Bel. Never in the country; he saw me yesterday kissing my hand to her, from the new tavern window that looks upon the back of his house, and immediately drove her from it, and fastened up the window-shutters.

Spark. [Without.] Very well, Will, I'll go up to 'em.

Har. I hear Sparkish coming up; take care of what I told you; not a word of Peggy; hear his intelligence, and make use of it, without seeming to mind it.

Bel. Mum, mum, uncle.

Enter SPARKISH.

Spark. O, my dear Harcourt, I shall die with laughing; I have such news for thee, ha, ha, ha!

What, your nephew too, and a little dumpish, or so; you have been giving him a lecture upon economy, I suppose—you, who never had any, can best describe the evils that arise from the want of it. I never mind my own affairs, not I; "The gods take care of Cato."—I hear, Mr. Belville, you have got a pretty snug house, with a bow-window that looks into the Park, and a back-door that goes out into it. Very convenient, and well-imagined; no young handsome fellow should be without one; you may be always ready there, like a spider in his web, to seize upon stray'd women of quality.

Har. As you used to do—you vain fellow, you; prythee don't teach my nephew your abandoned tricks; he is a modest young man, and you must not spoil him.

Spark. May be so, but his modesty has done some mischief at our house; my surly, jealous brother-in-law saw that modest young gentleman casting a wishful eye at his forbidden fruit, from the new tavern window.

Bel. You mistake the person, Mr. Sparkish; I don't know what young lady you mean.

Har. Explain yourself, Sparkish, you must mistake; Dick has never seen the girl.

Spark. I don't say he has; I only tell you what Moody says. Besides, he went to the tavern himself, and inquired of the waiter who dined in the back room, No. 4; and they told him it was Mr. Belville, your nephew; that's all I know of the matter, or desire to know of it, faith.

Har. He kiss'd his hand, indeed, to your lady, Alithea, and is more in love with her than you are, and very near as much as I am; so look about you; such a youth may be dangerous.

Spark. The more danger the more honour: I defy you both; win her and wear her, if you can;—Dolus an virtus in love as well as in war! though you may be expeditious, faith; for I believe, if I don't change my mind, I shall marry her to-morrow, or the day after. Have you no honest clergyman, Harcourt, no fellow-collegian to recommend me, to do the business?

Har. Nothing ever, sure, was so lucky. [Aside.] Why, faith, I have, Sparkish; my brother, a twin-brother, Ned Harcourt, will be in town to-day, and proud to attend your commands. I am a very generous rival, you see, to lend you my brother to marry the woman I love.

Spark. And so am I too, to let your brother come so near us; but Ned shall be the man; poor Alithea grows impatient; I can't put off the evil day any longer. I fancy the brute, her brother, has a mind to marry his country idiot at the same time.

Bel. How! country idiot, sir?

Har. Hold your tongue. [Apart to Belville.] I thought he had been married already.

Spark. No, no, he's not married, that's the joke of it.

Bel. No, no, he is not married.

Har. Hold your tongue. [Elbowing Belville.]

Spark. Not he; I have the finest story to tell you: by-the-by, he intends calling upon you—for he asked me where you lived—to complain of modesty there. He picked up an old raking acquaintance of his as we came along together, Will Frankly, who saw him with his girl, skulking and muffled up, at the play last night; he plagu'd him much about matrimony, and his being ashamed to show himself; swore he was in love with his wife, and intended to cuckold him. "Do you?" cried Moody, folding his arms, and scowling with his eyes thus—"You must have more wit than you used to have; besides, if you have as much as you think you have, I shall be out of your reach, and this profligate metropolis, in less than a week." Moody would fain have got rid of him, but the other held him by the sleeve, so I left 'em; rejoiced most luxuriously to see the poor devil tormented.

Bel. I thought you said, just now, that he was not married; is not that a contradiction, sir? [Harcourt still makes signs to Belville.]

Spark. Why, it is a kind of one; but considering your modesty, and ignorance of the young lady, you are pretty tolerably inquisitive, methinks; eh, Harcourt! ha, ha, ha!

Har. Pooh, pooh! don't talk to that boy, tell me all you know.

Spark. You must know, my booby of a brother-in-law hath brought up this ward of his (a good fortune let me tell you), as he coops up and fattens his chickens, for his own eating; he is plagu'y jealous of her, and was very sorry that he could not marry her in the country, without coming up to town; which he could not do on account of some writings or other; so what does my gentleman? He persuades the poor silly girl, by breaking a sixpence, or some nonsense or another, that they are to all intents married in heaven; but that the laws require the signing of articles, and the church service to complete their union: so he has made her call him husband, and bud, which she constantly does; and he calls her wife, and gives out she is married, that she may not look after younger fellows, nor younger fellows after her, egad; ha, ha, ha! and all won't do.

Bel. Thank you, sir. What heavenly news, uncle! [Aside.]

Har. What an idiot you are, nephew. [Apart.] And so then you make but one trouble of it, and are both to be tack'd together the same day?

Spark. No, no, he can't be married this week; he d—ns the lawyers for keeping him in town; besides, I am out of favour; and he is continually snarling at me, and abusing me for not being jealous. [Knocking at the door.] There he is; I must not be seen with you, or he'll suspect something; I'll go with your nephew to his house, and we'll wait for you, and make a visit to my wife that is to be, and perhaps we shall show young modesty here a sight of Peggy too.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Sir, here's the strange odd sort of a gentleman come again, and I have shown him into the fore-parlour.

Spark. That must be Moody. Well said, Will; an odd sort of a strange gentleman indeed; we'll step into the next room till he comes into this, and then you may have him all to yourself; much good may he do you. [Going.] Remember that he is married, or he'll suspect me of betraying him.

[Exeunt SPARKISH and BELVILLE.]

Har. Show him up, Will. [Exit Servant.] Now must I prepare myself to see a very strange, though a very natural metamorphosis; a once high-spirited, handsome, well-dress'd, raking prodigal of the town, sunk into a surly, suspicious, economical, country sloven.

Enter Moody.

Moody. Mr. Harcourt, your humble servant: have you forgot me?

Har. What, my old friend, Jack Moody! By thy long absence from the town, the grumness of thy countenance, and the slovenliness of thy habit, I should give thee joy; you are certainly married.

Moo. My long stay in the country will excuse my dress, and I have a suit at law that brings me up to town, and puts me out of humour; besides, I must give Sparkish ten thousand pounds to-morrow to take my sister off my hands.

Har. Your sister is very much obliged to you: being so much older than her, you have taken upon you the authority of a father, and have engaged her to a coxcomb.

Moo. I have, and to oblige her: nothing but coxcombs or debauchees are the favourites now a-days; and a coxcomb is rather the more innocent animal of the two.

Har. She has sense and taste, and can't like him; so you must answer for the consequences.

Moo. When she is out of my hands, her husband must look to the consequences. He's a fashionable fool, and will cut his horns kindly.

Har. And what is to secure your worship from consequences? I did not expect marriage from such a rake—one that knew the town so well; fie, fie, Jack.

Moo. I'll tell you my security; I have married no London wife.

Har. That's all one; that grave circumspection in marrying a country wife, is like refusing a deceitful, pamper'd, Smithfield jade, to go and be cheated by a friend in the country.

Moo. I wish the devil had both him and his simile.

[Aside.]

Har. Well, never grumble about it; what's done can't be undone. Is your wife handsome and young?

Moo. She has little beauty but her youth, nothing to brag of but her health, and no attraction but her modesty; wholesome, homely, and housewifely; that's all.

Har. You talk as like a grazier as you look, Jack. Why did you not bring her to town before, to be taught something?

Moo. Which something I might repent as long as I live.

Har. But pr'ythee, why wouldst thou marry her, if she be ugly, ill-bred, and silly: she must be rich then?

Moo. As rich as if she had the wealth of the mogul. She'll not ruin her husband, like a London baggage, with a million of vices she never heard of: then, because she's ugly, she's the likelier to be my own; and being ill-bred, she'll hate conversation; and since silly and innocent, will not know the difference between me and you; that is, between a man of thirty and one of forty.

Har. Fifty to my knowledge. [Moody turns off, and grumbles.] But see how you and I differ, Jack; wit to me is more necessary than beauty; I think no young woman ugly that has it, and no handsome woman agreeable without it.

Moo. 'Tis my maxim; he's a fool that marries; but he's a greater that does not marry a fool. I know the town, Mr. Harcourt; and my wife shall be virtuous in spite of you or your nephew.

Har. My nephew! poor sheepish lad, he runs away from every woman he sees: he saw your sister Alithea at the opera, and was much smitten with her; he always toasts her, and hates the very name of Sparkish. I'll bring him to your house, and you shall see what a formidable Tarquin he is.

Moo. I have no curiosity, so give yourself no trouble.—You have heard of a wolf in sheep's clothing; and I have seen your innocent nephew kissing his hands at my windows.

Har. At your sister, I suppose; not at her unless he was tipsy. How can you, Jack, be so outrageously suspicious? Sparkish has promised to introduce him to his mistress.

Moo. Sparkish is a fool, and may be what I'll take care not to be.—I confess my visit to you, Mr. Harcourt, was partly for old acquaintance sake, but chiefly to desire your nephew to confine his gallantries to the tavern, and not send 'em in looks, signs, or tokens, on the other side of the way. I keep no brothel; so pray tell your nephew.

[Going.]

Har. Nay, pr'ythee, Jack, leave me in better humour. Well, I'll tell him; ha, ha, ha! Poor Dick, how he'll stare. This will give him a reputation, and the girls won't laugh at him any longer. Shall we dine together at the tavern, and send for my nephew to chide him for his gallantry? Ha, ha, ha! we shall have fine sport.

Moo. I am not to be laugh'd out of my senses, Mr. Harcourt. I was once a modest young gentleman myself; and I never have been half so mischievous before or since, as I was in that state of innocence.—And so, old friend, make no ceremony with me; I have much business, and you have much pleasure, and, therefore, as I hate forms, I will excuse your returning my visit, or sending your nephew to satisfy me of his modesty—and so your servant.

[Erit.]

Har. Ha, ha, ha! poor Jack! what a life of suspicion does he lead! I pity the poor fellow, though he ought and will suffer for his folly.—Folly!—'tis treason, murder, sacrilege! When persons of a certain age will indulge their false, ungenerous appetites, at the expense of a young creature's happiness, dame Nature will revenge herself upon them, for thwarting her most heavenly will and pleasure.

[Erit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Chamber in Moody's house.

Enter PEGGY and ALITHEA.

Peg. Pray, sister, where are the best fields and woods to walk in in London?

Ali. A pretty question! Why, sister, Vauxhall, Kensington Gardens, and St. James's Park, are the most frequented.

Peg. Pray, sister, tell me why my bud looks so grum here in town, and keeps me up so close, and won't let me go a-walking, nor let me wear my best gown yesterday?

Ali. O, he's jealous, sister!

Peg. Jealous! What's that?

Ali. He's afraid you should love another man.

Peg. How should he be afraid of my loving another man, when he will not let me see any but himself?

Ali. Did he not carry you yesterday to the play?

Peg. Ay; but we sat amongst ugly people: he would not let me come near the gentry, who sat under us, so that I could not see 'em. He told me none but naughty women sat there; but I would have ventured for all that.

Ali. But how do you like the play?

Peg. Indeed I was weary of the play; but I liked hugely the actors; they are the goodliest, properest men, sister.

Ali. O, but you must not like the actors, sister.

Peg. Ay, how should I help it, sister? Pray, sister, when my guardian comes in, will you ask leave for me to go a-walking?

Ali. A-walking! ha, ha, ha! Lord, a country gentlewoman's pleasure is the drudgery of a foot-post; and she requires as much airing as her husband's horses. [Aside.] But here comes my brother; I'll ask him, though I'm sure he'll not grant it.

Enter MOODY.

Peg. O my dear, dear bud, welcome home; why dost thou look so frolish? Who has nager'd thee?

Moo. You're a fool: [PEGGY goes aside and cries.]

Ali. Faith, and so she is, for crying for no fault; poor, tender creature!

Moo. What, would you have her as impudent as yourself; as arrant a girlfirt, a gadder, a magpie; and to say all, a mere notorious town woman.

Ali. Brother, you are my only censurer; and the honour of your family will sooner suffer in your wife that is to be, than in me, though I take the innocent liberty of the town.

Moo. Hark you, mistress; do not talk so before my wife: the innocent liberty of the town!

Ali. Pray what ill people frequent my lodgings? I keep no company with any woman of scandalous reputation.

Moo. No, you keep the men of scandalous reputation company.

Ali. Would you not have me civil? Answer them at public places? Walk with them when they join me in the Park, Kensington Gardens, or Vauxhall?

Moo. Hold, hold; do not teach my wife where the men are to be found; I believe she's the worse for your town documents already. I bid you keep her in ignorance as I do.

Peg. Indeed, be not angry with her, bud: she will tell me nothing of the town, though I ask her a thousand times a day.

Moo. Then you are very inquisitive to know, I find.

Peg. Not I, indeed, dear; I hate London: our place-house in the country is worth a thousand of't; would I were there again!

Moo. So you shall, I warrant. But were you not talking of plays and players when I came in? You are her encourager in such discourses. [To ALITHEA.]

Peg. No, indeed, dear; she chid me just now for liking the player-men.

Moo. Nay, if she is so innocent as to own to me her liking them, there's no harm in't. [Aside.] Come, my poor rogue, but thou likest none better than me?

Peg. Yes, indeed, but I do: the player-men are finer folks.

Moo. But you love none better than me?

Peg. You are my own dear bud, and I know you: I hate strangers.

Moo. Ay, my dear, you must love me only; and not be like the naughty town women, who only hate their husbands, and love every man else; love plays, visits, fine coaches, fine clothes, fiddles, balls, treats, and so lead a wicked town life.

Peg. Nay, if to enjoy all these things be a town life, London is not so bad a place, dear.

Moo. How! if you love me you must hate London.

Peg. But, bud, do the town women love the player-men too?

Moo. Ay, I warrant you.

Peg. Ay, I warrant you.

Moo. Why, you do not, I hope?

Peg. No, no, bud; but why have we no player-men in the country?

Moo. Ha! Mrs. Minx, ask me no more to go to a play.

Peg. Nay, why, love? I did not care for going; but when you forbid me, you make me, as it were, desire it. Pray let me go to a play, dear?

Moo. Hold your peace; I won't.

Peg. Why, love?

Moo. Why, I'll tell you.

Peg. Pray, why, dear?

Moo. First, you like the actors: and the gallants may like you.

Peg. What, a homely country girl? No, bud, nobody will like me.

Moo. I tell you yes, they may.

Peg. No, no, you jest—I won't believe you; I will go.

Moo. I tell you, then, that one of the most raking fellows in town, who saw you there, told me he was in love with you.

Peg. Indeed: who, who, pray, who was't?

Moo. I've gone too far, and slept before I was aware. How overjoy'd she is! [Aside.]

Peg. Was it any Hampshire gallant? any of our neighbours?—'Promise you I am beholden to him.

Moo. I promise you, you lie; for he would but ruin you, as he has done hundreds.

Peg. Ay, but if he loves me, why should he ruin me? Answer me to that. Methinks he should not; I would do him no harm.

Ali. Ha, ha, ha!

Moo. 'Tis very well; but I'll keep him from doing you any harm, or me either. But here comes company; get you in, get you in.

Peg. But pray, husband, is he a pretty gentleman that loves me?

Moo. In, baggage, in. [Thrusts her in, and shuts the door.] What, all the libertines of the town brought to my lodging by this easy coxcomb! 'Sdeath! I'll not suffer it.

Enter SPARKISH, HARCOURT, and BELVILLE.

Spark. Here, Belville, do you approve my choice? Dear little rogue, I told you I'd bring you acquainted with all my friends the wits. [To ALITHEA.]

Moo. Ay, they shall know her as well as you yourself will, I warrant you. [Aside.]

Spark. This is one of those, my pretty rogue, that are to dance at your wedding to-morrow; and one you must make welcome; for he's modest. [BELVILLE crosses and salutes ALITHEA; HARCOURT does the same.] Harcourt makes himself welcome, and has not the same foible, though of the same family.

Har. You are too obliging, Sparkish. [ALITHEA and SPARKISH retire.]

Moo. And so he is, indeed. The fop's horns will as naturally sprout upon his brows as mushrooms upon dunghills. [Aside.]

Har. This, Mr. Moody, is my nephew you mentioned to me. I would bring him with me; for a sight of him will be sufficient, without poppy or mandragora, to restore you to your rest. [Joins ALITHEA and SPARKISH.]

Bel. I am sorry, sir, that any mistake or imprudence of mine should have given you any uneasiness: it was not so intended, I assure you, sir.

Moo. It may be so, sir, but not the less criminal for that. My wife, sir, must not be smirk'd and nodded at from tavern windows. I am a good shot, young gentleman, and don't suffer magpies to come near my cherries.

Bel. Was it your wife, sir?

Moo. What's that to you, sir? Suppose it were my grandmother.

Bel. I would not dare to offend her.—Permit me to say a word in private to you.

[Exit MOODY and BELVILLE.]

Spark. Now old surly is gone, tell me Harcourt, if thou likest her as well as ever.—My dear, don't look down; I should hate to have a wife of mine out of countenance at any thing.

Ali. For shame, Mr. Sparkish!

Spark. Tell me, I say, Harcourt, how dost like her? Thou hast stared upon her enough to resolve me.

Har. So infinitely well, that I could wish I had a mistress too, that might differ from her in nothing but her love and engagement to you.

Ali. Sir, Mr. Sparkish has often told me that his acquaintance were all wits and railers; and now I find it.

Spark. No, by the universe, madam, he does not rally now; you may believe him. I do assure you he is the honestest, worthiest, truest-hearted gentleman; a man of such perfect honour, he would say nothing to a lady he does not mean.

Har. Sir, you are so beyond expectation obliging, that—

Spark. Nay, 'egad, I am sure you do admire her extremely; I see it in your eyes.—He does admire you, madam; he has told me so a thousand and a thousand times; have you not, Harcourt? You do admire her; by the world, you do—don't you?

Har. Yes, above the world, or the most glorious part of it, her whole sex; and till now, I never thought I should have envied you or any man about to marry; but you have the best excuse to marry I ever knew.

Ali. Nay, now, sir, I am satisfied you are of the society of the wits and railers, since you cannot spare your friend, even when he is most civil to you; but the surest sign is, you are an enemy to marriage, the common butt of every railer.

Har. Truly, madam, I was never any enemy to marriage till now, because marriage was never an enemy to me before.

Ali. But why, sir, is marriage an enemy to you now? Because it robs you of your friend here? For you look upon a friend married as one gone into a monastery, that is dead to the world.

Har. 'Tis indeed, because you marry him: I see, madam, you can guess my meaning. I do confess heartily and openly, I wish it were in my power to break the match; by heavens I would.

Spark. Poor Frank!

Ali. Would you be so unkind to me?

Har. No, no; 'tis not because I would be unkind to you.

Spark. Poor Frank! No, egad, 'tis only his kindness to me.

Ali. Great kindness to you, indeed!—Insensible! Let a man make love to his mistress to his face.

[Aside.]

Spark. Come, dear Frank, for all my wife there, that shall be, thou shalt enjoy my company sometimes, dear rogue.—By my honour, we men of wit condole for our deceased brother in marriage, as much as for one dead in earnest. I think that was prettily said of me, ha, Harcourt? Pr'ythee, Frank, don't think my wife that shall be, there, a fine person?

Har. I could gaze upon her till I became as blind as you are.

Spark. How as I am? How?

Har. Because you are a lover; and true lovers are blind.

Spark. True, true; but by the world she has wit too, as well as beauty. Go, go, with her into a corner, and try if she has wit; [He puts HARCOURT over to ALITHEA.] talk to her anything, she's bashful before me—take her into a corner. [HARCOURT courts ALITHEA aside.]

Re-enter MOODY.

Moo. How, sir! If you are not concerned for the honour of a wife, I am for that of a sister. Be a pander to your own wife, bring men to her, let 'em make love before your face, thrust them into a corner together, then leave 'em in private! Is this your town wit and conduct?

Spark. Ha, ha, ha! a silly, wise rogue would make one laugh more than a stark fool, ha, ha, ha! I shall burst. Nay, you shall not disturb 'em; I'll vex thee by the world. What have you done with Belville? [Struggles with MOODY to keep him from HARCOURT and ALITHEA.]

Moo. Shewn him the way out of my house, as you should to that gentleman.

Spark. Nay, but pr'ythee let me reason with thee. [Talks apart with MOODY.]

Ali. The writings are drawn, sir—settlements made: 'tis too late, sir, and past all revocation.

Har. Then so is my death.

Ali. I would not be unjust to him.

Har. Then why to me so?

Ali. I have no obligations to you.

Har. My love.

Ali. I had his before.

Har. You never had it: he wants, you see, jealousy, the only infallible sign of it.

Ali. Love proceeds from esteem: he cannot distrust my virtue; besides, he loves me, or he would not marry me.

Har. Marrying you is no more a sign of his love, than bribing your woman, that he may marry you is a sign of his generosity. But if you take marriage for a sign of love, take it from me immediately.

Ali. No, now you have put a scruple in my head.—But, in short, sir, to end our dispute, I must marry him; my reputation would suffer in the world else.

Har. No: if you do marry him, with your pardon, madam, your reputation must suffer in the world.

Ali. Nay, now you are rude, sir. Mr. Sparkish, pray come hither, your friend here is very troublesome and very loving.

Har. Hold, hold! [Aside to ALITHEA.]

Moo. D'y'e hear that, senseless puppy?

Spark. Why, d'y'e think I'll seem jealous, like a country bumpkin?

Moo. No; rather be dishonour'd, like a credulous driveller. [They retire.]

Har. Madam, you would not have been so little generous as to have told him?

Ali. Yes, since you could be so little generous as to wrong him.

Har. Wrong him! no man can do it; he's beneath an injury: a bubble, a coward, a senseless idiot! a wretch, so contemptible to all the world but you, that—

Ali. Hold, do not rail at him; for, since he is like to be my husband, I am resolved to like him:

may, I think I am obliged to tell him, you are not his friend. Mr. Sparkish! Mr. Sparkish!

Spark. What—what? Now, dear rogue, has she not wit?

Har. Not so much as I thought, and hoped she had. [Surlily.]

Ali. Mr. Sparkish, do you bring people to rail at you?

Har. Madam!

Spark. How! No; but if he does rail at me, 'tis but in jest, I warrant: what we wits do for one another, and never take any notice of it.

Ali. He spoke so scurrilously of you, I had no patience to hear him.

Moo. And he was in the right on't.

Ali. Besides, he has been making love to me.

Moo. And I told the fool so.

Har. True; d—d tell-tale woman! [Aside.]

Spark. Psha! to shew his parts; we wits rail and make love often, but to shew our parts: as we have no affections, so we have no malice. We—

Moo. Did you ever hear such an ass?

Ali. He said you were a wretch, below an injury.

Spark. Psha!

Ali. A common bubble.

Spark. Psha!

Ali. A coward!

Spark. Psha! psha!

Ali. A senseless, drivelling idiot.

Moo. True, true, true; all true.

Spark. How, did he disparage my parts? Nay then, my honour's concerned. I can't put up that. Brother, help me to kill him. [Offers to draw.]

Ali. Hold! hold!

Moo. If Harcourt would but kill Sparkish, and run away with my sister, I should be rid of three plagues at once. [Aside.]

Ali. Indeed, to tell the truth, the gentleman said, after all, that what he spoke was but out of friendship to you.

Spark. How! say I am a fool,—that is, no wit,—out of friendship to me!

Ali. Yes, to try whether I was concerned enough for you; and made love to me only to be satisfied of my virtue, for your sake.

Har. Kind, however! [Aside.]

Spark. Nay, if it were so, my dear rogue, I ask thee pardon; but why would not you tell me so, 'faith?

Har. Because I did not think on't, 'faith.

Spark. Come, Belville is gone away: Harcourt, let's be gone to the new play; come, madam.

Ali. I will not go, if you intend to leave me alone in the box, and run all about the house, as you used to do.

Spark. Psha! I'll leave Harcourt with you in the box, to entertain you, and that's as good. If I sat in the box, I should be thought no critic. I must run about, my dear, and abuse the author. Come away, Harcourt, lead her down. B'ye, brother.

[Exit HARCOURT, SPARKISH, and ALITHEA.]

Moo. B'ye, driveller. Well, go thy ways, for the flower of the true town fops; such as spend their estates before they come to 'em, and are cuckolds before they're married. But let me go look to my freehold.

Enter a Countryman.

Country. Master, your worship's servant. Here is the lawyer, counsellor gentleman, with a green bag full of papers, come again, and would be glad to speak to you.

Moo. Now here's some other d—d impediment, which the law has thrown in our way. I shall never marry the girl, nor get clear of the smoke and wickedness of this cursed town. [Aside.] Where is he?

Country. He's below in a coach, with three other lawyers, counsellor gentlemen. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Another Chamber.

Enter PEGGY and LUCY.

Lucy. What ails you, Miss Peggy? You are grown quite melancholy.

Peg. Would it not make any one melancholy to see your mistress, Alithea, go every day fluttering about abroad to plays and assemblies, and I know not what, whilst I must stay at home, like a poor, lonely, sullen bird in a cage?

Lucy. Dear Miss Peggy, I thought you chose to be confined: I imagined that you had been bred so young to the cage, that you had no pleasure in flying about, and hopping in the open air, as other young ladies who go a little wild about this town.

Peg. Nay, I confess I was quiet enough, till somebody told me what pure lives the London ladies lead, with their dancing-meetings, and junketings, and dress'd every day in their best gowns; and, I warrant you, play at nine-pins every day in the week, so they do.

Lucy. To be sure, miss, you will lead a better life when join'd in holy wedlock with your sweet-temper'd guardian, the cheerful Mr. Moody.

Peg. I can't lead a worse, that's one good thing; but I must make the best of a bad market, for I can't marry nobody else.

Lucy. How so, miss? That's very strange.

Peg. Why, we have a contraction to one another; so we are as good as married, you know.

Lucy. I know it! Heaven forbid, miss!

Peg. Heigho!

Lucy. Don't sigh, Miss Peggy; if that young gentleman, who was here just now, would take pity on me, I'd throw such a contract as your's behind the fire.

Peg. Lord bless us, how you talk!

Lucy. Young Mr. Belville would make you talk otherwise, if you knew him.

Peg. Mr. Belville! Where is he? When did you see him? You have undone me, Lucy. Where was he? Did he say anything?

Lucy. Say anything! very little indeed; he's quite distracted, poor young creature! He was talking with your guardian just now.

Peg. The deuce he was! but where was it, and when was it?

Lucy. In this house, five minutes ago, when your guardian turn'd you into your chamber, for fear of your being seen.

Peg. I knew something was the matter, I was in such a flutter. But what did he say to my bud?

Lucy. What do you call him bud for? Bud means husband, and he is not your husband yet, and I hope never will be; and, if he were my husband, I'd bud him, a surly, unreasonable beast!

Peg. I'd call him any names, to keep him in good humour; if he'd let me marry anybody else (which I can't do), I'd call him husband as long as he lived. But what said Mr. Belville to him?

Lucy. I don't know what he said to him, but I'll tell you what he said to me, with a sigh, and his hand upon his breast as he went out of the door:—"If you ever were in love, young gentlewoman (meaning me), and can pity a most faithful lover, tell the dear object of my affections——"

Peg. Meaning me, Lucy?

Lucy. Yes, you, to be sure.—"Tell the dear object of my affections, I live but upon the hopes that she is not married; and when those hopes leave me, she knows the rest;" then he cast up his eyes thus,—gnash'd his teeth—struck his forehead;—would have spoke again, but he could not,—fetch'd a deep sigh, and vanish'd.

Peg. That is really very fine: I am sure it makes my heart sink within me, and brings tears into my eyes. O, he's a charming, sweet—But hush, hush! I hear my husband.

Lucy. Don't call him husband. Go into the Park this evening, if you can.

Peg. Mum, mum.

Enter Moody.

Moo. Come, what's here to do? you are putting the town pleasures in her head, and setting her a-longing.

Lucy. Yes, after nine-pins; you suffer none to give her those longings but yourself.

Moo. Come, Mrs. Pippant, good precepts are lost when bad examples are still before us: the liberty your mistress takes abroad makes her hanker after it, and out of humour at home. Poor wretch! she desired not to come to London; I would bring her.

Lucy. O yes, you surfeit her with pleasures.

Moo. She has been this fortnight in town, and never desired, till this afternoon, to go abroad.

Lucy. Was she not at the play yesterday?

Moo. Yes, but she never ask'd me; I was myself the cause of her going.

Lucy. Then if she ask you again, you are the cause of her asking, and not my mistress.

Moo. Well, next week I shall be rid of you all, rid of this town, and my dreadful apprehensions. Come, be not melancholy, for thou shalt go into the country very soon, dearest.

Peg. Pish! what d'ye tell me of the country for?

Moo. How's this? What! flout at the country?

Peg. Let me alone; I am not well.

Moo. O, if that be all—what ails my dearest?

Peg. Truly, I don't know; but I have not been well since you told me there was a gallant at the play in love with me.

Moo. Ha!

Lucy. That's my mistress too.

Moo. Nay, if you are not well, but are so concern'd, because a raking fellow chanced to lie, and say he liked you, you'll make me sick too.

Peg. Of what sickness?

Moo. O, of that which is worse than the plague; jealousy!

Peg. Pish! you jeer: I'm sure there's no such disease in your receipt-book at home.

Moo. No, you never met with it, poor innocent.

Peg. Well, but pray, bud, let's go to a play to-night.

Moo. No, no; no more plays. But why are you so eager to see a play?

Peg. Faith, dear, not that I care one pin for their talk there; but I like to look upon the player-men, and would see, if I could, the gallant you say loves me; that's all, dear bud.

Moo. Is that all, dear bud?

Lucy. [Aside.] This proceeds from my mistress's example.

Peg. Let's go abroad, however, dear bud, if we don't go to the play.

Moo. Come, have a little patience, and thou shalt go into the country next week.

Peg. Therefore I would first see some sights to tell my neighbours of: nay, I will go abroad, that's once.

Moo. What, you have put this into her head?

[To Lucy.]

Lucy. Heaven defend me, what suspicions! somebody has put more things into your head than you ought to have.

Moo. Your tongue runs too glibly, madam; and you have lived too long with a London lady, to be a proper companion for innocence. I am not overfond of you, mistress.

Lucy. There's no love lost between us.

Moo. You admitted those gentlemen into the house, when I said I would not be at home; and there was the young fellow too who behaved so indecent to my wife at the tavern window.

Lucy. Because you would not let him see your handsome wife out of your lodgings.

Peg. Why, O lord, did the gentleman come hither to see me indeed?

Moo. No, no. You are not the cause of that d—d question, too?

[To Lucy.]

Peg. Come, pray, bud, let's go abroad before 'tis late; for I will go, that's flat and plain—only into the Park.

Moo. So! the obstinacy already of the town wife; and I must, while she's here, humour her like one.

[Aside.] How shall we do, that she may not be seen or known?

Lucy. Muffle her up with a bonnet and cloak, and I'll go with her to avoid suspicion.

Moo. No, no, I am obliged to you for your kindness, but she shan't stir without me.

Lucy. What will you do then?

Peg. What, shall we go? I am sick with staying at home: if I don't walk in the Park, I'll do nothing that I'm bid for a week. I won't be mop'd.

Lucy. O, she has a charming spirit! I could stand your friend now, and would, if you had ever a civil word to give me.

[To Moody.]

Moo. I'll give thee a better thing; I'll give thee a guinea for thy good advice, if I like it; and I can have the best of the college for the same money.

Lucy. I despise a bribe: when I am your friend, it shall be without fee or reward.

Peg. Don't be long then, for I will go out.

Lucy. The tailor brought home last night the clothes you intend for a present to your godson in the country.

Peg. You must not tell that, Lucy.

Lucy. But I will, madam. When you were with your lawyers last night, Miss Peggy, to divert me and herself, put 'em on, and they fitted her to a hair.

Moo. Thank you, thank you, Lucy, 'tis the luckiest thought! Go this moment, Peggy, into your chamber, and put 'em on again, and you shall walk with me into the Park, as my godson. Well thought of, Lucy; I shall love you for ever for this.

Peg. And so shall I too, Lucy: I'll put 'em on directly. [Going.] I suppose, bud, I must keep on my petticoats, for fear of showing my legs.

Moo. No, no, you fool! never mind your legs.

[Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The Park.

Enter BELVILLE and HARCOURT.

Bel. And the moment Moody left me, I took an opportunity of conveying some tender sentiments through Lucy to Miss Peggy; and here I am, in expectation of seeing my country goddess.

Har. And so to blind Moody, and take him off the scent of your passion for this girl, and at the same time to give me an opportunity with Sparkish's mistress (and of which I have made the most), you hinted to him with a grave melancholy face, that you were dying for his sister. Gad-a-mercy, nephew! I will back thy modesty against any other in the three kingdoms: it will do, Dick.

Bel. What could I do, uncle? It was my last stake, and I play'd for a great deal.

Har. You mistake me, Dick; I don't say you could do better; I only can't account for your modesty's doing so much: you have done such wonders, that I, who am rather bold than sheepish, have not yet ceased wondering at you. But do you think that you imposed upon him?

Bel. Faith, I can't say; he said very little, grumbled much, shook his head, and shewed me the door. But what success have you had with Alithea?

Har. Just enough to have a glimmering of hope, without having light enough to see an inch before my nose. This day will produce something:—Alithea is a woman of great honour, and will sacrifice her happiness to it, unless Sparkish's absurdity stands my friend, and does everything that the fates ought to do for me.

Bel. Yonder comes the prince of coxcombs, and if your mistress and mine should, by chance, be tripping this way, this fellow will spoil sport: let us avoid him; you can't cheat him before his face.

Har. But I can though, thanks to my wit, and his want of it.

Bel. But you cannot come near his mistress but in his company.

Har. Still the better for me, nephew, for fools are most easily cheated, when they themselves are accessories; and he is to be bubbled of his mistress, or of his money (the common mistress,) by keeping him company.

Enter SPARKISH.

Spark. Who's that that is to be bubbled? Faith, let me snack; I han't met with a bubble since Christmas. 'Gad, I think bubbles, like their brother woodcocks, go out with the cold weather.

Har. He did not hear all, I hope. [Apart to BEL.]

Spark. Come, you bubbling rogues, you, where do we sup? O, Harcourt, my mistress tells me you have made love—fierce love to her last night, all the play long—ha, ha, ha!—but I—

Ha. I make love to her?

Spark. Nay, I forgive thee, and I know her; but I am sure I know myself.

Bel. Do you, sir? Then you are the wisest man in the world, and I honour you as such. [Bows.]

Spark. O, your servant, sir: you are at your railery, are you? You can't oblige me more; I'm your man: he'll meet with his match. Ha! Harcourt! did not you hear me laugh prodigiously at the play last night?

Har. Yes, and was very much disturb'd at it.

You put the actors and audience into confusion, and all your friends out of countenance.

Spark. So much the better: I love confusion, and to see folks out of countenance: I was in tip-top spirits, faith, and said a thousand good things.

Bel. But I thought you had gone to plays to laugh at the poet's good things, and not at your own.

Spark. Your servant, sir; no, I thank you. 'Gad, I go to a play, as to a country treat: I carry my own wine to one, and my own wit to t'other, or else I'm sure I should not be merry at either; and the reason why we are so often louder than the players is, because we hate authors damnably.

Bel. But why should you hate the poor rogues? You have too much wit, and despise writing, I'm sure.

Spark. O yes, I despise writing; but women, women, that make men do all foolish things, make 'em write songs too. Everybody does it; 'tis e'en as common with lovers, as playing with fans: and you can no more help rhyming to your Phillis, than drinking to your Phillis.

Har. But the poets damn'd your songs, did they?

Spark. D—n the poets! they turn'd them into burlesque, as they call it: that burlesque is a hocus-pocus trick they have got, which, by the virtue of hiccus-doccus, topsy-turvy, they make a clever witty thing absolute nonsense. Do you know, Harcourt, that they ridiculed my last song! "Twang, twang," the best I ever wrote.

Har. That may be, and be very easily ridiculed for all that.

Bel. Favour me with it, sir; I never heard it.

Spark. What, and have all the Park about us?

Har. Which you'll not dislike; and so, pr'ythee begin.

Spark. I never am ask'd twice, and so have at you.

SONG.

*Tell me not of the roses and lilies
Which tinge the fair cheek of your Phillis;
Tell me not of the dimples and eyes,
For which silly Corydon dies.
Let all whining lovers go hang;
My heart, would you hit,
Tip your arrow with wit,
And it comes to my heart with a twang, twang,
And it comes to my heart with a twang.*

[At the end of the song, HARCOURT and BELVILLE steal away from SPARKISH, and leave him singing; he sinks his voice by degrees at the surprise of their being gone.]

Re-enter HARCOURT and BELVILLE.

What the deuce did you go away for?

Har. Your mistress is coming.

Spark. The devil she is! O hide, hide me from her! [Hides behind HARCOURT.]

Har. She sees you.

Spark. But I will not see her; for I'm engaged, and at this instant. [Looking at his watch.]

Har. Pray first take me, and reconcile me to her.

Spark. Another time; faith, it is the lady, and one cannot make excuses to a woman.

Bel. You have need of 'em, I believe.

Spark. Psha! pr'ythee hide me!

Enter MOODY, PEGGY, in boy's clothes, and ALITHEA.

Har. Your servant, Mr. Moody.

Mo. Come along.

To PEGGY.

Peg. La! what a sweet delightful place this is!
Moo. Come along, I say, don't stare about you so; you'll betray yourself.

[Exit, pulling PEGGY, ALITHEA following.]

Har. He does not know us.

Bel. Or he won't know us.

Spark. So much the better.

[Exit, BELVILLE after them.]

Har. Who is that pretty youth with him, Sparkish?

Spark. Some relation of Peggy's, I suppose; for he is something like her in face and gawkiness.

Re-enter BELVILLE.

Bel. By all my hopes, uncle, Peggy in boy's clothes. I am all over agitation. [Apart to HARCOURT.]

Har. Be quiet, or you'll spoil all. They return.—Alithea has seen you, Sparkish, and will be angry if you don't go to her: besides, I would fain be reconciled to her, which none but you can do, my dear friend.

Spark. Well, that's a better reason, dear friend: I would not go near her now for her's or my own sake; but I can deny you nothing: for though I have known thee a great while, never go, if I do not love thee as well as a new acquaintance.

Har. I am obliged to you, indeed, my dear friend; I would be well with her, only to be well with thee still; for these ties to wives usually dissolve all ties to friends.

Spark. But they shan't though. Come along. [They retire.]

Re-enter MOODY, PEGGY, and ALITHEA.

Moo. Sister, if you will not go, we must leave you. [To ALITHEA.] The fool, her gallant, and she will muster up all the young saunterers of this place. What a swarm of cuckolds and cuckold-makers are here! I begin to be uneasy. [Aside.] Come, let's be gone, Peggy.

Peg. Don't you believe that; I han't half my belly-full of sights yet.

Moo. Then walk this way.

Peg. Lord, what a power of fine folks are here!—And Mr. Belville, as I hope to be married. [Aside.]

Moo. Come along; what are you muttering at?

Peg. There's the young gentleman there, you were so angry about, that's in love with me.

Moo. No, no; he's a dangler after your sister, or pretends to be; but they are all bad alike. Come along, I say.

[MOODY pulls PEGGY away. Re-enter PEGGY and MOODY, BELVILLE following. SPARKISH, HARCOURT, and ALITHEA come forward.]

Spark. Come, dear madam, for my sake you shall be reconciled to him.

Ali. For your sake I hate him.

Har. That's something too cruel, madam, to hate me for his sake.

Spark. Ay, indeed, madam, too cruel to me, to hate my friend for my sake.

Ali. I hate him because he is your enemy; and you ought to hate him too for making love to me, if you love me.

Spark. That's a good one! I hate a man for loving you? If he did love you, 'tis but what he can't help; and 'tis your fault, not his, if he admires you.

Ali. Is it for your honour, or mine, to suffer a man to make love to me, who am to marry you to-morrow?

Har. But why, dearest madam, will you be more concerned for his honour than he is himself? Let his honour alone, for my sake and his. He has no honour.

Spark. How's that?

Har. But what my dear friend can guard himself.

Spark. O ho—that's right again.

Ali. You astonish me, sir, with want of jealousy.

Spark. And you make me giddy, madam, with your jealousy and fears, and virtue and honour. 'Gad, I see virtue makes a woman as troublesome as a little reading or learning.

Har. Come, madam, you see you strive in vain to make him jealous of me: my dear friend is the kindest creature in the world to me.

Spark. Poor fellow!

Har. But his kindness only is not enough for me, without your favour, your good opinion, dear madam: 'tis that must perfect my happiness. Good gentleman, he believes all I say: 'would you would do so!—Jealous of me! I would not wrong him nor you for the world.

Spark. Look you there: hear him, hear him, and not walk away so; come back again. [ALITHEA walks carelessly to and fro.]

Har. I love you, madam, so—

Spark. How's that? Nay, now you begin to go too far indeed.

Har. So much, I confess I say I love you, that I would not have you miserable, and cast yourself away upon so unworthy and inconsiderable a thing as what you see here. [Claps his hand on his breast, and points to SPARKISH.]

Spark. No, faith, I believe thou wouldst not; now his meaning is plain; but I knew before thou wouldst not wrong me nor her.

Har. No, no, heavens forbid the glory of her sex should fall so low as into the embraces of such a contemptible wretch, the least of mankind—my dear friend here—I injure him. [Embraces SPARKISH.]

Ali. Very well.

Spark. No, no, dear friend, I knew it: madam, you see he will rather wrong himself than me in giving himself such names.

Ali. Do not you understand him yet?

Spark. Come, come, you shall stay till he has saluted you

Re-enter MOODY and PEGGY, BELVILLE at a distance.

Moo. What, invite your wife to kiss men? monstrous! Are you not ashamed?

Spark. Are you not ashamed that I should have more confidence in the chastity of your family than you have? You must not teach me: I am a man of honour, sir, though I am frank and free; I am frank, sir—

Moo. Very frank, sir, to share your wife with your friends.—You seem to be angry, and yet won't go. [To ALITHEA.]

Ali. No impertinence shall drive me away.

Moo. Because you like it.—But you ought to blush at exposing your wife as you do. [To SPARKISH.]

Spark. What then? It may be I have a pleasure in't as I have to show fine clothes at a play-house the first day, and count money before poor rogues.

Moo. He that shows his wife or money, will be in danger of having them borrowed sometimes.

Spark. I love to be envied, and would not marry a wife that I alone could love. Loving alone is as dull as eating alone; and so good night, for I must to Whitehall. Madam, I hope you are now reconciled to my friend; and so I wish you a good night, madam, and sleep if you can; for to-morrow, you know, I must visit you early with a canonical gentleman. Good night, dear Harcourt—remember to send your brother. [Exit.]

Har. You may depend upon me. Madam, I hope you will not refuse my visit to-morrow, if it should be earlier, with a canonical gentleman, than Mr. Sparkish?

Moo. This gentlewoman is yet under my care, therefore you must yet forbear your freedom with her.

Har. Must, sir?

Moo. Yes, sir, she is my sister.

Har. 'Tis well she is, sir; for I must be her servant, sir.—Madam—

Moo. Come away, sister; we had been gone if it had not been for you, and so avoided these lewd rake-hells, who seem to haunt us.

Har. I see a little time in the country makes a man turn wild and unsociable, and only fit to converse with his horses, dogs, and his herds.

Moo. I have business, sir, and must mind it: your business is pleasure; therefore you and I must go different ways.

Har. Well, you may go on; but this pretty young gentleman [Takes hold of PEGGY.] shall stay with us; for I suppose his business is the same with ours, pleasure.

Moo. 'Sdeath, he knows her, she carries it so silly; yet if he does not, I should be more silly to discover it first. [Aside.] Come, come.

Har. Had you not rather stay with us? [To PEGGY.] Pr'ythee who is this pretty young fellow? [To MOODY.]

Moo. One to whom I am guardian.—I wish I could keep her out of your hands. [Aside.]

Har. Who is he? I never saw any thing so pretty in all my life.

Moo. Pshaw, do not look upon him so much; he's a poor, bashful youth; you'll put him out of countenance. [Offers to take her away.]

Har. Here, nephew, let me introduce this young gentleman to your acquaintance. You are very like, and of the same age, and should know one another. Salute him, Dick, à la Française.

[BELVILLE kisses her.]

Moo. I hate French fashions. Men kiss one another! [Endeavours to take hold of her.]

Peg. I am out of my wits. [Aside.] What do you kiss me for? I am no woman.

Har. But you are ten times handsomer.

Peg. Nay, now you jeer one; and pray don't jeer me.

Har. Kiss him again, Dick.

Moo. No, no, no;—come away, come away. [To PEGGY.]

Har. Why, what haste you are in! Why won't you let me talk with him?

Moo. Because you'll debauch him; he's yet young and innocent.—How she gazes upon him! The devil! [Aside.] Come, pray let him go; I cannot stay fooling any longer: I tell you my wife stays upper for us.

Har. Does she? Come then, we'll all go sup with her.

Moo. No, no: now I think on't, having staid so long for us, I warrant she's gone to bed.—I wish she and I were well out of your hands. [Aside.]

Har. Well then, if she be gone to bed, I wish her and you a good night. But pray, young gentleman, present my humble service to her.

Peg. Thank you heartily, sir

Moo. 'Sdeath, she will discover herself yet in spite of me. [Aside.]

Bel. And mine too, sir.

Peg. That I will indeed. [Bows.]

Har. Pray give her this kiss for me.

[Kisses PEGGY.]

Moo. O heavens! What do I suffer? [Aside.]

Bel. And this for me. [Kisses PEGGY.]

Peg. Thank you, sir.

[Courtesses.—BELVILLE and HARCOURT laugh, and exeunt.]

Moo. O the idiot!—Now 'tis out. Ten thousand cankers gnaw away their lips! [Aside.] Come, come, driveller. [MOODY, PEGGY and ALITHEA go out and return.] So, they are gone at last.—Sister, stay with Peggy, till I find my servant. Don't let her stir an inch: I'll be back directly. [Exit.]

Re-enter HARCOURT and BELVILLE.

Har. What, not gone yet? Nephew, show the young gentlemen Rosamond's pond, while I speak another word to this lady.

[EXECUT BELVILLE and PEGGY; ALITHEA and HARCOURT struggle.]

Ali. My brother will go distracted.

Re-enter MOODY.

Moo. Where? how?—What's become of—gone!—whither?

Ali. In the next walk only, brother.

Moo. Only—only—where?—where? [Exit hastily.]

Har. What's the matter with him? Why so much concerned?—But, dearest madam—

Re-enter MOODY.

Moo. Gone, gone—not to be found—quite gone—ten thousand plagues go with 'em!—Which way went they?

Ali. But in t'other walk, brother.

Moo. T'other walk! t'other devil. Where are they, I say?

Ali. You are too abusive, brother.

Moo. You know where they are, you infamous wretch, eternal shame of your family; which you do not dishonour enough yourself, you think, but you must help her to do it too, thou legion of—

Ali. Good brother—

Moo. Damn'd, damn'd sister! [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Another part of the Park.

Enter BELVILLE and PEGGY.

Bel. No disguise could conceal you from my heart: I pretended not to know you, that I might deceive the dragon that continually watches over you; but now he's asleep, let us fly from misery to happiness.

Peg. Indeed, Mr. Belville, as well as I like you, I can't think of going away with you so; and as much as I hate my guardian, I must take leave of him a little handsomely, or he will kill me, so he will.

Bel. But, dear miss Peggy, think of your situation; if we don't make the best use of this opportunity, we never may have another.

Peg. Ay but, Mr. Belville, I am as good as married already; my guardian has contracted me, and there wants nothing but the church ceremony to make us one: I call him husband, and he calls me wife already; he made me do so. and we had been married in church long ago, if the writings could have been finished.

Bel. That's his deceit, my sweet creature.—He pretends to have married you, for fear of your liking any body else.—You have a right to choose for yourself; and there is no law in heaven or earth that binds you before marriage to a man you cannot like.

Peg. I'fack, no more I believe it does: sister Alithea's maid has told me as much. She's a very sensible girl.

Bel. You are in the very jaws of perdition, and nothing but running away can avoid it; the law will finish your chains to-morrow, and the church will rivet them the day after. Let us secure our happiness by escape, and love and fortune will do the rest for us.

Peg. These are fine sayings, to be sure, Mr. Belville; but how shall we get my fortune out of bud's clutches? We must be a little cunning; 'tis worth trying for. We can at any time run away without it.

Bel. I see by your fears, my dear Peggy, that you live in awe of this brutal guardian; and if he has you once more in his possession, both you and your fortune are secured to him for ever.

Peg. Ay, but it shan't though; I thank him for that.

Bel. If you marry without his consent, he can but seize upon half your fortune.—The other half, and a younger brother's fortune, with a treasure of love, are your own.—Take it, my sweetest Peggy, and this moment, or we shall be divided for ever.

[Kneels, and presses her hand.]

Peg. I'fackins, but we won't.—Your fine talk has bewitched me.

Bel. [Rising.] 'Tis you have bewitch'd me, thou dear, enchanting, sweet simplicity!—Let us fly with the wings of love to my house there, and we shall be safe for ever.

Peg. And so we will then.—There, squeeze my hand again.—Now run away with me; and if my guardy follows us, the devil take the hindmost, I say. [Going.]

Enter MOODY hastily, and meets them.

Moo. O! there's my stray'd sheep, and the wolf again in sheep's clothing!—Now I have recovered her, I shall come to my senses again. [Aside.] Where have you been, you puppy?

Peg. Been, bud?—We have been hunting all over the Park to find you.

Bel. From one end to t'other, sir. [Confusedly.]

Moo. But not where I was to be found, you young devil, you!—Why did you start when you saw me?

Peg. I'm always frighten'd when I see you; and if I did not love you so well, I should run away from you, so I should. [Pouts.]

Moo. But I'll take care you don't.

Peg. This gentleman has a favour to beg of you, bud? [BELVILLE makes signs of dislike.]

Moo. I am not in a humour to grant favours to young gentlemen, though you may. What have you been doing with this young lady—gentleman, I would say?

Peg. Fie, bud, you have told all.

Bel. I have been as civil as I could to the young stranger; and if you'll permit me, I will take the trouble off your hands, and show the young spark Rosamond's pond; for he has not seen it yet.—Come, pretty youth, will you go with me?

[Goes to her.]

Peg. As my guardian please.

Moo. No, no, it does not please me. Whatever I think he ought to see, I shall show him myself. You may visit Rosamond's pond, if you will; and the bottom of it, if you will.—And so, sir, your servant.

[Exit MOODY, with PEGGY under his arm, and BELVILLE.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—Moody's House.

Enter LUCY and ALITHEA.

Ali. Hold your peace.

Lucy. Nay, madam, I will ask you the reason why you would banish poor Mr. Harcourt for ever from your sight? How could you be so hard-hearted.

Ali. 'Twas because I was not hard-hearted.

Lucy. No, no; 'twas stark love and madness, I warrant.

Ali. It was so; I would see him no more, because I love him.

Lucy. Hey-day! a very pretty reason.

Ali. You do not understand me.

Lucy. I wish you may yourself.

Ali. I was engaged to marry, you see, another man, whom my justice will not suffer me to deceive or injure.

Lucy. Can there be a greater cheat or wrong done to a man, than to give him your person without your heart? I should make a conscience of it.

Ali. Hold your tongue.

Lucy. That you know I can't do, madam; and upon this occasion, I will talk for ever. What, give yourself away to one, that poor I, your maid, would not accept of.

Ali. How, Lucy?

Lucy. I would not, upon my honour, madam. 'Tis never too late to repent. Take a man, and give up your coxcomb, I say.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Mr. Sparkish, with company, madam, attends you below.

Ali. I will wait upon 'em. [Exit Servant.] My heart begins to fail me, but I must go through with it. Go with me, Lucy. [Exit.]

Lucy. Not I indeed, madam.—If you will leap the precipice, you shall fall by yourself. What excellent advice have I thrown away!—So I'll e'en take it where it will be more welcome.—Miss Peggy is bent upon mischief against her guardian, and she can't have a better privy counsellor than myself—I must be busy one way or another. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Another Chamber in Moody's House.

Enter MOODY and PEGGY.

Moo. I saw him kiss your hand before you saw me.—This pretence of liking my sister was all a blind—the young abandon'd hypocrite! [Aside.] Tell me, I say—for I know he likes you, and was hurrying you to his house—tell me, I say—

Peg. Lord, han't I told it a hundred times over?

Moo. I would try if, in the repetition of the ungrateful tale, I could find her altering it in the least circumstance; for if her story is false, she is so, too. [Aside.] Come, how was't, baggage?

Peg. Lord! what pleasure you take to hear it, sure.

Moo. No, you take more in telling it, I find; but speaking, how was't? No lies: I saw him kiss you; he kiss'd you before my face.

Peg. Nay, you need not be so angry with him neither; for, to say the truth, he has the sweetest breath I ever knew.

Moo. The devil! You were satisfied with it then, and would do it again?

Peg. Not unless he should force me.

Moo. Force you, changeling?

Peg. If I had struggled too much, you know, he would have known I had been a woman; so I was quiet, for fear of being found out.

Moo. If you had been in petticoats, you would have knock'd him down.

Peg. With what, bud? I could not help myself; besides, he did it so modestly, and blush'd so, that I almost thought him a girl in men's clothes, and upon his mummery too as well as me; and, if so, there was no harm done, you know.

Moo. This is worse and worse. So, 'tis plain she loves him, yet she has not love enough to make her conceal it from me; but the sight of him will increase her aversion for me, and love for him; and that love instruct her how to deceive me, and satisfy him, all idiot as she is. Love; 'twas he gave women first their craft, their art of deluding. I must strangle that little monster whilst I can deal with him. [Aside.] Go; fetch pen, ink, and paper, out of the next room.

Peg. Yes, I will, bud.

Moo. Go then.

Peg. I'm going.

Moo. Why don't you go then?

Peg. Lord! I'm going. {Exit.

Moo. This young fellow loves her, and she loves him; the rest is all hypocrisy. How the young modest villain endeavoured to deceive me! But I'll crush this mischief in the shell. Why should women have more invention in love than men? It can only be because they have more desire, more soliciting passions, more of the devil.

Re-enter PEGGY, with pen, ink, and paper.

Come, minx, sit down and write.

Peg. Ay, dear, dear bud; but I can't do't very well.

Moo. I wish you could not at all!

Peg. But what should I write for?

Moo. I'll have you write a letter to this young man.

Peg. O lord! to the young gentleman a letter?

Moo. Yes, to the young gentleman.

Peg. Lord, you do but jeer; sure, you jest.

Moo. I am not so merry. Come, sit down, and write as I bid you.

Peg. What, do you think I am a fool?

Moo. She's afraid I would not dictate my love to him, therefore she's unwilling. [Aside.] But you had best begin.

Peg. Indeed, and indeed, but I won't, so I won't.

Moo. Why?

Peg. Because he's in town. You may send for him here, if you will.

Moo. Very well; you would have him brought to you? Is it come to this? I say, take the pen and ink, and write, or you'll provoke me.

Peg. Lord! what do you make a fool of me for? Don't I know that letters are never writ but from the country to London, and from London into the country? Now he's in town, and I'm in town too; therefore I can't write to him, you know.

Moo. So, I'm glad it's no worse; she is innocent enough yet. [Aside.] Yes, you may, when your husband bids, write letters to people that are in town.

Peg. O, may I so? Then I am satisfied.

Moo. Come, begin. Sir—

[Dictates.

Peg. Sha'n't I say Dear sir? You know one says always something more than bare Sir up in a corner.

Moo. Write as I bid you, or I will write something with this penknife in your face.

Peg. Sir—

[Writes.

Moo. *Though I suffered last night your nauseous, loath'd kisses and embraces—*Write!

Peg. Nay, why should I say so? you know, I told you he had a sweet breath.

Moo. Write!

Peg. Let me put out loath'd.

Moo. Write, I say!

Peg. Well then.

[Writes.

Moo. Let me see what you have writ. [Reads.] *Though I suffered last night your kisses and embraces—*thou impudent creature, where is nauseous and loath'd?

Peg. I can't abide to write such filthy words.

Moo. Once more write as I'd have you, or I will spoil your writing with this; I will stab out those eyes that cause my mischief. [Holds up the penknife.

Peg. O Lord! I will.

[Writes.

Moo. So, so, let's see now: *though I suffered last night your nauseous, loath'd kisses and embraces—*go on—yet I would not have you presume that you shall ever repeat them. So—

[PEGGY writes.

Peg. I have writ it.

Moo. O then—I then conceal'd myself from your knowledge, to avoid your insolencies—

[PEGGY writes.

Peg. To avoid—

Moo. Your insolencies—

Peg. Your insolencies.

[Writes.

Moo. The same reason, now I am out of your hands—

Peg. So—

[Writes.

Moo. Makes me own to you my unfortunate, though innocent frolic, in being in boy's clothes.

[PEGGY writes.

Peg. So—

Moo. That you may for evermore—

Peg. Evermore—

Moo. Evermore cease to pursue her, who hates and detests you—

[PEGGY writes.

Peg. So—

[Sighs.

Moo. What do you sigh for? Detests you, as much as she loves her husband and her honour.

Peg. I vow, husband, he'll never believe I should write such a letter.

[Writes.

Moo. What, he'd expect a kinder one from you? Come, now your name only.

Peg. What, sha'n't I say—Your most faithful humble servant till death?

Moo. No, tormenting fiend. [PEGGY writes.] Her style, I find, would be very soft. [Aside.] Come, wrap it up now, whilst I go fetch wax and a candle, and write on the outside—For Mr. Belville. [Exit.

Peg. [Writes.] For Mr. Belville. So; I am glad he is gone. Hark! I hear a noise.

Moo. [Within.] Well, well; but can't you call again? Well, walk in then.

Peg. I'fack, there's folks with him.

Moo. [Within.] Very well; if he must see me, I'll come to him.

Peg. That's pure; now I may think a little. Why should I send dear Mr. Belville such a letter? Can one have no shift? Ah, a London woman would have had a hundred presently. Stay; what if I should write a letter, and wrap it up like this, and write upon it too? Ay; but then my guardian would see't. I don't know what to do. But yet y'vads I'll try, so I will; for I will not send this letter to poor Mr. Belville, come what will on't.—[Writes, and repeats what she writes.] Dear, dear, dear, sweet Mr. Belville—so—My guardian would have me send you a base, rude letter, but I won't—so—and would have me say I hate you; but I won't—there—for I'm sure, if you and I were in the country, at cards together—so—I could not help treading on your toe under the table; so pray keep at home, for I shall be with you as soon as I can; so no more at present from one who am, dear, dear, poor dear Mr. Belville, your loving friend till death do us part, Margaret Thrift. So, now wrap it up just like t'other; so, now write—For Mr. Belville.—But, oh! what shall I do with it? for here comes my guardian. [Puts it in her bosom.]

Re-enter MOODY, with a candle and sealing-wax.

Moo. I have been detained by a sparkish coxcomb, who pretended to visit me; but I fear 'twas to my wife. [Aside.] What, have you done?

Peg. Ay, ay, bud, just now.

Moo. Let's see't; what d'y'e tremble for?

[He opens and reads the first letter.]

Peg. So, I had been finely serv'd, if I had giv'n him this. [Aside.]

Moo. Come, where's the wax and seal?

Peg. Lord! what shall I do? [Aside.] Pray, let me see't. Lord! you think I cannot seal a letter; I will do't, so I will.

[Snatches the letter from him, changes it for the other, seals it, and delivers it to him.]

Moo. Nay, I believe you will learn that and other things too, which I would not have you.

Peg. So, ha'n't I done it curiously? I think I have: there's my letter going to Mr. Belville, since he'll needs have me send letters to folks. [Aside.]

Moo. 'Tis very well; but I warrant you would not have it go now?

Peg. Yes, indeed, but I would, bud, now.

Moo. Well, you are a good girl then. Come, let me lock you up in your chamber till I come back; and be sure you come not within three strides of the window when I am gone, for I have a spy in the street. [Puts her into the chamber.] At least 'tis fit she think so: if we do not cheat women, they'll cheat us. Now I have secur'd all within, I'll deal with the foe without, with false intelligence. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—Belville's Lodgings.

Enter LUCY and BELVILLE.

Lucy. I run great risks, to be sure, to serve the young lady and you, sir; but I know you are a gentleman of honour, and would scorn to betray a friend who means you well, and is above being mercenary.

Bel. As you are not mercenary, Mrs. Lucy, I ought to be the more generous; give me leave to present you with this trifle; [gives her a ring] not as a reward for your services, but as a small token of friendship.

Lucy. Though I scorn to be bribed in any cause, yet I am proud to accept it as a mark of your regard, and as such shall keep it for your sake; and now to business.

Bel. But has the dear creature resolved?

Lucy. Has she! why, she will run away and marry you, in spite of your teeth, the first moment you can break prison: so you, in your turn, must take care not to have your qualms. I have known several bold gentlemen not able to draw their swords, when a challenge has come too quick upon 'em.

Bel. I assure you, Mrs. Lucy, that I am no bully in love; and Miss Peggy will meet with her match, come when she will.

Lucy. Ay, so you all say; but talking does no business. Stay at home till you hear from us.

Bel. Blessings on thee, Lucy, for the thought.

Moo. [Without.] But I must and will see him, let him have what company he will.

Lucy. As I hope to be married, Mr. Belville, I hear Mr. Moody's voice. Where shall I hide myself? If he sees me, we are all undone.

Bel. This is our cursed luck again. What the devil can he want here? Get into this closet till he is gone. [Puts Lucy into the closet.] Don't you stir, Lucy. I must put the best face upon the matter. Now for it. [Takes a book and reads.]

Enter MOODY.

Moo. You will excuse me, sir, for breaking through forms, and your servant's entreaties, to have the honour—but you are alone, sir—your fellow told me below, that you were with company.

Bel. Yes, sir, the best company. [Shows his book.] When I converse with my betters, I choose to have 'em alone.

Moo. And I chooseto interrupt your conversation: the business of my errand must plead my excuse.

Bel. You shall be always welcome to me; but you seem ruffled, sir. What brings you hither, and so seemingly out of humour?

Moo. Your impertinency; I beg pardon, your modesty I mean.

Bel. My impertinency?

Moo. Your impertinency.

Bel. Sir, from the peculiarity of your character, and your intimacy with my uncle, I shall allow you great privileges; but you must consider, youth has its privileges too; and, as I have not the honour of your acquaintance, I am not obliged to bear with your ill humours, or your ill manners.

Moo. They who wrong me, young man, must bear with both; and if you had not made too free with me, I should have taken no liberties with you.

Bel. I could have wished, sir, to have found you a little more civil, the first time I have the honour of a visit from you.

Moo. If that is all you want, young gentleman, you will find me very civil indeed. There, sir, read that, and let your modesty declare whether I want either kindness or civility. Look you there, sir. [Gives him a letter.]

Bel. What is it?

Moo. Only a love-letter, sir; and from my wife.

Bel. How, is it from your wife? Hum and hum.

[Reads.]

Moo. Even from my wife, sir. Am not I wondrous kind and civil to you now too? But you'll not think her so. [Aside.]

Bel. Ha! is this a trick of his or her's! [Aside.]

Moo. The gentleman's surpris'd, I find. What, you expected a kinder letter?

Bel. No, faith, not I. How could I?

Moo. Yes, yes, I'm sure you did; a man so young and well made as you are, must needs be disappointed, if the women declare not their passion at the first sight or opportunity.

Bel. But what should this mean? It seems he knows not what the letter contains. [Aside.]

Moo. Come, ne'er wonder at it so much.

Bel. Faith, I can't help it.

Moo. Now, I think, I have deserv'd your infinite friendship and kindness; and have shew'd myself sufficiently an obliging kind friend and husband; am I not so, to bring a letter from my wife to her gallant?

Bel. Ay, indeed, you are the most obliging kind friend and husband in the world; ha, ha, ha! Pray, however, present my humble service to her, and tell her I will obey her letter to a tittle, and fulfil her desires, be what they will, or with what difficulty soever I do't; and you shall be no more jealous of me, I warrant her and you.

Moo. Well then, fare you well, and play with any man's honour but mine; kiss any man's wife but mine, and welcome; so, Mr. Modesty, your servant.

[Going.]

Enter SPARKISH, meeting him.

Spark. So, brother-in-law that was to have been, I have followed you from home to Belville's; I have strange news for you.

Moo. What, are you wiser than you were this morning?

Spark. Faith, I don't know but I am, for I have lost your sister, and I sha'n't eat half an ounce the less at dinner for it; there's philosophy for you.

Moo. Insensibility you mean. I hope you don't mean to say my sister ill, sir?

Spark. No, sir, she has used me ill; she's in her tantrums; I have had a narrow escape, sir.

Moo. If thou art endow'd with the smallest portion of understanding, explain this riddle.

Bel. Ay, ay, pr'ythee, Sparkish, condescend to be intelligible.

Spark. Why, you must know, we had settled to be married; it is the same thing to me, whether I am married or not; I have no particular fancy one way, or another, and so I told your sister; off or on, 'tis the same thing to me: but the thing was fix'd, you know. You and my aunt brought it about; I had no hand in it. And, to shew you that I was as willing to marry your sister as any other woman, I suffered the law to tie me up to hard terms; and the church would have finish'd me still to harder, but she was taken with her tantrums.

Moo. D—n your tantrums, come to the point.

Spark. Your sister took an aversion to the parson, Frank Harcourt's brother; abused me like a pickpocket, and swore 'twas Harcourt himself.

Moo. And so it was, for I saw him.

Spark. Why, you are as mad as your sister; I tell you it was Ned, Frank's twin brother.

Moo. What, Frank told you so? [story.]

Spark. Ay, and Ned too; they were both in a

Moo. What an incorrigible fellow! Come, come, I must be gone.

Spark. Nay, nay, you shall hear my story out. She walk'd up within pistol-shot of the church, then twirl'd round upon her heel, call'd me every name she could think of; and, when she had exhausted her imagination, and tired her tongue (no easy matter, let me tell you), she call'd her chair, sent her footman to buy a monkey before my face, then bid me good morrow with a sneer, and left us with our mouths open in the middle of a hundred people, who were all laughing at us! If these are not tantrums, I don't know what are.

Moo. Ha, ha, ha! I thank thee, Sparkish, from my soul; 'tis a most exquisite story: I have not had such a laugh for this half year. Thou art a most ridiculous puppy, and I am infinitely obliged to thee; ha, ha, ha! [Exit.]

Spark. Did you ever hear the like, Belville?

Bel. O yes; how is it possible to hear such a foolish story, and see thy foolish face, and not laugh at 'em? Ha, ha, ha! [Lucy in the closet laughs.]

Spark. Hey-day! what's that? What, have you raised a devil in the closet, to make up a laughing chorus at me? I must take a peep. [Going to the closet?]

Bel. Indeed, but you must not.

Spark. It was a woman's voice.

Bel. So much the better for me.

Spark. Pr'ythee, introduce me.

Bel. Though you take a pleasure in exposing your ladies, I choose to conceal mine; so, my dear Sparkish, lest the lady should be sick by too long a confinement, and laughing heartily at you, I must entreat you to withdraw. Pr'ythee, excuse me, I must laugh; ha, ha, ha, ha!

Spark. Do you know that I begin to be angry, Belville?

Bel. I can't help that. Ha, ha, ha!

Spark. My character's at stake; I shall be thought a d—d silly fellow; I will call Alithea to an account directly. [Exit.]

Bel. Ha, ha, ha!

Lucy. [Peeping out.] Ha, ha, ha, ha! O dear sir, let me have my laugh out, or I shall burst. What an adventure. [Comes out and laughs.]

Bel. My sweet Peggy has sent me the kindest letter; and by the dragon himself; there's a spirit for you!

Lucy. There's simplicity for you! Show me a town-bred girl with half the genius. Send you a love-letter, and by a jealous guardian too! Ha, ha, ha! 'Tis too much; too much! Ha, ha, ha! Well, Mr. Belville, the world goes as it should do. My mistress will exchange her fool for a wit; Miss Peggy her brute for a pretty young fellow; I shall dance at two weddings; be well rewarded by both parties; get a husband myself; and be as happy as the best of you; and so your humble servant. [Exit.]

Bel. Success attend you, Lucy. [Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—Moody's house.

PEGGY, discovered alone, leaning on her elbow on a table, with pen, ink, and paper.

Peg. Well, 'tis e'en so; I have got the London disease they call love; I am sick of my guardian, and dying for Mr. Belville! I have heard this distemper call'd a fever, but methinks it is like an ague; for when I think of my guardian, I tremble, and am so cold; but when I think of my gallant, dear Mr. Belville! my hot fit comes, and I am all in a fever indeed. Ah! poor Mr. Belville! Well, I will not stay here; therefore I'll make an end of my letter to him, which shall be a finer letter than my last, because I have studied it like anything. Oh! sick, sick!

Enter MOODY, who, seeing her writing, steals softly behind her, and looking over her shoulder:

Moo. What, [snatches the paper from her] writing more letters?

Peg. O Lord, bud! why d'ye fright me so?

[She offers to run out, he stops her, and reads.]

Moo. How's this! Nay, you shall not stir, madam. [Reads.] Dear, dear, Mr. Belville. Very well, I have taught you to write letters to good purpose; but let's see't. First, I am to beg your pardon for my boldness in writing to you, which I'd have you to know I would not have done had you not said first you loved me so extremely; which, if you do, you will never suffer me to be another man's, who I loath, nauseate, and detest. Now you can write these filthy words. But what follows!—therefore I hope you will speedily find some way to free me from this unfortunate match, which was never, I assure you, of my choice; but I'm afraid 'tis already too far gone; however, if you love me as I do you, you will try what you can do; you must help me away before to-morrow, or else, alas! I shall be for ever out of your reach, for I can defer no longer our—our—what is to follow our? Speak, what? Our journey into the country, I suppose. Oh, woman! d—d woman! and love! d—d love! their old temper; for this is one of his miracles; in a moment he can make those blind that could see, and those see that were blind; those dumb that could speak, and those prattle who were dumb before. But make an end of your letter, and then I'll make an end of you thus, and all my plagues together.

[Draws his sword.]

Peg. O Lord! O Lord! you are such a passionate man, bud!

Moo. Come, take the pen, and make an end of the letter, just as you intended; if you are false in a tittle I shall soon perceive it, and punish you with this as you deserve. [Lays his hand on his sword.] Write what was to follow. Let's see.—You must make haste, and help me away before to-morrow, or else I shall be for ever out of your reach, for I can defer no longer our—what follows our?—

[PEGGY takes the pen, and writes.]

Peg. Must all out then, bud? Look you there then.

Moo. Let's see;—for I can defer no longer our wedding.—Your slighted ALITHEA. What's the meaning of this? My sister's name to't? Speak; unriddle.

Peg. Yes, indeed, bud.

Moo. But why her name to't? Speak, speak, I say!

Peg. Ay, but you'll tell her again; if you would not tell her again—

Moo. I will not; I am stunn'd; my head turns round. Speak.

Peg. Won't you tell her, indeed, and indeed?

Moo. No; speak, I say.

Peg. She'll be angry with me; but I would rather she should be angry with me than you, bud. And to tell the truth, 'twas she made me write the letter, and taught me what I should write.

Moo. Ha! I thought the style was somewhat better than her own. [Aside.] Could she come to you to teach you, since I lock'd you up alone?

Peg. Oh! through the key-hole, bud.

Moo. But why should she make you write a letter for her to him, since she can write herself?

Peg. Why, she said, because—

Moo. Because what; because—

Peg. Why because, bud—

Moo. Because what, I say?

Peg. Because, lest Mr. Belville, as he was so young, should be inconstant, and refuse her; or be vain afterwards, and shew the letter, she might disown it, the hand not being her's.

Moo. Belville again! Am I to be deceiv'd again with that young hypocrite?

Peg. You have deceiv'd yourself, bud; you have indeed. I have kept the secret for my sister's sake, as long as I could; but you must know it, and shall know it too. [Cries.]

Moo. Dry your tears.

Peg. You always thought he was hankering after me. Good law! he's dying for Alithea, and Alithea for him. They have had private meetings; and he was making love to her before yesterday, from the tavern window, when you thought it was me. I would have discovered all, but she made me swear to deceive you; and so I have finely; have not I, bud?

Moo. Why did you write that foolish letter to him then, and make me more foolish to carry it?

Peg. To carry on the joke, bud; to oblige them.

Moo. And will nothing serve her but that great baby? He's too young for her to marry.

Peg. Why do you marry me then? 'Tis the same thing, bud.

Moo. No, no, 'tis quite different. How innocent she is! [Aside.] But hark you, madam, your sister went out this morning, and I have not seen her within since.

Peg. Alack-a-day! she has been crying all day above, it seems, in a corner.

Moo. Where is she? let me speak with her.

Peg. O Lord! then she'll discover all. [Aside.] Pray hold, bud; what, d'ye mean to discover me? She'll know I have told you then. Pray, bud, let me talk with her first.

Moo. I must speak with her to know whether Belville ever made her any promise, and whether she will be married to Sparkish or no.

Peg. Pray, dear bud, don't till I have spoken with her, and told her that I have told you all; for she'll kill me else.

Moo. Go then, and bid her come to me.

Peg. Yes, yes, bud.

Moo. Let me see—

Peg. I have just got time to know of Lucy, who first set me to work, what lie I shall tell next; for I am e'en at my wits end. [Aside, and exit.]

Moo. Well, I resolve it, Belville shall have her: I'd rather give him my sister than lend him my wife; and such an alliance will prevent his pretensions to my wife, sure; I'll make him of kin to her, and then he won't care for her.

Re-enter PEGGY.

Peg. O Lord, bud, I told you what anger you would make me with my sister.

Moo. Won't she come?

Peg. No, she won't, she's ashamed to look you in the face; she'll go directly to Mr. Belville, she says. Pray let her have her way, bud; she won't be pacified if you don't; and will never forgive me. For my part, bud, I believe, but don't tell anybody, they have broken a piece of silver between 'em; or have contracted one another, as we have done, you know, which is the next thing to being married.

Moo. Pooh! you fool; she is ashamed of talking with me about Belville, because I made the match for her with Sparkish! But Sparkish is a fool, and I have no objection to Belville's family or fortune: tell her so.

Peg. I will, bud.

[Going.]

Moo. Stay, stay, Peggy, let her have her own way; she shall go to Belville herself, and I'll follow her; that will be best; let her have her whim.

Peg. You're in the right, bud; for they have certainly had a quarrel, by her crying and hanging her head so: I'll be hang'd if her eyes an't swell'd out of her head, she's in such a piteous taking.

Moo. Belleville sha'n't use her ill, I'll take care of that: if he has made her a promise, he shall keep to it: but she had better go first. I will follow her at a distance, that she may have no interruption; and I will wait in the Park before I see them, that they may come to a reconciliation before I come upon 'em.

Peg. La, bud, how wise you are! I wish I had half your wisdom; you see everything at once. Stand a one side then; there, a little further that way.

Moo. And so I will: she shan't see me till I break in upon her at Belleville's.

[Sits down in the middle of the stage.]

Peg. Now for it. [Exit.]

Moo. My case is something better; for suppose the worst—should Belleville use her ill—I had rather fight him for not marrying my sister, than for debauching my wife, for I will make her mine absolutely to-morrow; and of the two, I had rather find my sister too forward than my wife: I expected no other from her free education, as she calls it, and her passion for the town. Well, wife and sister are names which make us expect love and duty, pleasure and comfort; but we find 'em plagues and torments, and are equally, though differently, troublesome to their keeper. But here she comes.

[Steps aside.]

Re-enter PEGGY, dressed like ALITHEA; and as she passes over the stage, seems to sigh, sob, and wipe her eyes.

Peg. Heigho! [Exit.]

Moo. [Comes forward.] There the poor devil goes, sighing and sobbing, a woeful example of the fatal consequences of a town education; but I am bound in duty, as well as inclination, to do my utmost to save her; but first I'll secure my own property. [Opens, and calls.] Peggy! Peggy! my dear! I will return as soon as possible; do you hear me? Why don't you answer? You may read in the book I bought you, till I come back. As the Jew says in the play, "Fast bind, fast find."—[Locks the door.] This is the best, and only security for female affections. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—The Park, before Belleville's House.

Enter SPARKISH, fuddled.

Spark. If I can but meet with her, or anybody that belongs to her, they will find me a match for 'em. When a man has wit, and a great deal of it, Champagne gives it a double edge, and nothing can withstand it; 'tis a lighted match to gunpowder. I was right to consult my friends, and they all agree with Moody, that I make a d—d ridiculous figure, as matters stand at present. I'll consult Belleville; this is his house; he's my friend too; and no fool. It shall be so. D—n it, I must not be ridiculous. [Going to the door, sees PEGGY coming.] Hold! hold! if the Champagne does not hurt my eye-sight, while it sharpens my wit, the enemy is marching up this way. Come on, madam Alithea; now for a smart fire; and then let's see who will be ridiculous.

Enter PEGGY.

Peg. Dear me, I begin to tremble: there is Mr. Sparkish, and I can't get to Mr. Belleville's house without passing by him. He sees me, and will discover me; he seems in liquor too. Bless me!

Spark. O ho! she stands at bay a little; she don't much relish the engagement. The first blow is half the battle. I'll be a little figurative with her. [Aside, approaches her.] I find, madam, you like a solo better than a duet. You need not have been walking alone this evening, if you had been wiser yesterday. What, nothing to say for yourself? Repentance, I suppose, makes you as awkward and as foolish as the poor country girl your brother has lock'd up in Pall-mall.

Peg. I'm frighten'd out of my wits.

[Tries to pass him.]

Spark. Not a step further shall you go till you give me an account of your behaviour, and make me reparation for being ridiculous. What, dumb still! Then if you won't by fair means, I must squeeze you to a confession. [As he goes to seize her, she slips by him; but he catches hold of her before she reaches BELVILLE'S door.] Not quite so fast, if you please. Come, come, let me see your modest face, and hear your soft tongue, or I shall be tempted to use you ill.

Enter MOODY.

Moo. Hands off, you ruffian! How dare you use a lady, and my sister, in this manner?

[Takes SPARKISH from her.]

Spark. She's my property, sir; transferred to me by you; and though I would give her up to anybody for a dirty sword-knot, yet I won't be bullied out of my right, though it is not worth that.

[Snaps his fingers.]

Moo. There's a fellow to be a husband! You are justified in despising him and flying from him. I'll defend you with my purse and my sword. Knock at that door, and let me speak to Belleville. [PEGGY knocks; when the Footman opens it, she runs in.] Is your master at home, friend?

Foot. Yes, sir.

Moo. Tell him, then, that I have rescued that lady from this gentleman; and, by her desire, and my consent, she flies to him for protection. If he can get a parson, let him marry her this minute; tell him so, and shut the door. [Exit Footman.] And now, sir, if your wine has given you courage, you had better shew it upon this occasion; for you are still d—d ridiculous.

Spark. Did you ever hear the like? Lookye, Mr. Moody, we are in the Park, and to draw a sword is an offence to the court; so you may vapour as long as you please. A woman of so little taste is not worth fighting for; she's not worth my sword: but if you'll fight me to-morrow morning for diversion, I am your man.

Moo. Relinquish your title in the lady to Belleville peaceably, and you may sleep in a whole skin.

Spark. Belleville! he would not have your sister with the fortune of a nabob; no, no, his mouth waters at your country tit-bit at home: much good may it do him.

Moo. And you think so, puppy. Ha, ha, ha!

Spark. Yes, I do, mastiff. Ha, ha, ha!

Moo. Then thy folly is complete. Ha, ha, h!

Spark. Thine will be so, when thou hast married thy country innocent. Ha, ha, ha!

[They laugh at each other.]

Enter HARCOURT.

Spark. What, my boy, Harcourt!

Moo. What brings you here, sir?

Har. I followed you to Belleville's, to present a near relation of your's, and a nearer one of mine, to you.

[Exit.]

Spark. What's the matter now?

Re-enter HARCOURT, with ALITHEA.

Har. Give me leave, gentlemen, without offence to either, to present Mrs. Harcourt to you.

Spark. Alithea, your wife! Mr. Moody, are you in the clouds too?

Moo. If I am not in a dream, I am the most miserable walking dog that ever run mad with his misfortunes and astonishment!

Har. Why so, Jack? Can you object to my happiness, when this gentleman was unworthy of it?

[MOODY walks about in a rage.]

Spark. This is very fine; very fine, indeed. Where's your story about Belville now, 'squire Moody? Pr'ythee, don't chafe, and stare, and stride, and beat thy head, like a mad tragedy poet! but out with thy tropes and figures.

Moo. Zounds! I can't bear it.

[Goes hastily to BELVILLE'S door, and knocks hard.]

Ali. Dear brother, what's the matter?

Moo. The devil's the matter! the devil and women together. [Knocks again.] I'll break the door down, if they won't answer. [Knocks again.]

A Footman appears in the balcony, in flat.

Foot. What would your honour please to have?

Moo. Your master, rascal.

Foot. He is obeying your commands, sir; and the moment he has finished, he will do himself the pleasure to wait on you.

Moo. You sneering villain, you! if your master does not produce that she-devil, who is now with him, and who, with a face of innocence, has cheated and undone me, I'll set fire to his house.

[Exit Footman from the balcony.]

Spark. 'Gad so! now I begin to smoke the business. Well said, simplicity! rural simplicity! 'Egad! if thou hast trick'd Cerberus here, I shall be so ravish'd, that I will give this couple a wedding-dinner. Pray, Mr. Moody, who's d—d ridiculous now?

Moo. [Going to SPARKISH.] Lookye, sir; don't grin, for if you dare to shew your teeth at my misfortunes, I'll dash 'em down your impudent throat, you jackanapes!

Spark. [Quite calm.] Very fine, faith; but I have no weapons to butt with a mad bull, so you may toss and roar by yourself, if you please.

Enter BELVILLE in the balcony.

Bel. What does my good friend want with me?

Moo. Are you a villain, or are you not?

Bel. I have obey'd your commands, sir.

Moo. What have you done with the girl, sir?

Bel. Made her my wife, as you desired.

Spark. Very true, I am your witness.

Moo. She's my wife, and I demand her.

Enter PEGGY in the balcony.

Peg. No; but I an't though, bud. What's the matter, dear? are you angry with me?

Moo. How dare you look me in the face, cockatrice?

Peg. How dare you look me in the face, bud? Have you not given me to another, when you ought to have married me yourself? Have you not pretended to be married to me, when you knew in your conscience you was not? And have you not been shilly-shally for a long time? So that if I had not married dear Mr. Belville, I should not have married at all; so I should not.

[BELVILLE and PEGGY retire from the balcony.]

Spark. Extremely pleasant, faith; ha, ha, ha!

Moo. I am stupified with shame, rage, and astonishment. My fate has overcome me; I can struggle no more with it. [Sighs.] What is left me? I cannot bear to look, or be looked upon. I will hurry down to my old house, take a twelvemonth's provision into it, cut down my drawbridge, run wild about my garden, which shall grow as wild as myself; then will I curse the world, and every individual in it; and when my rage and spirits fail me, I will be found dead among the nettles and thistles, a woeful example of the baseness and treachery of one sex, and of the falsehood, lying, perjury, deceit, impudence, and damnation, of the other. [Exit.]

Spark. Very droll, and extravagantly comic, I must confess; ha, ha, ha!

Enter BELVILLE and PEGGY.

Lookye, Belville, I wish you joy with all my heart; you have got the prize, and perhaps have caught a Tartar; that's no business of mine. If you want evidence for Mr. Moody's giving his consent to your marriage, I shall be ready. I bear no ill-will to that pair; I wish you happy; [to ALITHEA and HARCOURT] though I'm sure they'll be miserable; and so, your humble servant. [Exit.]

Peg. I hope you forgive me, Alithea, for playing your brother this trick; indeed, I should have only made him and myself miserable, had we married together.

Ali. Then 'tis much better as it is. But I am yet in the dark how this matter has been brought about; how your innocence, my dear, has outwitted his worldly wisdom.

Peg. I am sure I'll do anything to please my bud, but marry him.

But you, good gentry, what say you to this?

You are to judge me—have I done amiss?

I've reasons will convince you all, and strong ones,

Except old folks, who hanker after young ones.

Bud was so passionate, and grown so thrifty,

'Twas a sad life—and, then, he was near fifty!

I'm but nineteen—my husband too is young,

So soft, so gentle, such a winning tongue!

Have I, pray ladies, speak, done very wrong?

As for poor bud, 'twas honest to deceive him;

More virtuous, sure, to cheat him than to grieve him.

Great folks, I know, will call me simple slut;

"Marry for love," they cry, "the country put!"

Marriage with them's a fashion—soon grows cool;

But I'm for always loving, like a fool.

With half my fortune I would rather part,

Than be all finery with an aching heart.

For these strange awkward notions don't abuse me:

And, as I know no better, pray excuse me. [Exeunt]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Chamber.

Enter PETER and ANTHONY.

Peter. 'Would we were remov'd from this town,
Anthony,
That we may taste some quiet! for mine own part,
I'm almost melted with continual trotting
After inquiries, dreams, and revelations, [soldiers!
Of who knows whom, or where? Serve wenching
I'll serve a priest in Lent first, and eat bell-ropes.

Anth. Thou art the forwardest fool—
Peter. Why, good tame Anthony,
Tell me but this: to what end came we hither?
Anth. To wait upon our masters.
Peter. But how, Anthony?
Answer me that; resolve me there, good Anthony.
Anth. To serve their uses.
Peter. Shew your uses, Anthony.
Anth. To be employ'd in anything.
Peter. No, Anthony;
Not anything, I take it, nor that thing
We travel to discover, like a new island;
I'll give 'em warning. [visible woman,
Anth. Come, come, all will be mended: this in-
Of infinite report for shape and beauty,
That bred all trouble to no purpose,
They are determin'd now no more to think on.
Peter. Were there ever
Men known to run mad with report before?
Or wander after that, they knew not where [brains
To find; or, if found, how to enjoy? Are men's Made, now a-days, with malt, that their affections
Are never sober?
I do believe,
That men in love are ever drunk, as drunken men
Are ever loving.
Anth. Pr'ythee, be thou sober,
And know that they are none of those, not guilty
Of the least vanity of love; only a doubt
Fame might too far report, or rather, flatter
The graces of this woman, made them curious
To find the truth; which, since they find so
Lock'd up from their searches, they are now resolv'd
To give the wonder over.
Peter. 'Would they were resolv'd
To give me some new shoes, too! for I'll be sworn
These are e'en worn out to the reasonable soles,

In their good worship's business : and some sleep
Would not do much amiss, unless they mean
To make a watchman of me.—Here they come !

[Exeunt.]

Enter DON JOHN and DON FREDERICK.

Don J. I would we could have seen her though :
for, sure,

She must be some rare creature, or report lies :
All men's reports, too.

Don F. I could well wish I had seen Constantia .
But since she is so conceal'd, plac'd where
No knowledge can come near her, so guarded
As 'twere impossible, though known, to reach her,
I have made up my belief.

Don J. Hang me, from this hour,
If I more think upon her !
But as she came a strange report unto me,
So the next beauteous fame shall lose her.

Don F. 'Tis the next way :—
But whither are you walking ?

Don J. My old round,
After my supper, and then to bed.

Don F. Your servant, then.

Don J. Will not you stir ?

Don F. I have a little business.

Don J. I'd lay my life, this lady still—

Don F. Then you would lose it.

Don J. Pray, let's walk together.

Don F. Now I cannot.

Don J. I have something to impart.

Don F. An hour hence,
I will not miss to meet you.

Don J. Where ?

Don F. I' th' High-street ;

For, not to lie, I have a few devotions
To do first, and then I am your's, Don John.

Don J. Devotions, Frederick ! Well, I leave you to them :

Speed you well : but remember—

Don F. I will not fail.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Street.

Enter PETRUCHIO, ANTONIO, SANCHIO, and BAPTISTA.

Anto. Cut his windpipe, I say.

San. Fie, Antonio ! [him.]

Anto. Or knock his brains out first, and then forgive
If you do thrust, be sure it be to th' hilts,
A surgeon may see through him.

San. You are too violent.

Bapt. Too open ; indiscreet.

Petr. Am I not ruin'd ? [son'd ?]
The honour of my house crack'd ? my blood poi-
My credit and my name ?

Bapt. Be sure it be so,
Before you use this violence. Let not doubt,
And a suspecting anger, so much sway you :
Your wisdom may be question'd.

Anto. I say, kill him,
And then dispute the cause.

Bapt. Hang up a true man,
Because 'tis possible he may be thievish !
Is this good justice ?

Petr. I know, as certain
As day must come again, as clear as truth,
And open as belief can say it to me, [pense,
That I am basely wrong'd, wrong'd above recom-
Maliciously abus'd, blasted for ever
In name and honour, lost to all remembrance,
But what is smear'd and shameful : I must kill him ;

Necessity compels me.

San. But think better.

[me,

Petr. There's no other cure left ; yet, witness with
All that is fair in man, all that is noble,
I am not greedy of his life I seek for, [possible,
Nor thirst to shed man's blood ; and 'would 'twere
I wish it from my soul,
My sword should only kill his crimes : no, 'tis
Honour—honour, my noble friends, that idol honour,
That all the world now worships, not Petruchio,
Must do this justice.

Anto. Let it once be done,
And 'tis no matter whether you, or honour,
Or both, be accessory.

Bapt. Do you weigh, Petruchio,
The value of the person, power, and greatness,
And what this spark may kindle ?

Petr. To perform it,
So much I am tied to reputation,
And credit of my house, let it raise wild-fires,
And storms that toss me into everlasting ruin,
Yet I must through ; if you dare side me.

Anto. Dare !
Say we were all sure to die in this venture,
As I am confident against it, is there any
Amongst us of so fat a sense, so pamper'd,
Would choose luxuriously to lie a-bed,
And purge away his spirit ? send his soul out
In sugar sops, and syrups ? Give me dying,
As dying ought to be, upon my enemy :
Let them be all the world, and bring along
Cain's envy with them, I will on.

San. We'll follow.

Petr. You're friends, indeed !

Anto. Here is none will fly from you ;
Do it in what design you please, we'll back you.

Petr. That's spoken heartily.

Ant. And he that flinches,
May he die, lousy, in a ditch !

San. Is the cause so mortal ? nothing but his life ?

Petr. Believe me,
A less offence has been the desolation
Of a whole name.

San. No other way to purge it ?

Petr. There is, but never to be hop'd for.

Bapt. Think an hour more,
And if, then, you find no safer road to guide you,
We'll set our rest, too.

Anto. Mine's up already,
And hang him, for my part, goes less than life.

[Exeunt.]

Enter DON JOHN.

Don J. The civil order of this city, Naples,
Makes it below'd and honour'd of all travellers,
As a most safe retirement in all troubles ;
Beside the wholesome seat, and noble temper
Of those minds that inhabit it, safely wise,
And to all strangers courteous. But I see
My admiration has drawn night upon me,
And longer to expect my friend, may pull me
Into suspicion of too late a stirrer,
Which all good governments are jealous of.
I'll home, and think at liberty : yet, certain,
'Tis not so far night as I thought ; for see,
A fair house yet stands open ; yet all about it
Are close, and no lights stirring : there may be foul play :
I'll venture to look in. If there be knaves,
I may do a good office.

Nurse. [Within.] Signior !

Don J. What ? how is this ?

Nurse. [Within.] Signior Fabritio! [good done.]

Don J. This is a woman's tongue; here may be

Don J. [Within.] Who's there? Fabritio?

Don J. Ay.

Nurse. [Within.] Where are you?

Don J. Here.

Nurse. [Within.] Oh! come, for heaven's sake!

Don J. I must see what this means.

Enter Nurse with a Child.

Nurse. I have stayed this long hour for you; make no noise;

For things are in strange trouble. Here; be secret:

'Tis worth your care: begone now; more eyes watch us,

Than may be for our safeties.

Don J. Harkye—

Nurse. Peace; good night!

Don J. She's gone, and I am loaden. Fortune for me! [Exit.]

It weighs well, and it feels well; it may chance

To be some pack of worth: by th'mass, 'tis heavy!

If it be coin or jewels, it is worth welcome.

I'll ne'er refuse a fortune: I am confident

'Tis of no common price. Now to my lodgings:

If it be right, I'll bless this night. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—Another Street.

Enter DUKE, GUZMAN, PEDRO, and PEREZ.

Duke. Welcome to town. Are ye all fit?

Guz. To point, sir.

Duke. Where are the horses?

Pedro. Where they were appointed.

Duke. Be private all, and whatsoever fortune offer itself, let us stand sure.

Perez. Fear not;

Ere you shall be endanger'd, or deluded,

We'll make a black night out't.

Duke. No more, I know it;

You know your quarters.

Guz. Will you go alone, sir?

Duke. Ye shall not be far from me; the least noise shall bring you to my rescue.

Pedro. We are counsell'd. [Ereunt.]

Enter DON JOHN, with a Child, crying.

Don J. Was ever man so paid for being curious; Ever so bob'd for searching out adventures,

As I am! Did the devil lead me? Must I needs be peeping

Into men's houses, where I had no business,

And make myself a mischief?

What have I got by this now?

A piece of pap and caudle-work—a child:

This comes of peeping!

What a figure do I make now! good white bread,

Let's have no bawling wi' ye. 'Sdeath! have I

Known wenches thus long, all the ways of wenches,

Their snares and subtleties,

And am I now bumfiddled with a bastard?

Well, Don John,

You'll be wiser one day, when you have paid dearly For a collection of these butter prints.

'Twould not grieve me to keep this gingerbread,

Were it of my own baking; but to beggar

Myself in caudles, nurses, coral, bells, and babies,

For other men's iniquities!

What shall I do with it now?

Should I be caught here dandling this pap-spoon,

I shall be sung in ballads;

No eyes are near—I'll drop it, [me!]

For the next curious coxcomb. How it smiles upon

Ha! you little sugar-sop! 'tis a sweet baby; [it; 'Twere barbarous to leave it: ten to one 'twould kill Worse sin than his who got it. Well, I'll take it, And keep it as they keep death's-head, in rings, To cry memento to me, "No more peeping!"

Now all the danger is to qualify [lodge;]

The good old gentlewoman, at whose house we

For she will fall upon me with a catechism

Of four hours long. Come, good wonder,

Let you and I be jogging; your starv'd treble

Will waken the rude watch else. All that be

Curious night-walkers, may they find my fee! [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—A Street.

Enter DON FREDERICK.

Don F. Sure, he's gone home. I have beaten all the purlieus, [here?]

But cannot bolt him: if he be a bobbing—What's

Enter First CONSTANTIA.

1 Con. I am ready, And through a world of dangers am flown to you;

Be full of haste and care, we are undone else.

Where are your people? Which way must we travel?

For heaven's sake, stay not here, sir!

Don F. What may this prove?

1 Con. Alas! I am mistaken, lost, undone, For ever perish'd! Sir, for heaven's sake tell me,

Are you a gentleman?

Don F. I am.

1 Con. Of this place?

Don F. No; born in Spain.

1 Con. As ever you lov'd honour, As ever your desires may gain their ends,

Do a poor wretched woman but this benefit, For I am forc'd to trust you.

Don F. You have charm'd me; Humanity and honour bid me help you

And if I fail your trust—

1 Con. The time's too dangerous To stay your protestations: I believe you,

Alas! I must believe you. From this place, Good, noble sir, remove me instantly;

And, for a time, where nothing but yourself, And honest conversation, may come near me;

In some secure place settle me. What I am, And why thus boldly I commit my credit

Into a stranger's hand, the fear and dangers That force me to this wild course, at more leisure,

I shall reveal unto you.

Don F. Come, be hearty; He must strike through my life that takes you from me. [Ereunt.]

SCENE V.

Enter PETRUCHIO, ANTONIO, SANCHIO, and BAPTISTA.

Petr. He will sure come: are ye all well armed? Auto. Never fear us:

Here's that will make them dance without a fiddle.

Petr. We are to look for no weak foes, my friends, Nor unadvis'd ones.

Auto. Best gamesters make the best play; We shall fight close, and home, too.

Sañ. Antonio, You are a thought too bloody.

Auto. Why, all physicians

And penny almanacks allow the opening

Of veins this month. Why do you talk of bloody?
 What come we for, to fall to cuffs for apples?
 What, would you make the cause a cudgel-quarrel?
 On what terms stands this man? Is not his honour
 Open'd t' his hand, and pick'd out like an oyster?
 His credit like a quart-pot knock'd together,
 Able to hold no liquor? Clear out this point.

Petr. Speak soft, gentle cousin.

Anto. I'll speak truly.

What should man do, allied to these disgraces,
 Lick o'er his enemy, sit down, and dance him?
 Cry, "That's my fine boy, thou shalt do so no more, child?"

Petr. Here are no such cold pities.

Anto. By St. Jaques, [Andrew,
 They shall not find me one! Here's old tough
 A special friend of mine, and he but hold, [for,
 I'll strike them such a hornpipe! Knocks I come
 And the best blood I'll light on: I profess it
 Not to scare costermongers. If I lose my own,
 My audit's cast, and farewell five-and-fifty.

Petr. Let's talk no longer, place yourself with silence,

As I direct you; and when time calls us,

As ye are friends, so shew yourselves.

Anto. So be it.

Oh! how my fingers tingle to be at them!

[Eceunt.

SCENE IV.—A Chamber.

Enter Don JOHN and his Landlady.

Land. Nay, son, if this be your regard—

Don J. Good mother— [yourself

Land. Good me no goods. Your cousin and
 Are welcome to me whilst you bear yourselves
 Like honest and true gentlemen. Bring hither,
 To my house, that have ever been reputed
 A gentlewoman of a decent and fair carriage,
 And so behav'd myself—

Don J. I know you have.

Land. Bring hither, as I say, to make my name
 Stink in my neighbours' nostrils, your devices,
 Your brats, got out of allicant and broken oaths;
 Your linsey-wolsey work, your filch'd iniquities!
 You're deceived in me, sir, I am none
 Of those receivers.

Don J. Have I not sworn unto you,

'Tis none of mine, and shew'd you how I found it?

Land. You found an easy fool that let you get it.

Don J. Will you hear me? [your ends,

Land. Oaths! what care you for oaths to gain
 When you are high and pamper'd? What saint knows you?

Or what religion, but your wicked passions?

I'm sick to see this dealing.

Don J. Heaven forbid, mother!

Land. Nay, I am very sick.

Don J. Who waits there?

Petr. [Within.] Sir?

Don J. Bring a bottle of canary wine.

Land. Exceeding sick, heaven help me!

Don J. Haste you, sirrah!

I must e'en make her drunk. [Aside.] Nay, gentle mother—

Land. Now fie upon you! was it for this purpose
 You fetch'd your evening walks for your devotions,
 For this pretended holiness? No weather,
 Not before day, could hold you from the matins.
 Were these your bo-peep prayers?
 Still sicker, sicker!

Enter PETER, with a bottle of wine

Don J. There is no talking to her till I have drench'd her: [Aside.

Give me: here, mother, take a good round draught.
 It will purge spleen from your spirits: deeper, mother.

Land. Ay, ay, son, you imagine this will mend all.

Don J. All, i'faith! mother.

Land. I confess, the wine

Will do its part.

Don J. I'll pledge you.

Land. But, son John—

[once more.

Don J. I know your meaning, mother; touch it
 Alas! you look not well. Take a round draught,
 And then we'll talk at large.

Land. A civil gentleman!

A stranger: one the town holds a good regard of.

Don J. Now we grow kind and maudlin. [Aside.

Land. One that should weigh his fair name!

[Aside.] Oh! a stitch!

Don J. There's nothing better for a stitch, good mother:

Make no spare of it as you love your health;

Mince not the matter.

Land. As I said, a gentleman lodge in my house!

Now heaven's my comfort, signior!—

Don J. And the wine, good mother.

I look'd for this.

[Aside.

Land. I did not think you would have us'd me
 thus;

A woman of credit; one, heaven knows!

That loves you but too tenderly.

Don J. The thunder ceases, and the rain descends.

Land. What do you say, son?

Don J. I say, mother, [it.

That I ever found your kindness, and acknowledge

Land. No, no; I am a fool to counsel you.

Where's the infant?

Come, let's see your workmanship.

Don J. It is none of mine, mother, but I'll fetch it.

Here it is, and a lusty one.

Land. Oh! heaven bless thee! As I live,

Your own eyes, signior; and the nether lip

As like you as you had spit it.

Don J. I am glad on't.

Land. Bless me! what things are these?

Don J. I thought my labour

Was not all lost; 'tis gold, and these are jewels,

Both rich and right, I hope.

Land. Well, well, son John,

Here I am with you now, when, as they say,

Your pleasure comes with profit.

Don J. All this time, good mother,

The child wants looking to, wants meat and nurses.

Land. Now blessing o' thy heart! it shall have all,

And instantly: I'll seek a nurse myself, son.

'Tis a sweet child! Ah! my young Spaniard!

Take you no further care, sir.

Don J. Yes, of these jewels,

I must, by your good leave, mother; these are mine:

The gold for bringing up o't, I freely render

To your charge: for the rest, I'll find a master.

But where's Don Fred'rick, mother?

Land. Ten to one,

About the like adventure; he told me

He was to find you out.

Don J. Why should he stay thus?

There may be some ill chance in't; sleep I will not,

Before I have found him.

Well, my dear mother, let the child be look'd to

And look you to be rewarded. About it
Straight, good mother.

Land. No more words, nor no more children,
Good son, as you love me : this may do well :
This shall do well : eh ! you little, sweet cherub !

[Exit with the Child.]

Don J. Away ! So, so ; I thought the wine would do its duty :
She'll kill the child with kindness : t'other glass,
And she had ravish'd me. There is no way
Of bringing women of her age to reason,
But by this : girls of fifteen are caught
Fifty ways ; they bite as fast as you throw in ;
But with the old cold 'tis a diff'rent dealing,
'Tis wine must warm them to their sense of feeling.
[Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Chamber.

Enter Don FREDERICK, and ANTHONY with a candle.

Don F. Give me the candle ; so, go you out that way.

Anth. What have we now to do ? [Aside.]

Don F. And, on your life, sirrah ! [ledge ;]
Let none come near the door, without my know-
No, not my landlady, nor my friend.

Anth. 'Tis done, sir. [me.]

Don F. Nor any serious business that concerns

Anth. Is the wind there again ? [Aside.]

Don F. Begone !

Anth. I am, sir. [Exit.]

Fred. Now enter without fear.

Enter First CONSTANTIA.

And, noble lady,
That safety and civility you wish for,
Shall truly here attend you :
No wishes,
Beyond the moderation of a man,
Dare enter here. Your own desires and innocence,
Join'd to my vow'd obedience, shall protect you.

1 Con. You are truly noble,
And worth a woman's trust : let it become me,
(I do beseech you, sir,) for all your kindness,
To render, with my thanks, this worthless trifle :
[Offers a ring.]

I may be longer troublesome.

Don F. Fair offices
Are still their own rewards : heaven bless me, lady,
From selling civil courtesies. May it please you,
If you will force a favour, to oblige me,
Draw but that cloud aside, to satisfy me
For what good angel I'm engag'd.

1 Con. It shall be ;
For I am truly confident you're honest :
The piece is scarce worth looking on.

Don F. Trust me,
The abstract of all beauty, soul of sweetness !
What eyes are there !

Noble lady,
If there be any further service to cast on me,
Let it be worth my life, so much I honour you—

1 Con. Your service is too liberal, worthy sir.
Thus far I shall entreat—

Don F. Command me, lady :
You make your power too poor.

1 Con. That presently,
With all convenient haste, you will retire
Unto the street you found me in :
There, if you find a gentleman oppress'd
With force and violence, do a man's office,
And draw your sword, to rescue him.

Don F. He's safe,
Be what he will ; and let his foes be devils,
Arm'd with your beauty, I shall conjure them.
Retire ; this key will guide you : all things necessary
Are there before you.

1 Con. All my prayers go with you ! [Exit.]

Don F. Men say, gold
Does all, engages all, works through all dangers :
Now, I say, beauty can do more. The king's exchequer,

Nor all his wealthy Indies, could not draw me
Through half those miseries this piece of pleasure
Might make me leap into :

Yet, I vow,
My hopes shall die, and my tongue rot within me,
Ere I infringe my faith. Now to my rescue. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Street.

Enter the DUKE, pursued by PETRUCHIO, ANTONIO, and that party.

Duke. You will not all oppress me ?

Anto. Kill him i'th' wanton eye.
Let me come to him.

Duke. Then you shall buy me dearly.

[They fight ; the DUKE fights and retreats.]

Enter Don JOHN.

Don J. Sure, 'tis fighting !
My friend may be engag'd. Fie ! gentlemen,
This is unmanly odds. [Duke falls.] Press upon
A fall'n enemy ! it is cowardly :
Thus will I protect him. [Bestrides the DUKE.]

Anto. I'll stop your mouth, sir.

Don J. Nay, then, have at thee freely.
There's a plum to satisfy your longing.

Petr. He's fallen ; I hope I have sped him.
Where's Antonio ?

Anto. I must have one thrust more, sir.

Don J. Come up to me.
Anto. A mischief confound your fingers !
He's given me my quietus est ; I felt him
In my small guts ; I'm sure he's feez'd me :
This comes of siding with you.

Petr. I hear more rescue coming.

[Trampling within]
Anto. Let's turn back, then ;
My skull's uncloven yet, let me but kill somebody.

Petr. Away, for heaven's sake, with him !

[They hurry ANTONIO off.]

Enter the Duke's Party.

Don J. Help, gentlemen ! How is it ?

Duke. Well, sir,
Only a little stagger'd.

Duke's Party. Let's pursue them.

Duke. No ; not a man, I charge you.
My thanks to you, brave sir, whose timely valour
And manly courtesy came to my rescue.

Don J. You had foul play offer'd you, and shame befall him

That can pass by oppression.

Duke. May I crave, sir,
But this much honour more, to know your name,
And him I am so bound to ?

Don J. For the bond, sir,
'Tis every good man's tie ; to know me further,

Will little profit you; I am a stranger;
My country, Spain; my name, Don John; a gentleman

That came abroad to travel.

Duke. I have heard, sir,
Much worthy mention of you, yet I find
Fame short of what you are.

Don J. You are pleas'd, sir,
To express your courtesy; may I demand
As freely what you are, and what mischance
Cast you into this danger?

Duke. For this present
I must desire your pardon; you shall know me
Ere it be long, sir, and nobler thanks
Than now my will can render.

Don J. Your will's your own, sir. [Looking about.
Duke. What is't you look for, sir? Have you lost anything? [fellows

Don J. Only my hat i'th' scuffle; sure, these Were night-snaps!

Duke. No, believe me, sir; pray, use mine,
For 'twill be hard to find your own now.

Don J. Indeed, I cannot.

Duke. Indeed, you shall: I can command another.
I do beseech you, honour me.

Don J. Well, sir, then I will;

And so I'll take my leave.

Duke. Within these few days
I hope I shall be happy in your knowledge,
Till when, you live in my remembrance.

[Exit with his party.

Don J. And you in mine.
This is some noble fellow!

Enter Don FREDERICK.

Don F. 'Tis his tongue, sure.

Don John!

Don J. Don Frederick!

Don F. You're fairly met, sir. [night,
Pr'ythee, tell me, what revelations hast thou had to-
That home was never thought of?

Don J. Revelations!

I'll tell thee, Frederick: but before I tell thee,
Settle thy understanding.

Don F. 'Tis prepar'd, sir

Don J. Why, then, mark what shall follow:

This night, Frederick, this wicked night—

Don F. I thought no less.

Don J. This blind night!—

What dost thou think I have got?

Don F. What such wanton fellows ought to get.

Don J. Would 'twere no worse! you talk of revelations,

I have got a revelation will reveal me
An arrant coxcomb whilst I live.

Don F. What is't?

Thou hast lost nothing?

Don J. No, I have got, I tell thee.

Don F. What hast thou got?

Don J. One of the infantry—a child.

Don F. How!

Don J. A chopping child, man.

Don F. 'Give you joy, sir!

Don J. I'll give it you, sir, if it is joy. Frederick,

This town's abominable, that's the truth on't.

Don F. I still told you, John,

Your venching must come home; I counsel'd you;
But where no grace is—

Don J. 'Tis none of mine, man.

Don F. Answer the parish so.

Don J. Cheated, in troth!

Peeping into a house, by whom I know not,

ACT. DRAMA.—NOS. 85 & 86.

Nor where to find the place again; but, Frederick,
'Tis no poor one,

That's my best comfort, for't has brought about it
Enough to make it, man.

Don F. Where is't?

Don J. At home.

Don F. A saving voyage; but what will you say,
signior,

To him that, searching out your serious worship,
Has met a stranger fortune?

Don J. How, good Frederick?

A little squeaking girl to this boy would hit it.

Don F. No, mine's a nobler venture; what do you think, sir,

Of a distress'd lady, one whose beauty

Would oversell all Italy?

Don J. Where is she?

Don F. A woman of that rare behaviour,

So qualified, as love and admiration

Dwell round about her; of that perfect spirit—

Don J. Ay, marry, sir?

Don F. That admirable carriage,

That sweetness in discourse: young as the morning,
Her blushes staining his.

Don J. But where's this creature?

Shew me but that.

Don F. That's all one; she's forthcoming.

I have her sure, boy.

Don J. Harkye! Frederick;

What truck betwixt my infant?

Don F. 'Tis too light, sir;

Stick to your charge, good Don John; I am well.

Don J. But is there such a wench?

Don F. First tell me this:

Did you not lately, as you walk'd along,
Discover people that were arm'd, and likely
To do offence?

Don J. Yes, marry, and they urg'd it

As far as they had spirit.

Don F. Pray, go forward. [them,

Don J. A gentleman I found engag'd amongst

It seems, of noble breeding, I'm sure, brave mettle,

As I return'd to look you; I set into him,

And without hurt (I thank heaven!) rescu'd him.

Ecce signum. [Shewing the hat.

Don F. What the devil's that, John?

Don J. Only the laurel I gain'd in the scuffle.

Don F. Bravo! then all my work is done.

And now, to satisfy you, there is a woman—

Oh! John, there is a woman—

Don J. Oh! Frederick, where is she? [you;

Don F. And one of no less worth than I assure
And, which is more, fall'n under my protection.

Don J. I'm glad of that; forward, sweet Frederick. [too, sir.

Don F. And, which is most of all, she is at home,

Don J. Come, let's begone, sir.

Don F. Yes; but 'tis most certain,

You cannot see her, sir.

Don J. Why?

Don F. She has sworn me,

That none else shall come near her; not my mother,
Till some doubts are clear'd. [she in?

Don J. Not look upon her? What chamber is

Don F. In ours.

Don J. Let's go, I say:

A woman's oaths are wafers, break with making.

They must for modesty a little: we all know it.

Let's go, I say.

Don F. No, I'll assure you, sir.

Don J. Not see her! [rick;

I smell an old dog trick of your's. Lookye! Frede-

You talk'd to me of wenching; let's have fair play,
Square dealing, I would wish you.

Don F. You may depend upon it, John.

Don J. Tell me,
And tell me true: is the cause honourable,
Or for your pleasure?

Don F. By all our friendship, John,
'Tis honest, and of great end.

Don J. I'm answer'd;
But let me see her though.

Don F. I can't.

Don J. Leave the door open as you go in.

Don F. I dare not.

Don J. Not wide open, but a little, very little,
So as a jealous husband

Would level at his wanton wife through.

Don F. That courtesy,

If you desire no more—

Don J. No more.

Don F. And keep it strictly—

Don J. Upon my honour. [morning.]

Don F. I dare afford you. Come, 'tis now near

Don J. Along, along, then, dear Frederick. [Exeunt.]

Enter PETER and ANTHONY.

Peter. Nay, the old woman's gone, too.

Anth. She's a caterwauling
Amongst the gutters: but, conceive me, Peter,
Where our good masters should be.

Peter. Where they should be,
I do conceive; but where they are, good Anthony—

Anth. Ay, there it goes. My master's bo-peep with me,

With his sly popping in and out again,
Argued a cause—

Peter. My saint-like Don has hired a chapel
In the corner there, for his pious uses;

Where I, against my will, watch, fast, and pray.

Anth. Hark! [Lute sounds.]

Peter. What?

Anth. Dost not hear a noise?

Again!—'tis a lute.

Peter. Odd! it's a lute, or a drum. Where is it?

Anth. Above, in my master's chamber.

Peter. There is no creature: he hath the key himself, man.

Anth. Let him have it; this is his lute.

[Singing within.]

Peter. I grant you; but who strikes it?

Anth. An admirable voice, too! Hark you!

Peter. Anthony,

Art sure we are at home?

Anth. Without all doubt, Peter.

Peter. Then it must be the devil.

Anth. Let it be.

Good devil, sing again. Oh! dainty devil!

Peter, believe it a most delicate devil!

The sweetest devil—

Enter DON FREDERICK and DON JOHN.

Don F. If you will be content with peeping?

Don J. I will, I will.

Don F. Then come in softly;

And, as you love your faith, presume no further
Than you have promis'd.

Don J. Basta!

Don F. What makes you up so early, sir?

Don J. You, sir, in your contemplations?

Peter. Oh! pray you, peace, sir.

Anth. Hush, hush!

Don F. Why peace, sir?

[Lute sounds.]

Anth. Why—hush, hush!

Peter. Do you hear?

Don J. 'Tis your lute: she's playing on't.

Anth. The house is haunted, sir;

For this we have heard this half year.

Don F. You saw nothing?

Anth. Not I.

Peter. Nor I, sir.

Don F. Get out our breakfast, then;
And make no words on't.

Don J. We'll undertake this spirit, if it be one.

Anth. This is no devil, Peter.

Mum! there be bats abroad. [Exit with PETER.]

Don F. Stay; now she sings.

Why didst thou shrug so?

Either allay this heat, or, as I live, I will not trust [you.]

Don J. Pass on; I warrant you. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—Another Chamber.

Enter First CONSTANTIA, with a lute.

1 Con. Thou friendly, soothing instrument! my better

Genius has surely laid thee in my way,
That thy sweet melancholy strain might echo
To the sorrows of my heart, lest it, o'erburden'd,
Should, from reflection, sink into despair.
To curse those stars, that men say govern us—
To rail at fortune, to fall out with fate,
And tax the general world, will help me nothing:
Alas! our own desires

Are our own fates, our own stars all our fortune,
Which, as we sway them, so abuse, or bless us. [Retires and sits.]

Enter DON FREDERICK. DON JOHN peeping.

Don F. Peace to your meditations!

Don J. Plague on you!

Stand out of the light. [Aside.]

1 Con. I crave your mercy, sir. [Nerly.]

My mind, o'ercharg'd with care, made me unman-

Don F. Pray you, set that mind at rest; all shall be perfect. [son!]

Don J. I like the person rare: a handsome per-
A wond'rous handsome body! Would she would turn!

See, an that spiteful puppy be not got

Between me and my light again! [Aside.]

Don F. 'Tis done;

As all that you command, shall be: the gentleman
Is safely off all danger.

Don J. What a rare creature! [Aside.]

1 Con. How shall I thank you, sir? how satisfy—

Don F. Gentle lady, all's rewarded.

Now does he melt like marmalade. [Aside.]

Don J. Nay, 'tis certain,

Thou art the sweetest woman, eyes e'er look'd on!

Pray, heaven, thou art not honest! [Aside.]

Don F. None disturb'd you?

1 Con. Not any, sir; nor any sound came near
I thank your care.

Don F. 'Tis well.

Pull in your head, and be hang'd! [To Don J.]

Don J. Harkye! Frederick,

I have brought you home your pack-saddle.

Don F. Fie upon you!

[To Don J.—Shuts the door.]

1 Con. Nay, let him enter. Fie! my lord duke;
Stand peeping at your friends!

Don F. You are cozen'd, lady;

Here is no duke.

I Con. I know him, full well, signior.

I do beseech your grace, come in.

Don F. Shall he enter,

Whoe'er he be?

I Con. With all my heart.

Don F. Come in, then.

Enter Don JOHN.

Don J. Bless you, lady! [CONSTANTIA starts.]

Don F. Nay, start not; though he be a stranger to you,

He's of a noble strain; my kinsman, lady;

My countryman, and fellow-traveller.

He's truly honest.

Don J. That's a lie. [Aside.]

Don F. And trusty,

Beyond your wishes; valiant to defend,

And modest to converse with as your blushes.

Don J. Modest to converse with! Here's a fellow!

Now may I hang myself: this commendation

Has broke the neck of all my hopes; for now

Must I cry, "No, forsooth!" and "Ay, forsooth!"

And "Truly, as I live!" and "As I am honest!"

He's done these things on purpose; for he knows,

Like a most envious rascal as he is,

I am not honest this way. Oh! the traitor!

He has watch'd his time. I shall be quit with him.

[Aside.]

I Con. Sir, I credit you.

Don F. Go, salute her, John.

Don J. Plague o' your commendations! [Aside.]

I Con. Sir, I shall now desire to be a trouble.

Don J. Never to me, sweet lady. Thus I seal

My faith, and all my services. [Kisses her hand.]

I Con. One word, signior. [To Don F.]

Don J. What a hand the rogue has! softer than down,

And whiter than the lily; and then, her eyes!

What points she at? my leg, I warrant; or

My well-knit body: sit fast, Don Frederick.

Don F. 'Twas given him by that gentleman. You took such care of, his own being lost i'the scuffle. [one,]

I Con. With much joy may he wear it! 'tis a right

I can assure you, gentlemen; and right happy

May he be in all fights for that noble service.

Don F. Why do you blush?

I Con. It had almost cozen'd me.

For, not to lie, when I saw that, I look'd for Another owner of it. But 'tis well.

Don F. Who's there? [Knocking.]

Pray you, retire, madam. [Exit I CON.] Come in, sir.

Enter ANTHONY.

Now, what's the news with you?

Anth. There is a gentleman without

Would speak with Don John.

Don F. [To Don J. who is peeping after CON.] Don John!

Don J. [Still peeping.] What's the matter?

Don F. Leave peeping, John; you are wanted.

Don J. Who is it?

Anth. I do not know, sir; but he shews a man Of no mean reckoning.

Don J. Let him shew his name,

And you return a little wiser. [Exit ANTHONY.]

Don F. How do you like her, John?

Don J. As well as you, Frederick,

For all I am honest; you shall find it, too.

Don F. Art thou not honest?

Don J. Art thou an ass?

"And modest as her blushes!" What a blockhead

Would e'er have popp'd out such a dry apology

For his dear friend? And to a gentlewoman,

A woman of her youth and delicacy!

They are arguments to draw them to abhor us.

An honest, moral man! 'tis for a constable,

A handsome man, a wholesome man,

A liberal man, a likely man,

Stout, strong, and valiant— [ing;]

These had been things to hearken to; things catch-

But you have such a spite'd consideration,

Such qualms upon your worship's conscience,

Such chilblains in your blood, that all things pinch you,

Which nature and the liberal world make custom;

And nothing but fair honour! dear honour! sweet honour!

Oh! damn your water-gruel honour!

Don F. I am sorry, John— [that?]

Don J. And so am I, Frederick; but what of Fie upon thee! a man of thy discretion! [in;]

That I was trusty and valiant, were things well put

But modest! a modest gentleman!

Oh! wit, wit! where wast thou?

Don F. It shall be mended;

And henceforth you shall have your due.

Re-enter ANTHONY

Don F. I look for't. How now, who is't?

Anth. A gentleman of this city,

And calls himself Petrucchio.

Don J. Petrucchio! I'll attend him.

[Exit ANTHONY.]

Re-enter First CONSTANTIA.

I Con. How did he call himself?

Don F. Petrucchio:

Does it concern you aught?

I Con. Oh! gentlemen,

The hour of my destruction is come on me;

I am discover'd, lost, left to my ruin:

As ever you had pity—

Don J. Do not fear; [first.]

Let the great devil come, he shall come though me

Lost here, and we about you!

I Con. To you, and your humanity, a hapless

Helpless creature, begs for safety. Oh! grant

Me your protection; to your honours, sirs,

I fly, as to the altar, for a refuge:

Be your nobleness

My sanctuary, and shield a woe-sick heart

From all its terrors and afflictions. [Kneeling.]

Don J. Pray, rise. [Kneels.] I can't bear it.

Don F. Fall before us!

I Con. Oh! my unfortunate estate! all anger

Compar'd to his, to his—

Don F. Let his and all men's, [ven's sake!]

Whilst we have power and life; bear up, for hea-

Don J. And for my sake, be comforted.

I Con. I have offended heaven, too; yet heaven knows—

Don J. Ay, heaven knows, that we are all evil;

Yet heaven forbid we should have our deserts.

What is he?

I Con. Too, too near to my offence, sir.

Oh! he will cut me piece-meal!

Don F. 'Tis no treason?

Don J. Let it be what it will, if he cut here,

I'll find him cut-work.

Don F. He must buy you dear;

With more than common lives.

Don J. Fear not, nor weep not;

By heaven, I'll fire the town before you perish!
And then the more the merrier; we'll jog with you.

Don F. Come in, and dry your eyes.

Don J. Pray, no more weeping,
Spoil a sweet face for nothing! My return
Shall end all this, I warrant you.

I Con. Heaven grant it!

[Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—An Apartment in Don Frederick's Lodgings.

Enter PETRUCHIO, with a letter.

Petr. This man should be of quality and worth,
By Don Alvaro's letter; for he gives
No slight recommendation of him:
I'll e'en make use of him.

Enter Don JOHN.

Don J. Save you, sir; I am sorry
My business was so unmannerly, to make you
Wait thus long here.

Petr. Occasions must be serv'd, sir.

But is your name Don John?

Don J. It is, sir.

Petr. Then,

First, for your own brave sake, I must embrace you:
Next, for the credit of your noble friend,
Hernanda de Alvaro, make you mine:
Who lays his charge upon me, in this letter,
To look you out; and for the virtue in you,
Whilst your occasions make you resident
In this place, to supply you, love and honour you;
Which had I known sooner—

Don J. Noble sir,

[sir;

You'll make my thanks too poor. I wear a sword,
And have a service to be still dispos'd of,
As you shall please command it.

[sir;

Petr. That manly courtesy is half my business,
And, to be short, to make you know I honour you,
And in all points believe your worth-like oracle;
This day, Petruchio,
One that may command the strength of this place,
Hazard the boldest spirits, hath made choice
Only of you, and in a noble office.

Don J. Forward, I am free to entertain it.

Petr. Thus, then;

I do beseech you, mark me.

Don J. I shall, sir.

[worthy!

Petr. Ferrara's duke—Would I might call him
But that he has razed out from his family,
As he has mine, with infamy—This man,
Rather, this powerful monster, we being left
But two, of all our house, to stock our memories,
My sister Constantia and myself, with arts and witchcrafts,

Vows, and such oaths heaven has no mercy for,
Drew to dishonour this weak maid by stealth,
And secret passages, I knew not of.
Oft he obtain'd his wishes, oft abus'd her,
I am asham'd to say the rest. This purchas'd,
And his hot blood allay'd, he left her
And all our name to ruin.

Don J. This was foul play,
And ought to be rewarded so.

Petr. I hope so:

He 'scap'd me yesternight; which, if he dare
Again adventure for, I will pardon him.

Don J. Sir, what commands have you to lay on me?

Petr. Only thus: by word of mouth to carry him
A challenge from me, that so (if he have honour in him)

We may decide all difference betwixt us.

Don J. Fair and noble;
And I will do it home. When shall I visit you?

Petr. Please you, this afternoon, I will ride with you;

For, at the castle, six miles hence, we are sure
To find him.

Don J. I'll be ready.

Petr. My man shall wait here,
And conduct you to my house.

Don J. I shall not fail you. [Exit PETRUCHIO.]

Enter Don FREDERICK.

Don F. How now?

Don J. All's well, and better than thou couldst expect; for this wench is certainly no vestal. But who do you think that she is? guess, an' thou canst.

Don F. I cannot.

Don J. Be it known, then, to all men, by these presents, this is she, she, and only she, our curious coxcombs have been so long hunting after.

Don F. Who, Constantia? Thou talk'st of cocks and bulls, John.

Don J. I talk of wenches, Frederick. This is the pullet we two have been crowing after.

Don F. It cannot be.

Don J. It can be, it shall be, and must be—sister to Don Petruchio; her name Constantia; I know all, man.

Don F. Now I believe—

Don J. I both believe and hope it.

Don F. Why do you hope it?

Don J. First, because she is handsome; and next, because she is kind: there are two reasons for you.
Now do you find out a third, a better, if you can:
for take this, Frederick, for a certain rule, since she has once begun, she'll never give it over: ergo, if we have good luck, in time she may fall to our share.

Don F. I can't believe her dishonest for all this.
She has not one loose thought about her.

Don J. No matter for that, she's no saint. There has been fine work, dainty doings, Frederick!

Don F. How can you talk so?

Don J. Because I think so. Now you think so,
and talk otherwise; therefore, I am the honestest,
though you may be the modestest man.

Don F. Well, well; there may have been a slip.

Don J. Ay, and a tumble, too, poor creature! I think the boy will prove her's, I took up last night.

Don F. The devil!

Don J. Ay, ay; he has been at work. Let us go in, and comfort her; that she is here, is nothing yet suspected. Anon I'll tell you why her brother came, (who, by this light, is a brave fellow,) and what honour he has done me, in calling me to serve him. [John.]

Don F. There be irons heating for some, Don

Don J. Then we must take care not to burn our fingers, Frederick. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Chamber.

Enter Landlady and ANTHONY

Land. Come, sir, who is it that keeps your master company?

Anth. I say to you, Don John.

Land. I say, what woman?

Anth. I say so, too.

Land. I say again, I will know.

Anth. I say, 'tis fit you should.

Land. And I tell thee, he has a woman here.

Anth. I tell thee, 'tis, then, the better for him.

Land. Was ever gentlewoman

So trumf'd up with a fool! Well, saucy sirrah,

I will know who it is, and to what purpose.

I pay the rent, and I will know how my house

Comes by these inflammations,

Anth. 'Twould be a great ease to your age.

Enter Don FREDERICK.

Don F. How now?

Why, what's the matter, Landlady?

Land. What's the matter!

You use me decently among you, gentlemen.

Don F. Who has abus'd her? you, sir?

Land. Od's my witness!

I will not be thus treated, that I will not.

Anth. I gave her no ill language.

Land. Thou liest, sirrah!

Thou took'st me up at every word I spoke,

As I had been a maukin, a flirt gillian:

And thou think'st, because thou canst write and read,

Our noses must be under thee.

Don F. Dare you, sirrah?

[you:

Anth. Let but the truth be known, sir, I beseech

She raves of veuchers, and I know not what, sir.

Land. Go to, thou know'st too well, thou wicked varlet!

Thou instrument of evil!

Anth. As I live, sir, she's ever thus, till dinner.

Don F. Get you in, sir; I'll answer you anon.

[Exit ANTHONY.

Now to your grief: what is't? for I can guess—

Land. You may, with shame enough, Don Frederick,

[on,

If there were shame amongst you: nothing thought

But how you may abuse my house.

Don F. No more of these words;

Nor no more murmurings, woman:

I did suspect your anger:

But turn it presently and handsomely,

And bear yourself discreetly to this lady;

For such a one there is, indeed.

Land. 'Tis well, sir!

[melancholies,

Don F. Leave off your devil's matins, and your

Or we shall leave our lodgings.

Land. But, mine honour—

And 'twere not for mine honour—

Don F. Come, your honour,

Your house, and you, too, if you dare believe me,

Are well enough. Sleep up yourself, leave crying;

For I must have you entertain this lady

With all civility. When you know her,

[it.

You'll find your own fault; no more words, but do

Land. You know you may command me.

Enter Don JOHN.

Don J. Worshipful landlady,

How does thy swainskin petticoat? By heav'n,

Thou look'st most amiable!

Land. You'll leave this roguery,

When you come to my years.

Don J. By this light,

Thou art not above fifteen yet; a mere girl!

Thou hast not half thy teeth!

[Knocking.

Don F. Somebody knocks;

See who it is; and do not mind this fellow.

Land. I beg, sir, that you'll use me with decorum.

Don J. Ay, ay, I'll promise you; with nothing else.

[Exit Landlady.

Was there ever such a piece of touchwood?

Don F. Pr'ythee, John, let her alone; she has been

Well vex'd already. She'll grow stark mad, man.

Don J. I would fain see her mad. An old mad woman—

Don F. Don't be a fool.

[tooth-ache.

Don J. Is like a miller's mare troubled with the

She makes the rarest faces—

Don F. Pr'ythee, be sober.

Re-enter Landlady.

Don J. What, again!

[hills.

Nay, then, it is decreed, though hills were set on

And seas met seas to guard thee, I would through!

Land. Od's my witness! if you ruffle me, I'll spoil your sweet face for you.

Don J. Oh! raptures, raptures!

[Kissing her. She runs after him.

What, will you hurt your own son?

Land. Well, well! go, go to the door, there's a gentleman there would speak with you.

Don J. Upon my life, Petruchio. Good, dear landlady, carry him into the dining-room, and I'll wait upon him presently.

Land. Well, Don John, the time will come that I shall be even with you.

[Exit.

Don J. I must begone about this business.

Won't you go too, Frederick?

Don F. I am not requested, you know; besides, the lady will want advice and consolation.

Don J. Yes; and I know, too, with all your modesty, that you will be ready to give it her.

[so?

Don F. For shame, John; how can you ramble

You know you may trust me.

[Frederick.

Don J. I had rather trust a cat with sweet milk,

Don F. I'll but speak to her, and follow you.

Don J. Indeed?

Don F. Indeed.

Don J. Upon your honour?

Don F. Upon my honour.

Don J. And your modesty?

Don F. Phoo, phoo! don't be a fool.

Don J. Well, well, I shall trust you,—now I'm easy.

[Exit.

Enter First CONSTANTIA.

I Con. What, no way to divert this certain danger?

Don F. Impossible! their honours are engag'd.

I Con. Then there must be murder, and I the cause!

Which, gen'rous sir, I shall no sooner hear of,

Than make one in't. You may, if you please, sir,

Make all go less. Do, sir, for heaven's sake,

Let me request one favour.

Don F. It is granted.

I Con. Your friend, sir, is, I find, too resolute,

Too hot and fiery for the cause: as ever

You did a virtuous deed, for honour's sake,

Go with him, and allay him: your fair temper,

And noble disposition, like wish'd showers,

May quench those eating fires, that would spoil all

I see in him destruction.

[ation.

Don F. I will do it: and it is a wise consider-

I'll alter him, lady.

The old gentleman

Shall wait upon you; she is discreet and secret,

And you may trust her in all points.

I Con. You are noble.

Don F. And so I take my leave.

I hope, lady, a happy issue for all this.

I Con. All heaven's care upon you, and my prayers!

[Exeunt.

SCENE II.—Antonio's House.

Enter Surgeon and a Gentleman.Gent. What symptoms do you find in him?Surg. None, sir, dangerous, if he be ruled.Gent. Why, what does he do?Surg. Nothing that he should. First, he will let no liquor down but wine; and then, he has a fancy that he must be dressed always to the tune of John Dory.Gent. How to the tune of John Dory?Surg. Why, he will have fiddlers, and make them play and sing it to him all the while.Gent. An odd fancy, indeed!Enter ANTONIOAnto. Give me some wine.Surg. I told you so—"Tis death, sir.Anto. 'Tis a horse, sir. Dost thou think I shall recover with the help of barley-water only?Gent. Pie, Antonio, you must be governed.Anto. Why, sir, he feeds me with nothing but rotten roots, and drowned chickens, stewed pericraniums and pia-maters; and when I go to bed, (by heaven 'tis true, sir) he rolls me up in lints, with labels at them, that I am just the man in the almshouse; my head and face is in Aries' place.Surg. Will it please you to let your friends see you opened?Anto. Will it please you, sir, to give me a brimmer? I feel my body open enough for that. Give it me, or I'll die upon thy hand, and spoil thy custom.Surg. How, a brimmer?Anto. Why, look you, sir, thus I am used still;—I can get nothing that I want. In how long a time canst thou cure me?Surg. In forty days.Anto. I'll have a dog shall lick me whole in twenty. In how long a time canst thou kill me?Surg. Presently.Anto. Do it; that's the shorter, and there's more delight in it.Gent. You must have patience.Anto. Man, I must have business; this foolish fellow hinders himself; I have a dozen rascals to hurt within these five days. Good man-mender, stop me up with parsley like stuffed beef, and let me walk abroad, and let me be dressed to that warlike tune, John Dory.Surg. You shall walk shortly.Anto. I will walk presently, sir, and leave your salads there, your green salves and your oils; I'll to my old diet again, strong food and rich wine, and see what that will do.Surg. Well, go thy ways, thou art the maddest old fellow I ever met with! [Exeunt severally.]

SCENE III.—Don FREDERICK's lodging.

Enter First CONSTANTIA and Landlady.1 Con. I have told all I can, and more than yet These gentlemen know of me, ever trusting Your concealment—but are they such strange creatures?Land. There's the younger, ay, and the wildest, Don John, the arrant'st Jack in all this city: Has been a dragon in his days! the truth is, Whose chastity he chops upon he cares not; He flies at all! bastards, upon my conscience, He has now a hundred of 'em. The last night

He brought home one; I pity her that bore it. Some rich woman (For wise I dare not call her) was the mother, For it was hung with jewels; the bearing cloth No less than crimson velvet.

1 Con. How?Land. 'Tis true, lady.1 Con. Was it a boy, too?Land. A brave boy!1 Con. May I see it?

For there is a neighbour of mine, a gentlewoman, Has had a late mischance, which willingly I would know further of; now if you please To be so courteous to me—

Land. You shall see it: [know 'em?]

But what do you think of these men, now you Be wise, or you may repent too late. I tell you But for your own good, and as you will find it.

1 Con. I am advised.Land. No more words then; do that, And instantly, I told you of; be ready: Don John, I'll fit you for your frumps. [Aside.]1 Con. I will, dame:

But shall I see this child?

Land. Within this half hour.Let's in, and then think better. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—Near the Castle of the Duke.

Enter PETRUCHIO, DON JOHN, and FREDERICK.Don J. Sir, he is worth your knowledge, and a gentleman*(If I that so much love him, may commend him)* That's full of honour: and one, if foul play Should fall on us, will not fly back for fillips.Petr. You much honour me, And once more I pronounce you both mine.Don F. Stay;

What troop is that below i' th' valley there?

Don J. Hawking, I take it. [gentlemen;]Petr. They are so; 'tis the Duke, 'tis even he, I know him by his company.Don F. I think too, He bends up this way.Petr. So he does.Don J. Stand you still, Within that covert, till I call: You, Frederick, By no means be not seen, unless they offer To bring on odds upon us: He comes forward, Here will I wait him fairly: To your places.Petr. I need no more instruct you.Don J. Fear me not.[PETRUCHIO and FREDERICK retire.]Enter DUKE and his Party.Duke. Feed the hawks up, We'll fly no more to-day. Oh, my blest fortune, Have I so fairly met the man!Don J. You have, sir; And him you know by this. [Showing his hat.]Duke. Sir, all the honour, And love—Don J. I do beseech your grace stay there. Dismiss your train a little.Duke. Walk aside, And out of hearing, I command ye: Now, sir, Be plain.Don J. I will, and short, You have wronged a gentleman beyond all justice, Beyond the mediation of all friends.Duke. The man, and manner of wrong?Don J. Petruchio is the man; The wrong is, you have dishonour'd his sister.

Duke. Now, stay you, sir,
And hear me a little. This gentleman's [loved;
Sister, that you have named, 'tis true I have long
As true, I have possess'd her: No less truth,
I have a child by her. But that she, or he,
Or any of that family, are tainted;
Suffer disgrace or ruin by my pleasures,
I wear a sword to satisfy the world, no,
And him in this case when pleases; for know, sir,
She is my wife, contracted before heaven;
(A witness I owe more tie to than her brother)
Nor will I fly from that name, which long since
Had had the church's seal and approbation,
But for his jealous nature.

Don J. Sir, your pardon;
And all that was my anger, now my service. [we Duke. Fair sir, I knew I should convert you; had
But that rough man here now too—

Don J. You shall, sir.

What, ho, ho!

Duke. I hope you have laid no ambush?

Enter PETRUCHIO.

Don J. Only friends.

Duke. My noble brother, welcome.
Come, put your anger off, we'll have no fighting.
Unless you will maintain I am unworthy
To bear that name.

Petr. Do you speak this heartily?

Duke. Upon my soul, and truly: The first priest
Shall put you out of these doubts.

Petr. Now I love you,
And beseech you, pardon my suspicious;
You are now more than a brother, a brave friend too.

Don J. The good man's overjoy'd. What, ho,
Mr. Modesty, you may come forth now—

Enter DON FREDERICK.

Don F. How goes it? [all's well.

Don J. Why, the man has his mare again, and
The Duke professes freely he's her husband.

Don F. 'Tis a good hearing.

Don J. Yes, for modest gentlemen;
I must present you—May it please your grace,
To number this brave gentleman, my friend,
And noble kinsman, among these your servants.
He is truly valiant, and modest to converse with.

Duke. Oh, my brave friend! you shower your bounties on me. [ber

Amongst thy best thoughts, signior, in which number You being worthily disposed already,
May freely place your friend.

Don F. Your grace honours me. [brother,

Petr. Why, this is wond'rous happy. But now,
Now comes the bitter to our sweet: Constantia!

Duke. Why, what of her?

Petr. Nor what, nor where do I know: [ledge,
Wing'd with her fears, last night, beyond my know-
She quit my house, but whither—

Don F. Let not that—

Duke. No more, good sir, I have heard too much.

Petr. Nay, sink not,

She cannot be so lost.

Don J. Nor shall not, gentlemen;

Be free again, the lady's found: That smile, sir,
Shows you distrust your servant.

Duke. I do beseech you. [safe.

Don J. You shall believe me; by my soul, she's Duke. Heaven knows I would believe, sir.

Don F. You may safely.

Don J. And under noble usage: This modest gentleman—

Speak, Frederick.—

Don F. I met her in all her doubts last night, and to my guard
(Her fears being strong upon her) she gave her person;

I waited on her to our lodging; where all respect,
Civil and honest service, now attend her.

Petr. You may believe now.

Duke. Yes, I do, and strongly:

Well, my good friends, or rather my good angels,
For you have both preserved me; when these virtues
Die in your friend's remembrance—

Don J. Good, your grace,

Lose no more time in compliments, 'tis too precious;
I know it by myself, there can be no hell
To his that hangs upon his hopes.

Petr. He has hit it.

[crown you

Don F. To horse again then, for this night I'll
With all the joys you wish for.

Petr. Happy gentlemen!

[Exeunt.

SCENE V.—The Suburbs.

Enter FRANCISCO and a Man.

Fran. This is the maddest mischief: never fool was so fobbed off as I am, made ridiculous, and to myself mine own ass; trust a woman! I'll trust the devil first, for he dares be better than his word sometimes. Pray tell me, in what observance have
I ever failed her?

Man. Nay, you can tell that best yourself.

Fran. Let us consider.

Enter DON FREDERICK and DON JOHN.

Don F. Let them talk, we'll go on before.

Fran. Where didst thou meet Constantia, and this woman?

Don F. Constantia! what are these fellows? Stay by all means. [They listen.

Man. Why, sir, I met her in that great street that comes from the market-place, just at the turning by a goldsmith's shop.

Don F. Stand still, John.

Fran. Well, Constantia has spun herself a fine thread, now; what will her best friend think of this?

Don F. John, I smell some juggling, John.

Don J. Yes, Frederick, I fear it will be proved so.

Fran. But what should the reason be, dost think, of this so sudden change in her?

Don F. 'Tis she.

Man. Why, truly I suspect she has been enticed to it by a stranger.

Don J. Did you mark that, Frederick?

Fran. Stranger! who?

[town.

Man. A wild gentleman, that's newly come to Don F. Mark that, too.

Don J. Yes, sir.

Don F. Why do you think so?

Man. I heard her grave conductress twattle something as they went along, that makes me guess it.

Don J. 'Tis she, Frederick.

Don F. But who that he is, John?

Fran. I do not doubt to bolt them out, for they must certainly be about the town. Ha! no more words. Come, let's be gone. [Francisco and Man seeing Don J. and F. they retire.]

Don F. Well.

Don J. Very well.

Don F. Discreetly.

Don J. Finely carried.

Don F. You have no more of these tricks?

Don J. Ten to one, sir.

I shall meet with them if you have.

Don F. Is this fair? [ble ?

Don J. Was it in you a friend's part to deal doubt I am no ass, Don Frederick.

Don F. And, Don John, It shall appear I am no fool: disgrace me To make yourself thus every woman's courtesey? 'Tis boyish, 'tis base.

Don J. 'Tis false; I privy to this dog-trick! Clear yourself, for I know where the wind sits: Or, as I have a life— [Trampling within.

Don F. No more, they are coming: show no discontent, let's quickly away. If she be at home, our jealousies are over; if not, you and I must have a farther parley, John.

Don J. Yes, Don Frederick, you may be sure we shall. But, where are these fellows? Plague on them, we have lost them too in our spleens, like fools.

Enter DUKE and PETRUCHIO.

Duke. Come, gentlemen, let's go a little faster: Suppose you have all mistresses, and mend Your pace accordingly. [another man.

Don J. Sir, I should be as glad of a mistress as Don F. Yes, on my conscience wouldst thou, and of any other man's mistress too, that I'll answer for.

Don J. You'll answer!—Oh! You're a good one! [Exeunt.

SCENE VI.—Antonio's House.

Enter ANTONIO and his Man.

Anto. With all my gold?

Man. The trunk broken open, and all gone!

Anto. And the mother in the plot?

Man. And the mother and all.

Anto. And the devil and all; and all his imps go with them. Belike they thought I was no more of this world, and those trifles would but disturb my conscience.

Man. Sure, they thought, sir, you would not live to disturb them.

Anto. Well, my sweet mistress, I'll try how handsomely your ladyship can caper in the air; there's your master-piece. No imaginations where they should be?

Man. None, sir; yet we have searched all places we suspected; I believe they have taken towards the port.

Anto. Give me then a water-conjurer, one that can raise water-devils! I'll part them—play at duck and drake with my money! Get me a conjurer, I say; inquire out a man that lets out devils.

Man. I don't know where.

Anto. In every street, Tom Fool; any blear-eyed people with red heads and flat noses can perform it. Thou shalt know them by their half gowns and no breeches. Find me out a conjurer, I say, and learn his price, how he will let his devils out by the day. I'll have them again, if they be above ground.

[Exeunt.

SCENE VII.—Street before Don Frederick's Lodging.

Enter DUKE, PETRUCHIO, DON FREDERICK, and DON JOHN.

Petr. Your grace is welcome now to Naples; so you are all, gentlemen.

Don J. Don Frederick, will you step in, and give the lady notice who comes to visit her?

Petr. Bid her make haste; we come to see no stranger—a night-gown will serve her turn.

Don F. I'll tell her what you say, sir. [Exit.

Petr. Now will the sport be to observe her alterations, how, betwixt fear and joy, she will behave herself.

Duke. Dear brother, I must entreat you—

Petr. I conceive your mind, sir; I will not chide her, but like a summer's evening against heat—

Enter DON FREDERICK and PETER.

Don J. How now?

Don F. Not to abuse your patience longer, nor hold you off with tedious circumstances; for you must know—

Don J. What I knew before.

Petr. What?

Duke. Where is she?

Don F. Gone, sir.

Duke. How!

Petr. What did you say, sir?

Don F. Gone; by heaven removed. The woman of the house, too.

Petr. What, that reverend old woman, that tired me with compliments?

Don F. The very same.

Don J. Well, Don Frederick.

Don F. Don John, it is not well: but—

Don J. But what?

Petr. Come!

Don F. This fellow can satisfy I lie not.

Petr. A little after my master was departed, sir, with this gentleman, my fellow and myself being sent on business, as we must think, on purpose—

Don J. Yes, yes, on purpose.

Petr. Hang these circumstances, they always serve to usher in ill ends.

Don J. Gone! now could I eat that rogue, I am so angry. Gone?

Petr. Gone?

Don F. Directly gone, fled, shifted; what would you have me say?

Duke. Well, gentlemen, wrong not my good opinion.

Don F. For your dukedom, sir, I would not be a knave.

Don J. He that is, a rot run in his blood.

Petr. But harkye, gentlemen, are ye sure you had her here? Did you not dream this?

Don J. Have you your nose, sir?

Petr. Yes, sir.

Don J. Then we had her.

Petr. Since you are so short, believe your having her shall suffer more construction.

Don J. Well, sir, let it suffer.

[Turns off peevishly.

Don F. How to convince you, sir, I can't imagine; but my life shall justify my innocence, or fall with it.

Duke. Thus, then—for we may be all abused.

Petr. 'Tis possible.

Duke. Here let's part until to-morrow this time; we to our way to clear this doubt, and you to your's. Pawning our honours then to meet again; when, if she be not found—

Don F. We stand engaged to answer any worthy way we are called to.

Duke. We ask no more.

Petr. To-morrow, certain.

Don J. If we out-live this night, sir.

[Exeunt DUKE and PETRUCHIO.

Don F. Very well, Don John!

Don J. Very ill, Don Frederick!

Don F. We have somewhat now to do

Don J. With all my heart, I love to be doing.

Don F. If she be not found we must fight.

Don J. I am glad on't I have not fought a great while.

Don F. I am glad you are so merry, sir.

Don J. I am sorry you are so dull, sir.

Don F. Here let us part; and if the lady be Not forthcoming,

'Tis this, Don John, shall damp your levity!

[Clapping his hand upon his sword.

Don J. Or this shall tickle up your modesty!

[Éreunt.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Tavern.

Enter Second CONSTANTIA and her Mother.

Mother. Hold, Cons, hold, for goodness, hold! I am in that desertion of spirit, for want of breath, that I am almost reduced to the necessity of not being able to defend myself against the inconvenience of a fall.

2 Con. Dear mother, let us go a little faster, to secure ourselves from Antonio: for my part, I am in that terrible fright, that I can neither think, speak, nor stand still, till we are safe a ship-board, and out of sight of the shore.

Mother. Out of sight of the shore! why, do you think I'll depatriate?

2 Con. Depatriate? what's that?

Mother. Why, you fool, you, leave my country; what, will you never learn to speak out of the vulgar road?

2 Con. Oh lord! this hard word will undo us.

Mother. As I am a Christian, if it were to save my honour (which is ten thousand times dearer to me than life) I would not be guilty of so odious a thought.

2 Con. Pray, mother, since your honour is so dear to you, consider that if we are taken, both it and we should depatriate! There's it; mother, the world does not care a pin, if both you and I were hanged; and that we shall be certainly, if Antonio takes us, for you have run away with his gold.

Mother. Did he not tell you that he kept it in his trunk for us? and had not I a right to take it whenever I pleased? you have lost your reasoning faculty, Cons!

2 Con. Yes, mother, but you was to have it upon a certain condition, which condition I would sooner starve than agree to. I can't help my poverty, but I can keep my honour, and the richest old fellow in the kingdom sha'n't buy it. I'll sooner give it away than sell it; that's my spirit, mother.

Mother. But what will become of me, Cons? I have so indelible an idea of my dignity, that I must have the means to support it; these I have got, and I will ne'er depart from the demarches of a person of quality; and let come what will, I shall rather choose to submit myself to my fate, than strive to prevent it, by any depatriation that is not congruous in every degree to the steps and measures of a strict practitioner of honour.

2 Con. Would not this make one stark mad? your style is no more out of the way, than your manner of reasoning; you first sell me to an ugly old fellow, then you run away with me and all his gold; and now, like a strict practitioner of honour, resolve to be taken, rather than depatriate, as you call it.

Mother. As I am a Christian, Cons, a tavern, and a very decent sign; I'll in, I am resolved, though by it I should run a risk of never so stupendous a nature!

2 Con. There's no stopping her. What shall I do?

[Aside.

Mother. I'll send for my kinswoman and some music, to revive me a little: for really, Cons, I am reduced to that sad imbecility, by the injury I have done my poor feet, that I am in a great incertitude, whether they will have liveliness sufficient to support me up to the top of the stairs or no.

[Exit Mother.

2 Con. I have a great mind to leave this fantastical mother-in-law of mine, with her stolen goods, take to my heels and seek my fortune; but to whom shall I apply? Generosity and humanity are not to be met with at every corner of the street. If any young fellow would but take a liking to me, and make an honest woman of me, I would make him the best wife in the world: but what a fool am I to talk thus? Young men think of young women now-a-days, as they do of their clothes: it is genteel to have them, to be vain of them, to show them to everybody, and to change them often; when their novelty and fashion is over, they are turned out of doors, to be purchased and worn by the first buyer. A wife, indeed, is not so easily got rid of: it is a suit of mourning, that lies neglected at the bottom of the chest, and only shows itself now and then, upon melancholy occasions. What a terrible prospect! However, I do here swear and vow to live for ever chaste, till I find a young fellow who will take me for better and for worse. La, what a desperate oath have I taken!

Mother. [Looking out of the window.] Come up, Cons, the fiddles are here.

2 Con. I come.—[Mother goes from the window.] I must begone, though whither I cannot tell; these fiddles, and her discreet companions, will quickly make an end of all she has stolen; and then for five hundred new pieces will she sell me to another old fellow, whom I will serve in the same manner. She has taken care not to leave me a farthing; yet I am so, better than under her conduct, 'twill be at worst but begging for my life:

And starving were to me an easier fate,

Than to be forc'd to live with one I hate.

Mother. Come, Cons, make haste.

[Goes up to her Mother.

Enter Don JOHN.

Don J. It will not out of my head, but that Don Frederick has sent away this wench, for all he carries it so quietly; yet methinks he should be honestier than so; but these grave men are never touched upon such occasions. [Music above.] What's here, music and women? the best mixture in the world!—'would I were among them. [Music again, and a woman appears in the balcony.] That's a right one, I know it by her smile. I have an eye that never fails me. [Another lady appears.] Ah, rogue! she's right, too; I'm sure on't; here's a brave parcel of them! [Music still, and dancing.

Mother. Come, come, let's dance in t'other room; 'tis a great deal better.

Don J. Say you so? what, now, if I should go up and dance too? It is a tavern—rot this business! why should a man be hunting upon a cold scent, when there is so much better sport near at hand? I'll in, I am resolved, and try my own fortune; 'tis hard luck if I don't get one of them.

[As he goes to the door,

Enter Second CONSTANTIA.

See, here's one bolted already! Fair lady, whither so fast?

2 Con. I don't know, sir.

Don J. May I have the honour to wait upon you?

2 Con. Yes, if you please, sir.

Don J. Whither?

2 Con. I tell you, I don't know.

Don J. She's very quick. Would I might be so happy as to know you, lady!

2 Con. I dare not let you see my face, sir.

Don J. Why?

2 Con. For fear you should not like it, and then leave me; for, to tell you true, I have, at this present, very great need of you.

Don J. Hast thou? Then I declare myself thy champion: and let me tell thee, there is not a better knight-errant in all Christendom than I am to succour distressed damsels.

2 Con. What a proper, handsome, spirited fellow this is! If he'd love me now as he ought, I would never seek out farther. Sir, I am young, and unexperienced in the world.

Don J. If thou art young, 'tis no great matter what thy face is.

2 Con. Perhaps this freedom in me may seem strange; but, sir, in short, I'm forced to fly from one I hate; will you protect me?

Don J. Yes, that I will, before I see your face; your shape has charmed me enough for that already.

2 Con. But if we should meet him, will you here promise me, he shall not take me from you?

Don J. If any one takes you from me, he shall take my life too; if I love one, I won't keep t'other; they shall go together.

2 Con. For heaven's sake, then, conduct me to some place where I may be secured a while from the sight of any one whatsoever.

Don J. By all the hopes I have to find thy face as lovely as thy shape, I will.

2 Con. Well, sir, I believe you; for you have an honest look.

Don J. An honest look! Zounds! I am afraid Don Frederick has been giving her a character of me too. Come, pray, unveil.

2 Con. Then turn away your face, for I'm resolved you shall not see a bit of mine, till I have set it in order, and then—

Don J. What then?

2 Con. I'll strike you dead.

Don J. A mettled wench, I warrant her! If she be young now, and have but a nose on her face, she'll be as good as her word. Come, my dear, I'm even panting with impatience. Are you ready? [As he turns slowly round, she gets on the other side.]

'Sdeath! where is she?

2 Con. Here! stand your ground, if you dare!

Don J. By this light, a rare creature! ten thousand times handsomer than her we seek for! this can be sure no common one: 'pray heaven she be a kind one!

[Aside.

2 Con. Well, sir, what say you now?

Don J. Nothing: I'm so amazed, I'm not able to speak. Prythee, my sweet creature, don't let us be talking in the street, but run home with me, that I may have a little private innocent conversation with you.

2 Con. No, sir; no private dealing, I beseech you.

Don J. 'Sheart, what shall I do? I'm out of my wits. Harkye, my dear soul, canst thou love me?

2 Con. If I could, what then?

Don J. Why, then I should be the happiest man alive!

[Kissing her hand.

2 Con. Nay, good sir, hold—remember the conditions.

Don J. Conditions! what conditions? I would not wrong thee for the universe!

2 Con. Then you'll promise?

Don J. What, what? I'll promise anything, everything, thou dear, sweet, bewitching, heavenly woman!

2 Con. To make me an honest woman?

Don J. How the devil, my angel, can I do that, if you are undone to my hands?

2 Con. Ay, but I am not; I am a poor innocent lamb, just escaped from the jaws of an old fox.

Don J. Art thou, my pretty lamb? then I'll be thy shepherd, and fold thee in these arms.

2 Con. Ay, but you must not eat the lamb yourself.

Don J. I like you so well, I will do anything for thee, my dear delightful incognita! I love you so much, it is impossible to say how much I love thee! My heart, my mind, and my soul, are transported to such a degree, that—that—that—d—n it, I can't talk; so let us run home, or the old fox, my lamb, will overtake us.

[They run out.

SCENE II.—The Street.

Enter Don FREDERICK and FRANCISCO.

Don F. And art thou sure it was Constantia, sayest thou, that he was leading?

Fran. Am I sure I live, sir? Why, I dwelt in the house with her; how can I choose but know her?

Don F. But didst thou see her face?

Fran. Lord, sir, I saw her face as plain as I see yours just now, not two streets off.

Don F. Yes, 'tis even so; I suspected it at first, but then he forswore it with that confidence—Well, Don John, if these be your practices, you shall have no more a friend of me, sir, I assure you. Perhaps, though, he met her by chance, and intends to carry her to her brother, and the duke.

Fran. A little time will show. Gadso, here he is!

Don F. I'll step behind the shop, and observe him.

Enter Don JOHN and Second CONSTANTIA.

Don J. Here, now go in, and let me see who will get you out again without my leave.

2 Con. Remember, you have given your honour.

Don J. And my love—and when they go together, you may always trust them.

Don F. Dear Don John!

[Don J. puts CON. in, and locks the door.

Don J. Oh! how do you do, Frederick? D—n him, now will he ask me forty foolish questions, and I have such a mind to talk to this wench, that I cannot think of one excuse for my life!

Don F. Your servant, sir: pray, who's that you locked in just now, at the door?

Don J. Why, a friend of mine, that's gone up to read a book.

Don F. A book! that's a quaint one, i'faith! prythee, Don John, what library hast thou been buying this afternoon? for in the morning, to my knowledge, thou hadst never a book there, except it were an almanack, and that was none of thy own neither.

Don J. No, no, it's a book of his own, he brought along with him: a scholar, that's given to reading.

Don F. And do scholars, Don John, wear petticoats now-a-days?

Don J. Plague on him, he has seen her! Well, Don Frederick, thou knowest I am not good at lying: 'tis a woman, I confess it, make your best on't: what then?

Don F. Why then, Don John, I desire you'll be pleased to let me see her.

Don J. Why, 'faith, Frederick, I should not be against the thing, but you know that a man must keep his word, and she has a mind to be private.

Don F. But, John, you may remember, when I met a lady so before, this very self-same lady too, that I got leave for you to see her, John.

Don J. Why, do you think then, that this here is Constantia?

Don F. I cannot properly say I think it, John, because I know it; this fellow, here, saw her, as you led her in the streets.

Don J. Well, and what then? Who does he say it is?

Don F. Ask him, sir, and he'll tell ye.

Don J. Harkye, friend, dost thou know this lady?

Fran. I think I should, sir; I have lived long enough in the house to know her, sure.

Don J. And how do they call her, pr'ythee?

Fran. Constantia.

Don J. How! Constantia?

Fran. Yes, sir; the woman's name is Constantia, that's flat.

Don J. It is so, sir? and so is this too. [Strikes him.

Fran. Oh, oh! [Runs out.

Don J. Now, sirrah, you may safely say you have not borne false witness for nothing.

Don F. Fie, Don John, why do you beat the poor fellow for doing his duty, and telling truth?

Don J. Telling truth! thou talkest as if thou hadst been hired to bear false witness too: you are a very fine gentleman!

Don F. What a strange confidence he has! but is there no shame in thee? nor no consideration of what is just or honest, to keep a woman thus against her will, that thou knowest is in love with another man too? Dost think a judgment will not follow this?

Don J. Good, dear Frederick, do thou keep thy sentences and thy sentiments, which are now out of fashion, for some better opportunity; this here is not a fit subject for them: I tell thee, she is no more Constantia than thou art.

Don F. Why won't you let me see her then?

Don J. Because I can't: besides, she's not for thy taste.

Don F. How so?

Don J. Why, thy genius lies another way; thou art all for flames and darts, and those fine things! now I am for pure, plain, simple love, without any embroidery; I am not so curious, Frederick, as thou art.

Don F. Very well, sir; but is there no shame? but is this worthy in you to delude—

Don J. But is there no shame! but is this worthy! What a many butes are here! If I should tell thee now solemnly thou hast but one eye, and give thee reasons for it, wouldst thou believe me

Don F. I think hardly, sir, against my own knowledge.

Don J. Then why dost thou, with that grave face, go about to persuade me against mine? You should do as you would be done by, Frederick.

Don F. And so I will, sir, in this very particular, since there's no other remedy; I shall do that for the Duke and Petruchio, which I should expect from them upon the like occasion: in short, to let you see I am as sensible of my honour, as you can be careless of yours, I must tell you, sir, that I'm resolved to wait upon this lady to them.

Don J. Are you so, sir? Why, I must then, sweet sir, tell you again, I am resolved you sha'n't. Never stare nor wonder! I have promised to preserve her from the sight of any one whatsoever, and with the hazard of my life will make it good; but that you may not think I mean an injury to Petruchio, or the Duke, know, Don Frederick, that though I love a pretty girl perhaps a little better, I hate to do a thing that's base, as much as you do. Once more, upon my honour, this is not Constantia; let that satisfy you.

Don F. All that will not do. [Goes to the door.

Don J. No! why, then this shall. [Draws.] Come not one step nearer, for if thou dost, by heaven, I'm through you!

Don F. This is an insolence beyond the temper of a man to suffer. Thus, I throw off thy friendship; and since thy folly has provoked my patience beyond its natural bounds, know it is not in thy power now to save thyself.

Don J. That's to be tried, sir, though by your favour. [Looks up at the balcony.] Mistress What-d'ye-call-'em, pr'ythee look out now a little, and see how I'll fight for thee.

Don F. Come, sir, are you ready?

Don J. Oh lord, sir, your servant! [Fight.

Enter DUKE and PETRUCHIO.

Petr. What's here? fighting! Let's part them. How! Don Frederick against Don John? How came you to fall out, gentlemen? What's the cause?

Don F. Why, sir, it is your quarrel, and not mine, that drew this on me: I saw him lock Constantia up into that house, and I desired to wait upon her to you; that's the cause.

Duke. Oh! it may be, he designed to lay the obligation upon us himself. Sir, we are beholden to you for this favour beyond all possibility of—

[Approaching Don J.]
Don J. Pray, your grace, keep back, and don't throw away your thanks, before you know whether I have deserved them or no. Oh, is that your design? Sir, you must not go in there.

[PETRUCHIO is going to the door.]

Petr. How, sir! not go in?

Don J. No, sir; most certainly not go in.

Petr. She's my sister, and I will speak to her.

Don J. If she were your mother, sir, you should not, though it were but to ask her blessing.

Petr. Since you are so positive, I'll try.

Don J. You shall find me a man of my word, sir.

Duke. Nay, pray, gentlemen, hold; let me compose this matter. Why do you make a scruple of letting us see Constantia?

Don J. Why, sir, 'twould turn a man's head round to hear these fellows talk so: there is not one word true of all that he has said.

Duke. Then you do not know where Constantia is?

Don J. Not I, by heavens!

Don F. Oh, monstrous impudence! Upon my life, sir, I saw him force her up into that house, lock her up, and the key is now in his pocket.

Don J. Now that is two lies; for, first, he did not see her: and next, all force is unnecessary, she is so very willing Duke. But lookye, sir, this doubt may easily be cleared: let either Petruchio or me but see her, and if she be not Constantia, we engage our honours (though we should know her) never to discover who she is.

Don J. Ay, but there's the point now, that I can never consent to.

Duke. Why?

Don J. Because I gave her my word to the contrary.

Petr. Pish! I won't be kept off thus any longer. Sir, either let me enter, or I'll force my way.

Don F. No, pray, sir, let that be my office: I will be revenged on him, for having betrayed me to his friendship.

[PETRUCHIO and Don F. offer to fight with Don J.
Duke. Nay, you shall not offer him foul play, neither. Hold, brother, pray a word; and with you too, sir.

Don J. Harkye, gentlemen, I'll make ye a fair proposition; leave off this ceremony among yourselves, and those dismal threats against me: fillip up, cross or pile, who shall begin first, and I'll do the best I can to entertain you all, one after another.

Enter ANTONIO.

Anto. Now do my fingers itch to be about somebody's ears, for the loss of my gold. Ha! what's here to do? swords drawn! I must make one, though it cost me the singing of ten John Dories more. Courage, brave boy! I'll stand by you as long as this tool here lasts: and it was once a good one.

Petr. Who's this? Antonio! Oh, sir! you are welcome! you shall be even judge between us.

Anto. No, no, no; not I, sir, I thank you: I'll make work for others to judge of, I'm resolved to fight.

Petr. But we won't fight with you.

Anto. Then put up your swords, or by this hand I'll lay about me! [They put up their swords.]

Don J. Well said, old Bilboa, i'faith!

Petr. Pray hear us, though: this gentleman saw him lock up my sister into this house, and he refuses to let us see her.

Anto. How, friend, is this true? [Going to him.]

Don J. Not so hasty, I beseech you. Lookye, gentlemen, to show you that all are mistaken, and that my formal friend there is an ass—

Don F. I thank you, sir.

Don J. I'll give you my consent, that this gentleman here shall see her, if his information can satisfy you.

Duke. Yes, yes; he knows her very well.

Don J. Then, sir, go in here, if you please: I dare trust him with her, for he is too old to do any mischief. [ANTONIO goes in.]

Don F. I wonder how my gentleman will get off from all this?

Don J. I shall be even with you, Don Frederick, another time, for all your grinning. [Noise within.] How now! what noise is that?

Enter PETER.

Peter. The gentleman!—

Don J. Where is he?

Peter. He's run out of the back door, sir.

Don J. How so?

Peter. Why, sir, he's run after the gentlewoman you brought in.

Don J. 'Sdeath! how durst you let her out?

Peter. Why, sir, I knew nothing.

Don J. No? thou ignorant rascal! and therefore

I'll beat something into thee. [Beats him.] Run after her, you dog, and bring her back, or—

[PETER runs off.]

Don F. What, you won't kill him?

Don J. Nay, come not near me, for if thou dost, by heavens, I'll give thee as much! and would do so however, but that I won't lose time from looking after my dear, sweet—a plague confound you all!

[Goes in, and shuts the door after him.]

Duke. What, he has shut the door!

Don F. It's no matter: I'll lead you a private back way, by that corner, where we shall meet him.

[Ereunt.]

Enter First CONSTANTIA.

1 Con. Oh! whither shall I run to hide myself? the constable has seized the landlady, and, I am afraid, the poor child too. How to return to Don Frederick's house, I know not: and, if I knew, I durst not, after those things the landlady has told me of him. I am faulty, I confess, but greater faults have often met with lighter punishments.

Enter Don JOHN.

Don J. I am almost dead with running, and will be so quite, but I will overtake her.

1 Con. Hold, Don John, hold!

Don J. What's that? ha! is it you, my dear?

1 Con. For heaven's sake, sir, carry me from hence, or I'm utterly undone.

Don J. Phoo, plague, this is the other! now could I almost beat her, for but making me the proposition. Madam, there are some a-coming, that will do it a great deal better: but I am in such haste, that, I vow to gad, madam—

1 Con. Nay, pray, sir, stay; you are concerned in this as well as I; for your woman is taken.

Don J. Ha! my woman! [Goes back to her.] I vow to gad, madam, I do so highly honour your ladyship, that I would venture my life, a thousand times, to do you service. But, pray, where is she?

1 Con. Why, sir, she is taken by the constable.

Don J. Constable! Which way went he?

1 Con. I cannot tell; for I ran out into the streets, just as he had seized upon your landlady.

Don J. Plague o' my landlady! I mean the other woman.

1 Con. Other woman, sir! I have seen no other woman, never since I left your house!

Don J. 'Sdeath! what have I been doing here, then, all this while! Madam, your most humble—

1 Con. Good sir, be not so cruel as to leave me in this distress.

Don J. No, no, no; I'm only going a little way, and will be back again presently.

1 Con. But, pray, sir, hear me; I'm in that danger—

Don J. No, no, no; I vow to gad, madam, no danger in the world. Let me alone, I warrant you.

[Hurries off.]

1 Con. He's gone! and I a lost, wretched, miserable creature, for ever.

Enter ANTONIO.

Anto. Oh! there she is.

1 Con. Who's this? Antonio! the fiercest enemy I have. [Runs away.]

Anto. Are you so nimble-footed, gentlewoman? A plague confound all whores! [Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Street.Enter Mother and Kinswoman.

Kins. But, madam, be not so angry; perhaps she'll come again.

Mother. Oh! kinswoman, never speak of her more; for she's an odious creature to leave me thus in the lurch. I have given her all her breeding, and instructed her with my own principles of education.

Kins. I protest, madam, I think she's a person that knows as much of all that as—

Mother. Knows, kinswoman! there's ne'er a female in Italy, of thrice her years, knows so much the procedures of a true gallantry, and the infallible principles of an honourable friendship, as she does.

Kins. And, therefore, madam, you ought to love her.

Mother. No, fie upon her! nothing at all, as I am a Christian. When once a person fails in fundamentals, she's at a period with me. Besides, with all her wit, Constantia is but a fool; and calls all the minauderies of a bonne mine, affectation.

Kins. Bless me, sweet goodness! But, pray, madam, how came Constantia to fall out with your ladyship? Did she take anything ill of you?

Mother. As I am a Christian, I can't resolve you, unless it were that I led the dance first: but for that she must excuse me; I know she dances well, but there are others, who, perhaps, understand the right swim of it as well as she—

Enter Don FREDERICK.

And, though I love Constantia—

Don F. How's this? Constantia!

Mother. I know no reason why I should be debarred the privilege of shewing my own geno too sometimes.

Don F. If I am not mistaken, that other woman is she, Don John and I were directed to, when we came first to town, to bring us acquainted with Constantia. I'll try to get some intelligence from her. Pray, lady, have I never seen you before?

Kins. Yes, sir, I think you have, with another stranger, a friend of yours, one day, as I was coming out of the church.

Don F. I'm right then. And, pray, who were you talking of?

Mother. Why, sir, of an inconsiderate, inconsiderable person, that has at once both forfeited the honour of my concern, and the concern of her own honour.

Don F. Very fine, indeed! and is all this intended for the beautiful Constantia?

Mother. Oh! fie upon her, sir, an odious creature, as I'm a Christian, no beauty at all.

Don F. Why, does not your ladyship think her handsome?

Mother. Seriously, sir, I don't think she's ugly; but, as I am a Christian, my position is, that no true beauty can be lodged in that creature, who is not, in some measure, buoyed up with a just sense of what is incumbent to the devoir of a person of quality.

Don F. That position, madam, is a little severe; but however she has been incumbent formerly, as your ladyship is pleased to say, now that she's married, and her husband owns the child, she is sufficiently justified for what she has done.

Mother. Sir, I must, blushing, beg leave to say, you are in an error. I know there has been the passion of love between them, but with a temperament so innocent and so refined, as it did impose a negative upon the very possibility of her being with child. No, sir; I assure you my daughter Constantia has never had a child. A child! Ha, ha, ha! Oh, goodness, save us, a child!

Don F. Well, madam, I shall not dispute this with you any farther; but give me leave to wait upon your daughter; for her friend, I assure you, is in great impatience to see her.

Mother. Friend, sir! I know none she has. I'm sure she loaths the very sight of him.

Don F. Of whom?

Mother. Why, of Antonio, sir; he that you were pleased to say—ha, ha, ha!

Don F. I tell you I do not know Antonio, nor never named him to you. I told you, that the Duke has owned Constantia for his wife, and that her brother and he are friends, and are now both in search after her.

Mother. Then, as I'm a Christian, I suspect we have both been equally involved in the misfortune of a mistake. Sir, I am in the dernier confusion to avow, that, though my daughter, Constantia, has been liable to several addresses, yet she had never the honour to be produced to his grace.

Don F. So, now the thing is out, and I'm a d—d rogue for what I did to Don John; for, on my conscience, this is that Constantia the fellow told me of! I'll make him amends, whate'er it cost me. Lady, you must give me leave not to part with you, till you meet with your daughter, for some reasons I shall tell you hereafter.

Mother. Sir, I am so highly your obligée for the manner of your enquiries, and you have grounded your determinations upon so just a basis, that I shall not be ashamed to own myself a votary to all your commands. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Street.Enter Second CONSTANTIA.

2 Con. So, thanks to my youth and my heels, I am once more free from Antonio! What an escape! and yet, what a misfortune! I have no great reason to rejoice—for, though I have got clear from the old fellow, I have lost the young one too. I did not wish to outrun them both; but whither to go now? that's the question—I wish my spirited young Spaniard were here to answer it; but that this wild spark, whom I liked so well, and who swore he liked me, should send that old piece of mischief to distress me, and drive me out of the house, puzzles me exceedingly! I wish I could see him once more, to explain this matter to me. May I never be married if he is not coming this way! Should he prove false, my poor heart will have a terrible time of it. Now for the proof— [Walks aside.]

Enter Don JOHN, holding PETER.

Don J. Did you run after her, as I ordered you, sirrah!

Peter. Like any greyhound, sir.

Don J. And have you found her, rascal?

Peter. Not quite, sir.

Don J. Not quite, sir! You are drunk, fellow!

Peter. A little, sir; I run the better for it.

Don J. Have you seen her? speak quickly, or speak no more. [Shaking him.]

Petr Yes, yes, I have seen her.

Don J. Where? where?

Peter. There! there!

Don J. Where's there, sirrah?

Peter. There where I saw her—in the street.

Don J. Did you overtake her?

Peter. I was overtaken myself, sir, and—hic—fell down.

Don J. Then she is gone! irrecoverably gone! and I shall run distracted! [Second Constantia taps him on the shoulder; he turns, and they gaze on each other.] Heigho!

Peter. Never was so near death in all my life!

[Exit.]

Don J. Oh! my dear soul, take pity on me, and give me comfort; for I'm e'en dead for want of thee.

2 Con. Oh! you're a fine gentleman, indeed, to shut me up in your house, and send another man to me.

Don J. Pray, hear me.

2 Con. No, I will never hear you more, after such an injury; what would you have done, if I had been kind to you, that you could use me thus before?

Don J. By my troth, that's shrewdly urged.

2 Con. Besides, you basely broke your word.

Don J. But will you hear nothing? nor did you hear nothing? I had three men upon me at once, and had I not consented to let that old fellow up, who came to my rescue, they had all broken in whether I would or no.

2 Con. It may be so; for I remember I heard a noise; but suppose it was not so, what then? why, then I'll love him, however. Harkye, sir, I ought now to use you very scurvily; but I can't find in my heart to do so.

Don J. Then heaven's blessing on thy heart for it!

2 Con. But a—

Don J. What?

2 Con. I would fain know—

Don J. What, what? I'll tell thee anything, everything.

2 Con. I would fain know, whether you can be kind to me.

Don J. Look in your glass, my charmer, and answer for me.

2 Con. You think me very vain.

Don J. I think you devilish handsome.

2 Con. I shall find you a rogue at last.

Don J. Then you shall hang me for a fool; take your garters, and do it now, if you will. [Sighing.]

2 Con. You are no fool.

Don J. Oh, yes, a loving fool.

2 Con. Will you love me for ever?

Don J. I'll be bound to you for ever; you can't desire better security.

2 Con. I have better security.

Don J. What's that, my angel?

2 Con. The tenderest affection for you now, and the kindest behaviour to you, for evermore.

Don J. And I, upon my knees, will swear, that, that—what shall I swear?

2 Con. Nay, use what words you please, so they be not hearty.

Don J. I swear, then, by thy fair self, that looks so like a deity, and art the only thing I now can think of, that I'll adore you to my dying day.

2 Con. And here I vow, the minute thou dost leave me, I'll leave the world—that's, kill myself.

Don J. Oh! my dear heavenly creature, we'll love as long as we live, and then we'll die together; and there's an end of both of us. But who is this my old friend has got there?

Enter First CONSTANTIA and ANTONIO, who seizes her.

Anto. Oh! have I caught you, gentlewoman, at last? Come, give me my gold.

1 Con. I hope he takes me for another; I won't answer, for I had rather you should take me for any one, than who I am. [the hand?]

Don J. Pray, sir, who is that you have there by Anto. A person of honour, that has broken open my trunks, and run away with all my gold; yet, I'll hold ten pounds I'll have it whipped out of her again.

2 Con. Done, I'll hold you ten pounds of that now.

Anto. Ha! by my troth, you have reason; and, lady, I ask your pardon; but I'll have it whipped out of you, then gossip. [Going to her.]

Don J. Hold, sir, you must not meddle with my goods. [Stopping him.]

Anto. Your goods! how came she to be yours? I'm sure I bought her of her mother for five hundred good pieces in gold.

Don J. Ay, sir, but that bargain won't hold good in our court; besides, sir, as I told you before, she's mine, Don.

Anto. Yours, sir! by what right?

Don J. The right of possession, sir; the law of love, and consent of the parties.

Anto. And is this so, young lady?

2 Con. Yes, young gentleman, it is. You purchase me! And could you imagine, you old fool you, that I would take up with you, while there was a young fellow to be had for love or money! Purchase yourself a little wit, and a great deal of flannel, against the cold weather, or, on my word, you'll make a melancholy figure. Ha, ha, ha!

Don J. He does make a melancholy figure! ha, ha! you had better let her alone, Don; why, she's too hard for me—

Anto. Indeed, I think so. But, pray, sir, by your leave, I hope you will allow me the speech of one word to your goods here, as you call her; 'tis but a small request.

Don J. Ay, sir, with all my heart—how, Constantia! Madam, now you have seen that lady, I hope you will pardon the haste you met me in a little while ago; if I committed a fault, you must thank her for it.

1 Con. Sir, I do know too well the power of love, by my own experience, not to pardon all the effects of it in another.

Anto. Well, then, I'll promise you, if you will but help me to recover my gold again, that I'll never trouble you more.

2 Con. A match; and 'tis the best that you and I could ever make.

Don J. Pray, madam, fear nothing; by my love, I'll stand by you, and see that your brother shall do you no harm.

2 Con. Harkye, sir, a word; how dare you talk of love to any lady but me, sir?

Don J. By my troth, that was a fault, but I meant it only civilly.

2 Con. Ay, but if you are so very civil a gentleman, we shall not be long friends: I scorn to share your love with any one whatsoever; and, for my part, I'm resolved to have either all or none.

Don J. Well, well, my dear little covetous rogue, thou shalt have it all—thus I sign and seal—[Kisses] her hand.] and transfer all my stock of love to thee, for ever and for ever.

2 Con. I accept it, in the warmest spirit of love and gratitude.

Enter DON FREDERICK and Mother.

Don F. Come, now, madam, let us not speak one word more, but go quietly about our business; not but that I think it the greatest pleasure in the world to hear you talk, but—

Mother. Do you, indeed, sir? I swear then, good wits jump, sir; for I have thought so myself a very great while.

Don F. You have all the reason imaginable. Oh, Don John, I ask thy pardon! but I hope I shall make thee amends, for I have found out the mother, and she has promised to help thee to thy mistress again.

Don J. Sir, you may save your labour; the business is done, and I am fully satisfied.

Don F. And dost thou know who she is?

Don J. No, 'faith, I never asked her name.

Don F. Why, then, I'll make thee more satisfied; this lady, here, is that very Constantia—

Don J. Ha! thou hast not a mind to be knocked o'er the pate too, hast thou?

Don F. No, sir; nor dare you do it neither; but, for certain, this is that very self-same Constantia that thou and I so long looked after.

Don J. I thought she was something more than ordinary: but shall I tell thee now a stranger thing than all this?

Don F. What's that?

Don J. Why, I will never more think of any other woman, for her sake.

Don F. That, indeed, is strange; but you are much altered, John: it was but this morning that women were such hypocrites that you would not trust a single mother's daughter of them.

Don J. Ay, but when things are at the worst, they'll mend; example does everything, Frederick, and the fair sex will certainly grow better whenever the greatest is the best woman in the kingdom; that's what I trust to.

Don F. Well parried, John!

Don J. See here, Frederick! the lost jewel is found.

[Showing First Constantia.

Don F. Madam, I am heartily glad to meet your ladyship here; we have been in very great disorder since we saw you.

2 Con. Come, mother, deliver your purse; I have delivered myself up to this young fellow, and the bargain's made with that old fellow; so he may have his gold again, that all shall be well.

Mother. As I am a Christian, sir, I took it away, only to have the honour of restoring it again; for my hard fate having not bestowed upon me a fund which might capacitate me to make you presents, I had no way left for the exercise of my generosity but by putting myself into a condition of giving back what was yours.

Anto. A very generous design, indeed! So now I'll e'en turn a sober person, and leave off this wenching and this fighting, for I begin to find it does not agree with me.

Don J. What's here? Our landlady and the child again!

Enter PETRUCHIO and Landlady, with the Child.

Petr. Yes, we met her going to be whipped, in a drunken constable's hands that took her for another.

Don J. Why, then, pray let her e'en be taken, and whipped for herself, for, on my word, she deserves it.

Land. Yes, I'm sure of your good word at any time.

1 Con. Harkye, dear landlady!

Land. Oh, sweet goodness! is it you? I have been in such a pack of troubles since I saw you; they took me, and they tumbled me, and they hauled me, and they pulled me, and they called me painted Jezebel, and the poor little babe here did so take on!

Enter DUKE.

Come hither, my lord, come hither: here is Constantia!

1 Con. Yonder's my brother!

Duke. No, madam, there is no danger

1 Con. Were there a thousand dangers in those arms, I would run thus to meet them.

Duke. O, my dear! it were not safe that any should be here at present; for now my heart is so overpressed with joy, that I should scarce be able to defend thee.

Petr. Sister, I'm so ashamed of all my faults which my mistake has made me guilty of, that I know not how to ask your pardon for them.

1 Con. No, brother, the fault was mine, in mistaking you so much as not to impart the whole truth to you at first; but, having begun my love without your consent, I never durst acquaint you with the progress of it.

Duke. Come, let the consummation of our present joys blot out the memory of all these past mistakes.

Don J. And when shall we consummate our joys?

2 Con. ————Never:

We'll find out ways to make them last for ever.

Don J. A match, my girl!—Come, let us all away,

And celebrate THE CHANCES of this day;
My former vanities are past and gone,
And now I fix to happiness and one:
Change the wild wanton, for the sober plan,
And, like my friend become a modest man.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Room in Sterling's House.

Enter Miss FANNY, and BETTY meeting

Bet. [Running in.] Ma'am! Miss Fanny! ma'am!

Fan. What's the matter, Betty?

Bet. Oh la! Ma'am! as sure as I am alive, here is your husband: I saw him crossing the court-yard in his boots.

Fan. I am glad to hear it. But pray now, my dear Betty, be cautious. Don't mention that word again on any account. You know we have agreed never to drop any expressions of that sort, for fear of an accident.

Bet. Dear, ma'am, you may depend upon me. There is not a more trustier creature on the face of the earth than I am: though I say it, I am as secret as the grave; and if it is never told till I tell it, it may remain untold till doomsday for Betty.

Fan. I know you are faithful; but in our circumstances we cannot be too careful.

Bet. Very true, ma'am; and yet I vow and protest there's more plague than pleasure with a secret; especially if a body mayn't mention it to four or five of one's particular acquaintance.

Fan. Do but keep this secret a little while longer, and then I hope you may mention it to anybody. Mr. Lovewell will acquaint the family with the nature of our situation as soon as possible.

Bet. The sooner the better, I believe; for if he does not tell it, there's a little tell-tale, I know of, will come and tell it for him.

Fan. Fie, Betty!

Bet. Ah! you may well blush. But you're not so sick, and so pale, and so wan, and so many qualms—

Fan. Have done! I shall be quite angry with you.

Bet. Angry! Bless the dear puppet! I am sure I shall love it as much as if it was my own. I meant no harm, heaven knows.

Fan. Well, say no more of this; it makes me uneasy.—All I have to ask of you is, to be faithful and secret, and not to reveal this matter till we disclose it to the family ourselves.

Bet. Me reveal it! If I say a word, I wish I may be burned. I would not do you any harm for the world; and as for Mr. Lovewell, I am sure I have loved the dear gentleman ever since he got a tide-waiter's place for my brother. But let me tell you both, you must leave off your soft looks to each other, and your whispers, and your glances, and your always sitting next to one another at dinner, and your long walks together in the evening. For my part, if I had not been in the secret, I should have known you were a pair of lovers at least, if not man and wife, as—

Fan. See there now again! Pray be careful.

Bet. Well, well; nobody hears me. Man and wife—I'll say no more.—What I tell you is very true, for all that.

Love. [Within.] William!

Bet. Hark! I hear your husband—

Fan. What!

Bet. I say here comes Mr. Lovewell. Mind the caution I gave you: I'll be whipped now if you are not the first person he sees or speaks to in the family. However, if you choose it, it's nothing at all to me: as you sow, so you must reap; as you brew, so you must bake. I'll e'en slip down the back stairs, and leave you together. [Exit.]

Fan. I see, I see, I shall never have a moment's ease till our marriage is made public. New distresses crowd in upon me every day. The solicitude of my mind sinks my spirits, preys upon my health, and destroys every comfort of my life. It shall be revealed, let what will be the consequence.

Enter LOVEWELL.

Love. My love! How's this? In tears? Indeed this is too much. You promised me to support your spirits, and to wait the determination of our fortune with patience. For my sake, for your own, be comforted. Why will you study to add to our uneasiness and perplexity.

Fan. Oh, Mr. Lovewell! the indelicacy of a secret marriage grows every day more and more shocking to me. I walk about the house like a guilty wretch: I imagine myself the object of the suspicion of the whole family, and am under the perpetual terrors of a shameful detection.

Love. Indeed, indeed, you are to blame. The amiable delicacy of your temper, and your quick sensibility, only serve to make you unhappy. To clear up this affair properly to Mr. Sterling, is the continual employment of my thoughts. Everything now is in a fair train. It begins to grow ripe for a discovery; and I have no doubt of its concluding to the satisfaction of ourselves, of your father, and the whole family.

Fan. End how it will, I am resolv'd it shall end soon—very soon. I would not live another week in this agony of mind to be mistress of the universe.

Love. Do not be too violent neither. Do not let us disturb the joy of your sister's marriage with the tumult this matter may occasion. I have brought letters from Lord Ogleby and Sir John Melvil to Mr. Sterling. They will be here this evening; and, I dare say, within this hour.

Fan. I am sorry for it.

Love. Why so?

Fan. No matter: only let us disclose our marriage immediately.

Love. As soon as possible

Fan. But directly.

Love. In a few days you may depend on it.

Fan. To-night; or to-morrow morning.

Love. That, I fear, will be impracticable.

Fan. Nay, but you must.

Love. Must! Why?

Fan. Indeed you must: I have the most alarming reasons for it.

Love. Alarming, indeed! for they alarm me, even before I am acquainted with them. What are they?

Fan. I cannot tell you.

Love. Not tell me?

Fan. Not at present. When all is settled, you shall be acquainted with everything.

Love. Sorry they are coming! Must be discovered! What can this mean? Is it possible you can have any reasons that need be concealed from me?

Fan. Do not disturb yourself with conjectures; but rest assur'd, that though you are unable to divine the cause, the consequence of a discovery, be it what it will, cannot be attended with half the miseries of the present interval.

Love. You put me upon the rack: I would do anything to make you easy; but you know your father's temper. Money (you will excuse my frankness) is the spring of all his actions, which nothing but the idea of acquiring nobility or magnificence, can ever make him forego; and these he thinks his money will purchase. You know, too, your aunt's,

ACT. DRAMA.—NOS. 87 & 88.

Mrs. Heidelberg's, notions of the splendour of high life; her contempt for everything that does not relish of what she calls quality; and that from the vast fortune in her hands, left her by her late husband, she absolutely governs Mr. Sterling and the whole family. Now if they should come to the knowledge of this affair too abruptly, they might perhaps be incensed beyond all hopes of reconciliation.

Fan. Manage it your own way. I am persuaded.

Love. But in the meantime make yourself easy.

Fan. As easy as I can, I will. We had better not remain together any longer at present.

Enter STERLING.

Ster. Hey-day! who have we got here?

Fan. [Confused.] Mr. Lovewell, sir.

Ster. And where are you going, hussy?

Fan. To my sister's chamber, sir. [Exit.

Ster. Ah, Lovewell! What! always getting my foolish girl yonder into a corner? Well, well, let us but once see her eldest sister fast married to Sir John Melvil, we'll soon provide a good husband for Fanny, I warrant you.

Love. Would to heaven, sir, you would provide her one of my recommendation.

Ster. Yourself, eh, Lovewell?

Love. With your pleasure, sir.

Ster. Mighty well!

Love. And I flatter myself, that such a proposal would not be very disagreeable to Miss Fanny.

Ster. Better and better!

Love. And if I could but obtain your consent, sir—

Ster. What! You marry Fanny? No, no; that will never do, Lovewell. You're a good boy, to be sure: I have a great value for you; but can't think of you for a son-in-law. There's no stuff in the case—no money, Lovewell.

Love. My pretensions to fortune, indeed, are but moderate; but though not equal to splendour, sufficient to keep us above distress,—add to which, that I hope by diligence to increase it, and have love, honour—

Ster. But not the stuff, Lovewell. Add one little round 0 to the sum total of your fortune, and that will be the finest thing you can say to me. You know I've a regard for you—would do anything to serve you—anything on the footing of friendship; but—

Love. If you think me worthy of your friendship, sir, be assured that there is no instance in which I should rate your friendship so highly.

Ster. Psha! psha! that's another thing, you know. Where money or interest is concerned, friendship is quite out of the question.

Love. But where the happiness of a daughter is at stake, you would not scruple, sure, to sacrifice a little to her inclinations.

Ster. Inclinations! why you would persuade me that the girl is in love with you, eh, Lovewell?

Love. I cannot absolutely answer for Miss Fanny, sir; but am sure that the chief happiness or misery of my life depends entirely upon her.

Ster. Why, indeed, now, if your kinsman, Lord Ogleby, would come down handsomely for you—but that's impossible—No, no—'twill never do. I must hear no more of this. Come, Lovewell, promise me that I shall hear no more of this.

Love. [Hesitating.] I am afraid, sir, I should not be able to keep my word with you, if I did promise.

Ster. Why, you would not offer to marry her without my consent! would you, Lovewell?

3 T

Love. Marry her, sir!

[Confused.]

Ster. Ay, marry her, sir! I know very well, that a warm speech or two from such a dangerous young spark as you are, would go much further towards persuading a silly girl to do what she has more than a month's mind to do, than twenty grave lectures from fathers, or mothers, or uncles, or aunts, to prevent her. But you would not, sure, be such a base fellow, such a treacherous young rogue, as to seduce my daughter's affections, and destroy the peace of my family in that manner. I must insist on it, that you give me your word not to marry her without my consent.

Love. Sir—I—I—as to that—I—I—beg, sir,—Pray, sir, excuse me on this subject at present.

Ster. Promise, then, that you will carry this matter no further without my approbation.

Love. You may depend on it, sir, that it shall go no further.

Ster. Well, well, that's enough. I'll take care of the rest, I warrant you. Come, come, let's have done with this nonsense! What's doing in town? Any news upon 'Change?

Love. Nothing material.

Ster. Have you seen the currants, the soap, and Madeira, safe in the warehouse? Have you compared the goods with the invoice, and bills of lading, and are they all right?

Love. They are, sir.

Ster. And how are stocks?

Love. Fell one and a half this morning.

Ster. Well, well; some good news from America, and they'll be up again. But how are Lord Ogleby and Sir John Melvil? When are we to expect them?

Love. Very soon, sir. I came on purpose to bring you their commands. Here are letters from both of them.

[Giving letters.]

Ster. Let me see; let me see. 'Slife! how his lordship's letter is perfumed! It takes my breath away. [Opening it.] And French paper too!—with a slippery gloss on it that dazzles one's eyes. "My dear Mr. Sterling"—[Reading.]*—*Mercy on me! his lordship writes a worse hand than a boy at his exercise.—But how's this? Eh! "With you to-night—Lawyers to-morrow morning."—To-night! That's sudden indeed. Where's my sister Heidelberg? She should know of this immediately. Here, John! Harry! Thomas! [Calls the Servants.] Harkye, Lovewell!

Love. Sir.

Ster. Mind, now, now I'll entertain his lordship and Sir John. We'll show your fellows at the other end of the town how we live in the city. They shall eat gold, and drink gold, and lie in gold. Here, cook! butler! [Calling.] What signifies your birth, and education, and title? Money, money! that's the stuff that makes the great man in this country.

Love. Very true, sir.

Ster. True, sir! Why then have done with your nonsense of love and matrimony. You're not rich enough to think of a wife yet. A man of business should mind nothing but his business. Where are these fellows? John! Thomas! [Calling.] Get an estate, and a wife will follow of course.—Ah! Lovewell! an English merchant is the most respectable character in the universe. 'Slife! man, a rich English merchant may make himself a match for the daughter of a nabob. Where are all my rascals? Here, William!

[Exit calling.]

Love. So; as I suspected: quite averse to the match, and likely to receive the news of it with great displeasure. What's best to be done? Let me see. Suppose I get Sir John Melvil to interest himself in this affair. He may mention it to Lord Ogleby with a better grace than I can, and more probably prevail on him to interfere in it. I can open my mind also more freely to Sir John. He told me, when I left him in town, that he had something of consequence to communicate, and that I could be of use to him. I am glad of it: for the confidence he reposes in me, and the service I may do him, will ensure me his good offices. Poor Fanny! it hurts me to see her so uneasy, and her making a mystery of the cause adds to my anxiety. Something must be done upon her account; for, at all events, her solicitude shall be removed. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Miss Sterling's Dressing-room.

MISS STERLING and FANNY discovered.

Miss S. O, my dear sister, say no more. This is downright hypocrisy. You shall never convince me that you don't envy me beyond measure. Well, after all, it is extremely natural. It is impossible to be angry with you.

Fan. Indeed, sister, you have no cause.

Miss S. And you really pretend not to envy me?

Fan. Not in the least.

Miss S. And you don't in the least wish that you was just in my situation?

Fan. No, indeed, I don't. Why should I?

Miss S. Why should you? What! on the brink of marriage, fortune, title! But I had forgot: there's that dear, sweet creature, Mr. Lovewell, in the case. You would not break your faith with your true-love now for the world, I warrant you.

Fan. Mr. Lovewell! always Mr. Lovewell! Lord! what signifies Mr. Lovewell, sister?

Miss S. Pretty, peevish soul! O, my dear, grave, romantic sister! a perfect philosopher in petticoats! Love, and a cottage! eh, Fanny! Ah, give me indifference and a coach and six!

Fan. And why not a coach and six without the indifference? But pray, when is this happy marriage of your's to be celebrated? I long to give you joy.

Miss S. In a day or two: I cannot tell exactly. Oh, my dear sister! I must mortify her a little. [Aside.] I know you have a pretty taste. Pray, give me your opinion of my jewels. How do you like the style of this esclavage.

[Shewing jewels.]

Fan. Extremely handsome, and well fancied.

Miss S. What d'ye think of these bracelets? I shall have a miniature of my father set round with diamonds to one, and Sir John's to the other; and this pair of ear-rings, set transparent. Here, the tops, you see, will take off, to wear in a morning, or in an undress: how d'ye like them?

Fan. Very much, I assure you. Bless me, sister! you have a prodigious quantity of jewels: you'll b. the very queen of diamonds.

Miss S. Ha, ha, ha! very well, my dear! I shall be as fine as a little queen indeed. I have a bouquet to come home to-morrow, made up of diamonds, and rubies, and emeralds, and topazes, and amethysts; jewels of all colours, green, red, blue, yellow, intermixed; the prettiest thing you ever saw in your life! The jeweller says I shall set out with as many diamonds as anybody in town, except Lady Brilliant, and Polly What-d'ye-call-it, Lord Squander's kept mistress.

Fan. But what are your wedding-clothes, sister?

Miss S. O, white and silver, to be sure, you know. I bought them at Sir Joseph Lutestring's, and sat above an hour in the parlour behind the shop, consulting Lady Lutestring about gold and silver stuffs, on purpose to mortify her.

Fan. Fie, sister! how could you be so abominably provoking?

Miss S. Oh, I have no patience with the pride of your city-knights' ladies. Did you ever observe the airs of Lady Lutestring, dressed in the richest brocade out of her husband's shop, playing crown whist at Haberdashers'-hall; whilst the civil smirking Sir Joseph, with a snug wig trimmed round his broad face as close as a new cut yew hedge, and his shoes so black that they shine again, stands all day in his shop, fastened to his counter like a bad shilling?

Fan. Indeed, indeed, sister, this is too much. If you talk at this rate, you will be absolutely a by-word in the city. You must never venture on the inside of Temple-bar again.

Miss S. Never do I desire it: never, my dear Fanny, I promise you. Oh, how I long to be transported to the dear regions of Grosvenor-square! far, far from the dull districts of Aldersgate, Cheap, Candlewick, and Farringdon Without and Within! My heart goes pit-a-pat at the very idea of being introduced at court. Gilt chariot! pieballed horses! laced liveries! and then the whispers buzzing round the circle—"Who is that young lady? Who is she?" "Lady Melvil, ma'am!"—Lady Melvil! my ears tingle at the sound. And then at dinner, instead of my father perpetually asking, "Any news upon 'Change?" to cry, "Well, Sir John! anything new from Arthur's?" or to say to some other woman of quality, "Was your ladyship at the Duchess of Rubber's last night? Did you call at Lady Thunder's? In the immensity of crowd, I swear I did not see you. Scarce a soul at the Opera last Saturday. Shall I see you at Carlisle-house next Thursday?" Oh, the dear beau monde! I was born to move in the sphere of the great world.

Fan. And so, in the midst of all this happiness, you have no compassion for me; no pity for us poor mortals in common life.

Miss S. [Affectedly.] You? You're above pity. You would not change conditions with me. You're over head and ears in love, you know. Nay, for that matter, if Mr. Lovewell and you come together, as I doubt not you will, you will live very comfortably, I dare say. He will mind his business; you'll employ yourself in the delightful care of your family; and once in a season, perhaps, you'll sit together in a front box at a benefit play, as we used to do at our dancing-master's, you know; and perhaps I may meet you in the summer, with some other citizens, at Tunbridge. For my part, I shall always entertain a proper regard for my relations. You sha'n't want my countenance, I assure you.

Fan. Oh, you're too kind, sister!

Enter Mrs. HEIDELBERG.

Mrs. H. Here this evening! I vow and pertest we shall scarce have time to provide for them. Oh, my dear! [To Miss STERLING.] I am glad to see you're not quite in a dish-abbille. Lord Ogleby and Sir John Melvil will be here to-night.

Miss S. To-night, ma'am?

Mrs. H. Yes, my dear; to-night. Oh, put on a smarter cap, and change those ordinary ruffles. Lord! I have such a deal to do, I shall scarce have time to slip on my Italian lutestring. Where is this dawdle of a housekeeper?

Enter TRUSTY.

Oh, here, Trusty! do you know that people of quality are expected here this evening?

Trus. Yes, ma'am.

Mrs. H. Well; do you be sure now that everything is done in the most genteel manner, and to the honour of the family.

Trus. Yes, ma'am.

Mrs. H. Well, but mind what I say to you.

Trus. Yes, ma'am.

Mrs. H. His lordship is to lie in the chintz bed-chamber; d'ye hear? and Sir John in the blue damask-room: his lordship's valet-de-chamb in the opposite.

Trus. But Mr. Lovewell is come down; and you know that's his room, ma'am.

Mrs. H. Well, well; Mr. Lovewell may make shift, or get a bed at the George. But harkye, Trusty.

Trus. Ma'am

Mrs. H. Get the great dining-room in order as soon as possible. Unpaper the curtains, take the kivers off the couch and the chairs; and, do you hear? take the China dolls out of my closet, and put them on the mantelpiece immediately.

Trus. Yes, ma'am.

[Going.]

Mrs. H. And mind, as soon as his lordship comes in, be sure you set all their heads a-nodding.

Trus. Yes, ma'am.

Mrs. H. Be gone, then! fly, this instant! Where's my brother, Sterling?

Trus. Talking to the butler, ma'am.

Mrs. H. Very well. [Exit TRUSTY.] Miss Fanny, I pertest I did not see you before. Lord, child! what's the matter with you?

Fan. With me? nothing, ma'am.

Mrs. H. Bless me! why your face is as pale, and black, and yellow—of fifty colours, I vow and pertest. And then you have drest yourself as loose and as big! I declare, there is not such a thing to be seen now, as a young woman with a fine waist. You all make yourselves as round as Mrs. Deputy Barter. Go, child! You know the quality will be here by-and-by. Go, and make yourself a little more fit to be seen. [Exit FANNY.] She is gone away in tears; absolutely crying, I vow and pertest. This ridiculous love! we must put a stop to it. It makes a perfect natural of the girl.

Miss S. Poor soul! she can't help it. [Affectedly.]

Mrs. H. Well, my dear; now I shall have an opportunity of convincing you of the absurdity of what you was telling me concerning Sir John Melvil's behaviour to you.

Miss S. Oh, it gives me no manner of uneasiness. But indeed, ma'am, I cannot be persuaded but that Sir John is an extremely cold lover. Such distant civility, grave looks, and lukewarm professions of esteem for me and the whole family. I have heard of flames and darts, but Sir John's is a passion of mere ice and snow.

Mrs. H. Oh, fie, my dear; I am perfectly ashamed of you. That's so like the notions of your poor sister. What you complain of as coldness and indifference, is nothing but the extreme gentility of his address; an exact picture of the manners of quality.

Miss S. O, he is the very mirror of complaisance; full of formal bows and set speeches. I declare, if there was any violent passion on my side, I should be quite jealous of him.

Mrs. H. Jealous! I say jealous, indeed. Jealous of who, pray?

Miss S. My sister Fanny. She seems a much greater favourite than I am; and he pays her infinitely more attention, I assure you.

Mrs. H. Lord! d'ye think a man of fashion, as he is, cannot distinguish between the genteel and the vulgar part of the family? Between you and your sister, for instance; or me and my brother? Be advised by me, child. It is all purliteness and good-breeding. Nobody knows the quality better than I do.

Miss S. In my mind, the old lord, his uncle, has ten times more gallantry about him than Sir John. He is full of attentions to the ladies, and smiles, and grins, and leers, and ogles, and fills every wrinkle of his old wizen face with comical expressions of tenderness. I think he would make an admirable sweetheart.

Enter STERLING.

Ster. No fish? Why, the pond was dragged but yesterday morning; there's carp and tench in the boat. Plague on't! if that dog, Lovewell, had any thought, he would have brought down a turbot, or some of the land-carriage mackerel.

Mrs. H. Lord, brother! I am afraid his lordship and Sir John will not arrive while it is light.

Ster. I warrant you. But pray, sister Heidelberg, let the turtle be dressed to-morrow, and some venison; and let the gardener cut some pine-apples, and get out some ice. I'll answer for wine, I warrant you. I'll give them such a glass of champagne as they never drank in their lives; no, not at a duke's table.

Mrs. H. Pray, now, brother, mind how you behave. I am always in a fright about you with people of quality. Take care that you don't fall asleep directly after supper, as you commonly do. Take a good deal of snuff, and that will keep you awake. And don't burst out with your horrible loud horse-laughs. It is monstrous vulgar.

Ster. Never fear, sister. Who have we here?

Mrs. H. It is Mons. Cantoon, the Swiss gentleman that lives with his lordship, I vow and pertest.

Enter CANTON.

Ster. Ah, mounseer! your servant. I am very glad to see you, mounseer.

Can. Mosh oblige to Mons. Sterling. Ma'am, I am yours: Matemoiselle, I am your— [Bowing round.]

Mrs. H. Your humble servant, Mr. Cantoon!

Can. Kiss your hand, matam!

Ster. Well, mounseer; and what news of your good family? When are we to see his lordship and Sir John?

Can. Mons. Sterling, mi Lor Ogleby and Sir Jean Melvil will be here in one quarter hour.

Ster. I am glad to hear it.

Mrs. H. O, I am perdigious glad to hear it. Being so late, I was afraid of some accident. Will you please to have anything, Mr. Cantoon, after your journey?

Can. No, tank you, ma'am.

Mrs. H. Shall I go and shew you the apartments, sir?

Can. You do me great honour, ma'am.

Mrs. H. Come, then! Come, my dear! [Ereunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—An Ante-room to Lord Ogleby's Bed-chamber. Table, with chocolate, and small case for medicines.

BRUSH and Chambermaid discovered.

Brush. You shall stay, my dear, I insist upon it.

Cham. Nay pray, sir, don't be so positive; I cannot stay indeed.

Brush. You shall drink one cup to our better acquaintance.

Cham. I seldom drinks chocolate; and, if I did, one has no satisfaction with such apprehensions about one. If my lord should wake, or the Swiss gentleman should see one, or Madam Heidelberg should know of it, I should be frightened to death; besides, I have had my tea already this morning: I'm sure I hear my lord. [In a fright.]

Brush. No, no, madam, don't flutter yourself. The moment my lord wakes, he rings his bell, which I answer sooner or later, as it suits my convenience.

Cham. But should he come upon us without ringing—

Brush. I'll forgive him if he does. This key [Takes a phial out of the case] locks him up till I please to let him out.

Cham. La! sir, that's potecary's stuff.

Brush. It is so; but without this he can no more get out of bed, than he can read without spectacles. [Sips.] What with qualms, age, rheumatism, and a few surfeits in his youth, he must have a great deal of brushing, oiling, screwing, and winding-up, to set him a-going for the day.

Cham. [Sips.] That's prodigious indeed. [Sips.] My lord seems quite in a decay.

Brush. Yes, he's quite a spectacle: [Sips.]—a mere corpse, till he is revived and refreshed from our little magazine here. When the restorative pills and cordial waters warm his stomach, and get into his head, vanity frisks in his heart, and then he sets up for the lover, the rake, and the fine gentleman.

Cham. [Sips.] Poor gentleman! but should the Swiss gentleman come upon us. [Frightened.]

Brush. Why then the English gentleman would be very angry. No foreigner would break in upon my privacy. [Sips.] But I can assure you, Monsieur Cantoon is otherwise employed. He is obliged to skim the cream of half a score newspapers for my lord's breakfast: ha, ha, ha! Pray, madam, drink your cup peaceably. My lord's chocolate is remarkably good; he won't touch a drop, but what comes from Italy.

Cham. [Sipping.] 'Tis very fine, indeed! [Sips.] and charmingly perfumed: it smells for all the world like our young ladies' dressing-boxes.

Brush. You have an excellent taste, madam; and I must beg of you to accept of a few cakes for your own drinking. [Takes them out of a drawer in the table.] And in return, I desire nothing but to taste the perfume of your lips. [Kisses her.] A small return of favours, madam, will make, I hope, this country and retirement agreeable to us both. [He bows, she courtesies.] Come, pray sit down. Your young ladies are fine girls, faith! [Sips.] though, upon my soul, I am quite of my old lord's mind about them; and were I inclined to matrimony, I should take the youngest. [Sips.]

Cham. Miss Fanny! The most affablest, and the most best-natur'd creter!

Brush. And the eldest a little haughty or so.

Cham. More haughtier and prouder than Saturn himself; but this I say quite confidential to you; for one would not hurt a young lady's marriage, you know. [Sips.]

Brush. By no means; but you cannot hurt it with us. We don't consider tempers: we want money, Mrs. Nancy. Give us plenty of that, we'll abate you a great deal of other particulars; ha, ha, ha!

Cham. Bless me, here's somebody! [Bell rings.] Oh, 'tis my lord! Well, your servant, Mr. Brush. I'll clean the cups in the next room.

Brush. Do so; but never mind the bell: I sha'n't go this half hour. Will you drink tea with me in the afternoon?

Cham. Not for the world, Mr. Brush. I'll be here to set all things to rights; but I must not drink tea indeed; and so, your servant.

[Exit, with teaboard. Bell rings again.]

Brush. Yes, yes; I hear you. It is impossible to stupify one's self in the country for a week, without some little flirting with the abigails. This is much the handsomest wench in the house, except the old citizen's youngest daughter, and I have not time enough to lay a plan for her. [Bell rings.] O, my lord!

[Going.]

Enter CANTON, with newspapers in his hand.

Can. Monsieur Brush! Maistre Brush! my lord stirra, yet?

Brush. He has just rung his bell: I am going to him. [Exit.]

Can. Dépêchez vous donc. [Puts on his spectacles.] I wish de deveil had all dese papiers. I forget as fast as I read. De Advertise put out of my head de Gazette, de Chronique, and so dey all go l'un après l'autre. I must get some nouvelle for my lor, or he'll be enragé contre moi. Voyons! [Reads the paper.] Here is noting but Anti-Sejans and advertise—

Enter Maid with chocolate things.

Vat you want, chil?

Maid. Only the chocolate things, sir.

Can. O, ver well; dat is good girl; and very prit too. [Exit Maid.]

Lord O. [Within.] Canton! he, he! [Coughs.] Canton!

Can. I come, my—Vat shall I do? I have no news: he will make great tintamarre!

Lord O. [Within.] Canton! I say, Canton! Where are you?

Enter Lord OGLEBY, leaning on BRUSH.

Can. Here, my lor! I ask pardon, my lor, I have not finish de papiers.

Lord O. D—n your pardon and your papiers; I want you here, Canton.

Can. Den I run, dat is all. [Shuffles along.]

[LORD OGLEBY leans upon CANTON too, and comes forward.]

Lord O. You Swiss are the most unaccountable mixture: you have the language and the impertinence of the French, with the laziness of Dutchmen.

Can. 'Tis very true, my lor; I can't help—

Lord O. [Cries out.] O Diavolo!

Can. You are not in pain, I hope, my lor?

Lord O. Indeed, but I am, my lor. That vulgar fellow, Sterling, with his city politeness, would force me down his slope last night to see a clay-coloured ditch, which he calls a canal; and what with the dew and the east wind, my hips and shoulders are absolutely screwed to my body.

Can. A littel veritable eau d'arquibusede vil set all to right.

[LORD OGLEBY sits down, and BRUSH gives chocolate.]

Lord O. Where are the palsy drops, Brush?

Brush. Here, my lord!

[Pours out.]

Lord O. Quelle nouvelle avez vous, Canton?

Can. A great deal of papier, but no news at all.

Lord O. What! nothing at all, you stupid fellow?

Can. Oui, my lor, I have little advertise here vil give you more plaisir den all de lies about noting at all. La voila!

[Puts on his spectacles.]

Lord O. Come, read it, Canton, with good emphasis, and good discretion.

Can. I vil, my lor. [Reads.] Dere is no question but dat de cosmetique royale vil utterly take away all heats, pimps, frecks, oder eruptions of de skin, and likewise de urininge of old age, &c. &c. A great deal more, my lor. Be sure to ask for de cosmetique royale, signed by de docteur own hand. Dere is more raison for dis caution dan good men vil tink. Eh bien, my lor?

Lord O. Eh bien, Canton! Will you purchase any?

Can. For you, my lor?

Lord O. For me, you old puppy! for what?

Can. My lor!

Lord O. Do I want cosmetics?

Can. My lor!

Lord O. Look in my face; come, be sincere. Does it want the assistance of art?

Can. [With his spectacles.] En vérité, non. 'Tis very smooth and brilliant; but tote dat you might take a littel by way of prevention.

Lord O. You thought like an old fool, monsieur, as you generally do. Try it upon your own face, Canton; and if it has any effect, the doctor cannot have a better proof of the efficacy of his nostrum. The surfeit water, Brush! [Brush pours out.] What do you think, Brush, of this family we are going to be connected with? Eh!

Brush. Very well to marry in, my lord; but it would never do to live with.

Lord O. You are right, Brush; there is no washing the blackmoor white. Mr. Sterling will never get rid of Blackfriars; always taste of the Borachio; and the poor woman, his sister, is so busy, and so notable, to make one welcome, that I have not yet got over the fatigue of her first reception; it almost amounted to suffocation! I think the daughters are tolerable. Where's my cephalic snuff?

[BRUSH gives him a box.]

Can. Dey tink so of you, my lor; for dey look at noting else, ma foi.

Lord O. Did they? Why, I think they did a little. Where's my glass? [Brush puts one on the table.] The youngest is delectable. [Takes snuff.]

Can. O oui, my lor, very delect inteed; she made doux yeux at you, my lor.

Lord O. She was particular. The eldest, my nephew's lady, will be a most valuable wife; she has all the vulgar spirits of her father and aunt happily blended with the termagant qualities of her deceased mother. Some peppermint-water, Brush. How happy is it, Canton, for young ladies in general, that people of quality overlook everything in their marriage contract but their fortune.

Can. C'est bien heureux, et commode aussi.

Lord O. Brush, give me that pamphlet by my bedside. [Brush goes for it.] Canton, do you wait in the ante-chamber, and let nobody interrupt me till I call you.

Can. Mush good may do your lordship. [Exit.]

Lord O. [To Brush, who brings the pamphlet.] And now, Brush, leave me a little to my studies. [Exit Brush.] What can I possibly do among these women here, with this confounded rheumatism? It is a most grievous enemy to gallantry and address. [Gets off his chair.] Eh! courage, my lor! by heavens, I'm another creature! [Hums and dances a little.] It will do, faith! Bravo, my lor! These girls have absolutely inspired me. If they are for a game of romps; me voilà prêt! [Sings and dances.] Oh! that's an ugly twinge; but it's gone. I have rather too much of the lily this morning in my complexion; a faint tincture of the rose will give a delicate spirit to my eyes for the day. [Unlocks a drawer at the bottom of the glass, and takes out rouge; while he is painting himself, a knocking at the door.] Who's there? I won't be disturb'd.

Can. [Within.] My lor! my lor! here is Monsieur Sterling, to pay his devoir to you this morn in your chambre.

Lord O. What a fellow! [Softly.] I am extremely honoured by Mr. Sterling. Why don't you see him in, monsieur? [Aloud.] I wish he was at the bottom of his stinking canal. [Softly.] Door opens. Oh, my dear Mr. Sterling, you do me a great deal of honour.

Enter STERLING and LOVEWELL.

Ster. I hope, my lord, that your lordship slept well last night. I believe there are no better beds in Europe than I have. I spare no pains to get them, nor money to buy them. His majesty, God bless him! don't sleep upon a better out of his palace; and if I had said in too, I hope no treason, my lord.

Lord O. Your beds are like everything else about you, incomparable! They not only make one rest well, but give one spirits, Mr. Sterling.

Ster. What say you then, my lord, to another walk in the garden? You must see my water by day-light, and my walks, and my slopes, and my clumps, and my bridge, and my flowering trees, and my bed of Dutch tulips. Matters look'd but dim last night, my lord. I feel the dew in my great toe; but I would put on a cut shoe, that I might be able to walk you about: I may be laid up to-morrow.

Lord O. I pray heaven you may. [Aside.]

Ster. What say you, my lord?

Lord O. I was saying, sir, that I was in hopes of seeing the young ladies at breakfast: Mr. Sterling, they are, in my mind, the finest tulips in this part of the world; he, he, he, he!

Can. Bravissimo, mi lor! ha, ha, ha, ha!

Ster. They shall meet your lordship in the garden; we won't lose our walk for them; I'll take you a little round before breakfast, and a larger before dinner; and in the evening you shall go the grand tour, as I call it; ha, ha, ha!

Lord O. Not a foot, I hope, Mr. Sterling; consider your gout, my good friend: you'll certainly be laid by the heels for your politeness; he, he, he!

Can. Ha, ha, ha! 'tis admirable, en verite!

Ster. If my young man here [to LOVEWELL.] would but laugh at my jokes, which he ought to do, as mounseer does at your's, my lord, we should be all life and mirth.

Lord O. What say you, Canton, will you take my kinsman into your tuition? You have certainly the most companionable laugh I ever met with, and never out of tune.

Can. But when your lordship is out of spirits.

Lord O. Well said, Canton! But here comes my nephew, to play his part.

Enter Sir JOHN MELVIL.

Well, Sir John, what news from the island of love? Have you been sighing and serenading this morning?

Sir J. I am glad to see your lordship in such spirits this morning.

Lord O. I'm sorry to see you so dull, sir. What poor things, Mr. Sterling, these very young fellows are! They make love with faces as if they were burying the dead; though, indeed, a marriage sometimes may be properly called a burying of the living; eh, Mr. Sterling?

Ster. Not if they have enough to live upon, my lord; ha, ha, ha!

Can. Dat is all Monsieur Sterling tink of.

Sir J. Pr'ythee, Lovewell, come with me into the garden; I have something of consequence for you, and I must communicate it directly.

[Apart to LOVEWELL.]

Love. We'll go together. [Apart.] If your lordship and Mr. Sterling please, we'll prepare the ladies to attend you in the garden.

[Reunt Sir JOHN MELVIL and LOVEWELL.]

Ster. My girls are always ready; I make them rise soon, and to bed early; their husbands shall have them with good constitutions and good fortunes, if they have nothing else, my lord.

Lord O. Fine things, Mr. Sterling!

Ster. Fine things, indeed, my lord! Ah, my lord, had you not run off your speed in your youth, you had not been so crippled in your age, my lord.

Lord O. Very pleasant; he, he, he!

Ster. Here's mounseer now, I suppose, is pretty near your lordship's standing; but having little to eat, and little to spend in his own country, he'll wear three of your lordship out. Eating and drinking kills us all.

Lord O. Very pleasant, I protest. What a vulgar dog!

Can. My lor so old as me! He is chicken to me; and look like a boy to pauvre me.

Ster. Ha, ha, ha! Well said, mounseer: keep to that, and you'll live in any country of the world. Ha, ha, ha! But, my lord, I will wait upon you in the garden; we have but a little time to breakfast. I'll go for my hat and cane, fetch a little walk with you, and then for the hot rolls and butter! [Exit.]

Lord O. I shall attend you with pleasure. Hot rolls and butter in July! I sweat with the thoughts of it.

Can. C'est un barbare.

Lord O. He is a vulgar dog; and if there was not so much money in the family, which I can't do without, I would leave him and his hot rolls and butter directly. Come along, monsieur! [Exit.]

SCENE II.—The Garden.

Enter Sir JOHN MELVIL and LOVEWELL.

Love. In my room this morning? Impossible.

Sir J. Before five this morning, I promise you.

Love. On what occasion?

Sir J. I was so anxious to disclose my mind to you that I could not sleep in my bed; but I found that you could not sleep neither. The bird was flown, and the nest long since cold. Where was you, Lovewell?

Love. Pooh! pr'ythee, ridiculous.

Sir J. Come, now, which was it: Miss Sterling's maid? a pretty little rogue! or Miss Fanny's Abigail? a sweet soul too! or—

Love. Nay, nay, leave trifling, and tell me your business.

Sir J. Well, but where was you, Lovewell?

Love. Walking, writing; what signifies where I was?

Sir J. Walking! yes, I dare say. It rained as hard as it could pour. Sweet, refreshing showers, to walk in! No, no, Lovewell. Now would I give twenty pounds to know which of the maids—

Love. But your business! your business, Sir John!

Sir J. Let me a little into the secrets of the family.

Love. Psha!

Sir J. Poor Lovewell! he can't bear it, I see. [Aside.] She charged you not to kiss and tell, eh, Lovewell? However, though you will not honour me with your confidence, I'll venture to trust you with mine. What do you think of Miss Sterling?

Love. What do I think of Miss Sterling?

Sir J. Ay, what do you think of her?

Love. An odd question! but I think her a smart, lively girl, full of mirth and sprightliness.

Sir J. All mischief and malice, I doubt.

Love. How!

Sir J. But her person: what d'ye think of that?

Love. Pretty and agreeable.

Sir J. A little grisette thing.

Love. What is the meaning of all this?

Sir J. I'll tell you. You must know, Lovewell, that notwithstanding all appearances—[A loud laugh heard without.] We are interrupted. When they are gone, I'll explain.

Enter Lord OGLEBY, STERLING, CANTON, Mrs. HEIDELBERG, Miss STERLING, and FANNY.

Lord O. Great improvements indeed, Mr. Sterling; wonderful improvements! The four seasons in lead, the flying Mercury, and the bason with Neptune in the middle, are in the very extreme of fine taste. You have as many rich figures as the man at Hyde-park-corner.

Ster. The chief pleasure of a country house is to make improvements, you know, my lord. I spare no expense, not I. This is quite another guess sort of a place than it was when I first took it, my lord. We were surrounded with trees. I cut down above fifty to make the lawn before the house, and let in the wind and the sun, smack smooth, as you see. Then I made a green-house out of the old laundry, and turned the brew-house into a pinery. The high octagon summer-house, you see yonder, is raised on the mast of a ship, given me by an East Indian captain, who has turned many a thousand of my money. It commands the whole road. All the coaches, and chariots, and chaises, pass and repass under your eye. I'll mount you up there in the afternoon, my lord.

Lord O. No, I thank you, Mr. Sterling.

Ster. 'Tis the pleasantest place in the world to take a pipe and a bottle; and so you shall say, my lord.

Lord O. Ay, or a bowl of punch, or a can of flip, Mr. Sterling; for it looks like a cabin in the air. If flying chairs were in use, the captain might make a voyage to the Indies in it still, if he had but a fair wind.

Can. Ha, ha, ha, ha!

Mrs. H. My brother's a little comical in his ideas, my lord. But you'll excuse him. I have a little

Gothic dairy, fitted up entirely in my own taste. In the evening, I shall hope for the honour of your lordship's company to take a dish of tea there, or a sullybub warm from the cow

Lord O. I have every moment a fresh opportunity of admiring the elegance of Mrs. Heidelberg, the very flower of delicacy and cream of politeness.

Mrs. H. O, my lord! [Leers at Lord OGLEBY.]

Lord O. O, madam! [Leers at Mrs. HEIDELBERG.]

Ster. How d'ye like these close walks, my lord?

Lord O. A most excellent serpentine! It forms a perfect maze, and winds like a true-lover's knot.

Ster. Ay, here's none of your strait lines here; but all taste; zigzag, crinkum-crankum, in and out, right and left, to and again; twisting and turning like a worm, my lord.

Lord O. Admirably laid out indeed, Mr. Sterling! one can hardly see an inch beyond one's nose anywhere in these walks. You are a most excellent economist of your land, and make a little go a great way. It lies together in as small parcels as if it were placed in pots out at your window in Gracechurch-street.

Can. Ha, ha, ha, ha!

Lord O. What d'ye laugh at, Canton?

Can. Ah! que cette similitude est drôle! so clever what you say, my lord!

Lord O. You seem mightily engaged, madam. What are those pretty hands so busily employed about? [To FANNY.]

Fan. Only making up a nosegay, my lord! Will your lordship do me the honour of accepting it?

Lord O. I'll wear it next my heart, madam. I see the young creature dotes on me. [Aside.]

Miss S. Lord, sister! you've loaded his lordship with a bunch of flowers as big as the cook, or the nurse, carries to town, on a Monday morning, for a beaupot. Will your lordship give me leave to present you with this rose and a sprig of sweetbriar?

Lord O. The truest emblems of yourself, madam! all sweetness and poignancy. A little jealous, poor soul! [Aside.]

Ster. Now, my lord, if you please, I'll carry you to see my ruins.

Mrs. H. You'll absolutely fatigue his lordship with over-walking, brother.

Lord O. Not at all, madam. We're in the garden of Eden, you know; in the region of perpetual spring, youth, and beauty! [Leers at the Women.]

Mrs. H. Quite the man of quality, I vow and per-test. [Aside.]

Can. Take-a my arm, my lord!

[Lord O. leans on him.]

Ster. I'll only shew his lordship my ruins, and the cascade, and the Chinese bridge, and then we'll go in to breakfast.

Lord O. Ruins, did you say, Mr. Sterling?

Ster. Ay; ruins, my lord; and they are reckoned very fine ones, too. You would think them ready to tumble on your head. It has just cost me a hundred and fifty pounds to put my ruins in thorough repair. This way, if your lordship pleases.

Lord O. [Going, stops.] What steeple's that we see yonder? The parish church, I suppose.

Ster. Ha, ha, ha! that's admirable. It is no church at all, my lord! it is a spire that I have built against a tree, a field or two off, to terminate the prospect. One must always have a church, or an obelisk, or something to terminate the prospect, you know. That's a rule in taste, my lord!

Lord O. Very ingenious indeed! For my part, I desire no finer prospect than this I see before me:

[leers at the Women:] simple, yet varied; bounded, yet extensive. Get away, Canton! [Pushes CANTON away.] I want no assistance; I'll walk with the ladies.

Ster. This way, my lord.

Lord O. Lead on, sir. We young folks here will follow you. Madam; Miss Sterling; Miss Fanny; I attend you. [Exit after STER., gallanting the Ladies.]

Can. [Following.] He is cock o'de game, ma foi! [Exit.]

Sir J. Hark ye, Lovewell; you must not go. At length, thank Heaven! I have an opportunity to unbosom. I know you are faithful, Lovewell, and flatter myself you would rejoice to serve me.

Love. Be assured you may depend upon me.

Sir J. You must know then, notwithstanding all appearances, that this treaty of marriage between Miss Sterling and me will come to nothing.

Love. How!

Sir J. It will be no match, Lovewell.

Love. No match?

Sir J. No.

Love. You amaze me. What should prevent it?

Sir J. I.

Love. You! Wherefore?

Sir J. I don't like her.

Love. Very plain indeed! I never supposed that you were extremely devoted to her from inclination; but thought you always considered it as a matter of convenience rather than affection.

Sir J. Very true. I came into the family without any impressions on my mind; with an unimpassioned indifference, ready to receive one woman as soon as another. I looked upon love, serious sober love, as a chimera, and marriage as a thing of course, as you know most people do. But I, who was lately so great an infidel in love, am now one of its sincerest votaries. In short, my defection from Miss Sterling proceeds from the violence of my attachment to another.

Love. Another? So, so! here will be fine work. And pray who is she?

Sir J. Who is she! who can she be but Fanny; the tender, amiable, engaging Fanny?

Love. Fanny! What Fanny?

Sir J. Fanny Sterling, her sister. Is not she an angel, Lovewell?

Love. Her sister? Confusion! [Aside.] You must not think of it, Sir John.

Sir J. Not think of it! I can think of nothing else. Nay, tell me, Lovewell, was it possible for me to be indulged in a perpetual intercourse with two such objects as Fanny and her sister, and not find my heart led by insensible attraction towards her? You seem confounded. Why don't you answer me?

Love. Indeed, Sir John, this event gives me infinite concern. Why did not you break this affair to the family before?

Sir J. Under such embarrassed circumstances as I have been, can you wonder at my irresolution or perplexity? Nothing but despair, the fear of losing my dear Fanny, could bring me to a declaration even now; and yet I think I know Mr. Sterling so well, that strange as my proposal may appear, if I can make it advantageous to him as a money transaction, as I am sure I can, he will certainly come into it.

Love. But even suppose he should, which I very much doubt, I don't think Fanny herself would listen to your addresses.

Sir J. You are deceived a little in that particular.

Love. You'll find I'm in the right.

Sir J. I have some little reason to think otherwise.

Love. You have not declared your passion to her already.

Sir J. Yes, I have.

Love. Indeed! And—and—and how did she receive it?

Sir J. I think it is not very easy for me to make my addresses to any woman, without receiving some little encouragement.

Love. Encouragement! Did she give you any encouragement?

Sir J. I don't know what you call encouragement; but she blushed, and cried, and desired me not to think of it any more: upon which I pressed her hand; kissed it; swore she was an angel; and I could see it tickled her to the soul.

Love. And did she express no surprise at your declaration?

Sir J. Why, faith, to say the truth, she was a little surprised; and she got away from me too before I could thoroughly explain myself. If I should not meet with an opportunity of speaking to her, I must get you to deliver a letter for me.

Love. I! a letter! I had rather have nothing—

Sir J. Nay, you promised me your assistance; and I am sure you cannot scruple to make yourself useful on such an occasion. You may, without suspicion, acquaint her verbally of my determined affection for her, and that I am resolved to ask her father's consent.

Love. As to that, I—your commands, you know; that is, if she—Indeed, Sir John, I think you are in the wrong.

Sir J. Well, well, that's my concern. Ha! there she goes, by heaven! along that walk yonder, d'ye see? I'll go to her immediately!

Love. You are too precipitate. Consider what you are doing.

Sir J. I would not lose this opportunity for the universe.

Love. Nay, pray don't go! Your violence and eagerness may overcome her spirits. The shock will be too much for her. [Detains him.]

Sir J. Nothing shall prevent me. Ha! now she turns into another walk. Let me go. [Breaks from him.] I shall lose her. [Going, turns back.] Be sure now to keep out of the way! If you interrupt us, I shall never forgive you. [Exit hastily.]

Love. 'Sdeath! I can't bear this. In love with my wife! acquaint me with his passion for her! make his addresses before my face! I shall break out before my time. This was the meaning of Fanny's uneasiness. She could not encourage him; I am sure she could not. Ha! they are turning into the walk, and coming this way. Shall I leave the place? Leave him to solicit my wife? I can't submit to it. They come nearer and nearer. If I stay, it will look suspicious. It may betray us, and incense him. They are here. I must go. I am the most unfortunate fellow in the world! [Exit.]

Re-enter, Sir JOHN MELVIL and FANNY.

Fan. Leave me, Sir John; I beseech you, leave me! Nay, why will you persist to follow me with idle solicitations, which are an affront to my character, and an injury to your own honour?

Sir J. I know your delicacy, and tremble to offend it: but let the urgency of the occasion be my excuse. Consider, madam, that the future happiness of my life depends on my present application to you. Consider that this day must determine my fate; and these are perhaps the only moments left me to incline you to warrant my passion, and to entreat you not to oppose the proposals I mean to open to your father.

Fan. For shame, for shame, Sir John! Think of your previous engagements. Think of your own situation, and think of mine. What have you discovered in my conduct, that might encourage you to so bold a declaration? I am shocked that you should venture to say so much, and blush that I should even dare to give it a hearing. Let me be gone.

Sir J. Nay, stay, madam, but one moment. Your sensibility is too great. Engagements! what engagements have been pretended on either side, more than those of family convenience? I went on in the trammels of a matrimonial negotiation, with a blind submission to your father and Lord Ogleby; but my heart soon claimed a right to be consulted. It has devoted itself to you, and obliges me to plead earnestly for the same tender interest in your's.

Fan. Have a care, Sir John! do not mistake a depraved will for a virtuous inclination. By these common pretences of the heart, half our sex are made fools, and a greater part of your's despise them for it.

Sir J. Affection, you will allow, is involuntary. We cannot always direct it to the object on which it should fix; but when it is once inviolably attached, inviolably as mine is to you, it often creates reciprocal affection. When I last urged you on this subject, you heard me with more temper, and I hoped with some compassion.

Fan. You deceived yourself. If I forbore to exert a proper spirit—nay, if I did not even express the quickest resentment at your behaviour, it was only in consideration of that respect I wish to pay you in honour to my sister; and be assured, sir, woman as I am, that my vanity could reap no pleasure from a triumph that must result from the blackest treachery to her.

[Going, he stops her.]

Sir J. One word, and I have done. Your sister, I verily believe, neither entertains any real affection for me, or tenderness for you. Your father, I am inclined to think, is not much concerned by means of which of his daughters the families are united. Now, as they cannot, shall not be connected, otherwise than by my union with you, why will you, from a false delicacy, oppose a measure so conducive to my happiness, and, I hope, your own? I love you, most passionately and sincerely love you, and hope to propose terms agreeable to Mr. Sterling: if then you don't absolutely loath, abhor, and scorn me; if there is no other happier man—

Fan. Hear me, sir; hear my final determination. Were my father and sister as insensible as you are pleased to represent them; were my heart for ever to remain disengaged to any other—I could not listen to your proposals. What! you, on the very eve of a marriage with my sister; I, living under the same roof with her, bound not only by the laws of friendship and hospitality, but even the ties of blood, to contribute to her happiness, and not to conspire against her peace, the peace of a whole family, and that of my own too! Away, away, Sir John! At such a time, and in such circumstances, your addresses only inspire me with horror. Nay, you must detain me no longer: I will go.

Sir J. Do not leave me in absolute despair. Give me a glimpse of hope.

[Falls on his knees.]

Fan. I cannot. Pray, Sir John.

[Struggles to go.]

Sir J. Shall this hand be given to another?

[Kisses her hand.] No, I cannot endure it. My whole soul is your's, and the whole happiness of my life is in your power.

Re-enter Miss STERLING.

Fan. Ha! my sister here! Rise, for shame, Sir John.

Sir J. Miss Sterling!

[Rises.]

Miss S. I beg pardon, sir! You'll excuse me, madam. I have broke in upon you a little inopportune, I believe; but I did not mean to interrupt you: I only came, sir, to let you know that breakfast waits, if you have finished your morning's devotion.

Sir J. I am very sensible, Miss Sterling, that this may appear particular, but—

Miss S. O dear, Sir John, don't put yourself to the trouble of an apology; the thing explains itself.

Sir J. It will soon, madam. In the meantime, I can only assure you of my profound respect and esteem for you, and make no doubt of convincing Mr. Sterling of the honour and integrity of my intentions. And—and—your humble servant, madam!

[Exit in confusion.]

Miss S. Respect! Insolence! Esteem! Very fine truly. And you, madam! my sweet, delicate, innocent, sentimental sister! will you convince my papa too of the integrity of your intentions?

Fan. Do not upbraid me, my dear sister. Indeed I don't deserve it. Believe me, you can't be more offended at his behaviour than I am, and I am sure it cannot make you half so miserable.

Miss S. Make me miserable! You are mightily deceived, madam; it gives me no sort of uneasiness, I assure you. A base fellow! As for you, miss, the pretended softness of your disposition, your artful good-nature, never imposed upon me. I always knew you to be sly, envious, and deceitful.

Fan. Indeed you wrong me.

Miss S. Oh, you are all goodness, to be sure! Did not I find him on his knees before you? Did not I see him kiss your sweet hand? Did not I hear his protestations? Was not I a witness of your dissembled modesty? No, no, my dear! don't imagine that you can make a fool of your elder sister so easily.

Fan. Sir John, I own, is to blame; but I am above the thoughts of doing you the least injury.

Miss S. We shall try that, madam. I hope, miss, you'll be able to give a better account to my papa and my aunt, for they shall both know of this matter, I promise you.

[Exit.]

Fan. How unhappy I am! My distresses multiply upon me. Mr. Lovewell must now become acquainted with Sir John's behaviour to me, and in a manner that may add to his uneasiness. My father, instead of being disposed by fortunate circumstances to forgive any transgressions, will be previously incensed against me. My sister and my aunt will become irreconcilably my enemies, and rejoice in my disgrace. Yet, at all events, I am determined on a discovery. I dread it, and am resolved to hasten it. It is surrounded with more horrors every instant, as it appears every instant more necessary.

[Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Hall.

Enter a Servant, conducting in Sergeant FLOWER and Counsellors TRAVERSE and TRUEMAN, all booted.

Serv. This way, if you please, gentlemen. My master is at breakfast with the family at present, but I'll let him know, and he will wait on you immediately.

Flow. Mighty well, young man, mighty well.

Serv. Please to favour me with your names, gentlemen.

Flow. Let Mr. Sterling know, that Mr. Sergeant Flower, and two other gentlemen of the bar, are come to wait on him according to his appointment.

Serv. I will, sir.

[Going.]

Flow. And harkye, young man. [Servant returns.] Desire my servant—Mr. Sergeant Flower's servant—to bring in my green and gold saddle-cloth and pistols, and lay them down here in the hall, with my portmanteau.

Serv. I will, sir.

[Exit.]

Flow. Well, gentlemen; the settling these marriage articles falls conveniently enough, almost just on the eve of the circuits. Let me see; the Home, the Midland, and Western; ay, we can all cross the country well enough to our several destinations. Traverse, when do you begin at Hertford?

Trav. The day after to-morrow.

Flow. That is commission-day with us at Warwick, too; but my clerk has retainers for every cause in the paper, so it will be time enough if I am there next morning. Besides I've half a dozen cases that have lain by me ever since the spring assizes, and I must tack opinions to them before I see my country clients again; so I'll take the evening before me, and then currente calamo, as I say, eh, Traverse?

Trav. True; and pray, Mr. Sergeant, are you concerned in Jones and Thomas, at Lincoln?

Flow. I am: for the plaintiff.

Trav. And what do you think on't?

Flow. A nonsuit.

Trav. I thought so.

Flow. Oh, no manner of doubt on't—luce clarius—we have no right in us. We have but one chance.

Trav. What's that?

Flow. Why, my lord chief does not go the circuit this time, and my brother Puzzle being in the commission, the cause will come on before him.

True. Ay, that may do indeed; if you can but throw dust in the eyes of the defendant's counsel.

Flow. True. Mr. Trueman, I think you are concerned for Lord Ogleby in this affair?

True. I am, sir. I have the honour to be related to his lordship, and hold some courts for him in Somersetshire; go to the Western circuit, and attend the sessions at Exeter, merely because his lordship's interests and property lie in that part of the kingdom.

Flow. Ha! and pray, Mr. Trueman, how long have you been called to the bar?

True. About nine years and three quarters.

Flow. Ha! I don't know that I ever had the pleasure of seeing you before. I wish you success, young gentleman!

Enter STERLING.

Ster. Oh, Mr. Sergeant Flower, I am glad to see you. Your servant, Mr. Sergeant. Gentlemen, your servant. Well, are all matters concluded? Has that snail-paced conveyancer, old Ferret, of Gray's-inn, settled the articles at last? Do you approve of what he has done? Will his tackle hold tight and strong? Eh, master Serjeant?

Flow. My friend Ferret's slow and sure, sir; but then, serius aut citius, as we say, sooner or later, Mr. Sterling, he is sure to put his business out of hand as he should do. My clerk has brought the writings, and all other instruments along with him; and the settlement is, I believe, as good a settlement as any settlement on the face of the earth.

Ster. But that d—n'd mortgage of sixty thousand pounds. There don't appear to be any other incumbrances, I hope?

Trav. I can answer for that, sir; and that will be cleared off immediately on the payment of the first part of Miss Sterling's portion. You agree, on your part, to come down with eighty thousand pounds?

Ster. Down on the nail. Aye, aye, my money is ready to-morrow if he pleases. He shall have it in India bonds, or notes, or how he chooses. Your lords and your dukes, and your people at the court end of the town, stick at payments sometimes. Debts unpaid, no credit lost with them; but no fear of us substantial fellows, eh, Mr. Sergeant?

Flow. Sir John having last term, according to agreement, levied a fine, and suffered a recovery, has hitherto cut off the entail of the Ogleby estate, for the better effecting the purposes of the present intended marriage; on which above-mentioned Ogleby estate, a jointure of two thousand pounds per annum is secured to your eldest daughter, now Elizabeth Sterling, spinster, and the whole estate, after the death of the aforesaid earl, descends to the heirs male of Sir John Melvil, on the body of the aforesaid Elizabeth Sterling lawfully to be begotten.

Trav. Very true; and Sir John is to be put in immediate possession of as much of his lordship's Somersetshire estate, as lies in the manors of Hogmore and Cranford, amounting to between two and three thousand pounds per annum, and at the death of Mr. Sterling, a further sum of seventy thousand—

Enter Sir JOHN MELVIL.

Ster. Ah, Sir John! Here we are, hard at it; paving the road to matrimony. First the lawyers, then comes the doctor. Let us but despatch the long-robe, we shall soon get pudding-sleeves to work, I warrant you.

Sir J. I am sorry to interrupt you, sir; but I hope that both you and these gentlemen will excuse me. Having something very particular for your private ear, I took the liberty of following you, and beg you will oblige me with an audience immediately. [To STERLING.]

Ster. Ay, with all my heart! Gentlemen,—Mr. Sergeant,—you'll excuse it; business must be done, you know. The writings will keep cold till to-morrow morning.

Flow. I must be at Warwick, Mr. Sterling, the day after.

Ster. Nay, nay, I sha'n't part with you to-night, gentlemen, I promise you. My house is very full, but I have beds for you all, beds for your servants, and stabling for all your horses. Will you take a turn in the garden, and view some of my improvements before dinner? or will you amuse yourself on the green, with a game at bowls and a cool tankard? My servants shall attend you. Do you choose any other refreshment? Call for what you please; do as you please; make yourselves quite at home, I beg of you. Here, Thomas! Harry! William! wait on these gentlemen!—[Follows the Lawyers out, bawling and talking, and then returns to Sir JOHN.] And now, sir, I am entirely at your service. What are your commands with me, Sir John?

Sir J. After having carried the negotiation between our families to so great a length; after having assented so readily to all your proposals, as well as received so many instances of your cheerful compliance with the demands made on our part, I am extremely concerned, Mr. Sterling, to be the involuntary cause of any uneasiness.

Ster. Uneasiness! what uneasiness? Where business is transacted as it ought to be, and the parties understand one another, there can be no uneasiness. You agree, on such and such conditions, to receive my daughter for a wife; on the same conditions I agree to receive you as a son-in-law; and as to all the rest, it follows of course, you know, as regularly as the payment of a bill after acceptance.

Sir J. Pardon me, sir, more uneasiness has arisen than you are aware of. I am myself, at this instant, in a state of inexpressible embarrassment; Miss Sterling, I know, is extremely disconcerted too; and unless you will oblige me with the assistance of your friendship, I foresee the speedy progress of discontent and animosity through the whole family.

Ster. What the deuce is all this? I don't understand a single syllable.

Sir J. In one word, then, it will be absolutely impossible for me to fulfil my engagements in regard to Miss Sterling.

Ster. How, Sir John? Do you mean to put an affront upon my family? What! refuse to—

Sir J. Be assured, sir, that I neither mean to affront nor forsake your family. My only fear is that you should desert me; for the whole happiness of my life depends on my being connected with your family, by the nearest and tenderest ties in the world.

Ster. Why, did you not tell me, but a moment ago, that it was absolutely impossible for you to marry my daughter?

Sir J. True. But you have another daughter, sir.

Ster. Well!

Sir J. Who has obtained the most absolute dominion over my heart. I have already declared my passion to her; nay, Miss Sterling herself is also apprised of it; and if you will but give a sanction to my present addresses, the uncommon merit of Miss Sterling will no doubt recommend her to a person of equal, if not superior rank to myself, and our families may still be allied by my union with Miss Fanny.

Ster. Mighty fine, truly! Why what the plague do you make of us, Sir John? Do you come to market for my daughters, like servants at a statute-fair? Do you think that I will suffer you, or any man in the world, to come into my house, like the grand seignior, and throw the handkerchief first to one, and then to t'other, just as he pleases? Do you think I drive a kind of African slave-trade with them, and—

Sir J. A moment's patience, sir. Nothing but the excess of my passion for Miss Fanny should have induced me to take any step that had the least appearance of disrespect to any part of your family; and even now I am desirous to atone for my transgression, by making the most adequate compensation that lies in my power.

Ster. Compensation! what compensation can you possibly make in such a case as this, Sir John?

Sir J. Come, come, Mr. Sterling; I know you to be a man of sense, a man of business, a man of the world. I'll deal frankly with you; and you shall see that I don't desire a change of measures for my own gratification, without endeavouring to make it advantageous to you.

Ster. What advantage can your inconstancy be to me, Sir John?

Sir J. I'll tell you, sir. You know that by the articles at present subsisting between us, on the day of my marriage with Miss Sterling, you agree to pay down the gross sum of eighty thousand pounds.

Ster. Well!

Sir J. Now, if you will but consent to my waiving that marriage—

Ster. I agree to your waiving that marriage? Impossible, Sir John!

Sir J. I hope not, sir; as, on my part, I will agree to waive my right to thirty thousand pounds of the fortune I was to receive with her.

Ster. Thirty thousand, d'ye say?

Sir J. Yes, sir; and accept of Miss Fanny with fifty thousand, instead of fourscore.

Ster. Fifty thousand—

[Pausing.]

Sir J. Instead of fourscore.

Ster. Why, why, there may be something in that. Let me see. Fanny with fifty thousand, instead of Betsy with fourscore. But how can this be, Sir John? for you know I am to pay this money into the hands of my Lord Ogleby, who, I believe, between you and me, Sir John, is not overstocked with ready money at present; and threescore thousand of it, you know, is to go to pay off the present encumbrances on the estate, Sir John.

Sir J. That objection is easily obviated. Ten of the twenty thousand, which would remain as a surplus of the fourscore, after paying off the mortgage, was intended by his lordship for my use, that we might set off with some little eclat on our marriage; and the other ten for his own. Ten thousand pounds, therefore, I shall be able to pay you immediately; and for the remaining twenty thousand, you shall have a mortgage on that part of the estate which is to be made over to me, with whatever security you shall require for the regular payment of the interest, till the principal is duly discharged.

Ster. Why, to do you justice, Sir John, there is something fair and open in your proposal; and since I find you do not mean to put an affront upon the family—

Sir J. Nothing was ever further from my thoughts, Mr. Sterling. And after all, the whole affair is nothing extraordinary; such things happen every day; and as the world has only heard generally of a treaty between the families, when this marriage takes place, nobody will be the wiser, if we have but discretion enough to keep our own counsel.

Ster. True, true; and since you only transfer from one girl to the other, it is no more than transferring so much stock, you know.

Sir J. The very thing!

Ster. Odso! I had quite forgot. We are reckoning without our host here. There is another difficulty.

Sir J. You alarm me. What can that be?

Ster. I can't stir a step in this business without consulting my sister Heidelberg. The family has very great expectations from her, and we must not give her any offence.

Sir J. But if you come into this measure, surely she will be so kind as to consent.

Ster. I don't know that; Betsy is her darling, and I can't tell how far she may resent any slight that seems to be offered to her favourite niece. However, I'll do the best I can for you. You shall go and break the matter to her first; and by that time I may suppose that your rhetoric has prevailed on her to listen to reason, I will step in to reinforce your arguments.

Sir J. I'll fly to her immediately. You promise me your assistance?

Ster. I do.

Sir J. Ten thousand thanks for it! And now, success attend me! [Going.]

Ster. Harkye, Sir John! [Sir J. returns.] Not a word of the thirty thousand to my sister, Sir John.

Sir J. O, I am dumb, I am dumb, sir. [Going.]

Ster. You'll remember it is thirty thousand?

Sir J. To be sure I do.

Ster. But, Sir John! one thing more. [Sir J. returns.] My lord must know nothing of this stroke of friendship between us.

Sir J. Not for the world. Let me alone! let me alone! [Offering to go.]

Ster. [Holding him.] And when everything is agreed, we must give each other a bond to be held fast to the bargain.

Sir J. To be sure. A bond, by all means; a bond, or whatever you please. [Exit hastily.]

Ster. I should have thought of more conditions. He's in a humour to give me everything. Why, what mere children are your fellows of quality, that cry for a plaything one minute, and throw it by the next! As changeable as the weather, and as uncertain as the stocks. Special fellows to drive a bargain! and yet they are to take care of the interest of the nation, truly! Here does this whirligig man of fashion offer to give up thirty thousand pounds in hard money, with as much indifference as if it were a China orange. By this mortgage, I shall have a hold on his terra firma; and if he wants more money, as he certainly will, let him have children by my daughter or no, I shall have his whole estate in a net for the benefit of my family. Well, thus it is, that the children of citizens who have acquired fortunes, prove persons of fashion; and thus it is, that persons of fashion, who have ruined their fortunes, reduce the next generation to cits. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Another Apartment.

Enter Mrs. HEIDELBERG and Miss STERLING.

Miss S. This is your gentle-looking, soft-speaking, sweet-smiling, affable Miss Fanny, for you!

Mrs. H. My Miss Fanny! I disclaim her. With all her arts, she never could insinuate herself into my good graces; and yet she has a way with her, that deceives man, woman, and child, except you and me, niece.

Miss S. O, ay; she wants nothing but a crook in her hand, and a lamb under her arm, to be a perfect picture of innocence and simplicity.

Mrs. H. Just as I was drawn at Amsterdam, when I went over to visit my husband's relations.

Miss S. And then she's so mighty good to servants.—“Pray, John, do this; pray, Thomas, do that: thank you, Jenny;”—and then so humble to her relations.—“To be sure, papa;—as my aunt pleases;—my sister knows best.” But with all her demureness and humility, she has no objection to be Lady Melvil, it seems, nor to any wickedness that can make her so.

Mrs. H. She Lady Melvil! Compose yourself, niece. I'll ladyship her, indeed: a little creppin, cantin—She sha'nt be the better for a farden of my money. But tell me, child, how does this intriguing with Sir John correspond with her partiality to Lovewell? I don't see a concatenation here.

Miss S. There I was deceived, madam. I took all their whisperings and stealings into corners, to be the mere attraction of vulgar minds; but behold! their private meetings were not to contrive their own insipid happiness, but to conspire against mine. But I know whence proceeds Mr. Lovewell's resentment to me. I could not stoop to be familiar with my father's clerk, and so I have lost his interest.

Mrs. H. My spurit to a T. My dear child! [Kisses her.] Mr. Heidelberg lost his election for member of parliament, because I would not demean myself to be slabbared about by drunken shoemakers, beastly cheesemongers, and tallow-chandlers. However, niece, I can't help diffuring a little in opinion from you in this matter. My expurience and sagucity makes me still suspect that there is something more between her and that Lovewell, notwithstanding this affair of Sir John. I had my eye upon them the whole time of breakfast. Sir John, I observed, looked a little confounded, indeed, though I knew nothing of what had passed in the garden. You seemed to sit upon thorns too; but Fanny and Mr. Lovewell made quite another-guess sort of a figur! and were as perfect a pictur of two distressed lovers as if it had been drawn by Raphael Angelo. As to Sir John and Fanny, I want a matter-of-fact.

Miss S. Matter-of-fact, madam! Did not I come unexpectedly upon them? Was not Sir John kneeling at her feet, and kissing her hand? Did not he look all love, and she all confusion? Is not that matter-of-fact? And did not Sir John, the moment that papa was called out of the room to the lawyer-men, get up from breakfast, and follow him immediately? And I warrant you that by this time he has made proposals to him to marry my sister. Oh, that some other person, an earl or a duke, would make his addresses to me, that I might be revenged on this monster!

Mrs. H. Be cool, child. You shall be Lady Melvil, in spite of all their caballins, if it costs me ten thousand pounds to turn the scale. Sir John may apply to my brother indeed; but I'll make them all know who governs in this fammally.

Miss S. As I live, madam, yonder comes Sir John. A base man! I can't endure the sight of him. I'll leave the room this instant. [Disordered.]

Mrs. H. Poor thing! Well, retire to your own chamber, child. I'll give it him, I warrant you; and by-and-by I'll come and let you know all that has past between us.

Miss S. Pray do, madam. [Looking back.] A vile wretch! [Exit in a rage.]

Enter Sir JOHN MELVIL.

Sir J. Your most obedient humble servant, madam. [Bowing very respectfully.]

Mrs. H. Your servant, Sir John.

[Dropping a half curtsy and pouting.]

Sir J. Miss Sterling's manner of quitting the room on my approach, and the visible coolness of your behaviour to me, madam, convince me that she has acquainted you with what passed this morning.

Mrs. H. I am very sorry, Sir John, to be made acquainted with anything that should induce me to change the opinion which I would always wish to entertain of a person of quality.

[Pouting.]

Sir J. It has always been my ambition to merit the best opinion from Mrs. Heidelberg; and when she comes to weigh circumstances, I flatter myself—

Mrs. H. You do flatter yourself, if you imagine that I can approve of your behaviour to my niece, Sir John. And give me leave to tell you, Sir John, that you have been drawn into an action much beneath you, Sir John; and that I look upon every injury offered to Miss Betty Sterling, as an affront to myself, Sir John.

[Warmly.]

Sir J. I would not offend you for the world, madam; but when I am influenced by a partiality for another, however ill-founded, I hope your discernment and good sense will think it rather a point of honour to renounce engagements which I could not fulfil so strictly as I ought; and that you will excuse the change in my inclinations, since the new object, as well as the first, has the honour of being your niece, madam.

Mrs. H. I disclaim her as a niece, Sir John; Miss Sterling disclaims her as a sister; and the whole family must disclaim her, for her monstrous baseness and treachery.

Sir J. Indeed she has been guilty of none, madam. Her hand and her heart are, I am sure, entirely at the disposal of yourself and Mr. Sterling. And if you should not oppose my inclinations, I am sure of Mr. Sterling's consent, madam.

Mrs. H. Indeed?

Sir J. Quite certain, madam.

Enter STERLING unperceived.

Ster. [Behind.] So! they seem to be coming to terms already. I may venture to make my appearance.

[Sterling advances by degrees.]

Mrs. H. To marry Fanny?

Sir J. Yes, madam.

Mrs. H. My brother has given his consent, you say?

Sir J. In the most ample manner, with no other restriction than the failure of your concurrence, madam. [Sees Sterling.] Oh, here's Mr. Sterling, who will confirm what I have told you.

Mrs. H. What, have you consented to give up your eldest daughter in this manner, brother?

Ster. Give her up? heaven forbid! No, not give her up, sister; only in case that you—Zounds! I am afraid you have said too much, Sir John.

[Apart to Sir J.]

Mrs. H. Yes, yes; I see now that it is true enough what my niece told me. You are all plotting and caballing against her. Pray, does Lord Ogleby know of this affair?

Sir J. I have not yet made him acquainted with it, madam.

Mrs. H. No, I warrant you. I thought so. And so his lordship and myself, truly, are not to be consulted till the last!

Ster. What! did not you consult my lord? Oh, fie for shame, Sir John!

Sir J. Nay, but Mr. Sterling—

Mrs. H. We, who are the persons of most consequence and experience in the two families, are to know nothing of the matter, till the whole is as good as concluded upon. But his lordship, I am sure, will have more generosity than to countenance such a proceeding. And I could not have expected such behaviour from a person of your quality, Sir John. And as for you, brother—

Ster. Nay, nay, but hear me, sister.

Mrs. H. I am perfectly ashamed of you. Have you no spurrit? no more concern for the honour of our family than to consent—

Ster. Consent! I consent! As I hope for mercy, I never gave my consent. Did I consent, Sir John?

Sir J. Not absolutely, without Mrs. Heidelberg's concurrence. But in case of her approbation—

Ster. Ay, in case, I grant you; that is, if my sister approved. But that's quite another thing, you know.

[To Mrs. H.]

Mrs. H. Your sister approve, indeed! I thought you knew her better, brother Sterling. What! approve of having your eldest daughter returned upon your hands, and exchanged for the younger? I am surprised how you could listen to such a scandalous proposal.

Ster. I tell you, I never did listen to it. Did not I say that I would be entirely governed by my sister, Sir John? And unless she agreed to your marrying Fanny—

Mrs. H. I agree to his marrying Fanny!—abominable! The man is absolutely out of his senses. Can't that wise head of your's foresee the consequence of all this, brother Sterling? Will Sir John take Fanny without a fortune? No! After you have settled the largest part of your property on your youngest daughter, can there be an equal portion left for the eldest? No! Does not this overturn the whole system of the family? Yes, yes, yes!

Ster. Do you see now what you've done? Don't betray, me, Sir John.

[Apart to Sir J.]

Mrs. H. You know I was always for my niece Betsy's marrying a person of the very first quality. That was my maxum; and, therefore, much the largest settlement was of course to be made upon her. As for Fanny, if she could, with a fortune of twenty or thirty thousand pounds, get a knight, or a member of parliament, or a rich common councilman, for a husband, I thought it might do very well.

Sir J. But if a better match should offer itself, why should it not be accepted, madam?

Mrs. H. What! at the expense of her elder sister? O fie, Sir John! How could you bear to hear such an indignity, brother Sterling?

Ster. I! Nay, I sha'n't hear of it, I promise you. I can't hear of it, indeed, Sir John.

Mrs. H. But you have heard of it, brother Sterling; you know you have, and sent Sir John to propose it to me. But if you can give up your daughter, I sha'n't forsake my niece, I assure you. Ah! if my poor dear Mr. Heidelberg, and our sweet babes had been alive, he would not have behaved so.

Ster. Did I, Sir John? Nay, speak! Bring me off, or we are ruined.

[Apart to Sir J.]

Sir J. Why, to be sure, to speak the truth—

Mrs. H. To speak the truth!—To speak the truth, I'm ashamed of you both. But have a care what you are about, brother! have a care, I say. The counsellors are in the house, I hear; and if everything is not settled to my liking, I'll have nothing more to say to you, if I live these hundred years. I'll go over to Holland, and settle with Mr. Vanderspraken, my poor husband's first cousin, and my own family shall never be the better for a farden of my money, I promise you.

[Exit.]

Ster. I thought so. I knew she would never agree to it.

Sir J. 'Sdeath, how unfortunate! What can we do, Mr. Sterling?

Ster. Nothing.

Sir J. What, must our agreement break off the moment it is made, then?

Ster. It can't be helped, Sir John. The family, as I told you before, have great expectations from my sister; and if this matter proceeds, you hear yourself, that she threatens to leave us. My brother Heidelberg was a warm man—a very warm man, and died worth a plum at least. A plum! ay, I warrant you, he died worth a plum and a half.

Sir J. Well; but if I—

Ster. And then, my sister has three or four very good mortgages, a deal of money in the three percents., and old South Sea annuities, besides large concerns in the Dutch and French funds. The greatest part of all this she means to leave to our family.

Sir J. I can only say, sir—

Ster. Why, your offer of the difference of thirty thousand was very fair and handsome, to be sure, Sir John.

Sir J. Nay, but I am willing to—

Ster. Ay, but if I was to accept it against her will, I might lose above a hundred thousand; so you see the balance is against you, Sir John.

Sir J. Suppose I was to prevail on Lord Ogleby to apply to her, do you think that would have any influence over her?

Ster. I think he would be more likely to persuade her to it than any other person in the family. She has a great respect for Lord Ogleby. She loves a lord.

Sir J. I'll apply to him this very day. And if he should prevail on Mrs. Heidelberg, I may depend on your friendship, Mr. Sterling?

Ster. Ay, ay, I shall be glad to oblige you, when it is in my power; but as the account stands now, you see it is not upon the figures. And so your servant, Sir John. [Exit.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Room.

Enter MR. STERLING, MRS. HEIDELBERG, and MISS STERLING.

Ster. What, will you send Fanny to town, sister?

Mrs. H. To-morrow morning: I've given orders about it already.

Ster. Indeed!

Mrs. H. Positively.

Ster. But consider, sister, at such a time as this, what an odd appearance it will have.

Mrs. H. Not half so odd as her behaviour, brother. This time was intended for happiness, and I'll keep no incendiaries here to destroy it. I insist on her going off to-morrow morning.

Ster. I'm afraid this is all your doing, Betsy?

Miss S. No, indeed, papa. My aunt knows that it is not. For all Fanny's baseness to me, I am sure I would not do or say anything to hurt her with you or my aunt, for the world.

Mrs. H. Hold your tongue, Betsy; I will have my way. When she is packed off, everything will go on as it should do. Since they are at their intrigues, I'll let them see that we can act with vigour on our part; and the sending her out of the way, shall be the purluminary step to all the rest of my proceedings.

Ster. Well, but sister—

Mrs. H. It does not signify talking, brother Sterling, for I'm resolved to be rid of her, and I will. Come along, child. [To Miss S.] The postshay shall be at the door by six o'clock in the morning; and if Miss Fanny does not get into it, why I will; and so there's an end of the matter. [Bounces out with Miss Sterling, then returns.] One word more, brother Sterling. I expect that you will take your eldest daughter in your hand, and make a formal complaint to Lord Ogleby of Sir John Melvil's behaviour. Do this, brother; show a proper regard for the honour of your fammaly yourself, and I shall throw in my mite to the raising of it. If not—but now you know my mind: so act as you please, and take the consequences. [Exit.

Ster. The devil's in the women for tyranny!—Mothers, wives, mistresses, or sisters, they always will govern us. As to my sister Heidelberg, she knows the strength of her purse, and domineers upon the credit of it.—“I will do this,” and “you shall do that;” and “you shall do t'other, or else the fammaly sha'n't have a farden of it.” [Mimicking.] So absolute with her money! But to say the truth, nothing but money can make us absolute, and so we must e'en make the best of her. [Exit.

SCENE II.—The Garden.

Enter LORD OGLEBY and CANTON.

Lord O. What! Mademoiselle Fanny to be sent away? Why? Wherefore? What's the meaning of all this?

Can. Je ne sçais pas; I know nothing of it.

Lord O. It can't be: it sha'n't be:—I protest against the measure. She's a fine girl, and I had much rather that the rest of the family were annihilated, than that she should leave us. Her vulgar father, that's the very abstract of Change-alley; the aunt, that's always endeavouring to be a fine lady; and the pert sister, for ever shewing that she is one, are horrid company indeed, and without her would be intolerable. Ah, la petite Fanchon! she's the thing: isn't she, Canton?

Can. Dere is very good sympathie entre vous and dat young lady, my lor.

Lord O. I'll not be left among these Goths and Vandals; your Sterlings, your Heidelbergs, and Devilbergs: if she goes, I'll positively go too.

Can. In de same post-chay, my lor? You have no objection to dat, I believe, nor mademoiselle neither too—Ha, ha, ha!

Lord O. Pr'ythee hold thy foolish tongue, Canton. Does thy Swiss stupidity imagine that I can see and talk with a fine girl without desires? My eyes are involuntarily attracted by beautiful objects. I fly as naturally to a fine girl!

Can. As de fine girl to you, mi lor, ha, ha, ha! you always fly togedre, like un pair de pigeons—

Lord O. Like un pair de pigeons. [Mocks him.] Vous êtes un sot, Monsieur Canton. Thou art always dreaming of my intrigues, and never see'st me badiner, but you suspect mischief, you old fool, you.

Can. I am fool, I confess, but not always fool in dat, mi lor; he, he, he!

Lord O. He, he, he! Thou art incorrigible, but thy absurdities amuse one. Thou art like my rappee, here, [takes out his box.] a most ridiculous superfluity; but a pinch of thee now and then is a most delicious treat.

Can. You do me great honneur, mi lor

Lord O. 'Tis fact, upon my soul. Thou art properly my cephalic snuff, and art no bad medicine against megrims, vertigoes, and profound thinking—ha, ha, ha!

Can. Your flatterie, mi lor, vil make me too prone.

Lord O. The girl has some little partiality for me, to be sure; but pr'ythee, Cant, is not that Miss Fanny yonder?

Can. [Looks with a glass.] Ah—la voila! En verité, 'tis she, mi lor—'tis one of de pigeons—de pigeons d'amour.

Lord O. Don't be ridiculous, you old monkey.

Can. I am monkee. I am ole; but I have eye, I have ear, and a little understand, now and den.

Lord O. Taisez vous, bête.

Can. Elle vous attend, my lor.—She vil make a love to you.

Lord O. Will she? Have at her then! A fine girl can't oblige me more. 'Egad, I find myself a little enjoué. Come along, Cant.; she is but in the next walk; but there is such a deal of this d—d crinkum-crankum, as Sterling calls it, that one sees people for half an hour before one can get to them. Allons! Monsieur Canton, allons! donc.

[Exeunt singing in French.]

SCENE III.—Another part of the Garden.

Enter LOVEWELL and FANNY.

Love. My dear Fanny, I cannot bear your distress; it overcomes all my resolutions, and I am prepared for the discovery.

Fan. But how can it be effected before my departure?

Love. I'll tell you.—Lord Ogleby seems to entertain a visible partiality for you; and, notwithstanding the peculiarities of his behaviour, I am sure that he is humane at the bottom. He is vain to an excess; but withal extremely good-natured, and would do anything to recommend himself to a lady. Do you open the whole affair of our marriage to him immediately. It will come with more irresistible persuasion from you than from myself; and I doubt not but you'll gain his friendship and protection at once. His influence and authority will put an end to Sir John's solicitations, remove your aunt's and sister's unkindness and suspicions, and, I hope, reconcile your father and the whole family to our marriage.

Fan. Heaven grant it! Where is my lord?

Love. I have heard him and Canton, since dinner, singing French songs under the great walnut-tree, by the parlour-door. If you meet with him in the garden, you may disclose the whole immediately. To-morrow morning is fixed for your departure, and if we lose this opportunity, we may wish in vain for another. He approaches: I must retire. Speak, my dear Fanny, speak, and make us happy! [Exit.]

Fan. What shall I do? What shall I say to him? I am all confusion.

Enter Lord OGLEBY and CANTON.

Lord O. To see so much beauty so solitary, madam, is a satire upon mankind; and it is fortunate that one man has broken in upon your reverie for the credit of our sex. I say one, madam; for poor Canton here, from age and infirmities, stands for nothing.

Can. Noting at all, indeed.

Fan. Your lordship does me great honour. I have a favour to request, my lord.

Lord O. A favour, madam? To be honoured with your commands is an inexpressible favour done to me, madam.

Fan. If your lordship could indulge me with the honour of a moment's—What's the matter with me?

[Aside.]

Lord O. The girl's confused—Hey!—here's something in the wind, faith. I'll have a tête-à-tête with her. [Aside.] Allez-vous-en.

[To CANTON.]

Can. I go.—Ah, pauvre mademoiselle! Mi lor, have pitié upon the poor pigeon.

[Apart to Lord OGLEBY.]

Lord O. I'll knock you down, Cant. [Smiles.]

Can. Den I go. [Shuffles along] You are mosh please, for all dat.

[Aside.—Exit.]

Fan. I shall sink with apprehension.

[Aside.]

Lord O. What a sweet girl!—she's a civilized being, and atones for the barbarism of the rest of the family.

[Aside.]

Fan. My lord, I— [Courtseys and blushes.]

Lord O. I look upon it, madam, to be one of the luckiest circumstances of my life, that I have, at this moment, the honour of receiving your commands, and the satisfaction of confirming with my tongue, what my eyes, perhaps, have but too weakly expressed—that I am literally the humblest of your servants.

Fan. I think myself greatly honoured by your lordship's partiality to me; but it distresses me that I am obliged, in my present situation, to apply to it for protection.

Lord O. I am happy in your distress, madam, because it gives me an opportunity to shew my zeal. Beauty, to me, is a religion, in which I was born and bred a bigot, and would die a martyr. I'm in tolerable spirits, faith!

[Aside.]

Fan. There is not, perhaps, at this moment, a more distressed creature than myself. Affection, duty, hope, despair, and a thousand different sentiments, are struggling in my bosom; and even the presence of your lordship, to whom I have flown for protection, adds to my perplexity.

Lord O. Does it, madam? Venus forbid!—My old fault; the devil's in me, I think, for perplexing young women. [Aside, and smiling.] Take courage, madam! dear Miss Fanny, explain. You have a powerful advocate in my breast, I assure you. My heart, madam—I am attached to you by all the laws of sympathy and delicacy—by my honour, I am.

Fan. Then I will venture to unburthen my mind—Sir John Melvil, my lord, by his most misplaced and mistimed declaration of affection for me, has made me the unhappiest of women.

Lord O. How, madam? Has Sir John made his addresses to you?

Fan. He has, my lord, in the strongest terms. But I hope it is needless to say that my duty to my father, love to my sister, and regard to the whole family, as well as the great respect I entertain for your lordship,—[Courtseys.]—made me shudder at his addresses.

Lord O. Charming girl! Proceed, my dear Miss Fanny, proceed.

Fan. In a moment—give me leave, my lord:—But if what I have to disclose should be received with anger or displeasure—

Lord O. Impossible! by all the tender powers! Speak, I beseech you, or I shall divine the cause before you utter it.

Fan. Then, my lord, Sir John's addresses are not only shocking to me in themselves, but are more particularly disagreeable to me at this time—as—

[Hesitates.]

Lord O. As what, madam?

Fan. As—pardon my confusion—I am entirely devoted to another.

Lord O. If this is not plain, the devil's in it!—[Aside.] But tell me, my dear Miss Fanny, for I must know; tell me the how, the when, and the where. Tell me—

Re-enter CANTON, hastily.

Can. Mi lor, mi lor, mi lor!

Lord O. D—n your Swiss impertinence! how durst you interrupt me in the most critical, melting moment that ever love and beauty honoured me with?

Can. I demand pardon, mi lor; Sir John Melvil, mi lor, sent me to beg you do him de honneur to speak a little to you, mi lor.

Lord O. I'm not at leisure; I am busy. Get away, you stupid old dog, you Swiss rascal, or I'll—

Can. Fort bien, mi lor.

[Goes out on tiptoe.]

Lord O. By the laws of gallantry, madam, this interruption should be death; but as no punishment ought to disturb the triumph of the softer passions, the criminal is pardoned and dismissed. Let us return, madam, to the highest luxury of exalted minds—a declaration of love from the lips of beauty.

Fan. The entrance of a third person has a little relieved me, but I cannot go through with it; and yet I must open my heart with a discovery, or it will break with its burthen.

[Aside.]

Lord O. What passion in her eyes! I am alarmed to agitation: [Aside.] I presumed, madam, (and as you have flattered me, by making me a party concerned, I hope you'll excuse the presumption) that—

Fan. Do you excuse my making you a party concerned, my lord, and let me interest your heart in my behalf, as my future happiness or misery in a great measure depend—

Lord O. Upon me, madam?

Fan. Upon you, my lord.

[Sighs.]

Lord O. There's no standing this: I have caught the infection; her tenderness dissolves me.

[Sighs.]

Fan. And should you too severely judge of a rash action which passion prompted, and modesty has long concealed—

Lord O. [Takes her hand.] Thou amiable creature! command my heart, for it is vanquished. Speak but thy virtuous wishes, and enjoy them.

Fan. I cannot, my lord; indeed, I cannot. Mr. Lovewell must tell you my distresses; and when you know them, pity and protect me.

[Exit in tears.]

Lord O. How the devil could I bring her to this? It is too much—too much; I can't bear it: I must give way to this amiable weakness. [Wipes his eyes.] My heart overflows with sympathy, and I feel every tenderness I have inspired. [Stifles a tear.] Can I be a man and withstand it? No; I'll sacrifice the whole sex to her. But here comes the father, quite apropos. I'll open the matter immediately, settle the business with him, and take the sweet girl down to Ogleby-house to-morrow morning. But what the devil! Miss Sterling too!—What mischief's in the wind now? no conquest there: no, no, that would be too much desolation in the family.

Enter STERLING and Miss STERLING.

Ster. My lord, your servant: I am attending my daughter here upon rather a disagreeable affair. Speak to his lordship, Betsy.

Lord O. Your eyes, Miss Sterling, for I always read the eyes of a young lady, betray some little emotion. What are your commands, madam?

Miss S. I have but too much cause for my emotion, my lord.

Lord O. I cannot commend my kinsman's behaviour, madam. He has behaved like a false knight, I must confess. I have heard of his apostasy.—Miss Fanny has informed me of it.

Miss S. Miss Fanny's baseness has been the cause of Sir John's inconstancy.

Lord O. Nay now, my dear Miss Sterling, your passion transports you too far. Sir John may have entertained a passion for Miss Fanny; but believe me, my dear Miss Sterling, believe me, Miss Fanny has no passion for Sir John. She has a passion, indeed, a most tender passion. She has opened her whole soul to me, and I know where her affections are placed.

[Conceitedly.]

Miss S. Not upon Mr. Lovewell, my lord.

Lord O. Lovewell! no, poor lad! she does not think of him. [Smiles.] I know better: however, a little time will solve all mysteries.

Miss S. Have a care, my lord, that both the families are not made the dupes of Sir John's artifice, and my sister's dissimulation. You don't know her; indeed, my lord, you don't know her; a base, insinuating, perfidious—It is too much! She has been before-hand with me, I perceive, endeavouring to prejudice your lordship in her favour; and I am to be laughed at by everybody. Such unnatural behaviour to me! But since I see I can have no redress, I am resolved that, some way or other, I will have revenge.

[Exit.]

Ster. This is foolish work, my lord.

Lord O. I have too much sensibility to bear the tears of beauty.

Ster. It is touching indeed, my lord; and very moving for a father.

Lord O. To be sure, sir: you, with your exquisite feelings, must be distressed beyond measure. Wherefore, to divert your too exquisite feeling, suppose we change the subject, and proceed to business.

Ster. With all my heart, my lord.

Lord O. You see, Mr. Sterling, we can make no union in our families by the proposed marriage.

Ster. And I am very sorry to see it, my lord.

Lord O. Have you set your heart upon being allied to our house, Mr. Sterling?

Ster. 'Tis my only wish, at present, my omnium, as I may call it.

Lord O. Your wishes shall be fulfilled.

Ster. Shall they, my lord? but how—how?

Lord O. I'll marry in your family.

Ster. What! my sister Heidelberg?

Lord O. You throw me into a cold sweat, Mr. Sterling. No; not your sister, but your daughter.

Ster. My daughter!

Lord O. Fanny: now the murder's out.

Ster. What! you, my lord?

Lord O. Yes; I, I, Mr. Sterling.

Ster. No, no, my lord; that's too much. [Smiles.]

Lord O. Too much! I don't comprehend you.

Ster. What you, my lord, marry my Fanny! Bless me! what will the folks say?

Lord O. Why, what will they say?

Ster. That you are a bold man, my lord; that's all. Lord O. Mr. Sterling, this may be city wit, for aught I know. Do you court my alliance?

Ster. To be sure, my lord.

Lord O. Then I'll explain. My nephew won't marry your eldest daughter, nor I neither. Your youngest daughter won't marry him: I will marry your youngest daughter.

Ster. What! with a youngest daughter's fortune, my lord?

Lord O. With any fortune, or no fortune at all, sir. Love is the idol of my heart, and the demon, interest, sinks before him. So, sir, as I said before, I will marry your youngest daughter; your youngest daughter will marry me.

Ster. Who told you so, my lord?

Lord O. Her own sweet self, sir.

Ster. Indeed!

Lord O. Yes, sir; our affection is mutual—your advantage double and treble: your daughter will be a countess directly, I shall be the happiest of beings, and you'll be father to an earl instead of a baronet.

Ster. But what will my sister say? and my daughter?

Lord O. I'll manage that matter; nay, if they won't consent, I'll run away with your daughter in spite of you.

Ster. Well said, my lord! your spirit's good; I wish you had my constitution; but if you'll venture, I have no objection, if my sister has none.

Lord O. I'll answer for your sister, sir. Apropos—the lawyers are in the house; I'll have articles drawn, and the whole affair concluded to-morrow morning.

Ster. Very well; and I'll despatch Lovewell to London immediately for some fresh papers I shall want: you must excuse me, my lord, but I can't help laughing at the match.—He, he, he! what will the folks say? [Exit.]

Lord O. What a fellow am I going to make a father of! He has no more feeling than the post in his warehouse. But Fanny's virtues tune me to rapture again, and I won't think of the rest of the family.

Re-enter LOVEWELL, hastily.

Love. I beg your lordship's pardon; are you alone, my lord?

Lord O. No, my lord, I am not alone; I am in company—the best company.

Love. My lord!

Lord O. I never was in such exquisite, enchanting company, since my heart first conceived, or my senses tasted pleasure.

Love. Where are they, my lord? [Looks about.]

Lord O. "In my mind's eye, Horatio."

Love. What company have you there, my lord?

Lord O. My own ideas, sir, which so crowd upon my imagination, and kindle in it such a delirium of ecstasy, that wit, wine, music, poetry, all combined, and each in perfection, are but mere mortal shadows of my felicity.

Love. I see that your lordship is happy, and I rejoice at it.

Lord O. You shall rejoice at it, sir: my felicity shall not selfishly be confined, but shall spread its influence to the whole circle of my friends. I need not say, Lovewell, that you shall have your share of it.

Love. Shall I, my lord? then I understand you;—you have heard;—Miss Fanny has informed you—

Lord O. She has; I have heard, and she shall be happy: 'tis determined.

Love. Then I have reached the summit of my wishes. And will your lordship pardon the folly?

Lord O. O yes: poor creature, how could she help it? 'Twas unavoidable—fate and necessity.

Love. It was indeed, my lord. Your kindness distracts me.

Lord O. And so it did the poor girl, faith!

ACT. DRAMA.—NOS. 89 & 90.

Love. She trembled to disclose the secret, and declare her affections?

Lord O. The world, I believe, will not think her affections ill placed.

Love. [Bows.] You are too good, my lord.—And do you really excuse the rashness of the action?

Lord O. From my very soul, Lovewell.

Love. [Bows.] I was afraid of her meeting with a cold reception.

Lord O. More fool you then—

*Who pleads her cause with never-failing beauty,
Here finds a full redress.* [Strikes his breast.]

She's a fine girl, Lovewell.

Love. Her beauty, my lord, is the least merit. She has an understanding—

Lord O. Her choice convinces me of that.

Love. [Bows.] That's your lordship's goodness. Her choice was a disinterested one.

Lord O. No, no, not altogether; it began with interest, and ended in passion.

Love. Indeed, my lord, if you were acquainted with her goodness of heart, and generosity of mind, as well as you are with the inferior beauties of her face and person—

Lord O. I am so perfectly convinced of their existence, and so totally of your mind, touching every amiable particular of that sweet girl, that, were it not for the cold, unfeeling impediments of the law, I would marry her to-morrow morning.

Love. My lord!

Lord O. I would, by all that's honourable in man, and amiable in woman!

Love. Marry her! Who do you mean, my lord?

Lord O. Miss Fanny Sterling, that is; the Countess of Ogleby, that shall be.

Love. I am astonished!

Lord O. Why, could you expect less from me?

Love. I did not expect this, my lord.

Lord O. Trade and accounts have destroyed your feeling.

Love. No, indeed, my lord. [Sighs.]

Lord O. The moment that love and pity entered my breast, I was resolved to plunge into matrimony, and shorten the girl's tortures. I never do anything by halves, do I, Lovewell?

Love. No, indeed, my lord. [Sighs.] What an accident!

Lord O. What's the matter, Lovewell? thou seem'st to have lost thy faculties. Why don't you wish me joy, man?

Love. O, I do, my lord. [Sighs.]

Lord O. She said that you would explain what she had not power to utter; but I wanted no interpreter for the language of love.

Love. But has your lordship considered the consequences of your resolution?

Lord O. No, sir, I am above consideration, when my desires are kindled.

Love. But consider the consequences, my lord, to your nephew, Sir John.

Lord O. Sir John has considered no consequences himself, Mr. Lovewell.

Love. Mr. Sterling, my lord, will certainly refuse his daughter to Sir John.

Lord O. Sir John has already refused Mr. Sterling's daughter.

Love. But what will become of Miss Sterling, my lord?

Lord O. What's that to you? You may have her, if you will. I depend upon Mr. Sterling's city philosophy to be reconciled to Lord Ogleby's being his son-in-law, instead of Sir John Melvil, baronet. Don't you think that your master may be brought so that, without having recourse to his calculations, eh, Lovewell?

Love. But my lord, that is not the question.

Lord O. Whatever is the question, I'll tell you my answer. I am in love with a fine girl, whom I resolve to marry.

Enter Sir JOHN MELVIL.

What news with you, Sir John? You look all hurry and impatience, like a messenger after a battle.

Sir J. After a battle indeed, my lord. I have this day had a severe engagement; and, wanting your lordship as an auxiliary, I have at last mustered up resolution to declare, what my duty to you and to myself have demanded from me some time.

Lord O. To the business then, and be as concise as possible, for I am upon the wing; eh, Lovewell?

[Smiles, and LOVEWELL bows.]

Sir J. I find 'tis in vain, my lord, to struggle against the force of inclination.

Lord O. Very true, nephew; I am your witness, and will second the motion—sha'n't I, Lovewell?

[Smiles, and LOVEWELL bows.]

Sir J. Your lordship's generosity encourages me to tell you that I cannot marry Miss Sterling.

Lord O. I am not at all surprised at it; she's a bitter potion, that's the truth of it; but, as you were to swallow it and not I, it was your business, not mine.—Anything more?

Sir J. But this, my lord; that I may be permitted to make my addresses to the other sister.

Lord O. O yes, by all means; have you any hopes there, nephew? Do you think he'll succeed, Lovewell?

[Smiles, and winks at LOVEWELL.]

Love. I think not, my lord. [Gravely.]

Lord O. I think so too; but let the fool try.

Sir J. Will your lordship favour me with your good offices to remove the chief obstacle to the match, the repugnance of Mrs. Heidelberg?

Lord O. Mrs. Heidelberg? Had not you better begin with the young lady first? It will save you a great deal of trouble; won't it, Lovewell? [Smiles.] But do what you please, it will be the same thing to me—won't it, Lovewell? [Conceitedly.] Why don't you laugh at him?

Love. I do, my lord. [Forces a smile.]

Sir J. And your lordship will endeavour to prevail on Mrs. Heidelberg to consent to my marriage with Miss Fanny?

Lord O. I'll speak to Mrs. Heidelberg about the adorable Fanny as soon as possible.

Sir J. Your generosity transports me.

Lord O. Poor fellow, what a dupe! he little thinks who's in possession of the town? [Aside.]

Sir J. And your lordship is not in the least offended at this seeming inconstancy?

Lord O. Not in the least. Miss Fanny's charms will even excuse infidelity. I look upon women as the fera natura, lawful game, and every man who is qualified, has a natural right to pursue them—Lovewell as well as you, and you as well as he, and I as well as either of you. Every man shall do his best, without offence to any—what say you, kinsmen?

Sir J. You have made me happy, my lord.

Love. And me, I assure you, my lord.

Lord O. And I am superlatively so—allons donc! To horse and away, boys!—you to your affairs, and I to mine—suivons l'amour. [Sings.—Eccunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—Fanny's Apartment.

Enter LOVEWELL and FANNY, followed by BETTY.

Fan. Why did you come so soon, Mr. Lovewell? the family is not yet in bed, and Betty certainly heard somebody listening near the chamber-door.

Bet. My mistress is right, sir; evil spirits are abroad; and I am sure you are both too good, not to expect mischief from them.

Love. But who can be so curious, or so wicked?

Bet. I think we have wickedness and curiosity enough in this family, sir, to expect the worst.

Fan. I do expect the worst. Pr'ythee, Betty, return to the outward door, and listen if you hear anybody in the gallery, and let us know directly.

Bet. I warrant you, madam; the lord bless you both. [Exit.]

Fan. What did my father want with you this evening?

Love. He gave me the key of his closet, with orders to bring from London some papers relating to Lord Ogleby.

Fan. And why did you not obey him?

Love. Because I am certain that his lordship has opened his heart to him about you, and those papers are wanted merely on that account. But, as we shall discover all to-morrow, there will be no occasion for them, and it would be idle in me to go.

Fan. Hark!—hark! bless me, how I tremble! I feel the terrors of guilt. Indeed, Mr. Lovewell, this is too much for me; this situation may have very unhappy consequences. [Weeps.]

Love. But it sha'n't. I would rather tell our story this moment to all the house, and run the risk of maintaining you by the hardest labour, than suffer you to remain in this dangerous perplexity. What! shall I sacrifice all my best hopes and affections, in your dear health and safety, for the mean (and in such case the meanest) consideration, of our fortune? Were we to be abandoned by all our relations, we have that in our hearts and minds will weigh against the most affluent circumstances. I should not have proposed the secrecy of our marriage, but for your sake; and with hopes that the most generous sacrifice, you have made to love and me, might be less injurious to you, by waiting a lucky moment of reconciliation.

Fan. Hush, hush! for heaven's sake, my dear Lovewell, don't be so warm! your generosity gets the better of your prudence: you will be heard, and we shall be discovered. I am satisfied, indeed I am. Excuse this weakness, this delicacy, this what you will. My mind's at peace, indeed it is; think no more of it, if you love me.

Love. That one word has charmed me, as it always does, to the most implicit obedience: it would be the worst of ingratitude in me to distress you a moment. [Kisses her.]

Re-enter BETTY.

Bet. [In a low voice.] I'm sorry to disturb you.

Fan. Ha! what's the matter?

Love. Have you heard anybody?

Bet. Yes, yes, I have; and they have heard you too, or I'm mistaken; if they had seen you too, we should have been in a fine quandary.

Fan. Pr'ythee don't prate now, Betty.

Love. What did you hear?

Bet. I was preparing myself, as usual, to take me a little nap—

Love. A nap!

Bet. Yes, sir, a nap; for I watch much better so than wide awake; and when I had wrapped this handkerchief round my head, for fear of the earache from the key-hole, I thought I heard a kind of a sort of buzzing, which I first took for a gnat, and shook my head two or three times, and went so with my hand.

Fan. Well, well; and so—

Bet. And so, madam, when I heard Mr. Lovewell a little loud, I heard the buzzing louder too; and, pulling off my handkerchief softly, I could hear this sort of noise.—

[Makes an indistinct noise, like speaking.]

Fan. Well, and what did they say?

Bet. Oh! I could not understand a word of what was said.

Love. The outward door is locked?

Bet. Yes; and I bolted it too, for fear of the worst.

Fan. Why did you? they must have heard you, if they were near.

Bet. And I did it on purpose, madam, and coughed a little too, that they might not hear Mr. Lovewell's voice: when I was silent, they were silent, and so I came to tell you.

Fan. What shall we do?

Love. Fear nothing; we know the worst; it will only bring on our catastrophe a little too soon.—But Betty might fancy this noise; she's in the conspiracy, and can make a man a mouse at any time.

Bet. I can distinguish a man from a mouse as well as my betters: I am sorry you think so ill of me, sir.

Fan. He compliments you—don't be a fool.—Now you have set her tongue a running, she'll mutter for an hour. [To LOVEWELL.] I'll go and hearken myself. [Exit.]

Bet. I'll turn my back upon no girl for sincerity and service. [Half aside, muttering.]

Love. Thou art the first in the world for both; and I will reward you soon, for one and the other.

Bet. I am not mercenary neither: I can live on a little, with a good carter.

Re-enter FANNY.

Fan. All seems quiet. Suppose, my dear, you go to your own room; I shall be much easier then, and to-morrow we will be prepared for the discovery.

Bet. You may discover, if you please; but for my part, I shall still be secret. [Half aside.]

Love. Should I leave you now, if they still are on the watch, we shall lose the advantage of our delay. Besides, we should consult upon to-morrow's business. Let Betty go to her own room, and lock the outward door after her; we can fasten this; and, when she thinks all safe, she may return and let me out as usual.

Bet. Shall I, madam?

Fan. Do let me have my way to-night, and you shall command me ever after.

Love. I live only to oblige you, my sweet Fanny! I'll be gone this moment. [Going.]

Fan. Betty shall go first, and if they lay hold of her—

Bet. They'll have the wrong sow by the ear, I can tell them that. [Going hastily.]

Fan. Softly, softly, Betty; don't venture out, if you hear a noise. Softly, I beg of you. See, Mr. Lovewell, the effects of indiscretion!

Love. But love, Fanny, makes amends for all.

[Ereunt softly.]

SCENE II.—A Gallery, which leads to several bed-chambers. The stage dark.

Enter Miss STERLING, leading Mrs. HEIDELBERG, in a night-cap.

Miss S. This way, dear madam, and then I'll tell you all.

Mrs. H. Nay but, niece, consider a little—don't drag me out this figure; let me put on my fly-cap. If any of my lord's famnaly, or the counsellors at law should be stirring, I should be prodigus disconcerted.

Miss S. But, my dear madam, a moment is an age, in my situation. I am sure my sister has been plotting my disgrace and ruin in that chamber!—O! she's all craft and wickedness.

Mrs. H. Well, but softly, Betsy; you are all in emotion; your mind is too much flustrated; you can neither eat, nor drink, nor take your natara rest. Compose yourself, child; for, if we are not as warisome as they are wicked, we shall disgrace ourselves and the whole famnaly.

Miss S. We are disgraced already, madam. Sir John Melvil has forsaken me; my lord cares for nobody but himself; or if anybody, it is my sister: my father, for the sake of a better bargain, would marry me to a 'Change broker: so that if you, madam, don't continue my friend—if you forsake me—if I am to lose my best hopes and consolation—in your tenderness—and affections—I had better—at once—give up the matter—and let my sister enjoy—the fruits of her treachery—trample with scorn upon the rights of her elder sister—the will of the best of aunts—and the weakness of a too interested father.

[She pretends to be bursting into tears during this speech.]

Mrs. H. Don't, Betsy—keep up your spurit: I hate whimpering—I am your friend; depend upon me in every partiklar. But be composed, and tell me what new mischief you have discovered.

Miss S. I had no desire to sleep, and would not undress myself, knowing that my Machiavel sister would not rest till she had broke my heart: I was so uneasy that I could not stay in my room, but when I thought that all the house was quiet, I sent my maid to discover what was going forward; she immediately came back and told me, that they were in high consultation; that she heard only, for it was in the dark, my sister's maid conducting Sir John Melvil to her mistress, and then lock the door.

Mrs. H. And how did you conduct yourself in this dilemma?

Miss S. I returned with her, and could hear a mau's voice, though nothing that they said distinctly; and you may depend upon it, that Sir John is now in that room, that they have settled the matter, and will run away together before the morning, if we don't prevent them.

Mrs. H. Why, the brazen slut! she has got her sister's husband, (that is to be,) lock'd up in her chamber! at night too! I tremble at the thoughts!

Miss S. Hush, madam! I hear something.

Mrs. H. You frighten me:—let me put on my fly-cap—I would not be seen in this figur for the world.

Miss S. 'Tis dark, madam; you can't be seen.

Mrs. H. I protest, there's a candle coming, and a man too!

Miss S. Nothing but servants; let us retire a moment. [They retire.]

Enter BRUSH, half drunk, laying hold of the Chambermaid, who has a candle in her hand.

Cham. Be quiet, Mr. Brush; I shall drop down with terror.

Brush. But my sweet, and most amiable chambermaid, if you have no love, you may hearken to a little reason; that cannot possibly do your virtue any harm.

Cham. But you may do me harm, Mr. Brush, and a great deal of harm too; pray let me go; I am ruined if they hear you! I tremble like an asp.

Brush. But they sha'n't hear us; and if you have a mind to be ruined, it shall be the making of your fortune, you little slut, you! therefore, I say it again, if you have no love, hear a little reason!

Cham. I wonder at your impudence, Mr. Brush, to use me in this manner; this is not the way to keep me company, I assure you. You are a town-rake, I see, and now you are a little in liquor, you fear nothing.

Brush. Nothing, by heavens! but your frowns, most amiable chambermaid; I am a little electrified, that's the truth on't; I am not used to drink port, and your master's is so heady, that a pint of it over-sets a claret-drinker. Come, now, my dear little spider-brusher!

Cham. Don't be rude! bless me! I shall be ruined—what will become of me?

Brush. I'll take care of you, by all that's honourable!

Cham. You are a base man to use me so—I'll cry out if you don't let me go. That is Miss Sterling's chamber, that Miss Fanny's, and that Madam Heidelberg's.

Brush. We know all that. And that Lord Ogleby's, and that my Lady What-d'ye-call-'em's: I don't mind such folks when I'm sober, much less when I am whimsical—rather above that, too.

Cham. More shame for you, Mr. Brush! you terrify me; you have no modesty.

Brush. O, but I have, my sweet spider-brusher: for instance, I reverence Miss Fanny; she's a most delicious morsel, and fit for a prince. With all my horrors of matrimony, I could marry her myself:—but for her sister—

Miss S. [Within.] There, there, madam, all in a story!

Cham. Bless me, Mr. Brush!—I heard something.

Brush. Rats, I suppose, that are gnawing the old timbers of this execrable old dungeon; if it was mine, I would pull it down, and fill your fine canal up with the rubbish; and then I should get rid of two d—n'd things at once.

Cham. La! la! how you blaspheme! we shall have the house upon our heads for it.

Brush. No, no, it will last our time;—but as I was saying, the eldest sister, Miss Jezebel—

Cham. Is a fine young lady, for all your evil tongue.

Brush. No; we have smoked her already; and, unless she marries our old Swiss, she can have none of us.—No, no, she won't do—we are a little too nice.

Cham. You're a monstrous rake, Mr. Brush, and don't care what you say.

Brush. Why, for that matter, my dear, I am a little inclined to mischief; and if you don't have pity upon me, I will break open that door, and ravish Mrs. Heidelberg.

Mrs. H. [Coming forward.] There's no bearing this—you profligate monster!

Cham. Ha! I am undone!

Brush. Zounds! here she is, by all that's monstrous.

Miss S. A fine discourse you have had with that fellow.

Mrs. H. And a fine time of night it is to be here with that drunken monster!

Miss S. What have you to say for yourself?

Cham. I can say nothing—I'm so frightened, and so ashamed.—But, indeed, I am virtuous—I am virtuous, indeed.

Mrs. H. Well, well—don't tremble so; but tell us what you know of this horrible plot here.

Miss S. We'll forgive you if you'll discover all.

Cham. Why, madam, don't let me betray my fellow-servants; I sha'n't sleep in my bed, if I do.

Mrs. H. Then you shall sleep somewhere else to-morrow night.

Cham. O dear! what shall I do?

Mrs. H. Tell us this moment, or I'll turn you out of doors directly.

Cham. Why, our butler has been treating us below in his pantry; Mr. Brush forced us to make a kind of holiday night of it.

Miss S. Holiday! for what?

Cham. Nay, I only made one.

Miss S. Well, well! but upon what account?

Cham. Because as how, madam, there was a change in the family, they said—that his honour, Sir John, was to marry Miss Fanny instead of your ladyship.

Miss S. And so you make a holiday for that.—Very fine!

Cham. I did not make it, ma'am.

Mrs. H. But do you know nothing of Sir John's being to run away with Miss Fanny to-night?

Cham. No, indeed, ma'am.

Miss S. Nor of his being now locked up in my sister's chamber?

Cham. No, as I hope for mercy, ma'am.

Mrs. H. Well, I'll put an end to all this directly; do you run to my brother Sterling—

Cham. Now, ma'am? 'Tis so very late, ma'am—

Mrs. H. I don't care how late it is. Tell him there are thieves in the house—that the house is on fire—tell him to come here immediately. Go, I say.

Cham. I will, I will, though I'm frighten'd out of my wits.

Mrs. H. Do you watch here, my dear; and I'll put myself in order to face them. We'll plot 'em, and counterplot 'em too.

Miss S. I have as much pleasure in this revenge, as in being made a countess. Ha! they are unlocking the door. Now for it!

Fanny's door is unlocked, and BETTY comes out,
Miss STERLING approaches.

Bet. [Calling within.] Sir! sir! now's your time—all's clear. [Seeing Miss STERLING.]—Stay, stay—not yet—we are watch'd.

Miss S. And so you are, Madam Betty.

[Miss STERLING lays hold of her, while BETTY locks the door, and puts the key into her pocket.

Bet. [Turning round.] What's the matter, madam?

Miss S. Nay, that you shall tell my father and aunt, madam.

Bet. I am no tell-tale, madam, and no thief; they'll get nothing from me.

Miss S. You have a great deal of courage, Betty, and, considering the secrets you have to keep, you have occasion for it.

Bet. My mistress shall never repent her good opinion of me, ma'am.

Enter STERLING.

Ster. What's all this? What's the matter? Why am I disturb'd in this manner?

Miss S. This creature, and my distresses, sir, will explain this matter.

Re-enter Mrs. HEIDELBERG, with another head-dress.

Mrs. H. Now I'm prepared for the rancounter.—Well, brother, have you heard of this scene of wickedness?

Ster. Not I—but what is it? speak. I was got into my little closet, all the lawyers were in bed, and I had almost lost my senses in the confusion of Lord Ogleby's mortgages, when I was alarmed with a foolish girl, who could hardly speak; and whether it's fire, or thieves, or murder, or a rape, I'm quite in the dark.

Mrs. H. No, no; there's no rape, brother. All parties are willing, I believe.

Miss S. Who's in that chamber?

[Detaining BETTY, who seemed to be stealing away.

Bet. My mistress.

Miss S. And who's with your mistress?

Bet. Why, who should there be?

Miss S. Open the door, then, and let us see.

Bet. The door is open, madam. [Miss STERLING goes to the door.] I'll sooner die than peach. [Exit hastily.

Miss S. The door is locked; and she has got the key in her pocket.

Mrs. H. There's impudence, brother! piping hot from your daughter Fanny's school!

Ster. But, zounds! what is all this about? You tell me of a sum total, and you don't produce the particulars.

Mrs. H. Sir John Melvil is locked up in your daughter's bed-chamber—There is the particular.

Ster. The devil he is!—That's bad.

Miss S. And he has been there some time, too.

Ster. Ditto!

Mrs. H. Ditto! worse and worse, I say. I'll raise the whole house, and expose him to my lord, and the whole fammaly.

Ster. By no means! we shall expose ourselves, sister. The best way is to insure privately:—let me alone! I'll make him marry her to-morrow morning.

Miss S. Make him marry her! this is beyond all patience!—You have thrown away all your affection, and I shall do as much by my obedience; unnatural fathers make unnatural children. My revenge is in my own power, and I'll indulge it. Had they made their escape, I should have been exposed to the derision of the world: but the deriders shall be derided; and so—Help, help, there!—Thieves! thieves!

Mrs. H. Tit-for-tat, Betsy! you are right, my girl.

Ster. Zounds! you'll spoil all—you'll raise the whole family—the devil's in the girl.

Mrs. H. No, no; the devil's in you, brother: I am ashamed of your principles. What! would you connive at your daughter's being locked up with her sister's husband? Help! Thieves! thieves! I say.

Ster. Sister, I beg of you! daughter, I command you!—If you have no regard for me, consider yourselves! We shall lose this opportunity of ennobling our blood, and getting above twenty per cent. for our money.

Miss S. What, by my disgrace and my sister's triumph? I have a spirit above such mean considerations: and to shew you that it is not a low-bred, vulgar, Change-alley spirit.—Help! help! Thieves! thieves! I say.

Ster. Ay, ay, you may save your lungs: the house is in an uproar.

Enter CANTON, in a night-gown and slippers.

Can. Eh, diable! vat is de raison of dis great noise, dis tintamarre?

Ster. Ask those ladies, sir; 'tis of their making.

Lord O. [Calls within.] Brush!—Brush!—Canton!—Where are you?—What's the matter?—[Rings a bell.] Where are you?

Ster. 'Tis my lord calls, Mr. Canton.

Can. I com, mi lor! [Lord O. still rings.—Exit.

Flow. [Calls within.] A light! a light here!—Where are the servants? Bring a light for me and my brothers.

Ster. Lights here! lights for the gentlemen!

[Exit.

Mrs. H. My brother feels, I see:—your sister's turn will come next.

Miss S. Ay, ay, let it go round, madam, it is the only comfort I have left.

Re-enter STERLING with lights, before SERGEANT FLOWER, with a boot and a slipper, and TRAVERSE.

Ster. This way, sir; this way, gentlemen.

Flow. Well, but Mr. Sterling, no danger, I hope? Have they made a burglarious entry? Are you prepared to repulse them? I am very much alarmed about thieves at circuit time. They would be particularly severe with us gentlemen of the bar.

Trav. No danger, Mr. Sterling;—no trespass, I hope?

Ster. None, gentlemen, but of those ladies' making.

Mrs. H. You'll be ashamed to know, gentlemen, that all your labours and studies about this young lady, are thrown away—Sir John Melvil is at this moment locked up with this lady's younger sister.

Flow. The thing is a little extraordinary, to be sure; but, why were we to be frightened out of our beds for this? Could not we have tried this cause to-morrow morning?

Miss S. But, sir, by to-morrow morning, perhaps, even your assistance would not have been of any service:—the birds now in that cage would have flown away.

Enter Lord OGLEBY, in his robe-de-chambre, night-cap, &c. leaning on CANTON.

Lord O. I had rather lose a limb than my night's rest. What's the matter with you all?

Ster. Ay, ay, 'tis all over!—Here's my lord, too. Lord O. What's all this shrieking and screaming? Where's my angelic Fanny? She's safe, I hope.

Mrs. H. Your angelic Fanny, my lord, is locked up with your angelic nephew in that chamber.

Lord O. My nephew! Then I will be excommunicated.

Mrs. H. Your nephew, my lord, has been plotting to run away with Miss Fanny, and Miss Fanny has been plotting to run away with your nephew: and if we had not watched them, and called up the fammaly, they had been upon the scamper to Scotland by this time.

Lord O. Look ye, ladies! I know that Sir John has conceived a violent passion for Miss Fanny; and I know too, that Miss Fanny has conceived a violent passion for another person; and I am so well convinced of the rectitude of her affections, that I will support them with my fortune, my honour, and my life.—Eh, sha'n't I, Mr. Sterling? [Smiling.] What say you?

Ster. [Sulkily.] To be sure, my lord. These bawling women have been the ruin of everything.

[Aside.]

Lord O. But, come, I'll end this business in a trice.—If you, ladies, will compose yourselves, and Mr. Sterling will ensure Miss Fanny from violence, I will engage to draw her from her pillow with a whisper through the key-hole.

Mrs. H. The horrid creatures!—I say, my lord, break the door open.

Lord O. Let me beg of your delicacy not to be too precipitate! Now to our experiment!

[Advancing towards the door.]

Miss S. Now, what will they do? My heart will beat through my bosom.

Re-enter BETTY with the key.

Bet. There's no occasion for breaking open doors, my lord; we have done nothing that we ought to be ashamed of, and my mistress shall face her enemies. [Going to unlock the door.]

Mrs. H. There's impudence!

Lord O. The mystery thickens. Lady of the bedchamber, [To Betty.] open the door, and entreat Sir John Melvil (for the ladies will have it that he is there) to appear, and answer to high crimes and misdemeanors. Call Sir John Melvil into court!

Enter Sir JOHN MELVIL.

Sir J. I am here, my lord.

Mrs. H. Hey-day!

Sir J. What's all this alarm and confusion? There is nothing but hurry in this house? What is the reason of it?

Lord O. Because you have been in that chamber;—have been! nay, you are there at this moment, as these ladies have protested, so don't deny it—

Trav. This is the clearest alibi I ever knew, Mr. Sergeant.

Flaw. Luce clarius.

Lord O. Upon my word, ladies, if you have often these frolics, it would be really entertaining to pass a whole summer with you. But, come, [To Betty.] open the door and entreat your amiable mistress to come forth, and dispel all our doubts with her smiles.

Bet. [Opening the door.] Madam, you are wanted in this room. [Pertly.]

Enter FANNY, in great confusion.

Miss S. You see she's ready dressed—and what confusion she's in.

Mrs. H. Ready to pack off, bag and baggage! Her guilt confounds her!

Flaw. Silence in the court, ladies.

Lord O. I am confounded indeed, madam.

Lord O. Don't droop, my beautiful lily! but with your own peculiar modesty declare your state of mind. Pour conviction into their ears, and rapture into mine. [Smiling.]

Fan. I am, at this moment, the most unhappy—most distressed—the tumult is too much for my heart—and I want the power to reveal a secret, which, to conceal, has been the misfortune and misery of my— [Faints away.]

LOVEWELL rushes out of the chamber.

Love. My Fanny in danger! I can contain no longer. Prudence were now a crime; all other cares were lost in this. Speak, speak, speak to me, my dearest Fanny! let me but hear thy voice: open your eyes, and bless me with the smallest sign of life.

Miss S. Lovewell!—I am easy.

Mrs. H. I am thunderstruck!

Lord O. I am petrified!

Sir J. And I undone.

Fan. [Recovering.] O, Lovewell! even supported by thee, I dare not look my father nor his lordship in the face.

Ster. What now, did not I send you to London, sir?

Lord O. Eh! What? How's this? By what right and title have you been half the night in that lady's bed-chamber?

Love. By that right which makes me the happiest of men; and by a title which I would not forego for any the best of kings could give.

Bet. I could cry my eyes out to hear his magnanimity.

Lord O. I am annihilated!

Ster. I have been choked with rage and wonder; but now I can speak.—Lovewell, you are a villain;—you have broken your word with me.

Fan. Indeed, sir, he has not: you forbade him to think of me, when it was out of his power to obey you—we have been married these four months.

Ster. And he sha'n't stay in my house four hours. What baseness and treachery! As for you, you shall repent this step as long as you live, madam!

Fan. Indeed, sir, it is impossible to conceive the tortures I have already endured in consequence of my disobedience. My heart has continually upbraided me for it; and though I was too weak to struggle with affection, I feel that I must be miserable for ever without your forgiveness.

Ster. Lovewell, you shall leave my house directly; and you shall follow him, madam!

Lord O. And if they do, I will receive them into mine. Lookye, Mr. Sterling, there have been some mistakes, which we had all better forget for our own sakes; and the best way to forget them, is to forgive the cause of them, which I do from my soul. Poor girl! I swore to support her affection with my life and fortune; it is a debt of honour, and must be paid. You swore as much too, Mr. Sterling; but your laws in the city will excuse you, I suppose; for you never strike a balance without—errors excepted.

Ster. I am a father, my lord; but for the sake of other fathers, I think I ought not to forgive her, for fear of encouraging other silly girls, like herself, to throw themselves away without the consent of their parents.

Love. I hope there will be no danger of that, sir. Young ladies, with minds like my Fanny's, would startle at the very shadow of vice; and when they know to what uneasiness only an indiscretion has exposed her, her example, instead of encouraging, will rather serve to deter them.

Mrs. H. Indiscretion, quotha! a mighty pretty delicate word to express disobedience!

Lord O. For my part, I indulge my own passions too much to tyrannize over those of other people. Poor souls! I pity them. And you must forgive them, too. Come, come, melt a little of your flat, Mr. Sterling.

Ster. Why, why as to that, my lord—to be sure, he is a relation of your's, my lord—What say you, sister Heidelberg?

Mrs. H. The girl's ruined, and I forgive her.

Ster. Well! so do I then. Nay, no thanks. [To LOVE. and FAN. who seem preparing to speak.] There's an end of the matter. [Exit FLOW. TRAV. and BET.]

Lord O. But, Lovewell, what makes you dumb all this while?

Love. Your kindness, my lord. I can scarcely believe my own senses—they are all in a tumult of fear, joy, love, expectation, and gratitude. I ever was, and am now more bound in duty to your lordship.—For you, Mr. Sterling, if every moment of my life, spent gratefully in your service, will, in some measure, compensate the want of fortune, you, perhaps, will not repent your goodness to me. And you, ladies, I flatter myself, will not, for the future, suspect me of artifice and intrigue—I shall be happy to oblige and serve you. As for you, Sir John—

Sir J. No apologies to me, Lovewell; I do not deserve any. All I have to offer in excuse for what has happened, is my total ignorance of your situation. Had you dealt a little more openly with me, you would have saved me, yourself, and that lady, (who I hope will pardon my behaviour) a great deal of uneasiness. Give me leave, however, to assure you, that light and capricious as I may have appeared, now my infatuation is over, I have sensibility enough to be ashamed of the part I have acted, and honour enough to rejoice at your happiness.

Love. And now, my dearest Fanny, though we are, seemingly, the happiest of beings, yet all our joys would be damped, if his lordship's generosity and Mr. Sterling's forgiveness should not be succeeded by the indulgence, approbation, and consent of these our best benefactors. [To the audience.]

SCENE I.—Urganda's Palace

Enter MERLIN and URGANDA.

Urg. But hear me, Merlin; I beseech you, hear me.

Mer. Hear you! I have heard you; for years have heard your vows, your protestations. Have you not allured my affections by every female art? and when I thought that my unalterable passion was to be rewarded for its constancy, what have you done? Why, like mere mortal woman, in the true spirit of frailty, have given up me and my hopes—for what? a boy! an idiot!

Urg. Even this I can bear from Merlin.

Mer. You have injured me, and must bear more.

Urg. I'll repair that injury.

Mer. Then send back your favourite Cymon to his disconsolate friends.

Urg. How can you imagine that such a poor, ignorant object as Cymon is, can have any charms for me?

Mer. Ignorance, no more than profligacy, is excluded from female favour; of this the success of rakes and fools is proof sufficient.

Urg. You mistake me, Merlin; pity for Cymon's state of mind, and friendship for his father, have induced me to endeavour at his cure.

Mer. False, prevaricating Urganda! love was your inducement. Have you not stolen the prince from his royal father, and detained him here by your power, while a hundred knights are in search after him? Does not everything about you prove the consequence of your want of honour and faith to me? You were placed on this happy spot, to be the guardian of its peace and innocence; but now, at last, by your example, the once happy lives of the Arcadians are embittered with envy, passion, vanity, selfishness, and inconstancy: and whom are they to curse for this change? URGANDA! the lost URGANDA.

Urg. I beseech you, Merlin, spare me.

Mer. Yes; I'll converse with you no more, because I will be no more deceived. I cannot hate you, though I shun you; yet, in my misery, I have this consolation, that the pangs of my jealousy are at least equalled by the torments of your fruitless passion.

Still wish and sigh, and wish again;
Love is dethron'd; revenge shall reign!
Still shall my pow'r your vile arts confound,
And Cymon's cure shall be URGANDA's wound.

[Exit.

Urg. "And Cymon's cure shall be URGANDA's wound!" What mystery is couched in these words? What can he mean?

Enter FATIMA, looking after MERLIN.

Fat. I'll tell you, madam, when he is out of hearing. He means mischief, and terrible mischief, too; no less, I believe, than ravishing you, and cutting my tongue out. I wish we were out of his clutches.

Urg. Don't fear, Fatima.

Fat. I can't help it; he has great power, and is mischievously angry.

Urg. Here is your protection. [Shews her wand.] My power is at least equal to his. [Muses.] "And Cymon's cure shall be URGANDA's wound!"

Fat. Don't trouble your head with these odd ends of verses, which were spoken in a passion; or, perhaps, for the rhyme's sake. Think a little to clear us from this old mischief-making conjurer. What will you do, madam?

Urg. What can I do, Fatima?

Fat. You might very easily settle matters with him, if you could as easily settle them with yourself.

Urg. Tell me how?

Fat. Marry Merlin, and send away the young fellow. [URGANDA shakes her head.] I thought so: but before matters grow worse, give me leave to reason a little with you, madam.

Urg. I am in love, Fatima.

[Sighs.

Fat. And poor reason may stay at home: me exactly! Ay, ay, we are all alike; but with this difference, madam, your passion is surely a strange one; you have stolen away this young man, who, bating his youth and figure, has not one circumstance to create affection about him. He is half an idiot, madam, which is no great compliment to your wisdom, your beauty, or your power.

Urg. I despise them all; for they can neither relieve my passion, nor awaken his.

Fat. Cymon is incapable of being touched with anything; nothing gives him pleasure, but twirling his cap, and hunting butterflies: he'll make a sad lover, indeed, madam.

Urg. I can wait with patience for the recovery of his understanding; it begins to dawn already.

Fat. Where, pray?

Urg. In his eyes.

Fat. Eyes! Ha, ha, ha! Love has none, madam; the heart only sees, on these occasions. Cymon was born a fool, and his eyes will never look as you would have them, take my word for it.

Urg. Don't make me despair, Fatima.

Fat. Don't lose your time, then; 'tis the business of beauty to make fools, and not cure them. Even I, poor I, could have made twenty fools of wise men, in half the time that you have been endeavouring to make your fool sensible. Oh! 'tis a sad way of spending one's time.

Urg. Silence, Fatima! my passion is too serious to be jested with.

Fat. Far gone, indeed, madam; and yonder goes the precious object of it.

Urg. He seems melancholy: what's the matter with him?

Fat. He's a fool, or he might make himself very merry among us. I'll leave you to make the most of him. [Going.

Urg. Stay, Fatima, and help me to divert him.

Fat. A sad time, when a lady must call in help to divert her gallant! but I'm at your service.

Enter CYMON, melancholy.

Cymon. Heigho!

[Sighs.

Fat. What's the matter, young gentleman?

Cymon. Heigho!

Urg. Are you not well, Cymon?

Cymon. Yes, I am very well.

Urg. Why do you sigh, then?

Cymon. Eh!

[Looks foolish.

Fat. Do you see it in his eyes now, madam?

Urg. Pr'ythee, be quiet. What is it you want? tell me, Cymon; tell me your wishes, and you shall have them.

Cymon. Shall I?

Urg. Yes, indeed, Cymon.

Fat. Now for it.

Cymon. I wish—heigho!

Urg. These sighs must mean something.

[Aside to FATIMA.

Fat. I wish you joy, then; find it out, madam.

[Apart.

Urg. What do you sigh for?

[To CYMON.

Cymon. I want—

[Sighs.

Urg. What, what, my sweet creature?

[Eagerly.

Cymon. To go away.

Fat. Oh, la! the meaning's out.

Urg. Where would you go?

Cymon. Anywhere.

Urg. Had you rather go anywhere, than stay with me?

Cymon. I had rather go anywhere than stay with anybody.

Urg. Will you love me if I let you go?

Cymon. Anything, if you'll let me go; pray, let me go.

Fat. I'm out of all patience! what the deuce would you have, young gentleman? Had you one grain of understanding, or a spark of sensibility in you, you would know and feel yourself to be the happiest of mortals.

Cymon. I had rather go, for all that.

Fat. The picture of the whole sex! Oh! madam, fondness will never do: a little coquetry is the thing: I bait my hook with nothing else; and I always catch fish.

[Aside to URGANDA.

Urg. I will shew him my power, and captivate his heart through his senses.

Fat. You'll throw away your powder and shot.

INCANTATION.—URGANDA.

Hither, spirits, that aid me, hither!

Whither stays my love? ah! whither?

Alas! this heart must faithful prove,

Though still he flies URGANDA's love.

[URGANDA waves her wand, and the scene changes to a magnificent garden. Cupid and the Loves descend. Ballet by Loves and Zephyrs. During the dance, CYMON stares vacantly, grows inattentive, and at last, falls asleep.

Urg. Look, Fatima, nothing can affect his insensibility; and yet, what a beautiful simplicity!

Fat. Turn him out among the sheep, madam, and think of him no more; 'tis all labour in vain, as the song says, I assure you.

Urg. Cymon, Cymon! what, are you dead to these entertainments?

Cymon. Dead! I hope not.

[Starts.

Urg. How can you be so unmoved?

Cymon. They tired me so, that I wished them a good night, and went to sleep. But where are they?

Urg. They are gone, Cymon.

Cymon. Then let me go too.

[Gets up.

Fat. The old story!

Urg. Whither would you go? Tell me, and I'll go with you, my sweet youth.

Cymon. No, I'll go by myself.

Urg. And so you shall; but where?

Cymon. Into the fields.

Urg. But is not this garden pleasanter than the fields, my palace than cottages, and my company more agreeable to you than the shepherds?

Cymon. Why, how can I tell till I try? you won't let me choose.

AIR.—CYMON.

*You gave me, last week, a young linnet,
Shut up in a fine golden cage;
Yet how sad the poor thing was within it,
Oh! how it did flutter and rage!
Then he mop'd, and he pin'd,
That his wings were confin'd,
Till I open'd the door of his den;
Then so merry was he,
And because he was free,
He came to his cage back again.*

And so should I too, if you would let me go.

Urg. And would you return to me again?

Cymon. Yes, I would; I've no where else to go to.

Fat. Let him have his humour; when he is not confined, and is seemingly disregarded, you may have him, and mould him as you please. 'Tis a receipt for the whole sex.

Urg. I'll follow your advice. [Exit FATIMA.] Well, Cymon, you shall go wherever you please, and for as long as you please.

Cymon. And shall I let my linnet out, too?

Urg. And take this, Cymon, wear it for my sake, and don't forget me. [Gives him a nosegay.] Go, Cymon, take your companion, and be happier than I can make you.

AIR.—URGANDA.

*One adieu before you leave me,
One sigh, although that sigh deceive me;
Oh! let me think you true!
Cruel! thus Urganda flying;
Cruel! this fond heart denying;
One sigh, one last adieu.
Though my ardent vows be slighted,
Though my love be unrequited,
Oh! hide it from my view!
Let me feel not I'm forsaken;
Rather let me die mistaken,
Than breathe one last adieu.*

[Ereunt.

SCENE II.—A rural prospect.

Enter PHÆBE and DAPHNE.

Phæbe. What, to be left and forsaken! and see the false fellow make the same vows to another, almost before my face! I can't bear it, and I won't. Oh! that I had the power of our enchantress yonder. —I would play the devil with them all.

Daph. And yet, to do justice to Sylvia, who makes all this disturbance among you, she does not in the least encourage the shepherds, and she can't help their falling in love with her.

Phæbe. May be so; nor can I help hating and detesting her, because they do fall in love with her.

Linco. [Singing without.] "Care flies from the lad that is merry."

Daph. Here comes the merry Linco, who never knew care, or felt sorrow. If you can bear his laughing at your griefs, or singing away his own, you may get some information from him.

Enter LINCO, singing.

Linco. What, my girls of ten thousand! I was this moment defying love and all his mischief, and you are sent in the nick by him, to try my courage; but I'm above temptation, or below it; I duck down, and all his arrows fly over me.

AIR.—LINCO.

*Care flies from the lad that is merry,
Whose heart is as sound,
And cheeks are as round,
As round and as red as a cherry.*

Phæbe. What, are you always thus?

Linco. Ay, or heaven help me! What, would you have me do as you do? walking with your arms across, thus—heighoing by the brook-side among the willows. Oh! fie for shame, lasses! young and handsome, and sighing after one fellow a-piece, when you should have a hundred in a drove, following you like—like—you shall have the simile another time.

Daph. No; pr'ythee, Linco, give it us now.

Linco. You shall have it; or what's better, I'll tell you what you are not like—you are not like our shepherdess Sylvia; she's so cold, and so coy, that she flies from her lovers, but is never without a score of them; you are always running after the fellows, and yet are always alone; a very great difference, let me tell you: frost and fire, that's all.

Daph. Don't imagine that I am in the pining condition my poor sister is. I am as happy as she is miserable.

Linco. Good luck! I'm sorry for it.

Daph. What, sorry that I am happy?

Linco. Oh! no, prodigious glad.

Phæbe. That I am miserable!

Linco. No, no; prodigious sorry for that, and prodigious glad of the other.

Phæbe. Pr'ythee, be serious a little.

Linco. No; heaven forbid! If I am serious, 'tis all over with me. I must laugh at something; shall I be merry with you?

Daph. The happy shepherdess can bear to be laughed at.

Linco. Then Sylvia might take your shepherd without a sigh.

Daph. My shepherd! what does the fool mean?

Phæbe. Her shepherd! Pray, tell us, Linco.

[Eagerly.

Linco. 'Tis no secret, I suppose. I only met her Damon and Sylvia together just now, walking to—

Daph. What, my Damon?

Linco. Your Damon that was, and that would be Sylvia's Damon, if she would put up with him.

Daph. Her Damon! I'll make her to know—a wicked slut! a vile fellow! Come, sister, I'm ready to go with you—we'll be revenged. If our old governor continues to cast a sheep's eye at me, I'll have her turned out of Arcadia, I warrant you; a base, mischievous—
[Exit.]

Phæbe. This is some comfort, however—ha, ha, ha! in seeing one's sister as miserable as one's self.

[Exit.]

Linco. Ha, ha, ha! Oh! how the pretty, sweet-tempered creatures are ruffled.

AIR.—LINCO.

*This love puts 'em all in commotion;
For preach what you will,
They cannot be still,*

No more than the wind or the ocean. [Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A rural prospect.

SYLVIA discovered lying upon a bank.—Enter MERLIN.

Mer. My art succeeds, which hither has convey'd,
To catch the eye of Cymon, this sweet maid.
Her charms shall clear the mists which cloud his mind,

And make him warm, and sensible, and kind;
Her yet cold heart, with passion's sighs shall move,
Melt as he melts, and give him love for love.
This magic touch shall to these flowers impart

[Touches a nosegay in her hand.]

A power when beauty gains, to fix the heart. [Exit.]

Enter CYMON, with his bird.

Cymon. Away, prisoner, and make yourself merry. [Bird flies.] Ay, ay, I knew how it would be with you; much good may it do you, Bob. What a sweet place this is! Hills and greens, and rocks, and trees, and water, and sun, and birds! Dear me! 'tis just as if I had never seen it before. [Whistles about till he sees SYLVIA, then stops and sinks his whistling by degrees, with a look and attitude of astonishment.] Oh, la! what's here? 'Tis something dropped from the heavens, sure; and yet, 'tis like a woman, too! Bless me! is it alive? [Sighs.] It can't be dead, for its cheek is as red as a rose, and it moves about the heart of it. I don't know what's the matter with me. I wish it would wake, that I might see its eyes. If it should look gentle, and smile upon me, I should be glad to play with it. Ay, ay, there's something now in my breast that they told me of. It feels oddly to me; and yet I don't dislike it.

AIR.—CYMON.

All amaze!

Wonder, praise!

Here for ever could I gaze!

A little nearer to—

What is't I do?

*Fie, for shame! I am possess'd;
Something creeping in my breast
Will not let me stay or go.
Shall I wake it? No, no, no!*

I am glad I came abroad! I have not been so pleased ever since I can remember. But, perhaps, it may be angry with me. I can't help it, if it is. I had rather see her angry with me than Urganda smile upon me. Stay, stay! [SYLVIA stirs.] La! what a pretty foot it has!

[Retires. SYLVIA raises herself from the bank.

AIR.—SYLVIA.

Yet awhile, sweet sleep, deceive me,

Fold me in thy downy arms,

Let not cure awake to grieve me,

Lull it with thy potent charms.

I, a turtle, doom'd to stray,

Quitting young the parent's nest,

Find each bird a bird of prey;

Sorrow knows not where to rest.

[SYLVIA sees CYMON with emotion, while he gazes strongly on her, and retires, pulling off his cap.]

Syl. Who's that? [Speaks gently and confused.]

Cymon. 'Tis I. [Bows and hesitates.]

Syl. What's your name?

Cymon. Cymon.

Syl. What do you want, young man?

Cymon. Nothing, young woman.

Syl. What are you doing there?

Cymon. Looking at you there. What eyes it has!

[Aside.]

Syl. You don't intend me any harm?

Cymon. Not I, indeed! I wish you don't do me some. Art thou a fairy, pray?

Syl. No; I am a poor harmless shepherdess.

Cymon. I don't know that: you have bewitched me, I believe. I wish you'd speak to me, and look at me, as Urganda does.

Syl. What, the enchantress? Do you belong to her.

Cymon. I had rather belong to you; I would not desire to go abroad, if I did.

Syl. Does Urganda love you?

Cymon. So she says. If I were to stay here always, I should not be called the simple Cymon.

Syl. Nor I the hard-hearted Sylvia.

Cymon. Sylvia, Sylvia! what a sweet name! I could sound it for ever!

Syl. I shall never see you again. I wish I had not seen you now.

Cymon. If you did but wish as I do, all the enchantresses in the world could not hinder us from seeing one another. [Kneels and kisses her hand.]

Syl. We shall be seen, and separated for ever. I must go.

Cymon. When shall I see you again? In half an hour?

Syl. Half an hour! that will be too soon. No, no; it must be three quarters of an hour.

Cymon. And where, my sweet Sylvia?

Syl. Anywhere, my sweet Cymon!

Cymon. In the grove, by the river there.

Syl. And you shall take this to remember it. [Gives him the nosegay enchanted by MERLIN.] I wish it were a kingdom, I would give it you, and a queen along with it.

Cymon. And here is one for you, too; which is of no value to me, unless you will receive it; take it, my sweet Sylvia!

[Gives her URGANDA'S nosegay.]

DUET.—SYLVIA and CYMON.

Syl. Take this nosegay, gentle youth!

Cymon. And you, sweet maid, take mine.

Syl. Unlike these flowers be thy fair truth ;

Cymon. Unlike these flowers be thine.

These changing soon,

Will soon decay,

Be sweet till noon,

Then pass away.

Fair, for a time, their transient charms appear ;

But truth, unchang'd, shall bloom for ever here.

[Each pressing their hearts.—Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Before Urganda's Palace.

Enter URGANDA.

Urg. With what anxiety I watch his return ! And how mean is that anxiety for an object so insensible ! Oh, love ! is it not enough to make thy votaries despicable in others' eyes ! Must we also despise ourselves ?

Enter FATIMA.

Well, Fatima, is he returned ?

Fat. He has no feelings but those of hunger ; when that pinches him he'll return to be fed, like other animals.

Urg. Indeed, Fatima, his insensibility and ingratitude astonish and distract me. Yet am I only a greater slave to my weakness, and more incapable of relief.

Fat. Why, then, I may as well hold my tongue ; but before I would waste all the prime of my womanhood in playing such a losing game, I would—but I see you don't mind me, madam ; and, therefore, I'll say no more. I know the consequence, and must submit.

Urg. What can I do in my situation ? But see where Cymon approaches ! he seems transported. Look, look, Fatima ! he is kissing and embracing my nosegay ; it has had the desired effect, and I am happy : we'll be invisible, that I may observe his transports.

[Waves her wand, and retires with FATIMA.]

Enter CYMON, hugging a nosegay.

Cymon. Oh ! my dear, sweet, charming nosegay ! To see thee, to smell thee, and to taste thee, [kisses it] will make Urganda and her garden delightful to me. [Kisses it.]

Fat. What does he say ?

[Apart.]

Urg. Hush, hush ! all transport, and about me. What a change is this !

[Apart.]

Cymon. With this I can want for nothing. I possess everything with this. Oh ! the dear, dear nosegay ! and the dear, dear giver of it !

Urg. The dear, dear giver ! Mind that, Fatima ! What heavenly eloquence ! Here's a change of heart and mind ! Heigho !

[Apart.]

Fat. I'm all amazement ! in a dream ! But is that your nosegay ?

[Apart.]

Urg. Mine ! How can you doubt it ?

[Apart.]

Fat. Nay, I'm near-sighted.

[Apart.]

Cymon. She has not a beauty that is not brought to mind by these flowers. Oh ! I shall lose my wits with pleasure !

Fat. 'Tis pity to lose them the moment you have found them.

[Apart.]

Urg. Oh ! Fatima, I never was proud of my power till this transporting moment !

[Apart.]

Cymon. Where shall I put it ? Where shall I conceal it from everybody ? I'll keep it in my bosom, next my heart, all the day ; and at night, I will put it upon my pillow, and talk to it, and sigh to it, and swear to it, and sleep by it, and kiss it for ever and ever.

AIR.—CYMON.

What exquisite pleasure !

This sweet treasure,

From me they shall never

Sever.

In thee, in thee,

My charmer I see ;

I'll sigh, and caress thee,

I'll kiss thee, and press thee,

Thus, thus, to my bosom for ever and ever.

[URGANDA and FATIMA come forward. CYMON puts the nosegay in his bosom, and looks confused and astonished.]

Urg. Pray, what is that you would kiss and press to your bosom for ever and ever ?

[Smiles.]

Cymon. Nothing but—but—nothing.

Urg. What were you talking to ?

Cymon. Myself, to be sure ; I had nothing else to talk to.

Urg. Yes, but you have, Cymon. There is something in your bosom, next your heart.

Cymon. Yes, so there is.

Urg. What is it, Cymon ?

[Smiles.]

Fat. Now his modesty is giving way ; we shall have it at last.

[Aside.]

Cymon. Nothing but a nosegay.

Urg. That which I gave you ? Let me see it.

Cymon. What, give a thing, and take it away again ?

Urg. I would not take it away for the world.

Cymon. Nor would I give it you for a hundred worlds.

Fat. See it, by all means, madam. I have my reasons.

[Aside to URGANDA.]

Urg. I must see it, Cymon ; and, therefore, no delay. I will see it, or shut you up for ever.

Cymon. What a stir is here about nothing ! Now are you satisfied ?

[Holds the nosegay at a distance. URGANDA and FATIMA look at one another with surprise.]

Fat. I was right.

Urg. And I am miserable !

Cymon. Have you seen it enough ?

Urg. That is not mine, Cymon.

Cymon. No ; 'tis mine.

Urg. Who gave it you ?

Cymon. A person.

Urg. What person—male or female ?

Cymon. La ! how can I tell ?

Fat. Finely improved, indeed ! a genius !

[Aside.]

Urg. I must dissemble. [Aside.] Lookye ! Cymon, I did but sport with you ; the nosegay was your own, and you had a right to give it away, or throw it away.

Cymon. Indeed, 'but I did not, I only gave it for this ; which, as it is so much finer and sweeter, I thought would not vex you.

Urg. Heigho !

[Aside.]

Fat. Vex her ! Oh ! not in the least. But you should not have given away her present to a vulgar creature.

Cymon. How dare you talk to me so ? I would have you to know she is neither ugly nor vulgar. No, she is—

Fat. Oh ! she ! your humble servant, young Simplicity ! La ! how can you tell whether it is male or female ?

[CYMON appears confused.]

Urg. Don't mind her impertinence, Cymon : I give you leave to follow your own inclinations. I'll have him watched ; this office be your's, my faithful Fatima.

[Apart to FATIMA.—Exit FATIMA.]

Cymon. Then I am happy, indeed.

Urg. Cymon, I would that you could love with constancy like mine; but this you never can.

Cymon. Oh! yes, I can love. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—Dorcas's Cottage.

SYLVIA at the door, with CYMON's nosegay in her hand.

Syl. The more I look upon this nosegay, the more I feel Cymon in my heart and mind. Ever since I have seen him, I wander without knowing where, I speak without knowing to whom, and I look without knowing at what. Now I dread to lose him, and now again I think him mine for ever!

AIR.—SYLVIA.

*Oh! why should we sorrow, who never knew sin?
Let smiles of content shew our rapture within:
This love has so rais'd me, I now tread in air!
He's sure sent from heav'n to lighten my care!
Each shepherdess views me with scorn and disdain;
Each shepherd pursues me, but all is in vain:
No more will I sorrow, no longer despair,
He's sure sent from heav'n to lighten my care!*

[LINCO is seen listening.]

Enter LINCO.

Linco. If you were as wicked, shepherdess, as you are innocent, that voice of your's would corrupt justice herself, unless she were deaf, as well as blind.

Syl. I hope you did not overhear me, Linco?

Linco. Oh! but I did though; and, notwithstanding I come as the deputy of a deputy-governor, to bring you before my principal, for some complaints made against you by a certain shepherdess, I will stand your friend, though I lose my place for it: there are not many such friends, shepherdess.

Syl. What have I done to the shepherdesses, that they persecute me so?

Linco. You are much too handsome, which is a crime the best of 'em can't forgive you.

Syl. I'll trust myself with you, and face my enemies.

[As they are going, DORCAS calls from the cottage.

Dor. Where are you going, child? Who is that with you, Sylvia?

Linco. Now shall we be stopped by this good old woman, who will know all, and can scarce hear anything.

Dor. I'll see who you have with you.

Enter DORCAS, from the house.

Linco. 'Tis I, dame; your kinsman Linco.

[Speaks loud in her ear.

Dor. Oh! is it you, honest Linco? [Takes his hand.] Well, what's to do now?

Linco. The governor desires to speak with Sylvia; a friendly inquiry, that's all. [Loud.

Dor. For what? for what? Tell me that. I have nothing to do with his desires, nor she neither. He is grown very inquisitive of late about shepherdesses. Fine doings, indeed! No such doings when I was young. If he wants to examine anybody, why don't he examine me! I'll give him an answer, for him to be as inquisitive as he pleases.

Linco. But I am your kinsman, dame; and you dare trust me, sure. [Speaks loud in her ear.

Dor. Thou art the best of 'em, that I'll say for thee; but the best of you are bad when a young woman is in the case. I have gone through great difficulties myself, I can assure you, in better times than these. Why must not I go too?

Linco. We shall return to you again—before you can get there. [Loud.

Syl. You may trust us, mother: my own innocence, and Linco's goodness, will be guard enough for me.

Dor. Eh! what?

Linco. She says you may trust me with her innocence. [Loud.

Dor. Well, well, I will then. Thou art a sweet creature, and I love thee better than even I did my own child. [Kisses SYLVIA.] When thou art fetched away by him that brought thee, 'twill be a woeful day for me. Well, well, go thy ways with Linco. I dare trust thee anywhere. I'll prepare thy dinner at thy return; and bring my honest kinsman along with you.

Linco. We will be with you before you can make the pot boil.

Dor. Before what?

Linco. We will be with you before you can make the pot boil.

[Speaks very loud, and goes off with SYLVIA.

Dor. Heaven shield thee, for the sweetest, best creature that ever blessed old age! What a comfort she is to me! All I have to wish for in this world, is to know who thou art, who brought thee to me, and then to see thee as happy as thou hast made poor Dorcas. What can the governor want with her? I wish I had gone too. I'd have talked to him, and to the purpose. We had no such doings when I was a young woman; they never made such a fuss with me.

AIR.—DORCAS.

*When I were young, though now I'm old,
The men were kind and true;
But now they're grown up so false and bold
What can a woman do?
Now what can a woman do?
For men are truly
So unruly,
I tremble at seventy-two!*

*When I were fair, though now so so,
No hearts were given to rove;
Our pulses beat not fast nor slow,
But all was faith and love.
Now what can a woman do?*

*For men are truly
So unruly,*

I tremble at seventy-two.

[Exit.

SCENE IV.—The Magistrate's House.

Enter DORUS and DAPHNE.

Dorus. This way, this way, damsel. Now we are alone, I can hear your grievances; and will redress them, that I will. You have my good liking, damsel, and favour follows of course.

Daph. I want words, your honour and worship, to thank you fitly.

Dorus. Smile upon me, damsel; smile and command me. Your hand is whiter than ever, I protest. You must indulge me with a chaste salute.

[Kisses her hand.

Daph. La! your honour.

[Courtsies.

Dorus. You have charmed me, damsel, and I can deny you nothing. Another chaste salute; 'tis a perfect cordial. [Kisses her hand.] Well, what shall I do with this Sylvia, this stranger, this baggage, that has affronted thee? I'll send her where she shall never vex thee again—an impudent wicked—

[Kisses her hand.] I'll send her packing this very day; this hand, this lily hand, has signed her fate.
[Kisses it.]

Enter LINCO.

Linco. No bribery and corruption, I beg of your honour.

Dorus. You are too bold, Linco. Do your duty, and know your distance. Where is this vagrant, this Sylvia?

Linco. In the justice-chamber, waiting for your honour's commands.

Dorus. Why did not you tell me so?

Linco. I thought your honour better engaged, and that it was too much for you to try two female causes at one time.

Dorus. You thought! I won't have you think, but obey. Deputies must not think for their superiors.

Linco. Must not they? What will become of our poor country! [Going.]

Dorus. No more impertinence, but bring the culprit hither.

Linco. In the twinkling of your honour's eye.

[Erit.]
Daph. I leave my griefs in your worship's hands.
Dorus. You leave 'em in my heart, damsel; they soon shall be changed into pleasures. Wait for me in the next room. Smile, damsel, smile upon me and edge the sword of justice.

Re-enter LINCO, with SYLVIA.

Daph. Here she comes. See how like an innocent she looks—But I'll begone. I trust in your worship. I hate the sight of her; I could tear her eyes out.

[Aside, and exit.]
Dorus. [Gazes at SYLVIA.] Hem, hem! I am told, young woman—hem, hem! that—She does not look so mischievous as I expected.

[Aside, and turning from her.]
Linco. Bear up, sweet shepherdess! your beauty and innocence will put injustice out of countenance.

[Apart to SYLVIA.]
Syl. The shame of being suspected confounds me, and I can't speak.

[Apart.]
Dorus. Where is the old woman, Dorcas, they told me of? Did not I order you to bring her before me?

Linco. The good old woman is so deaf, and your reverence a little thick of hearing, I thought the business would be sooner and better done by the young woman.

Dorus. What, at your thinking again! Young shepherdess, I hear—I hear—hem! Her modesty pleases me. [Aside.] What is the reason, I say—hem! that—that I hear—She has very fine features. I protest she disarms my anger.

[Aside, and turning from her.]
Linco. Now is your time; speak to his reverence.

[Apart to SYLVIA.]
Dorus. Don't whisper the prisoner.

Syl. Prisoner! Am I a prisoner, then?

Dorus. No, not absolutely a prisoner; but you are charged, damsel—hem, hem! charged, damsel—I don't know what to say to her.

[Aside.]
Syl. With what, your honour?

Linco. If he begins to damsel us, we have him sure.

[Aside.]
Syl. What is my crime?

Linco. A little too handsome, that's all.

Dorus. Hold your peace. Why don't you look up in my face, if you are innocent? [SYLVIA looks at DORUS with great modesty.] I can't stand it; she has turned my anger, my justice, and my whole scheme, topsy-turvy. [Aside.] Reach me a chair, Linco.

Linco. One sweet song, Sylvia, before his reverence gives sentence. [Reaches a chair for DORUS.]

AIR.—SYLVIA.

*From duty if the shepherd stray
And leave his flocks to feed,
The wolf will seize the harmless prey,
And innocence will bleed.* [Kneels.]

Dorus. I'll guard thee, and fold thee too, my lambkin; and they sha'n't hurt thee. This is a melting ditty, indeed! Rise, rise, my Sylvia.

[Embraces her.]

Re-enter DAPHNE.—DORUS and DAPHNE start at seeing each other.

Daph. Is your reverence taking leave of her before you drive her out of the country?

Dorus. How now! What presumption is this, to break in upon us so, and interrupt the course of justice?

Daph. May I be permitted—

Dorus. No, you may not be permitted. I'll come to you presently.

Daph. I knew the wheedling slut would spoil all.

[Aside, and exit.]

Dorus. I'm glad she's gone. Linco, you must send her away; I won't see her now.

Linco. And shall I take Sylvia to prison?

Dorus. No, no, no; to prison! mercy forbid! What a sin should I have committed to please that envious, jealous-pated shepherdess! Linco, comfort the damsel. Dry your eyes, Sylvia. I will call upon you myself, and examine Dorcas myself, and protect you myself, and do everything myself. I profess she has bewitched me—I am all agitation. [Aside.] I'll call upon you to-morrow, perhaps to-night, perhaps in half-an-hour. Take care of her, Linco. She has bewitched me; and I shall lose my wits, if I look on her any longer. Oh! the sweet, lovely, delightful creature! [Aside, and exit.]

Linco. Don't whimper now, my sweet Sylvia. Justice has taken up the sword and scales again, and your rivals shall cry their eyes out. The day's our own, so come along.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—Another part of the country.

Enter FATIMA.

Fat. Truly, a very pretty mischievous errand I am sent upon. I am to follow this foolish young fellow all about to find out his haunts: not so foolish neither, for he is so much improved of late, we shrewdly suspect that he must have some female to sharpen his intellects; for love, among many other strange things, can make fools of wits, and wits of fools. I saw our young partridge run before me, and take cover hereabouts; I must make no noise, for fear of alarming him; besides, I hate to disturb the poor things in pairing time.

[Looks through the bushes.]

Enter MERLIN, unperceived.

Mer. I shall spoil your peeping, thou evil counsellor of a faithless mistress. I must torment her a little for her good. [Aside.]

Fat. There they are; our fool has made no bad choice. Upon my word, a very pretty couple, and will make my poor lady's heart ache.

Mer. I shall twinge your's a little before we part. [Aside.]

Fat. Well said, Cymon! upon your knees to her! Now for my pocket-book, that I may exactly describe this rival of ours; she is much too handsome to live long; she will be either burnt alive, thrown to wild beasts, or shut up in the black tower; the greatest mercy she can have will be to let her take her choice. [Takes out a pocket-book.]

Mer. May be so; but we will prevent the prophecy if we can. [Aside.]

Fat. [Writes.] "She is of a good height, about my size, a fine shape, delicate features, charming hair, heavenly eyes, not unlike my own; with such a sweet smile!" She must be burnt alive! yes, yes, she must be burnt alive. [MERLIN taps her upon the shoulder with his wand.] Who's there? Bless me! nobody. I protest it startled me. I must finish my picture. [Writes, and MERLIN waves his wand over her hand.] Now let me see what I have written. Bless me, what's here? all the letters are as red as blood—my eyes fail me! sure I am bewitched. [Reads and trembles.] "Urganda has a shameful passion for Cymon; Cymon a most virtuous one for Sylvia; as for Fatima, wild beasts, the black tower, and burning alive, are too good for her." [Drops the book.] I have not power to stir a step. I knew what would come of affronting that devil, Merlin.

[MERLIN becomes visible to her.]

Mer. True, Fatima, and I am here at your call.

Fat. Oh, most magnanimous Merlin! don't set your wit to a poor, foolish, weak woman.

Mer. Why then will a foolish weak woman set her wit to me? but we will be better friends for the future. Mark me, Fatima— [Holds up his wand.]

Fat. No conjuration, I beseech your worship, and you shall do anything with me.

Mer. I want nothing of you but to hold your tongue.

Fat. Will nothing else content your fury?

Mer. Silence, babler!

Fat. [Finds great difficulty in speaking at first.] I am your own for ever, most merciful Merlin! I am your own for ever. Oh! my poor tongue, I thought I never should have wagged thee again. What a dreadful thing it would be to be dumb.

Mer. You see it is not in the power of Urganda to protect you, or to injure Cymon and Sylvia. I will be their protector against all her arts, though she has leagued herself with the demons of revenge; we have no power but what results from our virtue.

Fat. I had rather lose anything than my speech.

Mer. As you profess yourself my friend (for, with all my art, I cannot see into a woman's mind,) I will shew my gratitude, and my power, by giving your tongue an additional accomplishment.

Fat. What, shall I talk more than ever?

Mer. [Smiles.] That would be no accomplishment, Fatima: no, I mean that you should talk less. When you return to Urganda, she will be very inquisitive, and you very ready to tell her all you know.

Fat. And may I, without offence to your worship?

Mer. Silence, and mark me well—observe me truly and punctually. Every answer you give to Urganda's questions must be confined to two words, yes and no. I have done you a great favour, and you don't perceive it.

Fat. Not very clearly indeed. [Aside.]

Mer. Beware of encroaching a single monosyllable upon my injunction; the moment another word escapes you, you are dumb for ever.

Fat. Heaven preserve me! what will become of me?

Mer. Remember what I say: as you obey or neglect me, you will be punished or rewarded. Farewell. [Bows.] Remember me, Fatima. [Exit.]

Fat. What a polite devil it is; and what a woe!ful plight am I in! this confining my tongue to two words is much worse than being quite dumb; I had rather be stunted in anything than in my speech. Heigho! there never sure was a tax upon the tongue before. [Exit.]

SCENE II.

Enter CYMON.

Cymon. Shall I rejoice or grieve at the change my heart feels? thou hast given me eyes, ears, and understanding; and till they forsake me, I must be Sylvia's. Are the new pains, or the strange delights that agitate me, the greater? Oh! love, it is thy work.

Enter SYLVIA.

She is here; but pensive! Oh! my Sylvia, why this drooping mien? Has not Merlin discovered all that was unknown to us? Has he not promised us his protection? What can Sylvia want, when Cymon is completely blessed?

Syl. Thy wishes are fulfilled then; take my hand, and with it a heart which, till you had touched, never knew, nor could even imagine, what was love.

Cymon. Transporting maid! [Kisses her hand.]

AIR.—SYLVIA.

*This cold flinty heart it is you who have warm'd;
You waken'd my passions, my senses have charm'd;
In vain against merit and Cymon I strove;
What's life without passion—sweet passion of love?*

*The spring should be warm, the young season be gay,
Her birds and her flowrets make blithesome sweet May;
Love blesses the cottage, and sings through the grove
What's life without passion—sweet passion of love?*

Cymon. Thus then I seize my treasure, will protect it with my life, and will never resign it but to heaven, who gave it to me. [Embraces her.]

Enter DAMON and DORILAS on one side, and DORUS and his followers on the other, who start at seeing CYMON and SYLVIA.

Damon. Here they are!

Syl. Ha! bless me!

[Starts.]

Dorus. Fine doings, indeed!

[CYMON and SYLVIA stand amazed and ashamed.]
Doril. Your humble servant, modest madam Sylvia!

Damon. You are much improved by your new tutor!

Dorus. But I'll send her and her tutor where they shall learn better. I am confounded at their assurance! Why don't you speak, culprits?

Cymon. We may be ashamed without guilt; ashamed for those who have watched and surprised us.

Dorus. Did you ever hear or see such an impudent varlet?

Damon. Shall we seize them, your worship, and drag 'em to Urganda?

Dorus. Let me first speak with that damsel.

[As he approaches, CYMON puts her behind him.]

Cymon. That damsel is not to be spoken with.

Dorus. Here's impudence in perfection! Do you know who I am, stripling?

Cymon. I know you to be one stationed by the laws to cherish innocence; but having passions that disgrace both your age and place, you neither observe the one, nor protect the other.

Dorus. I am astonished! What, are you the foolish young fellow I have heard so much of?

Cymon. As sure as you are the wicked old fellow I have heard so much of.

Dorus. Seize them both this instant.

Cymon. That is sooner said than done, governor.

[As they approach on both sides to separate them, he snatches a staff from one of the Shepherds, and beats them back.]

Dorus. Fall on him, but don't kill him; for I must make an example of him.

Cymon. In this cause I am myself an army; see how the wretches stare, and cannot stir.

AIR.—CYMON.

Come on, come on,

A thousand to one;

I dare you to come on

Though unpractis'd and young,

Love has made me stout and strong,

Has given me a charm,

Will not suffer me to fall;

Has steel'd my heart, and nerv'd my arm,

To guard my precious all.

[Looks at SYLVIA.]

Come on, come on, &c.

[CYMON drives off the party of Shepherds on one side. DORUS and his party surround SYLVIA.]

Dorus. Away with her, away with her!

Syl. Protect me, Merlin! Cymon! Cymon! where art thou, Cymon?

Dorus. Your fool Cymon is too fond of fighting to mind his mistress; away with her to Urganda, away with her.

[They hurry her off.]

Enter Shepherds, running across, disordered and beaten by CYMON.

Damon. 'Tis the devil of a fellow: how he has laid about him!

[Looking back.—Exit.]

Doril. There is no way but this to avoid him.

[Exit.]

Re-enter CYMON, in confusion and out of breath.

Cymon. I have conquered, my Sylvia! Where art thou? my life, my love, my valour, my all? What, gone? torn from me? then I am conquered, indeed!

[He runs off, and returns several times during the symphony of the following song.]

AIR.—CYMON.

Torn from me, torn from me: which way did they take her?

To death they shall bear me,

To pieces shall tear me,

Before I'll forsake her!

Though fast bound in a spell,

By Urganda and hell,

I'll burst through their charms,

Seize my fair in my arms;

Then my valour shall prove,

No magic like virtue, like virtue and love!

SCENE III.—A Palace.

Enter URGANDA and FATIMA.

Urg. Yes! No! Forbear this mockery. What can it mean? I will not bear this trifling with my passion! Why don't you speak? [FATIMA shakes her head.] Won't you speak?

Fat. Yes.

Urg. Go on then.

Fat. No.

Urg. Will you say nothing but no?

Fat. Yes.

Urg. Distracting, treacherous Fatima! Have you seen my rival?

Fat. Yes.

Urg. Thanks, dear Fatima! Well, now go on.

Fat. No.

Urg. This is not to be borne. Was Cymon with her?

Fat. Yes.

Urg. Are they in love with each other?

Fat. Yes.

[Sighs.]

Urg. Where did you see my rival? [FATIMA shakes her head.] Are you afraid of anybody?

Fat. Yes.

Urg. Are you not afraid of me too?

Fat. No.

Urg. Insolence! Is my rival handsome? Tell me that.

Fat. Yes.

Urg. Very handsome?

Fat. Yes, yes.

Urg. How handsome? handsomer than I, or you?

Fat. Yes—No—

[Hesitating.]

Urg. I shall go distracted! Leave me.

Fat. Yes.

[Courtsies, and exit.]

Urg. She has a spell upon her, or she could not do thus. Merlin's power has prevailed—he has enchanted her, and my love and my revenge are equally disappointed. This is the completion of my misery! Bravura, Urganda! Despair and shame confound me.

Enter DORUS.

Dorus. May I presume to intrude upon my sovereign's contemplations?

Urg. Dare not to approach my misery, or thou shalt share it.

Dorus. I am gone: and Sylvia shall go too.

[Going.]

Urg. Sylvia, said you? where is she? where is she? Speak, speak; and give me life or death.

Dorus. She is without, and attends your mighty will.

Urg. Then I am a queen again! Forgive me, Dorus, I knew not what I said; but now I am raised again! Sylvia is safe?

Dorus. Yes, and I am safe too; which is no small comfort to me, considering where I have been.

Urg. And Cymon—has he escaped?

Dorus. Yes, he has escaped from us; and, what is better, we have escaped from him.

Urg. Where is he?

Dorus. Breaking the bones of every shepherd he meets.

Urg. Well, no matter; I am in possession of the present object of my passion, and I will indulge it to the height of luxury. Let 'em prepare my victim instantly for death.

Dorus. For death! Is not that going too far?

Urg. Nothing is too far; she makes me suffer ten thousand deaths, and nothing but hers can appease me. [Dorus going.] Stay, Dorus—I have a richer revenge: she shall be shut up in the black tower till her beauties are destroyed, and then I will present her to this ungrateful Cymon. Let her be brought before me, and I will feast my eyes, and ease my heart, with this devoted Sylvia. No reply; but obey.

Dorus. It is done. This is going too far.

[Aside.—Exit, shrugging up his shoulders.]

Re-enter DORUS, with SYLVIA.

Urg. Are you the wretch, the unhappy maid, who has dared to be the rival of Urganda?

Syl. I am the happy maid who possess the affections of Cymon.

Urg. Thou vain rash creature! I will make thee fear my power, and hope for my mercy.

[Waves her wand, and the scene changes to the Black Rocks.]

Syl. I am still unmoved. [Smiles.]

Urg. Thou art on the very brink of perdition, and in a moment will be closed in a tower, where thou shalt never see Cymon, or any human being more.

Syl. While I have Cymon in my heart, I bear a charm about me, to scorn your power, or, what is more, your cruelty.

[Music. URGANDA waves her wand, and the Black Tower appears.]

Urg. Open the gates, and enclose her insolence for ever.

Enter Furies, who seize SYLVIA, and put her in the Tower.

Now let Merlin release you if he can.

[It thunders; the Tower sinks, and MERLIN appears in the place where the Tower sunk. All shriek, and run off, except URGANDA, who is struck with terror.]

Mer. "Still shall my power your arts confound, And Cymon's cure shall be Urganda's wound."

[URGANDA waves her wand.]

Wretched Urganda! your power is gone.

Urg. In vain I wave this wand, I feel my power is gone. Thus I destroy the small remains of my sovereignty.

*Forgive my errors, and forget my name;
Oh! drive me hence with penitence and shame;
From Merlin, Cymon, Sylvia, let me fly,
Beholding them, my shame can never die.*

[Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—A splendid Amphitheatre.

A grand entrée of the Knights of the different orders of chivalry.

CHORUS.

*Happy Arcadia still shall be,
Ever happy, while virtuous and free.*

[Exeunt.]

B O N T O N ;

OR, HIGH LIFE ABOVE STAIRS.

A FARCE, IN TWO ACTS ;

BY DAVID GARRICK.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

LORD MINIKIN
SIR JOHN TROTIEY
COLONEL TIVY
JESSAMY
DAVY
MIGNON.

LADY MINIKIN
MISS TITTUP
GYMP.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—An apartment at Lord Minikin's.

Enter Lady MINIKIN and Miss TITTUP.

Lady M. It is not, my dear, that I have the least regard for my lord; I had no love for him before I married him, and you know, matrimony is no breeder of affection; but it hurts my pride, that he should neglect me, and run after other women.

Miss T. But pray, have you made any new discoveries of my lord's gallantry?

Lady M. New discoveries! why, I saw him myself yesterday morning in a hackney-coach, with a mixux in a pink cardinal; you shall absolutely burn your's, Tittup, for I shall never bear to see one of that colour again.

Miss T. Sure she does not suspect me. [Aside.] And where was your ladyship, pray, when you saw him?

Lady M. Taking the air with Colonel Tivy in his carriage.

Miss T. But, my dear Lady Minikin, how can you be so angry that my lord was hurting your pride, as you call it, in the hackney-coach, when you had him so much in your power, in the Colonel's carriage?

Lady M. What, with my lord's friend, and my friend's lover! [Takes her by the hand.] Oh, fie, Tittup!

Miss T. Pooh, pooh! love and friendship are very fine names, to be sure, but they are mere visiting acquaintances: we know their names, indeed; talk of 'em sometimes, and let 'em knock at our doors; but we never let 'em in, you know.

Lady M. I vow, Tittup, you are extremely polite.

Miss T. I am extremely indifferent in these affairs, thanks to my education. We must marry, you know, because other people of fashion marry; but I should think very meanly of myself, if after I were married, I should feel the least concern at all about my husband.

Lady M. I hate to praise myself, and yet I may with truth aver, that no woman of quality ever had, can have, or will have, so consummate a contempt for her lord, as I have for my most honourable and puissant Earl of Minikin, Viscount Perriwinkle, and Baron Titmouse. Ha, ha, ha!

Miss T. But, is it not strange, Lady Minikin, that merely his being your husband should create such indifference? for certainly, in every other eye, his lordship has great accomplishments.

Lady M. Accomplishments! thy head is certainly turned: if you know any of 'em, pray let's have 'em; they are a novelty, and will amuse me.

Miss T. Imprimis, he is a man of quality.

Lady M. Which, to be sure, includes all the cardinal virtues. Poor girl! go on!

Miss T. He is a very handsome man.

Lady M. He has a very bad constitution.

Miss T. He has wit.

Lady M. He is a lord, and a little goes a great way.

Miss T. He has great good nature.

Lady M. No wonder—he's a fool.

Miss T. And then his fortune, you'll allow—

Lady M. Was a great one—but he games, and, if fairly, he's undone; if not, he deserves to be hanged; and so, exit my Lord Minikin. And now, let your wise uncle, and my good cousin Sir John Trotley, baronet, enter; where is he, pray?

Miss T. In his own room, I suppose, reading pamphlets and newspapers against the enormities of the times; if he stays here a week longer, notwithstanding my expectations from him, I shall certainly affront him.

Lady M. I am a great favourite; but it is impossible much longer to act up to his very righteous idea of things. Is it not pleasant to hear him abuse everybody, and everything, and yet always finishing with a "You'll excuse me, cousin!" Ha, ha, ha!

Miss T. What do you think the Goth said to me yesterday? One of the knots of his tie hanging down his left shoulder, and his fringed cravat nicely twisted down his breast, and thrust through his gold button-hole, which looked exactly like my little Barbet's head in his gold collar:—"Niece Tittup," cries he, drawing himself up, "I protest against this manner of conducting yourself both at home and abroad."—"What are your objections, Sir John?" answered I, a little pertly.—"Various and manifold," replied he; "I have no time to enumerate particulars now, but I will venture to prophesy, if you keep whirling round the vortex of pantheons, operas, festinos, coteries, masquerades, and all the devilades in this town, your head will be giddy, down you will fall, lose the name of Lucretia, and be called nothing but Tittup ever after. You'll excuse me, cousin!" and so he left me.

Lady M. Oh, the barbarian!

Enter GYMP.

Gymp. A card, your ladyship, from Mrs. Pewitt.

Lady M. Poor Pewitt! If she can but be seen at public places, with a woman of quality, she's the happiest of plebeians. [Reads the card.] "Mrs. Pewitt's respects to Lady Minikin, and Miss Tittup; hopes to have the pleasure of attending them to Lady Filligree's ball this evening. Lady Daisey seeks masks." We'll certainly attend her. Gymp, put some message-cards upon my toilet, I'll send her an answer immediately; and tell one of my footmen, that he must make some visits for me to-day, again, and send me a list of those he made yesterday: he must be sure to call at Lady Pettitoes, and if she should unluckily be at home, he must say that he came to inquire after her sprained ancle. [Erit GYMP.]

Miss T. Ay, ay, give our compliments to her sprained ancle.

Lady M. That woman's so fat, she'll never get well of it; and I am resolved not to call at her door myself, till I am sure of not finding her at home. I am horribly low-spirited to-day. Do send your Colonel to play at chess with me: since he belonged to you, Titty, I have taken a kind of liking to him; I like everything that loves my Titty.

Miss T. I know you do, my dear lady.

Lady M. That sneer I don't like; if she suspects, I shall hate her. [Aside.] Well, dear Titty, I'll go and write my cards, and dress for the masquerade, and if that won't raise my spirits, you must assist me to plague my lord a little. [Erit.]

Miss T. Yes, and I'll plague my lady a little, or I am much mistaken. My lord shall know every tittle that has passed. What a poor, blind, half-witted, self-conceited creature this dear friend and relation of mine is! and what a fine, spirited, gallant soldier my Colonel is! My Lady Minikin likes him, he likes my fortune; my lord likes me, and I like my lord; however, not so much as he imagines, or to play the fool so rashly as he may expect. What a great revolution in this family, in the space of fifteen months! We went out of England, a very awkward, regular, good English family; but half a year in France, and a winter passed in the warmer climate of Italy, have ripened our minds to every refinement of ease, dissipation, and pleasure.

Enter Colonel TIVY.

Col. T. May I hope, madam, that your humble servant had some share in your last reverie?

Miss T. How is it possible to have the least knowledge of Colonel Tivy, and not make him the principal object of one's reflections?

Col. T. That man must have very little feeling and taste, who is not proud of a place in the thoughts of the finest woman in Europe.

Miss T. Oh fie, Colonel!

Col. T. By my honour, madam, I mean what I say.

Miss T. By your honour, Colonel! Why will you pass off your counters to me? Don't I know that you fine gentlemen regard no honour but that which is given at the gaming-table? and which indeed ought to be the only honour you should make free with.

Col. T. How can you, miss, treat me so cruelly? Have I not absolutely foresworn dice, mistress, everything, since I dared to offer myself to you?

Miss T. Yes, Colonel: and when I dare to receive you, you may return to everything again, and not violate the laws of the present happy matrimonial establishment.

Col. T. Give me but your consent, madam, and your life to come—

Miss T. Do you get my consent, Colonel, and I'll take care of my life to come.

Col. T. How shall I get your consent?

Miss T. By getting me in the humour.

Col. T. But how to get you in the humour?

Miss T. Oh! there are several ways; I am very good-natured.

Col. T. Are you in the humour now?

Miss T. Try me.

Col. T. How shall I?

Miss T. How shall I?—you a soldier, and not know the art military? How shall I?—I'll tell you how: when you have a subtle, treacherous, polite enemy to deal with, never stand shilly-shally, and lose your time in treaties and parlies, but cock your hat, draw your sword; march, beat drum,—dub, dub, a-dub—present, fire, puff puff,—'tis done! they fly, they yield—Victoria! Victoria!

[Running off.]

Col. T. Stay, stay, my dear, dear angel!

[Bringing her back.]

Miss T. No, no, no; I have no time to be killed now: besides, Lady Minikin is in the vapours, and wants you at chess, and my lord is low-spirited, and wants me at picquet; my uncle is in an ill-humour, and wants me to discard you, and go with him into the country.

Col. T. And will you, miss?

Miss T. Will I!—no, I never do as I am bid: but you ought; so go to my lady.

Col. T. Nay, but, miss—

Miss T. Nay, but, Colonel, if you won't obey your commanding officer, you should be broke, and then my maid won't accept of you; so march, Colonel!—lookye, sir! I will command before marriage, and do what I please afterwards, or I have been well educated to very little purpose. [Exit.]

Col. T. What a mad devil it is! Now, if I had the least affection for the girl, I should be d—ly vexed at this! But she has a fine fortune, and I must have her if I can. Tol, lol, lol, &c. [Exit.]

Enter Sir JOHN TROTLEY and DAVY.

Sir J. Hold your tongue, Davy; you talk like a fool.

Davy. It is a fine place, your honour, and I would live here for ever.

Sir J. More shame for you. Live here for ever! What, among thieves and pickpockets? What a revolution since my time! the more I see, the more I've cause for lamentation! what a dreadful change has time brought about in twenty years! I should not have known the place again, nor the people. All the signs, that made so noble an appearance, are all taken down; not a bob or a tie-wig to be seen; all the degrees, from the Parade in St. James's Park, to the stool and brush at the corner of every street, have their hair tied up—and that's the reason so many heads are tied up every month.

Davy. I shall have my head tied up to-morrow; Mr. Wisp will do it for me: your honour and I look like Philistines among them.

Sir J. And I shall break your head if it is tied up; I hate innovations; all confusion, and no distinction! The streets now are as smooth as a turnpike-road! no rattling and exercise in the hackney-coaches; those who ride in them are all fast asleep; and they have strings in their hands, that the coachman must pull to wake them when they are to be set down: what luxury and abomination!

Davy. Is it so, your honour; 'feckins, I like it hugely.

Sir J. But you must hate and detest London.

Davy. How can I manage that, your honour, when there is everything to delight my eye, and cherish my heart?

Sir J. 'Tis all deceit and delusion.

Davy. Such crowding, coaching, carting, and squeezing; such a power of fine sights; fine shops full of fine things; and then such fine illuminations all of a row! and such fine dainty ladies in the streets, so civil and so graceless: they talk of country girls; these here look more healthy and rosy by half.

Sir J. Sirrah! they are prostitutes: and are civil to delude and destroy you.

Davy. Bless us, bless us! How does your honour know all this? Were they as bad in your time?

Sir J. Not by half, Davy: in my time, there was a sort of decency in the worst of women; but the harlots now watch like tigers for their prey; and drag you to their dens of infamy.—See, Davy, how they have torn my neckcloth. [Shows his neckcloth.]

Davy. If you had gone civilly, your honour, they would not have hurt you.

Sir J. Well, we'll get away as fast as we can.

Davy. Not this month, I hope; for I have not had half my bellyful yet.

Sir J. I'll knock you down, Davy, if you grow profligate; you sha'n't go out again to-night, and to-morrow keep in my room, and stay till I can look over my things, and see they don't cheat you.

Davy. Your honour then won't keep your word with me?

Sir J. Why, what did I promise you?

Davy. That I should take sixteenp'orth at one of the theatres to-night, and a shilling place at the other to-morrow.

Sir J. Well, well, so I did. Is it a moral piece, Davy?

Davy. Oh! yes, and written by a clergyman; it is called the "Rival Cannanites; or the Tragedy of Braggadocia."

Sir J. Be a good lad, and I won't be worse than my word; there's money for you. [Gives him money.] But come straight home, for I shall want to go to bed.

Davy. To be sure, your honour—as I am to go so soon, I'll make a night of it. [Aside, and exit.]

Sir J. This fellow would turn rake and macaroni if he were to stay here a week longer. Bless me, what dangers are in this town at every step! My niece, Lucretia, is so be-fashioned and be-devilled, that nothing, I fear, can save her; however, to ease my conscience, I must try; but what can be expected from the young women of these times, but sallow looks, wild schemes, saucy words, and loose morals! They lie a-bed all day, sit up all night; if they are silent, they are gaming, and if they talk, 'tis either scandal or infidelity; and that they may look what they are, their heads are all feather, and round their necks are twisted rattle-snake tippets. O tempora, O mores! [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Lord Minikin's Dressing-room.

Lord MINIKIN discovered in his dressing-gown, with JESSAMY and MIGNON.

Lord M. Pr'ythee, Mignon, don't plague me any more; dost think that a nobleman's head has nothing to do but be tortured all day under thy infernal fingers? Give me my clothes.

Mignon. Ven you lose your money, my lor, you no good humour; the devil may dress your cheveu for me! [Exit.]

Lord M. That fellow's an impudent rascal; but he's a genius, so I must bear with him. Oh, my head!—a chair, Jessamy! I must absolutely change my wine-merchant; I can't taste his champagne without disordering myself for a week. Heigho!

Enter Miss TITTUP.

Miss T. What makes you sigh, my lord?

Lord M. Because you were so near me, child.

Miss T. Indeed! I should rather have thought my lady had been with you. By your looks, my lord, I am afraid Fortune jilted you last night.

Lord M. No, faith! our champagne was not good yesterday, and I am vapoured like our English November; but one glance of my Tittup can dispel vapours like—like—

Miss T. Like something very fine, to be sure: but pray keep your simile for the next time; and harkye! a little prudence will not be amiss; Mr. Jessamy will think you mad, and me worse.

[Half aside.]

Jes. Oh! pray don't mind me, madam.

Lord M. Gadso! Jessamy, look out my domino, and I'll ring the bell when I want you.

Jes. I shall, my lord. Miss thinks that everybody is blind in the house but herself. [Aside, and exit.]

Miss T. Upon my word, my lord, you must be a little more prudent, or we shall become the town-talk.

Lord M. And so I will, my dear; and therefore, to prevent surprise, I'll lock the door.

Miss T. What do you mean, my lord?

Lord M. Prudence, child, prudence; I keep all my jewels under lock and key.

Miss T. You are not in possession yet, my lord. I cannot stay two minutes; I only came to tell you that Lady Minikin saw us yesterday, in the hackney-coach: she did not know me, I believe; she pretends to be greatly uneasy at your neglect of her; she certainly has some mischief in her head.

Lord M. No intention, I hope, of being fond of me?

Miss T. No, no, make yourself easy; she hates you most unalterably.

Lord M. You have given me spirits again.

Miss T. Her pride is alarmed, that you should prefer any of the sex to her.

Lord M. Her pride, then, has been alarmed ever since I had the honour of knowing her.

Miss T. But, dear my lord, let us be merry and wise; should she ever be convinced that we have a tendre for each other, she certainly would proclaim it, and then—

Lord M. We should be envied, and she would be laughed at, my sweet cousin.

Miss T. Nay, I would have her mortified too; for though I love her ladyship sincerely, I cannot say but I love a little mischief as sincerely; but, then, if my uncle Trotley should know of our affairs, he is so old-fashioned, prudish, and out-of-the-way, he would either strike me out of his will, or insist upon my quitting the house.

Lord M. My good cousin is a queer mortal, that's certain; I wish we could get him handsomely into the country again. He has a fine fortune to leave behind him.

Miss T. But then he lives so regularly, and never makes use of a physician, that he may live these twenty years.

Lord M. What can we do with the barbarian?

Miss T. I don't know what's the matter with me, but I am really in fear of him; I suppose, reading his formal books when I was in the country with him, and going so constantly to church, with my elbows stuck to my hips, and my toes turned in, have given me these foolish prejudices.

Lord M. Then you must affront him, or you'll never get the better of him.

Sir J. [Knocking without.] My lord, my lord, are you busy?

Miss T. Heavens! 'tis that detestable brute, my uncle!

Lord M. That horrid dog, my cousin!

Miss T. What shall we do, my lord?

Sir J. Nay, my lord, my lord, I heard you; pray let me speak with you.

Lord M. Oh! Sir John, is it you? I beg your pardon, I'll put up my papers, and open the door.

Miss T. Stay, stay, my lord; I would not meet him now for the world; if he sees me here alone with you, he'll rave like a madman: put me up the chimney; anywhere.

Lord M. [Aloud.] I'm coming, Sir John! Here, here! get behind my great chair; he sha'n't see you, and you may see all; I'll be short and pleasant with him.

[Puts her behind the chair, and opens the door.]

Enter Sir JOHN.—[During this scene Lord MINIKIN turns the chair, as Sir JOHN moves, to conceal Miss T.]

Sir J. You'll excuse me, my lord, that I have broken in upon you: I heard you talking pretty loud. What have you nobody with you? what were you about, cousin? [Looking about.]

Lord M. A particular affair, Sir John: I always lock myself up to study my speeches, and speak them aloud for the sake of the tone and action.

Sir J. [Sits down.] Ay, ay, 'tis the best way. I am sorry I disturbed you; you'll excuse me, cousin!

Lord M. I am rather obliged to you, Sir John; intense application to these things ruins my health; but one must do it for the sake of the nation.

Sir J. May be so: I hope the nation will be the better for't—you'll excuse me!

Lord M. Excuse me, Sir John: I love your frankness. But why won't you be franker still? we have always something for dinner, and you will never dine at home.

Sir J. You must know, my lord, that I love to know what I eat;—I hate to travel, where I don't know my way: and since you have brought in foreign fashions and figaries, everything and everybody are in masquerade: your men and manners, too, are as much frittered and fricased, as your beef and mutton; I love a plain dish, my lord. But to the point; I came, my lord, to open my mind to you about my niece Tittup; shall I do it freely?

Lord M. The freer the better; Tittup's a fine girl, cousin, and deserves all the kindness you can shew her.

[Lord M. and Miss T. make signs at each other.]

Sir J. She must deserve it, though, before she shall have it; and I would have her begin with lengthening her petticoats, covering her shoulders, and wearing a cap upon her head.

Lord M. Don't you think a taper leg, falling shoulders, and fine hair, delightful objects, Sir John?

Sir J. And therefore ought to be concealed; 'tis their interest to conceal them; when you take from the men the pleasure of imagination, there will be a scarcity of husbands; and then taper legs, falling shoulders, and fine hair, may be had for nothing.

Lord M. Well said, Sir John. Ha, ha!—your niece shall wear a horseman's coat and jack-boots to please you. Ha, ha, ha!

Sir J. You may sneer, my lord; but for all that, I think my niece in a bad way; she must leave me and the country, forsooth, to travel and see good company and fashions; I have seen them too, and wish from my heart that she is not much the worse for the journey—you'll excuse me.

Lord M. But why in a passion, Sir John? Don't you think that my lady and I shall be able and willing to put her into the road?

Sir J. Zounds! my lord, you are out of it yourself. This comes of your travelling; all the town know how you and my lady live together; and I must tell you—you'll excuse me,—that my niece suffers by the bargain; prudence, my lord, is a very fine thing.

Lord M. So is a long neckcloth nicely twisted into a button-hole; but I don't choose to wear one—you'll excuse me!

Sir J. I wish that he who first changed long neckcloths for such things as you wear, had the wearing of a twisted neckcloth that I would give him.

[Rises.]

Lord M. Pr'ythee, baronet, don't be so horribly out-of-the-way; prudence is a very vulgar virtue, and so incompatible with our present ease and refinement, that a prudent man of fashion is now as great a miracle as a pale woman of quality; we got rid of our mauvaise honte, at the same time that we imported our neighbour's rouge and their morals.

Sir J. Did you ever hear the like! I am not surprised, my lord, that you think so lightly, and talk so vainly, who are so polite a husband: your lady, my cousin, is a fine woman, and brought you a fine fortune, and deserves better usage.

Lord M. Will you have her, Sir John? she is much at your service.

Sir J. Profligate! What did you marry her for, my lord?

Lord M. Convenience. Marriage is not, nowadays, an affair of inclination, but convenience; and they who marry for love, and such old-fashioned stuff, are to me as ridiculous as those that advertise for an agreeable companion in a post-chaise.

Sir J. I have done, my lord; Miss Tittup shall either return with me into the country, or not a penny shall she have from Sir John Trotley, baronet. [Whistles and walks about.] Pray, my lord, what husband is this you have provided for her?

Lord M. A friend of mine; a man of wit, and a fine gentleman.

Sir J. May be so, and yet make a d—d bad husband for all that. You'll excuse me! What estate has he, pray?

Lord M. He's a colonel; his elder brother, Sir Tan Tivy, will certainly break his neck, and then my friend will be a happy man.

Sir J. Here's morals! a happy man when his brother has broken his neck! A happy man! Mercy on me!

Lord M. Why, he'll have six thousand a-year, Sir John—

Sir J. I don't care what he'll have, nor I don't care what he is, nor who my niece marries; she is a fine lady, and let her have a fine gentleman; I sha'n't hinder her. I'll away into the country to-morrow, and leave you to your fine doings; I have no relish for them, not I; I can't live among you, nor game with you; I hate cards and dice; I will neither rob nor be robbed; I am contented with what I have, and am very happy, my lord, though my brother has not broken his neck—you'll excuse me! [Exit.]

Lord M. Ha, ha, ha! Come, fox, come out of your hole! Ha, ha, ha!

Miss T. Indeed, my lord, you have undone me; not a foot shall I have of Trotley Manor, that's positive! But no matter, there's no danger of his breaking his neck, so I'll e'en make myself happy with what I have, and behave to him for the future, as if he were a poor relation.

Lord M. [Kneeling and kissing her hand.] I must kneel and adore you for your spirit, my sweet, heavenly Lucretia!

Re-enter Sir JOHN.

Sir J. [Starts.] One thing I had forgot—

Miss T. Ha! he's here again!

Sir J. Why, what the devil!—Heigho! my niece Lucretia, and my virtuous lord, studying speeches for the good of the nation. Yes, yes, you have been making fine speeches, indeed, my lord; and your arguments have prevailed, I see. I beg your pardon, I did not mean to interrupt your studies—you'll excuse me, my lord!

Lord M. [Smiling and mocking him.] You'll excuse me, Sir John!

Sir J. Oh! yes, my lord; but I'm afraid the devil won't excuse you at the proper time. Miss Lucretia, how do you, child? You are to be married soon: I wish the gentleman joy, Miss Lucretia; he is a happy man to be sure, and will want nothing but the breaking of his brother's neck to be completely so.

Miss T. Upon my word, uncle, you are always putting bad constructions upon things; my lord has been soliciting me to marry his friend—and having that moment—extorted a consent from me—he was thanking—and—and—wishing me joy—in his foolish manner. [Hesitating.]

Sir J. Is that all! But how came you here, child? Did you fly down from the chimney, or in at the window? for I don't remember seeing you when I was here before.

Miss T. How can you talk so, Sir John? You really confound me with your suspicions; and then you ask so many questions, and I have so many things to do, that—that—upon my word, if I don't make haste, I sha'n't get my dress ready for the ball, so I must run. You'll excuse me, uncle!

[Exit running.]

Sir J. A fine hopeful young lady that, my lord.

Lord M. She's well bred, and has wit.

Sir J. She has wit and breeding enough to laugh at her relations, and bestow favours on your lordship; but I must tell you plainly, my lord, you'll excuse me, that your marrying your lady, my cousin, to use her ill, and sending for my niece, your cousin, to debauch her—

Lord M. You're warm, Sir John, and don't know the world; and I never contend with ignorance and passion. Live with me some time, and you'll be satisfied of my honour and good intentions to you and your family; in the meantime, command my house. I must away immediately to Lady Filligree's; and I am sorry you won't make one with us. Here, Jessamy, give me my domino, and call a chair; and don't let my uncle wait for anything. You'll excuse me, Sir John. Tol, lol, de rol, &c.

[Exit, singing.]

Sir J. The world's at an end! Here's fine work! here are precious doings! This lord is a pillar of the state, too! no wonder that the building is in danger with such rotten supporters. Heigho! And then, my poor Lady Minikin, what a friend and husband she is blessed with! Let me consider—should I tell the good woman of these pranks, I may only make more mischief, and, mayhap, go near to kill her, for she's as tender as she's virtuous. Poor lady! I'll e'en go and comfort her directly, and endeavour to draw her from the wickedness of this town into the country, where she shall have reading, fowling, and fishing, to keep up her spirits; and when I die, I will leave her that part of my fortune with which I intended to reward the virtues of Miss Lucretia Tittup, with a plague to her! [Exit.]

SCENE III.—Lady Minikin's Apartment.

Lady MINIKIN and Colonel TIVY discovered.

Lady M. Don't urge it, Colonel; I can't think of coming home from the masquerade this evening; though I should pass for my niece, it would make an uproar among the servants; and, perhaps, from the mistake, break off your match with Tittup.

Col. T. My dear Lady Minikin, you know my marriage with your niece is only a secondary consideration; my first and principal object is you—you, madam: therefore, my dear lady, give me your promise to leave the ball with me. You must, Lady Minikin; a bold young fellow and a soldier, as I am, ought not to be kept from plunder when the town has capitulated.

Lady M. But it has not capitulated, and, perhaps, never will: however, Colonel, since you are so furious, I must come to terms, I think. Keep your eyes upon me at the ball; I think I may expect that; and when I drop my handkerchief, 'tis your signal for pursuing. I shall get home as fast as I can, you may follow me as fast as you can: Gymp will let us in the back way—No, no! my heart misgives me!

Col. T. Then I am miserable!

Lady M. Nay, rather than you should be miserable, Colonel, I will indulge your martial spirit: meet me in the field; there's my gauntlet.

[Throws down her glove.]

Col. T. [Seizing her.] Thus I accept your sweet challenge; and, if I fail you, may I hereafter, both in love and war, be branded with the name of coward.

[Kneels and kisses her hand.]

Enter Sir JOHN TROTLEY.

Sir J. May I presume, cousin—

Lady M. Ha!

[Squalls.]

Sir J. Mercy upon us! what are we at now?

Lady M. How can you be so rude, Sir John, to come into a lady's room without first knocking at the door? You have frightened me out of my wits.

Sir J. I am sure you have frightened me out of mine.

Col. T. Such rudeness deserves death.

Sir J. Death, indeed! for I never shall recover myself again. All pigs of the same styel! all studs for the good of the nation!

[Aside.]

Lady M. We must soothe him, and not provoke him.

[Apart to the Colonel.]

Col. T. I would cut his throat, if you'd permit me.

[Apart to Lady M.]

Sir J. The devil has got his hoof in the house, and has corrupted the whole family; I'll get out of it as fast as I can, lest he should lay hold of me, too.

[Going.]

Lady M. Sir John, I must insist upon your not going away in a mistake.

Sir J. No mistake, my lady; I am thoroughly convinced. Mercy on me!

Lady M. I must beg you, Sir John, not to make any wrong constructions upon this accident. You must know, that the moment you was at the door, I had promised the Colonel no longer to be his enemy in his designs upon Miss Tittup; this threw him into such a rapture, that upon my promising my interest with you, and wishing him joy, he fell upon his knees, and—and—[laughing—]ha, ha, ha!

Col. T. Ha, ha, ha! Yes, yes, I fell upon my knees, and—and—

Sir J. Ay, ay; fell upon your knees, and—and—ha, ha! A very good joke, faith! and the best of it is, that they are wishing joy all over the house upon the same occasion: and my lord is wishing joy; and I wish him joy, and you, with all my heart.

Lady M. Upon my word, Sir John, your cruel suspicions affect me strongly; and though my resentment is curbed by my regard, my tears cannot be restrained; 'tis the only resource my innocence has left.

[Exit.]

Col. T. I reverence you, sir, as a relation to that lady; but, as her slanderer, I detest you. Her tears must be dried, and my honour satisfied: you know what I mean; take your choice—time, place, sword, or pistol; consider it calmly, and determine as you please. I am a soldier, Sir John.

[Exit.]

Sir J. Very fine, truly! and so, between the crocodile and the bully, my throat is to be cut: they are guilty of all sorts of iniquity, and when they are discovered, no humility, no repentance! The ladies have recourse to their tongues or their tears, and the gallants to their swords. That I may not be drawn in by the one, or drawn upon by the other, I'll hurry into the country while I retain my senses, and can sleep in a whole skin.

[Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—An Apartment at Lord Minikin's.

Enter Sir JOHN TROTLEY and JESSAMY.

Sir J. There is no bearing this! what a land are we in! Upon my word, Mr. Jessamy, you should look well to the house; there are certainly rogues about it: for I did but cross the way just now to the pamphlet-shop, to buy a Touch at the Times, and they had a pluck at my watch; but I heard of their tricks, and had it sewed to my pocket.

Jes. Don't be alarmed, Sir John, 'tis a very common thing; and if you walk the streets without convoy, you will be picked up by privateers of all kinds. Ha, ha!

Sir J. Not be alarmed when I am robbed! Why, they might have cut my throat. I sha'n't sleep a wink all night; so, pray, lend me some weapon of defence; for I am sure, if they attack me in the open street, they'll be with me at night again.

Jes. I'll lend you my duelling-pistols, Sir John. Be assured there's no danger; there's robbing and murder cried every night under my window; but it no more disturbs me, than the ticking of my watch at my bed's head.

Sir J. Well, well; be that as it will, I must be upon guard. What a dreadful place this is! but 'tis all owing to the corruption of the times; the great folks game, and the poor folks rob; no wonder that murder ensues. Sad, sad, sad! Well, let me but get over to-night, and I'll leave this den of thieves to-morrow. How long will your lord and lady stay at this masking and mummery before they come home?

Jes. 'Tis impossible to say the time, sir; that merely depends upon the spirits of the company, and the nature of the entertainment; for my own part, I generally make it myself till four or five in the morning.

Sir J. Why, what the devil, do you make one at these masqueradings?

Jes. I seldom miss, sir; I may venture to say that nobody knows the trim and small talk of the place better than I do: I was always reckoned an incomparable mask.

Sir J. Thou art an incomparable coxcomb, I am sure. [Aside.]

Jes. An odd, ridiculous accident happened to me at a masquerade three years ago; I was in tip-top spirits, and had drunk a little too freely of the champagne, I believe—

Sir J. You'll be hanged, I believe. [Aside.]

Jes. Wit flew about—in short, I was in spirits: at last, from drinking and rattling, to vary the pleasure, we went to dancing; and who do you think I danced a minuet with? He, he, he! Pray, guess, Sir John.

Sir J. Danced a minuet with! [Aside.]

Jes. My own lady, that's all. The eyes of the whole assembly were upon us; my lady dances well, and I believe I am pretty tolerable: after the dance I was running into a little coquetry and small talk with her.

Sir J. With your lady? Chaos is come again! [Aside.]

Jes. With my lady. But, upon my turning my hand thus, [conceitedly] egad! she caught me; whispered me who I was. I would fain have laughed her out of it, but it would not do: "No, no, Jessamy," says she, "I am not to be deceived: pray, wear gloves for the future; for you may as well go barefaced, as shew that hand and diamond ring."

Sir J. What a sink of iniquity! Prostitution on all sides, from the lord to the pickpocket. [Aside.] Pray, Mr. Jessamy, among your other virtues, I suppose you game a little, eh! Mr. Jessamy?

Jes. A little whist or so: but I am tied up from the dice; I must never touch a box again.

Sir J. I wish you were tied up somewhere else. [Aside.] I shall go to my room: and let my lord and lady, and my niece Tittup know, that I beg they will excuse ceremony; that I must be up and gone before they go to bed; that I have a most profound respect and love for them, and—that I hope we shall never see one another again as long as we live.

Jes. I shall certainly obey your commands. What poor ignorant wretches these country gentlemen are! [Aside, and exit.]

Sir J. If I stay in this place another day, it would throw me into a fever. Oh! I wish it were morning! This comes of visiting my relations! [Enter DAVY, drunk.] So, you wicked wretch, you! where have you been, and what have you been doing?

Davy. Merry-making, your honour. London for ever.

Sir J. And did I not order you not to make a jackanapes of yourself and tie your hair up like a monkey?

Davy. And, therefore, I did it: no pleasing the ladies without this. My lord's servants call you an old out-of-fashioned codger, and have taught me what's what.

Sir J. Here's an imp of the devil! He is undone, and will poison the whole country. Sirrah! get everything ready; I'll be going directly.

Davy. To bed, sir? I want to go to bed myself, sir.

Sir J. Why, how now! you are drunk, too, sirrah!

Davy. I am a little, your honour; because I have been drinking.

Sir J. That is not all; but you have been in bad company, sirrah!

Davy. Indeed, your honour's mistaken; I never kept such good company in all my life.

Sir J. The fellow does not understand me. Where have you been, you drunkard?

Davy. Drinking, to be sure, if I am a drunkard; and if you had been drinking, too, as I have been, you would not be in such a passion with a body; it makes one so good-natured.

Sir J. There is another addition to my misfortunes! I shall have this fellow carry into the country as many vices as will corrupt the whole parish.

Davy. I'll take what I can, to be sure, your worship.

Sir J. Get away, you beast, you! and sleep off the debauchery you have contracted this fortnight, or I shall leave you behind, as a proper person to make one of his lordship's family.

Davy. So much the better: give me more wages, less work, and the key of the ale-cellar, and I am your servant; if not, provide yourself with another.

[Struts about.]

Sir J. Here's a reprobate! This is the completion of my misery! But, harkye, villain! go to bed, and sleep off your iniquity, and then pack up the things, or I'll pack you off to Newgate, and transport you for life, you rascal, you! [Exit.]

Davy. That for you, old codger! [Snapping his fingers.] I know the law better than to be frightened with moonshine. I wish that I were to live here all my days. This is life, indeed! a servant lives up to his eyes in clover; they have wages and board wages, and nothing to do but to grow fat and saucy: they are as happy as their master; they play for ever at cards, swear like emperors, drink like fishes, and go a-wenching with as much ease and tranquillity, as if they were going to a sermon. Oh! 'tis a fine life! [Exit, reeling.]

SCENE II.—A Chamber in Lord Minikin's house.

Enter Lord MINIKIN and Miss TITTUP, in masquerade dresses, lighted by JESSAMY.

Lord M. Set down the candles, Jessamy; and should your lady come home, let me know. Be sure you are not out of the way.

Jes. I have lived too long with your lordship to need the caution. Who the devil have we got now? but that's my lord's business, and not mine. [Exit.]

Miss T. [Putting off her mask.] Upon my word, my lord, this coming home so soon from the masquerade is very imprudent, and will certainly be observed. I am most inconceivably frightened, I can assure you. My uncle Trotley has a light in his room; the accident this morning will certainly keep him upon the watch. Pray, my lord, let us defer our meetings till he goes into the country. I find that my English heart, though it has ventured so far, grows fearful, and awkward to practise the freedoms of warmer climes. [Lord M. takes her by the hand.] If you will not desist, my lord, we are separated for ever. The sight of the precipice turns my head; I have been giddy with it too long, and must turn from it while I can. Pray, be quiet, my lord, I will meet you to-morrow.

Lord M. To-morrow! 'tis an age in my situation. Let the weak, bashful, coyish winner be intimidated with these faint alarms; but let the bold experienced lover kindle at the danger, and, like the eagle in the midst of storms, thus pounce upon his prey. [Takes hold of her.]

Miss T. Dear Mr. Eagle, be merciful; pray, let the poor pigeon fly for this once.

Lord M. If I do, my dove, may I be cursed to have my wife as fond of me, as I am now of thee.

[Offers to kiss her.]

Jes. [Without, knocking.] My lord, my lord!

Miss T. [Screams.] Ah!

Lord M. Who's there?

Jes. [Peeping.] 'Tis I, my lord; may I come in?

Lord M. D—n the fellow! What's the matter?

Jes. Nay, not much, my lord; only my lady's come home.

Miss T. Then I'm undone! What shall I do? I'll run into my own room.

Lord M. Then she may meet you.

Jes. There's a dark deep closet, my lord. Miss may hide herself there.

Miss T. For heaven's sake! put me into it; and when her ladyship's safe, let me know, my lord. What an escape have I had! [Goes into the closet.]

Lord M. The moment her evil spirit is laid, I'll let my angel out. Lock the door on the inside. Come softly to my room, Jessamy.

Jes. If a board creaks, your lordship shall never be liberal to me again. [Exeunt on tiptoe.]

Enter GYMP, lighting in Lady MINIKIN and Colonel TIVY, in masquerade dresses.

Gymp. Pray, my lady, go no further with the Colonel; I know you mean nothing but innocence; but I'm sure there will be bloodshed, for my lord is certainly in the house. I'll take my affidavit that I heard—

Col. T. It can't be, I tell you; we left him this moment at the masquerade: I spoke to him before I came out.

Lady M. He's too busy, and too well employed to think of home. But don't tremble so, Gymp. There is no harm, I assure you. The Colonel is to marry my niece, and it is proper to settle some matters relating to it—they are left to us.

Gymp. Yes, yes, madam, to be sure, it is proper that you talk together. I know you mean nothing but innocence; but, indeed, there will be bloodshed.

Col. T. The girl's a fool. I have no sword by my side.

Gymp. But my lord has, and you may kill one another with that. I know you mean nothing but innocence; but I certainly heard him go up the back-stairs into his own room, talking with Jessamy.

Lady M. 'Tis impossible but the girl must have fancied this. Can't you ask Whisp, or Mignon, if their master is come in?

Gymp. Lud! my lady, they are always drunk before this, and asleep in the kitchen.

Lady M. This frightened fool has made me as ridiculous as herself. Hark! Colonel, I'll swear there is something upon the stairs. Now I am in the field I find I am a coward.

Gymp. There will certainly be bloodshed.

Col. T. I'll slip down with Gymp this back way, then. [Going.]

Gymp. Oh, dear! my lady, there is something coming up there, too.

Col. T. Zounds! I've got between two fires!

Lady M. Run into the closet.

Col. T. [Runs to the closet.] There's no retreat; the door is locked.

Lady M. Behind the chimney-board, Gymp.

Col. T. I shall certainly be taken prisoner. [Gets behind the chimney-board.] You'll let me know when the enemy's decamped.

Lady M. Leave that to me. Do you, Gymp, go down the back-stairs, and leave me to face my lord; I think I can match him at hypocrisy.

[Sits down.]

Enter Lord MINIKIN.

Lord M. What, is your ladyship so soon returned from Lady Fillagree's?

Lady M. I am sure, my lord, I ought to be more surprised at your being here so soon, when I saw you so well entertained in a tête-à-tête with a lady in crimson: such sights, my lord, will always drive me from my most favourite amusements.

Lord M. [Seated.] You find, at least, that the lady, whoever she was, could not engage me to stay, when I found your ladyship had left the ball.

Lady M. Your lordship's sneering upon my unhappy temper may be a proof of your wit, but it is none of your humanity; and this behaviour is as great an insult upon me, as even your falsehood itself. [Pretends to weep.]

Lord M. Nay, my dear Lady Minikin, if you are resolved to play tragedy, I shall roar away too, and pull out my cambric handkerchief.

Lady M. I think, my lord, we had better retire to our apartments; my weakness and your brutality will only expose us to the servants. Where is Tittup, pray?

Lord M. I left her with the Colonel; a masquerade to young folks upon the point of matrimony, is as delightful as it is disgusting to those who are happily married, and are wise enough to love home, and the company of their wives.

[Takes hold of her hand.]

Lady M. False man! I had as lieve a toad touched me. [Aside.]

Lord M. She gives me the frisoone. I must propose to stay, or I shall never get rid of her. [Aside.] I am aguish to-night. He, he! Do, my dear, let us make a little fire here, and have a family tête-à-tête, by way of novelty. [Rings.]

Enter JESSAMY.

Let them take away that chimney-board, and light a fire here immediately.

Lady M. What shall I do? [Aside, and greatly alarmed.] Here, Jessamy, there is no occasion; I am going to my own chamber, and my lord won't stay here by himself. [Exit JESSAMY.]

Lord M. How cruel it is, Lady Minikin, to deprive me of the pleasure of a domestic duetto. A good escape, faith! [Aside.]

Lady M. I have too much regard for Lord Minikin to agree to anything that would afford him so little pleasure. I shall retire to my own apartment.

Lord M. Well, if your ladyship will be cruel, I must still, like the miser, starve and sigh, though possessed of the greatest treasure. [Bows.] I wish your ladyship a good night. [He takes one candle, and Lady MINIKIN the other.] May I presume—

[Salutes her.]

Lady M. Your lordship is too obliging. Nasty man! [Aside.]

Lord M. Disagreeable woman!

[Aside.—They wipe their lips, and exeunt.]

Miss T. [Peeping out of the closet.] All's silent now, and quite dark; what has been doing here, I cannot guess: I long to be relieved; I wish my lord were come—but I hear a noise. [Shuts the door.]

Col. T. [Peeping over the chimney-board.] I wonder my lady does not come. I would not have Miss Tittup know of this; 'twould be ten thousand pounds out of my way, and I can't afford to give so much for a little gallantry.

Miss T. [Comes forward.] What would my Colonel say, to find his bride that is to be, in this critical situation?

Enter Lord MINIKIN, in the dark.

Lord M. Now to release my prisoner.

[Comes forward.]

Enter Lady MINIKIN.

Lady M. My poor Colonel will be as miserable as if he were bedridden in garrison: I must release him. [Going towards the chimney.]

Lord M. Hist, hist!

Miss T.

Lord M. { Here, here!

Cok T.

Lord M. This way.

Lady M. Softly.

[Lord M. lays hold of Lady M. and the Colonel of Miss T.]

Sir J. [Without.] Lights this way, I say; get a blunderbuss.

Enter Sir JOHN TROTLEY, in his night-cap, and sword drawn, with JESSAMY.

Jes. Indeed, you dreamt it, there is nobody but the family. [All stand and stare.]

Sir J. Give me the candle, I'll ferret them out, I warrant. Bring a blunderbuss, I say: they have been skipping about that gallery in the dark this half-hour; there must be mischief. I have watched them into this room. Ho, ho! are you there? If you stir, you are dead men; [they retire] and [seeing the ladies] women, too! Egad—eh! What's this? the same party again! and two couple they are of as choice mortals as ever were hatched in this righteous town! you'll excuse me, cousins.

Lord M. In the name of wonder, how comes all this about?

Sir J. Well, but, harkye! my dear cousins, have you not got wrong partners? Here has been some mistake in the dark; I am mightily glad that I have brought you a candle to set all to rights again: you'll excuse me, gentlemen and ladies.

Enter GYMP, with a light.

Gymp. What in the name of mercy is the matter?

Sir J. Why the old matter, and the old game, Mrs. Gymp; and I'll match my cousins here at it against all the world, and I say done first.

Lord M. What is the meaning, Sir John, of all this tumult and consternation? May not Lady Minikin and I, and the Colonel and your niece, be seen in my house together without your raising the family, and making this uproar and confusion?

Sir J. Come, come, good folks, I see you are all confounded; I'll settle this matter in a moment. As for you, Colonel, though you have not deserved plain dealing from me, I will now be serious: you imagine this young lady has an independent fortune, besides expectations from me: 'tis a mistake, she has no expectations from me, if she marry you; and if I don't consent to her marriage, she will have no fortune at all.

Col. T. Plain dealing is a jewel; and to shew you, Sir John, that I can pay you in kind, I am most sincerely obliged to you for your intelligence: and I am, ladies, your most obedient, humble servant. I shall see you, my lord, at the club to-morrow. [Exit.]

Lord M. Sans doute, mon cher Colonel! I'll meet you there without fail.

Sir J. My lord, you'll have something else to do.

Lord M. Indeed! what is that, good Sir John?

Sir J. You must meet your lawyers and creditors to-morrow, and be told what you have always turned a deaf ear to—that the dissipation of your fortune and morals must be followed by years of parsimony and repentance; as you are fond of going abroad, you may indulge that inclination without having it in your power to indulge any other.

Lord M. The bumpkin is no fool, and is d—d satirical. [Aside.]

Sir J. You are silent, ladies. If repentance has subdued your tongues, I shall have hopes of you. A little country air might, perhaps, do as well: as you are distressed, I am at your service. What say you, my lady?

Lady M. However appearances have condemned me, give me leave to disavow the substance of those appearances. My mind has been tainted, but not profligate; your kindness and example may restore me to my former natural English constitution.

Sir J. Will you resign your lady to me, my lord, for a time?

Lord M. For ever, dear Sir John, without a murmur.

Sir J. Well, miss, and what say you?

Miss T. Guilty, uncle. [Curtseying.]

Sir J. Guilty! the devil you are? of what?

Miss T. Of consenting to marry one whom my heart does not approve, and coquetting with another, which friendship, duty, honour, morals, and everything but fashion, ought to have forbidden.

Sir J. Thus, then, with the wife of one under this arm, and the mistress of another under this, I sally forth a knight-errant, to rescue distressed damsels from those monsters, foreign vices and bon ton, as they call it; and I trust that every English hand and heart here will assist me in so desperate an undertaking. You'll excuse me, sirs! [Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Merchant's Counting-house.

Several Clerks are employed at their desks; STOCKWELL is discovered reading a letter; STUKELY comes out of the back room.

Stuke. He seems disordered: something in that letter; and, I'm afraid, of an unpleasant sort. He has many ventures of great account at sea; a ship richly freighted for Barcelona; another for Lisbon; and others expected from Cadiz, of still greater value. Besides these, I know he has many deep concerns in foreign bottoms, and underwritings to a vast amount. I'll accost him: sir—Mr. Stockwell.

Stock. Stukely! Well, have you shipped the cloths?

Stuke. I have, sir; here's the bill of lading, and copy of the invoice! the assortments are all compared: Mr. Traffic will give you the policy upon 'Change.

Stock. 'Tis very well: lay these papers by; and no more business for a while. Shut the door, Stukely; I have had long proof of your friendship and fidelity to me; a matter of most intimate concern lies on my mind, and 'twill be a sensible relief to unbosom myself to you; I have just now been informed of the arrival of the young West Indian I have so long been expecting; you know who I mean?

Stuke. Yes, sir; Mr. Belcour, the young gentleman, who inherited old Belcour's great estates in Jamaica.

Stock. Hush! not so loud; come a little nearer this way. This Belcour is now in London; part of his baggage is already arrived, and I expect him every minute. Is it to be wondered at, if his coming throws me into some agitation, when I tell you, Stukely, he is my son?

Stuke. Your son?

Stock. Yes, sir, my only son. Early in life I accompanied his grandfather to Jamaica as his clerk; he had an only daughter, somewhat older than myself; the mother of this gentleman: it was my chance (call it good or ill) to engage her affections; and, as the inferiority of my condition made it hopeless to expect her father's consent, her fondness provided an expedient, and we were privately married: the issue of that concealed engagement is, as I have told you, this Belcour.

Stuke. That event surely discovered your connexion.

Stock. You shall hear. Not many days after our marriage, old Belcour set out for England; and, during his abode here, my wife was, with great secrecy, delivered of this son. Fruitful in expedients to disguise her situation without parting from her infant, she contrived to have it laid and received at her door as a foundling. After some time, her father returned, having left me here; in one of those favourable moments that decide the fortunes of prosperous men, this child was introduced: from that instant he treated him as his own, gave him his name, and brought him up in his family. Old Belcour is dead, and has bequeathed his whole estate to him we are speaking of.

Stuke. Now, then, you are no longer bound to secrecy.

Stock. True; but before I publicly reveal myself, I could wish to make some experiment of my son's disposition: this can only be done by letting his spirit take its course without restraint; by these means, I think I shall discover much more of his real character under the title of his merchant, than I should under that of his father.

Enter a Sailor, ushering in several black Servants, carrying portmanteaus, trunks, &c.

Sail. 'Save your honour! is your name Stockwell?
Stock. It is.

Sail. Part of my master Belcour's baggage, an't please you: there's another cargo not far a-stern of us: and the coxswain has got charge of the dumb creatures.

Stock. Pr'ythee, friend, what dumb creatures do you speak of? Has Mr. Belcour brought over a collection of wild beasts?

Sail. No, lord love him! no, not he. Let me see; there's two green monkeys, a pair of grey parrots, a Jamaica sow and pigs, and a Mangrove dog; that's all.

Stock. Is that all?

Sail. Yes, your honour; yes, that's all: bless his heart, a' might have brought over the whole island if he would; a' didn't leave a dry eye in it.

Stock. Indeed! Stukely, shew them where to bestow their baggage. Follow that gentleman.

Sail. Come, bear a hand, my lads, bear a hand.

[Ereunt STUKELY and Servants.]

Stock. If the principal tallies with his purveyors, he must be a singular spectacle in this place: he has a friend, however, in this sea-faring fellow; 'tis no bad prognostic of a man's heart, when his ship-mates give him a good word. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Drawing-room.

Enter Housekeeper and Servant.

Housek. Why, what a fuss does our good master put himself in about this West Indian! See what a bill of fare I've been forced to draw out; seven and nine, I'll assure you, and only a family dinner, as he calls it: why, if my lord mayor was expected, there couldn't be a greater to do about him.

Serv. I wish to my heart you had but seen the loads of trunks, boxes, and portmanteaus, he has sent hither. An ambassador's baggage, with all the smuggled goods of his family, does not exceed it.

Housek. A fine pickle he'll put the house into: had he been master's own son, and a Christian Englishman, there could not be more rout than there is about this Creolian, as they call 'em.

Serv. No matter for that; he's very rich, and that's sufficient. They say, he has run and sugar enough belonging to him, to make all the water in the Thames into punch. But I see my master's coming. [Exit Housekeeper.]

Enter STOCKWELL.

* Stock. Where is Mr. Belcour? Who brought this note from him?

Serv. A waiter from the London Tavern, sir; he says the young gentleman is just dressed, and will be with you directly.

Stock. Show him in when he arrives.

Serv. I shall, sir; I'll have a peep at him first, however; I've a great mind to see this outlandish spark. The sailor fellow says, he'll make rare doings among us. [Aside.]

Stock. You need not wait; leave me. [Exit Serv.]
Let me see. [Reads.] "Sir,—I write to you under the hands of the hair-dresser; as soon as I have made myself decent, and slipped on some fresh clothes, I will have the honour of paying you my devoirs. Yours, BELCOUR."

He writes at his ease; for he's unconscious to whom his letter is addressed; but what a palpitation does it throw my heart into; a father's heart! All the reports I ever received give me favourable impressions of his character; wild, perhaps, as the manner of his country is, but, I trust, not frantic or unprincipled.

Enter Servant.

Serv. Sir, the foreign gentleman is come. [Erit.]
Enter BELCOUR.

Stock. Mr. Belcour, I am rejoiced to see you: you are welcome to England!

Bel. I thank you heartily, good Mr. Stockwell; you and I have long conversed at a distance; now we are met; and the pleasure this meeting gives me, amply compensates for the perils I have run through in accomplishing it.

Stock. What perils, Mr. Belcour? I could not have thought you would have made a bad passage at this time of year.

Bel. Nor did we: courier like, we came posting to your shores, upon the pinions of the swiftest gales that ever blew; 'tis upon English ground all my difficulties have arisen; 'tis the passage from the river side I complain of.

Stock. Ay, indeed! What obstruction can you have met between this and the river side?

Bel. Innumerable! Your town is as full of defiles as the island of Corsica, and I believe they are as obstinately defended; so much hurry, bustle, and confusion on your quays: so many sugar-casks, porter-butts, and common-council men in your streets, that unless a man marched with artillery in his front, 'tis more than the labour of Hercules can effect, to make any tolerable way through your town.

Stock. I am sorry you have been so incommoded.
Bel. Why, 'faith, 'twas all my own fault; accustomed to a land of slaves, and out of patience with the whole tribe of custom-house extortioners, boatmen, tide-waiters and water-bailiffs, that beset me on all sides, worse than a swarm of musquitoes, I proceeded a little too roughly to brush them away with my rattan; the sturdy rogues took this in dudgeon, and beginning to rebel, the mob chose different sides, and a furious scuffle ensued; in the course of which, my person and apparel suffered so much, that I was obliged to step into the first tavern to refit before I could make my approaches in any decent trim.

Stock. All without is as I wish; dear nature, add the rest, I am happy. [Aside.] Well, Mr. Belcour, 'tis a rough sample you have had of my countrymen's spirit; but, I trust, you'll not think the worse of them for it.

Bel. Not all, not at all; I like them the better. Was I only a visitor, I might, perhaps, wish them a little more tractable; but as a fellow-subject, and a sharer in their freedom, I applaud their spirit, though I feel the effects of it in every bone in my skin.

Stock. That's well; I like that well. How gladly I could fall upon his neck, and own myself his father. [Aside.]

Bel. Weil, Mr. Stockwell, for the first time in my life, here am I in England; at the fountain head of pleasure, in the land of beauty, of arts, and elegancies. My happy stars have given me a good estate, and the conspiring winds have blown me hither to spend it.

Stock. To use it, not to waste it, I should hope; to treat it, Mr. Belcour, not as a vassal, over whom you have a wanton and a despotic power; but as a subject, which you are bound to govern, with a temperate and restrained authority.

Bel. True, sir, most truly said; mine's a commission, not a right; I am the offspring of distress, and every child of sorrow is my brother; while I have hands to hold, therefore, I will hold them open to mankind; but, sir, my passions are my masters: they take me where they will; and, oftentimes, they leave to reason and to virtue nothing but my wishes and my sighs.

Stock. Come, come, the man who can accuse, corrects himself.

Bel. Ah! that's an office I am weary of; I wish a friend would take it up; I would to heaven you had leisure for the employment; but, did you drive a trade to the four corners of the world, you would not find the task so toilsome as to keep me free from faults.

Stock. Well, I am not discouraged; this candour tells me I should not have the fault of self-conceit to combat; that, at least, is not amongst the number.

Bel. No; if I knew that man on earth who thought more humbly of me than I do of myself, I would take up his opinion, and forego my own.

Stock. And were I to choose a pupil, it should be one of your complexion; so, if you'll come along with me, we'll agree upon your admission, and enter on a course of lectures directly.

Bel. With all my heart.

[Ereunt.]

SCENE III.—A Room in Lady Rusport's House.

Enter Lady RUSPORT and Miss RUSPORT.

Lady R. Miss Rusport, I desire to hear no more of Captain Dudley and his destitute family; not a shilling of mine shall ever cross the hands of any of them; because my sister chose to marry a beggar, am I bound to support him and his posterity?

Miss R. I think you are.

Lady R. You think I am! and pray where do you find the law that tells you so?

Miss R. I am not proficient enough to quote chapter and verse; but I take charity to be a main clause in the great statute of christianity.

Lady R. I say charity, indeed! I am apt to think the distresses of old Dudley, and of his daughter into the bargain, would never break your heart, if there was not a certain young fellow of two-and-twenty in the case; who, by the happy recommendation of a good person, and the brilliant appointment of an ensigncy, will, if I am not mistaken, cozen you out of a fortune of twice twenty thousand pounds, as soon as ever you are of age to bestow it upon him.

Miss R. A nephew of your ladyship's can never want any other recommendation with me: and if my partiality for Charles Dudley is acquitted by the rest of the world, I hope Lady Rusport will not condemn me for it.

Lady R. I condemn you! I thank heaven, Miss Rusport, I am no ways responsible for your conduct; nor is it any concern of mine how you dispose of yourself: you are not my daughter, and when I married your father, poor Sir Stephen Rusport, I found you a forward spoiled miss of fourteen, far above being instructed by me.

Miss R. Perhaps your ladyship calls this instruction.

Lady R. You are strangely pert; but 'tis no wonder: your mother, I'm told, was a fine lady; and according to the modern style of education you was brought up. It was not so in my young days; there was then some decorum in the world, some subordination, as the great Locke expresses it. Oh!

'twas an edifying sight, to see the regular deportment observed in our family; no giggling, no gossiping was going on there; my good father, Sir Oliver Roundhead, never was seen to laugh himself, nor ever allowed it in his children.

Miss R. Ay; those were happy times, indeed.

Lady R. But, in this forward age, we have coquettes in the egg-shell, and philosophers in the cradle; girls of fifteen, that lead the fashion in new caps and new opinions; that have their sentiments and their sensations; and the idle fops encourage them in it: 'o my conscience, I wonder what it is the men can see in such babies.

Miss R. True, madam; but all men do not overlook the maturer beauties of your ladyship's age; witness your admired Major Dennis O'Flaherty; there's an example of some discernment; I declare to you, when your ladyship is by, the Major takes no more notice of me than if I was part of the furniture of your chamber.

Lady R. The Major, child, has travelled through various kingdoms and climates, and has more enlarged notions of female merit than fall to the lot of an English home-bred lover; in most other countries, no woman on your side forty would ever be named in a polite circle.

Miss R. Right, madam; I've been told that in Vienna they have coquettes upon crutches, and Venuses in their grand climacteric; a lover there celebrates the wrinkles, not the dimples in his mistress's face. The Major, I think, has served in the imperial army.

Lady R. Are you piqued, my young madam? Had my sister, Louisa, yielded to the addresses of one of Major O'Flaherty's person and appearance, she would have had some excuse; but to run away as she did, at the age of sixteen too, with a man of old Dudley's sort—

Miss R. Was, in my opinion, the most venial trespass that ever girl of sixteen committed; of a noble family, an engaging person, strict honour, and sound understanding, what accomplishment was there wanting in Captain Dudley, but that which the prodigality of his ancestors had deprived him of?

Lady R. They left him as much as he deserves; hasn't the old man captain's half-pay? And is not the son an ensign?

Miss R. An ensign! Alas, poor Charles! Would to heaven he knew what my heart feels and suffers for his sake!

Enter Servant.

Serv. Ensign Dudley, to wait upon your ladyship.

Lady R. Who? Dudley? What can have brought him to town? [Exit.]

Miss R. Dear madam, 'tis Charles Dudley; 'tis your nephew.

Lady R. Nephew! I renounce him as my nephew; Sir Oliver renounced him as his grandson; wasn't he son of the eldest daughter, and only male descendant of Sir Oliver; and didn't he cut him off with a shilling? Didn't the poor dear good old man leave his fortune to me, except a small annuity to my maiden sister, who spoiled her constitution with nursing him? And, depend upon it, not a penny of that fortune shall ever be disposed of otherwise than according to the will of the donor.

Enter CHARLES DUDLEY.

So, young man, whence came you? What brings you to town?

Charles. If there is any offence in my coming to town, your ladyship is in some degree responsible for it, for part of my errand was to pay my duty here.

Lady R. And where is your father, child; and your sister? Are they in town too?

Charles. They are.

Lady R. Ridiculous! I don't know what people do in London, who have no money to spend in it.

Miss R. Dear madam, speak more kindly to your nephew; how can you oppress a youth of his sensibility?

Lady R. Miss Rusport, I insist upon your retiring to your apartment; when I want your advice, I'll send to you. [Exit Miss R.] So, you have put on a red coat too, as well as your father; 'tis plain what value you set upon the good advice Sir Oliver used to give you: how often has he cautioned you against the army!

Charles. Had it pleased my grandfather to enable me to have obeyed his caution, I would have done it; but you well know how destitute I am; and 'tis not to be wondered at, if I prefer the service of my king to that of any other master.

Lady R. Well, well, take your own course; 'tis no concern of mine: you never consulted me.

Charles. I frequently wrote to your ladyship, but could obtain no answer; and, since my grandfather's death, this is the first opportunity I have had of waiting upon you.

Lady R. I must desire you not to mention the death of that dear good man in my hearing; my spirits cannot support it.

Charles. I shall obey you: permit me to say, that, as that event has richly supplied you with the materials of bounty, the distresses of my family can furnish you with objects of it.

Lady R. The distresses of your family, child, are quite out of the question at present. Tell your father and your sister, I totally disapprove of their coming up to town.

Charles. Must I tell my father that, before your ladyship knows the motives that brought him hither? Allured by the offer of exchanging for a commission on full pay, the veteran, after thirty years' service, prepares to encounter the fatal heats of Senegambia; but wants a small supply to equip him for the expedition.

Enter Servant.

Serv. Major O'Flaherty, to wait on your ladyship. [Exit.]

Enter Major O'FLAHERTY.

O'Fla. Spare your speeches, young man; don't you think her ladyship can take my word for that? I hope, madam, 'tis evidence enough of my being present, when I have the honour of telling you so myself.

Lady R. Major O'Flaherty, I am rejoiced to see you. Nephew Dudley, you perceive I'm engaged.

Charles. I shall not intrude upon your ladyship's more agreeable engagements. I presume I have my answer?

Lady R. Your answer, child! What answer can you possibly expect? or how can your romantic father suppose that I am to abet him in all his idle and extravagant undertakings? Come, Major, let me shew you the way into my dressing-room; and let us leave this young adventurer to his meditation. [Exit.]

O'Fla. I follow you, my lady. Young gentleman, your obedient! Upon my conscience, as fine a young fellow as I would wish to clap my eyes on: he might have answered my salute, however: well, let it pass. Fortune, perhaps, frowns upon the poor lad; she's a d—d slippery lady, and very apt to jilt us poor fellows that wear cockades in our hats. Fare thee well, honey, whoever thou art. [Exit.]

Charles. So much for the virtues of a puritan! Out upon it! her heart is flint; yet that woman, that aunt of mine, without one worthy particle in her composition, would, I dare be sworn, as soon set her foot in a pesthouse as in a playhouse.

Enter Miss RUSPORT.

Miss R. Stop, stay a little, Charles; whither are you going in such haste?

Charles. Madam; Miss Rusport; what are your commands?

Miss R. Why so reserved? We had used to answer to no other names than those of Charles and Charlotte.

Charles. What ails you? You have been weeping.

Miss R. No, no; or if I have, your eyes are full too; but I have a thousand things to say to you: before you go, tell me, I conjure you, where you are to be found: here, give me your direction; write it upon the back of this visiting ticket. Have you a pencil?

Charles. I have; but why should you desire to find us out? 'tis a poor little inconvenient place; my sister has no apartment fit to receive you in.

Enter Servant.

Serv. Madam, my lady desires your company directly. [Exit.]

Miss R. I am coming: well, have you wrote it? Give it me. O, Charles! either you do not, or you will not understand me. [Exeunt.]

ACT II

SCENE I.—A Room in Fulmer's House.

FULMER discovered seated; Mrs. FULMER enters to him.

Mrs. F. Why, how you sit, musing and moping, sighing and desponding! I'm ashamed of you, Mr. Fulmer: is this the country you described to me, a second Eldorado, rivers of gold and rocks of diamonds? You found me in a pretty snug retired way of life at Boulogne, out of the noise and bustle of the world, and wholly at my ease: but, thank heaven! our partnership is revocable; I am not your wedded wife, praised be my stars! for what have we got? whom have we gulled but ourselves? which of all your trains has taken fire? Even this poor expedient of your bookseller's shop seems abandoned; for if a chance customer drops in, who is there, pray, to help him to what he wants?

Ful. Patty, you know it is not upon slight grounds that I despair; there had used to be a livelihood to be picked up in this country, both for the honest and dishonest: I have tried each walk, and am likely to starve at last: there is not a point to which the wit and faculty of man can turn, that I have not set mine to, but in vain; I am beat through every quarter of the compass.

Mrs. F. Ah! common efforts all: strike me a master-stroke, Mr. Fulmer, if you wish to make any figure in this country.

Ful. But where, how, and what? I have blustered for prerogative; I have bellowed for freedom; I have offered to serve my country; I have engaged to betray it. A master-stroke, truly! why, I have talked treason, writ treason, and if a man can't live by that, he can live by nothing. Here I set up as a bookseller; why, men leave off reading; and if I was to turn butcher, I believe, o'my conscience, they'd leave off eating.

Captain DUDLEY crosses the stage.

Mrs. F. Why, there now's your lodger, old Captain Dudley, as he calls himself; there's no flint without fire: something might be struck out of him, if you had the wit to find the way.

Ful. Haug him, an old dry skinned curmudgeon; you may as well think to get truth out of a courtier, or candour out of a critic: I can make nothing of him; besides he's poor, and therefore not for our purpose.

Mrs. F. The more fool he! Would any man be poor, that had such a prodigy in his possession?

Ful. His daughter, you mean; she is, indeed, uncommonly beautiful.

Mrs. F. Beautiful! Why, she need only be seen, to have the first men in the kingdom at her feet. Egad! I wish I had the leasing of her beauty; what would some of our young nabobs give?

Ful. Hush! here comes the Captain; good girl, leave us to ourselves, and let me try what I can make of him.

Mrs. F. Captain, truly! i'faith I'd have a regiment had I such a daughter, before I was three months older. [Exit.]

Enter Captain DUDLEY.

Ful. Captain Dudley, good morning to you.

Dud. Mr. Fulmer, I have borrowed a book from your shop; 'tis the sixth volume of my deceased friend Tristram: he is a flattering writer to us poor soldiers; and the divine story of Le Fevre, which makes part of this book, in my opinion of it, does honour, not to its author only, but to human nature.

Ful. He's an author I keep in the way of trade, but one I never relished: he is much too loose and profligate for my taste.

Dud. That's being too severe: I hold him to be a moralist in the noblest sense; he plays, indeed, with the fancy, and sometimes, perhaps, too wantonly; but while he thus designedly masks his main attack, he comes at once upon the heart; refines, amends it, softens it; beats down each selfish barrier from about it, and opens every sluice of pity and benevolence.

Ful. Well, sir, I shall not oppose your opinion; a favourite author is like a favourite mistress; and there you know, Captain, no man likes to have his taste arraigned.

Dud. Upon my word, sir, I don't know what a man likes in that case; 'tis an experiment I never made.

Ful. Sir! Are you serious?

Dud. 'Tis of little consequence whether you think so.

Ful. What a formal old prig it is. [Aside.] I apprehend you, sir; you speak with caution; you are married?

Dud. I have been.

Ful. And this young lady, which accompanies you—

Dud. Passes for my daughter.

Ful. Passes for his daughter! humph! [Aside.]

She is exceedingly beautiful, finely accomplished, of a most enchanting shape and air.

Dud. You are much too partial; she has the greatest defect a woman can have.

Ful. How so, pray?

Dud. She has no fortune.

Ful. Rather say, that you have none; and that's a sore defect in one of your years, Captain Dudley; you have served, no doubt?

Dud. Familiar coxcomb! But I'll humour him.

Ful. A close old fox; but I'll unkennel him. [Aside.]

Dud. Above thirty years I have been in the service, Mr. Fulmer.

Ful. I guessed as much; I laid it at no less. Why, 'tis a wearisome time; 'tis an apprenticeship to a profession, fit only for a patriarch. But ferment must be closely followed: you never could have been so far behind-hand in the chase, unless you had palpably mistaken your way. You'll pardon me, but I begin to perceive you have lived in the world, not with it.

Dud. It may be so; and you perhaps can give me better counsel. I am now soliciting a favour; an exchange to a company on full pay; nothing more, and yet I meet a thousand bars to that; though without boasting, I should think the certificate of services which I sent in might have purchased that indulgence to me.

Ful. Who thinks or cares about them? Certificate of services, indeed. Send in a certificate of your fair daughter; carry her in your hand with you.

Dud. What! Who! My daughter! Carry my daughter! Well, and what then?

Ful. Why, then your fortune's made, that's all.

Dud. I understand you: and this you call knowledge of the world. Despicable knowledge; but sirrah, I will have you know— [Threatens him.]

Ful. Help! Who's within? Would you strike me, sir? would you lift up your hand against a man in his own house?

Dud. In a church, if he dare insult the poverty of a man of honour.

Ful. Have a care what you do; remember there is such a thing in law as an assault and battery; ay, and such trifling forms as warrants and indictments.

Dud. Go, sir; you are too mean for my resentment: 'tis that, and not the law protects you. Hence!

Ful. An old, absurd, incorrigible, blockhead! I'll be revenged of him. [Exit.]

Enter CHARLES DUDLEY.

Charles. What is the matter, sir? Sure I heard an outcry as I entered the house.

Dud. Not unlikely; our landlord and his wife are for ever wrangling. Did you find your aunt Rusport at home?

Charles. I did.

Dud. And what was your reception?

Charles. Cold as our poverty and her pride could make it.

Dud. You told her the pressing occasion I had for a small supply to equip me for this exchange; was she granted me the relief I asked?

Charles. Alas, sir, she has peremptorily refused it.

Dud. That's hard; that's hard, indeed. My petition was for a small sum; she has refused it, you say.—Well, be it so, I must not complain. Did you see the broker, about the insurance on my life?

Charles. There again I am the messenger of ill news; I can raise no money, so fatal is the climate. Alas! that ever my father should be sent to perish in such a place.

Enter LOUISA DUDLEY, hastily.

Dud. Louisa, what's the matter? you seem frightened.

Lou. I am, indeed. Coming from Miss Rusport's, I met a young gentleman in the streets, who has beset me in the strangest manner.

Charles. Insufferable! Was he rude to you?

Lou. I cannot say he was absolutely rude to me, but he was very importunate to speak to me, and once or twice attempted to lift up my hat; he followed me to the corner of the street, and there I gave him the slip.

Dud. You must walk no more in the streets, child, without me, or your brother.

Lou. O, Charles! Miss Rusport desires to see you directly; Lady Rusport is gone out, and she has something particular to say to you.

Charles. Have you any commands for me, sir?

Dud. None, my dear; by all means wait upon Miss Rusport. Come, Louisa; I must desire you to get up to your chamber, and compose yourself.

[Exeunt.]

Enter BELCOUR, after peeping in at the door.

Bel. Not a soul, as I'm alive. Why, what an odd sort of a house is this! Confound the little jilt, she has fairly given me the slip. A plague upon this London, I shall have no luck in it; such a crowd, and such a hurry, and such a number of shops, and one so like the other, that whether the wench turned into this house or the next, or whether she went up stairs or down stairs (for there's a world above and a world below, it seems,) I declare I know no more than if I was in the Blue Mountains. In the name of all the devils at once, why did she run away? If every handsome girl I meet in this town is to lead me such a wildgoose chase, I had better have stayed in the torrid zone. I shall be wasted to the size of a sugar-cane. What shall I do? give the chase up? hang it, that's cowardly. Shall I, a true-born son of Phœbus, suffer this little nimble-footed Daphne to escape me?—"Forbid it, honour, and forbid it, love." Hush, hush! here she comes! Oh! the devil! What tawdry thing have we got here?

Enter Mrs. FULMER.

Mrs. F. Your humble servant, sir.

Bel. Your humble servant, madam.

Mrs. F. A fine summer's day, sir.

Bel. Yes, ma'am; and so cool, that if the calendar didn't call it July, I should swear it was January.

Mrs. F. Sir!

Bel. Madam!

Mrs. F. Do you wish to speak to Mr. Fulmer, sir?

Bel. Mr. Fulmer, madam? I haven't the honour of knowing such a person.

Mrs. F. No! I'll be sworn you have not; thou art much too pretty a fellow, and too much of a gentleman, to be an author thyself, or to have anything to say to those that are so. 'Tis the Captain, I suppose, you are waiting for.

Bel. I rather suspect it is the Captain's wife.

Mrs. F. The Captain has no wife, sir.

Bel. No wife! I'm heartily sorry for it! for then she's his mistress; and that I take to be the more desperate case of the two. Pray, madam, wasn't there a lady just now turned into your house? 'Twas with her I wished to speak.

Mrs. F. What sort of a lady, pray?

Bel. One of the loveliest sort my eyes ever beheld; young, tall, fresh, fair; in short, a goddess.

Mrs. F. Nay, but dear, dear sir, now I'm sure you flatter; for 'twas me you followed into the shop-door this minute.

Bel. You! No, no, take my word for it, it was not you, madam.

Mrs. F. But what is it you laugh at?

Bel. Upon my soul, I ask your pardon; but it was not you, believe me; be assured it wasn't.

Mrs. F. Well, sir, I shall not contend for the honour of being noticed by you; I hope you think you wouldn't have been the first man that noticed me in the streets; however, this I'm positive of, that no living woman but myself has entered these doors this morning.

Bel. Why, then, I'm mistaken in the house, that's all; for it is not humanly possible I can be so far out in the lady. [Going.]

Mrs. F. Coxcomb—But hold—a thought occurs as sure as can be, he has seen Miss Dudley. A word with you, young gentleman; come back.

Bel. Well, what's your pleasure?

Mrs. F. You seem greatly captivated with this young lady; are you apt to fall in love thus at first sight?

Bel. Oh, yes: 'tis the only way I can ever fall in love; any man may tumble into a pit by surprise; none but a fool would walk into one by choice.

Mrs. F. You are a hasty lover, it seems; have you spirit to be a generous one? They, that will please the eye, mustn't spare the purse.

Bel. Try me: put me to the proof; bring me to an interview with the dear girl that has thus captivated me, and see whether I have spirit to be grateful.

Mrs. F. But how, pray, am I to know the girl you have set your heart on?

Bel. By an undescrivable grace, that accompanies every look and action that falls from her; there can be but one such woman in the world, and nobody can mistake that one.

Mrs. F. Well, if I should stumble upon this angel in my walks, where am I to find you? What's your name?

Bel. Upon my soul I can't tell you my name!

Mrs. F. Not tell me! Why so?

Bel. Because I don't know what it is myself; as yet I have no name.

Mrs. F. No name!

Bel. None; a friend, indeed, lent me his; but he forbade me to use it on any unworthy occasion.

Mrs. F. But where is your place of abode?

Bel. I have none; I never slept a night in England in my life. [Retires.]

Enter FULMER.

Mrs. F. Hey day!

Ful. A fine case, truly, in a free country; a pretty pass things are come to, if a man is to be assaulted in his own house.

Mrs. F. Who has assaulted you, my dear?

Ful. Who! why this Captain Drawcansir, this old Dudley, my lodger; but I'll unlodge him: I'll unharbour him, I warrant.

Mrs. F. Hush! hush! Hold your tongue, man: pocket the affront, and be quiet; I've a scheme on foot will pay you a hundred beatings. [Aside to FUL.] Why you surprise me, Fulmer; Captain Dudley assault you! Impossible.

Ful. Nay, I can't call it an absolute assault; but he threatened me.

Mrs. F. Oh, was that all? I thought how it would turn out—A likely thing, truly, for a person of his obliging, compassionate turn: no, no, poor Captain Dudley, he has sorrows and distresses enough of his own to employ his spirits, without setting them against other people. Make it up as fast as you can: watch this gentleman out; follow him wherever he goes, and bring me word who and what he is; be sure you don't lose sight of him; I've other business in hand. [Exit.]

Bel. Pray, sir, what sorrows and distresses have befallen this old gentleman you speak of?

Ful. Poverty, disappointment, and all the distresses attendant thereupon: sorrow enough of all conscience: I soon found how it was with him, by his way of living, low enough of all reason; but what I overheard this morning put it out of all doubt.

Bel. What did you overhear this morning?

Ful. Why, it seems he wants to join his regiment, and has been beating the town over to raise a little money for that purpose upon his pay; but the climate, I find, where he is going is so unhealthy, that nobody can be found to lend him any.

Bel. Why then your town is a d—d good-for-nothing town: and I wish I had never come into it.

Ful. That's what I say, sir; the hard-heartedness of some folks is unaccountable. There's an old Lady Rusport, a near relation of this gentleman's; she lives hard by here, opposite to Stockwell's, the great merchant; he sent to her a-begging, but to no purpose; though she is as rich as a Jew, she would not furnish him with a farthing.

Bel. Is the Captain at home?

Ful. He is up stairs, sir.

Bel. Will you take the trouble to desire him to step hither? I want to speak to him.

Ful. I'll send him to you directly. I don't know what to make of this young man; but, if I live, I will find him out, or know the reason why. [Exit.]

Bel. I've lost the girl, it seems, that's clear: she was the first object of my pursuit; but the case of this poor officer touches me; and, after all, there may be as much true delight in rescuing a fellow-creature from distress, as there would be in plunging one into it.—But let me see: it's a point that must be managed with some delicacy. Apropos! there's pen and ink—I've struck upon a method that will do. [Writes.] Ay, ay, this is the very thing: 'twas devilish lucky I happened to have these bills about me. There, there, fare you well! I'm glad to be rid of you; you stood a chance of being worse applied, I can tell you.

[Incloses and seals the paper.]

Re-enter FULMER, with DUDLEY.

Ful. That's the gentleman, sir. I shall make bold, however, to lend an ear. [Exit.]

Dud. Have you any commands for me, sir?

Bel. Your name is Dudley, sir?—

Dud. It is.

Bel. You command a company, I think, Captain Dudley?

Dud. I did: I am now upon half-pay.

Bel. You have served some time?

Dud. A pretty many years; long enough to see some people of more merit, and better interest than myself, made general officers.

Bel. Their merit I may have some doubt of; their interest I can readily give credit to; there is little promotion to be looked for in your profession, I believe, without friends, Captain?

Dud. I believe so too: have you any other business with me, may I ask?

Bel. Your patience for a moment. I was informed you was about to join your regiment in distant quarters abroad.

Dud. I have been soliciting an exchange to a company of full pay, quartered at James' Fort, in Senegambia; but I'm afraid I must drop the undertaking.

Bel. Why so, pray?

Dud. Why so, sir? 'Tis a home question, for a perfect stranger to put; there is something very particular in all this.

Bel. If it is not impertinent, sir, allow me to ask you what reason you have for despairing of success?

Dud. Why, really, sir, mine is an obvious reason, for a soldier to have—Want of money; simply that.

Bel. May I beg to know the sum you have occasion for?

Dud. Truly, sir, I cannot exactly tell you on a sudden; nor is it, I suppose, of any great consequence to you to be informed: but I should guess, in the gross, that two hundred pounds would serve.

Bel. And you find a difficulty in raising that sum upon your pay? 'tis done every day.

Dud. The nature of the climate makes it difficult; I can get no one to insure my life.

Bel. Oh! that's a circumstance may make for you, as well as against; in short, Captain Dudley, it so happens, that I can command the sum of two hundred pounds: seek no further; I'll accommodate you with it upon easy terms.

Dud. Sir! do I understand you rightly?—I beg your pardon; but am I to believe that you are in earnest?

Bel. What is your surprise? Is it an uncommon thing for a gentleman to speak truth? Or is it incredible that one fellow-creature should assist another?

Dud. I ask your pardon—May I beg to know to whom?—Do you propose this in the way of business?

Bel. Entirely: I have no other business on earth.

Dud. Indeed! you are not a broker, I'm persuaded.

Bel. I am not.

Dud. Nor an army agent, I think?

Bel. I hope you will not think the worse of me for being neither; in short, sir, if you will peruse this paper, it will explain to you who I am, and upon what terms I act; while you read it, I will step home, and fetch the money: and we will conclude the bargain without loss of time. In the meanwhile, good day to you. [Exit hastily.]

Dud. Humph! there's something very odd in all this—let me see what we've got here—This paper is to tell me who he is, and what are his terms: in the name of wonder, why has he sealed it? Hey-day! what's here? Two bank notes, of a hundred each! I can't comprehend what this means. Hold; here's a writing, perhaps that will show me. Accept this trifle; pursue your fortune and prosper. Am I in a dream? is this a reality?

Enter MAJOR O'FLAHERTY.

O'Fla. 'Save you, my dear! Is it you now that are Captain Dudley, I would ask? [Exit DUDLEY.] Whuh! What's the hurry the man's in? If 'tis the lad that run out of the shop you would overtake, you might as well stay where you are; by my soul he's as nimble as a Croat; you are a full hour's march in his rear.—Ay faith, you may as well turn back, and give over the pursuit.

Re-enter DUDLEY.

Well, Captain Dudley, if that's your name, there's a letter for you. Read, man; read it; and I'll have a word with you after you have done.

Dud. More miracles on foot! So, so, from Lady Rusport.

O'Fla. You're right; it's from her ladyship.

Dud. Well, sir, I have cast my eye over it; 'tis short and peremptory; are you acquainted with the contents?

O'Fla. Not at all, my dear; not at all.

Dud. Have you any message from Lady Rusport?

O'Fla. Not a syllable, honey: only when you've digested the letter, I've a little bit of a message to deliver you from myself.

Dud. And may I beg to know who yourself is?

O'Fla. Dennis O'Flaherty, at your service; a poor major of grenadiers: nothing better.

Dud. So much for your name and title, sir; now be so good as to favour me with your message.

O'Fla. Why, then, Captain, I must tell you, I have promised Lady Rusport you shall do whatever it is she bids you to do in that letter there.

Dud. Ay, indeed! have you undertaken so much, Major, without knowing either what she commands, or what I can perform?

O'Fla. That's your concern, my dear, not mine; I must keep my word, you know.

Dud. Or else, I suppose, you and I must measure swords.

O'Fla. Upon my soul you've hit it.

Dud. That would hardly answer to either of us: you and I have, probably, had enough of fighting in our time, before now.

O'Fla. Faith and troth, master Dudley, you may say that; 'tis thirty years, come the time, that I have followed the trade, and in a pretty many countries. Let me see—In the war before last, I served in the Irish brigade, d'ye see; there, after bringing off the French monarch, I left his service, with a British bullet in my body, and this riband in my button-hole. Last war I followed the fortunes of the German eagle, in the corps of grenadiers; there I had my bellyful of fighting, and a plentiful scarcity of every thing else. After six-and-twenty engagements, great and small, I went off with this gash on my skull, and a kiss of the empress queen's sweet hand, (heaven bless it!) for my pains. Since the peace, my dear, I took a little turn with the confederates there in Poland; but such another set of madcaps!—by the Lord Harry, I never knew what it was they were scuffling about.

Dud. Well, major, I won't add another action to the list; you shall keep your promise with Lady Rusport: she requires me to leave London; I shall go in a few days, and you may take what credit you please from my compliance.

O'Fla. Give me your hand, my dear boy! this will make her my own; when that's the case, we shall be brothers, you know, and we'll share her fortune between us.

Dud. Not so, Major; the man who marries Lady Rusport, will have a fair title to her whole fortune without division: but I hope your expectations of prevailing are founded upon good reasons.

O'Fla. Upon the best grounds in the world; first, I think she will comply, because she is a woman; secondly, I am persuaded she won't hold out long, because she is a widow; and thirdly, I make sure of her, because I have married five wives [en militaire, Captain,] and never failed yet; and for what I know, they are all alive and merry at this very hour.

Dud. Well, sir, go on, and prosper; if you can inspire Lady Rusport with half your charity, I shall think you deserve all her fortune; at present, I must beg your excuse: good morning to you. [Erit.]

O'Fla. A good, sensible man, and very much of a soldier: I did not care if I was better acquainted with him; but 'tis an awkward kind of country for that: the English, I observe, are close friends, but distant acquaintance. I suspect the old lady has not been over generous to poor Dudley; I shall give her a little touch about that. Upon my soul, I know but one excuse a person can have for giving nothing, and that is, like myself, having nothing to give. [Erit.]

SCENE II.—Lady Rusport's House. A dressing-room.

Enter Miss Rusport and Lucy.

Miss R. Well, Lucy, you've dislodged the old lady at last; but methought you was a tedious time about it.

Lucy. A tedious time, indeed; I think they who have least to spare, contrive to throw the most away; I thought I should never have got her out of the house: then, madam, this being a visit of great ceremony to a person of distinction at the west end of the town, the old state chariot was brought forth on the occasion, with strict charges to dress out the box with the leopard skin hammer-cloth.

Miss R. Yes; and to hang the false tails on the miserable stumps of the old crawling cattle: well, well, pray heaven, the old crazy affair don't break down again with her, at least till she gets to her journey's end.—But where's Charles Dudley? Run down, dear girl, and be ready to let him in; I think he's as long in coming, as she was in going.

Lucy. Why, indeed, madam, you seem the more alert of the two, I must say. [Erit.]

Miss R. Now the deuce take the girl, for putting that notion into my head: I am sadly afraid Dudley does not like me; so much encouragement as I have given him to declare himself, I never could get a word from him on the subject: this may be very honourable, but, upon my life, it's very provoking. By the way, I wonder how I look to-day: Oh! shockingly! hideously pale! like a witch! this is the old lady's glass, and she has left some of her wrinkles on it. How frightfully have I put on my cap! all awry!—and my hair dressed so unbecomingly! altogether, I'm a most complete fright!—

Enter CHARLES, unobserved.

Charles. That I deny.

Miss R. Ah!

Charles. Quarrelling with your glass, cousin? Make it up, make it up, and be friends; it cannot compliment you more than by reflecting you as you are.

Miss R. Well, I vow, my dear Charles, that is delightfully said, and deserves my very best curtsy; your flattery, like a rich jewel, has a value not only from its superior lustre, but from its extraordinary scarceness: I verily think, this is the only civil speech you ever directed to my person in your life.

Charles. And I ought to ask pardon of your good sense, for having done it now.

Miss R. Nay, now you relapse again: don't you know, if you keep well with a woman on the great score of beauty, she'll never quarrel with you on the trifling article of good sense? but any thing serves to fill up a dull, yawning hour, with an insipid cousin: you have brighter moments, and warmer spirits, for the dear girl of your heart.

Charles. Oh, fie upon you! fie upon you!

Miss R. You blush, and the reason is apparent: you are a novice at hypocrisy; but no practice can make a visit of ceremony pass for a visit of choice. Love is ever before its time; friendship is apt to lag a little after it. Pray, Charles, did you make any extraordinary haste hither?

Charles. By your question, I see, you acquit me of the impertinence of being in love.

Miss R. But why impertinence? Why the impertinence of being in love? You have one language for me, Charles, and another for the woman of your affection.

Charles. You are mistaken; the woman of my affection shall never hear any other language from me, than what I use to you.

Miss R. I am afraid, then, you'll never make yourself understood by her.

Charles. It is not fit I should; there is no need of love to make me miserable; 'tis wretchedness enough to be a beggar.

Miss R. A beggar do you call yourself! O, Charles, Charles! rich in every merit and accomplishment, whom may you not aspire to? and why think you so unworthy of our sex, as to conclude there is not one to be found with sense to discern your virtue, and generosity to reward it?

Charles. You distress me; I must beg to hear no more.

Miss R. Well, I can be silent. Thus does he always serve me, whenever I am about to disclose myself to him. [Aside.]

Charles. Why do you not banish me and my misfortunes for ever from your thoughts?

Miss R. Ay, wherefore do I not, since you never allowed me a place in your's? but go, sir: I have no right to stay you; go where your heart directs you; go to the happy, the distinguished, fair one.

Charles. Now, by all that's good, you do me wrong; there is no such fair one for me to go to; nor have I an acquaintance among the sex, yourself excepted, which answers to that description.

Miss R. Indeed!

Charles. In very truth; there, then, let us drop the subject. May you be happy, though I never can!

Miss R. O Charles! give me your hand; if I have offended you, I ask your pardon; you have been long acquainted with my temper, and know how to bear with its infirmities.

Charles. Thus, my dear Charlotte, let us seal our reconciliation. [Kissing her hand.] Bear with thy infirmities! By heaven, I know not any one failing in thy whole composition except that of too great a partiality for an undeserving man.

Miss R. And you are now taking the very course to augment that failing. A thought strikes me;—I have a commission that you must absolutely execute for me; I have immediate occasion for the sum of two hundred pounds; you know my fortune is shut up till I am of age: take this paltry box, (it contains my ear-rings and some other baubles I have no use for) carry it to our opposite neighbour, Mr. Stockwell, (I don't know where else to apply) leave it as a deposit in his hands, and beg him to accommodate me with the sum.

Charles. Dear Charlotte, what are you about to do? How can you possibly want two hundred pounds?

Miss R. How can I possibly do without it, you mean? Doesn't every lady want two hundred pounds? Perhaps, I have lost it at play; perhaps, I mean to win as much to it; perhaps, I want it for two hundred different uses.

Charles. Pooh, pooh! all this is nothing; don't I know you never play?

Miss R. You mistake; I have a spirit to set, not only this trifle, but my whole fortune upon a stake; therefore, make no wry faces, but do as I bid you. You will find Mr. Stockwell a very honourable gentleman.

Enter LUCY, in haste.

Lucy. Dear madam, as I live, here comes the old lady in a hackney-coach.

Miss R. The old chariot has given her a second tumble: away with you! you know your way out, without meeting her. Take the box, and do as I desire you.

Charles. I must not dispute your orders. Farewell! [Exeunt CHARLES and Miss RUSPORT.]

Enter LADY RUSPORT, leaning on MAJOR O'FLAHERTY'S arm.

O'Fla. Rest yourself upon my arm; never spare it; 'tis strong enough: it has stood harder service than you can put it to.

Lucy. Mercy upon me! what is the matter? I am frightened out of my wits. Has your Ladyship had an accident?

Lady R. O, Lucy, the most untoward one in nature! I know not how I shall repair it.

O'Fla. Never go about to repair it, my lady; even build a new one; 'twas but a crazy piece of business at best.

Lucy. Bless me, is the old chariot broke down with you again?

Lady R. Broke, child! I don't know what might have been broke, if, by great good fortune, this obliging gentleman had not been at hand to assist me.

Lucy. Dear madam, let me run and fetch you a cup of the cordial drops.

Lady R. Do, Lucy. [Exit Lucy.] Alas, sir! ever since I lost my husband, my poor nerves have been shook to pieces: there hangs his beloved picture; that precious relic, and a plentiful jointure, is all that remains to console me for the best of men.

O'Fla. Let me see; i'faith, a comely personage! by his fur cloak, I suppose he was in the Russian service; and, by the gold chain round his neck, I should guess, he had been honoured with the order of St. Catherine.

Lady R. No, no, he meddled with no St. Catherine's; that's the habit he wore in his mayoralty. Sir Stephen was lord mayor of London; but he is gone, and has left me, a poor, weak, solitary widow, behind him.

O'Fla. By all means, then, take a strong, able, hearty man, to repair his loss. If such a plain fellow as one Dennis O'Flaherty can please you, I think I may venture to say, without any disparagement to the gentleman in the fur gown there—

Lady R. What are you going to say? Don't shock my ears with any comparisons, I desire.

O'Fla. Not I, my soul; I don't believe there's any comparison in the case.

Re-enter LUCY, with a bottle and glass.

Lady R. Oh, are you come? Give me the drops—[I'm all in a flutter.] [LUCY fills, LADY R. drinks.]

O'Fla. Hark ye, sweetheart, what are these same drops? Have you any more left in the bottle? I didn't care if I took a little sip of them myself.

Lucy. Oh, sir, they are called the cordial restorative elixir, or the nervous golden drops; they are only for ladies' cases.

O'Fla. Yes, yes, my dear, there are gentlemen as well as ladies, that stand in need of those same golden drops; they'd suit my case to a tittle.

Lady R. Well, Major, did you give old Dudley my letter? and will the silly man do as I bid him, and begone?

O'Fla. You are obeyed; he's on his march.

Lady R. That's well; you have managed this matter to perfection; I didn't think he would have been so easily prevailed upon.

O'Fla. At the first word; no difficulty in life; 'twas the very thing he was determined to do, before I came: I never met with a more obliging gentleman.

Lady R. Well, 'tis no matter; so I am but rid of him, and his distresses. Would you believe it, Major O'Flaherty, it was but this morning he sent a-begging to me for money to fit him out upon some wildgoose expedition to the coast of Africa, I know not where?

O'Fla. Well, you sent him what he wanted?

Lady R. I sent him, what he deserved, a flat refusal.

O'Fla. You refused him?

Lady R. Most undoubtedly.

O'Fla. You sent him nothing?

Lady R. Not a shilling.

O'Fla. Good morning to you—Your servant—
[Going.]

Lady R. Hey-day! what ails the man? Where are you going?

O'Fla. Out of your house, before the roof falls on my head; to poor Dudley, to share the little modicum, that thirty years' hard service has left me; I wish it was more, for his sake.

Lady R. Very well, sir; take your course; I shan't attempt to stop you; I shall survive it: it will not break my heart, if I never see you more.

O'Fla. Break your heart! No, o'my conscience will it not. You preach and you pray, and you turn up your eyes, and all the while you are as hard-hearted as a hyena—A hyena, truly! by my soul, there isn't in the whole creation so savage an animal, as a human creature without pity!

Lady R. A hyena, truly!

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Room in Stockwell's House.

Enter STOCKWELL and BELCOUR.

Stock. Gratify me so far, however, Mr. Belcour, as to see Miss Rusport; carry her the sum she wants, and return the poor girl her box of diamonds, which Dudley left in my hands: you know what to say on the occasion better than I do; that part of your commission I leave to your own discretion, and you may season it with what gallantry you think fit.

Bel. You could not have pitched upon a greater bungler at gallantry than myself, if you had rummaged every company in the city, and the whole court of aldermen into the bargain: part of your errand, however, I will do; but whether it shall be with an ill grace or a good one, depends upon the caprice of the moment, the humour of the lady, the mode of our meeting, and a thousand undefinable small circumstances, that, nevertheless, determine us upon all the great occasions of life.

Stock. I persuade myself you will find Miss Rusport an ingenuous, worthy, animated girl.

Bel. Why, I like her the better as a woman; but name her not to me as a wife: No, if ever I marry, it must be a staid, sober, considerate damsel, with blood in her veins as cold as a turtle's; quick of scent as a vulture, when danger's in the wind; wary and sharp-sighted as a hawk, when treachery is on foot: with such a companion at my elbow, for ever whispering in my ear—Have a care of this man, he's a cheat; don't go near that woman, she's a jilt; overhead there's a scaffold, underfoot there's a well; oh, sir! such a woman might lead me up and down this great city without difficulty or danger; but with a girl of Miss Rusport's complexion, heaven and earth, sir! we should be duped, undone, and distracted, in a fortnight.

Stock. Ha, ha, ha! Why, you are become wonderful circumspect of a sudden, pupil; and, if you can find such a prudent damsel as you describe, you have my consent, only beware how you choose: discretion is not the reigning quality amongst the fine ladies of the present time; and, I think, in Miss Rusport's particular, I have given you no bad counsel.

Bel. Well, well, if you'll fetch me the jewels, I believe, I can undertake to carry them to her: but as for the money, I'll have nothing to do with that: Dudley would be your fittest ambassador on that occasion; and, if I mistake not, the most agreeable to the lady.

Stock. Why, indeed, from what I know of the matter, it may not improbably be destined to find its way into his pockets.

Bel. Then, depend upon it, these are not the only trinkets she means to dedicate to Captain Dudley. As for me, Stockwell, indeed, wants me to marry; but, till I can get this bewitching girl, this incognita, out of my head, I can never think of any other woman.

Enter a Servant, and delivers a letter

Hey-day! Where can I have picked up a correspondent already? 'Tis a most execrable manuscript—Let me see—Martha Fulmer—Who is Martha Fulmer?—Pshaw! I won't be at the trouble of deciphering her d-d pothooks.—Hold, hold, hold; what have we got here?

"Dear Sir,—I have discovered the lady you was so much smitten with, and can procure you an interview with her; if you can be as generous to a pretty girl, as you was to a paltry old captain—How did she find that out?—you need not despair; come to me immediately; the lady is now in my house, and expects you.

Yours, MARTHA FULMER."

O thou dear, lovely, and enchanting paper! which I was about to tear into a thousand scraps, devoutly I entreat thy pardon: I have slighted thy contents, which are delicious; slandered thy characters, which are divine; and all the atonement I can make, is implicitly to obey thy mandates.

Enter STOCKWELL.

Stock. Mr. Belcour, here are the jewels; this letter encloses bills for the money; and, if you will deliver it to Miss Rusport, you'll have no further trouble on that score.

Bel. Ah! sir, the letter which I have been reading, disqualifies me for delivering the letter, which you have been writing; I have other game on foot: the loveliest girl my eyes ever feasted upon is started in view, and the world cannot now divert me from pursuing her.

Stock. Hey day; What has turned you thus on a sudden?

Bel. A woman; one that can turn, and overturn me and my tottering resolutions every way she will. Oh, sir, if this is folly in me, you must rail at nature: you must chide the sun, that was vertical at my birth, and would not wink upon my nakedness, but swaddled me in the broadest, hottest glare of his meridian beams.

Stock. Mere rhapsody, mere childish rhapsody; the libertine's familiar plea. Nature made us, 'tis true, but we are the responsible creatures of our own faults and follies.

Bel. Sir!

Stock. Slave of every face you meet, some hussy has inveigled you; some handsome profligate (the town is full of them) and, when once fairly bankrupt in constitution as well as fortune, nature no longer serves as your excuse for being vicious, necessity, perhaps, will stand your friend, and you'll reform.

Bel. You are severe.

Stock. It fits me to be so; it well becomes a father,—I would say, a friend. How strangely I forgot myself! [Aside.] How difficult it is to counterfeit indifference, and put a mask upon the heart!

Bel. How could you tempt me so? Had you not inadvertently dropped the name of father, I fear our friendship, short as it has been, would scarce have held me; but even your mistake I reverence—Give me your hand—'tis over.

Stock. Generous young man! because I bore you the affection of a father, I rashly took up the authority of one. I ask your pardon; pursue your course; I have no right to stop it. What would you have me do with these things?

Bel. This, if I might advise; carry the money to Miss Rusport immediately; never let generosity wait for its materials; that part of the business presses. Give me the jewels: I'll find an opportunity of delivering them into her hands; and your visit may pave the way for my reception. [Exit.]

Stock. Be it so; good morning to you. Farewell, advice! Away goes he upon the wing for pleasure. What various passions he awakens in me! He pains, yet pleases me; affrights, offends, yet grows upon my heart. His very failings set him off: for ever trespassing, for ever atoning, I almost think he would not be so perfect, were he free from fault: I must dissemble longer; and yet how painful the experiment! Even now he's gone upon some wild adventure; and who can tell what mischief may befall him? O nature! what it is to be a father! [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Fulmer's House.

Enter FULMER and MRS. FULMER.

Ful. I tell you, Patty, you are a fool, to think of bringing him and Miss Dudley together; 'twill ruin every thing, and blow your whole scheme up to the moon at once.

Mrs. F. Why sure, Mr. Fulmer, I may be allowed to rear a chicken of my own hatching, as they say. Who first sprung the thought, but I, pray? Who first contrived the plot? Who proposed the letter, but I—I?

Ful. And who dogged the gentleman home? Who found out his name, fortune, connexion:—that he was a West Indian, fresh landed, and full of cash;—a gull to our heart's content;—a hot-brained, headlong spark, that would run into our trap, like a wheatear under a turf, but I—I—I?

Mrs. F. Hark! he's come! disappear, march! and leave the field open to my machination.

[Exit FULMER.]

Enter BELCOUR.

Bel. O, thou dear minister to my happiness, let me embrace thee! Why, thou art my polar star, my propitious constellation, by which I navigate my impatient bark into the port of pleasure and delight.

Mrs. F. Oh, you men are sly creatures! Do you remember now, you cruel, what you said to me this morning?

Bel. All a jest, a frolic; never think on't; bury it for ever in oblivion: thou! why, thou art all over nectar and ambrosia, powder of pearl and odour of roses! thou hast the youth of Hebe, the beauty of Venus, and the pen of Sappho! But, in the name of all that's lovely, where's the lady? I expected to find her with you.

Mrs. F. No doubt you did, and these raptures were designed for her; but where have you loitered? the lady's gone; you are too late; girls of her sort are not to be kept waiting, like negro slaves in your sugar plantations.

Bel. Gone! whither is she gone? Tell me, that I may follow her.

Mrs. F. Hold, hold, not so fast, young gentleman, this is a case of some delicacy: should Captain Dudley know that I introduced you to his daughter, he is a man of such scrupulous honour—

Bel. What do you tell me! is she daughter to the old gentleman I met here this morning?

Mrs. F. The same; him you was so generous to.

Bel. There's an end of the matter then at once; it shall never be said of me, that I took advantage of the father's necessities to trepan the daughter.

[Going.]

Mrs. F. So, so; I've made a wrong cast; he's one of your conscientious sinners, I find; but I won't lose him thus. [Aside.] Ha, ha, ha!

Bel. What is it you laugh at?

Mrs. F. Your absolute inexperience; have you lived so very little time in this country, as not to know that, between young people of equal ages, the term of sister often is a cover for that of mistress? This young lady is, in that sense of the word, sister to young Dudley, and consequently daughter to my old lodger.

Bel. Indeed! are you serious?

Mrs. F. Can you doubt it? I must have been pretty well assured of that, before I invited you hither.

Bel. That's true; she cannot be a woman of honour, and Dudley is an unconscionable young rogue, to think of keeping one fine girl in pay, by raising contributions on another; he shall, therefore, give her up: she is a dear, bewitching, mischievous little devil, and he shall positively give her up.

Mrs. F. Ay, now the freak has taken you again; I say, give her up: there's one way, indeed, and certain of success.

Bel. What's that?

Mrs. F. Out-bid him; never dream of out-blustering him; all things,—then, will be made easy enough: let me see—some little genteel present to begin with: what have you got about you? Ay, search; I can bestow it to advantage, there's no time to be lost.

Bel. Hang it, confound it, a plague upon't, say I; I hav'n't a guinea left in my pocket: I parted from my whole stock here this morning, and have forgot to supply myself since.

Mrs. F. Mighty well! let it pass, then; there's an end: think no more of the lady, that's all.

Bel. Distraction! think no more of her? let me only step home and provide myself; I'll be back with you in an instant.

Mrs. F. Pooh, pooh! that's a wretched shift; have you nothing of value about you? Money's a coarse, slovenly vehicle, fit only to bribe electors in a borough; there are more graceful ways of purchasing a lady's favours—rings, trinkets, jewels.

Bel. Jewels; gadso! I protest, I had forgot: I have a case of jewels; but they won't do, I must not part from them: no, no, they are appropriated; they are none of my own.

Mrs. F. Let me see, let me see! Ay, now, this were something like! pretty creatures, how they sparkle! these would ensure success.

Bel. Indeed!

Mrs. F. These would make her your own for ever.

Bel. Then the deuce take them for belonging to another person; I could find in my heart to give them the girl, and swear I've lost them.

Mrs. F. Ay, do; say they were stolen out of your pocket.

Bel. No, hang it, that's dishonourable; here, give me the paltry things, I'll write you an order on my merchant, for double their value.

Mrs. F. An order! No order for me! no orders upon merchants, with their value received and three days' grace; their noting, protesting, and indorsing, and all their counting-house formalities; I'll have nothing to do with them: leave your diamonds with me, and give your order for the value of them to the owner; the money would be as good as the trinkets, I warrant you.

Bel. Hey! how! I never thought of that; but a breach of trust!—'tis impossible! I never can consent; therefore give me the jewels back again.

Mrs. F. Take them; I am now to tell you, the lady is in this house.

Bel. In this house?

Mrs. F. Yes, sir, in this very house; but what of that? you have got what you like better,—your toys, your trinkets: go, go. Oh, you are a man of notable spirit, are you not?

Bel. Provoking creature! bring me to the sight of my dear girl, and dispose of me as you think fit.

Mrs. F. And of the diamonds too?

Bel. D—n them, I would there was not such a hauble in nature! But, come, come, despatch; if I had the throne of Delhi, I should give it to her.

Mrs. F. Swear to me then, that you will keep within bounds; remember, she passes for the sister of young Dudley. Oh! if you come to your flights and your rhapsodies, she'll be off in an instant.

Bel. Never fear me.

Mrs. F. You must expect to hear her talk of her father, as she calls him, and her brother, and your bounty to her family.

Bel. Ay, ay, never mind what she talks of, only bring her.

Mrs. F. You'll be prepared upon that head?

Bel. I shall be prepared, never fear: away with you.

Mrs. F. But hold, I had forgot: not a word of the diamonds; leave that matter to my management.

Bel. Hell and vexation! Get out of the room, or I shall run distracted. [Exit Mrs. F.] Of a certain, Belcour, thou art born to be the fool of woman! Sure no man sins with so much repentance, or repents with so little amendment as I do. I cannot give away another person's property, honour forbids me; and I positively cannot give up the girl: love, passion, constitution, everything protests against that. How shall I decide? I cannot bring myself to break a trust, and I am not at present in the humour to baulk my inclinations. Is there no middle way? Let me consider—There is, there is: my good genius has presented me with one; apt, obvious, honourable: the girl shall not go without her baubles; I'll not go without the girl. Miss Rusport shan't lose her diamonds; I'll save Dudley from destruction, and every party shall be a gainer by the project.

Re-enter Mrs. FULMER, introducing Miss DUDLEY

Mrs. F. Miss Dudley, this is the worthy gentleman you wish to see; this is Mr. Belcour.

Lou. As I live, the very man that beset me in the streets! [Aside.]

Bel. An angel, by this light! Oh, I am gone, past all retrieving! [Aside.]

Lou. Mrs. Fulmer, sir, informs me, you are the gentleman from whom my father has received such civilities.

Bel. Her father! [Aside.] Oh, never name them. Lou. Pardon me, Mr. Belcour, they must be both named and remembered; and if my father were here—

Bel. Her father again! [Aside.] I am much better pleased with his representative.

Lou. That title is my brother's, sir; I have no claim to it.

Bel. I believe it.

Lou. But, as neither he nor my father were fortunate enough to be at home, I could not resist the opportunity—

Bel. Nor I, neither, upon my soul, madam: let us improve it, therefore. I am in love with you to distraction, I was charmed at the first glance; I attempted to accost you; you fled; I followed, but was defeated of an interview: at length I have obtained one, and seize the opportunity of casting my person and my fortune at your feet.

Lou. You astonish me! Are you in your senses, or do you make a jest of my misfortunes? Do you ground pretences on your generosity, or do you make a practice of this folly with every woman you meet?

Bel. Upon my life, no; as you are the handsomest woman I ever met, so you are the first to whom I ever made the like professions: as for my generosity, madam, I must refer you on that score to this good lady, who, I believe, has something to offer in my behalf.

Lou. Don't build upon that, sir: I must have better proofs of your generosity, than the mere divestment of a little superfluous dress, before I can credit the sincerity of professions so abruptly delivered. [Exit, hastily.]

Bel. Oh, ye gods and goddesses! how her anger animates her beauty! [Going out.]

Mrs. F. Stay, sir; if you stir a step after her, I renounce your interest for ever: why, you'll ruin everything.

Bel. Well, I must have her, cost what it will: I see she understands her own value though: a little superfluous dross, truly! She must have better proofs of my generosity!

Mrs. F. 'Tis exactly as I told you: your money she calls dross; she's too proud to stain her fingers with your coin; bait your hook well with jewels; try that experiment, and she's your own.

Bel. Take them; let them go; lay them at her feet; I must get out of the scrape as I can; my propensity is irresistible: there; you have them; they are your's: they are her's; but remember, they are a trust: I commit them to her keeping, till I can buy them off, with something she shall think more valuable.—Now tell me when I shall meet her.

Mrs. F. How can I tell that! Don't you see what an alarm you have put her into? Oh! you're a rare one; but go your ways for this while: leave her to my management, and come to me at seven this evening; but remember not to bring empty pockets with you, ha, ha, ha!

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—Lady Rusport's House.

Enter Miss RUSPORT, followed by a Servant.

Miss R. Desire Mr. Stockwell to walk in.
[Exit Servant.]

Enter STOCKWELL.

Stock. Madam, your most obedient servant: I am honoured with your commands, by Captain Dudley; and have brought the money with me, as you directed. I understand the sum you have occasion for is two hundred pounds.

Miss R. It is, sir: I am quite confounded at your taking this trouble upon yourself, Mr. Stockwell.

Stock. There is a bank note, madam, to the amount: your jewels are in safe hands, and will be delivered to you directly. If I had been happy in being better known to you, I should have hoped you would not have thought it necessary to place a deposit in my hands for so trifling a sum as you have now required me to supply you with.

Miss R. The baubles I sent you may very well be spared; and, as they are the only security, in my present situation, I can give you, I could wish you would retain them in your hands: when I am of age, (which, if I live a few months, I shall be) I will replace your favour, with thanks.

Stock. It is obvious, Miss Rusport, that your charms will suffer no impeachment by the absence of those superficial ornaments; but they should be seen in the suite of a woman of fashion, not as creditors to whom you are indebted for your appearance, but as subservient attendants, which help to make up your equipage.

Miss R. Mr. Stockwell is determined not to wrong the confidence I reposed in his politeness.

Stock. I have only to request, madam, that you will allow Mr. Belcour, a young gentleman, in whose happiness I particularly interest myself, to have the honour of delivering you the box of jewels.

Miss R. Most gladly; any friend of your's cannot fail of being welcome here.

Stock. I flatter myself you will not find him totally undeserving your good opinion: an education, not of the strictest kind, and strong animal spirits, are apt sometimes to betray him into youthful irregularities; but a high principle of honour, and an uncommon benevolence, in the eye of candour, will, I hope, atone for any faults, by which these good qualities are not impaired.

Miss R. I dare say Mr. Belcour's behaviour wants no apology: we have no right to be over strict in canvassing the morals of a common acquaintance.

Stock. I wish it may be my happiness to see Mr. Belcour in the list, not of your common, but particular acquaintance, of your friends, Miss Rusport: I dare not be more explicit.

Miss R. Nor need you, Mr. Stockwell: I shall be studious to deserve his friendship; and though I have long since unalterably placed my affection on another, I trust, I have not left myself insensible to the merits of Mr. Belcour; and hope that neither you nor he will, for that reason, think me less worthy your good opinion and regards.

Stock. Miss Rusport, I sincerely wish you happy: I have no doubt you have placed your affections on a deserving man; and I have no right to combat your choice.

[Exit.]

Miss R. How honourable is that behaviour! Now, if Charles were here, I should be happy. The old lady is so fond of her new Irish acquaintance, that I have the whole house at my disposal.

[Exit.]

Enter BELCOUR, preceded by a Servant.

Serv. I ask your honour's pardon; I thought my young lady was here. Who shall I inform her would speak to her?

Bel. Belcour is my name, sir; and pray, beg your lady to put herself in no hurry on my account: for I'd sooner see the devil than see her face. [Aside. —Exit Servant.] In the name of all that's mischievous, why did Stockwell drive me hither in such haste? A pretty figure, truly, I shall make! an ambassador, without credentials! Blockhead that I was, to charge myself with her diamonds! officious, meddling puppy! Now they are irretrievably gone: that suspicious jade, Fulmer, wouldn't part even with a sight of them, though I would have ransomed them at twice their value. Now must I trust to my poor wits, to bring me off; a lamentable dependence. Fortune, be my helper! here comes the girl. If she is noble-minded, as she is said to be, she will forgive me; if not, 'tis a lost cause; for I have not thought of one word in my excuse.

Enter Miss RUSPORT.

Miss R. Mr. Belcour, I'm proud to see you: your friend, Mr. Stockwell, prepared me to expect this honour; and I am happy in the opportunity of being known to you.

Bel. A fine girl, by my soul! Now what a cursed hang-dog do I look like.

[Aside.]

Miss R. You are newly arrived in this country, sir?

Bel. Just landed, madam; just set ashore, with a large cargo of Muscavado sugars, rum-puncheons, mahogany slabs, wet sweetmeats, and green parquets.

Miss R. May I ask you how you like London, sir?

Bel. To admiration; I think the town and the town's folk are exactly suited; 'tis a great, rich, overgrown, noisy, tumultuous place; the whole morning is a bustle to get money, and the whole afternoon is a hurry to spend it.

Miss R. Are these all the observations you have made?

Bel. No, madam; I have observed the women are very captivating, and the men very soon caught.

Miss R. Ay, indeed! Whence do you draw that conclusion?

Bel. From infallible guides; the first remark I collect from what I now see, the second from what I now feel.

Miss R. Oh, the deuce take you! But to waive this subject, I believe, sir, this was a visit of business, not compliment; was it not?

Bel. Ay; now comes on my execution. [Aside.]

Miss R. You have some foolish trinkets of mine, Mr. Belcour; haven't you?

Bel. No, in truth; they are gone in search of a trinket still more foolish than themselves. [Aside.]

Miss R. Some diamonds I mean, sir; Mr. Stockwell informed me you was charged with them.

Bel. Oh, yes, madam; but I have the most treacherous memory in life—Here they are! Pray put them up; they're all right; you need not examine them. [Gives a box.]

Miss R. Hey-day! right, sir! Why these are not my diamonds; these are quite different; and, as it should seem, of much greater value.

Bel. Upon my life I'm glad on't; for then I hope you value them more than your own.

Miss R. As a purchaser I should, but not as an owner; you mistake—these belong to somebody else.

Bel. 'Tis your's, I'm afraid, that belong to somebody else. [Aside.]

Miss R. What is it you mean? I must insist upon your taking them back again.

Bel. Pray, madam, don't do that; I shall infallibly lose them; I have the worst luck with diamonds of any man living.

Miss R. That you might well say, were you to give me these in the place of mine; but pray, sir, what is the reason of all this? Why have you changed the jewels? And where have you disposed of mine?

Bel. Miss Rusport, I cannot invent a lie for my life; and if it was to save it, I couldn't tell one: I am an idle, dissipated, unthinking fellow, not worth your notice; in short, I am a West Indian; and you must try me according to the charter of my colony, not by a jury of English spinsters: the truth is, I have given away your jewels; caught with a pair of sparkling eyes, whose lustre blinded their's, I served your property as I should my own, and lavished it away; let me not totally despair of your forgiveness; I frequently do wrong, but never with impunity; if your displeasure is added to my own, my punishment will be too severe. When I parted from the jewels, I had not the honour of knowing their owner.

Miss R. Mr. Belcour, your sincerity charms me; I enter at once into your character, and I make all the allowances for it you can desire. I take your jewels for the present, because I know there is no other way of reconciling you to yourself; but, if I give way to your spirit in one point, you must yield to mine in another; remember, I will not keep more than the value of my own jewels; there is no need to be pillaged by more than one woman at a time, sir.

Bel. Now, may every blessing that can crown your virtues, and reward your beauty, be shower'd upon you; may you meet admiration without envy, love without jealousy, and old age without malady; may the man of your heart be ever constant, and you never meet a less penitent, or less grateful offender, than myself!

Enter Servant, who delivers a letter.

Miss R. Does your letter require such haste?

Serv. I was bade to give it into your own hands, madam.

Miss R. From Charles Dudley, I see: have I your permission? [He retires.] Good heaven, what do I read! Mr. Belcour, you are concerned in this. [Reads.] "Dear Charlotte,—In the midst of our distress, Providence has cast a benefactor in our way, after the most unexpected manner: a young West Indian, rich, and with a warmth of heart peculiar to his climate, has rescued my father from his troubles, satisfied his wants, and enabled him to accomplish his exchange; when I relate to you the manner in which this was done, you will be charmed. I can only now add, that it was by chance we found out that his name is Belcour, and that he is a friend of Mr. Stockwell's. I lose not a moment's time, in making you acquainted with this fortunate event, for reasons which delicacy obliges me to suppress; but, perhaps, if you have not received the money on your jewels, you will not think it necessary now to do it.—I have the honour to be, dear Madam, most faithfully your's,—Charles Dudley."—Is this your doing, sir? Never was generosity so worthily exerted.

Bel. Or so greatly overpaid.

Miss R. After what you have now done for this noble but indigent family, let me not scruple to unfold the whole situation of my heart to you. Know then, sir, and don't think the worse of me for the frankness of my declaration, that such is my attachment to the son of that worthy officer, whom you relieved, that the moment I am of age, and in possession of my fortune, I should hold myself the happiest of women to share it with young Dudley.

Bel. Say you so, madam? then let me perish if I don't love and reverence you above all woman-kind; and, if such is your generous resolution, never wait till you are of age; life is too short, pleasure too fugitive; the soul grows narrower every hour. I'll equip you for your escape; I'll convey you to the man of your heart, and away with you then to the first hospitable person that will take you in.

Miss R. O! blessed be the torrid zone for ever, whose rapid vegetation quickens nature into such benignity! But had I spirit to accept your offer, which is not improbable, wouldn't it be a mortifying thing, for a fond girl to find herself mistaken, and sent back to her home, like a vagrant? and such, for what I know, might be my case.

Bel. Then he ought to be proscribed the society of mankind for ever: ay, ay; 'tis the sham sister, that makes him thus indifferent. 'Twill be a meritorious office to take that girl out of the way. [Aside.]

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Miss Dudley, to wait on you, madam.

Bel. Who?

Serv. Miss Dudley.

Miss R. What's the matter, Mr. Belcour? Are you frightened at the name of a pretty girl? 'Tis the sister of him we were speaking of; pray admit her. [Exit Servant.]

Bel. The sister? So, so; he has imposed on her, too; this is an extraordinary visit, truly. Upon my soul, the assurance of some folks is not to be accounted for. [Aside, bows, and is going.]

Miss R. I insist upon your not running away; you'll be charmed with Louisa Dudley.

Bel. O yes, I am charmed with her.

Miss R. You have seen her, then, have you?

Bel. Yes, yes, I've seen her.

Miss R. Well, isn't she a delightful girl?

Bel. Very delightful.

Miss R. Why, you answer as if you were in a court of justice. O' my conscience I believe you are caught; I've a notion she has tricked you out of your heart.

Bel. I believe she has, and you out of your jewels; for, to tell you the truth, she's the very person I gave them to.

Miss R. You gave her my jewels! Louisa Dudley, my jewels! admirable! inimitable! Oh, the sly little jade! but, hush! here she comes; I don't know how I shall keep my countenance.

Enter LOUISA.

My dear, I'm rejoiced to see you; how do you do? I beg leave to introduce Mr. Belcour, a very worthy friend of mine. I believe, Louisa, you have seen him before.

Lou. I have met the gentleman.

Miss R. You have met the gentleman:—well, sir, and you have met the lady; in short, you have met each other; why, then, don't you speak to each other? How you both stand; tongue-tied and fixed as statues—Ha, ha, ha! why, you'll fall asleep by-and-by.

Lou. Fie upon you, fie upon you; is this fair?

Bel. Upon my soul, I never looked so like a fool in my life; the assurance of that girl puts me quite down. [Aside.]

Miss R. Sir—Mr. Belcour; was it your pleasure to advance anything? Not a syllable. Come, Louisa, woman's wit, they say, is never at a loss; nor you neither?—Speechless both; why, you were merry enough before this lady came in.

Lou. I am sorry I have been any interruption to your happiness, sir.

Bel. Madam!

Miss R. Madam! Is that all you can say? But come, my dear girl, I won't tease you—apropos! I must show you what a present this dumb gentleman has made me: Are not these handsome diamonds?

Lou. Yes, indeed, they seem very fine; but I am no judge of these things.

Miss R. Oh, you wicked little hypocrite; you are no judge of these things, Louisa; you have no diamonds, not you.

Lou. You know I haven't, Miss Rusport; you know those things are infinitely above my reach.

Miss R. Ha, ha, ha!

Bel. She does tell a lie with an admirable countenance, that's true enough. [Aside.]

Lou. What ails you, Charlotte? what impertinence have I been guilty of, that you should find it necessary to humble me at such a rate? If you are happy, long may you be so; but, surely, it can be no addition to it to make me miserable.

Miss R. So serious; there must be some mystery in this; Mr. Belcour, will you leave us together? You see I treat you with all the familiarity of an old acquaintance already.

Bel. Oh, by all means; pray command me. Miss Rusport, I am your most obedient. By your condescension in accepting these poor trifles, I am under eternal obligations to you. To you, Miss Dudley, I shall not offer a word on that subject; you despise finery; you have a soul above it; I adore your spirit; I was rather unprepared for meeting you here, but I shall hope for an opportunity of making myself better known to you. [Exit.]

Miss R. Louisa Dudley, you surprise me; I never saw you act thus before; can't you bear a little innocent railery before the man of your heart?

Lou. The man of my heart, madam! Be assured I never was so visionary as to aspire to any man whom Miss Rusport honours with her choice.

Miss R. My choice, my dear! Why, we are playing at cross-purposes; how entered it into your head that Mr. Belcour was the man of my choice?

Lou. Why, didn't he present you with these diamonds?

Miss R. Well; perhaps, he did; and pray, Louisa, have you no diamonds?

Lou. I diamonds truly! Who should give me diamonds?

Miss R. Who but this very gentleman;—apropos, here comes your brother.

Enter CHARLES.

I insist upon referring our dispute to him: your sister and I, Charles, have a quarrel. Belcour, the hero of your letter, has just left us: somehow or other, Louisa's bright eyes have caught him; and the poor fellow's fallen desperately in love with her, —(don't interrupt me, hussy.) Well, that's excusable enough, you'll say; but the jest of the story is, that this hair-brain'd spark, who does nothing like other people, has given her the very identical jewels which you pledged for me to Mr. Stockwell; and will you believe that this little demure slut made up a face, and squeezed out three or four hypocritical tears, because I rallied her about it.

Charles. I'm all astonishment! Louisa, tell me, without reserve, has Mr. Belcour given you any diamonds?

Lou. None, upon my honour.

Charles. Has he made any professions to you?

Lou. He has; but altogether in a style so whimsical and capricious, that the best which can be said of them, is to tell you, that they seemed more the result of good spirits than good manners.

Miss R. Ay, ay, now the murder's out; he's in love with her, and she has no very great dislike to him; trust to my observations, Charles, for that: as to the diamonds, there's some mistake about them, and you must clear it up; three minutes' conversation with him will put everything in a right train: go, go, Charles, 'tis a brother's business; about it instantly; ten to one you'll find him over the way, at Mr. Stockwell's.

Charles. I confess I'm impatient to have the case cleared up: I'll take your advice, and find him out; good bye to you.

Miss R. Your servant; my life upon it, you'll find Belcour a man of honour. Come, Louisa, let us adjourn to my dressing-room; I've a little private business to transact with you, before the old lady comes up to tea, and interrupts us. [Reunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Room in Fulmer's House.

Enter FULMER and Mrs. FULMER.

Ful. Patty, wasn't Mr. Belcour with you?

Mrs. F. He was; and is now shut up in my chamber, in high expectation of an interview with Miss Dudley; she's at present with her brother, and 'twas with some difficulty I persuaded my hot-headed spark to wait till he has left her.

Ful. Well, child, and what then?

Mrs. F. Why, then, Mr. Fulmer, I think it will be time for you and me to steal a march, and be gone.

Ful. So this is all the fruit of your ingenious project; a shameful overthrow, or a sudden flight.

Mrs. F. Why, my project was a mere impromptu, and can, at worst, but quicken our departure a few days; you know we had fairly outlived our credit here, and a trip to Boulogne is no ways unseasonable. Nay, never dream, man; hark, hark! here's enough to bear charges. [Showing a purse.]

Ful. Let me see, let me see; this weighs well, this is of the right sort: why, your West Indian bled freely.

Mrs. F. But that's not all; look here. Here are the sparklers. [Showing the jewels.] Now what d'ye think of my performances? Eh! a foolish scheme, isn't it—a silly woman?

Ful. Thou art a Judith, a Joan of Arc, and I'll march under thy banners, girl, to the world's end. Come, let's be gone: I've little to regret; my creditors may share the old books among them; they'll have occasion for philosophy to support their loss, they'll find enough upon my shelves; the world is my library, I read mankind. Now, Patty, lead the way.

Mrs. F. Adieu, Belcour!

[Exeunt.]

Enter CHARLES DUDLEY and LOUISA.

Charles. Well, Louisa, I confess the force of what you say; I accept Miss Rusport's bounty, and when you see my generous Charlotte, tell her—but have a care, there is a selfishness even in gratitude, when it is too profuse; to be over-thankful for any one favour, is, in effect, to lay out for another; the best return I could make my benefactress would be, never to see her more.

Lou. I understand you.

Charles. We that are poor, Louisa, should be cautious: for this reason, I would guard you against Belcour; at least, till I can unravel the mystery of Miss Rusport's diamonds; I was disappointed of finding him at Mr. Stockwell's, and am now going in search of him again. He may intend honourably; but, I confess to you, I am staggered; think no more of him, therefore, for the present. Of this be sure, while I have life and you have honour, I will protect you, or perish in your defence. [Exit.]

Lou. Think of him no more! Well, I'll obey; but if a wandering, uninvited thought should creep by chance into my bosom, must I not give the harmless wretch a shelter? Fie, fie upon it. Belcour pursues, insults me; yet, such is the fatality of my condition, that what should rouse resentment, only calls up love.

Enter BELCOUR.

Bel. Alone, by all that's happy!

Lou. Ah!

Bel. Oh! shriek not, start not, stir not, loveliest creature; but let me kneel and gaze upon your beauties.

Lou. Sir! Mr. Belcour, rise! What is it you do? Should he that parted from me but this minute, now return, I tremble for the consequence.

Bel. Fear nothing; let him come: I love you, madam; he'll find it hard to make me unsay that.

Lou. You terrify me; your impetuous temper frightens me; you know my situation, it is not generous to pursue me thus.

Bel. True, I do know your situation, your real one, Miss Dudley, and am resolved to snatch you from it; 'twill be a meritorious act. Come, thou art a dear enchanting girl, and I'm determined not to live a minute longer without thee.

Lou. Hold! are you mad? I see you are a bold assuming man; and know not where to stop.

Bel. Who that beholds such beauty can? Provoking girl, is it within the stretch of my fortune to content you? What is it you can further ask, that I am not ready to grant?

Lou. Yes, with the same facility, that you bestowed upon me Miss Rusport's diamonds. For shame, for shame! was that a manly story?

Bel. So, so! these devilish diamonds meet me everywhere. Let me perish, if I meant you any harm. Oh! I could tear my tongue out for saying a word about the matter.

Lou. Go to her then, and contradict it; till that is done, my reputation is at stake.

Bel. Her reputation! Now she has got upon that she'll go on for ever. [Aside.] What is there I will not do for your sake? I will go to Miss Rusport.

Lou. Do so; restore her own jewels to her, which I suppose you kept back for the purpose of presenting others to her of a greater value; but, for the future, Mr. Belcour, when you would do a gallant action to that lady, don't let it be at my expense.

Bel. I see where she points: she is willing enough to give up Miss Rusport's diamonds, now she finds she shall be a gainer by the exchange. Be it so, 'tis what I wished. Well, madam, I will return to Miss Rusport her own jewels, and you shall have others of tenfold their value.

Lou. No, sir, you err most widely; it is my good opinion, not my vanity, which you must bribe.

Bel. Why what the devil would she have now? [Aside.] Miss Dudley, it is my wish to obey and please you; but I have some apprehension that we mistake each other.

Lou. I think we do.—Tell me, then, in a few words, what is it you aim at.

Bel. In a few words, then, and in plain honesty, I must tell you, so entirely am I captivated with you, that had you but been such as it would have become me to have called my wife, I had been happy in knowing you by that name; as it is, you are welcome to partake my fortune, give me in return your person, give me pleasure, give me love; free, disencumbered, anti-matrimonial love.

Lou. Stand off, and never let me see you more.

Bel. Hold, hold, thou dear, tormenting, tantalizing girl. Upon my knees, I swear you shall not stir till you have consented to my bliss. [Kneels.]

Lou. Unhand me, sir; O, Charles, protect me, rescue me, redress me. [Exit.]

Enter CHARLES DUDLEY.

Charles. How's this? Rise, villain, and defend yourself.

Bel. Villain!

Charles. The man who wrongs that lady is a villain.—Draw! [Rises.]

Bel. Never fear me, young gentleman; brand me for a coward if I baulk you.

Charles. Yet hold! let me not be too hasty; your name, I think, is Belcour.

Bel. Well, sir.

Charles. How is it, Mr. Belcour, you have done this mean, unmanly wrong; beneath the mask of generosity, to give this fatal stab to our domestic peace? You might have had my thanks, my blessing: take my defiance now. 'Tis Dudley speaks to you! the brother, the protector, of that injured lady.

Bel. The brother! give yourself a truer title.

Charles. What is't you mean?

Bel. Come, come, I know both her and you: I found you, sir, (but how or why I know not) in the good graces of Miss Rusport, (yes, colour at that name,) I gave you no disturbance there, never broke in upon you in that rich and plenteous quarter, but, when I could have blasted all your projects with a word, spared you, in foolish pity spared you, nor roused her from the fond credulity in which your artifice had lulled her.

Charles. No, sir, nor boasted to her of the splendid present you had made my poor Louisa; the diamonds, Mr. Belcour, how was that? What can you plead to that arraignment?

Bel. You question me too late; the name of Belcour and of villain never met before: had you inquired of me before you uttered that rash word, you might have saved yourself or me a mortal error; now, sir, I neither give nor take an explanation;—so come on. [They fight.]

Enter LOUISA and O'FLAHERTY.

Lou. Hold, hold; for heaven's sake!

O'Fla. Hell and confusion! What's all this uproar for? Can't you leave off cutting one another's throats, and mind what the poor girl says to you? You've done a notable thing, haven't you both, to put her into such a flurry? I think, o'my conscience, she's the most frightened of the three.

Charles. Dear Louisa, recollect yourself; why did you interfere? 'tis in your cause.

Bel. Now could I kill him for caressing her.

O'Fla. O, sir, your most obedient! You are the gentleman I had the honour of meeting here before; you was then running off at full speed, like a Kalmuck; now you are tilting and driving like a bedlamite, with this lad here, that seems as mad as yourself: 'tis a pity but your country had a little more employment for you both.

Bel. Mr. Dudley, when you have recovered the lady, you know where I am to be found. [Exit.]

O'Fla. Well, then, can't you stay where you are, and that will save the trouble of looking after you? Yon volatile fellow thinks to give a man the meeting by getting out of his way; by my soul, 'tis a roundabout method that of his. But I think he called you Dudley: harkye, young man, are you the son of my friend, the old captain?

Charles. I am. Help me to convey this lady to her chamber, and I shall be more at leisure to answer your questions.

O'Fla. Ay, will I: come along, pretty one: if you've had wrong done you, young man, you need look no further for a second; Dennis O'Flaherty's your man for that: but never draw your sword before a woman, Dudley; d—n it, never, while you live, draw your sword before a woman. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Lady Rusport's House.

Enter LADY RUSPORT and Servant.

Serv. An elderly gentleman, who says his name is Varland, desires leave to wait on your ladyship. [Exit.]

Lady R. Show him in; the very man I wish to see. Varland, he was Sir Oliver's solicitor, and privy to all his affairs; he brings some good tidings; some fresh mortgage, or another bond come to light; they start up every day.

Enter VARLAND.

Mr. Varland, I'm glad to see you; you are heartily welcome, honest Mr. Varland; you and I haven't met since our late irreparable loss: how have you passed your time this age?

Var. Truly, my lady, ill enough; I thought I must have followed good Sir Oliver.

Lady R. Alack-a-day, poor man! Well, Mr. Varland, you find me here overwhelmed with trouble and fatigue; torn to pieces with a multiplicity of affairs, a great fortune poured upon me, unsought for and unexpected: 'twas my good father's will and pleasure it should be so, and I must submit.

Var. Your ladyship inherits under a will, made in the year forty-five, immediately after Captain Dudley's marriage with your sister.

Lady R. I do so, Mr. Varland; I do so.

Var. I well remember it; I engrossed every syllable; but I am surprised to find your ladyship set so little store by this vast accession.

Lady R. Why, you know, Mr. Varland, I am a moderate woman; I had enough before; a small matter satisfies me; and Sir Stephen Rusport (heaven be his portion!) took care I shouldn't want that.

Var. Very true, very true; he did so; and I am overjoyed to find your ladyship in this disposition; for truth to say, I was not without apprehension the news I have to communicate would have been of some prejudice to your ladyship's tranquillity.

Lady R. News, sir! what news have you for me?

Var. Nay, nothing to alarm you; a trifle in your present way of thinking: I have a will of Sir Oliver's, you have never seen.

Lady R. A will! impossible! how came you by it?

Var. I drew it up, at his command, in his last illness: it will save you a world of trouble; it gives his whole estate from you to his grandson, Charles Dudley.

Lady R. To Dudley! his estate to Charles Dudley! I can't support it; I shall faint! You have killed me, you vile man! I never shall survive it!

Var. Lookye there, now; I protest, I thought you would have rejoiced at being clear of the incumbrance.

Lady R. 'Tis false; 'tis all a forgery, concerted between you and Dudley; why, else, did I never hear of it before?

Var. Have patience, my lady, and I'll tell you. By Sir Oliver's direction, I was to deliver this will into no hands but his grandson Dudley's; the young gentleman happened to be then in Scotland: I was despatched thither in search of him: the hurry and fatigue of my journey brought on a fever by the way, which confined me in extreme danger for several days; upon my recovery, I pursued my journey, found young Dudley had left Scotland in the interim, and am now directed hither: where, as soon as I can find him, doubtless, I shall discharge my conscience, and fulfil my commission.

Lady R. Dudley, then, as yet knows nothing of this will?

Var. Nothing; that secret rests with me.

Lady R. A thought occurs; by this fellow's talking of his conscience, I should guess it was upon sale. [Aside.] Come, Mr. Varland, if 'tis as you say, I must submit, I was somewhat flurried at first, and forgot myself; I ask your pardon: this is no place to talk of business, step with me into my room; we will there compare the will, and resolve accordingly. Oh! would your fever had you, and I had your paper. [Aside—Exeunt.]

Enter MISS RUSPORT, CHARLES, and O'FLAHERTY.

Miss R. So, so! my lady and her lawyer have retired to close confabulation; now, Major, if you are the generous man I take you for, grant me one favour.

O'Fla. 'Faith, will I, and not think much of my generosity neither; for, though it may not be in my power to do the favour you ask, look you, it can never be in my heart to refuse it.

Charles. Could this man's tongue do justice to his thoughts, how eloquent would he be! [Aside.]

Miss R. Plant yourself, then, in that room; keep guard for a few moments upon the enemy's motions in the chamber beyond; and if they should attempt a sally, stop their march a moment, till your friend here can make good his retreat down the back stairs.

O'Fla. A word to the wise! I'm an old campaigner: make the best use of your time; and trust me for tying the old cat up to the picket.

Miss R. Hush! hush! not so loud.

Charles. 'Tis the office of a sentinel, Major, you have undertaken, rather than that of a field-officer.

O'Fla. 'Tis the office of a friend, my dear boy; and therefore no disgrace to a general. [Exit.]

Miss R. Well, Charles, will you commit yourself to me for a few minutes?

Charles. Most readily; and let me, before one goes by, tender you the only payment I can ever make for your abundant generosity.

Miss R. Hold, hold! so vile a thing as money must not come between us. What shall I say? O Charles! O Dudley! What difficulties have you thrown upon me! Familiarly as we have lived, I shrink at what I am doing; and anxiously as I have sought this opportunity, my fears almost persuade me to abandon it.

Charles. You alarm me!

Miss R. Your looks and actions have been so distant, and at this moment are so deterring, that, were it not for the hope that delicacy, and not disgust, inspires this conduct in you, I should sink with shame and apprehension: but time presses; and I must speak, and plainly too. Were you now in possession of your grandfather's estate, as justly you ought to be, and were you inclined to seek a companion for life, should you, or should you not, in that case, honour your unworthy Charlotte with your choice?

Charles. My unworthy Charlotte! So judge me, heaven, there is not a circumstance on earth so valuable as your happiness, so dear to me as your person: but to bring poverty, disgrace, reproach from friends, ridicule from all the world, upon a generous benefactress; thievishly to steal into an open and unreserved, ingenuous heart, O Charlotte! dear, unhappy girl, it is not to be done.

Miss R. Come, my dear Charles, I have enough; make that enough still more by sharing it with me: sole heiress of my father's fortune, a short time will put it in my disposal; in the meanwhile you will be sent to join your regiment; let us prevent a separation, by setting out this very night for that happy country, where marriage still is free: carry me this moment to Belcour's lodgings.

Charles. Belcour's? The name is ominous; there's murder in it: inexorable honour! [Aside.]

Miss R. D'y'e pause? Put me into his hands, while you provide the means for our escape; he is the most generous, the most honourable of men.

Charles. Honourable! most honourable!

Miss R. Can you doubt it? Do you demur? Have you forgot your letter? Why, Belcour 'twas that prompted me to this proposal, that promised to supply the means, that nobly offered his unasked assistance,

Enter O'FLAHERTY.

O'Fla. Run, run; for holy St. Anthony's sake, to horse, and away! The conference is broke up, and the enemy advances upon a full Piedmontese trot, within pistol-shot of our encampment.

Miss R. Here, here; down the back stairs! O, Charles, remember me!

Charles. Farewell! Now, now, I feel myself a coward. [Exit.]

Miss R. What does he mean?

O'Fla. Ask no questions, but be gone; she has cooled the lad's courage, and wonders he feels like a coward. There's a damned deal of mischief brewing between this hyena and her lawyer: here comes old six-and-eight-pence—'egad! I'll step behind this screen, and listen; a good soldier must sometimes fight in ambush, as well as in open field. [Retires behind a screen.]

Enter VARLAND.

Var. Let me consider—five thousand pounds, prompt payment, for destroying this scrap of paper, not worth five farthings; 'tis a fortune easily earned; yes, and 'tis another man's fortune easily thrown away; 'tis a good round sum, to be paid down at once for a bribe: but 'tis a d—d rogue's trick in me to take it.

O'Fla. So, so! this fellow speaks truth to himself, though he lies to other people. [Aside.]

Var. 'Tis breaking the trust of my benefactor, that's a foul crime; but he's dead, and can never reproach me with it: and 'tis robbing young Dudley of his lawful patrimony, that's a hard case; but he's alive, and knows nothing of the matter.

O'Fla. These lawyers are so used to bring off the rogues of others, that they are never without an excuse for their own. [Aside.]

Var. Were I assured now that Dudley would give me half the money for producing this will, that Lady Rusport does for concealing it, I would deal with him, and be an honest man at half-price; and I wish every gentleman of my profession could lay his hand on his heart, and say the same thing.

O'Fla. A bargain, old gentleman! Nay, never start nor stare; you wasn't afraid of your own conscience; never be afraid of me.

Var. Of you, sir! who are you, pray?

O'Fla. I'll tell you who I am: you seem to wish to be honest, but want the heart to set about it; now I am the very man in the world to make you so; for if you do not give up that paper this very instant, by the soul of me, fellow, I will not leave one whole bone in your skin that sha'n't be broken.

Var. What right have you, pray, to take this paper from me?

O'Fla. What right have you, pray, to keep it from young Dudley? I don't know what it contains, but I am apt to think it will be safer in my hands than in yours; therefore give it me without more words, and save yourself a beating: do now; you had best.

Var. Well, sir, I may as well make a grace of necessity. There; I have acquitted my conscience, at the expense of five thousand pounds.

O'Fla. Five thousand pounds! Mercy upon me! When there are such temptations in the law, can we wonder if some of the corps are a disgrace to it?

Var. Well, you have got the paper; if you are an honest man, give it to Charles Dudley.

O'Fla. An honest man! look at me, friend, I am a soldier, this is not the livery of a knave; I am an Irishman, honey; mine is not the country of dishonour. Now, sirrah, be gone; if you enter these doors, or give Lady Rusport the least item of what has passed, I will cut off both your ears, and rob the pillory of its due.

Var. I wish I was once fairly out of his sight.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—A Room in Stockwell's House.

Enter STOCKWELL.

Stock. I must disclose myself to Belcour; this noble instance of his generosity, which old Dudley has been relating, allies me to him at once; concealment becomes too painful; I shall be proud to own him for my son: but see, he's here.

Enter BELCOUR.

Bel. O my cursed tropical constitution! 'Would to heaven I had been dropped upon the snows of Lapland, and never felt the blessed influence of the sun, so had I never burnt with these inflammatory passions.

Stock. So, so; you seem disordered, Mr. Belcour.

Bel. Disordered, sir! Why did I ever quit the soil in which I grew? what evil planet drew me from that warm, sunny region, where naked nature walks without disguise, into this cold, contriving, artificial country.

Stock. Come, sir, you've met a rascal; what o'that? General conclusions are illiberal.

Bel. No, sir, I have met reflection by the way; I have come from folly, noise, and fury, and met a silent monitor. Well, well, a villain! 'twas not to be pardoned; pray, never mind me, sir.

Stock. Alas! my heart bleeds for him. [Aside.]

Bel. And yet I might have heard him: now, plague upon that blundering Irishman, for coming in as he did; the hurry of the deed might palliate the event; deliberate execution has less to plead. Mr. Stockwell, I am bad company to you.

Stock. Oh, sir, make no excuse. I think you have not found me forward to pry into the secrets of your pleasures and pursuits; 'tis not my disposition; but there are times, when want of curiosity would be want of friendship.

Bel. Ah, sir, mine is a case wherein you and I shall never think alike.

Stock. 'Tis very well, sir; if you think I can render you any service, it may be worth your trial to confide in me; if not, your secret is safer in your own bosom.

Bel. That sentiment demands my confidence; pray, sit down by me. You must know, I have an affair of honour on my hands with young Dudley; and, though I put up with no man's insult, yet I wish to take away no man's life.

Stock. I know the young man, and am apprised of your generosity to his father; what can have bred a quarrel between you?

Bel. A foolish passion on my side, and a haughty provocation on his. There is a girl, Mr. Stockwell, whom I have unfortunately seen, of most uncommon beauty; she has withal an air of so much natural modesty, that, had I not had good assurance of her being an attainable wanton, I declare I should as soon have thought of attempting the chastity of Diana.

Enter a Servant.

Stock. Heyday! why do you interrupt us?

Serv. Sir, there's an Irish gentleman will take no denial; he says, he must see Mr. Belcour directly, upon business of the last consequence.

Bel. Admit him; 'tis the Irish officer that parted us, and brings me young Dudley's challenge; I should have made a long story of it, and he'll tell you in three words.

Enter Major O'FLAHERTY.

O'Fla. 'Save you, my dear; and you, sir, I have a little bit of a word in private for you.

Bel. Pray, deliver your commands; this gentleman is my intimate friend.

O'Fla. Why, then, Ensign Dudley will be glad to measure swords with you yonder, at the London Tavern, in Bishopsgate-street, at nine o'clock; you know the place.

Bel. I do, and shall observe the appointment.

O'Fla. Will you be of the party, sir? we shall want a fourth hand.

Stock. Savage as the custom is, I close with your proposal; and though I am not fully informed of the occasion of your quarrel, I shall rely on Mr. Belcour's honour for the justice of it, and willingly stake my life in his defence.

O'Fla. Sir, you are a gentleman of honour, and I shall be glad of being better known to you. But, harkye, Belcour, I had like to have forgot part of my errand; there is the money you gave old Dudley: you may tell it over, 'faith; 'tis a receipt in full: now the lad can put you to death with a safe conscience; and when he has done that job for you, let it be a warning how you attempt the sister of a man of honour.

Bel. The sister!

O'Fla. Ay, the sister; 'tis English, is it not? Or Irish, 'tis all one; you understand me: his sister, or Louisa Dudley, that's her name, I think, call her which you will. By St. Patrick! 'tis a foolish piece of business, Belcour, to go about to take away a poor girl's virtue from her, when there are so many to be met with in this town, who have disposed of their's to your hands. [Exit.]

Stock. Why, I am thunderstruck! what is it you have done, and what is the shocking business in which I have engaged? If I understand him right, 'tis the sister of young Dudley you have been at tempting: you talked to me of a professed wanton; the girl he speaks of has beauty enough indeed to inflame your desires, but she has honour, innocence, and simplicity, to awe the most licentious passions; if you have done that, Mr. Belcour, I renounce you, I abandon you, I forswear all fellowship or friendship with you for ever.

Bel. Have patience for a moment; we do indeed speak of the same person, but she is not innocent, she is not young Dudley's sister.

Stock. Astonishing, who told you this?

Bel. The woman where she lodges, the person who put me on the pursuit, and contrived our meetings.

Stock. What woman? What person?

Bel. Fulmer her name is; I warrant you, I did not proceed without good ground.

Stock. Fulmer, Fulmer! Who waits?

Enter a Servant.

Send Mr. Stukely hither directly; [Exit Servant.] I begin to see my way into this dark transaction. Mr. Belcour, Mr. Belcour, you are no match for the cunning and contrivances of this intriguing town.

Enter STUKELY.

Pr'ythee, Stukely, what is the name of the woman and her husband, who were stopped upon suspicion of selling stolen diamonds at our next-door neighbour's, the jeweller?

Stuke. Fulmer.

Stock. So!

Bel. Can you procure me a sight of those diamonds?

Stuke. They are now in my hand, I was desired to shew them to Mr. Stockwell.

Stock. Give them to me. What do I see? As I live, the very diamonds Miss Rusport sent hither, and which I entrusted to you to return.

Bel. Yes, but I betrayed that trust, and gave them Mrs. Fulmer, to present to Miss Dudley.

Stock. With a view, no doubt, to bribe her to compliance?

Bel. I own it.

Stock. For shame, for shame; and 'twas this woman's intelligence, you relied upon for Miss Dudley's character.

Bel. I thought she knew her. By heaven! I would have died, sooner than have insulted a woman of virtue, or a man of honour.

Stock. I think you would; but mark the danger of licentious courses: you are betrayed, robbed, abused, and, but for this providential discovery, in a fair way of being sent out of the world, with all your follies on your head. Dear Stukely, go to my neighbour, tell him, I have an owner for the jewels; and beg him to carry the people under custody to the London Tavern, and wait for me there. [Exit STUKELY.] I see it was a trap laid for you, which you have narrowly escaped: you addressed a woman of honour with all the loose incense of a profane admirer; and you have drawn upon you the resentment of a man of honour, who thinks himself bound to protect her. Well, sir, you must atone for this mistake.

Bel. To the lady the most penitent submission I can make is justly due; but in the execution of an act of justice, it never shall be said my soul was swayed by the least particle of fear. I have received a challenge from her brother: now, though I would give my fortune, almost my life itself, to purchase her happiness, yet, I cannot abate her one scruple of my honour; I have been branded with the name of villain.

Stock. Ay, sir, you mistook her character, and he mistook your's; error begets error.

Bel. Villain, Mr. Stockwell, is a harsh word.

Stock. It is a harsh word, and should be unsaid.

Bel. Come, come, it shall be unsaid.

Stock. Or else, what follows? Why, the sword is drawn; and to heal the wrongs you have done to the reputation of the sister, you make an honourable amends by murdering the brother.

Bel. Murdering!

Stock. 'Tis thus religion writes and speaks the word; in the vocabulary of modern honour, there is no such term. But, come, I don't despair of satisfying the one, without alarming the other; that done, I have a discovery to unfold, that you will then, I hope, be fitted to receive. [Exeunt.]

ACT V

SCENE I.—Stockwell's House.

Enter CAPTAIN DUDLEY LOUISA, and STUKELY.

Dud. And are those wretches, Fulmer and his wife, in safe custody?

Stuke. They are in good hands; I accompanied them to the tavern, where your son was to be, and then went in search of you. You may be sure, Mr. Stockwell will enforce the law against them as far as it will go.

Dud. What mischief might their cursed machinations have produced, but for this timely discovery!

Lou. Still I am terrified; I tremble with apprehension.

Stuke. Mr. Stockwell is with them, madam, and you have nothing to fear; you may expect them every minute; and see, madam, agreeably to your wish, they are here. [Exit.]

Enter CHARLES: afterwards STOCKWELL, and O'FLAHERTY.

Lou. O Charles, O brother! how could you serve me so? how could you tell me you was going to Lady Rusport's, and then set out on a design of fighting Mr. Belcour? But where is he; where is your antagonist?

Stock. Captain, I am proud to see you; and you, Miss Dudley, do me particular honour. We have been adjusting, sir, a very extraordinary and dangerous mistake, which, I take for granted, my friend Stukely has explained to you.

Dud. He has. I have too good an opinion of Mr. Belcour, to believe he could be guilty of a designed affront to an innocent girl; and I am much too well acquainted with your character, to suppose you could abet him in such design; I have no doubt, therefore, all things will be set to rights in a very few words, when we have the pleasure of seeing Mr. Belcour.

Stock. He has only stepped into the counting-house, and will wait upon you directly. You will not be over strict, madam, in weighing Mr. Belcour's conduct to the minutest scruple; his manners, passions, and opinions, are not as yet assimilated to this climate; he comes amongst you a new character, an inhabitant of a new world; and both hospitality, as well as pity, recommend him to our indulgence.

Enter BELCOUR.

Bel. I am happy, and ashamed, to see you; no man in his senses would offend you; I have forfeited mine, and erred against the light of the sun, when I overlooked your virtues; but your beauty was predominant, and hid them from my sight; I now perceive, I was the dupe of a most improbable report, and humbly entreat your pardon.

Lou. Think no more of it; 'twas a mistake.

Bel. My life has been composed of little else; 'twas founded in mystery, and has continued in error: I was once given to hope, Mr. Stockwell, that you was to have delivered me from these difficulties; but either I do not deserve your confidence, or I was deceived in my expectations.

Stock. When this lady has confirmed your pardon, I shall hold you deserving of my confidence.

Lou. That was granted the moment it was asked.

Bel. To prove my title to his confidence, honour me so far with yours, as to allow me a few minutes' conversation in private with you.

[She turns to her Father.]

Dud. By all means, Louisa [They retire.] Come, Mr. Stockwell, let us go into another room.

Charles. And now, Major O'Flaherty, I claim your promise, of a sight of the paper, that is to unravel this conspiracy of my aunt Rusport's. I think I have waited with great patience.

O'Fla. I have been endeavouring to call to mind what it was I overheard; I have got the paper, and will give you the best account I can of the whole transaction. [Exeunt all but LOUISA and BELCOUR.]

Bel. Miss Dudley, I have solicited this audience, to repeat to you my penitence and confusion. How shall I atone? What reparation can I make to you and virtue?

Lou. To me there's nothing due, nor anything demanded of you but your more favourable opinion for the future, if you should chance to think of me. Upon the part of virtue, I am not empowered to speak; but if hereafter, as you range through life, you should surprise her in the person of some wretched female, poor as myself, and not so well protected, enforce not your advantage, complete not your licentious triumph; but raise her, rescue her from shame and sorrow, and reconcile her to herself again.

Bel. I will, I will; by bearing your idea ever present in my thoughts, virtue shall keep an advocate within me: but tell me, loveliest, when you pardon the offence, can you, all perfect as you are, approve of the offender? As I now cease to view you in that false light I lately did, can you, and in the fullness of your bounty will you, cease also to reflect upon the libertine addresses I have paid you, and look upon me as your reformed, your rational admirer?

Lou. Are sudden reformatations apt to last? and how can I be sure the first fair face you meet will not ensnare affections so unsteady, and that I shall not lose you lightly as I gained you?

Bel. I know I am not worthy your regard; but there's a healing virtue in your eyes, that makes recovery certain; I cannot be a villain in your arms.

Lou. That you can never be: whomsoever you shall honour with your choice, my life upon't, that woman will be happy.

Bel. I see, Miss Dudley, I've not yet obtained your pardon.

Lou. Nay, that you are in full possession of.

Bel. Oh, seal it with your hand, then, loveliest of women, confirm it with your heart: make me honourably happy, and crown your penitent, not with your pardon only, but your love.

Lou. My love!

Enter O'FLAHERTY; afterwards DUDLEY and CHARLES, with STOCKWELL.

O'Fla. Joy, joy! sing, dance, leap, laugh for joy. Ha! done making love, and fall down on your knees to every saint in the calendar, for they are all on your side, and honest St. Patrick at the head of them.

Charles. O Louisa, such an event! By the luckiest chance in life, we have discovered a will of my grandfather's, made in his last illness, by which he cuts off my aunt Rusport with a small annuity, and leaves me heir to his whole estate, with a fortune of fifteen thousand pounds to yourself.

Lou. What is it you tell me? O, sir, instruct me how to support this unexpected turn of fortune.

[To her Father.]

Dud. Name not fortune: 'tis the work of Providence; 'tis the justice of heaven, that would not suffer innocence to be oppressed, nor your base aunt to prosper in her cruelty and cunning.

[A Servant whispers BELCOUR, and he goes out.]

O'Fla. You shall pardon me, Captain Dudley, but you must not overlook St. Patrick neither; for, by my soul, if he had not put it into my head to slip behind the screen, when your righteous aunt and the lawyer were plotting together, I don't see how you would ever have come at the paper there, that Master Stockwell is reading.

Dud. True, my good friend, you are the father of this discovery; but how did you contrive to get this will from the lawyer?

O'Fla. By force, my dear; the only way of getting anything from the lawyer's clutches.

Stock. Well, Major, when he brings his action of assault and battery against you, the least Dudley can do is to defend you with all the weapons you have put into his hands.

Charles. That I am bound to do; and after the happiness I shall have in sheltering a father's age from the vicissitudes of life, my next delight will be in offering you an asylum in the bosom of your country.

O'Fla. And upon my soul, my dear, 'tis high time I was there, for 'tis now thirty long years since I sat foot in my native country, and by the power of St. Patrick I swear I think it's worth all the rest of the world put together.

Dud. Ay, Major, much about that time have I been beating the round of service, and 'twere well for us both to give over; we have stood many a tough gale, and abundance of hard blows, but Charles shall lay us up in a little private, but safe harbour, where we'll rest from our labour, and peacefully wind up the remainder of our days.

O'Fla. Agreed; and you may take it as a proof of my esteem, young man, that Major O'Flaherty accepts a favour at your hands; for, by heaven, I'd sooner starve than say "I thank you" to the man I despise: but I believe you are an honest lad, and I'm glad you've trounced the old cat; for on my conscience, I believe I must otherwise have married her myself, to have let you in for a share of her fortune.

Stock. Hey-day! what's become of Belcour?

Lou. One of your servants called him out just now, and seemingly on some earnest occasion.

Stock. I hope, Miss Dudley, he has atoned to you as a gentleman ought.

Lou. Mr. Belcour, sir, will always do what a gentleman ought, and in my case, I fear only you will think he has done too much.

Stock. What has he done? and what can be too much? Pray heaven, it may be as I wish! [Aside.]

Dud. Let us hear it, child.

Lou. With confusion for my own unworthiness, I confess to you he has offered me—

Stock. Himself.

Lou. 'Tis true.

Stock. Then I am happy; all my doubts, my cares, are over, and I may owe him for my son. [Aside.] Why, these are joyful tidings! Come, my good friend, assist me in disposing your lovely daughter to accept this returning prodigal; he is no unprincipled, no hardened libertine: his love for you and virtue is the same.

Dud. 'Twere vile ingratitude in me to doubt his merit. What says my child?

O'Fla. Begging your pardon now, 'tis a frivolous sort of a question, that of your's, for you may see plainly enough by the young lady's looks, that she says a great deal, though she speaks never a word.

Charles. Well, sister, I believe the Major has fairly interpreted the state of your heart.

Lou. I own it; and what must that heart be, which love, honour, and beneficence, like Mr. Belcour's, can make no impression on?

Stock. I thank you. What happiness has this hour brought to pass!

O'Fla. Why don't we all sit down to supper then, and make a night on't?

Enter BELCOUR, introducing Miss RUSPORT.

Bel. Mr. Dudley, here is a fair refugee, who properly comes under your protection; she is equipped for Scotland; but your good fortune, which I have related to her, seems inclined to save you both the journey. Nay, madam, never go back; you are amongst friends.

Charles. Charlotte!

Miss R. The same; that fond, officious girl, that haunts you everywhere: that persecuting spirit—

Charles. Say rather, that protecting angel; such you have been to me.

Miss R. O Charles, you have an honest, but proud heart.

Charles. Nay chide me not, dear Charlotte.

Bel. Seal up her lips, then; she is an adorable girl; her arms are open to you; and love and happiness are ready to receive you.

Charles. Thus, then, I claim my dear, my destined wife. [Embracing her.]

Enter Lady RUSPORT.

Lady R. Hey-day! mighty fine! wife, truly! mighty well! kissing, embracing; did ever anything equal this? Why, you shameless hussy! But I won't condescend to waste a word upon you. You, sir, you, Mr. Stockwell; you fine, sanctified, fair-dealing man of conscience; is this the principle you trade upon? Is this your neighbourly system, to keep a house of reception for runaway daughters, and young beggarly fortune-hunters?

O'Fla. Be advised now, and don't put yourself in such a passion: we were all very happy till you came.

Lady R. Stand away, sir; haven't I reason to be in a passion?

O'Fla. Indeed, honey, and you have, if you knew all.

Lady R. Come, madam, I have found out your haunts; dispose yourself to return home with me. Young man, let me never see you within my doors again: Mr. Stockwell, I shall report your behaviour, depend on it.

Stock. Hold, madam, I cannot consent to lose Miss Rusport's company this evening, and I am persuaded you won't insist upon it; 'tis an unmotherly action to interrupt your daughter's happiness in this manner, believe me it is.

Lady R. Her happiness truly! upon my word! and I suppose it's an unmotherly action to interrupt her ruin; for what but ruin must it be to marry a beggar? I think my sister had a proof of that, sir, when she made choice of you. [To Capt. DUDLEY.]

Dud. Don't be too lavish of your spirits, Lady Rusport.

O'Fla. By my soul, you'll have occasion for a sip of the cordial elixir by-and-by.

Stock. It don't appear to me, madam, that Mr. Dudley can be called a beggar.

Lady R. But it appears to me, Mr. Stockwell; I am apt to think a pair of colours cannot furnish a settlement quite sufficient for the heiress of Sir Stephen Rusport.

Miss R. But a good estate, in aid of a commission, may do something.

Lady R. A good estate, truly! where should he get a good estate, pray?

Stock. Why, suppose now, a worthy old gentleman, on his death-bed, should have taken it in mind to leave him one—

Lady R. Ha! what's that you say?

O'Fla. O ho! you begin to smell a plot, do you?

Stock. Suppose there should be a paper in the world, that runs thus—"I do hereby give and bequeath all my estates, real and personal, to Charles Dudley, son of my late daughter Louisa, &c. &c. &c."

O'Fla. There's a fine parcel of et ceteras for your ladyship.

Lady R. Why, I am thunderstruck! by what contrivance, what villainy, did you get possession of that paper?

Stock. There was no villainy, madam, in getting possession of it; the crime was in concealing it, none in bringing it to light.

Lady R. Oh, that cursed lawyer, Varland!

O'Fla. You may say that, 'faith; he is a cursed lawyer, and a cursed piece of work I had to get the paper from him; your ladyship now was to have paid him five thousand pounds for it: I forced him to give it me of his own accord, for nothing at all, at all!

Lady R. Is it you that have done this? Am I foiled by your blundering contrivances, after all?

O'Fla. 'Twas a blunder, 'faith, but as natural a one as if I had made it o'purpose.

Charles. Come, let us not oppress the fallen; do right even now, and you shall have no cause to complain.

Lady R. Am I become an object of your pity, then? Insufferable! Confusion light amongst you! marry, and be wretched: let me never see you more. [Exit.]

Miss R. She is outrageous; I suffer for her, and blush to see her thus exposed.

Charles. Come, Charlotte, don't let this angry woman disturb our happiness: we will save her, in spite of herself; your father's memory shall not be stained by the discredit of his second choice.

Miss R. I trust implicitly to your discretion, and am in all things your's.

Bel. Now, lovely, but obdurate, does not this example soften?

Lou. What can you ask for more? Accept my hand, accept my willing heart.

Bel. O, bliss unutterable! brother, father, friend, and you, the author of this general joy—

O'Fla. Blessing of St. Patrick upon us all! 'tis a night of wonderful and surprising ups and downs: I wish we were all fairly set down to supper, and there was an end on't.

Stock. Hold for a moment! I have yet one word to interpose. Entitled by my friendship to a voice in your disposal, I have approved your match; there yet remains a father's consent to be obtained.

Bel. Have I a father?

Stock. You have a father; did not I tell you I had a discovery to make? Compose yourself; you have a father, who observes, who knows, who loves you.

Bel. Keep me no longer in suspense: my heart is softened for the affecting discovery, and nature fits me to receive his blessing.

Stock. I am your father.

Bel. My father! Do I live?

Stock. I am your father

Bel. It is too much; my happiness overpowers me; to gain a friend, and find a father, is too much. I blush to think how little I deserve you.

Dud. See, children, how many new relations spring from this night's unforeseen events, to endear us to each other.

O'Fla. O'my conscience, I think we shall be all related by-and-by Stock. Yes, Belcour, I have watched you with a patient, but inquiring eye, and I have discovered through the veil of some irregularities, a heart beaming with benevolence and animated nature: fallible indeed, but not incorrigible; and your election of this excellent young lady makes me glory in acknowledging you to be my son.

Bel. I thank you; and in my turn, glory in the father I have gained. Sensibly impressed with gratitude for such extraordinary dispensations, I beseech you, amiable Louisa, for the time to come, whenever you perceive me deviating into error or offence, bring only to my mind the providence of this night, and I will turn to reason and obey.

[Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in the House of Sir Stephen Bertram.

Sir STEPHEN BERTRAM and FREDERICK.

Sir S. Why do you press me for reasons I'm not bound to give? If I choose to dismiss an assistant clerk from my counting-house, how does it concern you?

Fred. That clerk you took at my recommendation and request: I am therefore interested to hope you have no reasons for dismissing him, that affect his character.

Sir S. I am your father, sir, and in this house sole master: I have no partners to account to; nor will I brook any comments on my conduct from my son.

Fred. Yet, as your son, may I not, without risking your displeasure, offer one humble word upon the part of a defenceless, absent friend?

Sir S. A friend!

Fred. Yes, sir; I hope I need not blush to call Charles Ratcliffe friend. His virtues, his misfortunes, his integrity, (you'll undeceive me if I err,) have much endeared him to me.

Sir S. Say rather his connexions. Come, I see where all his friendship points—to folly, to disgrace—therefore, no more of it. Break off; new friendships will cost you dear; 'tis better you should cease to call him friend, than put it in his power to call you brother. In one word, Frederick, I never will accept of Ratcliffe's sister as my daughter-in-law; nor, if I can prevent it, shall you so far forget yourself as to make her your mistress.

Fred. Mistress! Good heaven!—But I'll restrain myself.—You never saw Miss Ratcliffe.

Sir S. I wish you never had.—But you have seen your last of her, or me—I leave it to your choice.

[Exit.]

Fred. I have no choice to make; she is my wife—and if to take beauty, virtue, and elegance, without fortune, when my father would have me take fortune without them, is a crime that merits disinheritance, I must meet my punishment as I can.

The only thing I dread is the severe but honourable reproach of my friend Ratcliffe, to whom this marriage is a secret, and whose disinterested resentment I know not how to face: I must dissemble with him still, for I am unprepared with my defence, and he is here.

Enter CHARLES RATCLIFFE.

Char. Well met, Frederick.

Fred. I wish I could say so.

Char. Why, what's the matter now

Fred. I have no good news to tell you.

Char. I don't expect it; you are not made to be the bearer of good news: knavery engrosses all fortune's favour, and fools run up and down with the tidings of it.

Fred. You are still a philosopher.

Char. I cannot tell that, till I am tried with prosperity: it is that which sets our failings in full view; adversity conceals them.—But come, discuss: tell me in what one part of my composition the ingenious cruelty of fortune can place another blow.

Fred. By my soul, Charles, I am ashamed to tell you, because the blow is now given by a hand I wish to reverence. You know the temper of Sir Stephen Bertram: he is my father, therefore I will not enlarge upon a subject that would be painful to us both. It is with infinite regret I have seen you (nobly descended, and still more nobly endowed,) earning a scanty maintenance at your desk in his counting-house: it is a slavery you are now released from.

Char. I understand you; Sir Stephen has no further commands for me. I will go to him and deliver up my keys.

[Going.]

Fred. Have patience for a moment. Do you guess his reasons for this hasty measure?

Char. What care I for his reasons, when I know they cannot touch my honour.

Fred. Oh! Charles, my heart is penetrated with your situation: what will become of those beloved objects?

Char. Why, what becomes of all the objects misery lays low? they shrink from sight and are forgotten.—You know I will not hear you on this subject; 'twas not with my consent you ever knew there were such objects in existence.

Fred. I own it; but in this extremity, methinks you might relax a little from that rigid honour.

Char. Never; but, as the body of a man is braced by winter, so is my resolution by adversity. On this point only we can differ. Why will my friend persist in urging it?

Fred. I have done. You have your way.

Char. Then, with your leave, I'll go to your father.

Fred. Hold! Here comes one that supersedes all other visitors—old Sheva, the rich Jew, the merest muckworm in the city of London. How the old Hebrew casts about for prodigals to snap at!—I'll throw him out a bait for sport.

Char. No, let him pass; what sport can his infirmities afford?

Enter SHEVA.

Sheva. The goot day to you, my young master! How is it with your health, I pray? Is your fader, Sir Stephen Bertram, and my very good patron, to be spoken with?

Fred. Yes, yes, he is at home, and to be spoken with under some precaution, Sheva: if you bring him money, you would be welcome.

Sheva. Ah! that is very goot. Monies is welcome every where.

Fred. Pass on, pass on! no more apologies. Good man of money, save your breath to count your guineas. [Exit SHEVA.] That fellow would not let his shadow fall upon the earth, if he could help it.

Char. You are too hard upon him. The thing is courteous.

Fred. Hang him! he'll bow for half-a-crown. His carcase and its covering would not coin into a ducat, yet he is a moving mine of wealth.

Char. You see these characters with indignation: I contemplate them with pity. I have a fellow-feeling for poor Sheva: he is as much in poverty as I am, only it is poverty of another species: he wants what he has; I have nothing, and want everything. Misers are not unuseful members of the community; they act like dams to rivers, hold up the stream that else would run to waste, and make deep water where there would be shallows.

Fred. I recollect you was his rescuer; I did not know you were his advocate.

Char. 'Tis true, I snatched him out of jeopardy. My countrymen, with all their natural humanity, have no objection to the hustling of a Jew. The poor old creature was most roughly handled.

Fred. What was the cause?

Char. I never asked the cause. There was a hundred upon one; that was cause enough for me to make myself a second to the party overmatched.—I got a few hard knocks, but I brought off my man.

Fred. The synagogue should canonize you for the deed.

Re-enter SHEVA.

Sheva. Aha! there is no business to be done; there is no talking to your fader. He is not just now in the sweetest of all possible tempers. Anything Mr. Bertram, wanted in my way?

Fred. Yes, Sheva, there is enough wanted in your way, but I doubt it is not in your will to do it.

Sheva. I do always do my utmost for my principals: I never spare my pains when business is going: be it ever such a trifle I am thankful. Every little helps a poor man like me.

Fred. You speak of your spirit, I suppose, when you call yourself a poor man. All the world knows you roll in riches.

Sheva. The world knows no great deal of me. I do not deny that my monies may roll a little, but for myself I do not roll at all. I live sparingly, and labour hard, therefore I am called a miser—I cannot help it; an uncharitable dog—I must endure it; a bloodsucker, an extortioner, a Shylock,—hard names, Mr. Frederick; but what can a poor Jew say in return, if a Christian chooses to abuse him?

Fred. Say nothing, but spend your money like a Christian.

Sheva. We have no abiding place on earth, no country, no home: everybody rails at us, everybody flouts us, everybody points us out for their maygame and their mockery. If your play-writers want a butt or a buffoon, or a knave to make sport of, out comes a Jew to be baited and buffeted through five long acts, for the amusement of all good Christians. Cruel sport!—merciless amusement! Hard dealings for a poor stray sheep of the scattered flock of Abraham! How can you expect us to shew kindness, when we receive none?

Char. [Advancing.] That is true, friend Sheva, I can witness: I am sorry to say there is too much justice in your complaint

Sheva. Bless this goot light! I did not see you—'tis my very goot friend, Mr. Ratcliffe, as I live.—Give me your pardon, I pray you, sir, give me your pardon. I should be sorry to say in your hearing, that there is no charity for the poor Jews. Truly, sir, I am under very great obligations to you for your generous protection t'other night, when I was mobbed and maltreated; and, for aught I can tell, should have been massacred, had not you stood forward in my defence. Truly, sir, I bear it very thankful in my remembrance; truly I do; yes, truly.

Fred. Leave me with him, Charles; I'll hold him in discourse whilst you go to my father.

[Exit CHARLES.]

Sheva. Oh! it was goot deed, very goot deed, to save a poor Jew from a pitiless mob; and I am very grateful to you, worthy Mr.—Ah! the gentleman is gone away; that is another thing.

Fred. It is so, but your gratitude need not go away at the same time; you are not bound to make good the old proverb—"Out of sight, out of mind."

Sheva. No, no, no; I am very much obliged to him, not only for my life, but for the monies and the valuables I had about me; I had been hustled out of them all but for him.

Fred. Well, then, having so much gratitude for his favours, you have now an opportunity of making some return to him.

Sheva. Yes, yes; and I do make him a return of my thanks and goot wishes very heartily. What can a poor Jew say more? I do wish him all goot things, and give him all goot words.

Fred. Good words, indeed! What are they to a man who is cast naked upon the wide world, with a widowed mother and a defenceless sister, who look up to him for their support?

Sheva. Good lack, good lack! I thought he was in occupations in your fader's counting-house.

Fred. He was; and from his scanty pittance, piously supported these poor destitutes: that source is now stopped, and as you, when in the midst of rioters, was in want of a protector, so is he, in the midst of his misfortunes, in want of some kind friend to rescue him.

Sheva. Oh dear, oh dear! this world is full of sadness and of sorrow; miseries upon miseries! unfortunates by hundreds and by thousands, and poor Sheva has but two weak eyes to find tears for them all.

Fred. Come, come, Sheva, pity will not feed the hungry, nor clothe the naked. Ratcliffe is the friend of my heart: I am helpless in myself; my father, though just, is austere in the extreme; I dare not resort to him for money, nor can I turn my thoughts to any other quarter for the loan of a small sum in this extremity, except to you.

Sheva. To me! good lack, to me! What will become of me? What will Sir Stephen say? He is full of monies; but then again, he is a close man, very austere, as you say, and very just, but not very generous.

Fred. Well, well, let me have your answer.

Sheva. Yes, yes; but my answer will not please you without the monies: I shall be a Jewish dog, a baboon, an imp of Beelzebub, if I don't find the monies; and when my monies is all gone, what shall I be then? An ass, a fool, a jack-a-dandy!—Oh dear! Oh dear! Well, there must be conditions, look you.

Fred. To be sure: security twice secured; premium and interest, and bond and judgment into the bargain. Only enable me to preserve my friend, give me that transport, and I care not what I pay for it.

Sheva. Mercy on your heart! what haste and hurry you are in! How much did you want? One hundred pounds, did you say?

Fred. More than one, more than one.

Sheva. Ah, poor Sheva! more than one hundred pounds; what! so much as two hundred? 'tis a great deal of monies.

Fred. Come, friend Sheva, at one word—three hundred pounds.

Sheva. Mercies defend me, what a sum!

Fred. Accommodate me with three hundred pounds; make your own terms; consult your conscience in the bargain, and I will say you are a good fellow. Oh Sheva! did you but know the luxury of relieving honour, innocence, and beauty, from distress!

Sheva. Oh! 'tis a great luxury, I dare say, else you would not buy it at so high a price. Well, well! I have thought a little, and if you will come to my poor cabin in Duke's Place, you shall have the monies.

Fred. Well said, my gallant Sheva! Shall I bring a bond with me to fill up?

Sheva. No, no, no; we have all those in my shop. Fred. I do not doubt it: all the apparatus of an usurer. [Aside.] Farewell, Sheva! be ready with your instruments, I care not what they are: only let me have the money, and you may proceed to dissection as soon after as you please. [Exit.]

Sheva. Heigho! I cannot choose but weep. Sheva, thou art a fool. Three hundred pounds, by the day, how much is that in the year?—Oh dear, oh dear! I shall be ruined, starved, wasted to a watch light. Bowels, you shall pinch for this: I'll not eat flesh this fortnight: I'll suck the air for nourishment: I'll feed upon the steam of an alderman's kitchen, as I put my nose down his area.—Well, well! but soft, a word, friend Sheva! Art thou not rich? monstrous rich, abominably rich? and yet thou livest on a crust. Be it so! thou dost stint thine appetites to pamper thine affections; thou dost make thyself to live in poverty, that the poor may live in plenty. Well, well! so long as thou art a miser only to thine own cost, thou mayest hug thyself in this poor habit, and set the world's contempt at naught.

Enter CHARLES RATCLIFFE, not noticing the Jew.

Char. Unfeeling, heartless man, I've done with you. I'll dig, beg, perish, rather than submit to such unnatural terms! I may remain: my mother and my sister must be banished to a distance. Why, this Jew, this usurer, this enemy to our faith, whose heart is in his bags, would not have used me thus—I'll question him. Sheva!

Sheva. What is your pleasure?

Char. I do not know the word.

Sheva. What is your will, then? speak it.

Char. Sheva!—You have been a son—you had a mother—dost remember her?

Sheva. Goot lack, goot lack! do I remember her!—

Char. Didst love her, cherish her, support her?

Sheva. Ah me! ah me! it is as much as my poor heart will bear to think of her. I would have died—

Char. Thou hast affections, feelings, charities—

Sheva. I am a man, sir, call me how you please.

Char. I'll call you Christian, then; and this proud merchant, Jew.

Sheva. I shall not thank you for that compliment. Char. And hadst thou not a sister too?

Sheva. No; no sister, no brother, no son, no daughter; I am a solitary being, a waif on the world's wide common.

Char. And thou hast hoarded wealth, till thou art sick with gold, even to plethora. Thy bags run over with the spoils of usury, thy veins are glutted with the blood of prodigals and gamblers.

Sheva. I have enough; something perhaps to spare.

Char. And I have nothing, nothing to spare, but miseries, with which my measure overflows. By heaven, it racks my soul, to think that those beloved sufferers should want, and this thing so abundant! [Aside.] Now, Sheva, now, if you and I were out of sight of man, benighted in some desert, wild as my thoughts, naked as my fortune, should you not tremble?

Sheva. What should I tremble for?—You could not harm a poor defenceless aged man.

Char. Indeed, indeed, I could not harm you, Sheva, whilst I retained my senses.

Sheva. Sorrow disturbs them: yes, yes, it is sorrow. Ah me! ah me! poor Sheva in his time has been driven mad with sorrow.—'Tis a hard world.

Char. Sir, I have done you wrong. You pity me, I'm sure you do: those tones could never proceed but from a feeling heart.

Sheva. Try me, touch me; I am not made of marble.

Char. No, on my life you are not.

Sheva. Nor yet of gold extorted from the prodigal: I am no shark to prey upon mankind. What I have got, I have got by little and little, working hard and pinching my own bowels.—I could say something: it is in my thoughts; but no, I will not say it here. This is the house of trade; that is not to my purpose. Come home with me, so please you; 'tis but a little walk, and you shall see what I have shown to no man—Sheva's real heart: I do not carry it in my hand. Come, I pray you, come along. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—Mrs. Ratcliffe's Lodgings.

Enter ELIZA RATCLIFFE.

Eliza. Oh, happy me! possessed of all my heart delights in; and miserable me, for having ruined what I love. Alas! poor Bertram, fond to desperation, generous to thy destruction!—Why then did I marry? Wherefore did I suffer him to be the victim of fatal passion? What power perverted understanding, heart, humanity? What power, but that which can do all things, good or ill, make virtue, and unmake it, animate our courage, and extinguish it?—Love is at once my crime and my excuse. Good heavens! my mother.

Enter MRS. RATCLIFFE.—Eliza takes her hand and kisses it.

Mrs. R. Eliza! child! what means this more than usual agitation?

Eliza. Is it then more than usual?

Mrs. R. You weep.

Eliza. Do I? 'Tis natural, when I contemplate a face so dear and so decayed, furrowed with cares and sorrows for my sake.—Ah! my dear mother, you have loved me much too well.

Mrs. R. My darling, can that be, seeing I love your brother also? You share my heart between you.

Eliza. Give all to him; he has deserved it better.

Mrs. R. Heaven bless him in the extent of his deservings! On him rests all our hope; to him we cling, as to the last dear relic of our wrecked nobility. But he's a man, Eliza, and endowed with strength and fortitude to struggle in the storm; we are weak, helpless women, and can do no more than suffer and submit.

Eliza. True; but there is a part allotted to the weakest, even to me; an humble one indeed, and easily performed, since nothing is required but to obey, to love you, and to honour you.

Mrs. R. And you have done it faithfully, my child.

Eliza. You think so, my dear mother; but your praise is my reproach.—Oh! had I now a crime upon my conscience, and should I kneel thus, and beg for pardon at your feet, what would you say?

Mrs. R. Astonishment might keep me silent for a while, but my first words would be to pity and forgive you.

Eliza. That I can err, this guilty hand will witness. Well may you start. That hand is Bertram's; and that ring, pledged at the altar, was put on by him this very morning: I am Bertram's wife.

Mrs. R. Rise, quit this supplicating posture, till you find yourself in the presence of some person less disposed to pardon you than I am.

Eliza. How mild is that rebuke! how merciful! Your eye, like nature's, penetrates my heart; you see it weak as woman's resolution is—impassioned, not impure; conquered, but not corrupted.

Mrs. R. I see myself reflected in my child. Justice demands a censure; conscious recollection checks me from pronouncing it; but you have a brother, whose high soaring spirit will not brook clandestine marriages: your husband has a father of another spirit, as I fear. Alas! my child, betwixt the lofty and the low, you may steer well to keep a steady course.

Eliza. I see my danger; and though Bertram's ardour painted it in fainter colours than its true complexion may demand, yet I should hope the nature of a father cannot be so stern as never to forgive a choice that disappoints; but, let me hope, does not disgrace him.

Mrs. R. The name of Ratcliffe cannot. A daughter of your house, in better days, would hardly have advanced his knighthood higher than her foot-cloth.

Eliza. Ay, madam; but the pride of birth does but add stings to poverty. We must forget those days.

Mrs. R. Your father did not.

Eliza. Ah! my father!—

Mrs. R. Your brother never will.

Eliza. Yet he is humble for our sakes. Think what he does. Good heavens, my husband's father's clerk! Dear madam, tell me why he did not rather go where his courage called him, where his person would have graced the colours that he carried?

Mrs. R. Child, child, what colours? Surely you forget the interdiction of a father barred him from that service.

Eliza. Alas, alas!

Mrs. R. The bread would choke him that he earned under a father's curse.

Eliza. We have bled for our opinions, and we have starved for them; the axe, the sword, and poverty, have made sad havoc with our family: 'tis time we were at peace. The world is now before us: on this hour depends the fate of all perhaps that are to come. Frederick is with his father; he is determined to avow his marriage, and to meet the consequences. I never saw Sir Stephen, and have nothing but conjecture to direct me; I tremble for the event.

Mrs. R. 'Tis a distressful interim; and it is now the hour when I expect your brother.

Eliza. Oh! that is worse than all; for pity's sake hide me from him till Frederick returns: let me retire.

Mrs. R. Come, then, my child! I know not what it is, but something whispers me, that all will yet be well.

Eliza. Ten thousand blessings on you for that cheering hope: how my heart bounds to embrace it! 'Tis an auspicious omen, and I hail it like the voice of inspiration. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Sheva's House.

Enter DORCAS.

Dor. Why, Jabal! I say, Jabal! Where are you, sluggard?

Enter JABAL.

Jabal. Here am I, Mother Dorcas! Oh! what a starving star was I born under, to be the rich Jew's poor servant. No rest, no peace, whilst you are awake. Lud-a-mercy! if you did but know how your pipe echoes in this empty house!

Dor. Child! child! you must not think to be idle here.

Jabal. What would you have me do? Brush the bare walls for a breakfast? A spider could not make a meal upon them.

Dor. I warrant thou hast filled thy belly, cormorant.

Jabal. I have not had a bellyful since I belonged to you. You take care there shall be no fire in the kitchen; master provides no prog upon the shelf; so, between you both, I have plenty of nothing but cold and hunger.

Dor. Hunger, indeed! How should thy stomach ever be filled, when there is no bottom to it? 'tis like the Dead Sea, fathomless.

Jabal. 'Tis like the Dead Sea so far, that neither fish nor flesh are to be found within it.

Dor. Sirrah! you have a better master than you think for. It is unknown the charities he gives away.

Jabal. You're right, it is unknown; at least I never found the secret out. If it is charity to keep an empty cupboard, he has that to boast of: the very rats would run away from such a caterer. If it is charity to clothe the naked, here is a sample of it; examine this old drab; you may count the threads without spectacles; a spider's web is a warm blanket to it. If it is charity to feed the hungry, I have an empty stomach at his service to which his charity, at this present moment, would be very seasonable.

Dor. You must mortify your carnal appetites; how often shall I teach you that lesson?

Jabal. Every time I set eyes upon you.

Dor. Haven't you the credit of belonging to one of the richest men in the city of London?

Jabal. I wish I was turnspit to the poorest cook's-shop instead. Oh! if my master had but fixed his abode at Pye-Corner or Pudding-Laue, or Fish-Street-Hill, or any of those savoury places! What am I the fatter for the empty dignity of Duke's-Place? I had rather be a miser's heir than a miser's servant.

Dor. And who knows what may happen? Master has not a relation I ever heard of in the universal world.

Jabal. No, he has starved them all out. A chameleon could not live with him: he would grudge him even the air he feeds on.

Dor. For shame, slanderer! His good deeds will shine out in time.

Jabal. I sha'n't stand in their light; they may shine through me, for I am grown transparent in his service. Had not he like to have been torn to pieces 't'other day by the mob, for whipping a starved cat out of his area.

Dor. And whose fault was that but thine, ungracious boy, for putting it there? I am sure I have cause to bless the gentleman that saved him. But, hush! here comes my good master; and, as I live, the very gentleman with him. Ah! then I guess what is going forward.

Enter SHEVA and CHARLES RATCLIFFE.

Sheva. So, so, so! What's here to do with you? Why are you not both at your work?—Dorcas, a cup of cold water—I am very thirsty. [Exit DORCAS.]

Jabal. Are you not rather hungry too, sir?

Sheva. Hold your tongue, puppy! Get about your business: and, here; take my hat, clean it carefully; but mind you do not brush it; that will wear off the nap.

Jabal. The nap, indeed! There is no shelter for a flea. [Exit.]

Sheva. Aha! I am tired. I beg your pardon, Mr. Ratcliffe. I am an old man. Sit you down, I pray you, sit you down, and we will talk a little. [DORCAS brings a glass of water.] So, so, that is right. Water is good.—Fie upon you, Dorcas; why do you not offer the glass to my guest before me?

Dor. Lord love him! I'd give him wine, if I had it.

Sheva. No, no, it is good water; it is better than wine: wine is heating, water is cooling; wine costs monies, water comes for nothing. Your good health, sir. Oh! 'tis delicious, it is satisfying: I was very empty before; my stomach was craving, now I am quite content. Go your ways, Dorcas; go your ways. [Exit DORCAS.] Sir, I have nothing to ask you to but that water, which you would not drink: 'twas very good water, notwithstanding. Ah! Mr. Ratcliffe, I must be very saving now: I must pinch close.

Char. For what? Are you not rich enough to allow yourself the common necessities of life?

Sheva. Oh, yes, oh, yes! I am rich to be sure. Mercy on me, what a world of monies should I now have, if I had no pity in my heart! But it melts and melts, or else—Oh! dear me, what a heap it would have been!

Char. Pardon me, sir, if I say there are some seeming contradictions in your character, which I cannot reconcile. You give away your money, it should seem, with the generosity of a prince, and I hear you lament over it in the language of a miser.

Sheva. That is true, that is very true: I love my monies, I do love them dearly; but I love my fellow-creatures a little better.

Char. Seeing you are so charitable to others, why then can you not spare a little for yourself?

Sheva. Because I am angry with myself for being such a baby, a child, a chicken. Your people do not love me, what business have I to love your people? I am a Jew; my fathers, up to Abraham, all were Jews. Merciless mankind, how you have persecuted them! My family is all gone, it is extinct, my very name will vanish out of memory when I am dead. I pray you pardon me! I'm very old, and apt to weep; I pray you pardon me.

Char. I am more disposed to subscribe to your tears than to find fault with them.

Sheva. Well, well, well! 'tis natural for me to weep, when I reflect upon their sufferings and my own. Sir, you shall know—but I won't tell you my sad story: you are young and tender-hearted. It is all written down—you shall find it with my papers at my death.

Char. Sir! at your death?

Sheva. Yes, sure, I must die some time or other: though you have saved my life once, you cannot save it always. I did tell you, Mr. Ratcliffe, I would shew you my heart. Sir, it is a heart to do you all possible good whilst I live, and to pay you the debt of gratitude when I die. I believe it is the only one I owe to the pure benevolence of my fellow-creatures.

Char. I am sorry you have found mankind so ungrateful.

Sheva. Not so, not so; I might, perhaps, have found them grateful, if I had let them know their benefactor. I did relieve their wants, but I did not court their thanks: they did eat my bread, and hooted at me for a miser.

Enter JABAL.

Jabal. A gentleman, who says his name is Bertram, waits to speak with you. I fancy he comes to borrow money, for he looks wondrous melancholy.

Sheva. Hold your tongue, knave; what is it to you what he comes for?

Jabal. I am sure he does not come for a dinner, for he has not brought it with him.

Sheva. I pray you, Mr. Ratcliffe, pass out that way. I would not have you meet.—Admit Mr. Bertram. [Exeunt JABAL and CHARLES.]

Enter FREDERICK.

You are welcome, Mr. Bertram: our business may be quickly despatched. You want three hundred pounds: I have made shift to scrape that sum together, and it is ready for you.

Fred. Alas, Sheva! since last I saw you I am so totally undone, that it would now be a robbery to take your money. My father has expelled me from his house.

Sheva. Why? for what cause?

Fred. I have married—

Sheva. Well, that is natural enough.

Fred. Married without his knowledge.

Sheva. So did he without your's. What besides?

Fred. Married a wife without a farthing.

Sheva. Ah! that is very silly, I must say.

Fred. You could not say so, did you know the lady.

Sheva. That may be; but I do not know the lady: you have not named her to me.

Fred. The sister of Charles Ratcliffe.

Sheva. Ah! to Miss Ratcliffe? Is it so? And she is good and lovely, but she has no monies; and that has made your fader very angry with you?

Fred. Furious, irreconcilable.

Sheva. Why, truly, monies is a good thing; and your fader is not the only man in England that does think so. I confess I'm very much of his mind in respect of monies.

Fred. I know you are; therefore keep your money, and good morning to you.

Sheva. Hold, be not so hasty! If I do love my monies, it may be because I have it in my power to tender them to you.

Fred. But I have said I never can repay you, whilst you are in this world.

Sheva. Perhaps I shall be content to be repaid when I am out of it. I believe I have a pretty many post obits of that sort upon the file.

Fred. I do not rightly understand you.

Sheva. Then, pray you, have a little patience till I'm better understood.—Sir Stephen had a match for you in view?

Fred. He had.

Sheva. What was the lady's fortune?

Fred. Ten thousand pounds.

Sheva. That's a good round sum; but you did not love her, and you do love your wife?

Fred. As dearly as you love your money.

Sheva. A little better, we will hope; for I do lend my monies to my friend. For instance, take these bills; three hundred pounds. What ails you?—They are good bills, they are bank—oh! that I had a sack full of them! Come, come, I pray you, take them. They will hire you very pretty lodging, and you will be very happy with your pretty wife—I pray you take them. Why will you be so hard with a poor Jew, as to refuse him a good bargain, when you know he loves to lay his monies out to profit and advantage?

Fred. Are you in earnest? You astonish me.

Sheva. I am a little astonished too, for I did never see a man so backward to take money: you are not like your fader. I am afraid you are a little proud.

Fred. You shall not say so: I accept your generous tender.

Sheva. I wish it was ten thousand pounds, then your good fader would be well content.

Fred. Yes; of two equal fortunes, I believe he would be good enough to let me take my choice.

Sheva. Oh! that is very kind: he would give you the preference when he had none himself.

Fred. Just so; but what acknowledgment shall I give you for these bills?

Sheva. None, none; I do acknowledge them myself with very great pleasure in serving you, and no small pains in parting from them. I pray you, make yourself and pretty wife comfortable with the monies, and I will comfort myself, as well as I can, without them. Ah! poor Sheva! when thou art a beggar-man, who will take pity of thee?—Well, well, no matter! Now I must take a little walk about my business—I pray you pardon my unpoliteness.

Fred. No apology: I am gone. Farewell, Sheva! Thou a miser! thou art a prince!

Sheva. Jabal! open the door.

Enter JABAL.

Jabal. 'Tis done, sir.

Sheva. How now, sirrah! You was listening at the key-hole?

Jabal. Not I, sir; I was only oiling the lock: you love to have your bolts slip easily.

Sheva. You are a jackanapes; I shall slip you out of my door, by-and-by. [Exit.]

Jabal. You may slip me through the crack of it, if I staid much longer with you.—But, to be sure, I did listen, that is the truth of it. Hip! Holloa! Mother Dorcas!

Enter DORCAS.

Oh! I am glad you are in the way. Lend me your one ear, and I'll tell you a secret.

Dor. Let us hear it, Jabal, I love a secret. Come on this side of me.

Jabal. That's true; your left ear. Well, do you hear me? I have made a discovery.

Dor. I have no objection to a discovery. Out with it.

Jabal. Mother Dorcas, I have discovered that our old master is no more a miser than I am.

Dor. I told you so.

Jabal. So you did, but that's not all: I have found out, besides, that he is no Hebrew, no more a Jew than Julius Cæsar; for to my certain knowledge he gives away his money by handfuls to the consumers of hog's flesh.

Dor. He is merciful to all mankind.

Jabal. Yes, and to all sheep and oxen, lambs, and calves; for he will not suffer us to touch a morsel of their flesh. Now, because he lives without food, that's no reason I should starve for want of eating.—Oh, Mother Dorcas! 'tis untold what terrible and abominable temptations I struggle with.

Dor. How are you tempted, child? Tell me what it is that moves you.

Jabal. Why, 'tis the devil himself, in the shape of a Bologna sausage. Gracious! how my mouth did water, as I saw a string of them dangling from the pent-house of an oilman's shop! The fellow would have persuaded me they were made of asses' flesh.—Oh! if I could have believed him!

Dor. Oh! horrible! you must not touch the unclean beast.

Jabal. No, to be sure; our people have never tasted bacon, since they came out of the land of Ham.

Dor. Jabal, Jabal, what an escape you have had.

Jabal. So had the sausages, for my teeth quivered to be at them.

Dor. Come, my good lad, thou shalt be recompensed for thy self-denial: I have an egg for thee in the kitchen.

Jabal. I hope it is an ostrich's, for I am mortally sharp set. Oh! mother, I have a thought in my head—I will give old master warning, and seek my fortune elsewhere.

Dor. Where will you seek it?

Jabal. Where there is plenty of prog, be assured.—I will go upon the stage and turn actor; there is a great many eating parts, and I hope to fill them all. I spent sixpence to'other night upon a farce, when there was a notable fine leg of lamb served up before the audience. Oh, how I did long to be the attorney! I won't say so many good things would have come out of my mouth, but a pretty many more would have gone into it.

Dor. How you ramble, sirrah! What meagrimms you have in your head!

Jabal. Emptiness breeds them.—Mercy, how glad I should be, to see it written down in my part—"Enter Jabal with a roast chicken."

Dor. Come, come; homelier fare must content you.—Let us light the lamp, and boil our egg.

Jabal. What! is it between us? One egg, and two to eat it!

Dor. Well, I care not if I spend sixpence for a treat, so thou wilt be sociable and merry when it is over.

Jabal. Agreed:—only give me good cheer for my dinner, and we will have good humour for the desert. [Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—Mrs. Ratcliffe's Lodgings.

Enter Mrs. RATCLIFFE and FREDERICK.

Fred. Can you forgive me? Has my lovely advocate sued out my pardon, and may I now invoke a blessing on my love and me?

Mrs. R. Heaven in its bounty bless you both!—May all good fortune follow you, all comforts light upon you, and love and happiness ever subsist between you!

Fred. Such piety can never pray in vain. Where is Eliza?

Mrs. R. She does not know you are here: shall I call her?

Fred. Not yet. I have a little sum, and you must be our banker: Charles is too proud to touch it: his spirit is of a pitch too high to stoop to worldly matters. We have been warm and cordial friends; how we may fare as brothers, heaven only knows: I have some fears.

Mrs. R. Eliza is impressed with the same apprehensions; but if Sir Stephen acquiesce, all will be well. I hope this money is a token of his forgiveness.

Fred. 'Twill serve to set us out. I have provided lodgings more commodious. I hope you will permit Eliza to remove; and I make further suit, that you will have the goodness to accompany her.

Mrs. R. Well; but you do not answer to my question of the money. Haven't you seen your father?

Fred. I have seen him.

Mrs. R. And explained to him—

Fred. I have.

Mrs. R. Well, what says he?

Fred. If he had said what would have done him honour, and given ease to my Eliza's mother, I should not have waited for your question. But nature must have time to work: I have only stirred the dregs. May I now see Eliza? There is a cloud on my heart, also, which only her bright presence can dispel.

Mrs. R. Ah, sir! she can be only bright henceforward by reflection; her sunshine must be caught from yours? However, I will send her to you. [Exit.]

Fred. Oh! that my father was now standing by me to behold her, and confess how irresistible she is!

Enter ELIZA.

Oh! my soul's joy, my treasure, my Eliza!

[Embracing her.]

Eliza. Frederick, what tidings?

Fred. None but of love, increasing with each moment; glowing with every beam that those soft eyes diffuse, and heightened into rapture by those charms, those graces, that each look, word, motion, spread around you.

Eliza. These are fond, flattering words, but where's the consolation that you would have given me, had you brought back a pardon from your father? This ardour only proves, that you had too much love, and I too little generosity

Fred. Take courage, Eliza! I have not lost the field, only prolonged the fight: I have but skirmished with him yet; he has not felt my strength. Let me set you in sight, and if there is a callous in his heart, (which I won't say there is,) your eyes, my charmer, will refine and melt it.

Eliza. My eyes have injured him too much already. Oh! you rash man, why did you take such pains to be undone? Why lull me into dreams of happiness, till I forgot that I was poor and wretched? Deceiver of yourself and me, I thought we trod on flowers, and never spied the precipice behind you.

Fred. I see no precipice: I fear none.

Eliza. Hear me, my Frederick; let love stand off a while, and give your ear to reason. 'Tis fit, that you should know the heart for which you have risked so much. Our marriage was a rash one; be that my witness how I loved you, for never till this day, had I the recollection of one act that weighed upon my conscience, or reproached me with the sin of disobedience in the slightest instance. But, though I wanted firmness to oppose your love, I am not void of courage to prevent your ruin. Have patience! hear me out. Sir Stephen Bertram wished for money; I have none to give him. The fortune of my house is crushed, the spirit yet survives, even in me, the weakest, and, perhaps, the humblest of the name: but I resist contempt, and if he spurns my poverty, I have a sure resource that shall compel him to applaud my spirit.

Fred. What do you mean? Your looks, your language terrify me.

Eliza. Oh! I have loved you far too well to trifle. I will convince the world 'twas not by interest my heart was gained. 'Twas not to keep off want, to live at ease, and make the noble relics of my family retainers of his charity, I married to Sir Stephen Bertram's son; it was with worthier, purer views, to share his thoughts, unite my heart to his, and make his happiness my own. These sentiments are my inheritance; if these will not suffice for his ambition, they will teach me how to act becoming of my birth, under the imputation of his son's seducer.

Fred. Hence with that word! it is a profanation to your lips. Was ever man so blessed, so honoured, so exalted, as I am! If pride will not see it, if avarice cannot feel it, is that a reason why humility and gratitude should not be blest with enjoyment of it!

Re-enter Mrs. RATCLIFFE.

Mrs. R. Eliza, your brother is come.

Eliza. Leave me, I beseech you, Frederick; leave me! Let me confer with him alone; there's no way else to pacify him.

Mrs. R. Come, let us yield to her request: I do believe she's right.

[Exeunt Mrs. RATCLIFFE and FREDERICK.]

Enter CHARLES.

Char. Alone! How is my dear Eliza? You look pale, my love. Have you been out, or are you going out? Has anything occurred? You are more dressed than usual.

Eliza. Am I? No, sure; you have seen this dress before. I have nothing new.

Char. I can't say quite as much, for I have a new livelihood to seek. Sir Stephen has discharged me.

Eliza. Oh! lie upon him!

Char. No, no! the man is worldly wise; no more. He has a son, Eliza; and he has found out I have a sister. Who can blame him? Beauty is a dangerous thing when honour does not guard it. But I know what my Eliza is; and, therefore, to confute suspicion, and put this careful merchant at his ease, we will cut short the question, and retire from London.

Eliza. Where must we go?

Char. Far enough off for his repose, be sure. I am sorry on account of Frederick, for I love him; but he has been too frequent in his visits here, and he knows I think so. He will be happier for our parting.

Eliza. I doubt that. Is your resolution taken?

Char. Irrecoverable. Northward is my point.—Where is my mother? I would speak with her.

Eliza. Stay! Hear your sister first.

Char. What ails you? What is coming? Why do you tremble?

Eliza. Oh, Charles! [Weeps and hides her face]

Char. What is it? speak!

Eliza. I am the wife of Frederick.

Char. Heaven and good angels forbid it!

Eliza. Heaven and good angels, as I hope, have witnessed it.

Char. Rash girl! you have undone him. Torn asunder nature's strongest tie; set father against son. When was the name of Ratcliffe dishonoured until now? I've done with you.

Eliza. Charles! Brother! Benefactor! Is there yet a name more tender, an appeal more sacred? Did hard fortune leave me only one protector, one dear friend! and will not he forgive me? Take me, then, and hurl me to the ground, as one not worth preserving. [Throws herself on his neck.]

Char. Wretched Eliza! did I ever till this moment meet your embrace with coldness? Have I not loved you, heaven and earth how much! How then have I deserved to be dishonoured by you, and to have my name stamped as the joint seducer of a fond, weak youth, who will have cause to execrate the hour when first he called me friend?

Eliza. Strike me not to the heart with your reproaches, but in pity hear me. I am not lightly-minded, not ignobly taught how to distinguish honour, for I am your sister, and have a saint that does not blush to call me daughter: she has pronounced my pardon.

Char. She is all pity: sorrow has melted her fond heart to weakness.

Eliza. And can you find no excuse for mine? What have I known but sorrow, except gratitude to you, and love to Frederick? Cannot you allow for a fond, sorrow-melted heart in me as well as in my mother? You said but now, that as a friend you loved him: I love him as a friend; but woman's friendship to your sex, when years, affections, sentiments so harmonize, as Frederick's with mine, how long will it retain its station in two hearts before it draws them closer, and unites them as you see!

Char. We'll have no more of this, Eliza. There is a weakness lurking at my heart, that warns me how I trust myself too far: you have made wreck of your own honour, wretched girl; I may still rescue mine. [Exit.]

Enter FREDERICK and Mrs. RATCLIFFE.

Mrs. R. Eliza! my dear child! how has it passed?

Fred. It is too plain how it has passed. She is in tears, pale, and trembling. By my soul, it is too much!

Eliza. Hush! hush! be still.

Fred. She'll faint; by heavens, she'll faint. Oh! monstrous cruelty; why did I leave her? why did you persuade me?

Eliza. Give me your arm. Lead me into the other room; I shall recover there, if you will be patient.
[Ereunt.]

SCENE II.—Sir Stephen Bertram's House.

Enter Sir STEPHEN BERTRAM and SAUNDERS.

Sir S. Well, Saunders, what news have you been able to collect of my undutiful son?

Saun. I have not seen Mr. Bertram, but I am told he has settled himself in very handsome lodgings, and is gone to remove his lady to them.

Sir S. His lady, do you call her? Can you find no fitter term? Where should he get the means to settle? He was not furnished with them by me; who else will do it? If he attempts to raise money upon expectancies, be it at their peril who are fools enough to trust him: no prudent man will be his bubble. If I were sure that was his practice, I should hold it matter of conscience to advertise against his debts.

Saun. Perhaps there may be some persons in the world, who think you will not always hold out against an only son.

Sir S. Then let those persons smart for their opinion. They little know the feelings of an injured father; they cannot calculate my hopes, my disappointments, my regret? He might have had a lady with an ample fortune. A wife without a shilling is—but what avails complaint? Could you learn nothing further, who supplies him, who holds him up?

Saun. I hear that he had money of your broker, Sheva.

Sir S. That must be false intelligence. He will as soon make gold by transmutation, as wring it from the gripe of that old usurer. No, no; Sheva is too wary, too much a Jew, to help him with a shilling.

Saun. Yet I was so informed by his own servant, Jabal. He says Mr. Bertram came to old Sheva's house by appointment; that he overheard their whole conversation, in which your son very honourably stated* the utter ruin your displeasure had brought upon him, and would have refused the money, but that old Sheva forced it upon him.

Sir S. It mocks all belief; it only proves, that Sheva, the most inveterate miser in existence, has a fellow Jew for his servant, one of the completest liars in creation.

Saun. I am apt to give him credit for the fact, notwithstanding.

Sir S. Then give me leave to say, you have more faith than most men living. Was I to give so much credit, Mr. Saunders, I should soon stop.

Saun. I am not quite so fixed in my persuasion of old Sheva's character as you are. In his dealings, all the world knows he is punctually honest; no man's character stands higher in the Alley; and his servant tells me, though he starves himself, he is secretly very charitable to others.

Sir S. Yes, this you may believe, if you are disposed to take one Jew's word for another Jew's character. I am obstinate against both; and if he has supplied the money, as I am sure it must be on usurious principles, as soon as ever I have the old miser in my reach, I will wring either the truth from his lips, or the life out of his carcase.

Enter SHEVA.

Sheva. How does my worthy master? I am your very humble servant, goot Sir Stephen Bertram. I have a little private business to impart to you, with your goot leave, and if your leisure serves.

Sir S. Leave us, if you please. [Exit SAUNDERS.]

Sheva. Aha! I am very much fatigued. There is great thong and press in the offices at the Bank, and I am aged and feeble.

Sir S. Hold, sir! Before I welcome you within these doors, or suffer you to sit down in my presence, I demand to know, explicitly, and without prevarication, if you have furnished my son with money secretly, and without my leave?

Sheva. If I do lend, ought not I to lend it in secret? If I do not ask your leave, Sir Stephen, may I not dispose of my own monies according to my own liking? But if it is a crime, I do wish to ask you who is my accuser; that, I believe, is justice everywhere; and in your happy country I do think it is law likewise.

Sir S. Very well, sir; you shall have both law and justice. The information comes from your own servant, Jabal. Can you controvert it?

Sheva. I do presume to say, my servant ought not to report his master's secrets; but I will not say he has not spoken the truth.

Sir S. Then you confess the fact.

Sheva. I humbly think there is no call for that: you have the information from my footboy. I do not deny it.

Sir S. And the sum—

Sheva. I do not talk of the sum, Sir Stephen; that is not my practice: neither, under favour, is my footboy my cashier. If he be a knave, and listen at my key-hole, the more shame his; I am not in the fault.

Sir S. Not in the fault! Wretch, miser, usurer! You never yet let loose a single guinea from your gripe, but with a view of doubling it at the return. I know what you are.

Sheva. Indeed! 'tis more than I will say of myself. I pray you, goot Sir Stephen, take a little time to know my heart before you rob me of my reputation. I am a Jew, a poor defenceless Jew; that is enough to make me miser, usurer. Alas! I cannot help it.

Sir S. No matter: you are caught in your own trap. I tell you now, my son is ruined, disinherited, undone. One consolation is, that you have lost your money.

Sheva. If that be a consolation you are very welcome to it. If my monies is lost, my motives are not.

Sir S. I'll never pay one farthing of his debts. He has offended me for life; refused a lady with ten thousand pounds, and married a poor miss without a doit.

Sheva. Yes, I do understand your son is married.

Sir S. Do you so? By the same token I understand you to be a villain.

Sheva. Aha! that is a very bad word. Villain! I did never think to hear that word from one who says he knows me. I pray you, now, permit me to speak to you a word or two in my own defence. I have done a great deal of business for you, Sir Stephen; have put a pretty deal of monies in your pocket by my pains and labours; I did never wrong you of one sixpence in my life; I was content with my lawful commission; how can I be a villain?

Sir S. Do you not uphold the son against the father?

Sheva. I do uphold the son, but not against the fader: it is not natural to suppose the oppressor and fader one and the same person. I did see your son struck down to the ground with sorrow, cut to the heart: I did not stop to ask whose hand had laid him low; I gave him mine, and raised him up.

Sir S. You! you to talk of charity?

Sheva. I do not talk of it: I feel it.

Sir S. What claim have you to generosity, humanity, or any manly virtue? Which of your money-making tribe ever had sense of pity? Shew me the terms on which you have lent this money, if you dare! Exhibit the dark deed, by which you have meshed your victim in the snares of usury; but be assured, I'll drag you to the light, and publish your base dealings to the world.

[Catches him by the sleeve.]

Sheva. Take your hand from my coat; my coat and I are very old, and pretty well worn out together. There, there! be patient. Moderate your passions, and you shall see my terms: they are in little compass: fair dealings may be comprised in few words.

Sir S. If they are fair, produce them.

Sheva. Let me see, let me see! Ah! poor Sheva! I do so tremble, I can hardly hold my papers. So, so! Now I am right. Ah! here it is.

Sir S. Let me see it.

Sheva. Take it. [Gives a paper.] Do you not see it now? Have you cast your eye over it? Is it not right? I am no more than broker, look you. If there is a mistake, point it out, and I will correct it.

Sir S. [Reads.] Ten thousand pounds, invested in the three per cents, money of Eliza, late Ratcliffe, now Bertram.

Sheva. Even so. A pretty tolerable fortune for a poor disinherited son, not worth one penny.

Sir S. I'm thunderstruck!

Sheva. Are you so? I was struck too, but not by thunder. And what has Sheva done to be called villain? I am a Jew, what then? Is that a reason none of my tribe should have a sense of pity? You have no great deal of pity yourself, but I do know many noble British merchants that abound in pity, therefore I do not abuse your tribe.

Sir S. I am confounded and ashamed; I see my fault, and most sincerely ask your pardon.

Sheva. Goot lack, goot lack! that is too much. I pray you, goot Sir Stephen, say no more; you'll bring the blush upon my cheek, if you demean yourself so far to a poor Jew, who is your very humble servant to command.

Sir S. Did my son know Miss Ratcliffe had this fortune?

Sheva. When ladies are so handsome, and so goot, no generous man will ask about their fortune.

Sir S. 'Tis plain I was not that generous man.

Sheva. No, no; you did ask about nothing else.

Sir S. But how, in the name of wonder, did she come by it?

Sheva. If you did give me money to buy stock, would you not be much offended were I to ask you how you came by it?

Sir S. Her brother was my clerk. I did not think he had a shilling in the world.

Sheva. And yet you turned him upon the world, where he has found a great many shillings. The world, you see, was the better master of the two. Well, Sir Stephen, I will humbly take my leave.

You wished your son to marry a lady with ten thousand pounds; he has exactly fulfilled your wishes: I do presume you will not think it necessary to turn him out of doors, and disinherit him for that.

Sir S. Go on, I merit your reproof. I shall henceforward be ashamed to look you or my son in the face.

Sheva. To look me in the face is to see nothing of my heart; to look upon your son, and not to love him, I should have thought had been impossible. Sir Stephen, I am your very humble servant.

Sir S. Farewell, friend Sheva! Can you forgive me?

Sheva. I can forgive my enemy; much more my friend. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Chamber.

Enter Sir STEPHEN BERTRAM and SAUNDERS.

Sir S. I am wrong, Saunders, totally wrong, in the manner I have resented my son's marriage.

Saun. I am happy to hear you say so. I flattered myself you would not hold out long against a worthy son. It is not in the nature of a father to resent so deeply.

Sir S. Very true, Saunders, very true; my heart is not a hard one; but the lady he has married has ten thousand pounds for her fortune.

Saun. Oh! that indeed makes all the difference in life. This is a mollifying circumstance, I confess.

Sir S. I know not how she came by it. It seems to be the work of magic; but so it surely is; I saw the stock in Sheva's hands.

Saun. Well, sir, you could not have it from better hands than from the author himself.

Sir S. How! What! from Sheva! Impossible! Ratcliffe is of a great family. Some sudden wind-fall; some relation dead. You'll see him in mourning the next time you meet.

Saun. He has not put it on yet, for I left him this minute in the counting-house: he is waiting to speak with you.

Sir S. So, so, so! Now then the news will come out. But, pr'ythee, don't let the gentleman wait. We must make up for past slights by double civility. Pray inform Mr. Ratcliffe I shall be most happy to receive his commands.

Saun. O, money! money! what a qualifier thou art! [Exit.]

Sir S. Now I shall be curious to see how this young man will carry himself in prosperity. Had I but staid one day longer without discharging him, I could have met him with a better face.

Enter CHARLES RATCLIFFE.

Char. Sir Stephen Bertram, I shall not engross much of your time. My business will be despatched in a very few words.

Sir S. Whatever commands you may have for me, Mr. Ratcliffe, I am perfectly at your service.

Char. I don't doubt it, sir; but I shall not put your spirit to any great trial. My explanation will not be a hostile one, unless you choose to understand it as such.

Sir S. Far be it from me to wish it. Good terms between near connexions, you know, sir, should always be cultivated

Char. You are pleased to be facetious; but your irony will not put me by from telling you, that your son's connexion with my family is no match of my making. If my sister has dishonoured herself, it behoves me to say, and to say it on my solemn word, that the whole transaction was kept perfectly secret from me, and has received every mark of my displeasure and resentment that I, as yet, had an opportunity to give it.

Sir S. Proud as Lucifer himself! [Aside.] Well, sir, if you are dissatisfied with the match, I can only say I am not in the fault of it: but when you say your sister is dishonoured, I protest I do not perfectly understand you; nor did I quite expect such an expression from you.

Char. Probably you did not; your studies, perhaps, have laid more in the book of accounts than in the book of honour.

Sir S. You are very high, sir; I am afraid your unexpected good fortune has rather intoxicated you.

Char. No, sir; the best good fortune I have known this day, that which discharged me from your connexion; not this which unwillingly imposes it upon me.

Sir S. Very well, Mr. Ratcliffe. It was not with this sort of conversation I was prepared to entertain you; the sooner we put an end to it the better: only this I must take leave to tell you, that the fortune of the family into which your sister has married, is by no means overbalanced by the fortune she has brought into it.

Char. Ay, now your heart's come out: that mercenary taunt is all you have to say. But had my wish prevailed, you never should have had it in your power to utter Ratcliffe's name, without a blush for your unwarranted suspicions of his honour.

[Erit.]

Sir S. He's mad; his head is turned: prosperity has overset him. If the sister of the same blood is provided with no better brains, poor Frederick has made a precious bargain. We shall breed candidates for Bedlam.

[Erit.]

SCENE II.—Sheva's House.

Enter SHEVA.

Sheva. Aha! Very goot! very goot! I am at home. Now I will sit down in my own parlour, and not ask leave of anybody. I did not think I could have given so large a sum away, and yet outlived it; but I am pretty well. There is but one man in the world poorer than he was, and he is going out of it: and there is a couple, at least, a great deal happier, and they are coming into it. Well, well! that is two for one,—cent per cent, so I have made a pretty goot bargain. Now I will ring my bell, and order my dinner: yes, yes, I will eat my dinner, for I am hungry. [Sits.—Rings.]

Enter JABAL.

Oh! you knave! Oh! you picklock! how dare you listen at my door, and hear my secrets? Sirrah, I will have your ears nailed to it!—Don't you speak, don't you speak: you will make me angry, and that will spoil my appetite. What have you got in the house for my repast?

Jabal. Plenty, as good luck will have it.

Sheva. Plenty, say you! What is it? Let me hear.

Jabal. One egg-shell, and the skins of three potatoes: shall I serve them up at once, or make two courses of them?

Sheva. How now, you jackanapes? One egg-shell is not thing goot for a hungry man. Have you left some of the potatoes in the skins?

Jabal. Not an atom; you may have the broth they were boiled in.

Sheva. You are a saucy knave, to make a joke of your master. Do you think I will keep a jack-pudding in my house like you, to listen at my key-hole, and betray my conversation? Why did you say I gave away my monies?

Jabal. What harm hid I do? Nobody, believed me.

Sheva. Go your ways, go your ways; you are not for my purpose—you are not fit to be trusted: you do let your idle tongue run away with you.

Jabal. That is because you won't employ my teeth.

Sheva. You do prate too much; you do chatter, and bring your poor master into great straits: I have been much maltreated and abused.

Jabal. Have you so? I wish to goodness I had been by.

Sheva. Sirrah! you wish you had been by, to hear your master abused!

Jabal. Yes; for I would have dealt the fellow that abused you, such a recompense in the fifth button, that my friend Mendoza should not have placed it better. D—n it! do you think I would stand by, and hear my master abused?

Sheva. Don't you swear, don't you swear? that is goot lad, but don't you swear.

Jabal. No, by the living —! though I may be starved in your service, I will die in your defence.

Sheva. Well, well; you are a merry knave. But my eyes do water a little: the air is sharp, and they are weak. Go your ways, go your ways;—send Dorcas to me. [Erit JABAL.] I cannot tell what ails my heart all this day long, it is so troublesome. I have spent ten thousand pounds to make it quiet; but there must be a little fraction more; I must give the poor knave something for his goodwill. Oh dear, oh dear! what will become of me?

Enter DORCAS.

So, so! Come hither, Dorcas. Why do you look sad? What ails you, girl? Why do you cry?

Dor. Because you are going to turn away Jabal. He is the kindest, willingest, good-naturedest soul alive; the house will be a dungeon without Jabal.

Sheva. Then tell him, 'tis at your request I let him stay in this dungeon. Say, that I was very angry with him, but that you pacified my anger.

Dor. Lord love your heart! that is so like you.

Sheva. Hark you, Dorcas; I will give you this piece of money to make the poor knave merry; but mind that you bestow it on him as your own little present, and promise not to say it comes from me.

Dor. Well; to be sure you do not give your money like other people. If ever I do a good turn, I take care the person I favour should know from whence it comes, that so he may have the pleasure of returning it.

Sheva. Well, Dorcas, you take your course, and I take mine. Now I will go and beg a bit of dinner of a friend. You are a very good housewife, Dorcas; you do keep an empty kitchen and a clean cupboard.

Dor. And whose fault is that? How many people are feasting abroad at your cost, whilst you have a famine at home?—But here comes your friend and neighbour, Mrs. Goodison; she will take care of you. [Erit.]

Enter Mrs. Goodison.

Mrs. G. Ah! my good sir, I perceive you are at your old sport; no smoke in your chimney—no cloth upon your table—full coffers, and an empty cupboard.

Sheva. No, no; my coffers are not full; I am very poor just now.

Mrs. G. Come, then, and partake with one whom your bounty has made rich.

Sheva. Do not talk of my bounty; I do never give away for bounty's sake. If pity wrings it from my heart, whether I will or not, then I do give: how can I help it?

Mrs. G. Well, sir, I can be silent, but I cannot forget. And now, if you will come and share my grateful meal, perhaps I can shew you one of the loveliest objects in creation—a beautiful and amiable young bride, who, with her husband and mother, is now my lodger. She was married this very morning to your friend, Sir Stephen Bertram's son, who, between you and me, has brought himself into sad trouble with his father by the match. But surely, if there is a woman upon earth worth a man's being ruined for, it must be this young creature.—So modest—so sweet-tempered—so engaging! Oh! that Sir Stephen had your heart!

Sheva. It might be inconvenient to him if he had: it is not kept for nothing, I assure you.

Mrs. G. You would not turn such a daughter-in-law from your doors.

Sheva. Nor will he, perhaps.

Mrs. G. Ah, sir! I know a little better: this poor young gentleman himself told me he was ruined. "But don't be afraid to take me into your house," added he, with a sigh that went to my heart; "I am provided with the means of doing justice to you, by a generous friend," shewing me a bank bill of one hundred pounds. Heaven bless the generous friend! quoth I; and at that moment I thought of you, my good Mr. Sheva, who rescued me from the like distress when my poor husband died.

Sheva. You may think of me, Mrs. Goodison; but I beg you will not speak of me in the hearing of your lodgers.

Mrs. G. Well, well, sir; if I must not speak, I must not. Yet a stranger thing came out in conversation with the mother of the bride, a very excellent lady, from whom I found out that she is the widow of that very gentleman we knew at Cadiz, by the name of Don Carlos only, and to whom, I believe, you think yourself under some obligations in your escape from that country.

Sheva. Mercies upon his heart! he was the preserver of my life! but for his charitable succour, this poor body would have fed the fires of an Auto da fe. Is it possible Mrs. Ratcliffe is the widow of my benefactor?

Mrs. G. Most certain that she is, which you may soon be convinced of; but I perceive you know the lady's name.

Sheva. Did you not name the lady yourself?

Mrs. G. No, on my word. Ah, sir! you are fairly caught; you have betrayed yourself. Ill deeds, they say, will come to light, and so will good ones, it should seem.

Sheva. Hold your tongue, hold your tongue; you forget that I am fasting, and without a dinner. Go your ways, and I will follow; you are nimble, I am slow: you will be shamed with your lodgers, if they see you with a poor old Jew like me.

Mrs. G. Ah! You are cunning in your charities;

but I'll do as you would have me, and be ready at the door, to receive and welcome you. [Exit.]

Sheva. The widow of my preserver from the inquisitors of Cadiz, and the mother of my rescuer from the mob of London! Dear me, dear me! How Providence disposes all things! The friend that's dead wants nothing; the friend that is alive shall likewise want nothing that I can give him: for I will die quickly myself and give him all.—Goot lack! goot lack! when I did heap up monies with such pains and labour, I did always think that I should find a use for them at last. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—Mrs. Goodison's House.

MRS. RATCLIFFE, ELIZA, and CHARLES.

Char. I have cleared myself to his father, and I'll clear myself to all the world. No man shall say I lay traps for heirs.

Mrs. R. Charles, Charles, you soar too high.

Char. Madam, madam, you stoop too low.

Mrs. R. How is your honour slighted, when your friend did not even consult his father?

Char. He knew his father's mind too well.

Mrs. R. And what would you have done?

Char. I would have saved my friend.

Eliza. And sacrificed your sister. That, let me say, is a high strain of friendship, but no great proof of brotherly affection.

Char. Sister, there is more peace of mind sacrificed by indulging in an act to be repented of, than by foregoing a dishonourable propensity. The woman without fortune, that consents to a clandestine marriage with a man whose whole dependance is upon an unforgiving father, never can be justified.

Eliza. You argue from the unforgiving nature of Sir Stephen Bertram: you had experience of it, I had none.

Char. You might have had, by an appeal to his consent before you gave your own.

Mrs. R. You bear too hard upon your sister. You forget her sex, her situation, your own tenderness, and the affection you have ever borne her.

Char. No, madam; if I could forget how proudly I have thought of her, I should not be so humbled by her conduct as I am. I own I stand in amazement at your indifference. You think I am too sensitive—too proud: you tell me, that I soar too high. How was it when I was this Bertram's clerk? I bore my lot with patience; I submitted without murmuring to poverty: I cannot brook disgrace.

Eliza. Well, Charles, if you could love me only whilst you thought me faultless, I must wonder how it was that we were friends so long: and now you have said all that rigid justice can enforce against me; had you said less, I should have felt it more.

Enter FREDERICK.

*Fred. Charles—Brother—Friend!—*Will you not give me joy? Come, man, shake off this cloud, and smile upon my happiness; we catch it but by gleams.

Char. Yes, sir, we sometimes catch it by surprise and stealth; we catch it by a breach of promise and good faith: then to congratulate a man on such a catch, in my sense of the word, would be to libel him.

Fred. I have frequently seen cause to applaud your philosophy, Charles; now I must think you carry it too far.

Char. It touches you too near; therefore, you like it not.

Fred. To that remark I should return an answer, were not these dear pledges present, that might a little ruffle your philosophy, perhaps, but it would fully vindicate my principle.

Char. Postpone it then, but don't forget it.

Fred. When friends fall into altercation on such points as these, there should be none to witness their folly.

Char. Folly!

Mrs. R. Son, son, no more of this.

Eliza. Stop, I conjure you both! Charles! Charles! if you have love or pity left, let this dissension go no further. And you, Frederick—husband!—You, whose generous heart has put to hazard every hope for me, add yet another proof of love, by suffering these rebukes with patience: they are but flashes of a temper warm in friendship, glowing with honour, impatient of neglect. Perhaps my brother thinks ambition, meanness, artifice, might have some part,—some influence in moving me to what I've done. I spurn such motives—disavow them all. Were I in Frederick's place, and he in mine, I should have done as he did; I should have thought no sacrifice too great to have secured a lasting interest in a heart like his.

Char. This had been only ruin to yourself, and would have had the plea of spirit, therefore more excusable: but this no man of honour would have suffered; therefore 'tis only said, not done.

Fred. Whatever my Eliza says is done; her actions verify her words; and he, that doubts them, would dispute against the light of heaven. 'Tis I that am advanced, she is abased; 'tis I that am enriched, Eliza is impoverished. I only risk a few sharp words from an ungentle father; she suffers keen reproaches, undeserved, from an injurious brother.

Char. Urge me no further; I can bear no more.

Eliza. Oh! my dear mother, save me.

[Falls into her arms.]

Fred. There! there! you've struck her to the heart, and that's a coward's blow. [Apart to CHARLES, in an under voice.] My life, my soul! look up! Dear madam, take her hence.

[Mrs. RATCLIFFE takes ELIZA out.]
Char. A coward's blow! you recollect those words; and know their meaning, I suppose.

Fred. Yes; and will meet your comment when you will, and where you will.

Char. Then follow me, and we'll adjust that matter speedily.

Fred. I will but drop a tear upon the ruin you have made, and then be with you.

Char. I'll wait for you below.

[Erit.]

Enter ELIZA, hastily.

Eliza. Where are you both, rash men? Ah, Frederick! alone! What is become of Charles? Why is he gone away? What have you said to him? I did not hear it, I was lost in terror. I am sure you have quarrelled.

Fred. No, no, not quarrelled—only jarred, as friends will sometimes do; all will be set to rights.

Eliza. How? when? why not this moment, in my hearing? I shall be happy to make peace between you.

Fred. Peace will be made, assure yourself, sweet love; these little heats are easily adjusted.

Eliza. But I could do it best; you are too hot, both, both too hot and fiery.

Fred. We shall be cooler soon: such heats soon spend themselves, and then the heart is laid to rest.

Eliza. Heaven grant such rest to yours!

Fred. Indeed!

Eliza. What says my Frederick? You are still discomposed. Your colour comes and goes. Oh, that my arms could give you rest!—Nay, what now, my Frederick? you struggle to get loose!—Are these soft toils uneasy to you? will not your proud, swelling heart endure such gentle, fond imprisonment?

Fred. Oh, thou angelic virtue!—soul-dissolving softness! would I might thus expire, enfolded in these arms! Love, I conjure thee to bear up! I am sure my father will take pity, and be kind to thee: I shall assail his feelings in a manner that no parent can resist. I am going now to put it to the proof. Farewell!

Eliza. Why in such haste? Stay yet a little while. If you depart so soon, you'll meet with Charles again; and then—

Fred. What then?

Eliza. Some fatal accident will be the issue of it. Alas! you know not what his passions are when once inflamed: let them burn out, and then he's as calm as water.

Fred. Where does this tend? You would not make a coward of your husband?

Eliza. No: nor would you make a distracted wretch of your poor Eliza; therefore, I will not let you loose, till you have promised me not to provoke him to more violence: promise me this, and you shall go.

Fred. Well, then, if that will set your mind at rest, I promise you I'll have no further altercation with him, not another word to gall him.

Eliza. You'll not renew your quarrel?

Fred. No, my Eliza; we will end it, and dismiss it.

Eliza. And this you promise on your honour?

Fred. Yes, I do promise.

Eliza. Then all my fears are over. Now you may go.—Well! what withholds you? What more do you wish than freedom and release from my fond arms?

Fred. To snatch one last, dear moment; and then die within them. Oh! my soul's better part! may heaven preserve and bless you! [Erit.]

Eliza. Now I am happy, now I am secure: this breach once healed, I can face all alarms. [Erit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Tavern.

Enter FREDERICK, attended by a Waiter.

Fred. Is the porter returned who went with my message to Mr. Saunders, at Sir Stephen Bertram's?

Wait. He is, sir; the gentleman will be with you presently.

Fred. Shew him up as soon as he comes. There will be another gentleman call; I believe you know Mr. Ratcliffe?

Wait. Yes, we know Mr. Ratcliffe very well.

Fred. If he comes while Mr. Saunders is with me, request him to wait a few minutes till he is gone.

Wait. I shall, sir; any other commands?

Fred. None. [Erit Waiter.] I scarce know what I've written to my father; yet, perhaps, these few unstudied lines, dictated in such a moment, may dispose him to protect the widow, if fate will have it so, of a discarded son.—Now I am ready for this angry champion; and since he is resolved to vindicate his courage by his sword, let him produce his weapons when he will, I'll not refuse the satisfaction he demands.

Enter JABAL, hastily.

Jabal. Oh! sir, sir! I'm overjoyed to find you. Come, I pray you; come away to my old master, who is pining till he sees you.

Fred. Who is your master, and who are you?

Jabal. As if you did not know Jabal, who lives—No, hold there, who does not live, but starves with your old friend, in Duke's Place. Why, lud-a-mercy! I knew your honour at the length of the street, and saw you turn into this tavern; the puppy waiter would have stopped me from coming up to you.

Fred. I wish you had taken his advice.

Jabal. That would not be your wish, if you knew all. Sure enough I must hunt up Mr. Ratcliffe also: for there is an iron in the fire for each of you. Master is making his will. Lawyer Dash is at his elbow.

Fred. If the devil was at his elbow, I cannot come to him.

Jabal. Oh! the living! I would not carry such a message back for all the world. Why, when Lawyer Dash has pen and ink in hand, and a will under his thumb, he'll dash you in, or dash you out, in a crack.

Fred. Then temper the apology to your taste; only let your master know I cannot come.

Jabal. I'll tell him, then, you are married; that will be a silencer at once.

Fred. Begone! make haste! [Erit JABAL.]—Married! how cutting is that recollection! Joy's just in sight, shewn only to be snatched away. Dear, lost, undone Eliza! But I won't think, for that is madness,—inexorable honour must be obeyed.

Enter Mr. SAUNDERS.

Saun. Mr. Bertram, I came to you the first moment I could get away; for I longed to give you joy.

Fred. Joy! name it not.

Saun. Well, if your joy was somewhat damped at first, you may now take it without any drawback.

Fred. I know not what you mean, nor do I wish to inquire; be silent on that subject, I conjure you. The favour I have to ask you is simply this: here is a letter for my father; deliver it to him with your own hands. You seem surprised.

Saun. I am indeed. The impatience of your look; the hurry of your speech; the place in which I meet you—

Fred. The letter will explain all that; I could not give it you in presence of my—Well, no matter, I take you for a man of honour, and my friend. Will you give the letter?

Saun. Assuredly; but, if I am a man of honour, and your friend, why will you not let me stay with you? In truth, dear Frederick, I am a friend that, if you want him, will not flinch.

Fred. The friend I want, is one that will not force his services upon me when I can't accept of them; but take my word at once, and leave me.

Saun. Enough! I am gone. [Erit.]

Fred. I have been harsh with that good man; but this suspense is terrible.

Enter Waiter.

Wait. Mr. Ratcliffe desires to know if you are at leisure.

Fred. Perfectly; let him know I'm at his service.

[Erit Waiter.]

Enter CHARLES RATCLIFFE.

Char. I have brought my sword; compare it with your own, and, if you have a preference, make your choice. I presume you have no objection to the weapon?

Fred. None on my own account; a little, perhaps, on the score of vanity, as thinking I have some advantage over you in point of skill and practice.

Char. As far as that opinion goes, you are welcome to all the advantage it gives you. Oh! sir, this is a sorry business. Will nothing else convince you I am incapable of giving a coward's blow?

Fred. You have offered nothing else: it is a mode of your own choosing.

Char. Your language forced it on me; you have touched my feelings to the quick. Words, such as you made use of, cannot be passed over without absolute disgrace, unless you will revoke them by apology.

Fred. You may well conceive, Mr. Ratcliffe, with what repugnance I oppose myself to you on this occasion. Whether the event be fatal to you or to myself, small consolation will be left for the survivor. The course you take is warranted by every rule of honour, and you act no otherwise than as I expected; but, as my expression justifies your challenge, so did your provocation justify my expression; and your language being addressed to a lady, whom I have the honour to protect, it is not in my power to retract one tittle of what I said; for was you to repeat the same insult, I should follow it with the same retort.

Char. If you hold to the words, I know not how we can adjust it amicably.

Fred. There is a way; you must find it out.

Char. Suppose, then, that my language had been addressed to any other person than Eliza, would you in that case have apologized for your expression?

Fred. I will speak plainly to you, and the rather as I am now, perhaps, speaking to you for the last time. Admitted by your sister's favour into a family, whose representative resents her conduct, I will not so disgrace her choice in your eyes, who have opposed it, as to submit, in the first instance, to the most distant hint at an apology.

Char. I understand you now; you would have it spring from me.—Impossible!

Fred. Then, no more is to be said.

Char. No more—defend yourself. [They fight.]

Fred. What's that? I've wounded you!

Char. No.

Fred. Yes; I'm sure of it. 'Tis in your arm; you cannot poise your sword.

[CHARLES drops his sword.]

Char. It is too true: your point has hit me through the guard: I'm at your mercy.

Fred. I am at yours, dear Charles, for pardon and forgiveness; now I retract my words, and blush for having used them. Let me bind up your wrist: here is a handkerchief. Shall I call for assistance?

Char. No, no: a scratch; 'tis nothing. It scarce bleeds. Hark! somebody is at the door; take up the swords.

Sheva. [Without.] Let me in; I pray you, gentlemen, let me in. I am Sheva, your friend.

Char. Open the door, Frederick.

Enter SHEVA.

Sheva. Dear me! dear me! what have you been about? Do you come into a public tavern, and lock yourselves up to be private?

Char. Perhaps we did not wish the world to know the silly business we have been engaged in.

Sheva. Goodness defend me! is it come to this? Have I been studying how to make you happy, whilst you were striving how to make me wretched? What a strange world is this? Are you not friends? Are you not brothers? Is that a reason you should quarrel? And if you differ, must you fight? Can your swords argue better than their masters? You call that an affair of honour, I suppose; under your favour, I do not think it a very honourable affair; 'tis only giving a fine name to a foul deed.

Fred. Custom has glossed it over, and we are slaves to custom.

Sheva. I ask your pardon; I am only a poor Jew, a stranger in your country, and have not yet been taught to reverence all your customs. Goot lack, goot lack! what is the matter with your wrist?

Char. Nothing to signify: a trifling scratch.

Sheva. A scratch you call it! That is a wound in common language. I pray you come to my poor house, and let that scratch be healed; you had great care for me, let me have some for you: that is my sense of an affair of honour; to pay the debt that I do owe to you, and to your father, who preserved my life in Spain, that is my point of honour. Come, come, let us depart: this is no place to talk in; take up your swords, I hope we have no further use for them. [Ereunt.]

SCENE II.—Mrs. Goodison's.

Sir STEPHEN BERTRAM and Mrs. GOODISON.

Mrs. G. Your son is not at home, Sir Stephen, but Mrs. Bertram is; and if you will allow me to call her down, I'm sure she will be happy to pay her duty to you.

Sir S. A moment's patience, Mrs. Goodison.—You seem much interested for this young bride, your lodger.

Mrs. G. It is impossible to be otherwise. She has beauty to engage the eye, and manners to interest the heart.

Sir S. Some pride of family about her, I should guess: a little of her brother's vivacity, perhaps.

Mrs. G. None that appears: mildness, and modesty, and every gentle grace, seem inherently her own.

Sir S. Be pleased to tell her I attend to pay my compliments; and, as young ladies' characters are not so easily developed in the company of their mothers, I should be glad she would allow me to confer with her alone. [Exit Mrs. Goodison.] Now I shall have this mystery unravelled. Saunders's notion, that the fortune comes from Sheva, is romantic in the extreme. Why should he portion her? She has no Jew's blood in her veins, we'll hope; and, as to a deception, that he dares not practise. She comes.—By heavens, a lovely creature!

Enter ELIZA.

Eliza. You honour me most highly, sir.

Sir S. Not so, madam; the honour is conferred on me.

Eliza. How have I merited this condescension?

Sir S. Call it not condescension; it is no more than is due from one who is proud to embrace the title you have allowed him to assume.

Eliza. This is beyond my hopes. Will you permit me, then, to call myself your daughter, and entreat a blessing and a pardon on my knees?

Sir S. Not for the world in that submissive posture. All you can ask is granted, with acknowledgments on my part for the happiness you have bestowed upon my son. Had certain circumstances occurred before your marriage, that have since turned up, I presume you would not have precipitated matters, at least not in the secret manner they were carried.

Eliza. What circumstances, sir, may you allude to?

Sir S. The death, as I suppose, in your family.

Eliza. Good heaven forbid! What death? my brother?

Sir S. No; your brother, madam! no! Pray be not thus alarmed. I know your brother's circumstances too well, to suppose your sudden fortune could proceed from him—Perhaps some distant relation, or some friend, may have bequeathed—

Eliza. What? let me ask. I know of no bequest.

Sir S. Call it a gift, then, a donation on your marriage; it must have been an agreeable surprise to my son, to have been presented with a fortune so unexpectedly.

Eliza. I am loth to think Sir Stephen Bertram can descend to ridicule my poverty. That I should be regarded by you as an unwelcome intruder upon your family, I can well believe: that you would point your whole resentment against me alone, and spare your son, is all that I dare wish at present: my future hope aspires no higher than by perseverance in my duty as a wife to merit your opinion, so as, in time, you may acknowledge me as your daughter. Conscious that I have incurred your displeasure, I shall patiently endeavour to soften it by submission and obedience.

Sir S. Madam, that answer is at once so pacifying and so candid, that if the information I have had of your being possessed of ten thousand pounds for your fortune, be false, though I thought I had pretty strong evidence of it—

Eliza. Impossible!—I'm sure your son, I'm sure my brother, never told you this?

Sir S. I cannot say they did.

Eliza. No, I'll engage for them, they would disdain so gross and palpable a deceit.

Sir S. Well, be it as it may, with or without a fortune, portioned or penniless, I feel myself so irresistibly impelled to open my arms to you as a father, that, whether Sheva has or has not deceived me, I here deposit my resentment; and, by what I experience of your power over my heart, most thoroughly acquit my son for having surrendered his.

Eliza. It is the impulse of your own generosity, not any impression of my giving, that moves your heart to pity and forgiveness.—But who is Sheva, that you seem to point at as the author of this falsehood?

Sir S. Sheva, the Jew: surely you know the man?

Eliza. Thank heaven! I do not; I can safely say I never, to my recollection, heard his name before. Some vile impostor, I suppose.

Sir S. Not quite that, though had enough to be so treated, if he has practised this deceit on me. Sheva is my broker; your husband knows him well; a miserly, methodical, old Alley-drudge, who shewed me what I believed a true receipt for ten thousand pounds, vested in your name, in the funds. One of my people would have persuaded me it was his own voluntary benefaction; but if you don't know him, never saw him, never heard his name, the thing's impossible.

Eliza. Totally so, without one ray of probability; the man is either mad or mischievous. No Jew of that, or any other name, do I know; nay, I question if ever I exchanged a word with any one of the nation in my life.

Sir S. Your merit, then, and not your fortune, shall endear you to me. I will strike out ten thousand pounds that I perceive you are not possessed of, and write in ten thousand graces, which I perceive you are possessed of, and so balance the account. Now, Saunders, what's the matter?

Enter SAUNDERS.

Saun. Your son requested me to give this letter into your hands.

Sir S. No, no; there needs no letter. Tell him it is done; say, that you found me conquered in less time than he was. Bid him make haste hither in person, before I run away with his wife; and let him write no more letters, for I won't read a word of them.

[Exit SAUNDERS.]

Eliza. Won't you be pleased to open your letter?
Sir S. Positively I will not read it, because Frederick shall not have to say that his rhetoric had any share in making me a convert. If it is, as I suppose, a recital of your graces and good qualities, I do not want his description to assist my sense of what I see; but if you have a wish to see your own fair person painted by his hand, you are welcome to indulge it. [Takes the letter and gives it to ELIZA.]
Break the seal.

Eliza. 'Tis short; I'll read it to you—"I am this instant summoned by Charles Ratcliffe, on a point of honour, sword to sword"—Oh! heavens! I can no more—

[Drops the letter.]

Sir S. What is it? What alarms you?

Eliza. Oh! that letter! that letter!—My husband and my brother!—One or both have fallen!

Sir S. Merciful powers forbid it!

[Takes up the letter.]

Eliza. Stop not to read it! Fly! and take me with you—plant me between them; I am the cause of quarrel. Let the sword that aims to pierce a heart dearer than my own, lodge in my guilty bosom.

Sir S. Oh! horrible to thought! Hark, who is coming?

Eliza. The messenger of death; let him not speak; his very look will kill me.

Enter FREDERICK, followed by CHARLES.

Fred. My love, my life, my ever dear Eliza.

Eliza. Where is your wound? Are you not dying? What is become of Charles?

Char. Here is your happy brother—all is well.

Fred. We are both here with friendly hearts, and joyful news, to greet you.

Eliza. Don't speak of joy too soon; 'twill overthrow my senses. Let me survey you both. Don't deceive me; you have wounds about you.—Ah! Charles, what's this?

Char. The least, but luckiest wound that ever man received. This little glance of your brave husband's sword disarmed me of my weapon, and both our rash hearts of their anger. Now lay aside your fears, and prepare yourselves for wonders.

Fred. Oh! sir, I have offended you; but—

Sir S. But what? You have an advocate, that makes all hearts her own. Spare your appeal; you will but waste your words.

Char. Here comes my mother: bear up, Eliza; say not a word of what has passed.

Enter Mrs. RATCLIFFE.

Eliza. Oh, my dear madam! I have joy to give you; let me present you to my Frederick's father.

Sir S. Yes, madam; and the greatest joy that son ever conferred upon me, is the title he has given me, to claim a father's share with you in this angel of a daughter.

Mrs. R. Such she has been to me. I am blest to hear you say that you approve her.

Sir S. Frederick, give me your hand. If you had brought me half the Indies with a wife, I should not have joined your hand to her's with such sincere delight.

Fred. How generous is that declaration! Now, Charles, 'tis time to introduce our friend.

[Exit CHARLES.]

Mrs. R. What does he mean, Eliza?

Eliza. I know no more than you: some new wonder, I suppose.

Sir S. Ha! Sheva here? This is indeed a wonder.

Re-enter CHARLES, with SHEVA.

Char. This is the man. My benefactor; yours, Eliza; Frederick's; yours, dear mother! all mankind's. The widow's friend, the orphan's father, the poor man's protector, the universal philanthropist.

Sheva. Hush, hush! you make me hide my face.

[Covers his face with his hands.]

Char. Ah, sir! 'tis now too late to cover your good deeds. You have long masked your charities beneath this humble seeming, and shrunk back from actions princes might have gloried in. You must now face the world, and transfer the blush from your own cheeks to theirs, whom prejudice had taught to scorn you. For your single sake, we must reform our hearts, and inspire them with candour towards your whole nation.

Sheva. Enough! Enough! more than enough! I pray you spare me: I am not used to hear the voice of praise, and it oppresses me: I should not know myself if you were to describe me: I have a register within, in which these merits are not noted. Simply, I am an honest man, no more; fair in my dealings, as my good patron here, I hope, can witness.—That lady, I believe, is Mrs. Ratcliffe: she does not know me; I will not touch upon a melancholy subject, else I could tell a story—Merciful heaven! what horrors was I snatched from by her husband, now, alas! no more.

Mrs. R. Oh, gracious powers! The Jew of Cadiz.

Sheva. The very same. Your debtor in no less a sum than all I possess; the earnings of a life preserved, first by your husband, and now again by your son. Why am I praised, then, if I am merely honest, and discharge my debts?

Sir S. Ah! now the mystery's solved. The ten thousand pounds were yours; give them to Ratcliffe; I will have nothing from fortune where nature gives so much.

Sheva. That is a noble speech; but monies does not lessen merit, at least not always, as I hope, for Mr. Ratcliffe's sake, for he is heir of all that I possess.

Mrs. R. What can I say? My heart's too full for utterance.—O, Charles, the fortunes of your house revive! Surely the blessed spirit of your departed father now sympathises in our joy. Remember, son, to whom you owe this happiness, and emulate his virtues.

Char. If I forget to treat my fortune as becomes the son of such a father, and the heir of such a benefactor, your warning will be my condemnation.

Fred. That will never be : the treasure, that integrity has collected, cannot be better lodged than in the hands of honour.

Sir S. It is a mine of wealth.

Sheva. Excuse me, good Sir Stephen; it is not a mine, for it was never out of sight of those who searched for it. The poor man did not dig to find it; and where I now bestow it, it will be found by him again. I do not bury it in a synagogue, or any other pile; I do not waste it upon vanity, or public works; I leave it to a charitable heir, and build my hospital in the human heart. [Exeunt.]

THE CASTLE OF SORRENTO;

A MUSICAL ENTERTAINMENT, IN TWO ACTS;

BY HENRY HEARTWELL.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

COUNT MURVILLE
GOVERNOR OF SORRENTO
BLINVAL
GERMAIN Officer
Corporal
Footman.

MRS. BELMONT
ROSINA.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—On the right hand, one of the towers of the Castle of Sorrento; a ditch and parapet-wall dividing it from a large house placed on the left, with a latticed window over the door opening to a balcony. In the tower, a grated window about the height of the balcony. A picturesque view of the country in the distance, mountainous, and with vineyards.

ROSINA appears at the latticed window.

SONG.—ROSINA.

*Evening's shadows now appear,
All is hush'd and calm around—
Hark! his well-known voice I hear;
Let me fly to catch the sound*

*No; 'tis past, and silence reigns;
Pensive, still, I mourn his fate:
In his tower he still remains;
Here, alas! in vain I wait.
Evening's shadows now appear,
All is hush'd and calm around—
Hark! again his voice I hear;
Yes, I've caught the well-known sound.*

BLINVAL, in a red hussar jacket, his hair dishevelled, and his whole appearance neglected, appears at the grated window of the prison.

DUET.—BLINVAL and ROSINA.

*Blin. Hark! again that heavenly voice.
Ros. Yes, 'tis he; why throbs my heart?
By turns I sigh, by turns rejoice;
I'm fix'd, though reason says depart.
Blin. Oh! what joy, what bliss I feel!
Ros. Ah! could my prayers your anguish heal?
Blin. Sweet, heavenly maid, my griefs are past,
My prison now a palace seems;
Speak, will the pleasing vision last?
Or are my raptures fleeting dreams?
Ros. Ah! could Rosina's prayers avail,
How soon those heavy bars should fall!
Ah! could Rosina's tears prevail,
How swift you'd pass the hated wall!
Blin. Ye gods, I'm bless'd; what rapture's mine!
Forgive that late I dar'd repine.
Ros. Compassion's tear—
Blin. The joys I feel,—*

Ros. Bedews my cheek.
 Blin. No words reveal.
 Ros. Alas! poor youth,—
 Blin. How bless'd my lot!—
 Ros. How hard your fate!
 Blin. My grief's forgot.
I'm bless'd beyond what mortals know,
Though fate has mark'd the world my foe;
That cheering glance, that heavenly smile,
Would ev'ry human care beguile.
 Ros. Alas! how hard the prisoner's lot!
Forsaken, by the world forgot.
 Blin. What joys I feel!
 Ros. How hard his lot!—
 Blin. I'm bless'd, indeed.
 Ros. By all forgot.
 Blin. My griefs are past.
 Ros. Compassion's tear—
 Blin. Transporting sounds!
 Ros. Your woes shall cheer.
Ah! would my fervent prayers ascend,
Your painful sufferings soon should end.
 Blin. The prayers of virtue swift ascend,
I feel my sufferings soon must end.
 [BLINVAL retires.]

Ros. Heigho! he sings no more. No, he is gone, and I am still left in incertitude. It's very wicked of the Governor to keep so sweet a man cooped up in that huge ugly tower.

Enter GERMAIN with a portmanteau and hat-box.

Ger. [Knocks and calls at the door of the house.]

Hallo, ho, ho! Within there, ho!

Ros. What can that be?

Ger. Are you all dead? Rub down my hack, and let me have a spanking supper, for I'm confoundedly sharp set.

Ros. Pray, where do you suppose yourself, that you're so much at home? This is no inn.

Ger. [Looking up and taking off his hat.] Bumpers and Burgundy! there's a rogue's eye! [Aside.] Inn! Oh! no; Lord love your pretty face! the Widow Belmont would be quite shocked if I went to an inn.

Ros. Indeed! And who are you?

Ger. One of king Cupid's corps diplomatique; ambassador of love; courier of Hymen; the faithful follower, though I precede my master, of Count Murville, captain in the death's head hussars, et cetera—Germain, at your service. [Bowling.]

Ros. Oh! from our cousin Murville. Well, I'll inform mamma. Provoking puppy!—at this moment—he has chosen this time. [Aside, and exit.]

Ger. She might as well have asked me to walk in. Mighty pleasant, no doubt, this al fresco, to those who relish it; but for a gentleman who does Count Murville, captain in the death's head hussars, et cetera, the honour to adjust his mustachios, and to adorn his head, why, it's d—d scurvy treatment. Hip, hallo! house! within there!

[Knocks at the door.]

Enter Footman, from the house.

Foot. Hallo! Who thunders so loudly?

Ger. Why, me, to be sure.

Foot. You! and who the devil are you?

Ger. Is that your respect to a valet-de-chambre? Here, take my baggage, and know your distance.

[Snatches up the portmanteau and hat-box, places them on the Footman's shoulders, pushes him in, and follows.]

SCENE II.—A Drawing-room at the Widow Belmont's.

Enter the Footman and GERMAIN.

Foot. My mistress is at the Governor's, and you must wait. She will speak with you here. [Going.]

Ger. But, sir, respected sir, [bowing] if you are pleased to take your own sweet company away, can't you send me an omelet and a salad, with a few of your half-emptied flasks? You understand! and I don't think, without offence, I should lament your absence.

Foot. Oh! sir, your most obedient. But I am never purveyor except where I'm a guest: you understand? [Exit.]

Ger. Well, now, as I'm a Christian sinner, that fellow deserves the gallies. I wish my master would appear. Somehow, I'm never respected but for his sake. What can detain him at Naples? Oh! I have it: the imprisonment of his young friend Blinval; that fire-eating, mad rattlecap, who had nearly sabred his own colonel. What a cursed scrape! Death by the articles of war. But he performed such prodigies in the last battle, and saved Count Murville's life, so he'll move heaven, earth, and the minister for his release. Oh! now I recollect, he is in this district, close prisoner in the old castle of Sorrento: if I could speak to him—No, no, poor devil, he is trapped like a rat and can only be peeped at through his gratings.

Enter BLINVAL, in the red hussar's jacket, without a sword.

Blin. [Looking about, but not perceiving GERMAIN.] This apartment excels the last; am I awake, or is it all a dream?

Ger. [Not seeing him.] He is as wild as a young Tartar, as obstinate as a young devil, but as sound-hearted as a young Englishman. Oh! a fine fellow that Blinval.

Blin. [Turning quick round.] Blinval! who calls me?

Ger. [Starting.] Eh! what? No, sure—yes, but it is; it is our mad lieutenant.

[Runs and leaps on his neck.]

Blin. Germain! Not hanged yet, but don't strangle me, man. I'm here, you see, in spite of our old fusty colonel, safe, sound, and hearty, boy.

Ger. But by what miracle? I thought you snug in one of the four towers of that d—d castle.

Blin. So thinks the governor, heaven help him, at this hour. But tell me, whose is this house?

Ger. The Widow Belmont's.

Blin. Has she a daughter?

Ger. Rosina; a great beauty; fresh, blooming, and sixteen.

Blin. Huzza! Then I shall bless the day I heard the rusty hinges of Sorrento creak.

Ger. And were I in your place I should curse it most furiously. But what with hunger, thirst, and curiosity, I'm in a desperate case; pity me, sir, I have a craving appetite for your adventures.

Blin. Shut up in the south tower, I one day saw the daughter of this house at a latticed balcony; woodbines and jessamines were round the wall, but they weren't half so fresh as the sweet little creature who eclipsed them.

Ger. Oh Lord! oh Lord! I'm likely to be famished still, if we're to creep through the woodbines.

Blin. To the point, then: she kept her eyes long fixed on me; I tried to move her by croaking in my d—d hoarse voice, some melancholy ditties about captivity and so on. Every day fresh attentions, fresh songs. This very evening my gaoler called me from a charming interview. I thrust him out, and, in a moment of passion, dashed an old wardrobe in a dark corner of my room to atoms. A folded paper caught my eye, I seized it eagerly, it was directed—

Ger. How?

Blin. "To the unfortunate who succeeds me."

Ger. And the contents?

Blin. A legacy from my poor devil of a predecessor: he had been shut up in the same part of the tower ten years; but love had softened the hardships of his captivity. In short, the paper marked a secret avenue leading to the next house. I descended, crept through a subterraneous passage, climbed a cork-screw stair-case, reached a small door, and, upon pressing back a spring, jumped into that bed-room.

Ger. And the entrance—

Blin. Is concealed by that looking-glass. But tell me now, what brings your rogue's face to Sorrento?

Ger. Marriage. Your friend Murville is cousin to the Widow; they have been long involved in a law-suit, and were compelled to correspond: the first letters were cold, the second more civil, the third touched on arrangements, and in the last they settled it, to wind up all in the old-fashioned way, by a marriage.

Blin. Excellent! When will they solemnize?

Ger. The day's not fixed, for they have never met.

Blin. Not seen each other! Then I'm established in the house.

Ger. Eh! how do you make that out?

Blin. Dolt, dunderhead! I shall pass for Murville; the Widow Belmont will receive, caress, feed, lodge, and—

Ger. Marry you?

Blin. No, no; but I'll obtain an interview with my Rosina; speak to her frequently, and breathe my vows of love and constancy in a purer air.

Ger. In the meantime, they'll visit the south tower, find the bird flown, and send him back to whistle his soft notes in a foul air and a close cage.

Blin. They visit me but twice a day; and till tomorrow's noon I'm safe

Ger. Granted; but will that negligée suit the lover?

Blin. Oh! let me see. [Pauses.] I have been stopped by a banditti.

Ger. Ha, ha, ha! You're never at a loss; always a tale at your tongue's end. But my scruples—

Blin. Have, like all other things, their price. [Shaking a purse.] Fifty louis for their repose.

Ger. They're hushed. [Taking the purse.]

Blin. But if I appear in this identical dress, I shall be known instantly by Rosina, and it would not be prudent to discover myself, even to her, too soon.

Ger. What say you to my master's riding-coat and military hat?

Blin. The very thing; run and fetch them; quick, quick.

[GERMAIN runs out and returns with them immediately.]

Ger. [Helping BLINVAL on with his hat and coat.] So. And here comes the Widow, too, most opportune.

Blin. Attention, then, and to our posts. Remember, I have been robbed.

ACT. DRAMA.—NOS. 97 & 98.

Enter Mrs. BELMONT.

Mrs. B. [TO GERMAIN.] Is it you, sir, who wish to speak with me?

Ger. Yes, madam, it was I who galloped on joyfully to announce Count Murville, but—oh, heavens!—

Mrs. B. You alarm me. What has befallen him?

Ger. Oh! bitter news! Speak, sir, yourself, for I want words, and—impudence. [Aside.]

Mrs. B. What, is it you, cousin?

Blin. As you perceive, and in no better plight.

[Looking at his dress.]

Mrs. B. What has happened?

Blin. Friendship, love, and anxiety, all urged me to hasten here; unfortunately, a banditti—

Mrs. B. Robbers?

Blin. Stopped me some leagues from this.

Ger. Five minutes later, and I had shared his fate. Oh, terrible!

Mrs. B. Robbers!

TRIO.—BLINVAL, GERMAIN, and Mrs. BELMONT.

Blin. Affection induced me all dangers to brave,

I mounted my horse in the dead of the night.

Ger. This love had nigh shewn him the way to his grave;

When you hear his escape, you'll be seiz'd with affright.

Mrs. B. Such a hazard was wrong.

Ger. But his reasons were strong.

Blin. From the forest they rush'd, full a score at the least—

Ger. How he brags, how he lies! [Aside.]

Blin. Taken thus by surprise—

Mrs. B. Alas! all my fears, my alarms are increas'd.

Blin. With my back to a tree,

At one thrust despatch'd three;

Seventeen with drawn swords remain'd circling me round—

Ger. Seventeen with drawn swords remain'd circling him round.

Mrs. B. Alas! could no aid, could no succour be found?

Such a risk, such a state!

'Faith! his perils were great.

Blin. The blood of six others soon redd'n'd my sword—

Ger. What a bounce, what a lie! [Aside.]

Blin. Not a creature came by—

Mrs. B. Alas! sure, such numbers at last overpower'd.

Blin. With ten wounds gaping wide,

And six thrusts in the side,

I fought till my blood in a torrent was pour'd.

Ger. He fought till his blood in a torrent was pour'd.

Blin. Then faintly I sank, by such odds overpower'd.

Mrs. B. Alas! what a state, by such odds overpower'd!

Blin. Stretched on the ground for dead, the cowards rifled me, but fled on the approach of travellers, who, coming up, gave me every assistance in their power.

Mrs. B. Good heavens! I fear you must have suffered much from the wounds you received. Have you kept your chamber long?

Blin. Hum! I have been a good while confined; haven't I, Germain?

Ger. That you have; I can prove it.

Blin. But, excepting a weakness, no inconvenience follows.

Mrs. B. He is younger than I conceived, well made, and elegant. [Aside.] My last letter must have convinced you I was desirous to have all points explained.

Blin. Oh! we'll explain ourselves off hand. Germain, endeavour to get me some decent clothes; I am ashamed to see myself; I have the appearance—

Ger. Of a mountebank, precisely. [Exit.]

Mrs. B. Now we're alone, we can discourse on business.

Blin. Certainly; but at this moment, I'm so confused; the blows those rascals dealt, have made me so light-headed, so absent—

Mrs. B. Only one thing: it will be right to send a settlement to an attorney's.

Blin. Why, yes, it will be certainly quite right and necessary.

Mrs. B. You consent, then, to keep the farm?

Blin. The farm! Oh! decided. Yes, yes, we'll keep the farm.

Mrs. B. But we must recollect my daughter: she has just claims.

Blin. The greatest possible. She is so beautiful! such a soft, tender air! so interesting, so charming!

Mrs. B. Really! How can you tell all this? Have you seen her?

Blin. Seen her! Yes, I—Oh! no; but I speak from report which is loud in her praise; so, oblige me, and drop the suit.

Mrs. B. Why, you forget—you drop the suit.

Blin. Do I? True, true; but my head's so confused, I can think only of our approaching happiness.

Mrs. B. But I expected, I confess, a man of middle age, and you appear quite young.

Blin. True; I have ever been thought young, and surely, cousin, that's no misfortune.

Mrs. B. No; but as reason and friendship form the basis of our union, though tempted to regard it as a defect, I am willing to hope we shall be both happy. I shall now leave you to give directions for your comfort and accommodation.

Enter GERMAIN.

Germain, that room will be your master's. [Pointing.] Blin. [Aside.] By all that's fortunate, the secret door.

Mrs. B. I'll prepare my daughter to receive you immediately; but recollect, a father-in-law should be grave and sedate. Adieu! [Exit.]

Blin. Allons, Germain! the day's our own. Victory, my boy! I'm grown so grave and steady, they'll not suspect I could invent this trick.

Ger. Steady, with a vengeance! Ah! if you're other than Blinval, I shall look out for the world's end.

Blin. But I'm determined to reform.

Ger. Which way?

Blin. By marrying.

Ger. Why, faith! if anything can tame a man, I believe that may.

Blin. My stars all shine propitious; and every time my presence is required, I'll lock my door, glide to my prison, and whip back, no one the wiser.

Ger. But my master, in the meantime, appears; off goes my livery, and I'm cooped up in your agreeable south tower, for having touched upon the secret spring.

Blin. I shall rejoice in such good company. But see, the sun peeps forth; fogs, mists, and vapours fly: here comes Rosina.

Ger. Then you'll dispense with me; so I'll escape to the more foggy regions, where savoury fumes exhale from the stew-pans, and the jolly butler distributes his rich gifts from the Widow's cellar.

[Exit.]

Enter ROSINA.

Ros. [Aside.] This, then, is my step-father; and I must be respectful, and so forth: so says mamma Heigho!

Blin. [Aside.] She'll be astonished when she perceives the prisoner. [Going towards her.]

Ros. [Starting.] Oh, heavens! Can I believe my eyes? His very features!

Blin. What startles you, my little cousin? have I already the misfortune to displease?

Ros. No, sir; no, certainly not that: but I was struck with the resemblance to a friend; yes, sir, an absent friend, too little known, and, alas! too unfortunate. Pardon me, sir, but my tongue falters, my heart throbs, and my face burns. I must beg to retire. [Going.]

Blin. Don't leave me, coz. [Taking her hand.] Why withdraw your hand? You would not be so coy to my resemblance.

Ros. Oh! yes, I should, because I ought to be so.

Blin. But I shall be your father-in-law soon.

Ros. True; but you are so like this friend, I should think still of him.

Blin. You tremble. Happy Blinval! [Aside.] Ros. Yes, and my heart beats quick, just as it does when I see him.

Blin. And mine just as it does when I see you—I mean your mother. She is like you.

Ros. My mother! Ah! you are as young as your likeness.

Blin. Looks are deceitful. But, Rosina, you must love me, if not for my own sake, for the sake of my likeness.

Ros. Ah! but I don't love him; he is unfortunate, and I feel interested in his fate, that's all.

Blin. You pity him! I'll avow myself at once, and—[Aside.] Dearest Rosina, I—I—[A footstep is heard.] Oh! here's this teasing, amorous Widow; she haunts me. [Aside, and walking about.]

Enter Mrs. BELMONT, with an unfolded note.

Mrs. B. We shall have an addition to our party. Cousin, you'll not object to an old friend of mine, whom I prepare you to esteem.

Blin. A friend of your's? I shall be happy to see him. I wish him at the devil with all my heart. [Aside.]

Mrs. B. An honest, plain, rough Irishman. The laws of his country forbade him, as a catholic, serving in the armies of his own monarch, whom he adores as the father of a great, free, and happy people.

Blin. We have many brave Irish with our troops, all much esteemed: but who is your friend?

Mrs. B. A singular character; eccentric, and, at times, warm to a degree. His employment gives him an appearance of harsh authority, while, in reality, he is mild and humane. After this sketch, you will allow for a rough diamond. He wishes to be introduced to a soldier of your merit, and being within five minutes walk, comes without form—the Governor of the castle.

Blin. [Starting.] Eh! who? the Governor? [Walks about agitated.] All my unlucky planets must have joined. [Aside.]

Mrs. B. Run, haste, Rosina, give directions that the supper suit our guests. [ROSINA, with her eyes fixed on BLINVAL, does not attend.] Why aren't you gone?

Ros. Oh! the resemblance is astonishing.

[Aside, and exit.]

Mrs B. How kind of our good friend, the very first hour you arrive.

Blin. [Still walking about.] Oh, kind! Yes, yes—d—d kind! [Aside.]—kind to a degree; but I'm so dreadfully fatigued after fighting with the robbers, that I feel oppressed with sleep.

Mrs. B. Well, we'll sup early, then.

Blin. But can't we sup alone? On the footing we stand, a third is the devil.

Mrs. B. [Smiling.] We shall have opportunities enough of being tête-à-tête.

Blin. We have so much to say; the farm, the settlements, the attorney, the suit—

Mrs. B. But your head is so confused. However, there is no help, for he is already on the stairs.

Gov. [Without.] Easy, friend, easy; 'sblood! you'll have arm and all; there, hang up my roquelaure, and let the sergeant wait.

Blin. [Aside.] Now impudence stand my ally. There's no alternative.

[Turns on one side, draws up the collar of his coat round his face, pulls his hat over his eyes, and stands with his arms folded.]

Enter the GOVERNOR OF SORRENTO.

Gov. [Speaking as he enters.] If they ask for me here, tell 'em, remember, I'm just gone there, honey. Well, here and I'm come, quicker than my billet which got here first. 'Faith! and the captain will rejoice to be made known to an old veteran who has had some hard knocks to secure him a snug retreat, and a good flask of lachrymæ christi to fight his battles over. Be introducing us, Widow; I must tell him about my last campaign.

Mrs. B. Cousin: our friend, the Governor, cousin. Count Murville! the Governor of the castle.

Blin. [Still with his back to them.] Three thousand, and the enemy thought five, with the advantage of a wood, but his right flank left in the air.

Gov. Eh! what? By Saint Patrick, the most extraordinary fellow! how long will he keep in the air? Hallo! Count Murville, here's our old O'Rourke O'Donnel, Governor of Sorrento, and—wheh! [Whistling.] 'Sblood! he's as deaf as my invalid sergeant of artillery. Och! and you'll have a nice husband.

Blin. [Aside.] Psha! 'tis absurd, and I'll e'en brave the storm.

Mrs. B. Cousin, cousin! our friend, the Governor. How provoking!

Blin. Eh! who? Oh! I beg pardon; I was absorbed in a dull calculation.

Gov. [Advancing.] No excuses, jewel, to our old O'Donnel. [Starts back on seeing his face.] Och! what?—devil burn me!—yet, how could he get from the south tower? the strongest part of the whole castle, sure! Och! it's impossible! haven't I had the keys all under locks in my own room?

Blin. [All this time looks the Governor full in the face, and turns occasionally, with affected surprise, to Mrs. BELMONT.] I'm fortunate in attracting your notice. Pr'ythee, Widow, what can this mean!

Gov. That Count Murville! Hubaboo! Botheration! 'Faith! it's a young wild devil of the death's heads, I have now snug enough there, between four walls, not a stone's throw from us. [Strutting up to him.] Sir, let me tell you, sir, that while O'Rourke O'Donnel governs the castle, he will govern and keep his prisoners safe, though they do break out.

Blin. Ha, ha, ha! Widow, is your friend often thus? What upon earth have I to say to your prisoner? Here I'm Count Murville.

Gov. No, sir—'sblood! here you are—zounds! here you are not Count Murville. Widow, he is as like one of my prisoners as two drops of whisky.

Mrs. B. And this prisoner—

Gov. Is a wild rogue that found the world not wide enough for his mad pranks; and has the happiness of exercising them at his liberty, in a nice room, five yards by ten, in the south tower.

Blin. Ha, ha, ha! And you supposed he'd leaped your barrier, swam the wet ditch, and given your whiskered sentries sleeping draughts.

Gov. Och! he's as safe as bolts, walls, bars, and chains can keep him. Sure, I know that though he stands here just now.

Mrs. B. Ah! poor young man! you treat him too harshly.

Gov. 'Faith! my orders are positive. But I soften as much as possible. Humanity has a command over me strict as the king's, and I obey both masters with pleasure. But this Blinval—

Blin. Blinval! We served in the same corps, and were never asunder; he is as like me as if we'd been twins.

Gov. Twins! Zounds! he's yourself. Well, well, as it's explained, you can't be he, and you're well off: he's in a pretty mess.

Blin. I'm as much grieved and suffer as much as if I were in his place, we were such friends.

Gov. Were you so? 'Faith! I have a mind—but you must take your oath—No, no, I won't be satisfied with that; you must give me your honour.

Blin. What do you mean?

Gov. [To Mrs. B.] I can't be satisfied till I see them both in one spot, standing there, cheek by jowl, like two double cherries. He shall sup here.

Blin. Who?

Gov. Blinval.

Blin. Sup here! Blinval!

Mrs. B. It will be very kind.

Blin. You must not think of it. If it were known—his confinement's so strict—

Gov. 'Faith! and I run some risk; but to oblige a friend—Och! be easy, he shall sup here.

Blin. There will be bloodshed, then; we have quarrelled most furiously.

Gov. Quarrelled! Aha! that's the best news I have heard. It's the sure road to be as thick as mustard. You shall be friends.

Blin. I can never see him.

Gov. You shall be friends.

Blin. We two can't meet.

Gov. Och! be easy; I am the best hand in Italy at an accommodation. Didn't I make up the quarrel at Balmuddery, when honest Pat Holloway had put Captain Noraghan's nose clean out of joint.

Blin. And how had he done that?

Gov. 'Faith! he had squeezed it tight, between his finger and thumb a little.

SONG.—GOVERNOR.

Arrah! what a big nose had the bold Captain Noraghan!

Pat Holloway he pull'd it till he made him to roar again.

Whack fal de diddle! Shoot him through the middle.

Whack fal de diddle! Well-a-day!

Whack fal de diddle! Captain through the middle,

Och! shoot Paddy Holloway.

Both they chose me their seconds, and I gave my word to both;

For second man to two men, is one man that's third to both.

Whack fal de diddle! &c.

We met by a duck-pond; cries bold Captain Nora-ghan,

"Pat Holloway I'll shoot you, you never shall snore again."

Whack fal de diddle! &c.

The Captain miss'd Pat, for it was not a lucky shot, Pat Holloway fired next, and a very fine duck he shot.

Whack fal de diddle! &c.

Then I stepp'd in between 'em; 'twas full time to take it up;

For a duel now is one shot a-piece, and then make it up.

Whack fal de diddle! Shoot him through the middle.

Whack fal de diddle! Well-a-day!

Whack fal de raddle! Shake each other's daddle, And fast friends they walk'd away. [Exit.

Blin. [Aside.] I've no alternative; back to my prison.

Mrs. B. How happy this will make poor Blinval! Come, you must oblige me and be reconciled; it is my first request, and I insist on your compliance.

Blin. Insist, madam! My injured honour brooks no interference. Seek not to thwart me; some dreadful consequences might ensue, some consequences you cannot foresee. Insist, madam! I wish you a good night. [Rushes into the bed-chamber, and locks the door.]

Mrs. B. What madness and rudeness! I thought in Murville to have found mildness and sensibility. Oh! man, man! tax us not with deceit, when in your own proud sex there's such a proof of the wide difference between professions and actions.

Enter ROSINA.

Ros. Alone, madam! where is your company?

Mrs. B. Oh! Count Murville has retired to his apartment for the night.

Ros. He is unwell, then; poor young man!

Mrs. B. No, no; he is quite well; but he chose to retire.

Ros. Sure, that's a little ungallant. Then our nice supper's of no use.

Mrs. B. His place will be supplied. The Governor conceives there's a resemblance between Murville and one of his prisoners, and is gone for the captive.

Ros. What, the gay prisoner in the tower? Oh! there's a great resemblance; so striking! there's no mistaking it.

Mrs. B. Indeed! Pray, Rosina, how came you to remark it?

Ros. [Embarrassed.] I heard it. Ah! dear madam, I'll tell you all: every evening I've seen the prisoner from the staircase balcony. I have sat there whole hours to hear him sing. He bewails his captivity. Complains that all the world forsakes him, except me. Could I hear this and not be sorry for his fate?

Mrs. B. Rosina, your simplicity affects me; to pity him in his distress is amiable; but to love him would be imprudent. Be cautious, then, Rosina; nor sully with a fault one of the heart's best virtues—compassion for the unfortunate.

SONG.—MRS. BELMONT.

*From pity's power thou need'st not fly;
The tear she sheds adorns the eye;
And when down beauty's cheek it flows,
More bright its radiant crimson glows.*

*But there's a sigh, and there's a tear,
That bids youth's roses disappear;
Beware lest thine their influence prove,
Beware lest pity turn to love.*

*That tear is love's, and love's that sigh;
They fade the cheek, they dim the eye.*

*Ah! let not, then, thy artless bloom
In sighs and tears so dire consume.*

*Then, if thy heart tumultuous beat
Whene'er thine eyes yon captive's meet,
Away, nor more such danger prove,
For soon thy pity would be love.*

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—Blinval's Room in the Prison. A large stone seen rolled from one corner of a trap-door, and open opposite to it; the ordinary prison door closed and secured by iron plates, large nails, &c. The tables and chairs in confusion, a bureau overturned and broken.

Enter BLINVAL by the trap-door. He hurries in, rolls the stone back, and puts the tables and chairs in their places.

Blin. There, then, I'm safe. Now, Mr. Governor, one instant to derange this mad head, and I'm at your service. [Pulls his hair out of form, and gives as much disorder as he can to his appearance. A clanking heard of a chain.] Hark! Oh! my old buck, I must have had a few dips in the Shannon, too, not to outwit your excellence.

[Walks about in a melancholy manner with his arms crossed.]

Enter the GOVERNOR OF SORRENTO.

Gov. Och! and you're there. Well, then, I'm an old blockhead, and that's all. You may go back. [To the Guard outside.] Ah! what, my little Kill Colonel! Well, but what makes you so dismal? Don't be faint-hearted, boy; joy sometimes penetrates even the walls of a prison.

Blin. Joy! You are too generous, too much a man of honour, to add the pangs of railleury to my distress. Am I released?

Gov. 'Faith! and who told it you? Fair and softly; only six months, and tired so soon! That's no great compliment I must confess.

Blin. Psha! why, then, am I thus teased.

[Dashes down one of the chairs in a passion.]

Gov. And is there any other part of the king's furniture you would like to destroy? Pray, make as free as with your own.

Blin. I beg pardon; you've been very kind to me, Governor; you've been very kind.

Gov. Och! my dear boy, not a word more, I would attend you to the scaffold with the greatest pleasure imaginable; only don't break the furniture, that's all. But I've some pleasure in reserve: there's an old friend hard by, though you've quarrelled, and you shall sup with him to-night; I am determined you shall be reconciled; and, though Murville—

Blin. [With affected surprise.] Murville! I esteem him more than I can express; but I cannot forget having cheated him out of a fine girl. It was my fault; we are so alike, I easily passed in his place.

Gov. Like! 'Slife! but you had the same father. How it happened that's not my business, but you're brothers, or I'm not governor. Come, shall we march?

Blin. Willingly; and if you bring us together, you will have worked a miracle.

Gov. Hubaboo! honey, leave all to me. 'Faith! I'll not rest till you are face to face.

Blin. Then your rest's gone in this world, take my word.

Gov. Allons, donc. Nous verrons. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—Mrs. Belmont's.

Enter Mrs. BELMONT and ROSINA, GERMAIN following.

Mrs. B. Acquaint your master, Count Murville, and from me, that the sooner he attends to his affairs elsewhere, the better. It must be equally unpleasant to us both while he remains.

Ger. Dear, dear! was there ever such an unlucky son of Adam? [Aside.]—Most honoured madam, my master would break my head if I were so impertinent; and you yourself—Lovers' quarrels are, you know, madam—[goes to the bed-room, and tries the door]—Lord! it's no use; I could as soon get at—even the prisoner in the south tower.

Mrs. B. Well, when the Governor comes, we shall see.

Ger. [Alarmed.] The—the—the what, ma'am? Didn't you say the Governor?

Mrs. B. Certainly. What can that be to you?

Ger. Oh! nothing, ma'am; nothing to me.—[Aside.] Here's a cursed scrape—But I have such a kind of a sort of a dread of a prison ever since an old hag of a gipsy told me I should live to be hanged.—[Aside.] And, if I could make him hear—And, madam, the very name [loud] of a Governor makes my teeth chatter, madam.

Mrs. B. Well, well, you may retire. Desire my people to take care of you; and, when your master chooses to appear, you shall be called.

Ger. Truly, most benevolent lady, I most punctually obey your orders. What, ho! Gaspard, Diego, Jaufrou! here, you must take care of me.

[Gets near the bed-room door, and calls loudly, "The Governor's coming. Some more champagne."—As he goes out, he meets BLINVAL and the GOVERNOR OF SORRENTO entering: BLINVAL in his hussar jacket. GERMAIN starts back, and BLINVAL catches his arm, and threatens him.

Blin. [Speaking as he enters.] Ah! my head's giddy with confinement. I feel oppressed with the pure air.

Ros. It is the prisoner.

Mrs. B. The resemblance is striking.

Ger. [Aside.] The resemblance! then all is safe. [Advancing to BLINVAL.] Ah! sir, I am glad to see you.

Gov. [Putting him back.] And who the devil told you to be glad? Arrah! stand back, or I'll—stand back, I say! Ladies, I bring you a recluse, who, for some time, has virtuously renounced the fickle vanities and false allurements of this life; and, like most penitents, per force.

Blin. Past troubles are but as dreams, and this blessed moment [looking at ROSINA] cheaply purchased by ages of captivity.

Gov. But where's Muirville? Surely, he's not obstinate still.

Blin. I was in hopes a difference in our youth—

Gov. 'Slife! and my government. Scarcely an hour passes without such disputes at a mess dinner; 'faith, and they're commoner than toasts, ay, and pass off as quickly.

Mrs. B. He refuses all overtures.

[The GOVERNOR and Mrs. B. talk apart.

Blin. I lament it; but my misfortunes and my acknowledgments must, in the end, prevail.

Ros. [Aside.] Charming young man! What a good heart.—[To BLINVAL, first in a fluttering voice, then more firmly.] I really tremble when I reflect, sir, how you have suffered in that ugly tower.

Blin. My captivity would have been insupportable, but I was soothed by such an agreeable object.

Ros. [Aside.] Heigho! I hope that agreeable object presented itself from my balcony.

Gov. [Advancing with Mrs. B.] Shut up! But it sha'n't be; I am determined to see whether they be the same person, as they stand separately face to face.

Mrs. B. [Smiling.] Your prisoner appears younger.

Ros. He has a softer voice.

Gov. 'Faith! and I see no difference. But I'll not stir till he comes out; and, if he won't capitulate, by your leave, Widow, we must proceed to storm.

QUARTETTO.—MRS. BELMONT, BLINVAL, and ROSINA.

Gov. Knock, knock, knock;

Knock at his door. Knock, thunder away!

[They all knock loudly at the door.

The Governor commands, his voice obey.

Blin. I doubt him much, but soon you'll see
He'll ne'er come face to face with me;
Yet on the watch he's forc'd to keep,
While Blinval wakes—he'll never sleep.

Gov. A headstrong devil, won't he stir?

[Knocking]
High time, I swear, this strife to close!
Peep from your covert, surely—
The Governor must interpose.

[Knocking.]

Ros. & Our joint endeavours must prevail,

Mrs. B. When we request, he can't refuse;
Their enmity's of no avail;

They must be friends, they can't but choose.

Blin. Be silent, friends, his voice I hear.

All. He answers—listen, listen—so.

Be silent! draw, with caution, near.

Be silent—

Blin. Hark! He answers—No.

Ros. He doesn't stir—I'm sure 'tis so.

Blin. Be satisfied, he answers—No.

Ros. Did you hear him? [To Mrs. BELMONT.]

Mrs. B. No. Did you hear him?

Gov. No. Did you hear him?

Blin. No.

Ros. He didn't stir—I'm sure 'tis so.

Blin. Be satisfied, he answers—No.

Mrs. B.

Gov. } He didn't stir—I'm sure 'tis so.

Ros.

Blin. Be satisfied, he answers—No.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—An Apartment at Mrs. Belmont's. A table spread with wines and a dessert.

The GOVERNOR, Mrs. BELMONT, ROSINA, and BLINVAL in his own character, seated at supper.

Gov. 'Faith, and upon my honour, but it's the most extraordinary thing I ever saw, either in England, Ireland, or all Italy. Such an obstinate mule! Oh! if I had him for a few weeks in the castle!

Blin. Things more unlikely have happened

Gov. Well, let me catch him there, and he shall be in charity with all mankind before I let him loose. There's nothing on the whole earth so bad as obstinacy! I'm resolved never to quit this spot till he comes from that room. If I give up this point, it will be for the first time since I was christened by my surname O'Flagherty.

Blin. He will no more come from that room than I shall—who sit here.

Gov. Then, by your leave, Widow, here I'm posted. He shall come out, by the god of war!

Enter the Corporal of the Guard.

Now what the devil brings your impudence into this house?

Corp. Governor, a stranger's arrived, and brings orders about the prisoner Blinval.

Gov. Ah! this looks serious. [They all rise.] 'Faith, my young gentleman, I am concerned; but you must make up your mind to the worst; and, for the present, back to the south tower.

Ros. I'm distressed at this cross accident.

Blin. Indeed! then I'm happy.—Blinval is not indifferent. [Aside.]

Gov. Come, come, this is all very pleasant; but we've no time to lose. You must give up the ladies for the corporal.

Mrs. B. Through the indulgence of the Governor, we shall soon meet.

Gov. Oh! I'll be as indulgent as you please. Corporal, conduct the prisoner to the guard-room, and bid your officer lodge him safe in the south tower, and post a sentry at his door. I'll follow presently. [Exit BLINVAL and Corporal.]

It's a bad business, I'm afraid. Drawn on his Colonel! breach of subordination. Charge upon charge! These young fellows are so hot-brained, they think a dash of bravery comprises all military duties; it's the least part. Who obeys best, best commands, too; that is the soldier's creed. But this Murville—I'm resolved to keep up the blockade: here I'm posted.

Ros. Heigho!

Gov. 'Sblood! my fair violet, what makes you say "heigho!" Oh! if I could but knock off thirty of these hard years, 'faith, I'd soon change your note.

Mrs. B. [Smiling.] You'd have no chance.

Gov. No chance! 'Slife! but an honest Irish heart is worth the conquest. [ROSINA shakes her head, and sighs.] Again! Widow, the little blind urchin has been at work. Come, child, confess what happy name would have been wafted on that deep-drawn sigh: make me your confidant, and you'll find me a good ally.

Mrs. B. Rosina, child, the Governor is an old friend; your confidence will be well placed.—

[During the end of this dialogue, the bed-room door opens, and BLINVAL with the great-coat on, disguised as MURVILLE, peeps through, stealing in quietly, and unperceived by any of the party.

Gov. And has this lover of your's, my little dear, no name?

Blin. Oh! yes, yes, yes: he has a name, and I know it. [They all turn round towards BLINVAL.]

Gov. Och! Are you there at last, Mr. Murville? Come, if you please; you shall just step with me to the castle, where you shall shake hands with my prisoner; and let me see you both in the same person, and together, and then I will believe you are not him. [BLINVAL creeps back to the bed-chamber, and nearly gains the door, when the GOVERNOR perceiving his intention, catches his arm, and brings him back.]—No, honey, no! not quite so young. You must come fairly, or I shall call the guard.

Blin. [Struggling.] Sir, do you know, I am—

Gov. [Holding him.] Och! now be asy, friend, it is to know whether you are my prisoner or yourself; and to make you both come together, while you are separate, that I oblige you with my company to the south tower. So, now be asy, or I must call the guard. Come, come—och! to be sure, now, and you're not friends.

Blin. Well, sir—[Aside.] Zounds! what shall I hit on now?—Well, sir, I'll attend you; I'll follow—follow you presently.

Gov. Follow! 'Faith, in my country, friends always link themselves so doatingly—so, if you please, I must desire your arm.

[Keeps hold of BLINVAL, and drags him off.]

Mrs. B. [Having been previously talking apart with ROSINA.] Rosina, I must now have some serious talk with you. Follow me to my dressing-room, and look for the indulgence of a fond mother, if I experience the candour and truth of a dutiful child. [Exit.]

Ros. Ah! my heart beats so quick! If I could steal for an instant to my balcony, and catch one good, fair view—But my mamma needn't mind poor Blinval, he will soon be removed.—These despatches make me tremble. Oh! if I could but steal him fairly from that ugly tower, they should never see him again.

SONG.—ROSINA.

Together, then, we'd fondly stray,
O'er meadows green, thro' woodlands deep,
Rejoicing view the lambskins play,
And in the gurgling streamlet peep:
No cankering cares our sleep molest,
No frowning gaoler part;
Above the world, supremely blest,
His throne Rosina's heart.
From haunts of surly man we'd fly,
My pris'ner safe I'd guard;
Secure from envy's prying eye,
And love our bright reward.
For him I'd cull Pomona's store,
Nor from his side depart;
Thus bless'd, could Blinval ask for more?
His throne Rosina's heart. [Erit.]

SCENE II.—Blinval's Apartment in the prison. The stone is so removed as just to admit of the possibility of his passing. A lamp burning on the table. The camp bed, near the secret avenue. Curtains drawn close and opposite to the common entrance.

Gov. [Without.] Well, well! I shall be satisfied in a moment. Sentry, your prisoner's safe?

Sent. [Without.] All's well!

Gov. Safe, you say; all's well? Corporal, post your guard on the stairs, and let nobody pass.

[The keys are heard turning, the bars removing and the chains falling, &c.]

Enter the GOVERNOR OF SORRENTO holding BLINVAL, who is wrapped in his surtout.

Come, Come—'Faith! and you've been more tractable than I had hoped—But what makes you tremble? [BLINVAL appears smothering a laugh.] Oh! he's a mighty, pretty, well-behaved, civil spoken fellow, and will make you any apology you please.—[Looking round.] Hallo! Why, 'sblood and ouns! where has he hidden himself? Zounds! is it possible? Oh! no, no, no; he must be gone to bed. Stand here a moment, Count, while I wake him. [Goes towards the bed. BLINVAL watches his opportunity; and, at the instant the GOVERNOR has reached the bed, whips off the great-coat, throws it into the opening behind the stone, which he moves back to its right place, concealing the trap-door, and slips behind the bed, and into it.]—Ay, ay, poor devil! he has just laid down to take a comfortable bit of a nap. Blinval, Blinval! 'Faith, he sleeps like a top! Who'd think a man could sleep sound in misfortune? Blinval! [Throwing open the curtains.]

Blin. [Putting his head from the bed.] What do you want?

Gov. Och! and you're there! Well, and why did you not spake out, when you first saw my voice in your sleep?

Blin. [Coming forward.] What can this mean? Governor, let me tell you, your behaviour, to a man in distress, is inexcusable. Why am I thus tormented, sir? Leave me this instant, I insist!

Gov. Leave you! Faith and be asy, boy! Haven't I brought Murville? You shall be friends—[Turning to the spot where he had left BLINVAL.] Why, zounds! how! that other fellow is off!—There, I see him! Hallo! Sentry, sergeant, corporal! bring him back here.

Enter Corporal.

Why did you let that fellow pass, and not shoot him for forcing you? You a soldier! I'll have you all at the halberts, or I am not Governor, by St Patrick!

Cor. Governor, no one passed us.

Gov. [Raising his cane.] Ah! and get out with your d—d lies! Didn't I see him here, through my own eyes? And didn't I see the tail of his brown coat, as he skipped through the door? Make yourself scarce, or I shall break my cane over your d—d thick head. [Advances on the Corporal, who runs off.] Well, well, you shall meet yet; I'll not be treated so by any Count in the kingdom! I'll after him this instant; ay, and he shall give me the satisfaction of a gentleman, when he has made friends with you, which shall be here, here, and before you're shot. Erit.

Blin. Governor! Governor! [Following him.] Huzza! I'm safe again. Love is like hunger, and will break through stone walls.

[Watches the GOVERNOR fairly out. When the prison door closes, listens a moment, then runs to the moveable stone, pulls it away, and exit through the trap door.]

SCENE III.—A Grove leading to the Castle.

Enter GERMAIN, stealing along in silence and alarmed.

Ger Oh, dear! oh, dear! All must out now, and the reward of my labour will be bestowed with interest. Germain, thou art a fool; and a court-martial would decide it, and I'll prove it. "Gentlemen, the prisoner was a free man; and, for fifty louis, he abetted, assisted, connived at, and advised Lieutenant Blinval, of the death's-head hussars, then and there prisoner in the castle—[Starting, and looking round.]—to represent the Count Murville"—Oh, lord! oh, lord! Talk of the devil, and he's at your elbow. [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—The outside of the Castle; an antique building, with four towers, enclosed by a wet ditch. A draw-bridge up; cannon mounted, &c. A view across the Bay of Naples, Mount Vesuvius in the distance. The scene is by moonlight, and the reflection thrown upon the water. A Sentinel placed upon the ramparts.

Enter Count MURVILLE in the same uniform as BLINVAL's, the dress jacket of an hussar officer, and the cloak on the shoulder. He views the castle with attention, and then comes forward.

Mur. Here, then, I am at last; and with the pardon I had despaired of obtaining. His warm temper hurried Blinval into an act, which, though excusable in a young man, is death to a soldier. I can, in my turn, now give life. Yes, to the generous feelings of a monarch I am indebted for success, when interest and court favour failed. Blinval, how rich the gift! First, I'll embrace my friend; see him at liberty; then fly to my cousin, and seek that settled happiness her character bids me expect.

Enter GERMAIN.

Ger. [Aside, stealing forward.] Not quite so fast, or I'm ruined.—[To MURVILLE.] Sir, you're welcome. I have obeyed all your orders; nay, sir, exceeded them, in my impatience to oblige—[Aside.] myself: no lie there.

Mur. Germain, I have no doubt of your fidelity. I am expected, then?

Ger. No, sir, not yet; and if you could delay your visit for a short time, all things would be better arranged; at present, sir, the apartment, which has been occupied, is not ready; and—and—in short, sir, you are not expected yet.

Mur. This appears strange.—However, I have more serious business at present. Attend me here; I shall despatch you with a message in a few moments.

Ger. [Aside.] Serious business! Dear, dear! that's so lucky! If I can keep him at an inn all night, there will be time for invention.

Mur. [Pulling out his watch.] This loitering Governor! Could I impart to him my feeling and anxiety, he would be swift, indeed; but the scenes that he is accustomed to, deaden his sensibility.—[The drawbridge is lowered.] Hark! the bridge lowers; then there are some hopes.

Ger. [Aside.] Hopes! Oh! that I could but creep into a snail's house to escape. He'll have discovered all, and I shall live to see the gipsy's prophecy fulfilled—I shall be hanged!

Enter the GOVERNOR OF SORRENTO from the Castle, followed by the Lieutenant and an Officer; when they are on the bridge, the GOVERNOR directs the Officer to return to the Castle; the bridge is again raised, and the GOVERNOR and the Lieutenant come forward to MURVILLE.

Mur. I presume, sir, the Governor?

Gov 'Faith, sir, you have guessed right. I am

O'Rourke O'Flagherty of the kingdom, and, as you say, governor of the castle. You have despatches from Naples.

Mur. For the release of one of your state prisoners: I have the packet in my hand.

Gov. Welcome, sir, to Sorrento. I am seldom so pleased as when I wish my old acquaintances a good journey; though they are never grateful enough to wish to pay me a second visit.

Mur. I'm impatient to afford you that enjoyment. Here are my orders; inspect them. Here's the king's seal; they are correct.

[Delivering despatches.

Gov. [Reading.] "Blinval!"—Och! I am rejoiced—But we lose time. Lower the bridge!—Come, sir; a man's liberty must not be trifled with.

Ger. [Who has been skulking about with signs of fear.—Aside.] Oh! then, all's safe.—[Runs up to the bridge.] Hallo! within! Are you all deaf? Lower the bridge.

TRIO AND CHORUS.—The GOVERNOR, MURVILLE, and GERMAIN.

Lower the bridge, what hoa! attend.

Lower the bridge—

Officer. Who's there?

Gov. & Ger. } A friend

[The bridge is lowered again.

Gov. The strictest discipline, you see,
Within Sorrento's castle reigns:
My rule is—regularity,
And I'm rewarded for my pains.

[When the bridge is down, a guard comes from the Castle, leaving a sentinel at the other side of the bridge, and returns again into the Castle.

Officer. Advance! The countersign!

[The GOVERNOR makes signs to MURVILLE and GERMAIN to remain still.

Gov. Rochelle!

[Going to the Officer.

Officer. Correct! Pass friends, and all is well.

Gov. Lieutenant, hasten, Blinval's free.

[Giving the keys to the Lieutenant.

Mur. & Gov. } Fly! soothe his anxious mind to peace.

Gov. Roar like a lion—liberty!

Mur. & Gov. } Fly, quick, and hasten his release!

Mur. Tell him a friend, whose life he sav'd,
Has joyous tidings to impart.

Gov. Tell him he's been so well behav'd,
He's my permission to depart.

[Exit the Lieutenant over the bridge into the Castle, ordering the Officer from the ramparts to follow him.

Gov. Och! honey sweet, what joys we feel—

Mur. Transporting moment! yes, I feel—

Ger. I'm glad he's free, but still I feel—

Gov. When gratitude the bosom warms.

Mur. A generous act the bosom warms.

Ger. Some symptoms strong of fierce alarms.

Gov. Its glowing ardour you reveal.

Mur. Ah! could my tongue my joys reveal—

Ger. Ah! could my tongue my fears reveal—

Gov. Humanity, how bright thy charms!

Mur. & Ger. } 'Twould soon destroy those fancied charms.

Enter the Officer from the Castle.

Officer. Escap'd, escap'd! the pris'ner's fled!

[Exit GERMAIN, hastily.

The southern tower we've search'd in vain.

Gov. Oh, heaven! am I alive or dead?

Mur. Some mystery—

Gov. Some trick, 'tis plain!

To arms, to arms! Post sentries round!

[An alarm, flourish of drums, &c.

Officer. Each avenue, each opening guard!

Gov. Alive or dead, I'll have him found.

His slippery tricks I'll soon reward.

Enter Soldiers from the Castle.

To arms, to arms! the pris'ner's fled!

He must be found, alive or dead!

[All the Soldiers go off; but one party returns, bringing in GERMAIN.

Chorus. As now we search'd the castle round,

This fellow lurking near we found:

His guilty looks declare that he

Has help'd to set our pris'ner free.

Ger. I nothing know—in truth, 'tis so!

If he got free,

What's that to me?

I'm innocent, so let me go.

Chorus. March! The dungeon straight prepare:

He, for life, shall languish there.

Treachery was his intent;

Now he meets his punishment.

Ger. Oh! dear, good Mr. Governor, don't cram me into that abominable black castle, and I'll confess all.

Gov. Confess! Oh, ho! Then you begin to squeak, do you?

Mur. Scoundrel! And have you been accessory to his escape?

Ger. Why, lord, sir, he had escaped before I had any hand in the business.

Mur. Explain.

Ger. Why, you must know, then, that there's a secret communication between his prison and the Widow Belmont's. He has been burrowing under ground, and playing at bo-peep between the two buildings like a rabbit in a warren.

Gov. Has he so? 'Faith, then, I'll have my ferrets after him, and they'll soon bring him out. Corporal, take a guard, and go to the Widow Belmont's, and recover the prisoner.—[Exit Corporal with Guards.]—So, then, this singular gentleman has been cutting himself in half, and has been a double man after all. Then it was him I saw at the Widow's, and not Count Murville.

Mur. You certainly never saw Count Murville there; for I am he, and never yet entered her doors; but his reason for personating me I am at a loss to guess.

Ger. Love was his reason, sir. Love, you know, sir, will change a man into anything; and if Miss Rosina be not as much inclined to the prisoner as the prisoner is to her, I know nothing of the tender passion.

Gov. Och! then, the little blind boy, Master Cupid, has been at work with them.

Enter Mrs. BELMONT and ROSINA.

Mrs. B. Governor, what is all this? The confusion in my house—your guard—the—

Gov. Be aisy, Widow, be aisy! Here comes one that will clear up all.

Enter BLINVAL, guarded.

So, Mr. Proteus! 'Faith, and you're trapped! What, then, you put the Governor, and all his chains, bolts, bars, and sentries, at defiance. Eh! here you have this pickle, your cousin; but, give me leave, I must make known the real Murville. [Presents him to Mrs. BELMONT.] And that whipstart is my recluse of the south tower. Pretty, sweet innocent! see how demure he seems.

Ros. [Advancing.] Blinval! Oh! I'm so glad!

Mur. My dear Blinval! give me your hand, and let me give you joy of the pardon which I have obtained for you, and just delivered to the Governor.

Blin. My pardon! Huzza! My dear friend! I will, then, confess that—

Mur. You may spare yourself that trouble, for Germain has told us all. Cousin, my friend Blinval has had the ingenuity to find a secret communication from his prison to that apartment; and I believe your fair daughter made him explore it. The state is benefitted by the discovery; but he deserves to be made prisoner for life. Will you consent? Rosina has forged them, and he is, I dare be sworn, ready to hug his chains.

Mrs. B. I have had proofs of my daughter's attachment, and if she'll venture on such a prison-breaker—She's her own mistress. [BLINVAL goes up to ROSINA, who retires bashfully to Mrs. BELMONT.]

Nay, my child, you have my consent. Lock up his heart; and, like the Governor, temper your sway with gentleness.

FINALE.

Blin. *From Sorrento's prison free,
Prisoner here for life, I'll be!
Let not foes our bliss annoy,
Smile, good friends, and wish us joy.*

Chorus. Let not foes our bliss annoy, &c.

Ros. *Cupid's captives, void of pain,
Willing wear the marriage chain;
Hymen's fetters pleasing prove,
When the links are forg'd by love.*

Chorus. Let not foes, &c.

Gov. *Here has been a fine to-do!
One has all this while been two:
When the parson's work is done,
Two will certainly be one.*

Chorus. *When the parson's work is done,
Two will certainly be one.*

*From Sorrento's prison free,
Pris'ner here for life he'll be:
Let not foes our bliss annoy,
Smile, good friends, and wish us joy.*

[Exeunt.]

THE CONTRIVANCES;

A BALLAD OPERA, IN ONE ACT;

BY HENRY CAREY.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

ROVEWELL
ARGUS HEARTY
ROBIN.

ARETHUSA
BETTY.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—Rovewell's Lodgings.

ROBIN discovered.

Robin. Well, though pimping is the most honourable and profitable of all professions, it is certainly the most dangerous and fatiguing; but of all fatigues there's none like following a virtuous mistress. There's not one letter I carry, but I run the risk of kicking, caning, or pumping; nay, often hanging.

Let me see: I have committed three burglaries to get one letter to her. Now, if my master should not get the gipseys at last, I have ventured my sweet person to a fair purpose. But, basta! here comes my master and his friend Mr. Hearty. I must hasten and get our disguises,

*And if dame Fortune fail us now to win her,
Oh! all ye gods above! the devil's in her.* [Exit.]

Enter ROVEWELL and HEARTY.

Hearty. Why so melancholy, Captain? Come, come, a man of your gaiety and courage should never take a disappointment so much to heart.

Rove. 'Sdeath! to be prevented when I had brought my design so near perfection!

Hearty. Were you less open and daring in your attempts, you might hope to succeed. The old gentleman, you know, is cautious to a degree; his daughter is under a strict confinement: would you use more of the fox than the lion, fortune, perhaps, might throw an opportunity in your way. But you must have patience.

Rove. Who can have patience when danger is so near? Read this letter, and then tell me what room there is for patience.

Hearty. [Reads.] "To-morrow will prevent all our vain struggles to get to each other. I am then to be married to my eternal aversion; you know the fop, 'tis Cuckoo, who, having a large estate, is forced upon me; but my heart can be none but Rowewell's. Immediately after the receipt of this, meet Betty at the old place; there is yet one invention left; if you pursue it closely, you may, perhaps, release her who would be your—Arethusa."

Rove. Yes, Arethusa, I will release thee, or die in the attempt. Dear friend, excuse my rudeness; you know the reason.

AIR.—ROVEWELL.

*I'll face ev'ry danger
To rescue my dear,
For fear is a stranger
Where love is sincere.
Repulses but fire us,
Despair we despise,
If beauty inspire us
To pant for the prize.* [Exit.]

Hearty. Well, go thy way, and get her; for thou deservest her, o'my conscience. How have I been deceived in this boy! I find him the very reverse of what his step-mother represented him; and am now sensible it was only her ill usage that forced my child away. His not having seen me since he was five years old, renders me a perfect stranger to him: under that pretence I have got into his acquaintance, and find him all I wish. If this plot of his fail, I believe my money must buy him the girl at last. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Chamber in Argus's House.

ARETHUSA discovered.

AIR.—ARETHUSA.

*See, the radiant queen of night
Sheds on all her kindly beams;
Gilds the plains with cheerful light,
And sparkles in the silver streams.
Smiles adorn the face of nature,
Tasteless all things yet appear,
Unto me a hopeless creature,
In the absence of my dear.*

Enter ARGUS.

Argus. Pray, daughter, what lingo is that same you chant and sputter out at this rate?

Are. English, sir.

Argus. English, quotha! adod! I took it to be nonsense.

Are. 'Tis a hymn to the moon.

Argus. A hymn to the moon! I'll have none of your hymns in my house. Give me the book, housewife.

Are. I hope, sir, there is no crime in reading a harmless poem.

Argus. Give me the book, I say: poems, with a plague! what are they good for, but to blow up the fire of love, and make young wenches wanton? But I have taken care of you, mistress; for to-morrow you shall have a husband to stay your stomach, and no less a person than 'Squire Cuckoo.

Are. You will not, surely, be so cruel as to marry me to a man I cannot love.

Argus. Why, what sort of a man would you have, Mrs. Minx?

AIR.—ARETHUSA.

*Genteel in personage,
Conduct, and equipage,
Noble by heritage,
Generous and free.
Brave, not romantic;
Learn'd, not pedantic;
Frolic, not frantic;
This must be he.*

*Honour maintaining,
Meanness disdainings,
Still entertaining,
Engaging, and new.
Neat, but not finical;
Sage, but not cynical;
Never tyrannical;
But ever true.*

Argus. Why, is not Mr. Cuckoo all this? Adod! he's a brisk young fellow, and a little feather-bed doctrine will soon put the Captain out of your head; and to put you out of his power, you shall be given over to the 'squire to-morrow.

Are. Surely, sir, you will, at least, defer it one day.

Argus. No, nor one hour. To-morrow morning, at eight of the clock, precisely. In the meantime, take notice, the 'squire's sister is hourly expected; so, pray, do you be civil and sociable with her, and let me have none of your pouts and glouts, as you tender my displeasure. [Exit.]

Are. To-morrow is short warning; but we may be too cunning for you yet, old gentleman.

Enter BETTY.

Oh! Betty, welcome a thousand times! What news? have you seen the Captain?

Betty. Yes, madam; and if you were to see him in his new rigging, you'd split your sides with laughing. Such a hoyden! such a piece of country stuff, you never set your eyes on! But the petticoats are soon thrown off; and if good luck attend us, you may easily conjure Miss Malkin, the 'squire's sister, into your own dear Captain.

Are. But when will they come?

Betty. Instantly, madam; he only stays to settle matters for our escape. He's in deep consultation with his privy-counsellor Robin, who is to attend him in the quality of a country put. They'll both be here in a moment; so, let's in, and pack up the jewels, that we may be ready at once to leap into the saddle of liberty, and ride full speed to your desires.

Are. Dear Betty, let's make haste; I think every moment an age till I'm free from this bondage.

AIR.—ARETHUSA.

*When parents obstinate and cruel prove,
And force us to a man we cannot love,
'Tis fit we disappoint the sordid elves,
And wisely get us husbands for ourselves.*

[A knocking without.]

Betty. There they are; in, in. [Exeunt.]

Enter ARGUS.

Argus. You're woundy hasty, methinks, to knock at that rate. This is certainly some courtier come to borrow money; I know it by the saucy rapping of the footman. Who's at the door?

Robin. [Without.] Tummos.

Argus. Tummos! who's Tummos? Who would you speak with, friend?

Robin. [Without.] With young master's vather-in-law, that mun be, Master Hardguts.

Argus. And what's your business with Master Hardguts?

Robin. [Without.] Why, young mistress is come out o'the country to see brother's wife that mun be, that's all.

Argus. O!so! the 'squire's sister; I'm sorry I made her wait so long.

SCENE III.—A Chamber.

Enter ARGUS, introducing ROVEWELL, in woman's clothes, followed by ROBIN, as a clown.

Argus. Save you, fair lady, you're welcome to town. [ROVEWELL curtsies.] A very modest maiden, truly. How long have you been in town?

Robin. Why, an hour and a bit or so; we just put up horses at King's Arms yonder, and stayed a crum to zee poor things feed, for your London ostlers give little enough to poor beasts; an' you stond not by 'em yourzel, and zee 'em fed, as soon as your back's turned, adod! they'll cheat you afore your face.

Argus. Why, how now, Clodpate? are you to speak before your mistress, and with your hat on, too? Is that your country breeding?

Robin. Why, an' 'tis on, 'tis on; an' 'tis off, 'tis off: what cares Tummos for your false-hearted London compliments? An' you'd have an answer from young mistress, you mun look to Tummos; for she's so main bashful, she never speaks one word but her prayers, and thos'n so softly that nobody can hear her.

Argus. I like her the better for that; silence is a heavenly virtue in a woman, but very rare to be found in this wicked place. Have you seen your brother, pretty lady, since you came to town? [ROVEWELL curtsies.] Oh! miraculous modesty! would all women were thus! Can't you speak, madam?

[ROVEWELL curtsies again.]

Robin. An' you get a word from her, 'tis more nor she has spoken to us these fourscore and seven long miles; but young mistress will prate fast enough, an' you set her among your women folk.

Argus. Say'st thou so, honest fellow? I'll send her to those that have tongue enough, I'll warrant you. Here, Betty!

Enter BETTY.

Take this young lady to my daughter; 'tis 'Squire Cuckoo's sister; and, d'ye hear? make much of her, I charge you.

Betty. Yes, sir. Please to follow me, madam.

Rove. [Aside to ROBIN.] Now, you rogue, for a lie an hour and a half long, to keep the old fellow in suspense. [Exit with BETTY.]

Robin. Well, master, don't you think my mistress a dainty young woman? She's wonderfully benimred in our country for her shapes.

Argus. Oh! she's a fine creature, inaeed! But where's the 'squire, honest friend?

Robin. Why, one cannot find a man out in this same Londonshire, there are so many taverns and chocking-houses; you may as well seek a needle in a hay fardel, as they say'n i' the country. I was at 'squire's lodging yonder, and there was nobody but a prate-apace whoreson of a footboy, and he told me maister was at chocking-house, and all the while the vixen 'did nothing but tawnt and laugh at me: eood! I could have found in my heart to have gi'n him a good whirrit in the chops. So I went to one chocking-house, and t'other chocking-house, till I was quite weary; and I could see nothing but a many people supping hot suppings, and reading your gazing papers: we had much ado to find out your worship's house; the vixen boys set us o' thic side, and that side, till we were almost quite lost; an' it were not for an honest fellow that knowed your worship, and set us i' the right way.

Argus. 'Tis pity they should use strangers so; but as to your young mistress, does she never speak?

Robin. Adod! sir, never to a mon; why, she wo't not speak to her own father, she's so main bashful.

Argus. That's strange, indeed! But how does my friend, Sir Roger? he's well, I hope.

Robin. Hearty, still, sir. He has drunk down six fox-hunters sin last Lammass. He holds his old course still; twenty pipes a-day, a cup of mum in the morning, a tankard of ale at noon, and three bottles of stingo at night. The same mon now he was thirty years ago; and young 'Squire Yedward is just come from 'varsity: he's mainly growed sin you saw him; he's a fine, proper, tall gentleman now; why, he's near upon as tall as you or I, mun.

Argus. Good now, good now! But wouldst drink, honest friend?

Robin. I don't care an' I do, a bit or so; for, to say truth, I'm mortal dry.

Argus. Here, John!

Enter a Servant.

Take this honest fellow down, and make him welcome. When your mistress is ready to go, we'll call you.

Robin. Ah! pray, take care and make much of me, for I am a bitter honest fellow, and you did but know me.

[Exit with Servant.]
Argus. These country fellows are very blunt but very honest. I would fain hear his mistress talk. He said she'd find her tongue when she was once amongst those of her own sex. I'll go listen for once, and hear what the young tis have to say to one another.

[Exit.]

Enter ROVEWELL, ARETHUSA, and BETTY.

Rove. Dear Arethusa, delay not the time thus; your father will certainly come in and surprise us.

Betty. Let us make hay while the sun shines, madam: I long to be out of this prison.

Are. So do I; but not on the Captain's conditions, to be his prisoner for life.

Rove. I shall run mad if you trifle thus: name your conditions; I sign my consent before-hand.

[Kisses her.]

Are. Indeed, Captain, I'm afraid to trust you.

AIR.—ARETHUSA.

Cease to persuade,

Nor say you love sincerely;

When you've betray'd,

*You'll treat me most severely,
And fly what once you did pursue.*

Happy the fair

Who ne'er believes you;

But gives despair,

Or else deceives you,

And learns inconstancy from you.

Rove. Unkind Arethusa! I little expected this usage from you.

AIR.—ROVEWELL.

When did you see

Any falsehood in me,

That thus you unkindly suspect me?

Speak, speak your mind;

For I fear you're inclin'd,

In spite of my truth, to reject me.

If it must be so,

To the wars I will go,

Where danger my passion shall smother;

I'd rather perish there

Than linger in despair,

Or see you in the arms of another.

Enter ARGUS behind.

Argus. So, so; this is as it should be; they are as gracious as can be already. How the young tit smuggles her! Adod! she kisses with a hearty good will.

[Aside.]

Are. I must confess, Captain, I am half inclined to believe you.

Argus. Captain! how's this? bless my eyesight! I know the villain now; but I'll be even with him.

[Aside.]

Betty. Dear madam, don't trifle so; the parson's at the very next door, you'll be tacked together in an instant; and then I'll trust you to come back to your cage again, if you can do it with a safe conscience.

Argus. Here's a treacherous jade; but I'll do your business for you, Mrs. Jezabel.

[Aside.]

Betty. Consider, madam, what a life you lead here; what a jealous, ill-natured, watchful, covetous, barbarous, old cuff of a father you have to deal with! What a glorious opportunity this is, and what a sad, sad, very sad thing it is to die a maid!

Argus. If that jade die a maid, I'll die a martyr.

[Aside.]

Betty. In short, madam, if you stay much longer, you may repent it in every vein in your heart. The old hunk will undoubtedly pop in upon us and discover all, and then we're undone for ever.

Argus. You may go to the devil for ever, Mrs. Impudence.

[Aside.]

Are. Well, Captain, if you should deceive me—

Rove. If I do, may heaven—

Are. Nay, no swearing, Captain, for fear you should prove like the rest of your sex.

Rove. How can you doubt me, Arethusa, when you know how much I love you?

Argus. A wheedling dog! But I'll spoil his sport, anon.

[Aside.]

Betty. Come, come away, dear madam. I have the jewels: but stay, I'll go first and see if the coast be clear.

Argus. [Meeting her.] Where are you going, pretty maiden?

Betty. Only do—do—do—down stairs, sir.

Argus. And what hast thou got there, child?

Betty. Nothing but pi—pi—pi—pins, sir.

Argus. Here, give me the pins, and do you go to h—, Mrs. Minx, D'ye hear? out of my house this moment. [Exit BETTY.] These are your chamber jades, forsooth. O tempora! O mores! What an age is this! Get you in, forsooth; I'll talk with you anon. [Exit ARETHUSA.] So, Captain, are those your regimental clothes? I'll assure you they become you mightily. If you did but see yourself now, how much like a hero you look! Ecce signum! Ha, ha, ha!

Rove. Blood and fury! stop your grinning, or I'll stretch your mouth with a vengeance.

Argus. Nay, nay, Captain Belswagger, if you're so passionate, 'tis high time to call aid and assistance. Here, Richard, Thomas, John! help me to lay hold of this fellow. You have no sword now, Captain; no sword; d'ye mark me?

Enter Servants and ROBIN.

Robin. But I have a pistol, sir, at your service.

[Pulls out a pistol.]

Argus. Oh Lord! oh Lord!

Rove. And I'll unload it in your breast, if you stir one step after me.

Argus. A bloody-minded dog! But lay hold on that rogue there, that country cheat.

Robin. See here, gentlemen, are two little bulldogs of the same breed; [presenting two pistols] they are wonderful scourers of the brain; so that if you offer to molest or follow me—you understand me, gentlemen; you understand me.

[Exit with ROVEWELL.]

1 Serv. Yes, yes, we understand you, with a plague!

2 Serv. The devil go with 'em, I say.

Argus. Ay, ay, good b'ye to you, in the devil's name. A terrible dog! What a fright he has put me in! I sha'n't be myself this month. And you, ye cowardly rascals, to stand by and see my life in danger; get out, ye slaves; out of my house, I say. I'll put an end to all this; for I'll not have a servant in the house. I'll carry all the keys in my pocket, and never sleep more. What a murdering son of a w— this is! But I'll prevent him; for to-morrow she shall be married certainly, and then my furious gentleman can have no hopes left. A Jezabel! to have a red-coat without any money! Had he but money, if he want sense, manners, or even manhood itself, it mattered not a pin; but to want money is the devil. Well, I'll secure her under lock and key till to-morrow; and if her husband can't keep her from captain-hunting, e'en let her bring him home a fresh pair of horns every time she goes out upon the chace. [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—A Chamber

ARETHUSA discovered, sitting melancholy on a couch

AIR.—ARETHUSA.

Oh! leave me to complain

My loss of liberty;

I never more shall see my swain,

Nor ever more be free.

*Oh! cruel, cruel fate!
What joy can I receive,
When in the arms of one I hate,
I'm doom'd, alas! to live?
Ye pitying pow'rs above,
That see my soul's dismay,
Or bring me back the man I love,
Or take my life away.*

Enter ARGUS.

Argus. So, lady, you're welcome home! See, how the pretty turtle sits moaning the loss of her mate! What, not a word, Thusy? not a word, child? Come, come, don't be in the dumps now, and I'll fetch the captain, or the 'squire's sister; perhaps they may make it prattle a bit. Ah! ungracious girl! Is all my care come to this? Is this the gratitude you shew your uncle's memory, to throw away what he had bustling so hard for at so mad a rate? Did he leave you twelve thousand pounds, think you, to make you no better than a soldier's trull? to follow a camp? to carry a knapsack? This is what you'd have, mistress, is it not?

Are. This, and ten thousand times worse, were better with the man I love, than to be chained to the nauseous embraces of one I hate.

Argus. A very dutiful lady, indeed! I'll make you sing another song to-morrow; and till then, I'll leave you in salva custodia, to consider. B'ye, Thusy!

Are. How barbarous is the covetousness and caution of ill-natured parents! They toil for estates with a view to make posterity happy; and then, by a mistaken prudence, they match us to our aversion. But I am resolved not to suffer tamely, however: they shall see, though my body's weak, my resolution's strong, and I may yet find spirit enough to plague them.

AIR.—ARETHUSA.

*Sooner than I'll my love forego,
And lose the man I prize,
I'll bravely combat ev'ry woe,
Or full a sacrifice,
Nor bolts nor bars shall me control,
I death and danger dare;
Restraint but fires the active soul,
And urges fierce despair.
The window now shall be my gate,
I'll either fall or fly;
Before I'll live with him I hate,
For him I love I'll die.*

{Exit.

SCENE V.—The Street.

Enter ROVEWELL and Boy.

Boy. Sir, sir, I want to speak with you.

Rove. Is your mistress locked up, say you?

Boy. Yes, sir; and Betty's turned away, and all the men-servants; and there's no living soul in the house but our old cook-maid, and I, and my master, and Mrs. Thusy! and she cries, and cries her eyes out almost.

Rove. Oh! the tormenting news! But if the garrison be so weak, the castle may be the sooner stormed. How did you get out?

Boy. Through the kitchen-window, sir.

Rove. Shew me the window presently.

Boy. Alack-a-day! it won't do, sir. That plot won't take.

Rove. Why, sirrah?

Boy. You are something too big, sir.

Rove. I'll try that, however.

Boy. Indeed, sir, you can't get your leg in; but I could put you in a way.

Rove. How, dear boy?

Boy. I can lend you the key of Mrs. Thusy's chamber; if you can contrive to get into the house: but you must be sure to let my mistress out.

Rove. How couldst thou get it? This is almost a miracle.

Boy. I picked it out of my master's coat-pocket this morning, sir, as I was a-brushing him.

Rove. That's my boy! There's money for you. This child will come to good in time.

Boy. My master will miss me, sir; I must go; but I wish you good luck. [Exit.

ARETHUSA appears at the window above.

DUETT.—ROVEWELL and ARETHUSA.

Rov. Make haste and away, my only dear;

Make haste, and away, away!

For all at the gate,

Your true lover does wait,

And I pr'ythee, make no delay.

Are. Oh! how shall I steal away, my love?

Oh! how shall I steal away?

My daddy is near,

And I dare not, I fear;

Pray, come, then, another day.

Rov. Oh! this is the only day, my life;

Oh! this is the only day.

I'll draw him aside,

While you throw the gates wide,

And then you may steal away.

Are. Then, pr'ythee, make no delay, my dear,

Then, pr'ythee, make no delay:

We'll serve him a trick;

For I'll slip in the nick,

And with my true love away.

Cho. Oh! Cupid, befriend a loving pair;

Oh! Cupid, befriend us, we pray.

May our stratagem take,

For thine own sweet sake;

And, amen! let all true lovers say.

[Exit ARETHUSA]

Enter ROBIN, disguised as a Lawyer, and Soldiers.

Robin. So, my hearts of oak, are you all ready?

Sold. Yes, an't please your honour.

Rove. You know your cue, then; to your posts.

[They retire to a corner of the stage; ROBIN knocks smartly at the door.]

Robin. What, are you all asleep, or dead in the house, that you can't hear?

Enter ARGUS.

Argus. Sir, you are very hasty, methinks.

Robin. Sir, my business requires haste.

Argus. Sir, you had better make haste about it, for I know no business you have here.

Robin. Sir, I am come to talk with you on an affair of consequence.

Argus. Sir, I don't love talking; I know you not; and, consequently, can have no affairs with you.

Robin. Sir, not know me?

Argus. Sir, 'tis enough for me to know myself.

Robin. A d—d thwarting old dog this same.

[Aside.] Sir, I live but just in the next street.

Argus. Sir, if you lived at Jamaica, 'tis the same thing to me.

Robin. I find coaxing won't do. I must change my note, or I shall never unkenneel the old fox. [Aside.]

Well, Mr. Argus, there's no harm done, so take your leave of three thousand pounds. You have enough of your own already. [Going.]

Argus. How! three thousand pounds! I must inquire into this. [Aside.] Sir, a word with you.

Robin. Sir, I have nothing to say to you. I took you to be a prudent person, that knew the worth of money, and had to improve it; but I find I'm deceived.

Argus. Sir, I hope you'll excuse my rudeness; but, you know, a man cannot be too cautious.

Robin. Sir, that's true, and therefore I excuse you; but I'd take such treatment from no man in England besides yourself.

Argus. Sir, I beg your pardon; but to the business.

Robin. Why, thus it is: a spendthrift young fellow is galloping through a plentiful fortune; I have lent two thousand pounds upon it already; and if you'll advance an equivalent, we'll foreclose the whole estate, and share it between us; for I know he can never redeem it.

Argus. A very judicious man; I'm sorry I affronted him. [Aside.] But how is this to be done?

Robin. Very easily, sir. A word in your ear; a little more this way.

[DRAWS ARGUS aside; the Soldiers get between him and the door.]

Argus. But the title, sir, the title?

Robin. Do you doubt my veracity?

Argus. Not in the least, sir; but one cannot be too sure.

Robin. That's very true, sir; and, therefore, I'll make sure of you now I have you.

[ROBIN trips up his heels; the Soldiers blindfold and gag him, and stand over him; while ROSEWELL carries off ARETHUSA; after which they leave him, he making a great noise.]

Enter Mob.

All. What's the matter? what's the matter?

[They ungag him.]

Argus. Oh! neighbours, I'm robbed and murdered, ruined, and undone for ever.

1 Mob. Why, what's the matter, master?

Argus. There's a whole legion of thieves in the house; they gagged and blindfolded me, and offered forty naked swords at my breast. I beg of you to assist me, or they'll strip the house in a minute.

2 Mob. Forty drawn swords, say you, sir?

Argus. Ay, and more, I think, on my conscience.

2 Mob. Then look you, sir, I'm a married man, and have a large family, I would not venture amongst such a parcel of blood-thirsty rogues for the world; but, if you please, I'll run and call a constable.

All. Ay, ay; call a constable, call a constable.

Argus. I sha'n't have a penny left, if we stay for a constable. I am but one man, and, as old as I am, I'll lead the way, if you'll follow me. [Exit.]

All. Ay, ay; in, in; follow, follow; huzza!

1 Mob. Pr'ythee, Jack, do you go in, if you come to that.

4 Mob. I go in! what should I go in for? I have lost nothing.

Woman. What, nobody to help the poor old gentleman? odsbobs! if I were a man I'd follow him myself.

3 Mob. Why don't you, then? What occasion-ableness have I to be killed for him or you either?

Enter ROBIN, as Constable.

All. Here's Mr. Constable, here's Mr. Constable.

Robin. Silence, in the king's name.

All. Ay, silence, silence.

Robin. What's the meaning of this riot? Who makes all this disturbance?

1 Mob. I'll tell you, Mr. Constable—

3 Mob. An't please your worship, let me speak.

Robin. Ay, this man talks like a man of parts. What's the matter, friend?

3 Mob. An't please your noble worship's honour and glory, we are his majesty's liege subjects, and were terrified out of our habitations and dwelling-places, by a cry from abroad; which your noble worship must understand was occasionable by the gentleman of this house, who was so unfortunate as to be killed by thieves, who are now in his house to the numbering of above forty, an't please your worship, all completely armed with powder and ball, back-swords, pistols, bayonets, and blunderbusses.

Robin. But what is to be done in this case?

3 Mob. Why, an't please your worship, knowing your noble honour to be the king's majesty's noble officer of the peace, we thought 'twas best your honour should come and terrify these rogues away with your noble authority.

Robin. Well said, very well said, indeed. Gentlemen, I am the king's officer, and I command you, in the king's name, to aid and assist me to call those rogues out of the house. Who's within there? I charge you come out in the king's name, and commit yourselves to our royal authority.

2 Mob. This is the gentleman that was killed, an't please your worship.

Enter ARGUS.

Argus. Oh! neighbours, I'm ruined and undone for ever. They have taken away all that's dear to me in the world.

1 Mob. That's his money; 'tis a sad covetous dog.

Robin. Why, what's the matter? What have they done?

Argus. Oh! they have taken my child from me, my Thusy!

Robin. Good luck!

3 Mob. Marry come up, what valuation can she be? But have they taken nothing else?

Argus. Would they had stripped my house of every pennyworth, so they had left my child.

1 Mob. That's a lie, I believe; for he loves his money more than his soul, and would sooner part with that than a groat.

Argus. This is the Captain's doings; but I'll have him hanged.

Robin. But where are the thieves?

Argus. Gone, gone, beyond all hopes of pursuit.

2 Mob. What, are they gone? Then, come, neighbours, let's go in, and kill every mother's child of them.

Robin. Hold, I charge you to commit no murder; follow me, and we'll apprehend them.

Argus. Go, villains, cowards, scoundrels, or I shall suspect you are the thieves that mean to rob me of what is yet left. How brave you are, now all the danger's over! Oh! sirrah, you dog! [Looking at ROBIN] you are that rogue, Robin, the Captain's man. Seize him, neighbours, seize him!

Robin. [Aside.] I don't care what you do, for the job's over; I see my master coming.

Argus. Why don't you seize him, I say?

1 Mob. Not we, we have lost too much time about an old fool already.

2 Mob. Ay, the next time you are bound and gagged you shall lie and be d—d for me.

3 Mob. Ay, and me, too; come along, neighbours, come along. [Exeunt Mob.]

Enter ROVEWELL, HEARTY, ARETHUSA, and BETTY.

Argus. Bless me! who have we got here? Oh! Thus, Thus, I had rather never have seen thee again than have found you in such company.

Are. Sir, I hope my husband's company is not criminal.

Argus. Your husband! who's your husband, housewife? that scoundrel? Captain—Out of my sight, thou ungracious wretch! I'll go make my will this instant. And you, you villain, how dare you look me in the face after all this? I'll have you hanged, sirrah; I will so.

Hearty. Oh, fie! brother Argus, moderate your passion. It ill becomes the friendship you owe Ned Worthy, to vilify and affront his only child, and for no other crime than improving that friendship which has ever been between us.

Argus. Ha! my dear friend alive! I heard thou wert dead in the Indies. And is that thy son? and my godson, too, if I am not mistaken.

Hearty. The very same: the last and best remains of our family; forced by my wife's cruelty, and my absence, to the army. My wife is since dead, and the son she had by her former husband, who she intended to heir my estate; but fortune guided me by chance to my dear boy, who, after twenty years' absence, and changing my name, knew me not, till I just now discovered myself to him and your fair daughter, who I will make him deserve by thirty thousand pounds, which I brought from India, besides what real estate I may leave at my death.

Argus. And to match that, old boy, my daughter shall have every penny of mine, besides her uncle's legacy. Ah! you young rogue, had I known you, I would not have used you so roughly. However, since you have won my girl so bravely, take her, and welcome. But you must excuse all faults: the old man meant all for the best: you must not be angry.

Rove. Sir, on the contrary, we ought to beg your pardon for the many disquiets we have given you; and with your pardon, we crave your blessing.

[They kneel.]

Argus. You have it, children, with all my heart. Adod! I am so transported, I don't know whether I walk or fly.

Are. May your joy be everlasting!

DUETT.—ROVEWELL and ARETHUSA.

Thus fondly caressing,

My idol, my treasure,

How great is the blessing!

How sweet is the pleasure!

With joy I behold thee,

And doat on thy charms;

Thus, while I enfold thee,

I've heaven in my arms.

[Exeunt.]

LOVE A LA MODE;

A FARCE, IN TWO ACTS;

BY CHARLES MACKLIN

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

SIR THEODORE GOODCHILD
SIR ARCHY MACSARCASM
SIR CALLAGHAN O'BALLAGHAN
'SQUIRE GROOM
MR. MORDECAI.

CHARLOTTE.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—An Apartment at Sir Theodore Goodchild's.

Enter Sir THEODORE GOODCHILD and CHARLOTTE.

Char. Nay, there can be no harm in a little mirth, guardian; even those who happen to be the objects must approve the justice of it.

Sir T. But consider, Charlotte, what will the world say of me? Will it not be in every mouth, that Sir Theodore Goodchild was a very imprudent man, in combining with his ward to turn her lovers into ridicule?

Char. Not at all, sir; the world will applaud the mirth, especially when they know what kind of lovers they are; and that the sole motive of their addresses was the lady's fortune. Well, sure, since the days of giants and enchanted castles, no poor damsel has been besieged by such a group of odd mortals. Let me review my equipage of lovers: the first upon the list is a beau Jew, who, in spite of nature and education, sets up for a wit, a gentleman, and a man of taste.

Sir T. Ay, laugh at him as much as you will.

Char. The next is a downright English, New-market, stable-bred, gentleman-jockey; who, having ruined his finances by dogs, grooms, cocks, and horses, and such like company, now thinks to retrieve his affairs by a matrimonial match with a city fortune.

Sir T. Ha, ha, ha! I find, madam, you have perused the 'squire with great exactness.

Char. Pretty well, sir. To this Newmarket wight succeeds a proud, haughty, Caledonian knight; whose tongue, like the dart of death, spares neither sex nor age: all dread, and all feel it.

Sir T. Yes, yes; his insolence of family, and licentiousness of wit, have gained him the contempt and general toleration of mankind. But we must not look upon his spleen and ill-nature, my dear, as a national, but a personal vice.

Char. As such, sir, I always understand, and laugh at him. Well, of all my swains, he is the most whimsical; his passion is to turn every mortal into ridicule: even I, the object of his flame, cannot escape; for, while his avarice courts my fortune, his pride despises and sneers at my birth.

Sir T. That, Charlotte, is only to shew his wit.

Char. True, sir. The next in Cupid's train is your nephew, guardian; a wild Irish, Prussian, hard-headed soldier, whose military humour, and fondness for his profession, make me fancy, sometimes, that he was not only born in a siege, but that Bellona had been his nurse, Mars his schoolmaster, and the furies his playfellows. Ha, ha, ha!

Sir T. Ha, ha, ha! Oh, fie! Charlotte, how can you be so severe upon my poor nephew?

Char. Upon my honour, Sir Theodore, I don't mean to be severe, for I like his character extremely. Ha, ha!

Sir T. Well, well: notwithstanding your mirth, madam, I assure you, he has gained the highest esteem in his profession. But what can you expect, my dear, from a soldier, a mere rough-hewn soldier; who, at the age of fifteen, would leave Ireland and his friends? so that I don't suppose he has six ideas out of his profession: garrisons and camps have been the courts and academies that have formed him. But he ever had, from a child, a kind of military madness.

Char. Oh! I am in love with his warlike humour, I think it highly entertaining.

Sir T. As he has not made any direct addresses to you, Charlotte, let me inform him how improper such a step would be, and even let us leave him out of our scheme to-night.

Char. Oh! sir, impossible! our day's sport, our plot, our everything, would be imperfect without him, why, I intend him to be the leading instrument in the concert. One cannot possibly do without Sir Callaghan Brall—Bra—Brall—Pray, guardian, teach me to pronounce my lover's name.

Sir T. Thou art a mad creature! Well, madam, I will indulge your wicked mirth: his name is Callaghan O'Brallaghan.

Char. Oh, shocking! Callaghan O'Brallaghan! Why, it is enough to choke one; and it is as difficult to be uttered as a Welch pedigree. Why, if the fates should bring us together, I shall be obliged to hire an Irish interpreter to go about with me, to teach the people to pronounce my name. Ha, ha, ha!

Sir T. You may laugh, madam, but he is as proud of that name as any of your lovers are of their titles. I suppose they all dine here.

Char. Certainly; all but 'Squire Groom.

Sir T. Oh! you must not expect him; he is at York; he was to ride his great match there yesterday. Let me see: what is it o'clock? almost three. I will but just step to Lincoln's-inn Hall, and see what they are doing in your cause; it is to be ended to-day. By the time I return, I suppose your company will be come. A good morning to you, Charlotte.

Char. Sir, a good morning.

[Exit Sir T.]

Morde. [Sings Italian without.]

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Mr. Mordecai, madam.

Char. Shew him in.

[Exit Serv.]

Enter MORDECAI.

Morde. [Singing an Italian air, and addressing CHARLOTTE fantastically.] Voi sete molto cortese! anima mia! Here let me kneel and pay my softest adoration; and thus, and thus, in amorous transport, breathe my last.

[Kisses her hand.]

Char. Ha, ha, ha! Softly, softly! You would not, surely, breathe your last yet, Mr. Mordecai?

Morde. Why, no, madam; I would live a little longer for your sake.

[Bowing very low.]

Char. Ha, ha, ha! You are infinitely polite! but a truce with your gallantry—why, you are as gay as the sun; I think I never saw anything better fancied than that suit of your's, Mr. Mordecai.

Morde. Ha, ha!—a—well enough; just as my tailor fancied. Ha, ha, ha! Do you like it, madam?

Char. Quite elegant! I don't know any one about town deserves the title of beau better than Mr. Mordecai.

Morde. Oh! dear madam, you are very obliging.

Char. I think you are called Beau Mordecai by everybody.

Morde. Yes, madam, they do distinguish me by that title, but I don't think I merit the honour.

Char. Nobody more; for I think you are always by far the finest man in town. But, do you know, that I have heard of your extraordinary court, the other night, at the opera, to Miss Sprightly?

Morde. Oh, heavens! madam, how can you be so evere? That the woman has designs, I steadfastly believe; but as to me—oh!

Char. Ha, ha, ha! Nay, nay, you must not deny it, for my intelligence is from very good hands.

Morde. Pray, who may that be?

Char. Sir Archy Macsarcasm.

Morde. Oh, shocking! the common Pasquin of the town: besides, madam, you know he's my rival, and not very remarkable for veracity in his narrations.

Char. Ha, ha, ha! I cannot say he's a religious observer of truth, but his humour always makes amends for his invention. You must allow he has humour, Mr. Mordecai.

Morde. O cuor mio! How can you think so? Bating his scandal, dull, dull as an alderman after six pounds of turtle, four bottles of port, and twelve pipes of tobacco.

Char. Ha, ha, ha! Oh! surfeiting, surfeiting!

Morde. The man, indeed, has something droll, something ridiculous in him; his abominable Scots accent, his grotesque visage almost buried in snuff, the roll of his eyes, and twist of his mouth, his strange, inhuman laugh, his tremendous periwig, and his manner altogether, indeed, has something so caricatureably risible in it, that—ha, ha, ha!—may I die, madam, if I don't take him for a mountebank-doctor at a Dutch fair.

Char. Oh, oh! what a picture has he drawn!

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Sir Archy Macsarcasm is below, madam.

Char. Shew him up. [Exit Serv.]

Morde. Don't you think, madam, he is a horrid, foul-mouthed, uncouth fellow? He is worse to me, madam, than assafetida, or a tallow-chandler's shop in the dog-days; his filthy high-dried poisons me, and his scandal is grosser than a hackney news-writer's: madam, he is as much despised by his own countrymen as by the rest of the world. The better sort of Scotland never keep him company: but that is entre nous, entre nous.

Sir A. [Without.] Randol, bid Sawney be here wi' the chariot at aught o'clock exactly.

Enter Sir ARCHY MACSARCASM.—[MORDECAI runs up to embrace him.]

Ha, ha, ha! my chield o' circumcision, gie's a wag o' yer loof; hoo d'ye do, my bonny Eesraelite?

Morde. Always at your service, Sir Archy. He stinks worse than a Scotch snuff-shop. [Aside.]

Sir A. Weel, Mordecai, I see ye are as deeligent in the service o' yer mistress as in the service o' yer leuking-glass, for yer face and yer thoughts are a' turned upon the ane or the ither.

Morde. And I see your wit, Sir Archy, like a lawyer's tongue, will ever retain its usual politeness and good-nature.

Char. [Coming forward.] Ha, ha, ha! Civil and witty on both sides. Sir Archy, your most obedient.

Sir A. Ten thousand pardons, madam, I didna observe ye; I hope I see yer ladyship weel. Ah! ye look like a deivinity. [Curtseys.]

Sir A. Ten thousand pardons, madam, I didna observe ye; I hope I see yer ladyship weel. Ah! ye look like a deivinity. [Bowing awkwardly and low.]

Char. Sir Archy, this is immensely gallant.

Sir A. Weel, madam, I see my friend Mordecai here, is determined to tak' awa' the prize frae us a'. Ha, ha, ha! He is tricked out in a' the colours o' the rainboo.

Char. Mr. Mordecai is always well dressed, Sir Archy.

Sir A. Upon honour, he is as fine as a jay. Turn aboot, mon, turn aboot; let us view yer finery: stap along, and let us see yer shapes; he has a bonny march wi' him; very weel, very elegant. Ha, ha, ha! Guid troth! I think I never saw a tooth-drawer better dressed in a' my life.

[Admiring MORDECAI's dress.]

Char. Ha, ha, ha?

Morde. You are very polite, sir.

Char. But, Sir Archy, what is become of my Irish lover, your friend, Sir Callaghan? I hope he dines here.

Sir A. Ah, ah! guid faith wull he! I hae brought him along wi' me.

Char. What, is he in the house?

Sir A. Ay, in this very mansion, madam; for ye maun ken, that, like the monarchs o' auld, I never travel noo without my feul.

Char. Then, pray, Sir Archy, exhibit your fool.

Morde. Let's have a slice of him.

Sir A. Jauntly, jauntly; no' so fast! he's no' in right order yet.

Char. How do you mean, Sir Archy?

Sir A. Madam, as we came hither, I cooncelled him to write a love epistle to you, by way o' introduction till his courship: he is noo aboot it below stairs, an' in ten minutes ye may look to see an amorous billet, sic as hae nae been penned sin' the days o' Don Quixote. Ha, ha, ha!

Char. Oh, charming! I shall be impatient till I see his passion upon paper.

Sir A. Gude faith! madam, he has done that already; for he has composed a jargon that he ca's a sonnet, upon his bewitching Charlotte, as he terms you. Mordecai, you have heard him sing it.

Morde. I beg your pardon, Sir Archy, I have heard him roar it. Madam, we had him last night at the tavern, and made him give it to us in an Irish howl, that might be heard from hence to West Chester.

Sir A. Ha, ha, ha! Why, ye have a deevilish deal o' wit, Mordecai.

Char. Ha, ha, ha! I must hear this song.

Morde. Madam, your servant: I will leave Sir Archy to entertain you for a few minutes.

Char. You are not going, Mr. Mordecai?

Morde. Madam, I am only going down stairs to see if Sir Callaghan is disengaged; and if he be, to have a laugh at him before dinner, by way of a whet; that's all, madam; only by way of a whet.

Sir A. But, harkye! Mr. Mordecai, not a seclable o' the letter.

Morde. Oh! never fear me, Sir Archy, I am as secret as a spy. [Exit.]

Sir A. What a fantastical baboon this Eesraelite maks o' himsel'! the fallow is the mockery o' the hale nation.

Char. Why, to say the truth, he is entertaining, Sir Archy.

Sir A. Oh! yes, he is ridiculous, therefore, very usefu' in society; for wherever he comes there maun be laughter. But, now, madam, if ye please, a word or twa o' oor ain matters: ye see I dinna pester ye wi' flames, and darts, and sighings, and lamentations, and freevolous protestations, like yer silly lovers in a romance; for ye ken I always speak my thoughts wi' a blunt integrity: madam, I love you, and gin I didna, I wad scorn to say it.

Char. Oh! Sir Archy, all the world allows you sincerity, which is the most valuable quality a friend or a lover can possess.

Sir A. Vary true, madam; therefore, I cannot help gi'ing ye a bit o' advice concerning these fallows aboot ye, wha ca' themselfs your lovers. 'Squire Groom, doubtless, is a man o' honour, and my vary gude friend, but he is a beggar, a beggar; and, touching this Mordecai, the fallow's walthy, 'tis true; yes, yes, he is walthy, but he is a reptile, a mere reptile! and, as to the Irishman, Sir Callaghan O'Brallaghan, the fallow's weel enough to laugh at, but I wad hae ye look aboot ye there; for ye ken that yer guardian is his uncle, and, to my certain knowledge, there is a design upon yer fortune in that quarter, depend upon it.

Char. Very possible, Sir Archy, very possible; for a woman's fortune, I believe, is the principal object of every lover's wish.

Sir A. Madam, yer observation is very orthodox, in truth, as to Mordecai, Sir Callaghan, 'Squire Groom, and sic like fallows; but men o' honour—men o' honour, madam, hae ither principles, I assure ye, lady, the tenor o' my affection is nae for your pecuniary, but for the mental graces o' yer saul, and the deevine perfections o' yer body, which are, indeed, to me a Peru and a Mexico.

Char. Oh! Sir Archy, you overwhelm me.

Sir A. Madam, I speak upon the vercity o' mine honour; beside, madam, gin ye marry me, ye wull marry a man o' sobreeety and economy: 'tis true, I am not in the high-day o' blude, yet, as the poet sings, "far frae the vale o' years;" not like our young flashy whipsters, that gang aff like a squib or a cracker on a rejoicing night, in a noise and a stink, and are never heard o' after.

Char. You are certainly right, Sir Archy, the young fellows of fashion are mere trifles.

Sir A. They are baubles, madam; absolute baubles and prodigals; therefore, ye should preponderate the matter weel before ye mak' yer election. Consider, madam, there is nae scant o' walth or honour in oor family. Lady, we hae, in the house o' Macsarcasm, twa barons, three viscounts, sax earls, ene marquise, and twa dukes, besides baronets and lairds oot o' a' reckoning.

Char. Ha, ha, ha!

Sir A. What gars ye laugh, madam?

Char. I beg your pardon, sir; but—ha, ha, ha!—I am laughing to—ha, ha, ha!—to think what a number of noble relations I shall have.

Sir A. 'Faith! wull ye, madam; and ither guess families than ye hae in this part o' the world. Odswns! madam, there is as much difference betwixt oor nobelity o' the north, and your's o' the south, as there is between a hound o' blude and a mangrel.

Char. Ha, ha, ha! Pray, how do you make out that, Sir Archy?

Sir A. Why, madam, in Scotland, a' oor nobelity are sprung frae monarchs, warriors, heroes, and glorious achievements; now, here in the south, ye are a' sprung frae sugar-hogsheds, rum-puncheons, woo'-packs, hop-sacks, earn-bars, and tar-jackets; in short, ye are a composition of Jews, Turks, and refugees, and o' a' the commercial vagrants o' the land and sea; a sort of amphibious breed ye are.

Char. Ha, ha, ha! We are a strange mixture, indeed; nothing like so pure and noble as you are in the north.

Sir A. Oh! naething like it, madam, naething like it; we are o' another kidney. Now, madam, as ye yoursel' are nae weel propagated, as ye hae the misfortune to be a child o' commerce, ye should endeavour to mak' your espousals into ane o' oor auncient noble families o' the north; for ye maun ken, madam, that sic an alliance wull purify yer blude, and gie ye a rank and consequence in the world that a' yer pelf, were it as muckle as the bank o' Edenbrough, cou'dna purchase for ye.

Char. Very true, Sir Archy, very true; upon my word, your advice is friendly and impartial, and I wull think of it.

Enter MORDECAI.

Morde. Here he is! he is coming, madam; he is but just giving some orders to his servant about his baggage and post-horses.

Char. I hope he is not going away

Morde. Troth is he, madam; he is impatient to be with the army in Germany.

Sir C. [Within.] Is Sir Archy Macsarcasm and the lady this way, do you say, young man?

Serv. [Within.] Yes, sir.

Sir C. [Within.] Then, I'll trouble you with no further ceremony.

Enter SIR CALLAGHAN O'BALLAGHAN.

Madam, I am your most devoted and most obedient humble servant, and am proud to have the honour of kissing your fair hand this morning.

[Salutes CHARLOTTE.]

Char. Sir Callaghan, your humble servant. I am sorry to hear we are likely to lose you. I was in hopes the campaign had been quite over in Germany for this winter.

Sir C. Yes, madam, it was quite over, but it began again: a true genius never loves to quit the field till he has left himself nothing to do; for then, you know, madam, he can keep it with more safety.

Sir A. Well, but, Sir Callaghan, just as ye entered the apartment, the lady was urging she should like it mightily, gin ye wad favour her wi' a slight narrative of the late transactions and battles in Germany.

Char. If Sir Callaghan would be so obliging.

Sir C. Oh! dear madam, don't ax me.

Char. Sir, I beg pardon; I would not press anything that I thought might be disagreeable to you.

Sir C. Oh! dear madam, it is not for that; but it rebuts a man of honour to be talking to ladies of battles, and sieges, and skirmishes; it looks like gasconading and making the fanfaron. Besides, madam, I give you my honour, there is no such thing in nature as making a true description of a battle.

Char. How so, sir?

Sir C. Why, madam, there is so much doing everywhere, there is no knowing what is done anywhere; for every man has his own part to look after, which is as much as he can do, without minding what other people are about. Then, madam, there is such drumming and trumpeting, firing and smoking, fighting and rattling everwhere; and such an uproar of courage and slaughter in every man's mind; and such a delightful confusion altogether, that you can no more give an account of it than you can of the stars in the sky.

Sir A. As I shall answer it, I think it a very descriptive account that he gives of a battle.

Char. Admirable! and very entertaining.

Morde. Oh, delightful!

Sir A. Mordecai, ask him some questions; to him, to him, mon; hae a little fun wi' him; smoke him, smoke him; rally him, mon, rally him.

[Apart to MORDECAI.]

Morde. I'll do it, I'll do it; yes, I will smoke the Captain. [Apart.] Well, and pray, Sir Callaghan, how many might you kill in a battle?

Sir C. Sir?

Morde. I say, sir, how many might you have killed in any one battle?

Sir C. Kill! Hum! Why, I generally kill more in a battle than a coward would choose to look upon, or than an impertinent fellow would be able to eat. Ha! are you answered, Mr. Mordecai?

Morde. Yes, yes, sir, I am answered. He is a devilish droll fellow; vastly queer.

Sir A. Yes, he is very queer. But ye were very sharp upon him. Odswns! at him again, at him again; have another cut at him. [Apart.]

Morde. Yes, I will have another cut at him.

Sir A. Do, do. He'll bring himself intill a d—d scrape presently. [Aside.]

Morde. [Going to Sir C. and sneering at him.] He, he, he! But, harkye! Sir Callaghan—he, he, he!—give me leave to tell you now, if I were a general—

Sir C. You a general! 'Faith! then, you would make a very pretty general. [Turns MORDECAI about.] Pray, madam, look at the general. Ha, ha, ha!

All. Ha, ha, ha!

Sir C. Oh! my dear Mr. Mordecai, be advised, and don't prate about generals; it is a very hard trade to learn, and requires being in the field late and early, a great many frosty nights and scorching days, to be able to eat and drink, and laugh, and rejoice, with danger on one side of you, and death on the other; and a hundred things beside, that you know no more of than I do of being high priest of a synagogue; so hold your tongue about generals, Mr. Mordecai, and go and mind your lottery-tickets, and your cent. per cent. in 'Change-alley.

All. Ha, ha, ha!

Sir A. Ha, ha, ha! He hath tickled up the Eesraelite: he has gi'en it the Moabite o' baith sides o' his lugs.

Char. But, Sir Callaghan, sure, you must have been in imminent danger in the variety of actions you must have gone through.

Sir C. Oh! to be sure, madam; who would be a soldier without danger? Danger, madam, is a soldier's greatest glory, and death his best reward.

Morde. Ha, ha, ha! That is an excellent bull. Death a reward! Pray, Sir Callaghan, no offence, I hope, how do you make death being a reward?

Sir C. How! Why, don't you know that?

Morde. Not I, upon honour!

Sir C. Why, a soldier's death in the field of battle, is a monument of fame, that makes him as much alive as Cæsar, or Alexander, or any dead hero of them all.

All. Ha, ha, ha!

Char. Very well explained, Sir Callaghan.

Sir C. Why, madam, when the history of the English campaigns in America come to be written, there is your own brave young general, that died in the field of battle before Quebec, will be alive to the end of the world.

Char. You are right, Sir Callaghan; his virtues, and those of his fellow-soldiers in that action, will be remembered by their country while Britain or British gratitude has a being.

Sir A. Oh! the highlanders did gude service in that action; they cut them, and slashed them, and whapt them aboot, and played the vary deevil wi' them, sir. There's nae sic thing as standing a highlander's Andrew Ferrara; they will slaughe aff a fallow's head, at a dash slap: it was they that did the business at Quebec.

Sir C. I dare say they were not idle, for they are tight fellows. Give me your hand, Sir Archy; I assure you, your countrymen are good soldiers; ay, and so are our's, too.

Char. Well, Sir Callaghan, I assure you, I am charmed with your heroism, and greatly obliged to you for your account. Come, Mr. Mordecai, we will go down to Sir Theodore, for I think I heard his coach stop.

Morde. Madam, I attend you with pleasure: will you honour me with the tip of your ladyship's wedding-finger? Sir Callaghan, your servant; your's; your's; look here, here. [Erit with CHAR.]

Sir C. I find he is a very impertinent coxcomb, this same beau Mordecai.

Sir A. Yes, sir, he is a d—d impudent rascal!

Sir C. I assure you, I had a great mind to be upon the qui vive with him, for his jokes and his mockeries, but that the lady was by.

Sir A. Yes, he is a cursed impudent fellow! Because he is suffered to speak till a man o' fashion at Bath and Tunbridge, and other public places, the rascal always obtrudes himself upon ye. But, Sir Callaghan, hae ye written the letter to the lady?

Sir C. I have not.

Sir A. Hoo happened that, mon?

Sir C. Why, upon reflecting, I found it would not be consisting with the decorums of a man of honour, to write to a lady in the way of matrimonial advances, before I had first made my affections known to her guardian, who is, you know, my uncle; so, I have indited the letter to him instead of the lady, which is the same thing, you know.

Sir A. Ha, ha! Exactly, exactly: for, so ye do but write about it, ye ken, it matters not to whom.

Sir C. Ay, that is what I thought myself: so here it is. [Takes out a letter.] "To Sir Theodore Goodchild."

Sir A. Ay, let us have it: I warrant it's a bonny epistle.

Sir C. [Reads.] "Sir,—As I have the honour to bear the character of a soldier, and to call Sir Theodore Goodchild uncle, I do not think it would be consisting with a man of honour to behave like a scoundrel."

Sir A. That's an excellent remark, Sir Callaghan, an excellent remark, and vary new.

Sir C. Yes, I think it is a good remark. [Reads.] "Therefore, I thought proper, before I proceeded any farther, (for I have done nothing as yet,) to break my mind to you before I engage the affections of the young lady." You see, Sir Archy, I intend to carry the place like a soldier, à la militaire, as we say abroad for I make my approaches regularly to the breach, before I attempt the covered way.

Sir A. Excellent! that's excellent!

Sir C. Yes, I think it will do. [Reads.] "For as you are a gentleman, and one that knows my family by my father's side, which, you are sensible, is as old as any in the three kingdoms, and older, too; so, I thought it would be foolish to stand shilly-shally any longer, but come to the point at once." You see, Sir Archy, I give him a rub; but by way of a hint about my family; because why, do you see? Sir Theodore is my uncle only by my mother's side, which is a little upstart family, that came in with one Strongbow, but t'other day—lord! not above six or seven hundred years ago; whereas, my family, by my father's side, are all the true old Milesians, and related to the O'Flaherty's and O'Shaughnesses, and the Mac Lauchlins, the O'Donnaghans, O'Callaghans, O'Geogaghans, and all the tick blood of the nation; and I myself, you know, am an O'Brallaghan, which is the oldest of them all.

Sir A. Ay, ay; I believe ye are o' an auncient family, Sir Callaghan; but ye are oot in aine point.

Sir C. What is that, Sir Archy?

Sir A. Whar, ye said ye were as auncient as any family i' the three kingdoms.

Sir C. 'Faith! then, I said nothing but truth.

Sir A. Hut, hut, hut awa', mon! hut awa'! ye munna say that; what the de'il! consider our families i' the north; why, ye o' Ireland, sir, are but a colony frae us; an outcast, a mere outcast; and as such ye remain till this hour.

Sir C. I beg your pardon, Sir Archy, that is the Scotch account, which, you know, never speaks truth, because it is always partial: but the Irish history, which must be the best, because it was written by an Irish poet of my own family, one Shemus Thurlough Shannaghan O'Brallaghan, and he says, in his chapter of genealogy, that the Scotch are all Irishmen's bastards.

Sir A. Hoo, sir! bastards! Do ye mak' us ille-geetemate, illegeetemate, sir?

Sir C. 'Faith! I do: for the youngest branch of our family, one Mac Fergus O'Brallaghan, was the very man that went from Carrickfergus, and peopled all Scotland with his own hands; so that, my dear Sir Archy, you must be bastards, of course, you know.

Sir A. Harkye! Sir Callaghan, though yer ignorance and vanity wad mak' conquerors and ravishers o' yer auncesters, and harlots and Sabines o' oor mithers, yet, ye sall prove, sir, that their issue are a' the children o' honour.

Sir C. Harkye, harkye! Sir Archy, what is that ye mentioned about ignorance and vanity?

Sir A. Sir, I denoonce ye baith ignorant and vain, and mak' yer maist o't.

Sir C. 'Faith! sir, I can make nothing of it; for they are words I don't understand, because they are what no gentleman is used to; and, therefore, you must unsay them.

Sir A. Hoo, sir! eat my words? a North Briton eat his words?

Sir C. Indeed, you must, and this instant eat them.

Sir A. Ye sall eat first a piece o' this weapon.

[Draws.]

Sir C. Poo, poo! Sir Archy, put up, put up; this is no proper place for such work; consider, drawing a sword is a very serious piece of business, and ought always to be done in private: we may be prevented here; but if you are for a little of that fun, come away to the right spot, my dear.

Sir A. Nae equivocation, sir; dinna ye think ye hae gotten beau Mordecai to cope wi'. Defend yersel'; for, by the sacred honour o' Saint Andrew, ye sall be responsible for makin' us illegeetimate, sir, illegeetimate!

Sir C. Then, by the sacred crook of Saint Patrick, you are a very foolish man to quarrel about such a trifle. But since you have a mind for a tilt, have at you, my dear, for the honour of the sod. Oho! my jewel! never fear us, you are as welcome as the flowers of May.

[They fight.]

Enter CHARLOTTE.

Char. Oh, bless me! gentlemen, what are you doing? What is all this about?

Sir C. Madam, it is about Sir Archy's great-grandmother.

Char. His great-grandmother!

Sir C. Yes, madam; he is angry that I said my ancestor, Fergus O'Brallaghan, was a gallant of her's.

Char. Grandmother! Pray, Sir Archy, what is the meaning of all this?

Sir A. Madam, he has cast an affront upon a hale nation.

Sir C. I am sure, if I did, it was more than I intended; I only argued out of the history of Ireland, to prove the antiquity of the O'Brallaghans.

Sir A. Weel, sir, sin ye say ye didna intend the affront, I am satisfied. [Puts up his sword.]

Sir C. Not I, upon my honour; there are two things I am always afraid of: the one is, of being affronted myself, and the other, of affronting any man.

Sir A. Vary weel, sir, vary weel.

Char. That is a prudent and a very generous maxim, Sir Callaghan. Sir Archy, pray, let me beg that this affair may end here: I desire you will be the friends you were before this mistake happened.

Sir A. Madam, yer commands are absolute.

Char. Sir Callaghan—

Sir C. Madam, with all my heart and soul. I assure you, Sir Archy, I had not the least intention of affronting or quarrelling with you.

[Offers to embrace.]

Sir A. [Starting from him with contempt.] Vary weel, sir, vary weel.

Sir C. Oh! the curse of Cromwell upon your proud Scotch stomach!

[Aside.]

Char. Well, gentlemen, I am glad to see you are come to a right understanding: I hope 'tis all over.

Sir A. I am satisfied, madam; there is an end on't. But now, Sir Callaghan, let me tell ye as a friend, ye should never enter intill a dispute aboot leeterature, heestory, or the anteequity o' families, for ye hae gotten sic a wicked, awkward, cursed jargon upon yer tongue, that ye are never inteelligible in yer language.

Sir C. Ha, ha, ha! I beg your pardon, Sir Archy, it is you that have got such a cursed twist of a fat Scotch brogue about the middle of your own tongue, that you can't understand good English when I spake it you.

Sir A. Ha, ha, ha! Weel, that is droll enough, upon honour! ye are as gude as a farce or a comedy: but ye are oot again, Sir Callaghan; it is ye that hae the brogue, and not me; for a' the world kens I speak the sooth country sae weel, that whatever I gang, I am always ta'en for an Englishman: but we wul mak' judgment by the lady which of us twa has the brogue?

Sir C. Oh! with all my heart! Pray, madam, have I the brogue?

Char. Ha, ha, ha! Not in the least, Sir Callaghan, not in the least.

Sir C. I am sure I could never perceive it.

Char. Pray, Sir Archy, drop this contention, or we may chance to have another quarrel; you both speak most elegant English: neither of you have the brogue; neither. Ha, ha, ha!

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Dinner is served, madam, and Sir Theodore desires your company. [Exit.]

Char. I'll wait on him. Gentlemen, you will come. [Exit.]

Sir A. Instantly, madam. Weel, Sir Callaghan, dinna let us drape the design o' the letter, notwithstanding what has happened.

Sir C. Are we friends, Sir Archy?

Sir A. Pooh! upon honour am I; it was a' a mistake.

Sir C. Then give me your hand: I assure you, Sir Archy, I always love a man when I quarrel with him, after I am friends.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Dinner is served, gentlemen. [Exit.]

Sir A. Come along, then, Sir Callaghan; I will bring ye and the lady together after dinner, and then we sall see hoo ye'll mak' yer advances in love.

Sir C. Oh! never fear me, Sir Archy: I will not stay to make a regular siege of it, but will take her at once with a coup de main, or die upon the spot; for, as the old song says, Sir Archy:

*You never did hear of an Irishman's fear,
In love or in battle, in love or in battle;
We are always on duty, and ready for beauty,
Tho' cannons do rattle, tho' cannons do rattle:
By day and by night, we love and we fight,
We're honour's defender, we're honour's defender;
The foe and the fair we always take care
To make them surrender, to make them surrender.*

[Ereunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.

Enter Sir ARCHY MACSARCASM and CHARLOTTE.

Sir A. Odswuns! madam, step intill us for a moment, ye will crack yoursel wi' laughter; we hae gotten anither feul come to divert us unexpectedly, which, I think, is the highest finished feul the age has produced.

Char. Whom do you mean, Sir Archy?

Sir A. 'Squire Groom, madam; but sic a figure, the finest ye ever beheld: his little half-beuts, black cap, jockey dress, and a' his pontificalibus, just as he rid the match yesterday at York. Anteequity, in a' its records o' Greek and Roman folly, never produced a senator, visiting his mistress in so complete a feul's garb.

Char. Ha, ha, ha! Ridiculous! I thought I had done wondering at the mirror of folly; but he is one of those geniuses that never appear without surprising the world with some new stroke.

Enter MORDECAI.

Morde. Oh! madam—ha, ha, ha!—I am expiring! such a scene betwixt your two lovers, 'Squire Groom and Sir Callaghan! they have challenged each other.

Char. Oh, heavens! I hope not.

Sir A. Ha, ha, ha! That's gude, that's gude! I thought it would come to action. Ha, ha, ha! That's clever! now we sall hae ane o' them penked. Ha, ha, ha!

Char. How can you laugh, Sir Archy, at such a shocking circumstance?

Morde. Don't be frightened, madam,—ha, ha, ha! don't be frightened; neither of them will be killed, take my word for it, unless it be with claret, for that's their weapon.

Char. Oh! Mr. Mordecai, how could you startle one so?

Sir A. Oh! I am sorry for that: gude faith! I was in hopes they had a mind to shew their prowess before their mistress, and that we should hae a little Irish or Newmarket bluid spilt. But what was the cause of challenge, Mordecai?

Morde. Their passion for this lady, sir. 'Squire Groom challenged Sir Callaghan to drink your ladyship's health in a pint bumper, which the knight gallantly accepted in an instant, and returned the challenge in a quart: which was as gallantly received and swallowed by the 'Squire—ha, ha, ha!—and out-braved by a fresh daring of three pints: upon which I thought proper to decamp; not thinking it altogether safe to be near the champions, lest I should be deluged by a cascade of claret.

All. Ha, ha, ha!

Char. Oh, monstrous! they will kill themselves.

Morde. Never fear, madam.

Groom. [Within, hallooing.] Come along, Sir Callaghan O'Brallaghan! hoics, hoics! hark forward, my honeys!

Morde. Here your champion comes, madam.

Enter 'Squire GROOM, drunk.

Groom. Madam, I beg a million of pardons for not being with you at dinner; it was not my fault, upon my honour, for I sat up all night, on purpose to set out betimes; but, about one o'clock, last night, at York, as we were all d—d jolly, that fool, Sir Roger Bumper, borrowed my watch to set his by it—there it is, look at it, madam, it corrects the sun; they all stop by it, at Newmarket—and so, madam, as I was telling you, the drunken block-head put mine back two hours on purpose to deceive me; otherwise, I would have held fifty to one, I should have been here to a second.

Char. Oh! sir, there needs no apology: but how came you to travel in that extraordinary dress?

Groom. A bet, a bet, madam: I rid my match in this very dress yesterday; so, Jack Buck, Sir Roger Bumper, and some more of them, laid me a hundred each, that I would not ride to London and visit you in it, madam. Ha, ha, ha! Don't you think I have touched them, madam? eh! I have taken them all in, eh! haven't I, madam?

All. Ha, ha, ha!

Char. You have, indeed, sir. Pray, what time do you allow yourself to come from York to London?

Groom. Eh! time! Why, bar a neck, a leg, or an arm, sixteen hours, seven minutes, and thirty-three seconds; sometimes three or four seconds under; that is, to the Stones'-end, not to my own house.

Sir A. No, no; not till yer ain hoose, that would be too much.

Groom. No, no: only to the Stones'-end; but then, I have my own hacks—steel to the bottom—all blood—stickers and lappers every inch, my dear, that will come through if they have but one leg out of the four. I never keep anything, madam, that is not bottom; game, game to the last: ay, ay, you will find everything that belongs to me game, madam.

Sir A. Ha, ha, ha! Yes, yes, he is game, game to the bottom. There, walk about, and let us see yer shapes. Ha! what a fine figure! why, ye are sae fine a figure, and hae sae gude an understanding for it, it is a pity ye should ever do onything a' yer life but ride horse-races. Dinna ye think he's a cursed idiot, Mordecai?

Morde. [Apart.] Hum! he is well enough for a 'squire. Ha, ha!

Groom. Madam, I am come to pay my respects to you, according to promise. Well, which of us is to be the happy man? you know I love you; may I never win a match if I don't.

Char. Oh! sir, I am convinced of your passion; I see it in your eyes.

Sir A. Weel, but 'squire, ye hae gi'en us nae account hoo the match went.

Char. What was the match?

Groom. Our contribution. There are seven of us: Jack Buck, Lord Brainless, Bob Rattle, (you know Bob, madam; Bob's a d—d honest fellow!) Sir Harry Idle, Dick Riot, Sir Roger Bumper, and myself. We put in five hundred a-piece, all to ride ourselves, and all to carry my weight. The odds, at starting, were six and seven to four against me, the field round; and the field, ten, fifteen, and twenty to one; for you must know, madam, the thing I was to have ridden was let down—do you mind?—was let down, madam, in his exercise.

Sir A. That was unlucky!

Groom. Oh! d—d unlucky! however, we started off score, by Jupiter; and for the first half-mile, madam, you might have covered us with your under-petticoat. But your friend Bob, madam—ha, ha! I shall never forget it—poor Bob went out of the course, and run over two attorneys, an exciseman, and a little beau Jew, Mordecai's friend, madam, that you used to laugh at so immoderately at Bath; a little, fine, dirty thing, with a chocolate-coloured phiz, just like Mordecai's. The people were in hopes he had killed the lawyers, but were d—d disappointed when they found he had only broken a leg of one, and the back of the other.

All. Ha, ha, ha!

Sir A. And how did it end, 'Squire? Wha wan the subscription?

Groom. It lay between Dick Riot and I. We were neck and neck, madam, for three miles, as hard as we could lay leg to ground; made running every inch; but, at the first loose, I felt for him—found I had the foot—knew my bottom—pulled up—pretended to dig and cut—all fudge, all fudge, my dear; gave the signal to Pond to lay it on thick—had the whip-hand all the way—lay with my nose in his flank, under the wind, thus—snug, snug, my dear, quite in hand; while Riot was digging and lapping, right and left; but it would not do, my dear, against foot, bottom, and head: so, within a hundred yards of the distance-post, poor Dick knocked up, as stiff as a turnpike, and left me to canter in by myself, and to touch them all round, Ha! took the odds.

Sir A. Weel, it is wonderful to think to what a pitch of excellence oor nobility are arrived at in the art of sporting; I believe we axcel a' the nobility in Europe in that science, especially in jockeyship.

Groom. Sir Archy, I'll tell you what I'll do: I will start a horse, fight a main, hunt a pack of hounds, ride a match or a fox chase, drive a set of horses, or hold a toast, with any nobleman in Europe, for a thousand each, and I say done first.

All. Ha, ha, ha!

Sir A. Why, I ken ye wull, and I wull gang yer halves. Why, madam, the 'Squire is the keenest sportsman in a' Europe. Madam, there is naething comes amiss till him; he wull fish, or fowl, or hunt; he hunts everything; everything frae the flae i' the blanket to the elephant in the forest. He is at a' a perfect Nimrod; are ye not, 'Squire?

Groom. Yes, d—e, I'm a Nimrod, madam; at all, at all; anything, anything. Why, I ran a snail with his grace, the other day, for five hundred; no-thing in it; won it hollow, above half a horn's length.

Sir A. By above half a horn's length! that was hollow, indeed, 'Squire.

Groom. Oh! devilish hollow.

Sir A. But where is Sir Callaghan a' this time?

Groom. Oh! he's with Sir Theodore, who is joking him about his drinking bumpers with me, and his passion for you, madam.

Sir A. Ye mun ken, gentlemen, this lady and I hae laid a scheme to hae a little sport wi' Sir Callaghan; now, if you wull stap behind that screen, and promise to be silent, I'll gang and fetch him, and ye sall hear him make love as fierce as any hero in a tragedy.

Groom. Sir Archy, I'll be as silent as a bound at fault.

Sir A. Then do ye retire, madam, and come in till him, as if ye came on purpose. I'll fetch him in an instant.

Char. I shall be ready, Sir Archy. [Exit.]

Sir A. Get ye behind, get ye behind, gentlemen. [Exit.]

Groom. Ay, ay; we'll squat, never fear, Sir Archy. An Irishman make love! I should be glad to hear what an Irishman can say when he makes love. What do you think he'll say, little Shadrach? Do you think he'll make love in Irish?

Morde. Something very like it, I dare say, 'Squire. Let us retire, here they come. [Reunt.]

Enter Sir ARCHY MACSARCASM and Sir CALLA GHAN O'BRAALLAGHAN.

Sir A. Speak bauldly, man; ye ken the auld proverb, "Faint heart—"

Sir C. That is true—"never won fair lady." Yes, I think now I have got a bumper or two, I may tell her my passion, and bring the point to an eclaircissement.

Sir A. Ay, that's right, mon! stick to that, she will be wi' you in a twinkling. Yer servant, I wish ye gude success. [Exit.]

Sir C. Sir Archy, your servant. Well, now, what am I to do in this business? I know it is a great scandal for a soldier to be in love in time of war: I strive to keep her out of my mind, but can't; the more I strive to do it, the more she comes in. I am upon the forlorn-hope here, so must e'en make my push with vigour at once.

Enter CHARLOTTE.

Char. Sir Callaghan, your servant.

Sir C. Madam, I humbly beg your pardon for not seeing of you sooner; but I was speaking a soliloquy to myself, about your ladyship, and that kept me from observing you.

Char. Sir Theodore told me you wanted to speak to me upon some particular business.

Sir C. Why lookye, madam, for my part, I was never born or bred in a school of compliments, where they learn fine bows and fine speeches, but in an academy where heads, and legs, and arms, and bullets, dance country-dances without the owner's leave, just as the fortune of war directs: therefore, madam, all that I can say to you is, that your eyes have made me prisoner of war; that Cupid has made a garrison of my heart, and kept me to devilish hard duty; and if you don't believe me, I shall be a dead man before I come to action.

Char. But, Sir Callaghan, among all your symptoms of love, you have forgot to mention one that I am told is very elegant, and very powerful.

Sir C. Pray, what is that, madam?

Char. A song that I hear you have made, and set yourself, in the true Irish taste.

Sir C. Madam, I own I have been guilty of torturing the muses in the shape of a song, and I hope you will pardon my putting your ladyship's name to it.

Char. Upon one condition I will, which is, that you will do me the favour to let me hear you sing it.

Sir C. Oh! dear madam, don't ax me; it is a foolish song; a mere bagatelle.

Char. Nay, I must insist upon hearing it, as you expect or value the smiles, or fear the frowns, of your mistress; for, by your poetry, I shall judge of your passion.

Sir C. Then, madam, you shall have it, if it were ten times worse. Hem, hem! Fal, la! la! I don't know how I shall come about the right side of my voice. Now, madam, I tell you beforehand, you must not expect such fine singing from me as you hear at the opera; for, you know, we Irishmen are not cut out for it like the Italians.

SONG.

*Let other men sing of their goddesses bright,
That darken the day and enlighten the night:
I sing of a woman—but such flesh and blood,
A touch of her finger would do your heart good.*

With my fal, la! la! la, &c.

*Ten times in each day to my charmer I come,
To tell her my passion, but can't, I'm struck dumb;
For Cupid he seizes my heart by surprise,
And my tongue falls asleep at the sight of her eyes.
Her little dog Pompey's my rival, I see;
She kisses and hugs him, but frowns upon me:
Then pr'ythee, my Charlotte, abuse not your charms,
Instead of a lap-dog, take me to your arms.*

Char. Well, Sir Callaghan, your poetry is excellent; nothing can surpass it but your singing.

Sir C. Lookye, madam; to come to the point, I know I can't talk fine courtship, and love, and nonsense, like other men; for I don't spake from my tongue, but my heart; so that if you can take up your quarters for life with a man of honour, a sincere lover, and an honest Prussian soldier, now is your time, I am your man. What do you say, madam? Come, speak the word boldly, and take me to your arms.

Char. Ha, ha, ha! Don't be so violent, Sir Callaghan; but, say a lady were inclined to do herself the honour of going before a priest with you, I suppose you would have so much complaisance for your mistress, as to quit your trade of war, and live at home with her, were she to request it of you.

Sir C. Why, lookye, madam, I will deal with you like a man of honour in that point, too, and let you into the secret. I have received the king my master's money (and a brave king he is, I assure you) for above seventeen years, when I had none of my own; and now I am come to a title and fortune, and that he has need of my service, I think it would look like a poltroon to leave him: no, madam, it is a rule with me, never to desert my king or my friend in distress.

Char. Your sentiment is great, I confess, I like your principles; they are noble and most heroic, but a little too military for me. Ha, ha, ha! [Erit.]

Sir C. What! does she decline the battle. Well, then, I'll not quit the field yet, though; I'll reconnoitre her once more, and if I can't bring her into action, why, then, I'll break up the camp at once, ride post to Germany to-morrow morning, and so take my leave in a passion, without saying a word.

[Erit.]

Enter Sir ARCHY MACSARCASM and MORDECAI.

Morde. Pr'ythee, what is the meaning of all this, Sir Archy? the house seems to be in the possession of bailiffs, and Sir Theodore looks and speaks as if an earthquake had just happened.

Sir A. Your conjecture is very right, Mr. Mordecai; 'tis a' o'er wi' him! he is undone! a beggar, and so is the girl.

Morde. You astonish me.

Sir A. It is an unexpected business; but 'tis a fact, I assure ye. Here he is himself! Poor deevil! hoo dismal he looks.

Enter Sir THEODORE GOODCHILD, and an Attorney

Sir T. You are the attorney concerned for the creditors, Mr. Atkins?

Attor. I am, Sir Theodore; and am extremely sorry for the accident.

Sir T. I am obliged to you, sir; you do but your duty. The young lady is that way, sir; if you will step to her, I'll follow you. [Erit Attorney.] I hope you will excuse me, Sir Archy; this is a sudden and unhappy affair; I am unfit for company; I must go and open it myself to poor Charlotte.

[Erit.]

Morde. But pray, Sir Archy, what has occasioned all this?

Sir A. 'Faith, Mordecai, I dinna ken the particulars: but it seems, that he and a rich merchant in Holland (his partner, and joint guardian over this girl), are baith bankrupts; and, as the lawyer that is without there confirms, have failed for above a hundred thousand pounds mair than they can answer.

Morde. But how is this to affect the young lady?

Sir A. Why, sir, the greatest part of her fortune was in trade it seems, with Sir Theodore and his partner; besides, the suit in chancery, that she had wi' the company for above forty thousand pounds, has been determined against her this very day; so, that they are a' undone. Beggars, beggars!

Morde. I understand that the affair was clearly in her favour.

Sir A. Oh! sir, ye dinna ken the law. The law is a sort of hocus-pocus science, that smiles in yer face while it picks yer pocket; and the glorious uncertainty of it is of mair use to the professors than the justice of it.—Here the parties come, and seemingly in great affliction.

Enter Sir THEODORE GOODCHILD and CHARLOTTE.

Char. Dear sir, be patient, and moderate your sorrow; it may not be so terrible as your apprehensions make it. Pray, bear up.

Sir T. For myself I care not; but that you should be involved in my ruin, and left fortuneless; your fair expectations of a noble alliance blasted; your dignity and affluence fallen to scorn and penury—

Char. It cannot prove so bad, sir. I will not despair, nor shall you; for though the law has been so hard against me, yet, in spite of its wiles and treachery, a competency will still remain, which shall be devoted to mitigate your misfortunes. Besides, Sir Archy Macsarcasm is a man of honour, and on his promise and assistance I will rely.

Sir A. Wull ye! ye may as weel rely upon the assistance o' the philosopher's stone. What the deevil, wad she marry me to tinker up the fortunes o' broken citizens. But I wull speak till them, and end the affair at once. [Aside.—I am concerned to see you in this disorder, Sir Theodore.

Char. If all the vows of friendship, honour, and eternal love, which you have so often made me, were not composed of idle breath, and deceitful ceremony, now let their truth be seen.

Sir A. Madam, I am sorry to be the messenger o' ill tidings, but a' oor connexion is at an end. Oor hoose hae heard o' my addresses till you; and I hae had letters frae the dukes, the marquises, and a' the dignitaries o' the family, remonstrating, nay, expressly prohibiting my contaminating the blood of Macsarcasm wi' ony thing sprung from a hog's-head or a counting-house. I assure ye my passion for ye is mighty strong, madam; but I canna bring disgrace upon an honourable family.

Char. No more; your apology is baser than your perfidy. There is no truth, no virtue in man!

Sir A. Gude troth, nor in woman neither, that has nae fortune. But here is Mordecai: now, madam, a wandering Eesraelite, a casualty, a mere casualty, sprung frae annuities, bills, bubbles, bears, and lottery-tickets, and can hae nae family objections. He is passionately fond of you; and till this offspring of accident and mammon I resign my interest in ye.

Morde. Sir, I am infinitely obliged to you; but—a—matrimony is a subject I have never thoroughly considered; and I must take some time to deliberate, before I determine upon that inextricable business: besides, madam, I assure you, my affairs are not in a matrimonial situation.

Char. No apology, sir. Begone! I despise you and your apology.

Enter 'SQUIRE GROOM.

Groom. Hoics! hoics! What's the matter here? What is all this? What, are we all at fault? Is this true, Sir Theodore? I hear that you and the filly have both run on the wrong side of the post.

Sir T. It is too true; but I hope, sir, that will make no alteration in your affection.

Groom. Harkye! Sir Theodore, I always make my match according to the weight my thing can carry. When I offered to take her into my stable, she was sound, and in good case; but I hear her wind is touched; if so, I would not back her for a shilling. Matrimony, Sir Theodore, is a cursed long course; devilish heavy and sharp turnings. It won't do; can't come through, my dear; can't come through.

Sir A. I think, 'Squire, ye judge very nicely. Noo, in my thoughts, the best thing the lady can do is to snap the Irishman.

Morde. Well observed, Sir Archy. Snap him, snap him, madam! Hush! he's here.

Enter Sir CALLAGHAN O'BRAILLAGHAN.

Sir A. Ha! my gude friend, Sir Callaghan, I kiss yer hand. I hae been speaking to the lady wi' a' the eloquence I hae; she is enamoured o' yer person, and ye are just come i'the nick to receive her heart and her hand.

Sir C. By the honour of a soldier, madam, I shall think that a greater happiness than any that fortune can bestow upon me.

Sir A. Come, come, madam; true love is impatient, and despises ceremony; gie him yer hand at ance.

Char. No, sir; I scorn to deceive a man who offers me his heart: though my fortune is ruined, my mind is untainted; even poverty shall not pervert it to principles of baseness.

Sir C. Fortune ruined! Pray, Sir Theodore, what does the import of this language mean?

Sir T. The sad meaning is, Sir Callaghan, that, in the circuit of Fortune's wheel, the lady's station is reversed: she who, some hours since, was on the highest round, is now degraded to the lowest: this, sir, has turned the passion these gentlemen professed for her into scorn and ridicule, and I suppose will cool the fervency of your's.

Sir C. Sir Theodore, I assure you, I am heartily glad of her distress.

Sir T. Sir?

Sir C. When she was computed to have a hundred thousand pounds, I loved her 'tis true; but it was with fear and trembling, like a man that loves to be a soldier, yet is afraid of a gun; because I looked upon myself as an unequal match to her; but now she is poor, and that it is in my power to serve her, I find something warm about my heart here, that tells me I love her better than when she was rich, and makes me beg she will take my life this instant, and all I have into her service.

Sir T. Generous, indeed, Sir Callaghan.

Sir C. Madam, my fortune is not much, but it is enough to maintain a couple of honest hearts, and have something to spare for the necessities of a friend, which is all we want, and all that fortune is good for.

Sir T. Here, take her, sir; she is your's, and what you first thought her, mistress of a noble fortune.

Groom. What?

Morde. How's this?

Sir A. Gently! hush! saftly! he is only taking him in, he is taking him in! the bubble's bit!

Sir T. And had she millions, your principles deserve her: she has a heart, loving and generous as your own, which your manly virtue has subdued, and tempered to your warmest wishes.

Sir C. Pray, Sir Theodore, what does all this mean? Are you in jest, or in earnest? By my honour, I don't know how to understand one word you say. First, she has a fortune, then she has no fortune; and then she has a great fortune again! this is just what the little jackanapes about town call humbugging a man.

Sir T. Sir, I am serious.

Sir C. And, pray, what are you, madam? Are you serious, too, or in joke?

Char. Such as I am, sir, if you dare venture upon me for life, I am your's.

Sir C. By the integrity of my honour, madam, I will venture upon you, not only for life, but for death, too! which is a great deal longer than life, you know.

Sir T. I hope, nephew, you will excuse the deceit of my feigned bankruptcy, and the pretended ruin of the lady's fortune: it was a scheme devised to detect the illiberal, selfish views of prodigals, who never address the fair but as the mercenary lure attracts; a scheme to try and reward your passion, which hath shewn itself proof against the time's infection.

Sir C. 'Faith, then, it was no bad piece of generalship in you. But now she has surrendered herself prisoner of war, I think I have a right to lay her under contribution; for your kisses are lawful plunder, and mine by the laws of love. [Kisses her.] Upon my honour, her breath is as sweet as the sound of a trumpet.

Groom. Why, the knowing ones are all taken in here; double-distanced. Zounds! she has run a crimp upon us.

Morde. She has jilted us confoundedly.

Sir A. By the cross o' St. Andrew I'll be revenged; for I ken a lad of an honourable family, that understands the auncient classics in a' their perfection; he is writing a comedy, and he sall insinuate baith their characters intill it.

Morde. And I will write a satire upon her, in which she shall have an intrigue with a life-guard'sman and an opera-singer.

Groom. I can't write; but I'll tell you what I'll do—I'll poison her parrot, and cut off her squirrel's tail, d—e!

Sir C. Harkye! gentlemen, I hope you will ax my leave for all this. If you touch a hair of the parrot's head, or a feather of the squirrel's tail, or if you write any of your nonsensical comedies or lampoons, I shall be after making bold to make a few remarks on your bodies. Ha! I have an excellent pen by my side, that is a very good critic, and that can write a very legible hand upon impertinent authors.

Sir A. Hoot awa! noot awa! Sir Callaghan, dinna talk in that idle manner, sir; oor swords are as sharp and as responsible as the swords of ither men. But this is nae time for sic matters; ye hae got the lady, and we hae got the willows. I am sorry for the little Gargishite here, because he has bespoken his nuptial chariot and a' his leeveries; and, upon honour, I am very sorry for my gude friend the 'Squire here; the lady's fortin wad hae been very convenient till him, for I fancy he is fetlock deep in the turf: and, upon honour, I am sorry for the lady, for she has missed being matched intill the house of Macsarcasm, which is the greatest loss of a'.

Sir C. The whole business together is something like the catastrophe of a stage play, where knaves and fools are disappointed, and honest men rewarded. [Exeunt.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—Part of an ornamented Farm

Enter SIR HARRY GROVEBY and DUPELEY, meeting.

Sir H. Dear Charles, welcome to England! and doubly welcome to Oldworth's Oaks! Friendship, I see, has wings, as well as love.

Dupe. Your summons found me the day after my arrival. Next to my eagerness to see you, was that of being in time for the fête champêtre. Novelty and pleasure are the beings I pursue.

Sir H. You have pursued but their shadows; here they reign, in the manners of this new Arcadia, and the smiles of the sweet maid of the Oaks.

Dupe. Who, in the name of curiosity, is she that bears this romantic title? for your letter was a mere eclogue; the devil a thing could I make out, but a rhapsody upon rural innocence, and an invitation from a gentleman I did not know, to an entertainment I never saw.

Sir H. The business of the day is a wedding, and Charles Dupeley is invited to see his friend, Sir Harry Groveby, united to the most charming of her sex.

Dupe. The devil it is! What, a young fellow of your hope and fortune, sacrificed to a marriage of romance! But, prythee, tell me who she is?

Sir H. An orphan ward of the worthy old gentleman, at whose seat you now are: his character is singular, and as amiable in its way as her's. Inheriting a great estate, and liberally educated, his disposition led him early to a country life, where his benevolence and hospitality are boundless: and these qualities, joined with an imagination bordering upon the whimsical, have given a peculiar turn to the manners of the neighbourhood, that, in my opinion, degrades the polish of courts—but judge of the original.

Enter OLDWORTH.

Mr. Oldworth, I present you my friend; he is just arrived from abroad; I will not repeat how much he is worthy of your friendship.

Old. To be worthy of your's, Sir Harry, is the best recommendation. [To DUPELEY.] Sir, your friend is going to receive from my hands a lovely girl, whose merit he has discerned and loved for its own sake: such nuptials should recall the ideas of a better age: he has permitted me to celebrate them upon my own plan, and I shall be happy to receive the judgment of an accomplished critic.

Dupe. Sir, by what I already see of Oldworth's Oaks, and know of the character of the master, I am persuaded the talent most necessary for the company will be that of giving due praise.

Enter HURRY.

Hur. Lord! sir, come down to the building directly; all the trades are together by the ears; it is for all the world like the tower of Babylon; they have drove a broad-wheel waggon over two hampers of wine, and it is all running among lilies and honeysuckles; one of the cooks stumbled over one of the clouds, and threw a ham and chickens into a tub of white-wash; a lamp-lighter spilt a gallon of oil into a creamed apple-tart; and they have sent for more roses, and there is not one left within twenty miles.

Old. Why, honest Hurry, if there is none to be had, you need not be in such haste about them. Mercy on us! my fête has turned this poor fellow's head already; he will certainly get a fever.

Hur. Get a favour, sir! why, there has not been one left these three hours; all the girls in the parish have been scrambling for them, and I must get a hundred yards more. Lord ha' mercy! there is so much to do at once, and nobody to do it, that it is enough to moider one's head. If you loiter longer, sir, they will all be at loggerheads; they were very near it when I came away. [Exit.]

Old. I forgot to tell you, Sir Harry, that Lady Bab Lardoon is in the neighbourhood, and I expect her every moment.

Dupe. Who is she, pray?

Sir H. Oh! she's a superior! a phoenix! more worthy your curiosity than any object of your travels. She is an epitome, or rather a caricature, of what is called very fine life, and the first female gamester of the time.

Old. For all that, she is amiable: one cannot help discerning and admiring the natural excellence of her heart and understanding, though she is an example that neither is proof against a false education, or a rage for fashionable excesses. But when you see her, she will best explain herself. This fellow will give me no rest.

Re-enter HURRY.

Hur. Rest, sir! why, I have not slept this fortnight: come along, sir; pray, make haste; nothing's to be done without it.

Old. Nor with it, honest Hurry.

[Exit with HURRY.]

Dupe. Pr'ythee, Sir Harry, how came your acquaintance in this odd family?

Sir H. By mere chance: suffice it that I came, saw, and loved. I laid my rank and fortune at the fair one's feet, and would have married instantly; but that Oldworth insisted upon a probation of six months' absence—It has been a purgatory!

Dupe. I should like to see the woman that could entangle me in this manner. Shew me but a woman, from an Italian princess, to a figurante at the French opera; and, at the first glance, I will discover the whole extent of their artifice, find their true lure, and bring them to my hand as easily as a tame sparrow.

Sir H. And pray, my sagacious friend, upon what circumstances have you formed your suspicions that I am more likely to be imposed upon than yourself?

Dupe. Upon every one I have seen and heard; but, above all, upon that natural propensity of every true home-bred Englishman, to think one woman different from another. Now, I hold there is but one woman in the world.

Sir H. I perfectly agree, and Maria is that charming one.

Dupe. Ay; but Maria, and Lady Bab, and Pamela Andrews, and Clarissa Harlowe, and the girl that steals a heart in a country church, and she that picks your pocket in Covent-garden, are one and the same creature for all that; I am always too quick for them, and make fools of them first. Oh! do but try them by the principle I have laid down, you'll find them as transparent as glass.

Sir H. My own principle will answer my purpose just as well; with that perspective I have looked through the woman, and discovered the angel; and you will do the same when you see her, or never brag of your eye-sight more.

Dupe. Rhapsody and enthusiasm! I should as soon discover Mahomet's seventh heaven. But what says your uncle, old Groveby, to this match?

Sir H. 'Faith! I have asked him no questions, and why should I? when I know what must be his answer.

Dupe. Oh! he can never disapprove a passion that soars above the stars.

Sir H. He has all the prejudices of his years and worldly knowledge; the common old gentleman's character—you may see it in every drama from the days of Terence to those of Congreve; though not, perhaps, with quite so much good humour, and so little obstinacy as my uncle shews. He is ever most impetuous when most kind; and I dare trust his resentment will end with a dramatic forgiveness.

Re-enter HURRY.

Hur. Lord! sir, I am out of breath to find you; why, almost everything is ready except yourself; and madam Maria is gone to the grove, and she is so dressed, and looks so charming!

Sir H. Propitious be the hour! Here, Hurry, find out this gentleman's servant, and shew him where he is to dress. [Exit.]

Dupe. Oh! I shall be time enough: Hurry shall first shew me a little of the preparation. What is going forward here? [Approaches the side scene.]

Hur. Hold! sir, not that way; my master lets nobody see his devices and figaries there.

Dupe. Why, what is he doing there, Hurry?

Hur. Doing! as you are a gentleman, I will tell you what he is doing—I hope nobody hears us. [Looking about.] Why, he is going to make the sun shine at midnight, and he is covering it with a thousand yards of sail-cloth, for fear the rain should put it out. Lord! such doings! Here, this way, your honour.

Dupe. But, harkye! honest Hurry, do stand still a moment to oblige me.

Hur. Stand still, sir! Lord, sir! if I stand still, everything stands still; and then what a fine shampeter should we make of it! [Restless.]

Dupe. Who is this maid of the Oaks, friend Hurry?

Hur. A young lady, sir.

Dupe. I thought as much.

Hur. She is one of the most charmingest, sweetest, delightfulest, mildest, beautifullest, modestest, genteeldest, never-to-be-praised-enough, young creature in all the world!

Dupe. And who is her father, pray?

Hur. It is a wise child that knows its own father. Lord bless her! she does not want a father.

Dupe. Not while Mr. Oldworth lives.

Hur. Nor when he is dead neither; everybody would be glad to be her father, and everybody wishes to be her husband; and so, sir, if you have more questions to ask, I'll answer them another time, for I am wanted here, and there, and everywhere.

[Bustles about.]

Dupe. Shew me to my chamber to dress, and I'll desire no more of you at present.

Hur. Bless your honour for letting me go; for I have been very miserable all the while you were talking to me. This way, this way, sir. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The Oaks.

MARIA discovered sitting under a tree.

SONG.—MARIA.

*Come, sing round my favourite tree,
Ye songsters that visit the grove;
'Twas the haunt of my shepherd and me,
And the bark is a record of love.*

*Reclin'd on the turf by my side,
He tenderly pleaded his cause;
I only with blushes reply'd,
And the nightingale fill'd up the pause.
Come, sing, &c.*

Enter OLDWORTH.

Old. Joy to my sweet Maria! may long succeeding years resemble this, her bridal hour! may health, and peace, and love, still inspire her song, and make the harmony of her voice an emblem of her life! But come, my girl, if there is a wish remaining in your heart within my power to gratify, I hope, in this last hour of my cares, I shall not be a stranger to it.

Maria. My mind is incapable of reserve with you: the most generous of men is on the point of giving his hand to your—what shall I call myself? I am almost nameless, but as the creature of your bounty and cares; this title gives me a value in my own eyes, but I fear it is all I have to boast. The mystery you have kept, makes me apprehensive there is something in my origin ought to be concealed. What am I to interpret from your smiles?

Old. Everything that is contrary to your surmises: be patient, sweet maid of the Oaks; before night all mysteries shall be cleared. It is not an ordinary wedding I celebrate, I prepare a feast for the heart—Lady Bab Lardoon, as I live! the princess of dissipation! catch an observation of her while you can, Maria; for though she has been but three days out of London, she is as uncasy as a mole in sun-shine, and would expire if she did not soon dive into her old element again.

Enter Lady BAB LARDOON.

Lady B. Dear Maria, I am happy to be the first of your company to congratulate you. Well, Mr. Oldworth, I am delighted with the idea of your fête; it is so novel, so French, so expressive of what everybody understands, and nobody can explain! then there is something so spirited in an undertaking of expense where a shower of rain would spoil it all.

Old. I did not expect to escape from so fine a lady, but you and the world have free leave to comment upon all you see here. Laugh where you must, be candid where you can. I only hope that to celebrate a joyful event upon any plan, that neither hurts the morals or politeness of the company, and, at the same time, sets thousands of the industrious to work, cannot be thought blame-worthy.

Lady B. Oh! quite the contrary; and I am sure it will have a run: a force upon the seasons and the manners is the true test of a refined taste, and it holds good from a cucumber at Christmas to an Italian opera.

Enter Sir HARRY GROVEBY.

Sir H. I come to claim my lovely bride; here at her favourite tree I claim her mine: the hour is almost on the point, the whole country is beginning to assemble.

Lady B. Sir Harry, I rejoice at your happiness; and do not think me so tasteless, Maria, as not to acknowledge attachment like your's, preferable to all others, when it can be had—filer le parfait amour, is the first happiness in life; but that, you know, is totally out of the question in town; the matrimonial comforts, in our way, are absolutely reduced to two: to plague a man, and to bury him.

Sir H. I heartily congratulate Lady Bab, and all who are to partake of her conversation, upon her being able to bring so much vivacity into the country.

Lady B. Nothing but the fête champêtre could have effected it; for I set out in miserable spirits; I had a horrid run before I left town. I suppose you saw my name in the papers?

Sir H. I did; and, therefore, concluded there was not a word of truth in the report.

Maria. Your name in the papers, Lady Bab!

Lady B. To be sure; have not they begun with you yet, Maria?

Maria. Not that I know of, and I am not at all ambitious of the honour.

Lady B. Oh! but you will have it; the fête champêtre will be a delightful subject! To be complimented one day, laughed at the next, and abused the third; you can't imagine how amusing it is:—“We hear a certain lady, not a hundred miles from Hanover-square, lost, at one sitting, some nights ago, two thousand guineas. O tempora! O mores!”

Old. [Laughing.] Pray, Lady Bab, is the concluding ejaculation your own, or was it the printer's.

Lady B. His, you may be sure: a dab of Latin adds surprising force to a paragraph, besides shewing the learning of the author.

Old. Well, but really, I don't see such a great matter in this; why should you suppose anybody applied this paragraph to you?

Lady B. None but my intimates did, for it was applicable to half St. George's parish; but about a week after they honoured me with initials and italics: “It is said, Lady B. L.'s ill success still continues: it was observed, the same lady appeared at court, in a riband collier, having laid aside her diamond necklace." (Diamond in italics.) At last, to my infinite amusement, out I came at full length: "Lady Bab Lardoon has tumbled down three nights successively; a certain colonel has done the same, and we hear that both parties keep house with sprained ankles."—But, hark! I hear the pastoral's beginning. [Music behind.] Lord! I hope I shall find a shepherd.

Old. The most elegant one in the world; Mr. Dupeley, Sir Harry's friend.

Lady B. You don't mean Charles Dupeley, who has been so long abroad?

Sir H. The very same: I wish you would undertake him; he thinks himself quite an overmatch for the fair sex, of whom his opinion is as ill founded as it is degrading.

Lady B. Oh! is that his turn? What, he has been studying some late posthumous letters, I suppose? 'Twould be a delight to make a fool of such a fellow! Where is he?

Sir H. He is only gone to dress; I appointed to meet him on the other side the grove; he'll be here in twenty minutes.

Lady B. I'll attend him there in your place. I have it: I'll try my hand a little at naiveté; he never saw me; the dress I am going to put on for the fête will do admirably to impose upon him: I'll make an example of his hypocrisy, and his graces, and his usage du monde.

Sir H. My life for it, he will begin an acquaintance with you.

Lady B. If he don't, I'll begin with him: so come along, and we'll make our experiment immediately. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Garden-gate.

Hur. [Without.] Indeed, sir, I can't. Pray, don't insist upon it.

Enter OLD GROVEBY, booted and splashed, pushing in HURRY.

Grove. I must see Sir Harr Groveby, and I will see him. Do ye think—

Hur. Sir Harry won't see you to-day, he has a great deal of business upon his hands; he's going to be married. What would the man have?

Grove. I shall mar his marriage, I believe. [Aside.] I am his uncle, puppy, and ought to be at the wedding.

Hur. Are you so, sir? Bless my heart! why would you not say so? This way, good sir. It was impossible to know you in such a figure; I could sooner have taken you for a smuggler than his uncle: no offence, sir. If you will please to walk in that grove there, I'll find him directly. I am sorry for what has happened; but you did not say you were a gentleman, and it was impossible to take you for one. [Exit.]

Grove. Going to be married! and to whom? to a young girl, without birth, fortune, or without anybody's knowing anything about her; and without so much as saying to me, his uncle, with your leave, or by your leave: if he will prefer the indulgence of a boyish passion, to my affection and two thousand pounds per annum, I shall return to Gloomstock-hall, and make a new will directly. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Grove.

Enter MARIA.

Maria. I wish I may have strength to support my happiness: I cannot get the better of my agitation; and though this day is to complete my wishes, my heart, I don't know how, feels something like distress. But what strange person is coming this way?

Enter OLD GROVEBY.

Grove. Madam, your servant; I hope I don't intrude: I am waiting here for a young gentleman; if I disturb you, I'll walk at the other end.

Maria. Indeed, sir, you don't disturb me. Shall I call anybody to you, sir?

Grove. Not for the world, fair lady. This is a most lovely creature! [Aside.]

Maria. Who can this be? [Aside.]

Grove. I find, madam, there is going to be a wedding here to-day.

Maria. Yes, sir; a very splendid one, by the preparations.

Grove. A very foolish business, to make such a fuss about a matter which both parties may have reason to curse this time twelvemonth.

Maria. I hope not, sir. Do you know the parties?

Grove. One of them, too well, by being a near relation. Do you know the bride, young lady?

Maria. Pretty well, sir; my near acquaintance with her makes me attend here to-day. [Confused.]

Grove. Might I, without being impertinent, beg to know something about her: but you are partial to her, and won't speak your mind.

Maria. I am, indeed, partial to her; everybody is too partial to her; her fortune is much above her deserts.

Grove. Ay, ay, I thought so: sweet lady, your sincerity is as lovely as your person—you really think, then, she does not deserve so good a match?

Maria. Deserve it, sir! so far from deserving it, that I don't know that human creature that can deserve Sir Harry Groveby.

Grove. What a sensible, sweet creature this is! [Aside.] Young lady, your understanding is very extraordinary for your age: you sincerely think, then, that this is a very unequal match?

Maria. Indeed I do, very sincerely.

Grove. And that it ought not to be?

Maria. Ought not to be, sir! [Hesitating.] Upon my word, sir, I scarce know how to answer your question. [Confused.]

Grove. Your delicacy to your friend won't let you speak out; but I understand your objections: nay, I feel them so much, that I am come on purpose to break the match.

Maria. [Astonished.] Indeed, sir!

Grove. Ay, indeed, am I: a silly young puppy! without acquainting me with it, to go so far. I suppose some interested creature, with a little beauty and more cunning, has laid hold of this precious fool of a nephew of mine.

Maria. Your nephew, sir?

Grove. Yes, yes, my nephew; but he must give up his girl, or renounce the relationship.

Maria. But consider, sir, what the poor young woman must suffer!

Grove. She ought to suffer, a designing baggage! Had the young blockhead but half an eye he would have fallen in love with you; and if he had, there had been some excuse for his folly.

Maria. But, sir, pray, let me plead for him.

Groce. Nay, nay; my nephew, as you hinted at first, is a very silly fellow; and, in short, it is a d—d match.

Enter Sir HARRY GROVEY, who starts at seeing his Uncle.

Maria. I cannot stand this interview. [Erit.

Groce. Oh! your humble servant, Sir Harry Grovey! So, you are going to be married, and forgot that you had an uncle living, did you? But where is the old fox that has made a chicken of you? I shall let him know a piece of my mind.

Sir H. Mr. Oldworth, sir, knew nothing of my having an uncle, or he would never have given his consent without your's.

Groce. I have but a short word to say to you: give up the lady, or give up me.

Sir H. Let me entreat you to see her first.

Groce. I have seen a young lady; and I am so put upon my mettle by your ingratitude, that if she would but talk to me half-an-hour longer, I'd take her without a petticoat to Gloomstock-hall, and have my champêtre wedding, too.

Sir H. You are at liberty, sir—

Groce. To play the fool, as you have done: her own friend and companion told me she was undeserving.

Sir H. That Maria was undeserving! where is she who told you so? who is the slanderer? she has deceived you.

Groce. I don't know her name.

Sir H. Where did you see her

Groce. Here, here.

Sir H. When, sir?

Groce. This moment, sir.

Sir H. As I came in, sir?

Groce. Yes, sir, yes; she could not bear the sight of you, and went away.

Sir H. Dear sir, that was Maria herself.

Groce. Maria! what?

Sir H. Maria, the maid of the Oaks, my bride that is to be.

Groce. And she is the person you are going to marry?

Sir H. I cannot deny it.

Groce. If you did, you ought to be hanged: follow me, sir, follow me, sir; shew me to her this moment.

Sir H. What do you mean, sir?

Groce. What's that to you, sir! she has bamboozled you and I, too, and I will be revenged.

Sir H. But, dear sir—

Groce. Don't dear me, I won't rest a moment till I have seen her; either follow me or lead the way, for I must, I will see her directly, and then you shall know, and she too, that I am—Zounds! I'll shew you what I am; and so, come along, you puppy, you!

SCENE III.—A Flower-garden.

Enter Lady BAB LARDOON, dressed as a Shepherdess, OLDWORTH following.

Old. Hist, hist! Lady Bab! Here comes your prize; for the sake of mirth, and the revenge of your sex, don't miss the opportunity.

Lady B. Not for the world; you see I am dressed for the purpose. Step behind that stump of shrubs, and you shall see what an excellent actress I should have made. Away, away!

[Erit OLDWORTH. Lady B. retires.

Enter DUPELEY.

Dupe. Where the devil is Sir Harry? this is certainly the place where I was appointed to find him; but I suppose I shall spring him and his bride from under a rose-bush by-and-by like two pheasants in pairing-time. [Observing Lady B.] Ha! is that a dress, now, for the day, or is she one of the natives of this extraordinary region? Oh! I see now, it is all pure Arcadian; her eyes have been used to nothing but daisy-hunting: but what a neck she has! how beautifully Nature works when she is not spoiled by a d—d town stay-maker! what a pity she is so awkward! I hope she is not foolish.

[During this observation, he keeps his eyes fixed upon her; Lady B. looks first at him, then at herself; unpins her nosegay, and with an air of the most perfect naïveté, presents it to him.

Lady B. You seem to wish for my nosegay, sir; it is much at your service.

[Offers the flowers and curtsies awkwardly.

Dupe. Oh! the charming innocent! my wishes extend a little further. [Aside.] A thousand thanks, my fair one; I accept it as a faint image of your own sweets. To whom am I so much obliged?

Lady B. To the garden-man, to be sure; he has made flowers to grow all over the garden, and they smell so sweet! pray, smell 'em; they are charming sweet, I assure you, and have such fine colours;—La! you are a fine nosegay yourself, I think.

[Simpers and looks at him.

Dupe. Exquisite simplicity! [Aside.] Ah! I knew at first glance you were a compound of innocence and sensibility.

Lady B. Lack-a-daisy heart! how could you hit upon my temper so exactly?

Dupe. By a certain instinct I have; for I have seen few or none of the sort before: but, my dear girl, what is your name and situation

Lady B. Situation!

Dupe. Ay, what are you?

Lady B. I am a bridemaid.

Dupe. But when you are not a bridemaid, what is your way of life? how do you pass your time?

Lady B. I rise with the lark, keep my hands always employed, dance upon a holyday, and eat brown bread with content.

Dupe. Oh! the delicious description!—beechen shades, bleating flocks, and pipes, and pastorals. What an acquisition to my fame, as well as pleasure, to carry off this quintessence of champêtre! 'tis but an annuity job—I'll do it. [Aside.

Lady B. [Examines him.] And pray, what may you be? for I never saw anything so out of the way in all my life. He, he, he! [Simpers.

Dupe. I, my dear—I am a gentleman.

Lady B. What a fine gentleman! Bless me, what a thing it is! Ha, ha, ha! I never saw anything so comical in all my life. Ha, ha, ha! And this is a fine gentleman, of which I have heard so much.

Dupe. What is the matter, my dear? is there anything ridiculous about me, that makes you laugh? What have you heard of fine gentlemen, my sweet innocence?

Lady B. That they are as gaudy as peacocks, as mischievous as jays, as chattering as magpies, as wild as hawks—

Dupe. And as loving as sparrows.

Lady B. I know you are very loving—of yourselves. Ha, ha, ha! You are a sort of birds that flock but never pair.

Dupe. Why, you are satirical, my fairest : and have you heard anything else of fine gentlemen ?

Lady B. Yes, a great deal more : that they take wives for fortunes, and mistresses for shew ; squander their money among tailors, barbers, cooks, and fiddlers ; pawn their honour to sharpers, and their estates to Jews ; and, at last, run to foreign countries to repair a pale face, a flimsy carcass, and an empty pocket :—that's a fine gentleman for you !

Dupe. [Surprised.] Pray, my dear, what is really your name ?

Lady B. [Resuming her simplicity.] My name is Philly.

Dupe. Philly !

Lady B. Philly Nettletop, of the vale.

Dupe. And pray, my sweet Philly, where did you learn this character of a fine gentleman ?

Lady B. Oh ! I learnt it with my catechism. Mr. Oldworth has taught it to all the young maidens hereabout.

Dupe. [Significantly.] So it is from Mr. Oldworth, is it, my charming innocence, that you have learnt to be so afraid of fine gentlemen ?

Lady B. No, not at all afraid ; I believe you are perfectly harmless if one treats you right, as I do our young mastiff at home

Dupe. And how is that, pray ?

Lady B. Why, while one keeps at a distance, he frisks, and he flies, and he barks, and tears, and grumbles, and makes a sad rout about it—Lord ! you'd think he would devour one at a mouthful ; but if one does but walk boldly up and look him in the face, and ask him what he wants, he drops his ears and runs away directly.

Dupe. Well said, rural simplicity, again ! Well, but, my dear heavenly creature, don't commit such a sin as to waste your youth and your charms upon a set of rustics here ; fly with me to the true region of pleasure : my chaise and four shall be ready at the back gate of the park, and we will take the opportunity, when all the servants are drunk, as they certainly will be, and the company is gone tired to bed.

Lady B. [Fondly.] And would you really love me dearly now, Saturdays, and Sundays, and all ?

Dupe. [Aside.] Oh ! this will do without an annuity, I see.

Lady B. You'll forget all this prittle-prattle gibberish to me now, as soon as you see the fine strange ladies, by-and-by ; there's Lady Bab Lardoon, I think they call her, from London.

Dupe. Lady Bab Lardoon, indeed ! I should as soon be in love with the figure of the great mogul at the back of a pack of cards ; if she has anything to do with hearts, it must be when they are trumps, and she pulls them out of her pocket : no, sweet Philly ; thank heaven, that gave me insight into the sex, and reserved me for a woman in her native charms ; here alone she is to be found, and paradise is on her lips. [Struggling to kiss her.

Enter HURRY

Hur. Oh ! Lady Bab, I come to call your ladyship—Lord ! I thought they never kissed at a wedding till after the ceremony.

[Going. DUPELEY stares ; Lady B. laughs.

Dupe. Stay, Hurry, who are you looking for ?

Hur. Why, I came with a message for Lady Bab Larder, and would have carried her answer, but you stopped her mouth.

Dupe. Who—what—who ? This is Philly Nettletop.

Hur. Philly Fiddlestick ! 'Tis Lady Bab Larder, I tell you : do you think I don't know her because she has got a new dress ? [Exit.

Dupe. Lady Bab Lardoon !

Lady B. No, no ; Philly Nettletop.

Dupe. Here's a d—d scrape ! [Aside.

Lady B. In every capacity, sir, a rural innocent, Mr. Oldworth's mistress, or the great mogul, equally grateful for your favourable opinion.

[With a low curtsey.

Enter OLDWORTH and Sir HARRY GROVEBY, laughing.

Mr. Oldworth, give me leave to present to you a gentleman remarkable for second sight ; he knows all women by instinct—

Sir H. From a princess to a figurante, from a vintage to a May-pole ; I am rejoiced I came in time for the catastrophe.

Lady B. Mr. Oldworth, there is your travelled man for you ; and I think I have given a pretty good account of him.

[Pointing at DUPELEY, who is disconcerted.

Old. Come, come, my good folks, you have both acquitted yourselves admirably : Mr. Dupeley must forgive the innocent deceit ; and you, Lady Bab, like a generous conqueror, should bear the triumph moderately.

Sir H. Now this scene is finished, let me open another to you : Maria's charms have been as much signalized as her ladyship's wit : my old uncle Groveby—

Lady B. Of Gloomstock-hall ?

Sir H. The same ; and full primed with the rhetoric of sixty-five, against the marriage of inclination ; but such a conversion ! such a revolution !

Old. Your uncle here ! I must chide you, Sir Harry, for concealing from me that you had a relation so well entitled to be consulted. Which way is he ?

Sir H. I left him all in transport with my bride ; he kisses her, and squeezes her hand : 'gad ! I sha'n't get her away from him, without your help.

Enter OLD GROVEBY with MARIA under his arm.

I was coming to seek you, my Maria.

Grove. Your Maria, sir ! my Maria : she will own me, if you won't ; there, sir, let her teach you your duty.

[Quitting MARIA, who retires with Sir H. to the bottom of the stage.

Old. Sir, I have many pardons to ask of you ; but Sir Harry will be my witness, that my fault was in my ignorance ; had I known your name and situation, I should have paid you my respects months ago.

Grove. Sir, I don't wonder the graceless rogue forgot me ; but I'll be even with him ; he sha'n't have a guinea from me.

Old. Good sir, you are not serious that he has offended you.

Grove. I am serious, that I have found another inheritor for Gloomstock-hall ; I have got a niece worth twenty such nephews. [MARIA and Sir H. approach.] Ay, you may look, sir, but she shall have every acre of it. [Taking MARIA by the hand.] Mr. Oldworth, I intend there shall be no more ceremony between us ; I shall not quit your champêtre, I assure you.

Old. Sir, your good humour and compliance will be a new compliment to the day : my hopes and wishes are accomplished ! my long-projected joys are full, and I will proclaim them! Come to my arms, Maria; I have a father's right; and my child's conduct has made it a proud one.

Maria. How, how, sir?

Old. Excuse me, brother, madam, all: my story is very short, Maria; the hour of your birth made me a widower, and you a splendid heiress; I trembled at the dangers of that situation, made more dangerous by the loss of your mother—to be the object of flattery in the very cradle, and made a prey to interest is the common lot attending it; these reflections induced me to conceal your birth.

Maria. How blind have I been! benevolent as you are to all, I might still have perceived and interpreted the distinction of your unremitting tenderness. Oh! sir, expect not words; where shall I find even sentiments of tenderness, gratitude, and duty, that were not your's before?

Old. To you, Sir Harry, I shall make no apology for my secrecy; it has served to give scope and exercise to your generosity, a sensation more gratifying to minds like your's, than any acquisition of fortune; that pleasure past, accept now, with Maria's hand, the inheritance of Oldworth's Oaks.

Sir H. Sir, your conduct does not surprise, but it overwhelms me; long may you remain the possessor of Oldworth's Oaks! when you cease to be so, he will ill deserve to succeed you who does not make your example the chief object of his imitation.

Lady B. Mr. Oldworth, you promised us a singular regale, but you have outdone yourself.

Grove. Regale! Egad! I don't know what to call it; he has almost turned the champêtre into a tragedy, I think.

Old. My worthy friend, I have robbed you of a pleasure; I know you also had your eye upon my maid of the Oaks, for an exercise of your generosity.

Enter HURRY.

Hur. An't please your honour and worship, here are all the quality persons in fanciful dresses; you never saw such a sight; they are, for all the world, like the Turks and Prussians; do but look at 'em, how they come prancing along through the grove. I never saw anything so fine, and so proud, and so fantastical! Lord! I wonder anybody will ever wear a coat and waistcoat again! this is shampeter, indeed!

Grove. My friend Hurry is in the right; Harry, come and help to dress me; for, till I have got my fool's coat on, I can't make one among them.

Sir H. I'll wait upon you. My sweet Maria, I must leave you for a few minutes—for an age.

Old. My heart is now disburthened, and free to entertain my friends: come, Maria, let us meet them, and shew in our face the joy of our hearts: will your ladyship and Mr. Dupeley assist us?

[Exit Sir H.]

Lady B. Oh! most willingly, Mr. Oldworth.

Re-enter HURRY.

Hur. Gentlemen, nobility, ladies, and gentry, you are all wanted in the temple of Venice to—but I'll not say what, that you may be more surprised; and if you are surprised here, you'll be more surprised there; and we sha'n't have done with you there neither: pray, make haste, or you'll get no place.

[All crowd off but OLDWORTH, OLD GROVEBY, DUPELEY, and LADY BAB.]

Dupe. Well, Lady Bab, are your spirits quite exhausted, or have the events of the day made you pensive? I begin to believe there are more rational systems of happiness than ours: should my fair instructor become a convert, my ambition would be still to follow her.

Lady B. I am no convert; my mind has ever been on the side of reason, though the torrent in which I have lived has not allowed me time to practise, or even to contemplate it as I ought; but to follow fashion, where we feel shame, is surely the strongest of all hypocrisy, and from this moment I renounce it.

Grove. And you never made a better renounce in your life.

Dupe. To those charms I owe my conversion; and there wants but the hand of Lady Bab to make Oldworth's Oaks distinguished by another union, founded on merit in her sex, and discernment in mine.

Lady B. Sir, your proposal does me honour; but it is time enough to talk of hearts and hands: after the life we have led, six months' probation may be very proper for us both.

Old. Lady Bab, confer the gift when you please; but my fête champêtre shall be remembered as the date of the promise: and now for such a song and dance as will best conclude so happy a day.

[Ereunt.]

SCENE IV.—A grand Saloon.

Enter Masqueraders, with all the Characters in the piece.

FINALE.

Shepherd. Ye fine-fangled folks, who, from cities and courts,

*By your presence enliven the fields,
Accept for your welcome innocent sports,
And the fruits that our industry yields.*

Cho. Ye fine-fangled folks, &c.

*No temple we raise to the idol of wealth,
No altar to interest smokes;
To the blessings of love, kind seasons, and health,
Is devoted the feast of the Oaks.*

Cho. No temple we raise, &c.

Shepherdess. From the thicket and plain, each favourite haunt,

*The villagers hasten away:
Your encouraging smile is the bounty they want,
To compensate the toils of the day.*

Cho. From the thicket, &c.

*The milk-maid abandons her pail and her cow,
In the furrow the ploughman unyokes,
From the valley and meadow all press to the brow,
To assist at the feast of the Oaks.*

Cho. The milk-maid, &c.

Shepherd. The precept we teach is contentment and truth,

*That our girls may not learn to beguile;
By reason to govern the pleasures of youth,
And decorate age with a smile.*

Cho. The precept we teach, &c.

*No serpent approaches with venomous tooth,
No raven with ominous croaks,
Nor rancorous critic, more fatal than both,
Shall poison the feast of the Oaks.*

Cho. No serpent approaches, &c.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The Place of St. Giorgio Maggiore at sunset.

Enter PAROZZI, followed by MEMMO.

Mem. But be patient, Parozzi; at least be patient!

Par. Patient? Has not Rosabella rejected me? nay; when I taxed her with a passion for Flodoardo, did she not insultingly contrast the virtues by which he dignified his obscurity, with the vices by which, she said, my nobility was disgraced?

Mem. Well, well! To be sure nothing is half so disagreeable as truth; and it's certainly mighty provoking—

Par. Provoking! If I forgive her——! But her fate is fixed! She dies.

Mem. Dies? My dear Parozzi, don't look so fierce, or I shall certainly take to my heels! D—d—dies, said you?

Par. She dies! the Bravo Rugantino has received his hire.

Mem. Rugantino! I had much rather you wouldn't mention him.

Par. He, at whose name all Venice quakes.

Mem. I don't know what all Venice does; but I'm sure I do!

Par. Annually, on the evening before her birthday, Rosabella goes in solemn procession to pass some hours alone in the shrine of her patroness, St. Rosa. There will Rugantino meet her this very night; there too will I be!

Mem. You? Won't it be dangerous too?

Par. Ha! my revenge would be but half gratified, did I not see the blow struck myself! did not Rosabella hear as she expires, "Remember the scorned Parozzi." [A galley passes at a distance.] But look, Memmo, is not that the galley—

Mem. Which carried out Contarino? 'tis the same! It approaches! Contarino is on board.

The galley arrives—CONTARINO springs on shore.

Par. and Mem. Welcome, Contarino: welcome!

Par. Quick; your tidings—

Con. Are excellent. The emperor approves of our conspiracy: in a week his troops will arrive to assist us, and then shall we be masters of Venice. But the duke's prime counsellors, Manfrone and Lomelino, suspect our plans, and traverse them: they must be despatched immediately.

Par. For that have I already provided; Rugantino is in my pay, and—

Con. Rugantino? I have heard much of this strange man; but what I am to believe—

Par. Learn that from me. Soon after your departure a young stranger arrived here, called Floardo. His plausible manners pleased the duke; his Apollo-like form fascinated Rosabella; but he became the general idol when he found means to seize the five banditti, who had so long been the terror of Venice. We knew them well, Contarino, and had often found their daggers of use.

Con. But how did he discover their lurking-place?

Par. I know not; suffice it to say, that the five banditti were executed; but on the following morning this paper was found affixed to the palace-gates.

Con. [Reading.] "Venetians! the banditti who suffered yesterday have left a sixth behind them, whose single arm equals those of the other five. Ye, who need my dagger, seek me! As a proof of my skill, let St. Bertrand's cave be searched; 'twas there I stabbed to the heart the senator Carlo Foscari.—From the Venetian bravo, Rugantino."—Carlo Foscari?

Par. The duke's near kinsman, who had disappeared some months before.

Con. This paper shows a daring mind.

Par. "Ha!" cried I, when I had perused it, "this is the very man we need!" But Rugantino knew of my connection with his deceased associates, and ere I had time to seek him, he found me. Oh! 'tis the ugliest knave—his face so deform'd by scars—his eye-brows so black and bushy—then his smile is a terrific grin, and when he laughs, the sound is enough to scare mirth out of the universe.

Con. But Lomelino and Manfrone—

Par. He has engaged to despatch them the instant that he receives 10,000 ducats.

Con. Oh! a trifle! Memmo is rich; he'll furnish them.

Mem. I? That's ever your way. Always Memmo! and nothing but Memmo!

Con. Simpleton! If our plot succeeds, have we not promised—

Mem. Yes, yes! I own you give me plenty of promises—but you take from me plenty of realities! However, you shall have the 10,000 ducats this once; though I protest, it's like parting with ten thousand drops of my heart's blood.

Par. Peace, peace! Have you brought the arms, Contarino?

Con. Yes: where shall I deposit—

Par. Oh! at Memmo's, where we'll meet again at ten to-night.

Mem. The arms at my house? Dear, dear! now why at mine? If the house should be searched, then I shall get into a scrape, and—

Par. Silence! It shall be so. Till ten, farewell, Contarino.

Con. Farewell.

[Exeunt CON. and PAR.]

Mem. Now that's the way I'm always treated! they borrow my money, make me their scape goat, snap my nose off on all occasions, and all because I'm rather apt to be afraid, and honest enough to own it. Hang it! I'll try whether putting on a huff-bluff look like themselves, and strutting with a swaggering stride, thus, won't awe them into—[Noise without.] Hey! what's all this uproar?

Enter Herald, followed by JUANILLO, BETTINA, PAOLO, and Mob.

Juan. Silence!

Bet. Aye, aye! let's hear the proclamation.

Paolo. Silence! silence!

Juan. Aye: silence! silence!

Mem. Why don't somebody knock that fellow down, who makes such a noise with crying silence?

All. Knock him down! knock him down! silence!

Herald, [Reading.] "Whereas, the senator Foscari was found murdered by the Bravo Rugantino, the Duke hereby promises five hundred ducats to any one who shall discover where the murderer is concealed." God save the Duke!

[Exit.]

ACT. DRAMA.—NOS. 101 & 102.

All. Huzza!

Mem. Now, friends, here's a good round sum to be earned by some of you.

Juan. By none of us, Signor Memmo. Oh! this Rugantino's a terrible fellow! why, when young Flodoardo seized the five other banditti, didn't this Rugantino, who was the sixth, still contrive to escape?

Enter STEPHANO.

Steph. I'm beyond my time, and I fear Camilla—Hey-day, what do all these people here?

Juan. But why did Flodoardo leave Venice?

Mem. 'Tis suspected, he was in love with the duke's daughter, who is already promised to the prince of Milan.

Steph. What say they of my master.

Juan. Well, before he left us, I wish he had caught this Rugantino as finely as he caught his five companions: I protest I can't sleep for fear of the villain.

Paolo. Nor I.

Juan. Nor I.

Steph. I see Camilla coming. Now then to scare them away.

Juan. One thing's certain: If ever Rugantino's found, Flodoardo is the only man to take him.

Mem. The only man?—Come, come! there are others. I don't boast of my courage.

Juan. And I'm sure, nobody else does, who knows you, Signor.

Mem. But if I once set eyes on this Rugantino, I'll put myself into this attitude, spring upon him thus, and exclaim in a terrible voice—

Steph. [Approaches softly.] Rugantino's coming!

All. [Running off.] Where? where? where?

Run! run! run!

Steph. [Advances, laughing.] Rugantino's name sent them off like so many peas out of a pop-gun. But to give the devil his due, Signor Memmo ran by far the fastest. Now then for this antiquated duenna, who, in defiance of time and her looking-glass, fancies herself a girl of fifteen; and who is so passionately fond of dancing, that she even walks the streets in a fandango step. 'Tis a hard task which the prince of Milan has put on me, to make love to this superannuated coquette; but as he insists that no means of shaking Rosabella's constancy to Flodoardo should be left untried—she's here.

Enter CAMILLA.

Cam. Is it you, Signor Stephano?

Steph. And is it you, divine object of my—

Cam. Oh? sweet Signor, no raptures, if you love me! 'Tis late, and I'm so pressé, as the French have it, I've only time to assure you, that I've spared no pains to influence my lady in your master's favour.

Steph. And what success—

Cam. Absolutely none! her love to Flodoardo is immovable; but perhaps when the duke shall know of her attachment to this needy stranger, his remonstrances may induce her to give him up—but bless me! I must away, for I've a thousand things to do. You must know, that to-morrow night the duke gives a grand fête on one of the islands of the Adriatic sea, in honour of his daughter's birth-day. A mask is to be performed, called "The Triumph of Thetis;" and my lady, myself, and some other beauties of the court are to represent heathen goddesses. Now you must know, that I'm reckoned excellent in a mask.

Steph. I don't doubt it, Signora; I dare say, I should admire you in a mask more than in any other way.

Cam. And how, do you think, I was disguised at the last masquerade?

Steph. How, pray?

Cam. How? As Venus! Wasn't that charming?

Steph. As Venus? Ah! Signora, how admirably you must have been disguised!

Cam. Nobody found me out the whole night!

Steph. I dare say not; how the devil should they?

[Aside.]

Cam. And when I unmasked, the surprise!

Steph. Was excessive, I doubt not.

Cam. Universal, Signor! As to the duke, he was perfectly thunderstruck.

Steph. Struck, Signora? He must have been struck all of a heap! why, if I had been there, I don't think I should ever have recovered it!

Cam. And now guess, which of the heathen goddesses I am to be to-morrow night!

Steph. I can't imagine—Medusa perhaps; or very likely one of the three—furies. [Aside.]

Cam. A syren, signor! a syren!

Steph. A syren? Ah! signora, I shouldn't have guess'd that in a century!

Cam. And I've such a divine dress! I shall be all over sea-weed and cockle-shells, with a comb in one hand, and a looking-glass in t'other; and I shall dance an entire new pas seul, and—you never saw me dance, I think?

Steph. Frequently!

Cam. Indeed! Where, pray?

Steph. [Bowing.] In my dreams, signora!

Cam. [Aside.] In his dreams! How delicate a compliment! How refined, how fanciful, how far-fetched, how French!

Steph. But as you're to be a syren, oh! too adorable Camilla, suffer me to be your attendant triton!

Cam. An attendant triton? charming! Granted! granted, sweet signor!

Steph. Then need I not envy Neptune himself the possession of his Amphitrite!

Cam. [Aside.] Heroic creature! Let me die, but he's quite a pastor fido!—But I must begone.

Steph. First in the prince's name let me force this jewel upon your finger, and next in my own print a kiss on your snowy hand? [Kneeling.]

Cam. Oh! mercy! I desire—I entreat—je vous jure—

Steph. [Rising.] Nectar and ambrosia!

Cam. Oh! sweet signor!

Steph. Divine signora!

Cam. Adieu!

Steph. Farewell!

Both. Adieu! adieu! adieu!

Ereunt.

Enter PAROZZI.

Par. She comes! my lovely victim comes! But no more does my heart melt with tenderness at thy sight, Rosabella! No; hatred fills my bosom wholly, and should Rugantino's dagger fail, my own—they are here! Now then for St. Rosa's shrine! Away! [Erit.]

[A solemn procession crosses the stage. ROSABELLA, LAURA, and Ladies, Priests with lighted torches, &c. BETTINA, JUANILLO, PAOLO, and Mob, as spectators.]

SCENE II.—A Hall in the Palace.

Enter LOMELINO and MANFRONE.

Man. Enough, Lomelino; the prince of Milan may depend on my services.

Lom. His plans are daring and romantic, it's true; but still—

Man. Hush! the duke.

Enter the DUKE, with a paper.

Duke. Oh! insolence unparalleled! Look, my friends! this paper is from Rugantino.

Man. How?

Lom. And it contains—?

Duke. Read! read!

Lom. [Reading.] “Duke of Venice,—In your late proclamation you promise to any one who shall discover Rugantino, fire hundred ducats; now to any one who shall seize him, I promise five thousand. Your servant, signor; Rugantino.” Unheard-of assurance! But how did this paper reach you?

Duke. Will you believe me, friends! 'Twas fixed against my chamber-door! against my very chamber-door!

Man. Inconceivable!

Duke. Nothing is safe from this miscreant! I tremble for myself—for Venice—for my child—Say, where is Rosabella?

Lom. She ever passes the night preceding her birth-day in St. Rosa's shrine alone.

Duke. Alone? In this time of danger that must not be! Good Manfrone, tell Camilla to bear my orders, that her lady should return instantly. [Erit MANFRONE.] Follow me, Lomelino! I am half mad with anger and confusion! [Ereunt.]

SCENE III.—An illuminated Church, with St. Rosa's shrine in the centre. On one side large iron-grated doors; on the other a magnificent tomb, on which is inscribed “Here lies Carlo Foscari, who was inhumanly murdered by the Bravo, Rugantino.” THE PATRIARCH OF VENICE, Monks, PAROZZI, BETTINA, JUANILLO, PAOLO, and Spectators are discovered in groups. The procession enters through the iron gates. ROSABELLA kneels to the PATRIARCH; he gives her his benediction, and then orders the Spectators to withdraw; they all obey, except PAROZZI, who conceals himself behind the tomb. The PATRIARCH then retires with the Monks, closing the iron gates after him. ROSABELLA desires to be left alone, and LAURA and the Ladies retire.

Ros. I know not why, but an unusual dread has seized on my heart—this sacred place—the dead and awful silence—that tomb too, where rests the murdered Foscari—Let me banish these terrors in prayer at yonder shrine. Oh! Flodoardo. [Going.]

[During this speech a Beggar comes slowly from behind a tomb, and leans on a staff.]

Beg. Alack! alack!

Ros. What feeble voice—?

Beg. Will no one aid a poor old man?

Ros. Lean on me, father! Lean on me!

Beg. Thanks, dear lady! The dampness of these marble walls—Alas! I faint!

Ros. And there is no seat—Stay! stay! [Draws a couch from the shrine; the Beggar sinks upon it: ROSABELLA kneels behind him, and supports his head.] Rest here, father! Perhaps this essence may revive. [Giving a smelling-bottle.]

Beg. Kindest lady! You are—you are the duke's daughter, I think?

Ros. I am.

Beg. Oh! dear lady. [Suddenly altering his voice.] Start not! your life is in danger!

Ros. My life?

Beg. [Clasping her hand.] Hush! Fear nothing!

You shall not die; but if you value existence, be silent.

Ros. Unhand me! I'll fly, and—[Attempting to go; the Beggar suddenly starts up, still detaining her, and whistles; she sinks on one knee, as if imploring mercy. PAROZZI springs from behind the tomb.

Par. Is't done? [The Beggar has drawn a dagger, which he points to the kneeling ROSABELLA.] Ha!—Strike, I say! Strike, or thus—[Drawing his dagger and rushing to stab her.

Beg. I strike! [At the moment that PAROZZI raises his arm, the Beggar stabs him; ROSABELLA starts from the ground, but the Beggar still detains her, and she falls exhausted into his arms.] Fear not! tremble not! but mark me! I have saved your life; Rosabella, remember that! Remember too, that from this hour our fates are united indissolubly! thou art mine, Rosabella; thou never shalt be another's.

Ros. Thine? thine?

Beg. Mine! [Holding up the dagger.] I swear it by this blood, which I have shed for thee! by this heart, which I would drain for thee! by this kiss, thou Bravo's bride!

Ros. [Struggling.] Fearful man; my voice—my cries—

Enter CAMILLA, by the iron gate.

Cam. Signora, I come. Help! murder, murder!

[Erit.

Beg. I must away! But know'st thou, who press'd thy cheek, Rosabella? Go; tell thy father, the proud duke, 'twas the Bravo Rugantino!

Ros. Rugantino?

[She staggers back, and supports herself against a pillar.

Re-enter CAMILLA, followed by the PATRIARCH, and Monks, with torches; LAURA and the Ladies also return in confusion. While they enter, RUGANTINO throws off his false beard and Beggar's dress, and appears as a Friar; he steps behind a pillar, draws a cowl over his face, and when the Monks enter, he mixes with the crowd.

Cam. This way, this way!

Patriarch. No one is here.

Cam. 'Twas a Beggar, whose bloody dagger—Patriarch. Search every aisle. Away!

[They disperse.

Rug. [As he passes ROSABELLA, whose Ladies are listening to CAMILLA's story, he clasps her hand, and says in a low voice] Remember!

Ros. [Starting.] Heavens! that friar is—

Rug. [Shows her the bloody dagger.] I saved your life!

Ros. Leave me! save yourself! fly!

Rug. [Aloud, in a sanctified tone.] Benedicite! fair daughter. [Erit.

Ros. I die; oh, support me!

[Her Ladies crowd around her; the PATRIARCH and Monks return.

SCENE IV.—A Chamber in Memmo's House.

Enter CONTARINO, FALIERI, and GONZAGA. Servants bring in a Table, with goblets, lights, &c.

Fal. 'Tis strange that Parozzi is not yet arrived.

Con. 'Tis past the hour he mentioned.

Gon. Memmo too, who went to seek him, returns not.

[During these speeches, the Servants arrange the table, and retire.

Con. Where is the place of general rendezvous? Fal. In the ruined Carthusian Monastery. When last we mustered—

Mem. [Without.] Contarino! Falieri!

Con. 'Tis Memmo's voice.

MEMMO rushes in, followed by PISANI.

Mem. There! there's a pretty spot of work.

Con. What's the matter?

Mem. There's a fine kettle of fish.

Con. What's the matter, I say?

Mem. The devil's the matter! murder's the matter! hanging's the matter! The matter! Parozzi is—he is—I can't bring my tongue to speak such a terrible word.

Pis. Friends, Parozzi is murdered.

Con. Murdered?

Fal. By whom?

Mem. By whom? by that fiend in a human form; by that pest, from whose knife no man's throat is safe; by Rugantino.

Con. Fal. and Gon. Rugantino?

Pis. Even so.

Mem. And what's worst, Parozzi has let him into our secret; and to obtain his own pardon, perhaps at this moment the Bravo is telling all to the duke.

Con. Confusion!

[Noise without.

Fal. Steps on the stairs.

Mem. I dare say, the officers of justice.

Gon. Bar the door!

[CONTARINO bars it hastily—knocking.

Mem. We're all undone!

[Knocking.

Con. Is there no outlet?

Mem. None, none, except one. Thirty feet high, out of the window into the canal!

[Knocking

A Voice. [Without.] Open, I say!

All Consp. What's that? what's that?

Con. Who speaks?

[The door bursts open, and RUGANTINO appears in his Bravo's habit; his face is marked with several scars.

Rug. Rugantino! Your slave, sweet gentlemen conspirators.

Mem. I'm a dead man.

Con. You among us? You, Parozzi's murderer?

Rug. Right, but mark me, I loved Rosabella, Parozzi was my rival, and I stabbed him to the heart. Now swear that Rosabella shall be mine, elect me your chief, and I'll keep your secret.

Con. You our chief? Think you we'll stoop—

Rug. Ye have stooped to vice; can ye stoop lower? Will you accept my terms?

All. Never!

Rug. Then go your own way; mine leads to the duke—to the duke, sweet signors! Farewell!

[Going.

Con. [Placing himself before the door, which he closes.] Not so fast! draw, friends, draw! the villain's in our power, and—

[All draw.

Rug. In your power? Ho. ho! [Laughing.] Now listen. When I left my home—

Mem. That must be there for certain.

[Pointing downwards

Rug. Silence!

Mem. Oh, mercy on me!

Rug. I left on my table a sealed packet, containing a full account of your plans. This packet, if I return not before the clock strikes eleven, will be conveyed to the duke. Now then, if you choose to stab me, I'll lend you a sword myself.

[Throwing himself carelessly into a seat.

Con. Before eleven?

[The chimes are heard.

Mem. And hark ! it chimes the three quarters. Oh ! go, go, go, my dear Rugantino !

Rug. Do you accept my terms ?

All. We do, we do !

Rug. A list of your associates.

Con. Thou hast it.

[Giving a paper.]

Rug. [Rises.] So ! the attack must be made to-morrow night.

Con. To-morrow ? The emperor's troops not arrived—

Rug. Cowards ! Have ye not a host in Rugantino ?

Con. It must not be, for—

Rug. No, must not ? Then here I sit, and the clock must strike eleven.

[Resuming his seat.]

Mem. Sit ? sit ? For heaven's sake, consent to every thing if he will but go.

Con. I could tear my flesh. Rugantino, be all as thou wilt. But time flies—the packet—

Rug. Nay, I go ; but first some wine.

Mem. [Filling a goblet hastily.] There, there, my dear little fellow !

Rug. Now pledge me, pledge me on your knees !

[All take goblets and kneel, except RUGANTINO.]

All. We pledge you, Rugantino !

Rug. [Starts from his chair.] Ho, ho ! Look, how low guilt can reduce the proudest. Rise, rise ! Rugantino will not deign to drink with you. [Dashing down the Goblet.] Farewell !

[Going.]

Con. [To FALIERI.] At least I'll watch whither—

[Following him ; RUGANTINO turns suddenly round, and presents a pistol at him.]

Rug. Follow me, and I fire. 'This pistol can kill but one, 'tis true ; but who among you chooses to be that one ?

Mem. Not I, I'm sure !

Rug. Then let no one quit the room, till he hears my whistle, or he dies. [He stops at the door, takes off his hat, and bows.] Sweet signors, eternally your slave.

[Exit.]

Mem. Thank heaven ! he's gone at last.

Con. 'Tis in vain to struggle.

Fal. We are in his toils ; yet if he's honest, he'll be a powerful ally.

[The whistle is heard.]

Con. Hark ! 'tis the signal.

Fal. Away then !

[Exeunt.]

Mem. Aye, aye, away with you ! Oh ! Memmo, Memmo, Memmo ! Cursed was the hour, when you poked your foolish noddle into a plot.

[Exit.]

SCENE V.—Rosabella's Chamber.

Enter ROSABELLA and CAMILLA.

Cam. Yes, child ; your adventure with this Bravo has made the duke resolve, that you shall marry the prince of Milan instantly. As to your love for Flodoardo—

Ros. Love, Camilla ? Dear, dear, there's no love in the case ; what I feel for him is friendship—esteem ; and surely Flodoardo deserves to inspire such sentiments. Deserves ? Ah, what does Flodoardo not deserve ?

Cam. Very well ; then you'd be quite contented, were Flodoardo to marry another woman ?

Ros. Oh, but Flodoardo would not marry another woman ; of that I'm quite sure, Camilla.

Cam. Ah ! child, child ! I see this Flodoardo will make you give a great deal of pain to your dear good father.

[Practising her dance.]

Ros. Indeed ? Then I am sure I wish I had never seen him. This odious Flodoardo—to make me give pain—I'm quite vexed with him—quite angry—I don't like him at all !

Cam. What, not like him ?

Ros. No, not at all !

[Hesitating.]

Cam. Not at all.

Ros. Not that I hate him neither ; for you know, Camilla, there's no reason why I should hate this poor dear Flodoardo ?

Cam. But there are reasons why you should try to forget him.

Ros. Oh ! as to that, I protest, I vow so often every day to think no more of him, that all day long I think of nothing else ! and when he declared his love, didn't I frown and order him to quit Venice ? though I'm sure, I've done nothing but weep ever since he obeyed me ? Now what can I do more, Camilla ? I'll go to my father, avow everything to him, and perhaps—

Cam. [Dancing.] No ; that step's not right.

Ros. And why is that step not right ?

Cam. Because first you should sink thus ; then borée thus, then—

[Dancing.]

Ros. What, before I go to my father ?

Cam. Lord ! child, I wasn't thinking about your father ; I was thinking of my new pas seul, which I mean to dance at the fête to-morrow.

Ros. Psha !

Enter LAURA.

Laura. Signora Camilla, your syren's dress is finished.

Cam. Oh ! charming ! I come, dear Laura.

[Exit LAURA.]

Ros. What ! a syren's dress ?

Cam. Yes ; as you are to be the goddess Thetis, I mean to be one of your syrens. Oh ! such a dress, Signora !

[Going.]

Ros. Stay, stay, Camilla. Surely, at your age—

Cam. My age ? Let me die, child, but to hear you talk, one would think I was quite passée ! Because the bud is more delicate, has the rose full-blown no merits ? Because I mayn't do for the blaze of meridian day, is there no such thing as candle-light beauty ? Let me tell you, child, that in the eyes of some people, some people may have scarcely less charms than—some people ; and though I mayn't represent quite as well as yourself the goddess of spring, I flatter myself I may still figure with great effect as a summer syren. But time runs away, my tire-woman waits, and I fly to arrange my cockle-shells. Adieu, mademoiselle.

[Exit, dancing.]

Ros. Poor Camilla ! what pity that with so good a heart the levity of her head—yet why blame a folly so innocent, and which keeps her in such good humour with herself and others ? Ah ! rather let me strive to dispel my own delusion, so dangerous to myself and so repugnant to the wishes of my friends. Oh ! Love, love, love ! Dear, dear, I wish I didn't know what the disagreeable word means !

[Exit.]

SCENE VI.—The Duke's Bed-chamber. A balcony in the centre ; on one side a bed in an alcove, on the other a large mirror.

The DUKE, LOMELINO, MANFRONE, STEPHANO, BERTOLDO, and Attendants discovered. The DUKE delivers letters to STEPHANO, who goes off. The DUKE dismisses the rest, and seats himself.

Duke. Yet, after all, it must be owned, this Rugantino is a singular character ! The man, who can do what he has done, must possess such talents and such courage, as at the head of an army would enable him to conquer half the world! Would I could once see this Rugantino!

Rug. [Who during this speech has come softly from the alcove, and now claps the DUKE on the shoulder.] Look up, then!

[The DUKE starts from his chair; RUGANTINO nods to him familiarly.]

Duke. Man—who art thou?

Rug. Thou seest me; and can'st doubt? Well then, I am the Bravo Rugantino; Foscari's murderer, and the republic's most devoted slave.

Duke. Rugantino, thou art a fearful, a detestable man!

Rug. Aye! Well, perhaps I am so; but at least 'tis certain, Andreas, that you and I stand on the same line; for at this moment are we the two greatest men in Venice, you in your way, I in mine. [The DUKE moves towards the door, RUGANTINO bars his passage.] Hold, friend! not so fast! we must first have some conversation.

Duke. Indeed! then be this the subject. Mark me, miscreant! Instantly confess who bribed you to murder Foscari, abjure your bloody trade, quit the republic, or I swear—

Rug. Quit it? abjure—and why should I do all this? through fear of thee? Ho, ho! [Laughing.] through fear of Venice? Ha! Rugantino fears not Venice; 'tis Venice that fears Rugantino! Quit the republic? Well; on one condition—

Duke. Name it.

Rug. 'Tis a mere trifle. Give me your daughter for my bride.

Duke. Insolent! My daughter is already a prince's bride. Within this hour my written promise sent to the Prince of Milan—

Rug. Aye? Well, well; within another hour this dagger in the prince's heart shall make your written promise void.

Duke. Has heaven no lightnings?

[Goes to his seat.]

Rug. Hear yet more: I've sold for ten thousand ducats the lives of your friends Lomelino and Manfrone; now give me Rosabella, and I'll break the bargain.

Duke. [Snatches up the light, and hastens to the door.] Monster! Guards, guards!

Rug. Say you so? Thus then.

[Takes off his hat, and strikes out the light with it; then steps back to the mirror, which he pushes away, and passes through the aperture.]

Duke. Ha! miscreant. Lights! lights, I say!

[The door opens.]

Rug. [Putting his head out.] Au revoir, good father that is to be.

[Closes the mirror.]

Enter BERTOLDO and Guards, with torches.

Duke. Seize him.

Ber. Whom, my lord? We see no one.

[The Guards search the room.]

Duke. Traitors! Have you let him pass?

Ber. Pass? No one has past us.

Duke. Not pass'd you?

Ber. Nor is any one here.

Duke. My brain turns round! 'Tis a fiend in human shape.

Enter ROSABELLA.

Ros. Dear father, what means—

Duke. Oh! my child—Rugantino—even now he was here.

Ros. Good heavens!

Duke. He threatened to—[To BERTOLDO.] Call Manfrone and Lomelino hither instantly. Fly!

[Exit BERTOLDO.]

Steph. [Without.] Where is the duke?

Duke. What new alarm?

Enter STEPHANO.

Steph. Justice, justice! The prince of Milan—

Duke. Say on! Be quick!

Steph. Within this hour arrived at Venice. Even now I found him in his chamber—bleeding—dying.

Duke. Heavens!

Steph. He murmured "A base assassin—" and expired. Near him lay your written promise; a bloody dagger was struck through it, and—

Duke. That dagger—Bring it! Away!

[Exit STEPHANO.]

Enter BERTOLDO.

Ber. [A letter in his hand.] My lord, the chambers of Manfrone and Lomelino both are vacant. In vain—[A sealed packet is thrown on the stage.]

Duke. What's that?

Ber. This letter was thrown into the balcony.

[Giving it to the DUKE.]

Duke. Manfrone's hand? I tremble. Read, read, my child.

Ros. [Opens it, and reads.] "Lomelino lies dead at my feet, and his murderer compels me to write this in his blood—I die, Andreas, and by the hand of—"

[Screams, and drops the letter, which the DUKE snatches up.]

Enter STEPHANO and Guards.

Steph. Here is the dagger, and on the hilt stands the name of—

Ros. [Looking at the dagger.] }

Duke. [Examining the letter.] } 'Tis Rugantino.

Rug. [Without.] Ho, ho!

All. Hark!

[Some run to the balcony, the rest remain in amazement.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Palace Gardens.

"Huzzas" are heard without, and shouts of "Flodoardo! Flodoardo!"

Enter ROSABELLA from the palace.

Ros. He is returned! Flodoardo is returned! Oh! joy past utterance. But he returned against my positive orders; I must be angry with him, very angry. But alas the day! how shall I manage to conceal my pleasure. See, see, he comes!

Enter RUGANTINO, clad in glittering armour, from the palace. Every trace of deformity is gone.

Rug. [Aside.] She's here; and oh! so lovely! Alas! sweet maid! how would the roses of thy cheek grow pale, knew'st thou, that the man now approaching is the dreaded Rugantino. [He advances, bowing.] Lady!

Ros. [Aside.] Cavalier—I—you—you have been very long absent—that is—I mean—did you receive much pleasure from your travels?

Rug. Much; for everywhere I heard the praise of Rosabella.

Ros. Flodoardo! will you again offend me?

Rug. After this hour I shall never offend you more. Lady, I come to say farewell—for ever?

Ros. For ever? Ah! Flodoardo, and can you then leave me? Can you leave my father, I meant to say?

Rug. Your father?

Ros. His friendship for you is so warm—

Rug. I value it highly; but it cannot make me happy.

Ros. Does then your happiness require so much?

Rug. It does, it does! But one boon can make me happy; I have begged for it on my knees! [Pressing her hand to his lips.] I have begged for it, Rosabella, and my suit has been rejected.

Ros. [Trying gently to disengage her hand.] Enthusiast!

Rug. [Drawing her nearer to him.] Rosabella!

Ros. What would you of me?

Rug. Your heart! my happiness!

Ros. Flodoardo! [Forces her hand from him.] Leave me! I command you—leave me this instant.

[He bows, and retires. At the palace-gate he stops, and waves his hand.]

Rug. Lady, farewell! We meet—no more!

Ros. Stay, oh! stay, Flodoardo! I—I am thine.

Rug. [Rushing back.] Rosabella!

Ros. Thine, and for ever!

[He falls on his knee, and she sinks upon his bosom.]

Enter the DUKE from the palace.

Duke. Do my eyes deceive me?

Ros. [Shrieking.] My father!

Duke. How has my confidence been betrayed.

[He turns to leave them.]

Rug. Stay, noble Andreas; stay, and hear—

Duke. Young man, what excuse?

Rug. Excuse! Oh! I need none for loving Rosabella; 'twere for him to excuse himself, who had seen Rosabella, and not loved her. Andreas, I adore your daughter; I demand her for my bride.

Duke. You? A needy stranger, who—

Ros. [Hastening to the DUKE, throwing her arms round his neck, and hiding her face in his bosom.] Oh! be not incensed with him, dear father.

Duke. Rosabella, hast thou given this youth thy heart; given it to him—irrevocably?

Rug. [Repeats, and presses his hand against his breast.] Irrevocably! Ah!

[ROSABELLA raises her head, and extends her hand towards RUGANTINO.]

Duke. I am answered. Flodoardo, you see this maid; will you deserve her?

Rug. Deserve her? Ask what thou wilt, and I swear—

Duke. Mark then! The murderer of Manfrone and Lomelino, of Foscari and the prince of Milan. Go, bring him hither: alive, or dead, thou must give into my power the terrible banditti-king, Rugantino.

Rug. My noble lord!

Ros. Oh! no, no, no; he must not! Too surely this detested monster—

Rug. Detested! Oh! silence, Rosabella; at least allow me to hope. Wilt thou swear, Andreas, that Rugantino once in your power, nothing shall prevent Rosabella from being my bride?

Duke. I swear it.

Rug. Enough! Now mark me, duke—You give a masque this night in the Nereid's Island?

Duke. I do. All Venice is invited.

Rug. 'Tis well. Let my purpose be kept secret; and as soon as all those are arrived, whose names are in this list, [Giving a paper.] your guards must surround the only entrance to the saloon. Then let them discharge their muskets, and if I still live, at that signal will I produce before you this dreaded Rugantino.

Duke. You shall be obeyed. But how—

Rug. No questions. I must away; Rosabella—

Ros. [Weeping, and embracing him.] Oh! Flodoardo—perhaps—Rugantino's dagger—But no, no, no: Heaven is just, heaven is merciful, and we shall meet again. Away then! Come, father, come!

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A ruined Monastery.

Enter FALIERI, MEMMO, and GONZAGA.

Fal. Our associates not arrived? Yet Rugantino charged us to muster our forces here, and engaged to meet us at sunset.

Gon. 'Tis a perilous knave, that Rugantino.

Mem. Perilous! I protest, I'm glad our plot is to be executed to-night, if it's only that I mayn't come into contact any more with that devil incarnate. I really believe he deals with the black gentleman, and that no mischief happens in Venice without his having a finger in the pie! If any one dies, it's he kills them; if a house is on fire, it's he kindles it; nay, I'm morally certain, 'twas he that occasioned the last earthquake.

Fal. Yet at least he keeps his word—Lomelino and Manfrone are already no more.

Mem. Very true, but yet—Heigho! my poor ten thousand ducats.

Gon. Hark!

Fal. 'Tis Contarino.—Now, friend, where's Rugantino?

Enter CONTARINO.

Con. Even now I left him. Flodoardo is returned, and Rugantino thinks it good to dispatch him immediately. I warrant he'll soon give a good account of him.

Mem. Nay, when despatching is the business, to do the gentleman justice, he loses no time.

Con. Are you all invited to the duke's masque to-night?

Fal. All! and in the most urgent and flattering manner.

Con. That's well! it proves we are not suspected.

Mem. I only hope there's no trick in all this. If this show of kindness should be only a take-in, now—Mercy on me! my teeth chatter at the thought!

Con. Mark me, friends; we must go armed to the duke's.

Fal. Leave his highness to me; this poniard is quite at his service.

Gon. The whole council of ten are invited.

Con. Down with them every man.

Mem. Aye, aye: fine talking! But suppose it should turn out to be—"Down with ourselves?"

Con. Silence, thou white-livered wretch!

Mem. Come, don't be so snappish, if you please.

Con. The stroke of midnight must be the signal for Gonzaga's quitting the saloon, and hastening to seize the arsenal.

Fal. As soon as he hears the alarm-bell, the admiral Adorno will lead his people to our assistance.

Con. Oh! our success is sure, and—But our comrades approach. Be alert, friends; hasten to distribute the arms and crimson scarfs, which are to distinguish our partisans.

Enter PISANI and Conspirators.—Scarfs, swords, pistols, &c. are distributed; and each drawing his sword, they kneel, and swear fidelity.

Con. Strangers approach: Disperse, and remember that the signal is—

All. Midnight! [Ereunt, severally.]

Enter the DUKE and CAMILLA, dressed as a syren, with a comb in one hand, and a looking-glass in the other.

Duke. What news, Camilla?

Cam. The best, your highness. Everything's ready, the Tritons and Nereids are dressed, the gondolas are waiting, and we're all impatient to be gone.

Duke. Why, Camilla, you are in high spirits.

Cam. In spirits? In ecstasies! My head's at this moment a chaos of the most enchanting images, of nothing but masks, coloured lamps, and musicians, conchs, cupids, and cockle-shells.

Duke. Delightful! And may I ask what you are to be?

Cam. [Curtseying.] A syren, your highness.

Duke. A syren! Truly, Camilla, 'twas lucky for Ulysses that you were not a syren in his days; closing his ears would not have availed him; he must have closed his eyes too.

Cam. [Curtseying.] Oh! mercy! Oh! heaven! Let me die, but your highness makes me blush!

Duke. 'Tis the better: Nothing becomes beauty like blushing. [Exit.]

Cam. So, so! Such warmth! "Nothing becomes beauty like—" Let me die if his highness isn't a little smitten with me himself.

Steph. [Without.] Camilla! Signora Camilla!

Cam. It's Stephano; and quite tritonized, I protest.

Enter STEPHANO, dressed as a triton.

Cam. Charming, signor! charming! Well, let me die—But sea-green's a most becoming colour; and then that beard's so divinely degagée, the French have it.

Steph. Very likely. But come, come! the duke stays for you.

Cam. Stays for me? I fly, signor, I fly! Now then for the Nereid's island. [Ereunt.]

SCENE III.—A Grotto. In the centre, a large porch, with folding-doors.

The DUKE is seated under a canopy on an elevated throne; FALIERI stands on the steps of it, conversing with him. Two gothic seats below the throne.—CONTRARIO, MEMMO, and GONZAGA; LAURA, PISANI, Lords and Ladies, &c.

Con. Look, Gonzaga, how kindly the duke smiles on Falieri.

Gon. 'Tis plain that he suspects nothing.

Con. Now, Memmo, what are become of your fears?

Mem. Fears? I feel so bold, so desperate, that I quite long for midnight.

Con. [Laughing.] Oh, brave Memmo! [Music.] But the masque is beginning. Look! Pan and the sylvan deities are arriving in honour of the birthday of Thetis.

[A procession enters, Pan dancing, Satyrs and Hamadryads; Diana with her nymphs; Mars in his chariot; warriors; Bacchus seated on a ton; bacchanals. On one side, Venus with

Cupid descends; and Minerva on the other. The celestial palace comes down amidst thunder and lightning; Jupiter, Juno, &c. come out of the palace, which re-ascends; Pluto and Proserpine rise on a burning throne; they alight, and the car sinks.

Mem. Well, Pluto's as like Rugan—

Con. [Stopping his mouth.] Hush!

[Proserpine expresses her envy of the beauty of the three goddesses; she waves her sceptre, and a golden apple appears with this inscription, "For the fairest." She throws it before them. They contend for it. Marine music. At this moment a volley of musquetry is heard. All start in horror; the music stops abruptly; a dead silence for a moment.

All the Guests. What was that?

Duke. [Aside.] 'Twas the signal.

Ros. [Aside to CAMILLA.] My heart beats!

Mem. [To the DUKE.] Suffer me to inquire what noise—

[He opens the folding-doors; the Porch appears filled with Guards.

Guards. Back!

Mem. Guards?

The Guests. Guards? Guards?

Duke. Fear nothing, my friends! this precaution regards no one here; but know, before an hour expires, you will see in this saloon—the Bravo Rugantino.

All. How?

Duke. Yes! Flodoardo has engaged—

Rug. [Without.] Give us way.

Ros. 'Tis he, and safe!

[The Guards open to the right and left, and RUGANTINO, still as FLODOARDO, rushes in, wrapt in a large mantle.

Mem. Bless me! I'm afraid that—

Con. Be calm, signor! there is nothing to fear.

Rug. Signors, you all know my business here. Answer then, Duke of Venice; have you not sworn, that Rugantino once in your power, nothing shall prevent Rosabella from being my bride?

Duke. I have.

Rug. Know then, he is in your power—is in mine.

Duke. Dead or living?

Rug. He still lives.

All Consps. He lives!

Rug. He still lives, signors.

[Bowing.]

Ros. [Embracing CAMILLA.] Did'st thou hear that, Camilla? the villain still lives! Not one drop of blood has stained the innocent hand of Flodoardo.

Rug. Innocent? Ah! now then be prepared; I'll produce the Bravo before you, and—

Cam. Oh, heavens! not here, signor! I shall die of a thousand little fears, if you bring him here.

Mem. And I shall die of ten thousand little fears.

Rug. Fear nothing, good Camilla. Be seated, Andreas. Let the rest arrange themselves behind the duke—Rugantino's coming.

[The DUKE seats himself; ROSABELLA on one side leaning on CAMILLA; the Conspirators are on the other.

Rug. [Advancing towards the porch.] Rugantino! [A pause—he retires still further back.] Rugantino!

Ros. I tremble, lest—

Rug. [Within the porch, but still in sight, though his back is turned to the spectators.] Rugantino! I say.

Ros. [Rushing towards him.] Oh! venture not, Flodoardo.

[At the moment she lays her hand on his arm, he throws off his cloak and helmet, and appears in the habit, and with the countenance of the Bravo.

Rug. Ho, ho.

[ROSABELLA falls at his feet, ANDREAS starts from his chair. All utter a cry of surprise and terror.

Rug. Now then, you wished to see the Bravo Rugantino? Here he stands, and is come to claim his bride.

Con. Without there! guards!

Rug. [Presenting a pistol.] That word again, and you never speak another!

Ros. [Recovering.] Dreadful illusion! Methought—Flodoardo—

Rug. Illusion? Rosabella, 'twas none; your beloved Flodoardo and the Bravo Rugantino are the same; in me you behold both.

Ros. 'Tis false, 'tis false! Flodoardo's actions were good and glorious as a demi-god's. Flodoardo and thou—Wretch, whom many a bleeding ghost has long since accused at the throne of heaven, dare not thou to profane the name of Flodoardo. 'Tis false, 'tis false!

Rug. Then mark, and be convinced. [He turns away, and in a moment appears with FLODOARDO'S countenance and the Bravo's habit.] Look on me now, Rosabella; you see me changed; but change as I may, of one thing be assured; I am the man whom you loved as Flodoardo. Rosabella, dost thou love me still?

Ros. [Throwing herself on CAMILLA'S bosom.] Man, man! Now God forgive you for torturing me so cruelly.

Duke. Guards, seize him! To the scaffold!

Rug. What? Have I not kept my promise? Duke of Venice, will you not keep your oath?

Duke. It was given to the virtuous Flodoardo; with the murderer Rugantino I made no compact. Speak, senators; ought I to keep an oath so made?

Senators. No, no! to the scaffold!

Mem. Aye, to the scaffold!

Rug. Is it so then? and will no one intercede? Signor Contarino! one word in my favour—

Con. Away! address not thyself to me.

Rug. Good Signor Memmo, plead for me. You know me well, and—

Mem. I? I know nothing at all about you. I never saw you before—never heard of you—and hope never to see or hear of you again.

Rug. What? and does no one pity the wretched Rugantino? No one? Are all silent—all? My fate then is decided. To the scaffold! [Going.

Ros. [Springing forward, and falling at the DUKE'S feet, who is crossing to the Conspirators.] Mercy, mercy! Pardon him—pardon—Rugantino.

Rug. Say'st thou so? Ha, an angel pleads for Rugantino in his last moments.

Ros. He is a sinner, but leave him to the justice of heaven! He is a sinner, but Rosabella adores him still!

Duke. [Repulsing her.] Away, unworthy girl!—he dies.

Rug. And can you look on with dry eyes, while that innocent dove bleeds at your feet? Go, barbarian, you never loved her as she deserved! [Raising her from the ground.] Now then she is yours no longer; thou art mine, Rosabella—art Rugantino's; thou lov'st me as I would be loved; I am blessed, and now to business. [The DUKE returns to the throne. He places ROSABELLA in CAMILLA'S arms.] Within there! [He sounds a whistle; Guards rush in, and surround the Conspirators; the doors are closed after them.] Guard them well. You have your orders.

Duke. What means—

Rug. It means, that this night your life and the constitution of Venice were doomed to conclude together.

Con. Noble Andreas, believe not—

Rug. Silence! I know your whole plot, and the officers of justice by my orders have already seized the gentry with the crimson scarfs. Duke, still doubt you my truth? Mark then! [Turning to the Conspirators.] 'The first who acknowledges his guilt shall be freely pardoned! I swear it, I, the Bravo Rugantino.

Mem. [Falling at the DUKE'S feet.] Venetians, Rugantino has told you true.

Rug. Live!

[MEMMO rises.

Mem. So I will as long as I can.

[Erit.

Consp. 'Tis false, 'tis false!

Rug. False? Then hear me, and then tremble! Manfrone and Lomelino, the duke's friends are still alive. [The doors fly open; MANFRONE and LOMELINO appear.] Away with them!

[The DUKE embraces MANFRONE and LOMELINO.

Ros. Joy! joy! Camilla, joy! Rugantino is not then a murderer. Alas! and yet Foscari's death—

Rug. Fear nothing, my love. Chance led me to the cave, where Foscari lay robbed and wounded by banditti, and before the venerable man expired, I swore to revenge his murder: traced out the villains, in whose society I received some hints of the conspiracy. I made my plans for defeating it known to Lomelino, who assisted me in my designs; he taught me a private entrance to the Duke's chamber, and persuaded Manfrone to share his concealment, until it became needful that their deaths should be believed.

Duke. But the prince of Milan's murder—

Rug. Was imaginary. Stephano was in my secret, and acted by my orders.

Duke. And the prince of Milan himself—

Rug. [Throwing off his Bravo's habit, and appearing splendidly dressed with several orders, &c.] Be hold him!

Duke. Amazement!

Ros. You? you the prince of Milan?

Prince. Even so. The perfidy of one ungrateful woman had made me distrust the whole sex; and I swore never to unite my fate but to her who would be constant to me under every circumstance. Rosabella has stood the trial; and I now glory to salute as Milan's future mistress the Bravo's bride.

Ros. Oh, happy, happy Rosabella!

Duke. How bright a sunshine after a day so stormy. Forth, forth, my son! Let a thousand torches show Venice her preserver! Let a thousand voices join in the exulting shout, "Honoured be the Bravo!—Happy is the Bravo's bride!"

All. Huzza!

[The folding-doors open—the back ground is lighted by the moon. Neptune and Amphitrite enter—then Nereids and Tritons, STEPHANO is among them—then CAMILLA and two other females as Syrens.—Last a machine representing a rock of red coral floating on a silver sea, whose waves are in motion. On the summit of the rock is a brilliant conch-shell, in which sits ROSABELLA. Artificial zephyrs hang over her, some seeming to fan her with their wings, others with their breath to impel the rock forwards, which is drawn by enormous Dolphins, spouting up water; while on the head of each stands a little Cupid, holding golden reins, with which he appears to guide the animal. The three rival Goddesses agree to give ROSABELLA the apple, even Proserpine applauding the decision. The Conch sinks gently, till it touches the earth, when ROSA-

BELLA quits the machine, and receives the apple from the Goddesses.—The PRINCE and ROSABELLA enter the Conch, which ascends to its former elevation; the machine moves on in triumph, and as it passes along the front of the stage, the curtain falls.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in the Doctor's House.

Enter CONSTANCE, hastily, meeting LISETTE.

Con. Lisette, Lisette! who do you think I have just seen?

Lis. Your old guardian, I suppose.

Con. Do you think I should look thus pleasant, if it were him I meant?

Lis. Who, then? our gaoler, who keeps the keys?

Con. What, poor Jeffrey? Ha, ha, ha! How you talk!

Lis. No, no; I guess who you mean: the young Marquis de Lancy; and he has passed so frequently under your window, within these few days, that I am amazed your guardian, with all his suspicions, has not observed him.

Con. He has walked by above ten times within this hour, and every time with his eye fixed up to the lattice of my window, and I had no heart to remove from it, for every time he saluted me with a most respectful bow.

Lis. Was his valet with him?

Con. No; but I saw another person in deep conversation with him; a strange-looking man, who appeared like one of the faculty, for his dress very much resembled that of my guardian's.

Lis. Who could it be?

Con. But what most surprised me, he had a letter in his hand, which he respectfully held up to me, but I could not reach it.

Lis. I know who it is: La Fleur, valet to the Marquis, disguised as a doctor; and I have no doubt but, under that disguise, he will find means to introduce himself to your old guardian, and, perhaps, be brought into the very house; and if I can assist his scheme, I will; for is it not a shame, the Doctor should dare, here in Paris, to forbid you and your servant to stir from home; lock us up, and treat us as women are treated in Spain?

Con. Never mind, Lisette, don't put yourself in a passion; for we can learn to plot and deceive, and treat him as men are treated in Spain.

Lis. Right, madam; and to prove I am not less inclined than yourself to Spanish manners, I am as much in love as you are.

Con. Not with the Marquis?

Lis. Do you think I don't know better where it is my duty to love? I am in love with his man.

Con. I wish I knew the contents of that letter he held out to me.

Lis. That you are beloved—admired; I can tell every word in it; I know every sentence as well as if I had read it; and now, madam, it is my advice you sit down and answer it directly.

Con. Before I have read it?

Lis. Yes, yes; give your answer at the time you receive his letter; consider how convenient it will be to give the one, while you take the other: we are so watched, you know, that we ought to let no opportunity pass, for fear we should never get another; and, therefore, when he finds means to send his letter, you must take the same to return your's.

Con. But if my guardian should ever know I had written to a gentleman—

Lis. I'll write for you: and, should there be any discovery, the letter will be in my hand-writing, not your's. We must lose no time; the Doctor is abroad at present, and it must be both written and delivered before his return.

[Goes to the table, and writes.]

Con. But, my dear Lisette—

Lis. Don't put me out.

Con. What are you saying?

Lis. [Writing.] What you are thinking.

Con. You don't know my thoughts.

Lis. I do. And here they are, in this letter.

Con. Let me look at it.

Lis. No, don't examine your thoughts, I beg you won't: [Folds the letter.] besides, you have no time to read it; I must run to the garden-gate and deliver it immediately. The worst difficulty is having, for near an hour, to supplicate this poor, simple, decrepit fool of the old Doctor's to open me the garden-gate for a moment. Jeffrey!

Con. The Doctor has lately appointed Jeffrey his apothecary; he is busy preparing of medicines, and will be angry at being disturbed.

Lis. No matter; it may save the life of some of his master's patients.

Enter JEFFREY, with a bandage on his left eye, and one on his right leg.

Jeff. You made me overthrow the whole decoction.

Lis. Great apothecary!

Con. And alone worthy the physician under whom you have received instructions!

Jeff. I am very sorry I overthrew the decoction, for it was for my use: my leg is in pain still, and I am not yet satisfied that the dog was not mad.

Lis. I tell you, I am sure he was not; and, had you suffered him to live, it would have proved so.

Jeff. My master ordered me to kill him.

Lis. Merely to make you believe he was mad, and to shew his skill by pretending to preserve you from the infection.

Jeff. Nay, don't speak against my master.

Lis. Who was it undertook to cure your eyes?

Jeff. He; and, thank heaven, Lisette, I shall not suffer any more from that!

Lis. Why, then, do you wear a bandage?

Jeff. To hide the place where it was.

Lis. And is it thus the Doctor cured you?

Jeff. He was so kind to put my left eye out, in order to save the right.

Con. Well, still you are more fortunate than the god of love; for he has no eyes at all.

Jeff. And I shall have two, very soon; for my master has promised to buy me one at the great manufactory, which will be much handsomer than either of my other—a very handsome glass one.

Lis. And if the Doctor will remake you thus, piece by piece, in time, my dear Jeffrey, you may become a very pretty man: but you know, Jeffrey, I love you even as you are.

Jeff. Love me! that's a good joke. Lisette, I am afraid you want something of me, you speak to me so pleasantly.

Lis. Want something of you! How could such an idea enter your head?

Jeff. Because when you don't want something of me, you huff me and cuff me from morning to night, eh, eh! you look no more as you do now. Why, if I were dying, I durst hardly speak to you.

Lis. Well, henceforward, you shall have no reason to complain. But do you know, Jeffrey, I have a little favour to ask of you.

Jeff. Ay, I thought so.

Con. My dear Jeffrey, we will make you any recompence.

Jeff. What is it you want? If I can do it without offending my master, I will.

Lis. If you don't tell him, he'll never know it.

Jeff. But I tell him everything; he pays me my wages for telling, and I must not take them without earning them.

Con. If money be of such value to you, here, take my purse.

Jeff. No; it is not money I want, it is something else.

Lis. What, what, then?

Jeff. Oh! Mrs. Lisette, you know what I want, but you always denied me.

Lis. Psha! if I could grant it, indeed, without my master knowing it—

Jeff. Oh! I won't tell him of that, I protest.

Con. Well, Jeffrey, what is your favour?

Jeff. Just one salute of Mrs. Lisette.

Lis. Oh! if that's all, after you have obliged us, you shall have twenty.

Jeff. But I had rather have one now, than the twenty you promise after.

Lis. Come, then, make haste, if it must be so.

Jeff. [Salutes her.] Oh! the first kiss of the girl one loves is so sweet!

Lis. Now you are ready to comply with our request?

Jeff. Tell me what it is?

Lis. To give us the key of the garden-gate.

Jeff. I am very sorry I can't oblige you.

Lis. Why not?

Jeff. For several reasons.

Lis. Tell me one.

Jeff. In the first place, I have not got the key—my master took it with him when he went out.

Lis. You know you tell a falsehood: he has not got it. Is this your bargain and your gratitude?

Jeff. Nay, if you are angry at that, give me the kiss again.

Lis. Ugly, foolish, yet artful and cunning wretch! leave the room. You make love to me, indeed! Why, I always hated you, laughed at you, and despised you.

Jeff. I know that. Did not I tell you, when you spoke so kindly to me, you wanted something? how, then, could you expect me to oblige you?

Lis. I shall ever detest the sight of you.

Jeff. Unless you want something, and then you'll call me again—and then I shall kiss you again. Ha, ha, ha!

[Exit, shewing the key.]

Lis. I never was so provoked in my life.

Con. My dear Lisette, if our two lovers, the Marquis and his servant, prove no more fortunate in their schemes, than we have been in ours, I fear I must, according to his desire, marry the Doctor, and you Jeffrey.

Lis. I marry Jeffrey! Here comes the Doctor.

Enter Doctor.

Doc. What an indignity! I can't put up with it; I can't bear it; I'm ready to choke with passion!

Con. Dear sir, what is the matter?

Doc. I am disgraced, ruined, undone!

Con. And what has caused it, sir?

Doc. A conspiracy of the blackest kind. Man's weakness has arrived to its highest summit; and there is nothing wanting but merit to draw upon us the most cruel persecution.

Lis. Ah! I understand: the faculty have been conspiring against you.

Doc. They have refused to grant me a diploma; forbid me to practise as a physician; and all because I don't know a parcel of insignificant words, but exercise my profession according to the rules of reason and nature. Is it not natural to die? Then, if a dozen or two of my patients have died under my hands, is not that natural?

Lis. Very natural, indeed.

Doc. But, thank heaven! in spite of the scandalous reports of my enemies, I have, this morning, nine visits to make.

Con. Very true, sir: a young ward has sent for you, to attend his guardian; three nephews have sent for you, to attend their uncles, very rich men; and five husbands have sent for you, in great haste, to attend their wives.

Doc. And is not that a sign they think what I can do? Is it not a sign they have the highest opinion of my skill? And the faculty shall see I will rise superior to their machinations. I have entered upon a project that, I believe, will tease them: I have made overtures to one of their professed enemies, a man whom they have crushed, and who is the chief of a sect just sprung up; of which perhaps, you never heard; for simply, by the power of magnetism, they can cure any ill, or inspire any passion.

Con. Is it possible?

Doc. Yes; and every effect is produced upon the frame merely by the power of the magnet, which is held in the hand of the physician, as a wand of a conjurer is held in his; and it produces wonders in physic, equally surprising.

Con. And will you become of this new sect?

Doc. If they will receive me; and, by this time, the president has, I dare say, received my letter, and I wait impatiently for an answer.

Enter JEFFREY.

Jef. A doctor, at the door, desires to speak with you.

Doc. A doctor in my house!

Lis. I dare say it is the magnetising doctor you have been writing to.

Doc. Very likely; I dare say 'tis Doctor Mystery; shew him in, Jeffrey.

Jef. Please to walk this way, sir.

[Exit.]

Enter LA FLEUR, dressed as a doctor.

La F. Doctor, I hope I have your pardon, that, though no farther acquaintance than by letter, I thus wait upon you to pay my respects—

Con. [To Lis.] It is the same I saw with the Marquis.

Lis. [Aside.] And it is La Fleur, his valet.

La F. And to assure you, that I, and all my brethren, have the highest respect for your talents, and shall be happy to have you a member of our society.

Doc. I presume, sir, you are Doctor Mystery, author and first discoverer of that healing and sublime art, Animal Magnetism.

La F. I am.

Doc. And it will render you immortal: my curiosity to become acquainted with the forms and effects of your power is scarcely to be repressed a moment. Will you indulge me with the smallest specimen of your art, just to satisfy my curiosity?

La F. You are, then, entirely ignorant of it?

Doc. Entirely.

La F. And so am I. [Aside.] Hem—hem! you must know, Doctor—

Doc. Shall I send the women out of the room?

La F. By no means; no, no; but I will shew both you and them a specimen of my art directly. You know, Doctor, there is an universal fluid, which spreads throughout all nature.

Doc. A fluid?

La F. Yes, a fluid—which is—a fluid—and you know, Doctor, that this fluid—generally called a fluid—is the most subtle of all—that is, the most subtle. Do you understand me?

Doc. Yes, yes.

La F. It ascends on high, [Looking down.] and descends on low; [Looking up.] penetrates all substances, from the hardest metal to the softest bosom—you understand me, I perceive?

Doc. Not very well.

La F. I will give you a simile, then.

Doc. I shall be much obliged to you.

La F. This fluid is like a river—You know what a river is?

Doc. Yes, certainly.

La F. This fluid is like a river, that—that runs—that goes—that gently glides—so—so—so—while there is nothing to stop it; but if it encounter a mound or any other impediment—boo—boo—boo—it bursts forth—it overflows the country round—throws down villages, hamlets, houses, trees, cows, and lambs; but remove obstacles which obstruct its course, and it begins again, softly and sweetly, to flow, thus—thus—the fields are again adorned, and everything goes on, as well as it can go on. Thus it is with the animal fluid, which fluid obeys the command of my art.

Doc. Surprising art! But what are the means you employ?

La F. Merely gestures, or a simple touch.

Doc. Astonishing! give me some proof of your art directly; do satisfy my curiosity.

La F. I will; and by holding up this wand, in which is a magnet, in a particular position, I will so direct the fluid, that it shall immediately give you the most excruciating rheumatism, which will last you a couple of hours. I will then change it to the gout; then to strong convulsions; and after, into a raging fever; and in this manner shall your curiosity become satisfied.

[Holds up his wand as if to magnetise.]

Doc. Hold, Doctor! I had rather see the experiment on some one else.

La F. Oh! then, sir, I have now at my house, a patient whom the faculty have just given up as incurable; and notwithstanding his disorder is of a most violent and dangerous kind, I will have him brought here, and I will teach you to perform his cure yourself.

Doc. By the power of magnetism?

La F. By the power of magnetism.

Doc. That would do me infinite honour, indeed: but why bring him to my house? pray, who is he?

La F. A young man of quality.

Con. Dear sir, let him be brought hither, and let me see the cure performed.

Doc. [Takes LA F. aside.] I can't say I approve of a young man being brought into my house; for you must know, Doctor, that young lady is to be my wife; as we are not exactly of an age, another may make an impression.

LA F. Consider my patient's state of health; he is like a dying man.

Doc. But he'll be well after I have cured him.

LA F. Very true. [Doctor whispers LA F.] True; certainly it is. [They whisper again.]

Con. Why this whispering? I am ignorant what are the virtues of your art, Doctor; but I am sure it has not that of rendering you polite.

LA F. Pardon, madam; I was but instructing the Doctor in some particulars of which you may hereafter have reason to be satisfied.

Lis. I doubt that, sir; unless your art could render this solitary confinement we are doomed to, agreeable.

LA F. Before the end of the day, you shall prefer it to the false pleasures of the gay world; for what are more false than the pleasures derived from balls, masquerades, and theatres?

Doc. Very true.

Lis. Well, I must own I love a theatre.

LA F. The worst place of all, to frequent; once in my life I was present at a theatrical representation; but such a piece did I see!—ah! the most dangerous for a young woman to be present at.

Lis. Pray, sir, what was it?

LA F. An honest gentleman, of about seventy years of age, was before the audience in love with a young lady of eighteen, whom he had brought up from her infancy, and whom he meant to make his wife.

Doc. Very natural.

LA F. A young gentleman of the neighbourhood, because he was young, rich, and handsome, imagined he would suit the lady better.

Doc. Just like them all.

LA F. He, therefore, disguised his valet, who, under the mask of friendship, introduced himself to this good man, the guardian.

Doc. A villain! he deserved to be hanged.

LA F. And seized the moment when he embraced him, as I now embrace you, to stretch out his hand, while it was behind him, and convey a letter to the lady's waiting-maid.

[Embraces the Doctor, and exchanges letters with LISETTE; LISETTE gives the letter she receives to CONSTANCE; LA FLEUR puts the other into his pocket.]

Lis. And she gave him another. I have seen the play myself; and it was very well acted. [Retires.]

LA F. And is it not scandalous to put such examples before young people?

Con. And pray, Doctor, do you think I am not under sufficient confinement, that you take the same methods to make me still more unhappy.

LA F. [To the Doctor.] Why does your ward dislike confinement?

Doc. Because she dislikes me.

LA F. Are you sure of that?

Doc. Yes, I think I am.

Con. I am dying with curiosity to read my letter.

[Aside, and exit.]

LA F. This wand shall cause in her sentiments the very reverse. In this is a magnet which shall change her disposition. Take it; [Gives the wand.] and, while you keep it, she will be constrained to love you with the most ardent passion.

Doc. I thank you a thousand times.

Lis. Excellent!

[Erit.]

Doc. Her maid has overheard us.

LA F. No, no; but take me into another apartment, and I will explain to you what, at present, you are not able to comprehend: after which, you will permit me to step home, and fetch my patient hither.

Doc. Certainly: when I am in possession of my ward's affection, I can have nothing to apprehend from him. And you are sure she will now become favourable to me? You are sure I shall attract her?

LA F. Yes, sure—by the loadstone. [Ereunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—Another Apartment in the Doctor's House.

Enter LISETTE and CONSTANCE.

Lis. I overheard it all; and he has given your guardian the wand in which you heard him say the magnet was contained; and while he keeps it, it is to magnetise you, and force you to love him in spite of yourself.

Con. All this agrees with the letter he has given me from his master, in which the Marquis informs me by what accident that letter my guardian sent to the doctor who professes magnetism, fell into his hands, and immediately gave him the idea of disguising his valet, and sending him hither under the name of that doctor. But where is La Fleur now?

Lis. Just left your guardian, and gone home to bring the patient you heard him speak of; and I would lay a wager, that very patient is no other than the Marquis himself.

Con. But for what end is all this?

Lis. That they have planned, you may depend upon it. For the present, you have nothing to do but to pretend an affection for your guardian.

Con. It will be difficult to feign a passion my heart revolts at.

Lis. Never fear your good acting: besides, I will take an equal share in it.

Con. How? you!

Lis. I'll fall in love with the Doctor as well as you. If the magnetism affect you, why not have the same power over me? and if it make you love him, it shall make me adore him.

Con. Hush! here he comes. [They retire.]

Enter Doctor, with the wand.

Doc [Aside.] What he has told seems so very surprising, that nothing but proofs can thoroughly convince me; and now for the proof.

[Looks at CONSTANCE.]

Lis. [Aside to Con.] He ogles you; cast a tender look, and accompany it with a sigh.

Con. [Sighing.] Alas!

Doc. My dear Constance, my lovely ward, what—what makes you sigh? Weariness of your confinement, I suppose?

Con. [Sighing.] Ah! sir.

Doc. Come, come; I confess, the restraint you have been under has been too much, and I am not surprised you have taken a dislike to me.

Con. A dislike to you! Ah, sir! [Sighing.] Oh! guardian!

[Going to speak, turns away, and hides her face.]

Doc. [Aside.] I believe it will do. Come, come, Constance, do not sigh and make yourself uneasy; you shall not live many weeks thus retired, for I am thinking of marrying you very soon [She turns eagerly to him] to a fine young gentleman.

[She turns away from him.]

Con. Ah! cruel.

Doc. What did you say? If I have the good fortune to be beloved by you, let me have the happiness to hear it from yourself.

Con. Yes, cruel man! some invincible power compels me, in spite of my resistance. Yes, I love you.

Lis. And I adore you.

Doc. What, you, too? I did not expect that.

Lis. No, mine is not merely a love, but a rage—a violence—I doat to distraction—love you to the loss of my health, of spirits, of rest and life.

Con. If you do not take pity on the passion which burns in my heart—

Lis. If you can be regardless of the flames which consume me with violence—

Con. Can you be insensible of my tender pleadings?

Lis. Take care how you turn my affection to hatred.

Doc. [Aside.] What a terrible situation I have got myself into! the effect of the magnetism is very natural; it acts upon one as well as another; but Lisette's love is very troublesome. I'll call Jeffrey in, and give up part of my power to him; he will take the wand for a few minutes, and charm Lisette.

Con. Why do you thus run from me? Is this the return my love demands? But be not uneasy; death shall deliver you from an object, whose passion you despise.

Doc. Oh! that you could but read what is written in my heart!

Lis. Ah! sir, behold the state [Kneels.] to which you have reduced a poor innocent. If I am treated with kindness, I am naturally soft, gentle, and tender; but, if I am neglected, [Rising.] by all that's great and precious, I will do some strange thing either to you or my rival!

Doc. This Lisette is so furious, she makes me tremble; I must put an end to her affection. [Aside.] Jeffrey!

Enter JEFFREY.

Jef. Here, sir; what do you want with me?

Doc. Take this, and carry it to my study.

[Gives the wand.]

Jef. Yes, sir; directly.

Doc. Stop a moment, Jeffrey; stop a moment!

Jef. Two or three moments, if you please.

Doc. [Aside.] Now we shall see what effect it has.

Lis. [To Con.] I see through this design; let us fall in love with Jeffrey.

Con. With all my heart.

Doc. Well, Jeffrey—and—and how do you do, Jeffrey?

Jef. Pretty well, considering my leg, where the dog bit me, and considering I can only see with one eye.

Lis. But even that misfortune does not prevent your looking very agreeable, Jeffrey.

Doc. [Aside.] It succeeds; she is taken.

Jef. What are you beginning to laugh at me again?

Lis. Laugh at you! No, Jeffrey. I now wonder how it was possible I should ever laugh at you: how becoming is that bandage! and the eye we do see has a thousand times more bewitching charms for the absence of that we do not. Dear madam, only observe him.

Con. Who can resist that amiable figure, dearest Jeffrey.

Jef. Ha, ha, ha!

Doc. [Aside.] This is as bad as the other.

Jef. I think the mad dog has bit us all.

Lis. Is it possible you can love Jeffrey? No, no; your situation forbids it. Take, take my master; I resign him to you.

Con. No, I resign him to you.

Lis. I will not have him.

Doc. This is a very disagreeable situation.

Lis. Jeffrey, will you be deaf to my passion?

Con. Yes, I'm sure he will prefer me.

Jef. No, I won't: I have been in love with her this twelvemonths, and I'll make choice of her.

Con. Then what will become of me?

Doc. I can bear this no longer. Give me that; [snatches the wand;] and do you make up some medicines.

Jef. Ah! my dear Lisette, you have made me so happy, I must shake hands.

[Offers to take her hand, he slaps his face.]

Lis. Learn to behave with more reserve for the future.

Jef. Ecod! I think you have not behaved with much reserve. Did you not hang upon me, and say you loved me!

Lis. Love you! Behold my master, and do not imagine I can love any but him.

Con. No; who can love any but him?

Doc. This is worse and worse! Where is the Doctor? If he do not come, and give me some relief, I am a ruined man. [Loud knocking.] Jeffrey, see if that is him, [Exit JEFFREY.] I have no doubt but it is; and with him the young patient, on whom I am to prove my skill. Constance, and you, Lisette, leave the room for the present.

Con. Yes, if you will go with me. But how do you think it is possible for me to leave you? A feeling, which I cannot explain—

Lis. And one I cannot explain—

Doc. But I am going to prescribe, and it is improper.

Enter LA FLEUR, leading the MARQUIS DE LANCY, dressed in a handsome robe-de-chambre.

La F. This, Doctor, is your patient. This is the renowned physician, from whom you are to expect a cure.

Doc. He looks surprisingly well, considering how much he has suffered.

La F. That renders his case the more dangerous. I would rather a patient of mine should look ill, and be in no danger, than look well, and be in imminent danger.

Mar. To conceive the sufferings I have undergone, a being must be transformed! he must be more, before he can conceive what I have felt; for months have I led this agonizing life! But I am told, Doctor, you can put an end to my disorder; you have, in your possession, that which can give me ease; but by what science you are master of so great a power, I own, is beyond my comprehension.

La F. Dear sir, you know not all the resources in the art of medicine; trust firmly, that you are in the hands of persons well informed and well practised. We know how to give nature a filip!

Doc. Doctor Mystery, do you use your authority with these females, to leave us to ourselves.

Con. I can't go.

Lis. Nor I.

La F. I believe it is very true, [Feels their pulse.] No, they can't go; no, the force of the attraction will not suffer them to go. [To Doctor.] What do you think of the power of magnetism now?

Doc. It has double the power I desire, and I wish it not to act on Lisette.

Con. [To Lis.] I hope the Marquis is not really ill.

La F. I will remedy that. [Whispers to the Doctor while the Marquis makes signs of love to Constance.] Now attend to what I am going to do; I'll turn the whole affection of the maid upon myself.

Doc. I will be very much obliged to you.

[LA FLEUR whispers to the Doctor again.]

Mar. [Apart to Constance.] One word only:—will you be mine, should my scheme prove successful?

Con. What is it?

Mar. I have no time to say—but answer me, will you be mine?

Con. I will.

Doc. [Apart to LA FLEUR.] Very well, extremely well: this will do very well; and now deliver me from her love as soon as you can.

La F. I must approach her, and 'tis done. [Goes to LISETTE, makes signs of magnetism, and speaks apart.] I am in love with you, feign to be so with me.

Lis. I am in earnest, without feigning.

La F. So much the better; it will appear more natural. [To the Doctor.] It's done; observe how she looks at me.

Doc. What an art!

La F. But I will shew its power in a manner yet more astonishing.

Con. [Apart to the MARQUIS.] I was on the point of being married to my guardian.

Doc. Is it possible?

Mar. [Forgetting himself, and in warmth.] Distraction! that must never be!

[DOCTOR turns to him in surprise, LISETTE perceives it.]

Lis. Oh, heavens! look to the patient.

La F. One of his fits has seized him. [MARQUIS pretends a fit.] But it's nothing; it will soon be over.

Mar. Nay, do not hide yourself. Oh! oh! that I could plunge this steel [holds up his handkerchief] a hundred times in that detestable heart. Come on, monster, and acknowledge thy conqueror, expiring under this hand.

Doc. I'll go into the next room. It is me, I believe, he is going to kill.

La F. But he has no weapon; don't be afraid.

Con. [To LA F.] Oh! dear sir, relieve him from this terrible fit.

Doc. Do; I beg you will.

La F. I cannot wholly relieve him at present; but you shall see me change the manner of his raving. Behold my power! [Pretends to magnetise.] See, his countenance changes; his looks express tenderness. Now it is no longer fury that transports him; but the soft languor of love now pervades his senses.

Mar. [Looking at CONSTANCE.] Oh! charming Arpasia!

La F. Arpasia was the name of his first love: he fancies himself near to her.

[The MARQUIS kneels to CONSTANCE.]

Mar. Is it you, then, whom I behold? But, alas! you do not suspect what I have suffered in your absence; and I only retain my life, in the pleasing hope of one day passing it with you, and rendering your's as happy as my own. What am I to think of this silence? You do not answer to my tender complaints. Ah! you hate me, you despise me! But dread the effects of this contempt; I feel it is in my power to accomplish all. [Rising.]

Lis. He is going into his raving fit again. Pray, madam, speak to him, if it be but a word.

Mar. Speak to me one word, if it be only one word!

La F. Your ward is afraid of disobliging you; but give her leave to speak to him, if it be but one word, only to be witness to a scene so nouvelle.

Doc. But, harkye!

La F. Psha, psha! She looks at you for consent: tell her, she may say yes—just yes.

Doc. But why suffer her to speak?

La F. Consider you are in possession of the magnet, and nothing can prevent the power of that charm.

Mar. Ah! cruel! Ought I thus to wait for a word from those lips? You wish, then, to behold me die?

Doc. Well, well; answer him, yes.

Mar. Do you love me?

Con. Yes.

Mar. [Kisses her hand.] I am transported!

Doc. [Endeavouring to separate them.] Hold, hold! This is a fit as powerful to me as it is to you.

Lis. Dear sir, let him alone; he may fall into his rage again.

Mar. What thrilling transport rushes to my heart! all nature appears to my ravished eyes more beautiful than poets ever formed! Aurora dawns; the feathered songsters chant their most melodious strains; the gentle zephyrs breathe their choicest perfumes, and the inspiring scene intoxicates my very soul!

Doc. Come, change this fit into another.

Mar. And you, who listen to me, partake my joy. Come and dwell with me under the shady branches of the river-side. Come, lovely shepherdess; [takes hold of CONSTANCE]; come, young shepherd; [takes hold of the Doctor]; mingle in the dance.

Lis. Come, young shepherd.

[Takes hold of the Doctor with one hand, and

LA FLEUR with the other.]

Doc. I can't dance.

Mar. In vain you refuse. Pass, with gentle steps, the mossy banks, and join in the rural pastime.

[They all dance.—Ereunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in the Doctor's House.

Enter LISETTE and LA FLEUR.

Lis. But when is this farce to end?

La F. My master, now he is introduced, will take advantage of some circumstances, to obtain, either by force or stratagem, the Doctor's consent to his wishes; and as he finds he is beloved by the young lady, which, before, he was in doubt of—

Lis. Psha! he might easily have guessed her sentiments. A young woman, weary of confinement as she was, is easily in love with the first young man who solicits her affections.

La F. And may I hope you love me?

Lis. Ay, sir; I am weary of confinement, like my mistress.

La F. A thousand thanks, my dear Lisette!

Lis. But while Jeffrey keeps the keys of every door, no creature can either go out, or enter, without his leave.

La F. And is there no way to get rid of him?

Lis. Yes; a thought strikes me this moment: a couple of days ago, a neighbour's dog bit him, and our doctor, merely to shew his skill in the cure, persuaded him the dog was mad. Suppose we make the Doctor himself believe he was really so, and that poor—

Enter DOCTOR, with the wand.

Doc. He has had another fit; but I have just now left him in a sound sleep, which came upon him as suddenly as any of his waking paroxysms.

La F. If that be the case, he must be left alone; we will not disturb him.

Lis. [Aside to LA F.] When I return, be sure to confirm whatever I shall say. [Exit.]

Doc. What! have you persuaded her to leave you?

La F. Yes, for a little while.

Doc. Why, too much of love is something tedious. I come once more to talk with you, Doctor, upon this surprising art; which, though you have taken such great pains to explain, I am still far from comprehending so much as I think I ought.

La F. I will, before long, give you such proof.

Re-enter LISETTE, followed by JEFFREY.

Lis. Oh! save me! or I'm a dead woman!

Doc. What's the matter?

Jef. This is no joke, and I won't take it as such.

Lis. [Goes between LA F. and DOCTOR.] Have a care of him. Speak low; he'll be at us.

Doc. Will he be at us?

Lis. [In a low voice.] Jeffrey is mad!

Doc. What do you say?

Lis. I found him in his bed, gnawing the bed-clothes; and, when he saw me, he would have gnawed me. [The Doctor turns to him.] Don't look at him, sir! don't look at him!

Doc. Why, I don't think this possible; the dog that bit him was not—

Lis. Indeed, sir, he was as mad as ever—

La F. Indeed, the poor creature looks as if some horrible infection had seized him.

Doc. Why, I can't say but I think he does.

Lis. And I'll give you the true proof immediately.

[Throws a glass of water at him.]

Jef. What's that for? How dare you use me thus?

Lis. There! you see what a dislike he has to water.

La F. That is a symptom which confirms our suspicions.

Doc. An evident sign of the hydrophobia!

La F. Yes, of the hydrophobia.

[LISETTE comes with another glass of water to throw at him; at the sight of which he starts.]

Lis. See, see, how he looks, only at the sight of water.

Jef. If you dare throw any more upon—

[Holds up his hand.]

Doc. Lisette, let him alone. It is dangerous to push the poor creature to extremities. Doctor, suppose we magnetise him?

La F. No; magnetism, in cases like this, can have no effect.

Doc. What remedy, then?

La F. I know of but one: to smother him.

Lis. The only thing in the world.

Doc. And we ought to lose no time, if it must be done.

Jef. What, smother me? [Falls on his knees to the DOCTOR.] Oh! sir, have pity on me.

Doc. Don't be frightened; it will be over in ten minutes.

Jef. But I had rather not.

Doc. Ungrateful wretch! do you consider the consequence of living?

Lis. For shame, Jeffrey! don't ask such a thing.

Doc. But, since he won't consent with a good grace, we must seize him all three together.

Jef. Ah! mercy, what will become of me?

Lis. [Aside to JEFFREY.] Run out of the house, and never come back, if you would save your life.

[JEFFREY runs off.]

La F. He sha'n't escape. Stop him there! [Exit.]

Doc. Why, he has run into the street! What a deal of mischief he may cause; and, as I'm alive, he has run away with all the keys in his pocket.

Lis. But, luckily, the doors are open.

Doc. But, why does not the doctor come back?

Lis. Depend upon it, he will not leave him till he has secured him in some safe place where he can do no mischief.

Enter CONSTANCE.

Con. Dear sir, come to the assistance of your patient; he has followed me to my chamber, and frightened me out of my senses: I thought he were going to die. Indeed, sir, he is very ill; I am sure he can't live long.

Enter MARQUIS DE LANCY, creeping slowly to the couch, as if unable to walk.

Mar. Oh! Doctor, relieve me from this pressure, or I die.

Doc. I wish my brother physician were returned! Come, sir, lean your head this way. Where is your complaint?

Mar. Here, here it lies! [Laying his hand on his stomach.] I fear this will be the last hour of my life!

Doc. No, no; I hope not.

[Magnetising him sometimes with one end of the wand, and sometimes with the other.]

Mar. The malady changes its place. Oh! my head! remove it from my head! make it descend. Now it flies to my heart! it sets it on fire! it tears it to pieces!

Doc. I wish the doctor would return.

Mar. My tortures redouble! vultures gnaw me! Can't you remove them? [Attempts again to magnetise.] No, no; my strength fails me! my eyes lose their sight! I die!

[Groans, sinks on the couch, and remains motionless.]

Lis. Oh! he's dead! he's dead! he's dead!

Con. What will become of us all? He's dead! he's dead!

Doc. I am quite shocked at it! But, my dear children, don't make such a noise. The neighbours will hear you; and they will say I have killed him with some of my experiments.

Lis. It was that fatal wand you put upon his heart.

Doc. Yes; I suppose I directed the fluid the wrong way. But, perhaps, he only fainted. Who knows but we may recover him? I will go and find some of my newly-invented drops, which may, perhaps, restore him. [Feels in his pockets.] And that poor, unhappy Jeffrey has taken away the key of my cabinet, where all my drops are.

Con. Break open the locks, then; there is no time to lose.

Doc. And Doctor Mystery not to return! Everything conspires to ruin me! I was loth to receive this patient into my house: my heart forboded some ill consequence. Dear me! dear me! [Exit.]

Mar. If my scheme succeed, the consequence will be such as you little dream of. Where is La Fleur?

Lis. Gone to secure Jeffrey somewhere out of the house.

Mar. If he should not return soon, all my long-concerted plan will be overturned.

Lis. Here he is.

Enter LA FLEUR.

La F. I have lodged him safe for these two days.
Mar. [Takes off his robe.] Give me your clothes, and take this immediately, and be dead.

La F. Dead! What do you mean?

Mar. Ask no questions; but lie on that couch, and counterfeit being dead.

Lis. Your master has been doing it this half hour.

La F. [Putting on the robe.] It is very strange; but since you command it—

Mar. Dare not stir, or breathe! All depends on your acting well. You must have your face powdered, that he may not know you.

La F. Now I am in character.

Mar. Where are my people?

La F. At the tavern, in the next street, both disguised like doctors.

Mar. That's right; I fly to them directly.—

[Going.]

La F. Your night-cap, your night-cap!

[The MARQUIS throws it to him.]

Mar. And give me your wig. [Puts it on.] I hear the Doctor coming. Farewell! Play your part to a miracle.

[Exit.]

Con. And heaven prosper your designs!

La F. [Sitting on the couch.] But what does all this mean? I don't understand.

Lis. Hush! dead people never speak.

[Throws him down on the couch.]

Enter Doctor.

Doc. Well, how is he? what does he say?

Lis. Why, like all other persons in his state, he does not complain.

Doc. Hold this bottle to his nose, and sprinkle this on his face.

Con. Alas! he is gone, and nothing can be of use.

Doc. How a few moments have changed him! I should'n't have known him again. He's as white as ashes. Lay your hand upon his heart, Lisette, and feel if it beats at all: for my part, I am so disconcerted with the accident, I am fit for nothing.

Lis. [Lays her hand on his heart.] All is still, sir

Doc. Is there no motion?

Lis. None in the least. [Slaps his face.] Like marble—has little feeling in it.

Doc. Doctor Mystery not returning, I conceive this was a plot upon me.

Lis. And this poor creature was in the plot, you think, and died on purpose to bring it about?

Doc. No; but the other found he could not cure him, and so left the disgrace of his death to me; and my enemies will take the advantage of it, considering how many of my patients have died lately.

Lis. What are we to do with the body?

Doc. I have yet one hope left; it is my last; and I won't hesitate, but about it instantly.

Con. What resource?

Doc. [To Lis.] He is certainly dead, is he not?

Lis. Certainly; there can be no doubt of that.

Doc. And, do what we will, nothing worse can happen to him.

Lis. No, certainly; not in this world.

Doc. Well, then, I will try an experiment upon him, which I once read, and I have often had a vast mind to try it upon Jeffrey; but, as he was alive, it might have proved fatal.

Lis. What is it?

Doc. No matter; you shall see it performed; and I can't say I have much doubt of its success. Begin to take off some of his garments, while I go and get all the apparatus ready.

La F. But I am not such a fool to stay till you come back. My master may say what he will; but I will go away.

Lis. Nonsense, man! Have you not undertaken to be dead? Come, finish your part with a good grace.

Con. Pray do, La Fleur.

La F. But what experiment is he going to try upon me? I always hated doctors, and would never let any one of them come near me.

Con. But this is not a doctor: the college have refused to admit him; so, don't be afraid.

La F. Oh! as that's the case—

Lis. [Throws him down, as before.] Hush! play your part.

Enter Doctor, with a bag of instruments.

Doc. Lisette, help me with these instruments, and then run and watch that skillet of oil on the fire; and, when it boils, bring it hither.

Lis. But, suppose anybody should come in while we are trying the experiment?

Doc. Right; I'll lock the door. My fright makes me forget everything.

[Exit.]

La F. Let me see the instruments

Lis. Psha! what signifies seeing them; a'n't you to feel them?

Doc. [Without.] What! force into a man's house, whether he will or no?

Con. I hear a noise! [Looks out.] It is the Marquis returned; and all his schemes, perhaps, will be fulfilled.

[LA FLEUR lies down again.]

Enter MARQUIS DE LANCY, PICCARD, and FRANCOIS, disguised as doctors, (the MARQUIS having changed his dress,) followed by the Doctor.

Mar. I have powerful reasons for entering this house. I came hither accompanied by these physicians, sent with me by the college, to demand a patient, who was this morning brought hither by a notorious professor of quackery; the young gentleman is of family, and nearly allied to me.

Doc. [Aside.] I am undone!

Mar. Where is he, sir? I must see him, and speak with him.

Lis. At present, you can't speak with him; he is in a better world.

[Pointing to LA FLEUR.]

Mar. Alas! behold him there, or am I deceived? No; it is he himself whom I see! and he is dead! Gentlemen, I call you as witnesses that he is dead, and that yonder stands the assassin.

[PICCARD and FRANCOIS examine the body;

PICCARD puts on his spectacles.

Fran. [Feeling his pulse.] Yes, he is dead; but he is not dead according to our rules.

Mar. Oh! my dear friend, and are you gone? But your death shall be revenged. [To the Doctor.] Villain, tremble! for thy life shall answer for this

Gentlemen, gentlemen, please to take notes of what you see and hear in this house. [The Doctors write

Lis. Dear sir, have pity on my poor master; he has killed the poor gentleman, to be sure; but it was without malice.

Doc. But you know, gentlemen, this is not the first patient that has been killed during an operation.

Pic. Ay, by the authority of the college.

Doc. [To the MARQUIS.] Dear sir, my only hope is in your mercy.

Mar. Then despair! for know, I am the Marquis de Lancy; and call to your remembrance with what insolence you rejected all my overtures to espouse your ward. Here is the advantageous contract I repeatedly sent to you, which you had the arrogance to return to me, without even deigning to look at.

Doc. Only deliver me from this trouble, and I will sign it without reading it at all.

Mar. But will the lady also sign it?

Con. No; for how can I wed another, when he [pointing to the Doctor] is the object of my love?

Doc. But consider, my dear Constance, that I am old and ugly, jealous and infirm. Indeed I am, indeed I am, I protest, Constance!

Con. But my love for you is so implanted in my heart—

Mar. If that be the case—Come, sir, follow us.

Doc. Stay; give me the contract, and let me sign it. [Aside.] I will once more have recourse to the wand.

Mar. What imports your signing, if your ward will not?

Doc. She will sign.

Con. Never!

Doc. Give me the contract, and hold that.

[Gives the wand to the MARQUIS, takes the contract, and signs it.]

Mar. What's this?

Doc. Keep it; never let it go from you.

Con. Yes, I feel a desire to sign; give me the contract.

Doc. Ay, I was sure of it. [CONSTANCE signs the contract.] And there, Marquis, is the contract.

[Giving the contract to the MARQUIS.]
La F. [Rising.] Ah! I breathe again! I am a little better!

Doc. [Starting.] Why, is he not dead?

La F. No; I am mending apace.

Doc. Gentlemen, tear in pieces the process. [To La F.] Oh! sir, what misery have you brought upon me!

La F. And what misery would your d—d instruments, and your boiling oil, have brought upon me?

Doc. How did you hear, in that fit, what I said?

La F. Very easily, sir. Return him the wand; and the ladies, I dare say, will fall in love with him again.

Doc. [Looking at La F. and then at the MARQUIS.] My eyes are open! I recollect them both! But this was the sick man! [To the MARQUIS.]

La F. But I was the dead one!

Doc. I am cheated, defrauded! What ho! neighbours! Here are thieves, murderers!

Mar. Nay, Doctor, reflect upon the arts you made use of, to keep my Constance yours, even in spite of her inclinations; then do not condemn the artifice I employed to obtain her with her own consent. A reward like this, urged me to encounter every hazard and every danger; for, believe me, Doctor, there is no magnetism like the powerful magnetism of love.

ACT. DRAMA.—NOS. 103 & 104.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Register Office.

Enter WILLIAMS.

WIL. The business of the morning is partly over. What a crowd of deluded females have flocked here within these three hours, in expectation of the imaginary place we have advertised! A register-office, under the direction of so conscientious a person as Mr. Gulwell, instead of a public good, becomes a public evil. My upright master seldom feels any reflections of this kind! avarice is his leading principle; and so long as he can swell his bags by the folly or credulity of mankind, he will not suffer conscience to hinder him in the pursuit of gain. I think I hear him coming.

4 D

Enter GULWELL.

Gul. So, this advertisement has brought in two pounds, thirteen shillings! no very bad morning's work. Well, thanks to the memory of our witty founder, say I. Had he not hit on the scheme of a register-office, I might have dangled on at quill-driving without ever being worth a groat.

Wil. But, sir, do you think this calling of ours the most conscientious one in the world? I begin to imagine my old employment, the law, the more honest profession of the two.

Gul. Mr. Williams, there is roguery in all the employments under the sun. Every day's experience will convince you, that there is no getting through the world without a necessary portion of trick and chicanery.

Wil. Sir, if the imposture of this advertisement were found out and duly punished, one or both of us would stand a fair chance for the pillory. How many poor girls have been stripped of perhaps their last shilling, by being amused with the hopes of the place we have advertised. P'faith! sir, some of our professions are little better than downright pick-pockets. I am glad I shall have the good fortune to leave it so soon.

Gul. Mr. Williams, I am truly sorry for our separation, but rejoice at the occasion of it; however, if you hope to make a fortune in your altered condition of life, you must learn to keep your conscience in proper subordination. I can assure you, that fraud is as necessary a requisite in a stewardship as in an intelligence-office. Is there no message from Dr. Skinfint about the Welsh living?

Wil. Yes, sir; he says as curates are so cheap in Wales, he will not take less than a thousand guineas.

Gul. A spiritual curmudgeon! Why, it is not quite a hundred a year. I forgot to ask if you called at Captain Sparkle's last night?

Wil. I did, sir; and was surprised to see him so greatly recovered.

Gul. I thought he would grow better after the embarkation. I never supposed him in any very great danger, because he refused eight hundred guineas for his commission, when his life was despaired of. Have you finished the assignment of the surgeoncy.

Wil. No, sir.

Gul. Then get it done, Mr. Williams: stay, you must write an advertisement for the Daily, any time this afternoon will do, of an employment to be disposed of in Ireland, of a thousand pounds per annum, which requires little learning or attendance, and may be executed by a deputy. Remember to add, that secrecy is required, and none but principals need to apply.

Wil. I forgot to tell you, the young gentleman was here to know if you had received an answer about the secretary's place.

Gul. Truly, I am sorry I could not succeed: fifteen hundred guineas were insisted on; I pleaded the young gentleman's acknowledged merit, and the public services of his brave father, who lost his life in fighting for his country, which so softened my principal, that he sunk his demand from—

Wil. Fifteen to five hundred, I hope.

Gul. From guineas to pounds: I could get no further abatement.

Wil. It is a pity that such extraordinary merit should have no better success.

Gul. Ah! Mr. Williams, if places were given to persons of merit only, the Lord have mercy upon many a big-looking family. Away; here's company coming. [Exit WILLIAMS.] Heyday! who have we here? By his looks, he must be one of the tribe of the soup-maigres.

Enter a Frenchman.

French. Be votre nom Monsieur le Gulvelle?

Gul. It is, sir; your business?

French. Sire, me be tell dat dere be de grand nombres d'academies Françaises en Londres; and me vould be glad to be employé as un maitre de langues. Me speak a de Frens vid de vrai prononciation; and you see beside ma connoissance in de langue Angloise be not the most inconsiderable.

Gul. Oh! yes, sir; you speak very pretty English, I must own. Pray, what business have you been bred to?

French. Bisness; do you mean to front a me? me be von of de gens de qualité.

Gul. How, sir; a person of quality, and so poor as to be seeking after a livelihood.

French. Vy vere be de vonders of all dat? Nōting be more commun in France. Me dit, indeed, sometime, pour passer le temps, amuse mysel vid curl a de air, and cut a de corn of mine comrades de qualité of bot sex.

Gul. Sir, if you be a proficient in these sciences, I give you joy with all my heart, for I don't know a more profitable calling in London; nay, nor a more reputable one; for its professors are caressed by persons of the first fashion and distinction. There's your countryman, Monsieur Frizzellette de la Corneille, a hair and corn-cutter in St. James's, that keeps his chariot, though 'tis scarce half a score years since he would have made a bow to the ground for a bellyful of soup-maigre.

French. And begar, so would me too

Gul. Sir, I will cook you up an advertisement as long as a proclamation, that will effectually do your business. In the meantime, I shall give orders for one of the laconic kind, to hang in golden letters over your door: "Hair and corns cut after the French taste, by a person of quality."

French. Ay, dat vil do ver vell. Par un personne de qualité.

Gul. But, sir, as you are a man of rank, you may, perhaps, think it below your dignity to follow any profession that has the least appearance of business?

French. Non, non, monsieur; tout au contraire.

Gul. Then I dare venture to say, that in less than a dozen years you will be rich enough to return to your native country, and marry a princess of the blood. How, in the name of wonder, could you think of being a pitiful teacher of French for a livelihood, when you are possessed of talents superior to all the learning in the world?

French. Me vill tell you, monsieur: it be not more as dix, onze, douze, treize—ay, thirteen year, since mon cousin comed over to l'Angleterre, to teash a de Frens in de boarding-école. Vell, he dit engage de affection of de Angloise young lady, sa belle écolière, runned away wid her, and so, begar, he getted de vife vid not less as von hundred thousand livres. Now, as mon cousin could marry de lady vid so much of de l'argent, vy may not me hope to do the same?

Gul. True, sir; but there's an ugly act of parliament since that time, which hinders you fortunehunting gentlemen from gaining such wives. Well, sir, you will deposit a small sum; two or three guineas, or so; and I shall begu the advertisement.

French. Hey! vat you say? deposit! Je n'entends pas deposit.

Gul. Oh! sir, I'll soon explain it. Deposit signifies—

French. Non, non, mon cher ami! it be impossible for me to know vat you means; for me do not understand un mot de la langue Angloise.

Gul. Why, sir, I thought your connoissance in de langue Angloise had not been the most inconsiderable? [Mimicking him.]

French. Oh! monsieur—but dat—dat—dat was une autre chose—quite anoder ting.

Gul. Well, sir, I must have two or three guineas, by way of earnest, before I proceed any further in your business.

French. Two, tree guinee! begar; me could so soon give you two, tree million. Vat you take a me for? un grand voleur—von tief? You tink me ave rob your Inglisse exchequer; for all de world know dat de exchequer of my countree ave scarce so much to be rob of. Let a me see: me ave no more as von chelin, and von, two, three alpence.

Gul. Thirteen pence halfpenny! a very critical sum in England. Well, sir, you may leave that in part; I must give you credit for the remainder.

French. [Gives his money.] Dere, sir. And so, Monsieur le Gulvelle, you tink en verité me sal ride in my coach.

Gul. Not at all impossible. Call again in a week, and you shall see what I have done for you.

French. Begar! you have elevé mine heart. Sire, me be votre tres humble, tres obligé, and tres devoté serviteur. Oh! mon Dieu! ride in my carrosse! [Erit.]

Gul. Your most humble servant, good Monsieur le Carosse. If it were not for the credulity of mankind, what a plague would become of us office-keepers!

Enter MARGERY.

Mar. Sur, an I may be so bold, I've come to ax-an ye've sped about t'woman servant, 'at ye advertised for?

Gul. I have not. Come nearer, young woman.

Mar. Let me steek't deer first, an ye please.

[Shuts the door.]

Gul. What countrywoman are you?

Mar. I'se Yorkshire, by my truly! I was bred and bworn at little Yatton, aside Roseberry Topping.

Gul. Roseberry Topping! Where is that, my pretty maid?

Mar. Certainly God! ye know Roseberry? I thought ony fule had known Roseberry. It's t' biggest hill in oll Yorkshire; it's aboun a mile an a hofe high, and as coad as ice at top on't i't' hetttest summer's day; that it is.

Gul. You've been in some service, I suppose?

Mar. Ay, I'll uphole ye have I, ever sin I was neen year ald. Nay, makins, I'd a God's penny at Stowstah market, aboun hofe a year afore 'at I was neen; and as good a servant I've been, thof I say't myself, as ever came within pair o'deers. I can milk, kurn, fother, bake, brew, sheer, winder, card, spin, knit, sew, and do everything 'at belongs to a husbandman, as weel as ony lass 'at ever ware clog-sheen: and as to my karecter, I defy onybody, gentle or simple, to say black's my nail.

Gul. Have you been in any place in London?

Mar. Ay, an' ye please; I lived wi' Maadam Shrilpipp, in St. Pole's Kirk-garth, but was forced to leave my place afore 'at I had been a week o' days in't.

Gul. How so?

Mar. Marry, because she ommost flighted and scauded me out o' my wits. She was t' arrantest scaud 'at ever I met wi' in my bworn days. She had seerly sike a tongue, as never was in ony woman's head, but her awn. It wad ring, ring, like a larum frae mworn to neeght. Then she wad put hersel into sike flusters, that her face wad be as black as t' reeking-crook. Nay, for that matter, I was but rightly sarra'd, for I was telled aforehand, by some verra sponible fwoke, as she was a mere donnot; howsomever, as I fand my money grow less and less every day, (for I had brought my good seven-and-twenty shilling to neen groats and two-pence,) I thought it wad be better to take up wi' a bad place than nea place at oll.

Gul. And how do you like London?

Mar. Marry, sir, I like nowerth eger nor shell on't. They're sike a set of fwoke as I never saw with my eyen. They laugh and fier at a body like onything: I went no but t'other day ti t' baker's shop for a lafe of bread, and they fell a giggling at me, as I'd been yan o' t' greatest gawvions i' t' world.

Gul. Pray, what is a gawvion?

Mar. Why, you're a gawvion for not knowing what it is; I thought ye Londoners ha' known everything: a gawvion's a ninny-hammer. Now, do you think, sir, 'at I look ought like a gawvion?

Gul. Not in the least, my pretty damsel.

Mar. They may bwost as they will o' their manners, but they have nae mare manners than a miller's horse, I can tell them that; that I can. I wish I had been still at canny Yatton.

Gul. As you have so great a liking to the place, why would you leave it?

Mar. Marry, sur, I was forced, as yan may say, to leave 't: the 'squire wad not let me be. By my truly, sir, he was efer after me, mworn, noon, and neeght. If I wad but ha consented to his wicked ways, I might ha' had gould by goppins, that I might. "Lo' ye, 'squire," say I, "you're mista'en o' me; I'se none o' thea sort o' cattle; I'se a vartuous young woman, I'll assure ye; ye're other fwoke's fwoke; wad ye be sike a taystrel as to ruin me?" But oll wadn't do; he kept following and following, and teasing and teasing me: at length, run I to teit' my auld dame, and she advised me to gaug to London to be out of his way; that she did, like an onnest woman as she was. I went to my cousin Ishell, and says I to her, "Ishell," says I, "come, will you goway to London?" and telled her the hale affair atween me and the 'squire. "Odsbeed!" says she, "my lass, I'll gang wi' thee ti t' world's end." And away we come in good yearnest.

Gul. It was a very vartuous resolution. Pray, how old are you?

Mar. I'se nineteen come Collop-Monday.

Gul. Would you undertake a housekeeper's place? Mar. I'se flaid I cannot manage't, unless it were in a husbandman's house.

Gul. It is a very substantial farmer's in Buckinghamshire: I am sure you will do; I'll set you down for it. Your name?

Mar. Margery Moorput, an ye please.

Gul. How do you spell it?

Mar. Nay, makins, I know naught o' speldering. I'se nea schollard.

Gul. Well, I shall write to him this evening. What wages do you ask?

Mar. Nay, marry, for that matter, I wadn't be ower stiff about wage.

Gul. Then I can venture to assure you of it. You must give me half-a-crown, my pretty maid. Our fee is only a shilling for a common place, but for a housekeeper's we have always half-a-crown.

Mar. There's twa shilling, an' yan, tea, three, four, fave, six penn'orth o' bross, with a thousand thanks. God's prayer light o' you! for I've seer ye'r't best friend I have met wi' sin I come frae canny Yatton, that you are. When shall I coll again, sir?

Gul. About the middle of the next week.

Mar. Sir, an' ye please, gud m'worning to you.

[Exit.

Gul. Good morning to you, dear, virtuous Mrs. Margery Moorput. So, this is a specimen of Yorkshire simplicity, that it is—More customers!

Enter Scotchman.

Well, sir, your business with me?

Scotch. Gin ye be the maister o' this office, my business wi' ye is to spear at ye, gin ye can be o' any service till a peur distressit gentleman?

Gul. Sir, I shall be glad to do a gentleman in distress any service in my power, especially one of your country. I have a veneration for the very name of Scotchman; my father was one.

Scotch. Troth, ye speak vera mickle like a gentleman, and seem to hae a proper sense o' national honour. I'm glad that I've been sae fonsy as to fa' into sic hands. Ye maun ken that my family is as auncient as ony i' a' Scotland, and that by direct lineal deshent, I sprang frae the great Jamy Mackintosh, who was a peevy-councillor to King Sandy the second.

Gul. A very considerable origin, indeed! But, pray, sir, what may have been the cause of your present distress?

Scotch. I've tell ye the hale matter: when I was a laddie I was sae daft to get the ill wull o' a' my kin, by the disgrace I had brought upo' the Mackintoshes, by pitting myself 'prentice till a canker auld carle o' a sword-slipper in Aberdeen, whose bonny daughter I was so unsonsy as to click a fancy to.

Gul. Well, sir?

Scotch. When I was out o' my 'prenticeship, I wanted gear to begin the warld wi': I axed a' my friends, but they gruit at me like the vengeance. "Hald ye there, lad!" quo' they: "Ye maun e'en pickle i' your ain poke nuke." "As ye barked ye may brew." An' the de'il o' owther gowd or siller; nae no sae mickle as a plack or a bawbie wad they gi' me, unless I wad betak' myself to some mare gentleman-like occupation. Weel, sir, I was forcit to wale a new business. They ga' me graith enough to buy a pack; and I turned travelling merchant, whilk the English, by way o' derision, ca' a pedder, that I might nae langer be a disgrace to my kin.

Gul. Why, this was a way to retrieve the disgrace o' the Mackintoshes, indeed!

Scotch. Right, sir, verra right a truly. But wi' your permission, I've speed me to the tragical part o' my story: as I was ganging my gate towards Portsmouth, I was attackt by twa robbers, who gar'd me strip frae the muckle coat o' my back to my vera sark; an' rubbit me o' a', ay, an' mare nor a' I could ca' my ain. An' no content wi' taking my gades, they ruggit my hair; they pou'd me by the lugs; they brisset and skelpit me to sic a gree, that the gore blude rin into my breeks, an' my skin was amaisht as black as pick; nay, when I graned i' meikle dool an' agony, the fallows leugh at my piti-fu' mains, ca'd me an ill-fared scabbit tyke; an' bad me begane into my ain crowdie country to sell butter an' brunstane.

Gul. The barbarous villains! Not only to rob and abuse you, but to insult your country.

Scotch. I wot, it was a downright national reflection; an' I'm sic a loo'er o' my country, that it hurt me mare nor a' the whacks they ga' me, an' the loss o' my pack into the bargain. Weel, sir, I am now brought to the maist ruefu' plight, that ever peur fallow was in, for I canna' git claiths to my back, or veetel to my wame: I'm sae blate that I maun starve to deid, or I can ax charity; albeit, I'm sae hungry that I could make a brow meal upo' a whin sour kail, an' a haggise, ta'en aff a middling, gif it e'en stank like a brock.

Gul. Poor gentleman! I pity your condition with all my heart.

Scotch. As I trudge along the wynds, I can hear the cawler waiter, I drink at the pump, gang jaup, jaup, jaup, i' my empty kyte. Except a bicker o' gud fat brose, an' a lunch o' salt beef, whilk I gat last Sabbath-day aboard o' a wee Scotch barkie, I ha' no had my peur wame weel steght this twa owks an' aboon; an' hunger, ye ken, is unco fare to bide.

Gul. It is so, indeed.

Scotch. Now, gin ye can pit me intill any creditable way o' getting my bread, I sall rackon it a very great kyndness.

Gul. For what station in life do you think yourself fittest?

Scotch. For any station, where learning is necessary. I care na' a pickle o' sneshing what it be. Ye may ken, by my elocation, I'm a man o' nae sma' lair. I was sae weel-leered, that ilka auld wife in Aberdeen wad turn up the whites of her e'en like a mass John at kirk, an' cry, "Ay, God guide us! what a pauky chiel is Donald! He's sae aldagabbit tha' a speaks like a print buke." I could like vera weel to be a Latin secretary till a minister o' state, an' can say, wi'out vanity, I'm as fit for an office as ony man i' the British dominions.

Gul. Then you understand Latin?

Scotch. Latin! Hoot awa' man! hoot awa', ye daft gowk! do ye jcer a body? a Scotchman, an' not unnerstan' Latin! Ha, ha, ha! A vera gude joke a truly! unnerstan' Latin. quo'he! Why, we speak it better nor ony o' his majesty's subjects, an' wi' the genuine original pronunciation, too. I've gi' you a specimen frae that wutty chiel, Maister Ovid:

Parve, nec invidia, sine me, liber, ibis in urbem,

Hei mihi, quod Domino non licet ire tuo!

Now, ken ye, man, whether I unnerstand Latin or no?

Gul. Oh! sir, I see you are a complete Latinist. Well, if we can't fall in for the secretary, suppose you should take up with translating awhile, till something better offer? there are pretty pickings, very comfortable pickings, now and then, to be had in that way.

Scotch. Anything at present to satisfy the cravings of my wame, there is no an under the dignity o' my family. Ye ken the auld saw, beggars munna be choosers: for that matter, I've no repine, gif I can but e'en git bannocks, an' sneeshing, till something better fa' out.

Gul. Give me your name and place of abode, and you may expect to hear from me very shortly.

Scotch. Donald Mackintosh, gentleman; at Maister Archibald Buchanan's, a tobacco-merchant, at the sign of the Highlander and snuff-bledder, ower anent King James's-stairs, Shadwell. [GULWELL writes.] What's your charge, sir?

Gul. Only a shilling, sir: 'tis a perquisite for my clerk.

Scotch. There it's for ye, sir. [Gives money.] I was fain to borrow't o' Sandy Ferguson, the coal-heaver; for the de'il a boddle had I o' my ain.

Gul. Have you got anybody to give you a character?

Scotch. In troth, I canna say I ha' e'en now. I ken no living saul in London but Sandy an' my landlord, that I would ax sic a favour o'; and abins their karecter o' me would no be thought sufficient.

Gul. Nay, sir, it is no very great matter: it would have saved you a trifle; for when we make characters, we must be paid for them. We have characters, as jockies have pedigrees, from five shillings to five guineas.

Scotch. Weel, sir, we may tauk o' that anither time: gin ye succeed, ye'll find me no ungratefu'. Ye sall see I ha' no sae mikle o' the fau'se Englishman wi' me, as to be forgetfu' o' my benefactors. I'm awear I've been vera fasheous; howe'er, I'se fash ye nae langer, but gang my wa's home. Sir, your vera abliged servant. Ik gude troth, this is a rara avis in terris, nigroque similima cygno. [Exit.]

Gul. Your most obedient, good Mr. Latin secretary. There goes one of the many fools that owe their ruin to family pride. Mr. Williams, give an eye to the office; I shall be back in a few minutes. [Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Register Office.

Enter GULWELL, meeting WILLIAMS.

Gul. Her ladyship hath released me sooner than I expected. Go, get the instrument finished, Mr. Williams. [Exit WILLIAMS.] A comb-brush for Lady Vixen. [Writing.] This, I believe, will be the one-and-twentieth she hath had from my office within these two years: a special customer, i'faith! Heyday! Who have we here? A spruce coxcomb of the military cast.

Enter Captain LE BRUSH.

Capt. Sir, your most obedient. Pray, a'n't you Mr. Geoffrey Gulwell, esquire?

Gul. The same, sir.

Capt. Then I am come to have a little talk with you.

Gul. Your business, good sir?

Capt. You must know, sir, I am an ensign in a new raised ridgmen, to which post I was advanced through the interest of my very good friend and acquaintance, Lord Pliant; whom I had the honour to serve many years in the capacity of valet-de-chambre. But, sir, though formerly a servant, I am a gentleman born, and have had the honour of an university iddication.

Gul. Sir, I make no doubt of it; you have the appearance of a man of consequence: may I crave your name and family?

Capt. My name, sir, is Le Brush. I am commonly called Brush, but Le Brush is the name my family was arriginally, nay, even so lately as Harry the Eight, known by: a name, sir, given by way of distinction to one of my auntsisters, that was general under All-afraid the Great, for so victoriously sweeping away hole armies of the enemy. Our family had all their estates confiscated in the broils between the Yorkshire and the Lancashire line; so that their predecessors have been a little out of repair to the present time, and the name regenerated into plain Brush.

Gul. Sir, as your family hath been so long reduced, how came you by the education you talk of?

Capt. Sir, I was taught to read and write free-gratis for nothing, at a charity-school; and attended Lord Pliant to the university; where, you know, there are many opportunities for a man of talons to improve himself.

Gul. Right, sir; such opportunities, that I have frequently known a valet return from thence full as wise as his master.

Capt. Egad! sir, I see very plainly you're a gentleman that knows what's what.

Gul. And pray, Captain, what were your favourite studies at college?

Capt. Logic and poetry; the only two studies fit for a gentleman: as the first will teach you to cheat the devil, and the other to charm the ladies.

Gul. I should be glad to have a little conference with you on the latter; for I am a bit of a dabbler in it.

Capt. Then, serously, as a friend, I would dissuade you to look out d—d sharp, or, upon my soul, you'll catch a Tartar! for I have not met with anybody that was fit to hold the candle to me in poetry, for a long series of time. But, sir, as I am in haste, we had better refer the dispute, at present. Any other time I am at your service for a confab of a few hours. I shall run through my business with as brief prolixity as possible.—At a country town, where I was recruiting, I had the good fortune to pick up a maiden lady, pretty well stricken in years, with a fortune of three thousand pounds in the stocks. Now, sir, as the interest of the money, and my present pay, will scarcely be sufficient to maintain me, (for you know, sir, a soldier and a gentleman is anonymous characters, and a man in my office must live up to his dignity,) I say, sir, as the interest of the money is d—d low, I have a desire to purchase a cornetcy, or a company of foot, that I may be better able to live like a gentleman.

Gul. Posts of that kind frequently fall under my disposal. I think it a prudent and honourable intention in you; as, in case of mortality, the provision for your lady will be larger.

Capt. Pooh! d—n the old hag! I don't care if the devil had her! I have been married above two months, and was as tired of her in the first fortnight, as a modern man of quality after a twelvemonth's cohabitation. I have, for these five weeks past, done everything in my power to break her heart; but, egad! it is made of such tough stuff, such penetrable stuff, (as my friend Shakspeare calls it,) that I believe I sha'n't be able to defect the business, d—e! In short, my disappointment has thrown me into such a devilish delima, that the devil fetch me, if I know, for the blood and soul of me, how to execrate myself out of it! For I want to be rid of her, most cursedly, that's certain!

Gul. There are many ways, Captain, by which such a business may be brought about.

Capt. True, sir; my sergeant, Tom Spatterdash, who is a d—d cute dog, as any in the coppercan system—You don't know Tom, do you, sir?

Gul. I can't say I have the honour of his acquaintance.

Capt. Oh! the most drollest, comicallest fellow in the whole universe, egad! As I was a saying, Tom offered me, for ten guineas, to give her a dose; but, no, no; d—e, thinks I to myself, I'll not poison the old beldam, neither; it will be the more fashionable way to break her heart.

Gul. Sir, as you are a gentleman, I would beg leave to ask why you are so desirous of parting with a woman, who has been so great a benefactress to you? I should be afraid your patron and his lady would resent such behaviour. Will you be kind enough to answer my question with truth.

Capt. Truth, sir, is, to be sure, a most amable thing, and what every gentleman ought to make use of, as Mr.—what's his name?—one of the old Roman philosophers,—Pythagorus, I believe,—ay, 'Squire Pythagorus it was, who used to say, "Socratus is my friend, Pluto is my friend; but truth is more my friend." So say I; Lord Pliant is my friend, Lady Pliant is my friend; but truth is more my friend. And though some persons will affirm that truth ought not to be spoken at all times, yet no philosopher, nor nobody else, would ever venture to affirm, but that truth ought to be spoken at some times; which being granted,—I say, sir, which being granted, it must follow, necessarily follow, sir, that though truth ought not to be spoken at all times, occasions, and seasons, yet reasonable truths may be occasionally spoken at all times; but this, sir, is the very profundity of logic, and, consequently, out of the reach of every capacity; wherefore, I shall descend into the spear of common sense, to be the better understood.

Gul. Sir, I must acknowledge that your arguments are very sublime and logical; but yet they are no answer to my question. Perhaps I have been too rude to press you on the occasion; there may be some lady in the case, who—

Capt. Egad! sir, you're in the right! I had not been married above ten days, when I fell most consumedly in love with a niece of my wife's; a girl of fifteen, with a d—d large fortune: a most exquisit creature, upon my soul! In short, she is the hole tote of my desires. As that there black fellar in the play—Othello Moor, I think they call him, says—"Perdition catch my soul but I do love her; and when I love her not, chaos is come again!"

Gul. Pray, Captain, who is that Chaos?

Capt. "And when I love her not, chaos is come again!" Oh! a d—d fine sentiment as ever was uttered! the most sentimental sentiment in the world!

Gul. But, Captain, I ask who is that Chaos?

Capt. Chaos! Lard bless you! you partend you don't know; a man of your years and understanding, too! Fie, fie! Mr. Gulwell, none of your tricks upon travellers!

Gul. Sir, I seldom ask the meaning of a word I understand.

Capt. Then you must know, chaos is a—my dear, it is a—a—[Aside.] Zounds! what shall I say? The devil chaos him!—It is a—I can't find words to express myself properly—It is impossible to divine it literally; but chaos—when a man speaks of chaos in—a general way, it is as much as to say—chaos—chaos—I can't divine it otherwise, for the blood and soul of me!

Gul. You have not divined it at all; at least, not to my satisfaction. I suppose, by the connexion, it signifies dislike.

Capt. Right, sir; it is a—a—kind of dislike; but not, as one may say, a—a—an absolute dislike.—But, sir, to proceed in my story: if I could but break my wife's heart, I should assuredly marry my niece in less than a month after her decease. A separate maintenance won't do, or Mrs. Le Brush should have it with all my soul; but, if we part, you know, all hopes of breaking her heart are over. She has offered to separate, if I would give her two hundred pounds in ready rhino, and annually allow her for life, an annual provision of fifty pounds per annum, every year.

Gul. Which you've refused, I suppose?

Capt. Refused! most certainly, sir. I was almost putrified with astonishment at the egregious impudence of her demand. I shall not consent to allow her a shilling more than fifteen a year. She may live comfortably, very comfortably on it, in the North.

Gul. Truly, sir, I think fifteen pounds a year a very genteel allowance; especially as she brought you so small a trifle as three thousand!

Capt. I think so too, egad! But these old devils have no conscience at all, d—e! Well, sir, you'll give me an answer as soon as possible. You may hear of me at Mrs. Dresden's, a milliner, under the Peeaches in Common Garden.

Gul. [Writing.] Very well, sir. I'll talk with a principal about your affair, this evening.

Capt. There, sir. [Gives him money.] You'll take care to beat him down as low as possible.

Gul. You may depend on my best endeavours; most noble Captain, [Exit Captain LE BRUSH.] scoundrel! I should have said, Why, this fellow's a greater rascal than myself! But what can be expected from a coxcomb of his stamp!—More company?

Enter an Irishman.

Irish. My dear honey, I am come to shée if you have commiseration enough in your bowelsh to a poor Irishman, to get him a plaish.

Gul. What sort of a place are you fit for?

Irish. Upon my shalvashion, joy, d'ye see? I am fit for any plaish alive! I have strenght and bonesh enough in this carcash of mine, to do all the work in the world.

Gul. Have you ever been in service?

Irish. In shervish! No, to be sure I have not!—Yes, by St. Patrick, ever since I was so big as a potato!

Gul. With whom did you last live?

Irish. With 'Squire Macellan, of Killybegs.

Gul. Killybegs! Where the deuce is that?

Irish. Why, where the devil should it be but in Ireland, my dear honey?

Gul. But what part of Ireland? what province? what county?

Irish. It is in the provinsh of Donègal, in the county of Ulster. It is an inland sea-port town, where they catch the best pickled herrings in England. By my fet! he was the best man of a maisher between Derry and Youghall. Arrah! I shall never live so well with nobody else, unless I go back to live with him again!

Gul. As he was so good a master, how came you to leave him?

Irish. Leave him, joy! because he wanted to make a bug and a fool of me. When I went to go to plough and harrow, he would insist on my yoking the dear creatures, the mulesh, by the necks, instead of the tailsh.

Gul. The tails! Why, is that the Irish custom in ploughing?

Irish. Ay, upon my conscience, it is, joy! and the best cushtom, that ever was born in the world. I'll give you a reason for it, honey: you know, when the trashes are fastened to the tail, all the rest of the body is free; and when all the carcash but the tail goes along, the tail must follow of course: besides, honey, all the world knows that the strength of every human creature lies in the tail. Arrah! he wanted to bodder me with his d—d English tricks! but the devil burn me, if honest Paddy would not have left twenty places, if he had been in them, all at once, sooner than be put out of the way of his country.

Gul. You were certainly in the right; I commend your spirit. But, pray, how have you lived since you came to London?

Irish. Lived, honey! as a great many live in London—nobody knows how. By my shoul! I have only picked up five thirteens for these four weeks and a half!

Gul. [Aside.] A special raw-boned fellow this! he will do for America: I'll send word to my nephew Trappum.—Would you like to go abroad, friend?

Irish. Ay, my dear honey! any way in England, or in Scotland; but I do not like, d'ye see, to live out of my native kingdom.

Gul. Oh! it's only a very short voyage; a little round the Land's End. A gentleman has taken a very considerable farm in the west; and if I could prevail on him to hire you, you would have the sole management of it. 'Twould be the making of you. You can write, I suppose?

Irish. Yes, upon my conscience, that I can very well—my mark, honey, that's all. But that's nothing, my dear; I could get anybody to write for me, if they did but know how.

Gul. That's true. Well, I shall see the gentleman this evening, and have a little close talk with him about you.

Irish. Upon my shoul, the most shivilest person, d'ye see, that ever I met with, since I was an Irishman. [Aside.]

Gul. Where do you lodge, friend?

Irish. At the Harp and Spinning Wheel, in Farthing-fields, Wapping; in a room of my own, that I hire at nine-pence a week.

Gul. Your name?

Irish. Patrick O'Carrol.

Gul. O'Carrol! Give me your hand; we must be cousins. My great-grandmother was an O'Carrol!

Irish. Was she, by St. Patrick? Then we must be cushins, sure enough! Where was she born?

Gul. At what do you call the place, where 'Squire O'Carrol lives?

Irish. What, Provost O'Carrol?

Gul. Ay, the Provost.

Irish. Oh! you're a soft lad! you don't know it was Ballishanny?

Gul. Right; that is the very place! Well, cousin, I should like to be better acquainted with you.

Irish. And so should poor paddy by my fet! You cannot conceive how my heart dances in the inside of my bowelsh, to see a relation in this part of the world, where I expected to see nobody at all. Do, honey, put your head here to feel. Fet! joy, it beats, and beats, and beats, and jumps about in my belly, like a brusted pea in a fire-shovel. Arrah!

I knew you to be better than half an Irishman, by your shivility to strangers.

Gul. Ay, I wish I were wholly so; but it was my misfortune to be born in England.

Irish. Upon my conscience, that was almost poor Paddy's misfortune, too! I was begot in England; but, as good luck would have it, I went over to Ireland to be born.

Gul. Well, cousin, if you will call on me to-morrow morning, I hope I shall be able to give you joy of your place.

Irish. I shall, my dear cushin. Arrah! now, if I were but my father, who has been dead these seven years, I should be making a song upon you for this shivility.

Gul. Your father? What was he?

Irish. A true Irish poet, my dear; he could neither read nor write. By my fet! honey, he wrote many an excellent new song. I have one of his upon Moggy Maelachlen, a young virgin in Sligo, who he fell in love with, after she had two love-begs at one time to 'Squire Cannon.

Gul. I should be glad to see it, if you have it on you.

Irish. Oh! yes, my dear creature, I always carry it upon me: it is in my head, honey; you shall see it in a minute, if you will give me leave to sing it.

Gul. With all my heart, cousin.

Irish. The devil burn me, now, honey, if I can think of the right tune, because it never had any tune at all. However, it will go to Larry Groghrau.

Gul. By all means, let's have it.

AIR.—Irishman.

*My sweet pretty Mog, you're as soft as a bog,
And as wild as a kitten, as wild as a kitten;
Those eyes in your face—oh! pity my case!*

*Poor Paddy have smitten, poor Paddy have smitten.
Far softer than silk, and as fair as new milk,
Your lily-white hand is, your lily-white hand is:
Your shape's like a pail, from your heal to your tail,
You're straight as a wand is, you're straight as a wand is.*

*Your lips red as cherries, and your curling hair is
As black as the devil, as black as the devil;
Your breath is as sweet, too, as any potato,
Or orange from Seville, or orange from Seville.
When dress'd in your bodice, you trip like a goddess,
So nimble, so frisky; so nimble, so frisky;
A kiss on your cheek ('tis so soft and so sleek)
Would warm me like whisky, would warm me like whisky.*

*I grunt and I pine, like a pig or a swine,
Because you're so cruel, because you're so cruel;
No rest I can take, and asleep or awake,
I dream of my jewel, I dream of my jewel.
Your hate, then, give over, nor Paddy, your lover,
So cruelly handle, so cruelly handle;
Or Paddy must die, like a pig in a sty,
Or snuff of a candle, or snuff of a candle.*

Gul. I thank you very kindly; it is a most admirable song. Well, you will be here at nine to-morrow?

Irish. You may be certain of my coming, my dear cushin.

Gul. But, harkye! be sure not to mention a word of this affair to any person whatsoever. I would not have it get wind, lest anybody should be applying to the gentleman.

Irish. Oh! let Paddy alone for that, my dear creature; I am too cunning to mention it to nobody but my nown shelf. Well, your servant, my dear cushion. [Exit.]

Gul. Your servant, your servant! We must have this fellow indented as soon as possible: he will fetch a rare price in the plantations.

Enter Mrs. DOGGEREL and a Girl.

Heyday! what whimsical figure is this? she appears to be of the family of the Slammekins. [Aside.]

Mrs. D. Mr. Office-keeper,—I forget your name, though I have seen it so often in print.

Gul. Gulwell, madam. Pray, be seated.

Mrs. D. I come, Mr. Gulwell, to inquire after a person that can write short-hand: I want an amanuensis.

Gul. An amanuensis, madam?

Mrs. D. Yes, sir; an amanuensis to take down my ideas: they flow upon me in such torrents, that I cannot commit them to paper, a tenth part so fast as I could wish. My name, sir, is not altogether unknown in the literary world. You have, undoubtedly, heard of the celebrated Mrs. Slaternella Doggerel, the dramatic poetess?—Eh! have not you?

Gul. Oh; yes, madam, ten thousand times!—[Aside.] Though the devil fetch me, if ever I heard of the name before!

Mrs. D. I have written Mr.—a—a—What's your name, sir?

Girl. Gulwell, mamma, is the gentleman's name.

Mrs. D. Ay, ay, child. I have written, Mr. Culwell, no less than nine tragedies, eight comedies, seven tragi-comedies, six farces, five operas, four masques, three oratorios, two mock-tragedies, and one tragi-comi-operatico-magico-farcico-pastoral-dramatic romance, making, in the whole, as Scrub says, five-and-forty.

Girl. Yes, sir, five-and-forty.

Gul. And pray, madam, how many of them have been brought upon the stage?

Mrs. D. Not one, sir; but that is no diminution of their merit; for while the stage is under the direction of people that scribble themselves, it is no wonder they are so backward in producing the works of others. As what-do-you-call-'em says in the play, "Who the devil cares for any man that has more wit than himself?" Eh! Mr. Culwell?

Gul. Very true, madam. But suppose we should beat about for a patron among the great!

Mrs. D. A patron, quotha! Why, the very word, applied as an encourager of literary merit, is almost obsolete. You might as soon find a real patriot, as a real patron. Our great men are too much engaged in the trifles and follies of the age, to give themselves any concern about dramatic genius. Indeed, if I could submit to write a treatise on the science of gaming, a new history of the peerage, or an essay on improving the breed of running-horses, perhaps some of our right honourable jockies might vouchsafe to give me a recommendation to their brother jockies of the theatrical turf.

Gul. Madam, I am of opinion, that a well-written pamphlet in favour of the ministry, could not fail of procuring you a patron.

Mrs. D. And so you would have me sacrifice my conscience to interest, you strange creature, you?

Gul. Conscience, madam! What have authors, that write for bread, to do with conscience? A learned professor in the law, though he has amassed even a ministerial fortune at the bar, will, for a few guineas, prostitute his eloquence, by pleading in a bad cause; then why should not a poor devil of an author, against his conscience, brandish his pen in a political squabble, to keep himself from starving.

Mrs. D. But what author of true genius could ever stoop to write a parcel of dull stuff about ins and outs? No, no; depend on't, the most certain way to get my pieces on the stage, will be to go on the stage myself. Many ricketty, dramatic brats have been allowed to crawl on the stage, which would never have made their theatrical appearance, if they had not been of theatrical parentage.

Gul. Madam, your observation is very just.

Mrs. D. But, pray, what do you think of my person? With a large hoop instead of this trolloppee, should I not make a tolerably elegant figure in tragedy, nay, not to say magnificent one?

Gul. The most elegant and magnificent in the world.

Mrs. D. I once played Belvidera with some of my city acquaintance, and got such prodigious applause, that Mr. Alderman Loveturtle came waddling up to me, with a—"Madam, you have played the part so finely, that though I love good eating and drinking better than anything in the world, I would mortify upon bread and water a whole month, for the pleasure of seeing you play it again."

Gul. Madam, you are an excellent mimic.

Mrs. D. And what has raised the reputation of some performers so much as mimicry? But I'll give you a speech out of Belvidera's mad scene.

Gul. Madam, you will oblige me greatly.

Girl. My mamma speaks it delightfully, I assure you, sir.

Mrs. D. Take my cap, Melpomene; I must have my hair about my ears; there is no playing a mad scene without dishevelled hair.

"Ha! look there!

My husband bloody, and his friend too!—vanish'd!

Here they went down:—Oh! I'll dig, dig the den up!

Ho! Jaffier! Jaffier!"

Girl. Pray, don't cry, mamma; don't cry.

[Weeps.]

Mrs. D. Pray, Mr. Gulliver, lend me your hand to help me up. Well, what do you think of this acting?

Gul. I am astonish'd at it. Why don't you apply to the managers?

Girl. My mamma did apply to one of them.

Mrs. D. Yes, and spoke that very speech.

Gul. And what did he say? Was he not in raptures.

Mrs. D. So far from it, that he did nothing at the while but titter, and he! he! he!

Girl. Yes, he did nothing but he! he! he!

Gul. Titter, and he! he! he!

[They all force a laugh.]

Mrs. D. Yes, yes; I shall breed her up myself. With her own capabilities and my instructions, I don't doubt but she will make all our tragedy heroines turn pale; she will eclipse them all, I warrant her; I have already taught her the part of Sappho, in my two-act tragedy of that name. Give the gentleman a speech, Melpomene.

Girl. Yes, mamma. Where shall I begin?

Mrs. D. At "Oh! Phaon, Phaon!" You are to observe, sir, that all my tragedies are written in heroics; I hate your blank verse; it is but one remove from prose, and consequently not sublime enough for tragedy. Now, begin, Melly.

Girl. "Oh! Phaon, Phaon! could my eyes impart, The swelling throes and tumults of my heart—"

Mrs. D. "The swelling throes and tumults of my heart!" Child, you are too languid by ten thousand degrees. Your sister, Calliope, would speak it abundantly better. Nay, little Clio, that is not quite three years old, could not speak it worse. Give it more energy, child. Set yourself a heaving like a tragedian out of breath. It should be spoken thus: "The swelling throes and tumults of my heart."

Girl. "The swelling throes and tumults of my heart, Thou never wouldst thy Sappho's love desert."

Mrs. D. There's a pathetic speech for you!

Gul. Very pathetic indeed. And this little dear hath spoken it like an angel.

Mrs. D. I'll now give you a touch of the pompous. "By hell and vengeance—" I forgot to tell you it is the turnkey's soliloquy in my tragedy of Betty Canning.

"By hell and vengeance, Canning shall be mine!

Her, but with life, I never can resign.

Should Ætna bar my passage to the dame,

Headlong I'd plunge into the sulphurous flame;

Or, like the Titans, wage a war with Jove,

Rather than lose the object of my love."

Gul. Madam, this must have a fine effect. It will certainly bring the house down, whenever it is played.

Mrs. D. You sensible creature, I must embrace you for the kind expression. Yes, yes, it must have a fine effect, or it never would have had a run of fifty nights. I assure you, it was played no less than fifty nights by Mr. Flockton's company.

Gul. Flockton's company! Pray, who is Flockton?

Mrs. D. He is master of the best company of puppets in England.

Gul. So, then, your piece has been played by wooden actors? Ha, ha, ha!

Mrs. D. Wooden actors! and why this sarcasm on wooden actors? Pray, sir, let me ask you, what piece is, now-a-days, played without wooden actors? Well, Mr.—a—Culpepper—

Girl. Lud! mamma, what a queer name is that! They call him Gulwell.

Mrs. D. My dear, I knew his name begun with either Gull or Cull—I ask your pardon, sir; I am so frequently enveloped in thought that I even forget my own name; I hope, therefore, you will not take it amiss that I should not remember your's.

Gul. No apology, madam.

Mrs. D. Well, Mr.—a—Gulcatcher, if you hear of an amanuensis, pray give me the most early intelligence.

Gul. But I hope, madam, I shall not offend you in asking you how he is to be paid?

Mrs. D. Paid! Why, I really did not think of this—Let me see: suppose—no, this won't do—hum—ay—He shall have a tenth part of the profit of my future productions: he shall tithe them.

Gul. Madam, I feel for your young muses, and can dissemble with you no longer. Take my advice: go immediately home, and burn all your pieces; for I am certain you will never make a shilling of them, unless you sell them for waste paper.

Mrs. D. Waste paper! Heaven and earth! such excellent compositions go for waste paper!

Girl. Waste paper, indeed! I should not have thought of waste paper!

Gul. Burn them all immediately. Give me your solemn promise to leave off scribbling; and if any place, worthy your acceptance, fall in my way, I will endeavour to fix you in it.

Mrs. D. What! sacrifice immortality for a place? I must tell you, sir, you're an envious, impertinent, self-sufficient puppy, to presume to advise me, who have a million times your understanding.

Girl. Yes, a million times your understanding!

Mrs. D. Waste paper! Oh, ye gods! if I had the wealth of Cræsus, I would give it all to be revenged on this affronting savage! [Exit.]

Girl. Ah! you're a naughty creature to vex my poor mamma in this manner! [Exit.]

Gul. So, this comes of my plain dealing! I am rightly served for endeavouring to wash the black-amour white.

Re-enter Mrs. DOGGEREL and Girl.

Mrs. D. I have returned to tell you, that I will have ample vengeance for this indignity. I will immediately set about writing a farce, to be called the Register Office, in which I will expose your tricks, your frauds, your cheats, your impositions, your chicaneries! I'll do for you! I'll make you repent the hour wherein you had the impudence and ill-nature to advise me to burn all my pieces! By all the gods! I'll write such a piece against you—

Then like thy fate superior will I sit,

And see thee scorn'd and laugh'd at by the pit;

I, with my friends, will in the gallery go,

And tread thee sinking to the shades below. [Exit.]

Girl. "And tread thee sinking to the shades below!" [Exit.]

Gul. The woman takes it mightily in dudgeon!

Enter an Irishman.

Irish. My dear cushin, after I went away before, I forgot to pay for your shivility; therefore, I am going to come back again to be out of your debt.

Gul. Never mind it, cousin; any other time.

Irish. Arrah! I am a person of more honour than to continue in nobody's debt, when I owe him nothing. You kidnapping rascal, you was going to send me into the other world, to be turned into a black negro. I had gone, sure enough, but for McCarroll O'Neil, whom I overtook, as we run against one another in your English St. Patrick's church-yard—St. Paul's. Besides, if I should be taken sick, and die of a consumption to-night, you might tell me to my face, the next time I see you, that I stole out of the world on purpose to cheat you. There, my dear cushin!

[Overturns the desks, &c. beats GULWELL off, and exit.]

THE SIEGE OF BELGRADE;

A COMIC OPERA, IN THREE ACTS;

FATIMA.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The Village of Servia, with the Danube. On one side, the Turkish camp; on the other, the Austrian, which appears at a distance.

Enter several Turkish Soldiers, who range themselves on each side the stage; then enter Turkish Peasants of both sexes, who dance; after the dance,

CHORUS.—TURKISH SOLDIERS.

*Wave our prophet's fam'd standard of glory on high,
Till the envious moon die away in the sky;
And, like the pale Christians, leave Danube's fair stream,
To reflect our victorious crescent's bright beam.*

Enter USEPH.

Useph. Be silent, you soldiers: his highness the Seraskier is coming; he has just arrived with the Turkish army under his command to relieve Belgrade. I have been conversing with him; I told him of your loyalty to the sublime Porte. "Sir—your highness—my dear highness," says I; for we talked it very familiarly: "I am the chief magistrate of this village; I know the Ottoman Porte has not more loyal subjects in all the province of Servia; and as for your highness—always talking of your highness—your highness's name is never out of our mouths." By-the-by, remember his name is Mohamed Aboubeker Ben Abdallah Ben Ali; I dare say you never heard it before. So, says the Seraskier to me, "My dear Useph Ben Yacomb Ben Mustapha"—at the same time graciously laughing at me with great condescension—[Flourish.] Oh! here he comes: now you shall see how his highness is pleased to honour me; I shall certainly be created a pacha of three tails.

Enter SERASKIER, ISMAEL, and Attendants.

Seras. Useph, come hither.

Useph. Yes, your highness. [Apart to the Peasants.] Now he is going to consult me on some great military operation.

Seras. Are there many pretty girls in this neighbourhood?

Useph. Ha, ha, ha! That's a good joke. Ah! your highness will conquer every way, I see. Ha, ha, ha! Your highness is pleased to make me laugh. Ha, ha, ha!

Seras. You are too familiar.

Useph. My lord?

Seras. Begone. [Ereunt USEPH and Peasants.]

Enter LILLA, who kneels to the SERASKIER.

AIR.—LILLA.

*Lost, distress'd, thus driven from home,
Whither shall poor Lilla go?
Wheresoe'er my steps may roam,
Tyrant power will prove my foe.*

Seras. Who is this beautiful girl? Rise, lovely fair one.

Lilla. I humbly beg your highness' pardon for my boldness; I am not used to talk to great folks.

Seras. Speak, charming angel! bless me with the voice of nature; who are you?

TRIO.—SERASKIER, LILLA, and ISMAEL.

Seras. *Speak, I command thee; tell thy grief.
Say, can my power afford relief;
For my trembling heart must yield belief.*

[Aside.]

Lilla. *Ah! may I dare to tell my grief,
And, humbly, thus, implore relief;
To my falt'ring tongue, oh! yield belief.*

Ismael. *Beauty may boldly tell her grief;
Such fine eyes command relief;
And his trembling heart must yield belief.*

Lilla. I am but a poor country girl, sir; my name is Lilla; but I love Leopold, and Leopold loves me; yet my cross, ill-natured brother wants me to refuse

Leopold, to marry that ugly old miser, Useph, a justice of peace in our village.

Seras. Useph! Oh! the old poacher! [Aside.] does your brother object to Leopold?

Lilla. He says, and please your highness, that Leopold is too passionate to make a good husband; now, I own he is rather violent, but I don't like him a bit the worse for that.

Seras. Where is Leopold?

Lilla. Ah! my lord, my mind misgives me that some mischief has happened to him; but they locked me up to prevent my going in search of him.

Seras. Then how came you here?

Lilla. Please your highness, I jumped out of the window.

Seras. What a pleasing sample of rustic simplicity! how handsome she is! [To ISMAEL.]

Im. What, my lord, do you forget your Austrian captive?

Seras. Forget her! no; but why should I confine myself to a single rose, when I can form a bouquet of them. Well, charming Lilla, within this half-hour I promise you redress. Conduct her to my tent, and attend her well.

Lilla. A thousand thanks, your highness. [Erit.]

Seras. Is she not beautiful, Ismael?

Im. I own, my lord, she is beautiful; but—

Seras. But what?

Im. I beg your highness' pardon; but while I see the black eagle soar upon the walls of Belgrade, I cannot forget that I am a soldier.

Seras. Nor I, Ismael; but I have room in my heart for love and valour at the same time; I never fight better than when I am in love; Mars never smiles so propitiously upon me as when I am paying my adoration to Venus; so, if you wish me to conquer the Austrians, you must get me this girl. [Erit ISMAEL.] She is a charming creature, and shall be mine.

AIR.—SERASKIER.

The rose and the lily their beauties combining,

Delight in adorning a form so divine;

Such charms to a peasant consigning,

Ah! must I resign?

Forbid it, ye powers! to love 'tis a treason;

Yet, ambition, assuming the semblance of reason,

Commands me, with scorn, the mean thought to decline.

Wealth and power, what are your worth,

To pleasure if you give not birth?

Rich in ambition's gilded toys,

I barter them for real joys. [Erit.]

SCENE II.—Inside of Peter's House.

Enter PETER and GHITA.

DUET.

Ghita. How the deuce I came to like you,

I am sure I cannot tell;

Had my face ne'er chanc'd to strike you,

I'd been pleas'd, sir, just as well.

Peter. Faith! as you say, I, too, wonder

Why to like you I'm inclin'd:

Though in love we're apt to blunder;

Love, you know, they say, is blind.

Ghita. You're ogling all the lasses.

Peter. You're simp'ring at each lad.

Ghita. Each hour in falsehood passes.

Peter. You flirt it quite as bad.

Both. You had better not provoke me;

Though you think as you've bespoke me,

*I shall let you break my heart,
But I'm ready now to part.*

Peter. Then, suppose I take my leave?

Ghita. Do; I'm sure I shall not grieve.

Will you stay, or will you go?

Peter. Shall I stay, or shall I go?

Both. As you please, say yes or no.

Enter USEPH.

Useph. What, the deuce! quarrelling before marriage! Oh, fie! that is very irregular; wait till the ceremony is over, and then you will quarrel of course.

Peter. Indeed, sir!

Ghita. Hear me, sir.

Useph. No, I'll not hear you: am I to be talked to by you? I, who have conversed with his highness the Seraskier?—besides, I hate to hear both sides of the question; it perplexes me so, that I never know how to make a decision.

Peter. Why, then, sir, how can you decide?

Useph. Why, I decide that you are both in the wrong. I fancy that decision will hold good in most quarrels; my friend, his highness the Seraskier, could not make a better decision. But where is your sister? where is my dear Lilla? [To PETER.]

Ghita. Why, Peter has locked her up, to keep her from your rival, Leopold.

Useph. Ah! that's a desperate dog: he is always in a desperate passion, and always pretending to keep his temper; he is the very torch of sedition, and always in a blaze. [LEOPOLD singing without.] Eh! why, that's his voice. I—I—I don't much wish for meeting—Here he comes.

Enter LEOPOLD.

Leop. How are you? how do you do? Harkye! you, sir, where's your sister?

Peter. Why, as to that, Leopold—

Leop. Oh! I know what you are going to say; you mean to say that I am in a passion.—Ah! Ghita, how do you do? Very fine, pleasant, disagreeable, temperate weather, I think.

Useph. Rather cloudy.

Leop. What?

Useph. It was rather cloudy when I was talking to his highness the Seraskier just now. But I believe I can answer your inquiries: in the first place—

Leop. What do you mean by that? I'd have you know that I won't take an insult from any man living.

Useph. Why, there is no talking to you; I can't reason with you.

Leop. It's false! you—I say, you are mistaken. I insist upon your reasoning with me; d—e! you shall reason with me; ay, and coolly, too, though I know you are my rival.

Useph. But give me leave—

Leop. Well, I know what you are going to say, that people needn't quarrel because they are rivals.

Useph. Granted; and besides—

Leop. Well, I know, I know; and you mean to observe, that warmth and anger betray a weakness on these occasions, which, I trust, I am free from. Harkye! you rascal, [To PETER.] I know your sister is locked up; if you don't give me the key, d—e! I'll break your head; I will, by—

Useph. Sir, do you remember who I am? a magistrate and a courtier: do you respect my authority? [Marching up to LEOPOLD, who draws back.]

Leop. [Marching up to USEPH, who draws back.] No, I do not: that for your authority. [Snaps his fingers.] A magistrate, indeed! Ha, ha, ha! Look at the magistrate. What have you to say now, magistrate?

Useph. Nothing: if you don't respect authority, there's an end of the matter.

Leop. [To PETER.] Give me the key.

Peter. Why, to say the truth, Leopold, I have lost it.

Leop. Lost it! Oh! very well. But it's no matter: I believe this right shoulder of mine will force any lock. I'll break open the door; and I'll do it without any violence, only to shew how I can keep my temper; now I defy any of you to say that I put myself in a passion. D—e! stand out of the way, or I'll knock you down, you old goat.

[Pushes violently against USEPH and exits.]

Ghita. What do you think, now, sir?

Useph. 'Faith! I don't know; my thoughts are rather confused; I—I—I—[Noise without.] There, there, he has broke the door all to smash. Good morning to you: perhaps his highness waits for me.

[Going.]

Peter. Consider, sir, you had better not leave us.

Useph. Indeed, I beg your pardon; our good humoured friend may come back and knock out my brains very coolly; only to shew what he can do without being in a passion. [Exit with PETER.]

Ghita. Poor Lilla! I hope Leopold will carry her off. I am sure she loves him, and that he loves her; the whole village will rejoice at their wedding.

AIR.—GHITA.

*All will hail the joyous day,
When love his triumph shall display;
The dance shall mingle old and young.
The rustic pipe assist the song;
The sprightly bells with welcome sound,
Shall spread the happy news around,
And give a hint to maidens coy,
That youth they should not misemploy.
Useph will, with sullen pride,
Envy joys to wealth denied;
And as we trip with merry glee,
Wish himself as poor as we.
The sprightly bells, &c.*

[Exit.]

SCENE III.—Outside of Peter's house; a garden-wall round it.

LEOPOLD discovered at the window, out of which is a veil hanging.

Leop. Poor Lilla! nowhere to be found: she's gone; and, by her veil hanging here out of the window, in a fit of despair. I'll after her. [Jumps out, and comes out of the door of the garden wall with the veil.] This relic of my beloved Lilla's shall serve to keep my resentment alive. But where's that cruel villain, Peter? d—e! I'll maul him.

[Retires into the garden.]

Enter PETER.

Peter. Ha! the window open! nay, then, madam's off: but where's that mad-brained Leopold?

Enter LEOPOLD.

Leop. Have I caught you, sirrah? Now, what have you to say for yourself?

[Seizes him by the throat.]

Peter. Why, nothing, to be sure, if you stop my breath.

Leop. Harkye! rascal, if you don't tell me where Lilla is—

Peter. Why, you are in such a passion, Leopold.

Leop. It's false; I'm not in a passion. If you say I'm in a passion, I'll kick you, you scurvy knave.

Enter USEPH and Officers.

Useph. Seize that fellow directly.

TRIO AND CHORUS.

Useph. Seize him, seize him, I say.

Peter. Seize him, seize him! • Why, pray?

Leop. Let me come at him, pray.

Chorus. Haste, let us bear him away.

Useph. Don't fear, I'll protect you.

Leop. You're a rogue; I suspect you.

Useph. Knock him down, I command it.

Chorus. Knock him down, he commands it.

Peter. How can justice demand it?

Hear me.

Chorus. Hear me.

Leop. No, hear me.

Useph. We are none of us safe—

Chorus. While that fellow is free. [Ereunt.]

SCENE IV.—Inside of Anselm's Cottage.

Enter ANSELM.

Anselm. The hour is almost come. I wonder if Colonel Cohenberg be yet arrived; perhaps he may be the chosen instrument of heaven to destroy this Turkish tyranny, that like a baneful weed, chokes up our every seed of freedom.

AIR.—ANSELM.

*The sapling oak lost in the dell,
Where tangled brakes its beauties spoil,
And every infant shoot repel,
Droops hopeless o'er the exhausted soil.
At length, the woodman clears around
Where'er the noxious thickets spread;
And high reviving from the ground,
The forest monarch lifts his head.*

Enter Colonel COHENBERG.

Ans. Colonel Cohenberg!

Col. My friend Anselm!

Ans. What could induce you, Colonel, to trust yourself so far within the enemy's camp?

Col. Two powerful motives, my Anselm, love and glory. Our general means to attack this post to-night, and I am honoured with the command of the detachment. Will the villagers assist us, think ye?

Ans. Assist ye! ay, Colonel, to the last drop of our blood, every man of us. We have groaned under Turkish oppression too long. But you mentioned the word love, Colonel: may I venture to inquire after the fair Catherine, whom I saw at Vienna last year?

Col. Adorable girl; she had just consented to be mine, when I was suddenly ordered to the siege of Belgrade.

Ans. That was unlucky. How did she bear the news?

Col. Like a heroine; when I attempted a faltering adieu, "What," says she, "will you now refuse the hand you have so often solicited? Should the bitter hour of misfortune overtake you, my Cohenberg, you will need the consolation of friendship; and have you a dearer friend than your Catherine? I will go with you, and shall find my happiness in fulfilling the duties of a wife."

Ans. You married her, then?

Col. Ay, but was immediately obliged to join my regiment. How shall I speak the remainder of our melancholy story? She attempted to follow me, but was taken prisoner by a straggling party of the Turkish army, just arrived to the relief of Belgrade.

Ans. Then, I fear she is taken to the Seraskier's seraglio.

Col. That's what I dread. In what part of the camp is his seraglio?

Ans. You may have observed, about two miles from hence, a convent almost in ruins, which he has converted into his seraglio.

Col. I am not personally known to the Seraskier. By pretending business to him I may easily gain admittance to his presence. I have prepared two letters, one to the Seraskier, in my own name, another to my Catherine, informing her of my design.

Ans. And if you find her there, what then?

Col. What then! why, then I'll storm the Seraskier's tent, and carry her off this night.

Ans. Heaven prosper you! 'tis a hazardous enterprise.

Col. Hazardous, my Anselm! I scorn the thought. I have picked the gallant fellows whom I command; my brave bussars, the flower of the Austrian army; we have fought, we have bled, we have conquered together; and that leader bazards little, who has thought it his first duty to treat his soldiers as his friends.

Ans. But you know, Colonel, friends in all situations will sometimes desert.

Col. I am not speaking of the weathercock friendship that only shews which way the wind of caprice points. We have tried each other in adversity and prosperity, and have cemented our friendship with our blood on the field of battle. But come, lead me to the Seraskier; be diligent, confident, and secret;

*Then trust our cause to Providence above,
The never-failing hope of faithful love.* [Exeunt.

SCENE V.—The Seraskier's Tent.

Enter LILLA.

AIR.

*Blithe as the hours of May,
Were those I now deplore,
When first I own'd love's gentle sway;
They will return no more.
Every fond hope is lost;
No comfort can they bring;
Winter's untimely chilling frost
Destroy'd the infant spring.
Blithe as the hours, &c.*

Enter GHITA.

Ghita. Ah! my dear Lilla, I am glad I have found you. Do you know, the surly guard denied me admittance at first. Well, how did you come here? tell me all about it?

Lilla. Hush! some other time; here comes his highness; now, pray, don't leave me alone with him.

Enter SERASKIER.

Seras. Ha! a companion with her! that obstacle must be removed. [Aside.] Well, Lilla, you shall find me a man of my word; I promised you redress, and you shall have it, but I must first talk with Useph on the business, and this pretty maiden shall be my messenger, to say that I desire his immediate attendance on me.

Ghita. Yes, your highness. Come, Lilla.

Seras. Lilla, you may remain with me.

Ghita. [Aside.] Oh! yes, she's like to remain;

indeed, whilst his highness is so violently in love with justice; yes, yes, I understand it very well; ay, ay. [Erit.]

Seras. Lilla, why are you so much alarmed? you have nothing to apprehend: do you know, Lilla, it is in your power to make me very happy?

Lilla. Is your highness unhappy?

Seras. I am. Tell me, Lilla, are you sensible of love?

Lilla. Ah! that I am, indeed, sir

Seras. Suppose I were to love you.

Lilla. I should be sorry for that, my lord.

Seras. Why so?

Lilla. Because, my lord, I couldn't love you in return: pray, my lord, don't be angry.

Seras. I am not angry: but come, Lilla, I must inspire you with an ambition for grandeur.

Lilla. Will grandeur make me happy, sir?

Seras. Certainly.

Lilla. Then how can your highness be unhappy?

Seras. Oh! that is—that is—I cannot explain that to your comprehension—but say, Lilla, when you behold from your cottage-window the magnificent buildings and gardens of Belgrade, do you not—

Lilla. Oh! my lord, I own I admire them; but my favourite is a humble flower, which, I fear, I should not find in your highness's garden.

Seras. What's that?

Lilla. Heart's-ease, sir.

Seras. Come, come, you shall misunderstand me no longer— [Takes hold of her.]

Enter GHITA, hastily.

Ghita. Oh! my lord, my lord.

Seras. You are soon returned.

Ghita. Oh! yes, my lord; ill news, you know, flies apace. Some officers have seized poor Leopold, and are hurrying him to prison, for affronting that wicked old justice Useph.

Lilla. Ah! my lord, pray, have compassion on an unfortunate lover.

Seras. You must first set me an example: the law must have its course.

TRIO.—SERASKIER, LILLA, and GHITA.

Seras. When justice claims the victim due,
Her dictates I obey.

Lilla & Ghita. } Yet should distress for pity rue,

Ghita. } You'll own the gentle way.

Seras. Law must prevail.

Lilla. And so it may,

Except when love is in the way.

Seras. Your arts forbear,

No more I'll hear.

Lilla. When justice she attended,

Let her not find a foe.

Ghita. When justice I attended,

Let me not find a foe.

Lilla. In what has she offended?

Alas! I do not know.

Ghita. In what have I offended?

Alas! I do not know.

Seras. In what you have offended,
Dissembler, well you know.

Lilla & Ghita. } On what will he resolve?

All. My troubled bosom vearing,
In varied forms perplexing,
A thousand doubts revolve.

Lilla & Ghita. } Compassion thus entreating,

Ghita. } In vain shall we implore.

Seras. In vain shall they implore.

Lilla & } May pity, sorrow greeting,
 Ghita. } Our happiness restore.
 All. In what have I offended, &c.

Enter ISMAEL, USEPH, PETER, LEOPOLD, and Officers.

Useph. Please your highness, here's a most unruly, obstreperous country fellow, who has broken open a door, and attempted to knock down a magistrate; and all, forsooth, because he's under the influence of the tender passion; he is the most violent unmannerly—

Leop. It's false, I am not violent.

Ism. [Aside to SERAS.] This poor fellow has an honest heart; the magistrate is a villain; the villagers are already disaffected to us; be careful how you act in this affair, my lord. Subdue them by your justice—your clemency.

Seras. [To ISMAEL.] I will take your advice for the present, but I must have the girl, sooner or later. Hear me.

Ism. Silence; attend to his highness.

Seras. You all know my affection for the good people of this village—

Leop. [Half aside.] The women, I believe, know it very well.

Useph. Silence, sirrah!

Seras. I consider you all as my children—

Leop. [Aside.] If he were to stay amongst us much longer the whole village would be his children in another generation.

Useph. How dare you mutter, you reprobate?

Seras. [Whispers ISMAEL, who goes off.] I would willingly content you all, but that's impossible; let my sentence be publicly known.

[The curtain at the back of the tent is drawn up; the Turkish camp is seen; Soldiers, Peasants, &c. enter through the tent, and place themselves on each side of the stage.]

Ghita. [Aside.] Now for some terrible sentence.

Seras. Leopold, you are in love with Lilla?

Leop. Yes, my lord.

Seras. And loved by her in return?

Leop. Yes, your highness.

Seras. Then marry her.

Leop. Thanks to your highness.

Seras. You are in love with Lilla, Useph?

Useph. Yes, my lord.

Seras. And not beloved by her?

Useph. I fear not, my lord.

Seras. Leopold has offered you an affront?

Useph. He has, my lord.

Seras. You are a man of authority, and should set an example of moderation; you must forgive him.

Leop. How do you like that, old one?

[Aside to USEPH.]

Seras. [To the Officers.] Take off his chains.

Enter LILLA and ISMAEL.

Lilla. That be my task; it is my duty and happiness.
 [Takes off his chains.]

FINALE.

Lilla. *So kindly condescending,
 To our complaints attending,
 Your highness us befriending,
 No more shall wrongs assail.*

Chorus. So kindly, &c.

Leop. Your highness, please to hear me—

Lilla. Be silent, I beseech.

Leop. Zounds! I'll be cool, don't fear me

Peter. Oh! let us hear his speech.

Ghita. We're bound to you for ever. [To SERAS.]

Seras. No silly compliments, I pray.

Lilla. To thank you I'd endeavour—

Seras. You soon, methinks, might learn the way.
 [To LILLA.]

Chorus. So kindly, &c.

Seras. *Seemingly condescending,
 To their complaints attending,
 Though love my bosom's rending
 Yet shall my scheme prevail.*

Chorus. *May fate our prayers befriending,
 No disappointment sending;
 Let love and truth prevail.*

*Securely, bliss enjoying,
 All fear of power annoying,
 Your clemency destroying,
 Now justice shall prevail.*

[During the finale, the SERASKIER takes hold of LILLA's hand and kisses it; LEOPOLD observes this, and takes LILLA's place; the SERASKIER takes LEOPOLD's hand, supposing it to be LILLA's, but finding his mistake, appears confused.]
 [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Convent.

Enter CATHERINE.

AIR.

*My plaint in no one pity moves,
 Save echo, who in plaints replies:
 Like me, depriv'd of him she loves,
 With sympathy she counts my sighs.
 Pleas'd with the strain, the hapless maid
 Repeats the unavailing moan;
 And, while she lends her soothing aid,
 Laments my sorrows and her own.*

Unhappy as I am, it is some consolation to me that Cohenberg knows my heart, and will not wrong me so far as to doubt my constancy. But so, the Seraskier—he treats me with respect, though he is still ignorant who I am.

Enter SERASKIER.

Seras. Alas! madam, shall I never have the happiness of seeing you wear those smiles which nature, prodigal in adorning you, meant as her last gift to perfect your charms.

Cath. I am your prisoner, sir; my indignant heart swells whilst I avow it.

Seras. I am your prisoner; does not my every sigh—

Cath. You are a soldier, sir; do not disgrace that character by insulting a defenceless woman.

Enter ISMAEL.

Ism. My lord, a deserter of no vulgar rank, from the Austrian camp, desires to be admitted to your presence.

Seras. Conduct him hither. [Exit ISMAEL.] I presume, madam, you would wish to retire?

Cath. If I stay, I may hear some news of my friends. [Aside.] I request, sir, you will permit me to remain here.

Seras. I thank you, madam, for the request, since it, at last, gives me an opportunity of obliging you.

Re-enter ISMAEL with Colonel COHENBERG.

Cath. [Aside.] Oh, heavens! my Cohenberg!

Col. [Aside.] My Catherine!

SERAS. What are you?

COL. An Austrian.

SERAS. What have you to communicate?

COL. Colonel Cohenberg is not unknown to your highness.

CATH. [Aside.] What can he mean?

SERAS. His character is not unknown to me: what then?

COL. Your highness once wrote to him as to an exchange of prisoners; consequently, know his hand.

SERAS. Perfectly well.

CATH. [Aside.] I perceive some artifice; but what a hazard does he run!

COL. [Giving a letter.] Here, sir, is my commission.

SERAS. 'Tis his seal, his writing. [Reads.] "The bearer is in my confidence; if you wish for my aid, tell him on what terms you are willing to acquire my friendship and assistance.—Cohenberg." Is it possible that I shall be the happy means of gaining Cohenberg to the Ottoman cause? Tell the gallant Christian I deem his friendship invaluable; and in the name of my most illustrious sovereign, promise, as a debt of gratitude, whatever he shall ask. Do you know this Colonel Cohenberg, madam?

CATH. Yes, my lord, so well, that I have him now before me. [Looking at the COLONEL.] He married a lady who was dear to me as myself; they were separated by the chance of war, and Cohenberg now lives to see her he loves in slavery and sorrow.

COL. Take comfort, madam; he loves her more tenderly than ever, and vows to relieve her, or perish in the attempt.

SERAS. Say, Christian, if I write, when may I expect an answer?

COL. Within these few hours you may depend on seeing me again.

CATH. [Aside.] Indeed!

SERAS. Heavens! madam, how you are altered! To what am I to attribute this blissful change?

CATH. To the blessed tidings I have just now heard. I am charmed to hear of Cohenberg's inviolable constancy, and transported with the hope of his Catherine being, one day, restored to freedom, by the arms of the hero she adores.

SERAS. You take so warm an interest in his favour that, were he here, I should almost suspect myself reduced into his rival.

CATH. There would be no fear of that, for well he knows his Catherine will not suffer him to have a rival.

SERAS. I hardly comprehend you. But I must send my answer to Cohenberg's letter. [Sits down to write.] 'Tis done. Now, madam, if you have any kind things to say in behalf of your friend, I'll be your secretary; continue those smiles, and you shall find a Mussulman can be as complaisant a lover as any Christendom can boast. What shall I tell him?

CATH. Tell him—

DUET.—SERASKIER AND CATHERINE.

Of plighted faith so truly kept,

Of all love's dictators tell:

Of restless thoughts, that never slept,

Since when she bade farewell,

The rising sigh, the frequent tear,

The flush of hope, the chilling fear:

So may the sympathetic soul,

Direct kind fancy's wing,

Where future hours in transport roll,

And love's reward shall bring.

[During this scene the Colonel and CATHERINE shew their joy at seeing each other, unobserved by the SERASKIER, who is between them. In the course of the duet, the Colonel makes an unsuccessful effort to give her a letter.

SERAS. [Gives the Colonel a letter.] There is my answer; and by our holy prophet do I swear faithfully to perform each article. [The Colonel gives a letter to CATHERINE, unperceived by the SERASKIER. A Slave enters, matches it from her, and presents it to the SERASKIER on his knee.] What's this? [Reads.] "I have ventured into the Turkish camp in hopes of seeing you, my beloved Catherine." Ha! Catherine! "This night I mean to storm the Seraskier's fort, and give you liberty.—Your true Cohenberg." What ho! a guard!

Enter ISMAEL and Guard.

Seize him.

CATH. Hear me, my lord.

SERAS. No more, dissembler! Bear her away.

CATH. My Cohenberg, I have undone thee.

SERAS. Away with her. [Exit Guards with CATH.] Slaves, on your lives I charge you, guard well this hypocrite, this liar. [The Colonel, in great agitation, feels for his sword, which the Guards have taken from him, and missing it, clasps his hands in agony.] Deep in the darkest dungeon of the fort let him be chained; there shall he stay till his associates in perfidy shall come to burst his bonds, and storm the post I guard.

COL. Alike I scorn thy menaces and taunts. I glory, though I failed, in the attempt. Heap cruelty on cruelty on me, I can bear it; my darkness is the loss of Catherine's eyes, my chains the despair of seeing her; and death were transport to the pangs I feel in knowing her a slave to thee, barbarian!

[Exit, guarded.

SERAS. Ismael!

ISM. My lord?

SERAS. Wilt thou not despise me when I tell thee neither Cohenberg's plot, nor Catherine's charms, can drive this rustic Lilla from my heart. I'll carry her off this night. Have you prepared the disguises as I commanded?

ISM. I have, my lord.

SERAS. Give orders that my tent be pitched in yonder wood, and my seraglio instantly removed thither.

ISM. Why so, my lord?

SERAS. To elude the search that will be made after Lilla: besides, Cohenberg's designs have taught me that I lie too near the frontiers of the Austrians. Away! and see my orders are obeyed.

[Exit ISMAEL.

AIR.—SERASKIER.

Confusion! thus defeated!

With bitter scorn thus treated!

Whatever thought pursuing,

Where'er I turn my eyes,

Surrounding mists of ruin

In dark'ning circles rise:

In frost, on fire, by turns,

My bosom freezes—burns—

'Tis fix'd—my rival finds a grave.

Yet honour bids me save

From death the captive brave.

Confusion! thus defeated!

With bitter scorn thus treated!

Whatever thought pursuing,

Where'er I turn my eyes,

Surrounding mists of ruin

In dark'ning circles rise.

[Exit.

SCENE II.—A Wood.Enter ANSELM and Peasants.

Ans. It is as I suspected. I am sure 'twas Colonel Cohenberg I saw hurried to the fort. 'I fear the worst.

1 Peas. Is there no help, Anselm?

Ans. None but this: some of you must swim the river, and inform the Austrian out-posts of Cohenberg's danger; and, perhaps, their succour may arrive in time to free him. I will remain on this side, that, should they arrive, I may conduct them by short and secret paths to the Seraskier's tent.

2 Peas. I'll go.

1 Peas. And I, if I drown for it; let's all go.

Ans. Hear me, hear me, friends. You two shall undertake this message to the Austrians, the others stay with me to excite the villagers to revolt.

[Ereunt.]SCENE III.—Another part of the Village.Enter LILLA and GHITA.

DUET.

Haste, gentle zephyrs, o'er the glade,

If there my love discerning,

Kindly with fluttering pinions aid

His weary steps returning.

So may thy wings (their wanton play

No scorching sun oppressing)

Still gladly fan the sultry day,

And prove the summer's blessing.

Ghita. Love they call a gentle passion,

Boast its power to calm the breast;

I prefer the jealous fashion;

Sweets when dash'd with sour are best.

While the ever-cooing doves,

In fond nonsense tell their loves;

Scarce existing, nought desiring;

Cloy'd with bliss, as well they may;

They, with languor half expiring,

Doze their stupid lives away.

Lilla. Let me in true pleasure's mirror

Tranquil view love's placid form;

Free from every jealous terror,

Give me the calm, take you the storm.

Lilla. Well, Ghita, now we are married, I hope our husbands will take their leave of jealousy.

Ghita. Psha! Lilla, how often must I tell you jealousy follows love like a shadow.

Lilla. Then love is a pretty thing and an ugly shadow. But I have seen my shadow often in the sun, and it appeared so tall and frightful that I am sure it couldn't be like me. But it begins to grow late, I wish our husbands would come home.

Ghita. There are two men coming this way.

Enter SERASKIER and ISMAEL, in long cloaks.

Seras. [To ISMAEL.] Desire my followers to keep back.

Ghita. [To LILLA.] See, they have wrapped themselves up in long cloaks that we shouldn't know them.

Lilla. Ah! this is another of Leopold's jealous frolics. But I'll not speak first, I am determined.

Seras. Lilla, Lilla!

Lilla. I can't bear to see him uneasy; I must speak to him.

SESTETTO.

Lilla & Ghita. } Night thus from me concealing
The form of him I love;
Oh! let his voice, revealing

Seras. & Ism. } Night thus from me concealing
The form of her I love;
Oh! let her voice, revealing

The truth, my fears remove.

Lilla & Ghita. } Oh, heavens! the Seraskier!

Seras. } A lover's accents hear;
With sympathetic passion,
Fond expectation cheer.

Lilla & Ghita. } Ah! should my husband hear us,
What could poor Ghita do?
What could poor Lilla do?

Enter LEOPOLD and PETER.

Leop. & Peter. } Hark! I'm sure there's some one near us.

Peter. Ghita!

Leop. Lilla!

Lilla & Ghita. } Our husbands near us!

Ghita. } My love, I'm here.

Leop. & Ghita. } You're here!

Peter. } Then, who is this so near?

Lilla & Ghita. } Honest peasants, homeward going

Ghita. } From their labour, I suppose.

Leop. & Ghita. } How, I pray, are you so knowing,

Peter. } Whether they be friends or foes?

Jealous fears perplexing,

Like whelming billows roll,

And wreck my tortur'd soul.

Begone; 'tis thy falsehood

[To LILLA and GHITA.]

Lilla & Ghita. } Distracts my tortur'd soul.

Lilla & Ghita. } Ah! can my dear suspect me?

Ghita. } My truth he cannot fear.

All. } Suspense, in clouds, shuts in the day.

Hope, cheering star, afford thy ray

Of silver light; and, to our eyes,

Oh! bid thy bright creation rise. [Ereunt.]

SCENE IV.—Inside of Peter's House.Enter PETER and LEOPOLD

Peter. A pretty adventure this.

Leop. Yes, a very pretty adventure, indeed.

Peter. How do you feel, Leopold?

Leop. Oh! I'm composed, quite composed.

Peter. For my part, I own I am in a passion.

Leop. Oh! then you are wrong, my dear friend; you are wrong, Peter.

Peter. My suspicions are not easily roused, but now—

Leop. Oh! for shame, Peter, can't you be calm? Death and d—n! can't you be cool?

Peter. I confess I am angry, and—

Leop. But you sha'n't be angry, I tell you. You must be cool; d—e! you shall.

Peter. Must I?

Leop. Yes.

Peter. Why, then, I will; you know I am naturally very peaceable.

Leop. Peaceable! Here's a fellow, now, that would stand by quietly to have his horns fitted on; by my troth, if I must wear mine, I'll butt with them like a mad bull.

[Erit.]

Peter. Poor Leopold, he's angry with me for not putting myself in a passion, desires that I will be cool, then flies in a rage because I follow his advice.

AIR.—PETER.

*How few know how to value life,
And taste its real joys,
Unmix'd with jealousy and strife,
With anger, pride, and noise!
Let riches, power, and pomp surpass,
And scorn me, if they please;
Let me love, laugh, and take my glass,
And lead a life of ease.
Limpid and pure life's current seems,
Till passion's wild mistake,
In madness, troubles all the streams
Of which he must partake.
Let riches, &c.*

Re-enter LEOPOLD.

Leop. I say, Peter, Ghita's coming this way. Now don't you say anything to her, because you won't keep yourself cool; leave me to manage her, I know more about these matters than you do.

Enter GHITA.

Well, Ghita, your husband and I have been laughing over the whimsical affair that happened just now.

Ghita. Yes, it was whimsical, indeed. All's safe, I find. [Aside.]

Leop. Well, and so they were countrymen returning from their day's labour, were they?

Ghita. Yes, countrymen returning from labour.

Leop. Oh! I dare say they were. Curse me, if I believe a word on't. [Aside.] Well, but who were they?

Ghita. I know no more of the matter than Lilla does.

Peter. Oh! here comes Lilla.

Enter LILLA.

Leop. Lilla, my dear, come here, I want to speak with you: now you know that I never put myself into a passion; but a lie provokes me, therefore, have a care; now I expect you to tell me the truth, for Ghita has confessed the whole matter.

Lilla. Has she, indeed?

Leop. She has; therefore, have a care.

Peter. [Aside to LEOP.] Now, Leopold, I tell you—

Leop. Be quiet, you fool; keep yourself calm.

[GHITA makes signs to LILLA that she has not told.

Lilla. [Aside.] Oh, oh! very well.

Leop. [To LILLA.] Come, why don't you speak? these countrymen.

Lilla. Ay, these countrymen—Who were they? Why don't you tell me? I am sure you know.

Leop. I know! here's a pretty piece of business.

Lilla. Well, if you won't tell me, Ghita will.

Leop. Harkye! Lilla, I am convinced you are wrong; therefore, I insist on your confession.

Lilla. Oh! you will have me confess?

Leop. Yes, I will; therefore, recollect yourself, I will have it. I say, Peter, this is the way to manage a wife. You see I have carried my point.

AIR.—LILLA.

*What can mean that thoughtful frown?
Why those eyes to earth cast down?
Tell me what amiss they see;
Let them kindly look on me.*

La ra la! la!

ACT. DRAMA.—NOS. 105 & 106.

*What, then, would my dearest have?
Come, indeed, I will be grave;
And, with melancholy face,
Calmly hear thy piteous case.*

La ra la! la!

[During the song she dances slowly between PETER, LEOPOLD, and GHITA.

Peter. I say, Leopold, this is the way to manage a wife; you see you have carried your point.

Leop. Why, I—I—I don't know how it is, but ecod! she has danced me into a good humour, I think.

Lilla. Now, Leopold, how could you serve me so? Why, Ghita says you have been laughing at her.

Leop. Why, yes, I believe I am in a merry humour.

Lilla. I don't think you are merry; you seem grumpy.

Leop. Psha! no such thing; I am not grumpy.

Ghita. Ah! you don't deserve the supper we have prepared for you. But come, Lilla, we must forgive 'em.

Lilla. Well, if we must, we must.

[Brings the table with supper forward.

Leop. [Aside to PETER.] Well, Peter, what do you think of this?

Peter. [Aside to LEOP.] Why, for my part, I think it looks like innocence.

Leop. So it does, so it does; but we'll watch them, though; so, mum! Peter. [All sit.] Egad! I never was happier in my life; come, let's have a toast.

Lilla. I'll give you one: may our happiness ever continue!

Leop. Very well; very well, indeed. [All drink.] So good a toast deserves a second bumper. [Drinks again.] Now away with suspicions for ever.

[SERASKIER sings without.

SERENADE.

*To mighty love, the trembling strings are pressing;
Sacred to him they praise, their sweet employ.
Ah! the fond heart, whose passion they're expressing,
Vibrates like them to love, but not to joy.*

Leop. What's that?

Peter. It sounds like music.

Ghita. What delightful harmony!

Leop. Curse harmony! I don't like it at all.

[Rises.

Lilla. Sit down, Leopold.

Leop. I won't sit down.

Lilla. Nay, don't be angry; here's a merry-thought for you.

Leop. Eat it yourself, then.

Lilla. You shall sit down. It is only the villagers amusing themselves: and you know, Leopold, that people of fashion often have music at supper.

[SERASKIER sings without.

Leop. Oh! choak your singing.

Lilla. [Aside to GHITA.] We are undone! 'tis the Seraskier.

Peter. Ah! Leopold, there's danger in that voice. How melodious!

Leop. Horribly melodious! Harkye! Peter, are you courageous?

Peter. Tolerably so.

Leop. [Takes two swords, and gives one to PETER.] Here, then, take this sword, and follow me. We'll join the concert; and if I don't put these gallants out of tune, I'll be—It's astonishing how I continue to keep my temper.

[Exit with PETER.

Lilla. What will become of us! Let's follow them; I fear there will be mischief. I wonder that Leopold keeps his temper. [Exeunt.]

Enter USEPH at a back door.

Useph. All quiet; then I'm sure Leopold can't be here; and I have such a dread of that d—d fellow, that—[Seeing the supper.] Eh! What have we here? a good supper, and nobody to eat it. I think my appetite returns, as my fright goes off. Egad! I'll pick a bit. There's nothing in the world I like better than a good supper, especially when anybody else pays for it. Ha, ha, ha! Eh! What's this? [Holding a large slice of ham on his fork.] Oh! the Christian dogs! what, eat pork! Oh, horrible! [Eats the ham eagerly.] Oh, fie! oh, fie! What have we here? Wine! worse and worse! Wine, indeed! How can people be so impious to drink—[Drinks a large cupful.] Though, I believe a Mahometan may take a cup of wine when nobody sees him. Egad! I'll take another. Here's to the founder of the feast. [Drinks.] Now, if I could but meet Lilla—Good cheer puts one in such excellent spirits, and makes one so valiant and so loving, that—[Pistols fire.] Oh, Lord! [Starts up.] They are firing pistols against the door. Oh, dear! oh, dear! What will become of me? [Goes to the door at the back.] Eh! this door is fast! Mercy on me!

[Hides under the table.]

Enter PETER and GHITA.

Ghita. Stay here, my dear Peter, if you love me; all opposition is fruitless. I am sure the Seraskier is amongst them.

Peter. Poor Leopold! he'll be overpowered by numbers. Run up to the house-top, Ghita, and alarm the neighbours.—[Exit GHITA.]—How unlucky that this accident should happen just at supper-time!

Enter LEOPOLD.

Leop. Confusion! they have carried off my Lilla. Plague on my sword for failing me, when I might have rescued her; but I'll raise the neighbourhood, and if I can but find that old scoundrel, Useph—[Turns round, and sees USEPH.] Ha! villain, what brought you here?

Useph. What brought me here? Why, I heard a riot, so I came to—to—Leop. To what?

Useph. Why, to quell it, and defend your house; and, besides, I came to wish you joy on your marriage, my dear friend.

Leop. And how did you get into the house?

Useph. I came through the garden, and in at the back-door, quietly and peaceably as a magistrate should do, and agreeably to my function.

Peter. Yes, and you seem to have been eating some of our supper: was that agreeably to your function?

Leop. Ah! sirrah, who asked you to supper?

Useph. I only picked a bit.

Leop. Hold your tongue. Harkye, rascal! my Lilla's carried off; and I am almost sure that you are in the plot; so, come along, and if I find my suspicions right, I'll hang you on the next tree.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE V.—A Turkish Watch-tower.

Enter the SERASKIER, ISMAEL, and Guards from the Tower.

Seras. Well, Ismael; so far we have proceeded successfully, and Lilla is safe within my power. The villagers fought manfully.

Isma. I fear, my lord, we shall experience other proofs of their valour.

Seras. To what am I to attribute these unusual apprehensions, Ismael?

Isma. My lord, I never before fought in a cause I was ashamed of.

Seras. No more: it's time to think of Cohenberg. Are the executioners prepared?

Isma. They are, my lord.

Seras. Are the horsemen ready to bear off Catherine?

Isma. They have their orders, my lord.

[Retires back.]

Seras. [To the Guards.] Strike off his chains, and bring your prisoner forth. Do you conduct the lady hither. [To another Guard, who exits.]

The Guards lift up a trap-door, one descends and returns with Colonel COHENBERG.

Col. To what new indignities am I reserved?

Enter Guard with CATHERINE.

Seras. Hear me, Christian; had the chance of battle made you my prisoner, I should have treated you as a soldier; but you have degraded yourself into a spy, and an ignominious death is, by the law of nations, your reward; yet life or death, on one condition, may still be yours.

Col. And if that one should be unworthy, learn, though life and liberty are dearer to me than all the treasures of your eastern world, I have a gem within my keeping, more valuable far,—my honour! which I scorn to barter for it.

[Muffled drums are heard.]

Seras. Hark! that is thy knell. When thrice those sounds, within a few short moments, shall have passed upon thy obstinacy, that instant is thy last. Attend: this night thy Austrians mean to attack my fort. Let the deceivers be deceived: deliver them to my sword. Renounce your Christian worship: do this; and, in my Sultan's name, I promise you power, wealth, honour, your Catherine, all your wishes can desire.

Col. My Catherine! she is a reward so valuable, so truly great, that—

Cath. Hear me, Cohenberg: should an unmanly tenderness for me make thee forget thy faith, thy country, and thy king, though that instant be my last, I'll tear thee, coward, from my bleeding heart, and cast thee off unworthy of my love.

Seras. [Aside.] Death to my hopes! she ruins all my purposes.—Christian, reflect; be quick, or both your lives shall expiate thy fault.

Cath. This is the greatest mercy thou canst shew. He dares to die, and I dare not live to see him dishonoured.

Seras. [Muffled drums.] Appear, ye ministers of death.

Enter Black Slaves.

Now, Christian, this moment is thy last.

Col. Oh, heavens!

Seras. Bear her away!

Cath. To torture—death. My Cohenberg, remember me.

Col. In life and death, my Catherine.

Seras. Away with her! [Exit CATH. guarded.]

Col. Come, tyrant, give me the fatal bow-string, and end at once this pageant of thy cruelty. Thy threats I boldly despise; thy offers thus I tread beneath my feet; and, though this worthless frame may fall before thee, fixed as the founded rock, my soul shall stand, firm to my God, my king, and my country.

Seras. I'll hear no more.

Col. [Kneels.] Preserve my Catherine, heaven!

[Muffled drums. The Slaves put the cord round his neck, and prepare to strangle him.

Seras. Despatch him, slaves!

Col. Good angels, guard my Catherine!

Seras. Christian, thy prayers are vain.

[A great shout is heard, and the drums beating to arms.

Seras. Distraction! we are betrayed. [Erit.

Col. Off, off! ye slaves.

Enter ANSELM, PETER, LEOPOLD, &c.—ANSELM gives the Colonel a sword. Slaves go off. ANSELM, PETER, and LEOPOLD go into the tower. SERASKIER re-enters with his sword drawn; the Colonel fights with him, and drives him off. The Turks are driven from the tower; the Turkish flag is taken down, and the Austrian colours hoisted. A party of Austrians enter from the tower, with PETER, LEOPOLD, ANSELM, and Peasants. Col. COHENBERG enters. Drums and trumpets.

Col. The villain has escaped me in the throng. But, oh! Catherine is no where to be found.

Peter. A Turkish soldier told me, even now, some horsemen bore her over yonder plain.

Col. Ha! over yonder plain! [Erit.

FINALE.

Now victory has, like a mistress kind,

Put an end to all our quarrels;

In a brimming cup our joys we'll find,

From the vine we'll pluck our quarrels.

Let us drink as we fight; with loud huzzas,

We'll charge, and scorn all shrinking;

Till our wine, like the foe, retreats apace,

And we shew our valour in drinking.

[Ereunt.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—Inside of the Seraskier's Tent.

Several Ladies discovered.

CHORUS.

On the warlike plains descending,

Night, in pity, casts her veil;

Hostile strife awhile suspending,

Short-lived peace and rest prevail.

Enter FATIMA and LILLA.—LILLA in an elegant Turkish habit.

Fat. Then you are resolved to leave us, Lilla?

Lilla. Yes, your ladyship, that I will as soon as I can.

Fat. And are you not sorry to part with your fine clothes, and quit the pleasures of the seraglio?

Lilla. Pleasures, madam, what are they?

Fat. Why, 'tis our pleasure to obey his highness, the Seraskier, who is our lord and husband.

Lilla. And have you no other husband?

Fat. Why, that's a very odd question.

Lilla. Nay, I beg your ladyship's pardon; but I understand there are five-and-twenty; if so, what a pity you should only have one husband amongst you.

Fat. Nay, nay; I ought not to be sorry at your going, or for the beautiful stranger leaving us. I have, hitherto, been the Seraskier's favourite; and you are two dangerous rivals.—Oh! here she comes.

Enter CATHERINE from the tent.

Cath. This intelligence of Cohenberg's safety, gives me new life. Now let fortune do her worst. Well, Fatima, are the sentinels bribed to let us pass?

Fat. I gave Selim the gold, as you desired; who, doubtless, has obeyed your orders.

Cath. So, Lilla, I find you are to be my guide to the castle. Are you sure you know the way?

Lilla. Yes, my lady; 'tis by the private path, which leads directly to it. I dare say we shall be safe. [Trembling.

Cath. Why do you tremble, Lilla?

Lilla. No, my lady—yes—yes—yes, I believe I am a little afraid.

Cath. Oh, for shame! You a lover! Consider.

Lilla. No, I won't consider. Now, pray, madam, talk finely to me, as you did a little while ago, and don't let me think of difficulties.

Cath. Difficulties! they are the test of virtue, the spur to courage: the noble mind would lose half its splendour, were it not for the pleasure of surmounting difficulties.

AIR.—CATHERINE.

No more I heave the heartfelt sigh;

No more I drop the briny tear;

Hope's promis'd hour of bliss is near.

Yet dangers surrounding,

My reason confounding

Ah! whether shall I fly!

Enter a Turkish Soldier.

Sold. The drums are beating to arms; we expect to be attacked every moment. [Erit.

Cath. Come, Lilla. Adieu, kind Fatima! [Ereunt.

Peter. [Without.] The enemy's camp's on fire. Plunder's the word.

Enter PETER, LEOPOLD, ANSELM, Peasants, and Austrian Soldiers, who cut down the SERASKIER's tent, and carry it off in pieces. The Turkish camp is seen on fire, at a distance. Drums and trumpets are heard. Re-enter LEOPOLD and PETER.

Leop. Lilla not to be found! Oh! she is in the plot; I am sure she is; she has done it on purpose. I knew she would run away when I married her: I was certain.

Peter. 'Tis a pity, indeed.

Leop. 'Tis false! 'tis not a pity.

Peter. Well, then, 'tis not a pity. What a plague, mustn't I be sorry for you?

Leop. Rot your sorrow! No.

Peter. Well, I won't be sorry, then

Leop. But are you really sorry for me, Peter?

Peter. To be sure I am: you know the friendship I have had for you, ever since we were boys together.

Leop. Give me your hand, then. I ask your pardon. But why will you provoke me?

Peter. Why was you provoked then?

Leop. No, I was not; but I mean that—I say I mean—Zounds! I don't know what I mean.

SONG.—LEOPOLD.

*How provoking your doubts! Do you think I'm a fool?
In the heat of the battle you know I was cool;*

*While ourselves and our neighbours
With guns, pistols, sabres,
Were cutting and slashing,
Mahomedans hashing.*

*But need I care for that, since time is on the wing;
You see I am merry, you hear how I sing.*

Tot de rol, &c.

You see I am merry, you hear how I sing.

*That jade, madam Lilla, that gipsy, afar,
Is jiggling away to the Turkish guitar;*

*While great smooth-chinn'd fribbles,
With vile squeaking trebles,
Chant her praises to cheer*

That cruel Seraskier!

Till the handkerchief's thrown—But, then, what's that to me?

It can't make me uneasy—I'm happy, you see.

Tot de rol, &c.

It can't make me uneasy—I'm happy, you see.

[Ereunt.]

SCENE II.—An Apartment at Col. Cohenberg's.

Enter an Austrian Soldier, and LILLA, veiled.

Sold. Pray, walk this way; our colonel will be so glad to see you.

Lilla. Indeed, sir, he won't.

Sold. Oh! but I am sure he will, my lady.

Lilla. Sir!

Sold. I beg your ladyship's pardon; but, though bred in the ranks, I know good manners.

Lilla. Ah! that's my misfortune. I wish you did not; for, then, you would quit the room, and let me alone.

[Soldier bows, and exit.]

Useph. [Without.] Come along, Michael.

Lilla. Oh, heavens! that wretch, Useph! What shall I do! Though, perhaps, he won't know me in this dress

[Retires.]

Enter an Austrian Soldier, conducting in USEPH and MICHAEL. USEPH dressed as an Austrian officer.

Useph. Pray, don't disturb the noble Colonel; but when his honour is quite at leisure, let his honour know that I humbly wait to offer my congratulations. My name is Heon Joseph Wolfgang Baumboick Blandenkerstoon Schwartzenberg.

[Exit Soldier.]

Mich. Why, heyday! I thought your name had been Ben Yacomb Ben Mustapha.

Useph. Ay, that was my Turkish title; but it won't do now the Austrians are our masters. I think I have got a good name, eh! Michael?

Mich. Yes; and as you never had a good name before, I hope you will keep it, now you have got it.

Useph. Ha, ha! Very well; you are a sharp fellow, Michael; I'll recommend you to the Colonel, when I am appointed to some post of great emolument under him: you shall be my deputy, and do all the business for me,—[Aside.] and I'll take all the money.

Mich. So I will. I have often wondered where the deuce you could conceal your riches.

Useph. Ay, that's a secret I mean to let you into; for I don't think my hoards are quite safe in this time of warlike combustion. We'll remove them, Michael.

[LILLA listens.]

Mich. But where are they?

Useph. Why, you know the burying-place, about a mile off, which the Turks hold so sacred. In the middle of that ground stands a high and spacious tomb; there I have hid it. But, mum!

Enter an Austrian Soldier.

Sold. [To LILLA.] Our Colonel is not at home, madam; but I shall be happy to attend your ladyship.

Useph. [To the Soldier.] Harkye! my lad, pray, who is this pretty piece of camp furniture, eh?

Sold. Hush! 'tis our Colonel's lady. I was the first who saw her here, and expect to be made a corporal for it.

[Erit.]

Useph. [Aside to MICHAEL.] Oh, ho! then I know my cue.—Leave us, Michael. [Exit MICHAEL.—USEPH bows to LILLA.] How happy are we all to see your ladyship returned! The Colonel is a most amiable creature; he does me the honour to live in my house: it was mine yesterday. Indeed, he forgot to ask my leave; but true politeness overlooks trifles. He must have a number of very pretty things at his disposal. Oh! if ever I should live to be appointed a commissary—and if your ladyship would but stand my friend—Pray, is your ladyship fond of jewels?

Lilla. [Aside.] If I speak to him, he'll know my voice.

Useph. I have some of the most beautiful here, which I should be proud to present to your ladyship.

[Offers a casket.]

Lilla. [Aside.] I believe I had best take them, to prevent further questions.

[Takes the casket.]

Useph. [Aside.] I can see that she is used to bribery.

Enter a Soldier.

Sold. The Colonel is not returned yet, madam, till he do, we shall be proud to obey the wife of our noble commander.

Lilla. [Throws open her veil.] I am not his wife, sir.

Useph. Why, heyday! Zounds! this is my wife that ought to be.

Lilla. I'll not be the wife of any of you. But, since you say, sir, you will obey my commands, pray, be kind enough to turn that wicked old justice of peace out of the house.

Sold. Oh! that we will directly.

[Erit.]

Useph. What, turn me out of the house! that's a d—d good joke. Well, but, Lilla, I'll trouble you for my pearls again, dear.

Lilla. Why, I thought you gave them to me.

Useph. Yes, I gave them you to look at.

Lilla. Well, I have looked at them, and like them very well.

Useph. Come, come; I must have my jewels.

Enter two Soldiers.

Lilla. Turn him out.

Useph. I won't go without my pearls. At your peril, detain them. Lookye! my lads, I'm a magistrate; I see you are well-disposed persons, and so I'll explain to you the nature of justice as to private property. For instance: my pearls—I say, my pearls—

[Soldiers push him out.]

Lilla. Ha, ha, ha! I think I shall be even with you, Mr. Justice. I am glad I know where his money is hidden. I wish I had told that gentleman of the fine lady that came away with me: I dare say she is the Colonel's wife. Ah! but, then, perhaps, he would have been angry with me for losing her. Well, thanks to fortune, here I am at present; so, I'll think no more of past dangers.

AIR.—LILLA

*Domestic peace, my soul's desire,
The dearest bliss fate could bestow,*

*At length, to thee I may aspire;
 Misfortune's storms no longer blow.
 Escap'd their ire, now safe on shore,
 I listen to the tempest's roar;
 And while the billows idly foam,
 They but endear my long lost home.* [Exit.]

SCENE III.—Outside of Colonel Cohenberg's House.

USEPH discovered being pushed out of the house by two Soldiers.

Useph. Well, but hear me: I say, that—there! they have turned me out, and won't hear me. Nobody will attend to me. What a miserable dog I am! Never was there so unhappy a magistrate!

Enter LEOPOLD.

Leop. Cruel, cruel, Lilla!

Useph. What?

Leop. She has robbed me of my peace for ever?

Useph. She has robbed me, too; however, I am ready to make the matter up, if you'll pay me for the pearls.

Leop. What does the fellow mean?

Useph. I mean the pearls Lilla had of me.

Leop. What! had of you?

Useph. Hear me patiently, and I'll tell you all.

Leop. Zounds! I am patient.—Well?

Useph. I intended those pearls as a present to a certain person.

Leop. And you gave them to Lilla?

Useph. Yes, in my house—Colonel Cohenberg's, I mean; for there she is.

Leop. What, Lilla there! Oh, ho! [Knocks.

Sold. [Within.] What, you won't go along!—[Comes out, and sees LEOPOLD.] Ha! brother soldier, how are you?

Leop. Very well, thankye. Well, and so you are here. And how are you? Isn't there a young woman—I'm glad to see you—I say a young woman—How long have you been here?—Called Lilla, at this house?

Sold. Yes, she's within. Come with me.

[REënt LEOPOLD and Soldier. USEPH attempts to follow; but is pushed back, and the door shuts.

Useph. What, shut the door in my face! I see there is no chance of getting the pearls; and I shall be ruined if I stay here; so, I'll e'en pack up my remaining treasure, and go over to the Turks. I got all my money by changing sides, and I'll change sides to keep it.

AIR.—USEPH.

*Some time ago, I married a wife,
 And she, poor soul! was the plague of my life;
 I thought, when I lost her, my troubles were done,
 But, if faith, I found they're just begun.*

*Tho' she's gone,
 Still 'tis all one,
 My troubles, alas! are just begun.*

*A magistrate I next became,
 To be impartial was my aim;
 No distinction I made between great and small;
 Plaintiffs, defendants, I flee'd them all:
 Great and small, flee'd them all.*

*Turks and Christians, I cheated 'em all
 In praise of honesty, I've heard,
 As policy, 'tis much prefer'd;
 Then, if 'tis best, in life's repast,
 The daintiest dish I'll taste the last.*

*Honest at last,
 Tir'd of the past,
 Perhaps, as a change, I may try it at last.* [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—A Room at Colonel Cohenberg's.

Enter LEOPOLD and LILLA.

Lilla. My dear Leopold, how glad I am to see you! Was it not lucky that I heard Useph say where his riches were?

Leop. Yes, very lucky. [Aside.] Not a word of the pearls yet.—Well, but, Lilla,—I say this fine dress of yours—Zounds! I can't bear to look at it.

Lilla. What, more suspicions, Leopold?

Leop. No, my suspicions are vanished.

Lilla. I am glad of it.

Leop. Yes, I am convinced of your falsehood.—Where are the pearls that Useph gave you? I suppose you can explain that to me.

Lilla. I'll explain nothing, Leopold. Your want of confidence in me vexes me to the heart. I am sure we shall never be happy, if this be the case.

[Cries.
Leop. Oh! very well. I see what—you wish to part—Oh! with all my heart.

Lilla. And with all mine.

DUET.—LEOPOLD and LILLA.

Lilla. *Though you think by this to vex me,
 Love no more can give me pain.*

Leop. *Vainly strive not to perplex me,
 You shall dupe me ne'er again.*

Lilla. *Now your falsehood is requited,
 I'll enjoy a single life.*

Leop. *Hark! to glory I'm invited,
 By the cheerful drum and fife.*

Lilla. By consent, then, now we sever,—

Leop. Love's all nonsense, freedom's sweet;

Lilla. And we take our leave for ever,

Leop. Never more again to meet

Lilla. Never more?

Leop. Never more.

Lilla. I don't want, sir, to allure you;

I don't wish your stay, not I.

Leop. *I'm quite happy, I assure you;
 Gladly I pronounce good bye!*

Lilla. You will change your mind, believe me—

Leop. No; I told you so before.

Lilla. Can you have the heart to leave me?

Leop. Yes: I'll never see you more.

Lilla. Never more?

Leop. Never more.

Both. *Never more my love shall leave me;
 Never part—no, never more.* [Exeunt.]

SCENE V.—A Turkish Burial-ground.

Enter PETER, followed by LEOPOLD, with a small cane.

Peter. How fortunate that Lilla should overhear Useph discover where his treasures are hidden. But you say we are to carry this money to Colonel Cohenberg, who will deliver it to the lawful owners.

Leop. Yes; we are to commit a robbery for the public good. So, follow me, Peter. In we go.

Enter MICHAEL with a sack, and USEPH disguised in a long cloak.

Useph. Come along, Michael. But make no noise, that we may make our escape, undiscovered, to Belgrade. This is the spot where I buried my poor, dear wife, two years ago.

Mich. I recollect it.

Useph. Ah! many a time, in the dead of the night, have I visited this place.

Mich. What the plague, did you want to steal your wife?

Useph. No, no; I ran away with her once, when she was alive; and repented it ever afterwards. She was a good soul, but rather turbulent; never quiet, till she arrived here; and, now she is at rest, I should be sorry to disturb her. There, Michael; that tomb is my banking-house; and, perhaps, it is not the first banking-house where a fortune has been buried. However, this is an old established shop, and all the parties in it quiet, safe people.

Mich. Then we come to remove the treasure?

Useph. Even so, my boy: I shall take away my money, and leave my wife. Many a husband would think that no bad bargain. [Going in, meets PETER and LEOPOLD.] Oh, terrible! What do I see! my riches! Oh! you audacious robbers! Oh! you sacrilegious villains!

Leop. Now, don't make a noise; you must be cool.

Useph. Why, you impudent varlet! Do you plunder me, and preach to me at the same time? Zounds! I'll never be cool again.

Leop. Yes, you will. [Strikes him with a cane.] How do you find yourself, now? [Strikes him again.]

Useph. Oh! good, kind Leopold, I am cool—in-deed, I am quiet.

Leop. Now, then, let's hear what you have to say.

Useph. May I, then, without offence, ask what right you have to take my money? I don't ask this in anger; I am quite cool.

Leop. Your money! Why, your name is Heroon Joseph Wolfgang Baumbork Blandenkerstoon Schwartzbergen.

Peter. And this money belongs to one Ben Yacomb Ben Ali Ben Mustapha.

Leop. An old, roguish magistrate of this village, who used to cheat people of their property. Come, honest Michael, you shall carry this treasure for us to Colonel Cohenberg's.

Useph. To Colonel Cohenberg's! Why, what the devil—

Leop. What, you want the other dose?

Useph. No, no.

Leop. Well, then, assist Peter in loading Michael.

Useph. I tell you I will not assist. That—

Leop. [Strikes him.] Now be cool.

Useph. This is d—d hard to make a man accessary to robbing himself.

[They put several bags, which PETER and LEOPOLD brought from the tomb, into the sack, then place it on MICHAEL's back, who carries it off. USEPH puts one of the bags into his pocket, unseen by PETER or LEOPOLD.—Exeunt.]

SCENE VI.—Outer Wall of the Burial-ground.—Several voices are heard crying "Follow! Follow!"

Enter CATHERINE, LEOPOLD, PETER, MICHAEL, and USEPH.

Cath. Oh, heavens! I am closely pursued!—Which way shall I escape? My friends, will you conduct me to Colonel Cohenberg's?

Leop. Ay, madam, at the hazard of our lives. Lead on, Useph. [Exeunt.]

Enter SERASKIER, ISMAEL, and Guards.

Seras. Confusion! My camp destroyed, and Catherine escaped!

Isma. Pray, my lord, return. You are near the frontiers of the Austrians.

Seras. Not till I recover Catherine. [Trumpets.] Hark! I am called to arms. Begone, and bear our crescent to the wars. [Exit ISMAEL.]

AIR.—SERASKIER.

*Love and honour now conspire
To rouse my soul with martial fire.
Holy prophet, hear my prayer,
Give me once more the charming fair
The Austrian trumpet's bold alarms
Breathe defiance to our arms.
Fir'd with ardour to engage,
Give me to dare the battle's rage,
When groans that shall be heard no more,
Echo to the cannon's roar.
Death stalks triumphant o'er the field:
On every side the Christians yield.
Still conquest doubly presses
The lover-soldier's arms,
In prospect he possesses
Complying beauty's charms.* [Exit.]

SCENE VII.—Castle and view of Belgrade.—The siege commences. Guns firing balls of fire, supposed to be thrown to fire the citadel. A party of Turks are repulsed by a party of Austrians. An Austrian Soldier fights some time sword in hand with a Turkish Soldier; but, losing his sword, takes a pistol from his belt, and fires at him; the Turk falls, and is thrown into the ditch that surrounds the Castle.—Enter the SERASKIER and Col. COHENBERG fighting. The SERASKIER falls.—PETER, LEOPOLD, ANSELM, &c. fight with the Turkish Soldiers. USEPH enters, and flourishes his sword on the side of the Turks; but finding they are sure to be conquered, joins the Austrians. Drums and trumpets heard all the time.

Col. [To the SERASKIER, who is down.] Rise, and learn Christian revenge.

Enter CATHERINE.

FINALE.—In the course of which, enter GHITA and LILLA.

Cho. Loud let the song of triumph rise,
Bless'd triumph o'er oppression's sway
Valour has gain'd the brightest prize,
For freedom's voice shall join the lay.

Cath. Fortune relenting, from her stores,
Her richest treasures lavish pours;
The bliss for which so long we strive
The joys of victory and love.

Seras. Vanquish'd, I boast my victor brave;
Light were the chains which valour gave;
More potent fetters now I find,
Kindness subdues his captive's mind.

Cho. Loud let the song of triumph rise,
Bless'd triumph o'er oppression's sway;
Valour has gain'd the brightest prize,
For freedom's voice shall join the lay.

DUET.—LILLA and GHITA.

*Now while music her strains most inviting,
Shall in sweet gratitude's cause display;
Tho' untutor'd in skill so delighting,
Our heartfelt thanks let us humbly pay.
Strains so artless tho' we proffer,
Hearts o'erflowing zest the offer*

Cho. Now while music, &c.

Leop. All ill-humour thus vented in fighting,
We are, as usual, good-humour'd and gay;

Lilla. *Happy liberty's blessings regaining,
They inspiring our simple lay ;*
Ghita. *Freedom's glorious cause sustaining,
The theme our humble song will raise.*
Lilla. *Strains so artless,—
Though we proffer,—
Hearts o'erflowing,
Zest the offer.*
Cho. Freedom's glorious cause, &c.
Cath. *From companions in danger, this greeting
Of friendship, how can we requite ?*

Trio. *A reception so gracious when meeting,
Our duty becomes our delight.*
Lil. } Bright the laurel of victory gracing,
& } The manly brow merit marks it to wear ;—
Ghi. }
Cho. *Doubly dear is that laurel while placing
By the lov'd hand of the favourite fair
Toils forgetting, pleasure courting,
Beauty beaming, smiles transporting.
Bright the laurel, &c.* [Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Gallery in Lord Touchwood's house, with chambers adjoining.

Enter CARELESS, crossing the stage, as just risen from table ; MELLEFONT following him.

Mel. Ned, Ned, whither so fast ? What, turned fincher ? Why, you wo' not leave us ?

Care. Where are the women ? I'm weary of drinking, and begin to think them the better company.

Mel. Then thy reason staggers, and thou'rt almost tipsy.

Care. No, 'faith ! but your fools grow noisy ; and if a man must endure the noise of words without sense, I think the women have more musical voices, and become nonsense better.

Mel. Why, they are at the end of the gallery, retired to their tea and scandal. But I made a pretence to follow you, because I had something to say to you in private, and I am not likely to have many opportunities this evening.

Brisk. [Without.] Careless, Careless !

Care. And here's this coxcomb, most critically come to interrupt you.

Enter BRISK.

Brisk. Boys, boys, lads, where are you ? What, do you give ground ? Mortgage for a bottle, eh ?
Careless, this is your trick ; you're always spoiling company by leaving it.

Care. And thou art always spoiling company by coming into it.

Brisk. Pooh ! Ha, ha, ha ! I know you envy me.
Spite, proud spite, by the gods, and burning envy.
I'll be judged by Mellefont here, who gives and takes rillery better, you or I. P'sha ! man, when I say you spoil company by leaving it, I mean you leave nobody for the company to laugh at. I think there I was with you : ch ! Mellefont ?

Mel. O' my word, Brisk, that was a home thrust: you have silenced him.

Brisk. Oh! my dear Mellefont, let me perish, if thou art not the soul of conversation, the very essence of wit, and spirit of wine. The deuce take me, if there were three good things said, or one understood, since thy amputation from the body of our society. He, he! I think that's pretty and metaphorical enough: egad! I could not have said it out of thy company. Careless, eh!

Care. Hum! ay, what is it?

Brisk. Oh, mon cœur! What is it! Nay, 'gad! I'll punish you for want of apprehension: the deuce take me if I tell you.

Mel. No, no; hang him, he has no taste. But, dear Brisk, excuse me; I have a little business.

Care. Pr'ythee, get thee gone; thou seest we are serious.

Mel. We'll come immediately, if you'll but go in, and keep up good humour and sense in the company: pr'ythee, do; they'll fall asleep else.

Brisk. Egad: so they will. Well, I will, I will: 'gad! you shall command me from the zenith to the nadir. But, the deuce take me, if I say a good thing till you come. But, pr'ythee, dear rogue, make haste; pr'ythee make haste, I shall burst else. And yonder your uncle, my Lord Touchwood, swears he'll disinherit you; and Sir Paul Pliant threatens to disclaim you for a son-in-law; and my Lord Froth won't dance at your wedding to-morrow; nor, the deuce take me, I won't write your epithalamium; and see what a condition you're like to be brought to.

Mel. Well, I'll speak but three words, and follow you.

Brisk. Enough, enough. Careless, bring your apprehension with you. [Exit.

Care. Pert coxcomb!

Mel. 'Faith! 'tis a good-natured coxcomb, and has very entertaining follies: you must be more humane to him; at this juncture it will do me service. I'll tell you, I would have mirth continued this day at any rate; though patience purchase folly, and attention be paid with noise: there are times when sense may be unseasonable, as well as truth. Pr'ythee, do thou wear none to-day; but allow Brisk to have wit, that thou may'st seem a fool.

Care. Why, how now? Why this extravagant proposition?

Mel. Oh! I would have no room for serious design, for I am jealous of a plot. I would have noise and impertinence keep my Lady Touchwood's head from working.

Care. I thought your fear of her had been over. Is not to-morrow appointed for your marriage with Cynthia? and her father, Sir Paul Pliant, come to settle the writings this day, on purpose?

Mel. True; but you shall judge whether I have not reason to be alarmed. None, besides you and Maskwell, are acquainted with the secret of my aunt Touchwood's violent passion for me. Since my first refusal of her addresses, she has endeavoured to do me all ill offices with my uncle; yet has managed them with that subtlety, that to him they have borne the face of kindness; while her malice, like a dark lantern, only shone upon me, where it was directed: but whether urged by her despair, and the short prospect of time she saw to accomplish her designs; whether the hopes of revenge, or of her love, terminated in the view of this my marriage with Cynthia, I know not; but this morning she surprised me in my own chamber.

Care. Was there ever such a fury! Well, bless us! proceed. What followed?

Mel. It was long before either of us spoke; passion had tied her tongue, and amazement mine. In short, the consequence was thus: she omitted nothing that the most violent love could urge, or tender words express; which when she saw had no effect, but still I pleaded honour and nearness of blood to my uncle, then came the storm I feared at first; for, starting from my bed-side, like a fury she flew to my sword, and with much ado, I prevented her doing me or herself a mischief. Having disarmed her, in a gust of passion she left me, and in a resolution, confirmed by a thousand curses, not to close her eyes till they had seen my ruin.

Care. Exquisite woman! But, what the devil, does she think thou hast no more sense than to disinherit thyself? For, as I take it, this settlement upon you is with a proviso that your uncle have no children.

Mel. It is so. Well, the service you are to do me will be a pleasure to yourself. I must get you to engage my Lady Pliant all this evening, that my pious aunt may not work her to her interest; and if you chance to secure her to yourself, you may incline her to mine. She's handsome, and knows it; is very silly, and thinks she has sense; and has an old fond husband.

Care. I confess, a very fair foundation for a lover to build upon.

Mel. For my Lord Froth, he and his wife will be sufficiently taken up with admiring one another, and Brisk's gallantry, as they call it. I'll observe my uncle myself; and Jack Maskwell has promised me to watch my aunt narrowly, and give me notice upon any suspicion. As for Sir Paul, my wise father-in-law that is to be, my dear Cynthia has such a share in his fatherly fondness, he would scarce make her a moment uneasy to have her happy hereafter.

Care. So, you have manned your works; but I wish you may not have the weakest guard where the enemy is strongest.

Mel. Maskwell, you mean? Pr'ythee, why should you suspect him?

Care. 'Faith! I cannot help it: you know, I never liked him; I am a little superstitious in physiognomy.

Mel. He has obligations of gratitude to bind him to me; his dependence upon my uncle is through my means.

Care. Upon your aunt, you mean.

Mel. My aunt?

Care. I'm mistaken if there be not a familiarity between them you do not suspect, for all her passion for you.

Mel. Pooh, pooh! nothing in the world but his design to do me service; and he endeavours to be well in her esteem, that he may be able to effect it.

Care. Well, I shall be glad to be mistaken; but your aunt's aversion, in her revenge, cannot be any way so effectually shewn as in promoting a means to disinherit you. She is handsome and cunning, and naturally amorous; Maskwell is flesh and blood, at best, and opportunities between them are frequent. His affection to you, you have confessed, is grounded upon his interest; that you have transplanted; and should it take root in my lady, I don't see what you can expect from the fruit.

Mel. I confess the consequence is visible were your suspicions just. But see, the company is broken up: let's meet them.

Enter Lord TOUCHWOOD, Sir PAUL PLIANT, Lord FROTH, and BRISK.

Lord T. Out upon it, nephew! leave your father-in-law and me to maintain our ground against young people.

Mel. I beg your lordship's pardon; we were just returning—

Sir P. Were you, son? Gadsbud! much better as it is. Good, strange! I swear I'm almost tipsy; t'other bottle would have been too powerful for me, as sure as can be, it would. We wanted your company; but Mr. Brisk, where is he? I swear and vow he's a most facetious person, and the best company; and, my Lord Froth, your lordship is so merry a man! He, he, he!

Lord F. Oh, fie! Sir Paul, what do you mean? Merry! Oh, barbarous! I'd as lieve you called me fool.

Sir P. Nay, I protest and vow, now, 'tis true; when Mr. Brisk jokes, your lordship's laugh does so become you! He, he, he!

Lord F. Ridiculous! Sir Paul, you're strangely mistaken. I find champagne is powerful. I assure you, Sir Paul, I laugh at nobody's jest but my own, or a lady's; I assure you, Sir Paul.

[Lord T., MELLEFONT, and CARELESS talk apart.]

Brisk. How? how, my lord? What, affront my wit? Let me perish, do I never say anything worthy to be laughed at?

Lord F. Oh, fie! don't misapprehend me: I don't say so; for I often smile at your conceptions. But there is nothing more unbecoming a man of quality than to laugh; 'tis such a vulgar expression of the passion! everybody can laugh. Then, especially, to laugh at the jest of an inferior person, or when anybody else of the same quality does not laugh with him: ridiculous! to be pleased with what pleases the crowd! Now, when I laugh, I always laugh alone.

Brisk. I suppose that's because you laugh at your own jests, egad! Ha, ha, ha!

Lord F. He, he! I swear, though, your raillery provokes me to a smile.

Brisk. Ay, my lord, it's a sign I hit you in the teeth, if you shew them.

Lord F. He, he, he! I swear, that's so very pretty, I can't forbear.

Lord T. Sir Paul, if you please, we'll retire to the ladies, and drink a dish of tea to settle our heads

Sir P. With all my heart. Mr. Brisk, you'll come to us: or call me when you're going to joke; I'll be ready to laugh incontinently.

[Exit with Lord T.]

Mel. But does your lordship never see comedies?

Lord F. Oh! yes, sometimes; but I never laugh.

Mel. No!

Lord F. Oh! no. Never laugh, indeed, sir.

Care. No! why, what d'ye go there for?

Lord F. To distinguish myself from the commonalty, and mortify the poets; the fellows grow so conceited when any of their foolish wit prevails upon the side-boxes! I swear—he, he, he!—I have often constrained my inclinations to laugh—he, he, he!—to avoid giving them encouragement.

Mel. You are cruel to yourself, my lord, as well as malicious to them.

Lord F. I confess I did myself some violence at first; but now I think I have conquered it.

Brisk. Let me perish, my lord, but there is something very particular and novel in the humour; 'tis true, it makes against wit, and I'm sorry for some friends of mine that write; but, egad! I love to be malicious. Nay, deuce take me, there's wit in't, too; and wit must be foiled by wit: cut a diamond with a diamond; no other way, egad!

Lord F. Oh! I thought you would not be long before you found out the wit.

Care. Wit in what? Where the devil's the wit, in not laughing when a man has a mind to't?

Brisk. Oh Lord! why, can't you find it out? Why, there 'tis, in the not laughing. Don't you apprehend me? My lord, Careless is a very honest fellow; but, harkye!—you understand me—something heavy; a little shallow, or so. Why, I'll tell you now: suppose now you come up to me—nay, pr'ythee, Careless, be instructed—suppose, as I was saying, you come up to me, holding your sides, and laughing as if you would—Well, I look grave, and ask the cause of this immoderate mirth: you laugh on still, and are not able to tell me: still I look grave; not so much as smile—

Care. Smile! no; what the devil should you smile at, when you suppose I can't tell you?

Brisk. Psha, psha! pr'ythee, don't interrupt me: but I tell you, you shall tell me at last; but it shall be a great while first.

Care. Well, but pr'ythee, don't let it be a great while, because I long to have it over.

Brisk. Well, then, you tell me some good jest, or very witty thing, laughing all the while as if you were ready to die, and I hear it, and look thus; would not you be disappointed?

Care. No; for if it were a witty thing, I should not expect you to understand it.

Lord F. Oh, fie! Mr. Careless; all the world allows Mr. Brisk to have wit: my wife says he has a great deal; I hope you think her a judge.

Brisk. Pooh! my lord, his voice goes for nothing. I can't tell how to make him apprehend. Take it t'other way: suppose I say a witty thing to you.

[To CARELESS.]

Care. Then I shall be disappointed, indeed.

Mel. Let him alone, Brisk; he is obstinately bent not to be instructed.

Brisk. I'm sorry for him, the deuce take me!

Mel. Shall we go to the ladies, my lord?

Lord F. With all my heart; methinks, we are a solitude without them.

Mel. Or, what say you to another bottle of champagne?

Lord F. Oh! for the universe, not a drop more, I beseech you. Oh! intemperate! I have a flushing in my face already.

[Takes out a pocket-glass and looks in it.]

Brisk. Let me see, let me see, my lord. I broke my glass that was in the lid of my snuff-box. Hum! Deuce take me, I have encouraged a pimple here, too.

[Takes the glass and looks in it.]

Lord F. Then you must fortify him with a patch; my wife shall supply you. Come, gentlemen, allons!

[Exeunt.]

Enter MASKWELL and Lady TOUCHWOOD.

Lady T. I'll hear no more. You're false and ungrateful; come, I know you false.

Mask. I have been frail, I confess, madam, for your ladyship's service.

Lady T. That I should trust a man whom I had known betray his friend!

Mask. What friend have I betrayed? or to whom?

Lady T. Your fond friend, Mellefont, and to me; can you deny it?

Mask. I do not.

Lady T. Have you not wronged my lord, who has been a father to you in your wants, and given you being? Have you not wronged him in the highest manner?

Mask. With your ladyship's help, and for your service, as I told you before; I can't deny that neither. Anything more, madam?

Lady T. More, audacious villain! Oh! what's more is most my shame. Have you not dishonoured me?

Mask. No, that I deny; for I never told in all my life; so that accusation's answered: on to the next.

Lady T. Death! do you dally with my passion? Insolent devil! But have a care; provoke me not; you shall not escape my vengeance. Calm villain! how unconcerned he stands, confessing treachery and ingratitude! Is there a vice more black? Oh! I have excuses, thousands, for my faults: fire in my temper; passions in my soul, apt to every provocation; oppressed at once with love and with despair. But a sedate, a thinking villain, whose black blood runs temperately bad, what excuse can clear?

Mask. Will you be in temper, madam? I would not talk to be heard. I have been a very great rogue for your sake, and you reproach me with it; I am ready to be a rogue still to do you service; and you are flinging conscience and honour in my face, to rebate my inclinations. How am I to behave myself? You know I am your creature; my life and fortune in your power; to disoblige you brings me certain ruin. Allow it, I would betray you, I would not be a traitor to myself: I don't pretend to honesty, because you know I am a rascal: but I would convince you, from the necessity of my being firm to you.

Lady T. Necessity, impudence! Can no gratitude incline you? no obligations touch you? Were you not in the nature of a servant? and have not I, in effect, made you lord of all, of me, and of my lord? Where is that humble love, the languishing, that adoration which was once paid me, and everlastingly engaged?

Mask. Fixed, rooted in my heart, whence nothing can remove them; yet you—

Lady T. Yet! what yet?

Mask. Nay, misconceive me not, madam, when I say I have had a generous and a faithful passion, which you had never favoured but through revenge and policy.

Lady T. Ha!

Mask. Look you, madam, we are alone, pray contain yourself, and hear me. You know you loved your nephew when I first sighed for you; I quickly found it: an argument that I loved; for, with that art you veiled your passion, 'twas imperceptible to all but jealous eyes. This discovery made me bold, I confess it; for by it I thought you in my power: your nephew's scorn of you added to my hopes; I watched the occasion, and took you, just repulsed by him, warm at once with love and indignation; your disposition, my arguments, and happy opportunity, accomplished my design. How I have loved you since, words have not shewn; then how should words express?

Lady T. Well, mollifying devil! and have I not met your love with forward fire?

Mask. Your zeal, I grant, was ardent, but misplaced; there was revenge in view; that woman's idol had defiled the temple of the god, and love was made a mock-worship. A son and heir would have edged young Mellefont upon the brink of ruin, and left him nought but you to catch at for prevention.

Lady T. Again provoke me! Do you wind me like a larum, only to rouse my own stilled soul for your diversion? Confusion!

Mask. Nay, madam, I'm gone, if you relapse. What needs this? I say nothing but what yourself, in open hours of love, have told me. Why should you deny it? nay, how can you? Is not all this present heat owing to the same fire? Do not you love him still? How have I this day offended you, but in not breaking off his match with Cynthia? which ere to-morrow, shall be done, had you but patience.

Lady T. How! what said you, Maskwell? Another caprice to unwind my temper?

Mask. No, by my love, I am your slave, the slave of all your pleasures; and will not rest till I have given you peace, would you suffer me.

Lady T. Oh! Maskwell, in vain do I disguise me from thee; thou knowest me; knowest the very inmost windings and recesses of my soul. Oh! Mellefont!—Married to-morrow!—Despair strikes me. Yet my soul knows I hate him, too: let him but once be mine, and next immediate ruin seize him.

Mask. Compose yourself; you shall have your wish. Will that please you?

Lady T. How, how? thou dear, thou precious villain, how?

Mask. You have already been tampering with my Lady Pliant?

Lady T. I have: she is ready for any impression I think fit.

Mask. She must be thoroughly persuaded that Mellefont loves her.

Lady T. She is so credulous that way naturally, and likes him so well, that she will believe it faster than I can persuade her. But I don't see what you can propose from such a trifling design; for her first conversing with Mellefont will convince her of the contrary.

Mask. I know it. I don't depend upon it; but it will prepare something else, and gain us leisure to lay a stronger plot: if I gain a little time, I shall not want contrivance.

One minute gives invention to destroy

What, to rebuild, will a whole age employ.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The same.

Enter Lady FROTH and CYNTHIA.

Cyn. Indeed, madam! is it possible your ladyship could have been so much in love?

Lady F. I could not sleep; I did not sleep one wink for three weeks together.

Cyn. Prodigious! I wonder want of sleep, and so much love, and so much wit as your ladyship has, did not turn your brain.

Lady F. Oh! my dear Cynthia, you must not rally your friend. But, really, as you say, I wonder, too. But then, I had a way; for, between you and I, I had whimsies and vapours; but I gave them vent.

Cyn. How, pray, madam?

Lady F. Oh! I writ; writ abundantly. Do you never write?

Cyn. Write! what?

Lady F. Songs, elegies, satires, encomiums, panegyrics, lampoons, plays, or heroic poems.

Cyn. Oh Lord! not I, madam: I'm content to be a courteous reader.

Lady F. Oh, inconsistent! In love, and not write! If my lord and I had been both of your temper, we should never have come together. Oh! bless me! what a sad thing would that have been, if my lord and I should never have met!

Cyn. Then neither my lord nor you would ever have met with your match, on my conscience.

Lady F. On my conscience, no more we should; thou say'st right; for sure, my Lord Froth is as fine a gentleman, and as much a man of quality!—Ah! nothing at all of the common air. I think I may say he wants nothing but a blue ribbon and a star to make him shine the very phosphorus of our hemisphere. Do you understand those two hard words? If you don't, I'll explain them to you.

Cyn. Yes, yes, madam, I'm not so ignorant. At least, I won't own it, to be troubled with your instructions. [Aside.]

Lady F. Nay, I beg your pardon; but being derived from the Greek, I thought you might have escaped the etymology. But I'm the more amazed, to find you a woman of letters, and not write. Bless me, how can Mellefont believe you love him?

Cyn. Why, 'faith! madam, he that won't take my word shall never have it under my hand.

Lady F. I vow, Mellefont's a pretty gentleman; but methinks he wants a manner.

Cyn. A manner! what's that, madam?

Lady F. Some distinguishing quality; as, for example, the bel air, or brilliant, of Mr. Brisk; the solemnity, yet complaisance, of my lord; or something of his own, that he should look a little je ne sais quoi-ish; he is too much a mediocrity, in my mind.

Cyn. He does not, indeed, affect either pertness or formality; for which I like him: here he comes.

Lady F. And my lord with him: pray, observe the difference.

Enter Lord Froth, Mellefont, and Brisk.

Cyn. Impertinent creature! I could almost be angry with her now. [Aside.]

Lady F. My lord, I have been telling Cynthia how much I have been in love with you; I swear I have; I'm not ashamed to own it now; ah! it makes my heart leap; I vow I sigh when I think on't. My dear lord—ha, ha, ha!—do you remember, my lord?

[Squeezes him by the hand, looks kindly on him, sighs, and then laughs out.]

Lord F. Pleasant creature! Perfectly well. Ah! that look; ay, there it is; who could resist? 'Twas so my heart was made a captive first, and ever since it has been in love with happy slavery.

Lady F. Oh! that tongue, that dear deceitful tongue! that charming softness in your mien and your expression! and then your bow! Good, my lord, bow as you did when I gave you my picture. Here, suppose this my picture. [Gives him a pocket-glass.] Pray, mind my lord; ah! he bows charmingly. [Lord Froth bows profoundly low, then kisses the glass.] Nay, my lord, you sha'n't kiss it so much; I shall grow jealous, I vow now.

Lord F. I saw myself there, and kissed it for your sake.

Lady F. Ah! gallantry to the last degree. Mr. Brisk, you're a judge; was ever anything so well bred as my lord?

Brisk. Never anything—but your ladyship, let me perish.

Lady F. Oh! prettily turned again! let me die but you have a great deal of wit. Mr. Mellefont, don't you think Mr. Brisk has a world of wit?

Mel. Oh! yes, madam.

Brisk. Oh dear! madam.

Lady F. An infinite deal.

Brisk. Oh heavens! madam.

Lady F. More wit than anybody.

Brisk. I'm everlastingly your humble servant, deuce take me, madam.

Lord F. Don't you think us a happy couple?

[To Cynthia.]

Cyn. I vow, my lord, I think you are the happiest couple in the world; for you're not only happy in one another, and when you are together, but happy in yourselves, and by yourselves.

Lord F. I hope Mellefont will make a good husband, too.

Cyn. 'Tis my interest to believe he will, my lord.

Lord F. D'ye think he'll love you as well as I do my wife? I'm afraid not.

Cyn. I believe he'll love me better.

Lord F. Heavens! that can never be: but why do you think so?

Cyn. Because he has not so much reason to be fond of himself.

Lord F. Oh! your humble servant for that, dear madam. Well, Mellefont, you'll be a happy creature.

Mel. Ay, my lord, I shall have the same reason for my happiness that your lordship has, I shall think myself happy.

Lord F. Ah! that's all.

Brisk. Your ladyship is in the right: [To Lady F.] but, egad! I'm wholly turned into satire. I confess I write but seldom; but when I do—keen iambics, egad! But my lord was telling me, your ladyship has made an essay toward an heroic poem.

Lady F. Did my lord tell you? Yes, I vow, and the subject is my lord's love to me. And what do you think I call it? I dare swear you won't guess—The Syllabub. Ha, ha, ha!

Brisk. Because my lord's title's Froth, egad! Ha, ha, ha! Deuce take me! very apropos and surprising. Ha, ha, ha!

Lady F. Eh! ay, is not it? And then, I call my lord, Spumoso; and myself—what d'ye think I call myself?

Brisk. Lactilla, may be: 'gad! I cannot tell.

Lady F. Biddy, that's all; just my own name.

Brisk. Biddy! Egad! very pretty: deuce take me, if your ladyship has not the art of surprising the most naturally in the world. I hope you'll make me happy in communicating the poem.

Lady F. Oh! you must be my confidant. I must ask your advice.

Brisk. I'm your humble servant, let me perish. I presume your ladyship has read Bossu?

Lady F. Oh! yes; and Rapin, and Dacier upon Aristotle and Horace. My lord, you must not be jealous, I'm communicating all to Mr. Brisk.

Lord F. No, no; I'll allow Mr. Brisk. Have you nothing about you to show him, my dear?

Lady F. Yes, I believe I have. Mr. Brisk, come, will you go into the next room? and there I'll show you what I have. [Exit with Brisk.]

Lord F. I'll walk a turn in the garden, and come to you. [Exit.]

Mel. You're thoughtful, Cynthia.

Cyn. I'm thinking that though marriage makes man and wife one flesh, it leaves them still two fools; and they become more conspicuous by setting off one another.

Mel. That's only when two fools meet, and their follies are opposed.

Cyn. Nay, I have known two wits meet, and by the opposition of their wit, render themselves as ridiculous as fools. Matrimony is a hazardous game to engage in. What think you of drawing stakes, and giving over in time?

Mel. No, hang it, that's not endeavouring to win, because it's possible we may lose; since we have shuffled and cut, let's e'en turn up trump now.

Cyn. Then I find it's like cards; if either of us have a good hand, it is an accident of fortune.

Mel. No, marriage is rather like a game at bowls; fortune, indeed, makes the match, and the two nearest, and sometimes the two furthest are together; but the game depends entirely upon judgment.

Cyn. Still it is a game, and, consequently, one of us must be a loser.

Mel. Not at all; only a friendly trial of skill, and the winnings to be laid out in an entertainment.

Enter Sir PAUL and Lady PLIANT.

Sir P. Gadsbud! I am provoked into a fermentation, as my Lady Froth says. Was ever the like read of in story?

Lady P. Sir Paul, have patience, let me alone to rattle him up.

Sir P. Pray, your ladyship, give me leave to be angry; I'll rattle him up, I warrant you; I'll teach him, with a certiorari, to make love to my wife.

Lady P. You teach him! I'll teach him myself; so, pray, Sir Paul, hold you contented.

Sir P. Hold yourself contented, my Lady Pliant; I find passion coming upon me even to desperation, and I cannot submit as formerly, therefore give way.

Lady P. How now? will you be pleased to retire, and—

Sir P. No, marry, will I not be pleased; I am pleased to be angry, that's my pleasure at this time.

Mel. What can this mean?

Lady P. 'Gads my life! the man's distracted. Why, how now! who are you? What am I? Slid-ikins! can't I govern you? What did I marry you for? Am I not to be absolute and uncontrollable? Is it fit a woman of my spirit and conduct should be contradicted in a matter of this concern?

Sir P. It concerns me, and only me; besides, I'm not to be governed at all times. When I am in tranquillity, my Lady Pliant shall command Sir Paul; but when I'm provoked to fury, I cannot incorporate with patience and reason; as soon may tigers match with tigers, lambs with lambs, and every creature couple with its foe, as the poet says.

Lady P. He's hot-headed still! 'Tis in vain to talk to you; but remember I have a curtain-lecture for you, you disobedient, headstrong brute.

Sir P. No, 'tis because I won't be headstrong; because I won't be a brute, and have my head fortified, that I am thus exasperated. But I will protect my honour; and yonder is the violator of my fame.

Lady P. 'Tis my honour that is concerned, and the violation was intended to me. Your honour! you have none, but what is in my keeping, and I can dispose of it when I please; therefore, don't provoke me.

Sir P. Hum! gadsbud! she says true. [Aside.] Well, my lady, march on; I will fight under you, then: I am convinced, as far as passion will permit. [Sir P. and Lady P. come up to MELLEFONT.]

Lady P. Inhuman and treacherous—

Sir P. Thou serpent and first tempter of woman-kind—

Cyn. Bless me! sir—madam—what mean you?

Sir P. Thy, Thy, come away, Thy; touch him not: come hither, girl: go not near him, there's nothing but deceit about him; snakes are in his looks, and the crocodile of Nilus in his wicked appetite; he would devour thy fortune, and starve thee alive.

Lady P. Dishonourable, impudent creature!

Mel. For heaven's sake, madam, to whom do you direct this language?

Lady P. Have I behaved myself with all the decorum and nicety befitting the person of Sir Paul's wife; have I preserved my honour as it were in a snow-house; have I, I say, preserved myself like a fair sheet of paper, for you to make a blot upon?

Sir P. And she shall make a simile with any woman in England.

Mel. I am so amazed, I know not what to say.

Sir P. Do you think my daughter—this pretty creature—Gadsbud! she's a wife for a cherubim—Do you think her fit for nothing but to be a stalking-horse, to stand before you while you take aim at my wife? Gadsbud! I was never angry before in my life, and I'll never be appeased again.

Mel. Confusion! this is my aunt; such malice can be engendered no where else. [Aside.]

Lady P. Sir Paul, teach Cynthia from his sight; leave me to strike him with the remorse of his intended crime.

Cyn. Pray, sir, stay; hear him; I dare affirm he's innocent.

Sir P. Innocent! why, harkye! come hither, Thy; harkye! I had it from his aunt, my sister Touchwood. Gadsbud! he does not care a farthing for anything of thee, but thy portion; why, he's in love with my wife; he would have tantalized thee, and dishonoured thy poor father, and that would certainly have broken my heart. I'm sure, if ever I should have horns, they would kill me; they would never come kindly; I should die of 'em, like any child that was cutting his teeth; I should, indeed, Thy; therefore, come away; but Providence has prevented all, therefore, come away when I bid you.

Cyn. I must obey. [Exit with Sir P.]

Lady P. Oh! such a thing! the impiety of it startles me; to wrong so good, so fair a creature, and one that loves you tenderly: 'tis a barbarity of barbarities, and nothing could be guilty of it—

Mel. But the greatest villain imagination can form, I grant it; and next to the villany of such a fact, is the villany of aspersing me with the guilt. How? which way was I to wrong her? for yet I understand you not.

Lady P. Why, gads my life! cousin Mellefont, you cannot be so preumptory as to deny it, when I tax you with it to your face; for, now Sir Paul's gone, you are corum nobis.

Mel. By heaven, I love her more than life, or—

Lady P. Fiddle, faddle! don't tell me of this and that, and everything in the world; but give me mathematic demonstration, answer me directly. But I have not patience. Oh! the impiety of it, as I was saying, and the unparalleled wickedness! Oh, merciful father! how could you think to reverse nature so, to make the daughter the means of procuring the mother!

Mel. The daughter procure the mother!

Lady P. Ay; for though I am not Cynthia's own mother, I am her father's wife; and that's near enough to make it incest.

Mel. Oh! my precious aunt, and the devil in conjunction!

Lady P. Oh! reflect upon the horror of that, and then the guilt of deceiving everybody; marrying the daughter, only to dishonour the father; and then seducing me—

Mel. Where am I? is it day? and am I awake? Madam—

Lady P. And nobody knows how circumstances may happen together. To my thinking now, I could resist the strongest temptation; but yet, I know 'tis impossible for me to know whether I could or no; there's no certainty in the things of this life.

Mel. Madam, pray give me leave to ask you one question.

Lady P. Oh, Lord! ask me the question! I'll swear, I'll refuse it; I swear I'll deny it, therefore, don't ask me; nay, you shan't ask me; I swear I'll deny it. Oh gemini! you have brought all the blood into my face; I warrant, I am as red as a turkey-cock. Oh fie! cousin Mellefont.

Mel. Nay, madam, hear me—

Lady P. Hear you? No, no; I'll deny you first, and hear you afterwards; for one does not know how one's mind may change upon hearing. Hearing is one of the senses, and all the senses are fallible; I won't trust my honour, I assure you; my honour is infallible and un-come-at-table.

Mel. For heaven's sake, madam—

Lady P. Oh! name it no more. Bless me, how can you talk of heaven, and have so much wickedness in your heart? May be, you don't think it a sin: they say, some of you gentlemen don't think it a sin. Indeed, if I did not think it a sin—But still, my honour, if it were no sin—But then, to marry my daughter, for the convenience of frequent opportunities: I'll never consent to that; as sure as can be, I'll break the match.

Mel. Death and amazement! Madam, upon my knee—

Lady P. Nay, nay, rise up: come, you shall see my good-nature. I know love is powerful, and nobody can help his passion: 'tis not your fault, nor I swear it is not mine. How can I help it, if I have charms? And how can you help it, if you are made a captive? Oh Lord! here's somebody coming; I dare not stay. Well, you must consider of your crime, and strive as much as can be against it: strive, be sure; but don't be melancholy, don't despair; but never think that I'll grant you anything—Oh! Lord! no; but be sure you lay aside all thoughts of the marriage; for though I know you don't love Cynthia, only as a blind for your passion to me, yet it will make me jealous—Oh Lord! what did I say? Jealous! no, no, I can't be jealous; for I must not love you; therefore, don't hope—but don't despair neither. Oh! they're coming, I must fly.

[Exit.]

Mel. So, then, in spite of my care and foresight, I am caught—in my security: yet this was but a shallow artifice, unworthy of my Machiavilian aunt; there must be more behind: destruction follows hard, if not presently prevented.

Enter MASKWELL.

Maskwell, welcome! Thy presence is a view of land appearing to my shipwrecked hopes: the witch has raised the storm, and her ministers have done their work; you see the vessels are parted.

Mask. I know it: I met Sir Paul towing away Cynthia. Come, trouble not your head, I'll join you together ere to-morrow morning, or drown between you in the attempt.

Mel. There's comfort in a hand stretched out to one that's sinking, though never so far off.

Mask. No sinking, nor no danger. Come, cheer up; why, you don't know that, while I plead for you, your aunt has given me a retaining fee; nay, I am your greatest enemy, and she does but journey-work under me.

Mel. Ha! how's this?

Mask. What d'ye think of my being employed in the execution of all her plots? Ha, ha, ha! Nay, it's true: I have undertaken to break the match; I have undertaken to make your uncle disinheritor you; to get you turned out of doors, and to—Ha, ha, ha! I can't tell you for laughing. Oh! she has opened her heart to me—I'm to turn you a grazing, and to—ha, ha, ha!—marry Cynthia myself: there's a plot for you.

Mel. Ha! Oh! see; I see my rising sun! Light breaks through clouds upon me, and I shall live in day. Oh! my Maskwell, how shall I thank or praise thee? thou hast outwitted woman. But tell me, how couldst thou thus get into her confidence, eh! how? But was it her contrivance to persuade my Lady Pliant to this extravagant belief?

Mask. It was; and, to tell you the truth, I encouraged it for your diversion: though it made you a little uneasy for the present, yet the reflection of it must needs be entertaining. I warrant, she was very violent at first.

Mel. Ha, ha, ha! Ay, a very fury.

Mask. Ha, ha, ha! I know her temper. Well, you must know, then, that all my contrivances were but bubbles; till at last I pretended to have been long secretly in love with Cynthia; that did my business; that convinced your aunt I might be trusted; since it was as much my interest as hers to break the match: then she thought my jealousy might qualify me to assist her in her revenge; and, in short, in that belief, told me the secrets of her heart. At length, we made this agreement: if I accomplish her designs, (as I told you before,) she has engaged to put Cynthia, with all her fortune, into my power.

Mel. She is most gracious in her favour. Well, and, dear Jack, how hast thou contrived?

Mask. I would not have you stay to hear it now; for I don't know but she may come this way. I am to meet her anon; after that, I'll tell you the whole matter. Be here in this gallery an hour hence: by that time, I imagine, our consultation may be over.

Mel. I will. Till then, success attend thee. [Exit.]

Mask. Till then, success will attend me; for when I meet you, I meet the only obstacle to my fortune. Cynthia, let thy beauty gild my crimes; and whatsoever I commit of treachery or deceit, shall be imputed to me as a merit. Treachery! what treachery? Love cancels all the bonds of friendship, and sets men right upon their first foundations. Duty to kings, piety to parents, gratitude to benefactors, and fidelity to friends, are different and particular ties; but the name of rival cuts 'em all asunder, and is a general acquittance. Rival is equal; and love, like death, an universal leveller of mankind. Ha! but is there not such a thing as honesty? Yes, and who-soever has it about him bears an enemy in his breast; for your honest man, as I take it, is that nice, scrupulous, conscientious person, who will cheat nobody but himself: such another coxcomb as your wise man, who is too hard for all the world, and will be made a fool of by nobody but himself. Ha, ha, ha! Well, for wisdom and honesty, give me cunning and hypocrisy. Oh! 'tis such a pleasure to angle for fair-faced fools! Then that hungry gudgeon, credulity, will bite at anything. Why, let me see: I have the same face, the same words and accents, when I speak what I do think, and when I speak what I do not think; the very same: and dear dissimulation is the only art not to be known from nature.

*Why will mankind be fools, and be deceiv'd?
And why are friends and lovers' oaths believ'd?
When each, who searches strictly his own mind,
May so much fraud and power of baseness find.*

[Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The same.

Enter Lord and Lady Touchwood.

Lady T. My lord, can you blame my brother Pliant, if he refuse his daughter upon this provocation? The contract's void by this unheard-of impiety.

Lord T. I don't believe it true; he has better principles: pho! 'tis nonsense. Come, come, I know my Lady Pliant; 'tis not the first time she has mistaken respect for love, and made Sir Paul jealous of the civility of an undesigning person, the better to bespeak his security in her unfeigned pleasures.

Lady T. You censure hardly, my lord: my sister's honour is very well known.

Lord T. Yes, I believe I know some that have been familiarly acquainted with it. This is a little trick wrought by some pitiful contriver, envious of my nephew's merit.

Lady T. Nay, my lord, it may be so, and I hope it will be found so; but that will require some time; for, in such a case as this, demonstration is necessary.

Lord T. There should have been demonstration of the contrary, too, before it had been believed.

Lady T. So, I suppose, there was.

Lord T. How? where? when?

Lady T. That I can't tell; nay, I don't say there was; I am willing to believe as favourably of my nephew as I can.

Lord T. I don't know that.

Lady T. How? Don't you believe that, say you, my lord?

Lord T. No, I don't say so. I confess I am troubled to find you so cold in his defence.

Lady T. His defence! Bless me! would you have me defend an ill thing?

Lord T. You believe it, then?

Lady T. I don't know; I am very unwilling to speak my thoughts in anything that may be to my cousin's disadvantage; besides, I find, my lord, you are prepared to receive an ill impression from any opinion of mine, which is not consenting with your own; but since I am like to be suspected in the end, and 'tis a pain any longer to dissemble, I own it to you: in short, I do believe it; nay, and can believe anything worse, if it were laid to his charge. Don't ask me my reasons, my lord; for they are not fit to be told you.

Lord T. I'm amazed! Here must be something more than ordinary in this. [Aside.] Not fit to be told me, madam? You can have no interests wherein I am not concerned; and, consequently, the same reasons ought to be convincing to me, which create your satisfaction or disquiet.

Lady T. But those which cause my disquiet, I am willing to have remote from your hearing. Good, my lord, don't press me.

Lord T. Don't oblige me to press you.

Lady T. Whatever it was, 'tis past; and that is better to be unknown, which cannot be prevented; therefore, let me beg of you to rest satisfied.

Lord T. When you have told me I will.

Lady T. You won't.

Lord T. By my life, my dear, I will.

Lady T. What if you can't?

Lord T. How? Then I must know; nay, I will: no more trifling; I charge you tell me—by all our mutual peace to come, upon your duty—

Lady T. Nay, my lord, you need say no more, to make me lay my heart before you; but don't be thus transported; compose yourself; it is not of concern, to make you lose one minute's temper: 'tis not, indeed, my dear. Oh Lord! I wish I had not told you anything. Indeed, my lord, you have frightened me. Nay, look pleased, I'll tell you.

Lord T. Well, well.

Lady T. Nay, but will you be calm? Indeed, it's nothing but—

Lord T. But what?

Lady T. But will you promise not to be angry? nay, you must not be angry with Meliefont. I dare swear he's sorry; and, were it to do again, would not—

Lord T. Sorry for what? Death! you rack me with delay.

Lady T. Nay, no great matter, only—well, I have your promise—pho! why, nothing, only your nephew had a mind to amuse himself sometimes with a little gallantry towards me. Nay, I can't think he meant anything seriously; but methought it looked oddly.

Lord T. Confusion! what do I hear?

Lady T. Or, may be, he thought he was not enough akin to me upon your account, and had a mind to create a nearer relation on his own; a lover, you know, my lord—Ha, ha, ha! Well, but that's all. Now you have it. Well, remember your promise, my lord; and don't take any notice of it to him.

Lord T. No, no, no.

Lady T. Nay, I swear you must not: a little harmless mirth—only misplaced, that's all. But if it were more, 'tis over now, and all's well. For my part, I have forgotten it; and so has he, I hope; for I have not heard anything from him these two days.

Lord T. These two days! Is it so fresh? Unnatural villain! I'll have him stripped, and turned naked out of my doors this moment, and let him rot and perish.

Lady T. Oh! my lord, you'll ruin me, if you take such public notice of it; it will be a town-talk: consider your own and my honour. Stay, I told you you would not be satisfied when you knew it.

Lord T. Before I've done, I will be satisfied. Ungrateful monster! How long—

Lady T. Lord! I don't know: I wish my lips had grown together when I told you. Almost a twelvemonth—nay, I won't tell you any more, till you are yourself. Pray, my lord, don't let the com pany see you in this disorder: yet, I confess, I can't blame you; for I think I was never so surprised in my life. Who would have thought my nephew could have so misconstrued my kindness? But will you go into your closet, and recover your temper? I'll make an excuse of sudden business to the company, and come to you. Pray, good, dear my lord, let me beg you do now: I'll come immediately, and tell you all. Will you, my lord?

Lord T. I will. I am mute with wonder.

Lady T. Well, but go now; here's somebody coming.

Lord T. Well, I go. You won't stay; for I would hear more of this.

Lady T. I'll follow instantly. [Exit Lord T.]

Enter MASKWELL.

So!

Mask. This was a masterpiece, and did not need my help; though I stood ready for a cue to come in, and confirm all, had there been occasion.

Lady T. Have you seen Mellefont?

Mask. I have; and am to meet him here about this time.

Lady T. How does he bear his disappointment?

Mask. Secure in my assistance, he seemed not much afflicted, but rather laughed at the shallow artifice, which so little time must of necessity discover: yet he is apprehensive of some further design of your's, and has engaged me to watch you. I believe he will hardly be able to prevent your plot; yet I would have you use caution and expedition.

Lady T. Expedition, indeed; for all we do must be performed in the remaining part of this evening, and before the company break up, lest my lord should cool, and have an opportunity to talk with him privately: my lord must not see him again.

Mask. By no means; therefore, you must aggravate my lord's displeasure to a degree that will admit of no conference with him. What think you of mentioning me?

Lady T. How?

Mask. To my lord, as having been privy to Mellefont's design upon you, but still using my utmost endeavours to dissuade him: though my friendship and love to him has made me conceal it, yet, you may say, I threatened the next time he attempted anything of that kind, to discover it to my lord.

Lady T. To what end is this?

Mask. It will confirm my lord's opinion of my honour and honesty, and create in him a new confidence in me, which (should this design miscarry) will be necessary to the forming of another plot that I have in my head—to cheat you, as well as the rest. [Aside.]

Lady T. I'll do it.

Mask. You had best go to my lord, keep him as long as you can in his closet, and I doubt not but you will mould him to what you please: your guests are so engaged in their own follies and intrigues, they'll miss neither of you.

Lady T. When shall we meet? At eight this evening, in my chamber; there rejoice at our success, and toy away an hour in mirth.

Mask. I will not fail. [Exit Lady T.] I know what she means well enough. I have lost all appetite to her; yet she's a fine woman, and I loved her once; but I don't know, the case is altered; what was my pleasure is become my duty; and I am as indifferent to her now, as if I were her husband. Should she smoke my design upon Cynthia,

I were in a fine pickle. She has a penetrating head, and knows how to interpret a coldness the right way; therefore, I must dissemble ardour and ecstacy, that's resolved. How easily and pleasantly is that dissembled before fruition! Plague on't! that a man can't drink without quenching his thirst. Ha! yonder comes Mellefont, thoughtful. Let me think: meet her at eight—hum—ha! I have it. If I can speak to my lord before, I will deceive them all, and yet secure myself. 'Twas a lucky thought! Well, this double-dealing is a jewel. Here he comes: now for me.

Enter MELLEFONT, musing. MASKWELL, pretending not to see him, walks by him, and speaks as it were, to himself:

Mercy on us! what will the wickedness of this world come to!

Mel. How now, Jack? What, so full of contemplation that you run over?

Mask. I'm glad you're come, for I could not contain myself any longer; and was just going to give vent to a secret, which nobody but you ought to drink down. Your aunt's just gone from thence.

Mel. And having trusted thee with the secrets of her soul, thou art villainously bent to discover 'em all to me? eh!

Mask. I'm afraid my frailty leans that way; but I don't know whether I can in honour discover all.

Mel. All, all, man. What, you may in honour betray her as far as she betrays herself. No tragical design upon my person, I hope?

Mask. No, but it's a comical design upon mine.

Mel. What dost thou mean?

Mask. Listen, and be dumb: we have been bargaining about the rate of your ruin—

Mel. Like any two guardians to an orphan heirless. Well.

Mask. And whereas pleasure is generally paid with mischief, what mischief I shall do is to be paid with pleasure.

Mel. So, when you've swallowed the potion, you sweeten your mouth with a plum?

Mask. You are merry, sir; but I shall probe your constitution: in short, the price of your banishment is to be paid with the person of—

Mel. Of Cynthia, and her fortune. Why, you forget, you told me this before.

Mask. No, no; so far you are right; and I am, as an earnest of that bargain, to have full and free possession of the person of your aunt.

Mel. Ha! Pho! you trifle.

Mask. By this light, I'm serious, all railery apart. I knew 'twould stun you. This evening, at eight, she will receive me in her bed-chamber.

Mel. Hell and the devil! is she abandoned of all grace? Why, the woman is possessed.

Mask. Well, will you go in my stead?

Mel. Into a hot furnace sooner.

Mask. No you would not; it would not be so convenient, as I can order matters.

Mel. What dy'e mean?

Mask. Mean! not to disappoint the lady, I assure you. Ha, ha, ha! How gravely he looks. Come, come, I won't perplex you. 'Tis the only thing that Providence could have contrived to make me capable of serving you, either to my inclination or your own necessity.

Mel. How, how, for heaven's sake, dear Mask-well?

Mask. Why, thus: I'll go according to my appointment; you shall have notice at the critical minute, to come and surprise your aunt and me together. Counterfeit a rage against me, and I'll make my escape through the private passage from her chamber, which I'll take care to leave open. 'Twill be hard if then you can't bring her to any conditions; for this discovery will disarm her of all defence, and leave her entirely at your mercy: nay, she must ever after be in awe of you.

Mel. Let me adore thee, my better genius! I think it is not in the power of fate now to disappoint my hopes—my hopes! my certainty!

Mask. Well, I'll meet you here, within a quarter of eight, and give you notice.

Mel. Good fortune ever go with thee!

[Exit MASKWELL.]

Enter CARELESS.

Care. Mellefont, get out o'the way. My Lady Pliant's coming, and I shall never succeed while thou art in sight, though she begins to tack about; but I made love a great while to no purpose.

Mel. Why, what's the matter? She's convinced that I don't care for her.

Care. I can't get an answer from her, that does not begin with her honour, or her virtue, or some such cant. Then she has told me the whole history of Sir Paul's nine years' courtship; how he has lain for whole nights together upon the stairs, before her chamber-door; and the first favour he received from her was a piece of an old scarlet petticoat for a stomacher; which, since the day of his marriage, he has, out of a piece of gallantry, converted into a night-cap; and wears it still, with much solemnity, on his anniversary wedding-night.

Mel. You are very great with him. I wonder he never told you his grievances: he will, I warrant you.

Care. Excessively foolish! But that which gives me most hopes of her is her telling me of the many temptations she has resisted.

Mel. Nay, then, you have her; for a woman's bragging to a man that she has overcome temptation, is an argument that they were weakly offered, and a challenge to him to engage her more irresistibly. Here she comes with Sir Paul. I'll leave you. Ply her close; and, by-and-by, clap a billet-doux into her hand; for a woman never thinks a man truly in love with her, till he has been fool enough to think of her out of her sight, and to lose so much time as to write to her. [Exit.]

Enter SIR PAUL and Lady PLIANT.

Sir P. Sh'a'n't we disturb your meditations, Mr. Careless? you would be private?

Care. You bring that along with you, Sir Paul, that shall be always welcome to my privacy.

Sir P. Oh! sweet sir, you load your humble servants, both me and my wife, with continual favours.

Lady P. Sir Paul, what a phrase was there! You will be making answers, and taking that upon you which ought to lie upon me: that you should have so little breeding, to think Mr. Careless did not apply himself to me. Pray, what have you to entertain anybody's privacy? I swear and declare, in the face of the whole world, I'm ready to blush for your ignorance.

Sir P. I acquiesce, my lady; but don't snub so loud. [Apart.]

Lady P. Mr. Careless, if a person that is wholly illiterate might be supposed to be capable of being qualified to make a suitable return to those obligations, which you are pleased to confer upon one that is wholly incapable of being qualified in all these circumstances, I'm sure I should rather attempt it than anything in the world; (courtesies) for, I'm sure, there's nothing in the world that I would rather. (Courtesies.) But I know Mr. Careless is so great a critic, and so fine a gentleman, that it is impossible for me—

Care. Oh, heavens! madam, you confound me.

Sir P. Gadsbud! she's a fine person.

Lady P. Oh, Lord! sir, pardon me, we women have not those advantages: I know my own imperfections; but, at the same time, you must give me leave to declare in the face of the world, that nobody is more sensible of favours and things; for with the reserve of my honour, I assure you, Mr. Careless, I don't know anything in the world I would refuse to a person so meritorious. You'll pardon my want of expression.

Care. Oh! your ladyship is abounding in all excellence, particularly that of phrase.

Lady P. You are so obliging, sir.

Care. Your ladyship is so charming.

Sir P. So, now, now; now, my lady.

Lady P. So well bred.

Care. So surprising.

Lady P. So well-dressed, so bonne mienne, so eloquent, so unaffected, so easy, so free, so particular, so agreeable—

Sir P. Ay, so, so, there.

Care. Oh Lord! I beseech you, madam, don't—

Lady P. So gay, so graceful, so good teeth, so fine shape, so fine limbs, so fine linen; and I don't doubt but you have a very good skin, sir.

Care. For heaven's sake, madam—I'm quite out of countenance.

Sir P. And my lady's quite out of breath, or else you should hear. Gadsbud! you may talk of my Lady Froth—

Care. Oh! fie, fie! not to be named of a day. My Lady Froth is very well in her accomplishments, but it is when my Lady Pliant is not thought of; if that can ever be.

Lady P. Oh! you overcome me—that is so excessive.

Sir P. Nay, I swear and vow, that was pretty.

Care. Oh! Sir Paul, you are the happiest man alive. Such a lady! that is the envy of her sex, and the admiration of ours.

Sir P. Your humble servant. I am, I thank heaven, in a fine way of living, as I may say, peacefully and happily; and, I think, need not envy any of my neighbours, blessed be Providence! Ay, truly, Mr. Careless, my lady is a great blessing; a fine, discreet, well-spoken woman, as you shall see, if it become me to say so; and we live very comfortably together: she is a little hasty sometimes, and so am I; but mine is soon over; and then I'm so sorry. Oh! Mr. Careless, if it were not for one thing—

Enter TIMOTHY, with a letter, and offers it to Sir PAUL PLIANT.

Gadso! gadsbud! Tim, carry it to my lady; you should have carried it to my lady first.

Tim. 'Tis directed to your worship.

Sir P. Well, well, my Lady reads all letters first. Lady P. How often have you been told of that, you jackanapes?

Sir P. Child, do so no more; d'ye hear, Tim?

Tim. No, an please you. [Exit.]

Sir P. A humour of my wife's—you know, women have little fancies. But, as I was telling you, Mr. Careless, if it were not for one thing, I should think myself the happiest man in the world; indeed, that touches me near, very near.

Care. What can that be, Sir Paul?

Sir P. Why, I have, I thank heaven, a very plentiful fortune, a good estate in the country, some houses in town, and some money, a pretty tolerable personal estate; and it is a great grief to me, indeed it is, Mr. Careless, that I have not a son to inherit this. 'Tis true, I have a daughter; and a fine dutiful child she is, though I say it; blessed be Providence, I may say; for, indeed, Mr. Careless, I am mightily beholden to Providence—a poor, unworthy sinner! But if I had a son—ah! that's my affliction, and my only affliction; indeed, I cannot refrain from tears when it comes in my mind.

[Cries.

Care. Why, methinks, that might be easily remedied; my lady's a fine likely woman.

Sir P. Oh! a fine likely woman as you shall see in a summer's day; indeed she is, Mr. Careless, in all respects.

Care. And I should not have taken you to have been so old—

Sir P. Alas! that's not it, Mr. Careless; ah! that's not it; no, no, you shoot wide of the mark a mile, indeed you do; that's not it, Mr. Careless; no, no, that's not it.

Care. No! what can be the matter, then?

Sir P. You'll scarcely believe me, when I shall tell you. Why, my lady is so nice. I am her husband, as I may say, though far unworthy of that honour; yet, I am her husband; but, alas-a-day! I have no more familiarity with her person, as to that matter, than with my own mother; no, indeed.

Care. Alas-a-day! this is a lamentable story; 'tis an injury to the world; my lady must be told on't; she must, i'faith! Sir Paul.

Sir P. Ah! would to heaven you would, Mr. Careless; you are mightily in her favour.

Care. I warrant you; what! we must have a son some way or other.

Sir P. Indeed I should be mightily bound to you if you could bring it about, Mr. Careless.

Lady P. Sir Paul, it's from your steward; here's a return of six hundred pounds; you may take fifty of it for your next half-year. [Gives him the letter.

Enter Lord FROTH and CYNTHIA.

Sir P. How does my girl? Come hither to thy father; poor lamb, thou'rt melancholy.

Lord F. Heavens! Sir Paul, you amaze me of all things in the world. You are never pleased but when we are all upon the broad grin; all laugh, and no company: ah! then, 'tis such a sight to see some teeth. Sure, you're a great admirer of my Lady Whiffler, Mr. Suer, and Sir Lawrence Loud, and that gang.

Sir P. I vow and swear she's a very merry woman; but I think she laughs a little too much.

Lord F. Merry! Oh Lord! what a character that is of a woman of quality! You have been at my Lady Whiffler's upon her day, madam? [To CYN.

Cyn. Yes, my lord. I must humour this fool.

[Aside.

Lord F. Well, and how, eh? What is your sense of the conversation there?

Cyn. Oh! most ridiculous! a perpetual concert of laughing without any harmony; for sure, my lord, to laugh out of time is as disagreeable as to sing out of time, or out of tune.

Lord F. He, he, he! right; and then, my Lady Whiffler is so ready, she always comes in three bars too soon: and then, what do they laugh at? For, you know, laughing without a jest, is as impertinent—he! as, as—

Cyn. As dancing without a fiddle.

Lord F. Just, i'faith! that was at my tongue's end.

Cyn. But that cannot be properly said of them for, I think, they are all in good nature with the world, and only laugh at one another; and, you must allow, they have all jests in their persons, though they have none in their conversation.

Lord F. True, as I'm a person of honour: for heaven's sake, let us sacrifice 'em to mirth a little.

Re-enter TIMOTHY, and whispers Sir PAUL PLIANT.

Sir P. Gadso! Wife, wife; my Lady Pliant, I have a word—

Lady P. I'm busy, Sir Paul; I wonder at your impertinence.

Care. Sir Paul, harkye! I'm reasoning the matter, you know. Madam, if your ladyship pleases, we'll discourse of this in the next room.

[Exit with Lady P.

Sir P. Oh, ho! I wish you good success; I wish you good success. Boy, tell my lady, when she has done, I would speak with her below. [Exit with TIM.

Enter Lady FROTH and BRISK.

Lady F. Then you think that episode between Susan the dairy-maid and our coachman, is not amiss? you know, I may suppose the dairy in town, as well as in the country.

Brisk. Incomparable, let me perish! But, then, being an heroic poem, had not you better call him a charioteer? Charioteer sounds great; besides, your ladyship's coachman having a red face, and you comparing him to the sun—and, you know, the sun is called heaven's charioteer.

Lady F. Oh! infinitely better; I'm extremely beholding to you for the hint. Stay, we'll read over those half-a-score lines again. [Pulls out a paper.] Let me see here: you know what goes before; the comparison, you know.

[Reads.

"For as the sun shines ev'ry day,

So of our coachman I may say"—

Brisk. I'm afraid that simile won't do in wet weather, because you say the sun shines every day.

Lady F. No, for the sun it won't; but it will do for the coachman; for, you know, there's most occasion for a coach in wet weather.

Brisk. Right, right, that saves all.

Lady F. Then, I don't say the sun shines all the day; but, that he peeps now and then: yet he does shine all the day, too, you know, though we don't see him.

Brisk. Right; but the vulgar will never comprehend that.

Lady F. Well, you shall hear. Let me see.

[Reads.

"For as the sun shines every day,

So of our coachman I may say,

He shews his drunken fiery face,

Just as the sun does more 'r less."

Brisk. That's right; all's well, all's well: more or less.

Lady F. [Reads.]

"And when, at night, his labour's done,

Then, too, like heaven's charioteer, the sun"—

Ay, charioteer does better.

"Into the dairy he descends,

And there his whipping and his driving ends;

4 F

*There he's secure from danger of a bilk,
His fare is paid him, and he sets in milk."*

For Susan, you know, is Thetis, and so—

Brisk. Incomparably well and proper, egad! but I have one exception to make: don't you think bilk—
—I know it's good rhyme—but don't you think bilk and fare too like a hackney-coachman?

Lady F. I swear and vow I'm afraid so; and yet our Jehu was a hackney-coachman when my lord took him.

Brisk. Was he? I'm answered, if Jehu was a hackney-coachman. You may put that into the marginal notes, though, to prevent criticism: only mark it with a small asterism, and say, Jehu was formerly a hackney-coachman.

Lady F. I will. You'd oblige me extremely to write notes to the whole poem.

Brisk. With all my heart and soul; and proud of the vast honour, let me perish.

Lord F. He, he, he! My dear, have you done? Won't you join with us? we were laughing at my Lady Whiffler and Mr. Sner.

Lady F. Ay, my dear, were you? Oh! filthy Mr. Sner! he's a nauseous figure, a most fulsamic fop, pho! He spent two days together in going about Covent-garden to suit the lining of his coach with his complexion.

Lord F. Oh, silly! yet his aunt is as fond of him, as if she had brought the ape into the world herself.

Brisk. Who, my Lady Toothless? Oh! she's a mortifying spectacle; she's always chewing the cud, like an old ewe.

Cyn. Fie! Mr. Brisk, 'tis eringoes for her cough.

Lady F. Then she's always ready to laugh when Sner offers to speak; and sits in expectation of his no jest, with her mouth open.

Brisk. Like an oyster at low ebb, egad! Ha, ha, ha!

Lady F. Then that t'other great strapping lady; I can't hit of her name; the old fat fool that paints so exorbitantly.

Brisk. I know whom you mean; but deuce take me, I can't hit of her name neither. Paints, d'ye say? why, she lays it on with a trowel; then she has a great beard that bristles through it, and makes her look as if she were plastered with lime and hair, let me perish.

Lady F. Oh! you made a song upon her, Mr. Brisk.

Brisk. Eh! egad! so I did. My lord can sing it. 'Tis not a song, neither: it's a sort of an epigram, or rather, an epigrammatic sonnet; I don't know what to call it, but it's satire. Sing it, my lord.

SONG.—Lord Froth.

Ancient Phillis has young graces,

'Tis a strange thing, but a true one;

Shall I tell you how?

She herself makes her own faces,

And each morning wears a new one;

Where's the wonder now?

Brisk. Short, but there's salt in it; my way of writing, egad!

Enter THOMAS.

Lady F. How now?

Tho. Your ladyship's chair is come

Lady F. Is nurse and the child in it?

Tho. Yes, madam.

Lady F. Oh! the dear creature! let's go see it.

Lord F. I swear, my dear, you spoil that child with sending it to and again so often; this is the seventh time the chair has gone for her to-day.

Lady F. Oh la! I swear it's but the sixth, and I haven't seen her these two hours. The poor dear creature! I swear, my lord, you don't love poor dear little Sappho. Come, my dear Cynthia; Mr. Brisk, we'll go see Sappho, though my lord won't.

Cyn. I'll wait upon your ladyship.

Brisk. Pray, madam, how old is Lady Sappho?

Lady F. Three quarters; but I swear she has a world of wit, and can sing a tune already. My lord, won't you go? won't you? what, not to see Saph? Pray, my lord, come see little Saph. I knew you could not stay. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The Same.

Enter MELLEFONT and CYNTHIA.

Cyn. I heard him loud as I came by the closet-door, and my lady with him: but she seemed to moderate his passion.

Mel. Ay, as gentle breezes moderate a fire; but I shall counterwork her spells.

Cyn. It's impossible; she'll cast beyond you still. I'll lay my life it will never be a match.

Mel. What?

Cyn. Between you and I.

Mel. Why so? I don't know why we should not steal out of the house this moment, and marry one another without consideration or the fear of repentance. Hang fortune, portion, settlements, and jointures.

Cyn. Ay, ay, what have we to do with them? You know we marry for love.

Mel. Love, love, downright, very villainous love.

Cyn. Here, then, I give you my promise, in spite of my duty, any temptation of wealth, your inconstancy, or my own inclination to change—

Mel. To run most wilfully and unreasonably away with me this moment, and be married.

Cyn. Hold—never to marry anybody else.

Mel. That's but a kind of negative consent. Why you won't balk the frolic?

Cyn. If you had not been so assured of your own conduct, I would not. But 'tis but reasonable that, since I consent to like a man without the vile consideration of money, he should give me a very evident demonstration of his wit; therefore let me see you undermine my Lady Touchwood, as you boasted, and force her to give her consent, and then—

Mel. I'll do't.

Cyn. And I'll do't.

Mel. This very next ensuing hour of eight o'clock is the last minute of her reign, unless the devil assist her in propria persona.

Cyn. Well, if the devil should assist her, and your plot miscarry—

Mel. Ay, what am I to trust to, then?

Cyn. Why, if you give me very clear demonstration that it was the devil, I'll allow for irresistible odds. Here's my mother-in-law, and your friend Careless; I would not have 'em see us together, yet. [Exeunt.]

Enter CARELESS and Lady PLIANT.

Lady P. I swear, Mr. Careless, you are very alluring, and say so many fine things, and nothing is so moving to me as a fine thing. Well, I must do you this justice, and declare in the face of the world, never anybody gained so far upon me as yourself; with blushes I must own it, you have shaken, as I may say, the very foundation of my honour. Well, sure if I escape your importunities, I shall value myself as long as I live, I swear.

Care. And despise me. [Sighing.]

Lady P. The last of any man in the world, by my purity; now you make me swear. Oh! gratitude, forbid that I should ever be wanting in a respectful acknowledgment of an entire resignation of all my best wishes, for the person and parts of so accomplished a person, whose merit challenges much more, I'm sure, than my illiterate praises can describe.

Care. Ah! heavens, madam, you ruin me with kindness. Your charming tongue pursues the victory of your eyes, while at your feet your poor adorer dies. [In a whining tone.]

Lady P. Ah! very fine.

Care. Ah! why are you so fair, so bewitchingly fair? Oh, let me grow to the ground here, and feast upon that hand! Oh, let me press it to my heart, my trembling heart! the nimble movement shall instruct your pulse, and teach it to alarm desire. [Still whining.] I'm almost at the end of my cant, if she does not yield quickly. [Aside.]

Lady P. Oh! that's so passionate and fine, I cannot hear it. I am not safe if I stay, and must leave you.

Care. And must you leave me? Rather let me languish out a wretched life, and breathe my soul beneath your feet. I must say the same thing over again, and can't help it. [Aside.]

Lady P. I swear, I'm ready to languish, too. Oh, my honour! whither is it going? I protest you have given me the palpitation of the heart.

Care. Can you be so cruel?

Lady P. Oh! rise, I beseech you; say no more till you rise. Why did you kneel so long? I swear I was so transported, I did not see it. Well, to shew you how far you have gained upon me, I assure you, if Sir Paul should die, of all mankind there's none I'd sooner make my second choice.

Care. Oh, heaven! I can't outlive this night without your favour. I feel my spirits faint, a general dampness overspreads my face, a cold deadly dew already vents through all my pores, and will, to-morrow, wash me for ever from your sight, and drown me in my tomb.

Lady P. Oh! you have conquered; sweet, melting, moving sir, you have conquered. What heart of marble can refrain to weep, and yield to such sad sayings? [Cries.]

Care. I thank heaven they are the saddest that I ever said. [Aside.] Oh!

Lady P. Oh! I yield myself all up to your uncontrollable embraces. Say, thou dear dying man, when, where, and how? Ah! there's Sir Paul.

Care. 'Slife! yonder's Sir Paul; but if he were not come, I'm so transported I cannot speak. This note will inform you. [Gives her a note, and exit.]

Re-enter CYNTHIA, with Sir PAUL PLIANT.

Sir P. Thou art my tender lambkin, and shalt do what thou wilt; but endeavour to forget this Mellefont.

Cyn. I would obey you to my power, sir; but, if I have not him, I have sworn never to marry.

Sir P. Never to marry! Heavens forbid! must I neither have sons nor grandsons? must the family of the Pliants be utterly extinct for want of issue male? Oh, impiety! but did you swear? did that sweet creature swear, eh? How durst you swear without my consent, eh? Gadsbud! who am I?

Cyn. Pray, don't be angry, sir; when I swore I had your consent; and, therefore, I swore.

Sir P. Why, then, the revoking my consent does annul or make of non effect your oath; so you may unswear it again; the law will allow it.

Cyn. Ay, but my conscience never will.

Sir P. Gadsbud! no matter for that; conscience and law never go together; you must not expect that.

Lady P. Ay, but Sir Paul, I conceive, if she has sworn—d'ye mark me? if she has once sworn, it is most unchristian, inhuman, and obscene, that she should break it. I'll make up the match again, because Mr. Careless said it would oblige him. [Aside.]

Sir P. Does your ladyship conceive so? Why, I was of that opinion once, too. Nay, if your ladyship conceives so, I'm of that opinion again; but I can neither find my lord nor my lady, to know what they intend.

Lady P. I am satisfied that my cousin Mellefont has been much wronged.

Cyn. I'm amazed to find her of our side, for I'm sure she loved him. [Aside.]

Lady P. I know my Lady Touchwood has no kindness for him; and besides, I have been informed by Mr. Careless, that Mellefont had never anything more than a profound respect. That he has owned himself to be my admirer, 'tis true, but he was never so presumptuous to entertain any dishonourable notions of things; so that if this be made plain, I don't see how my daughter can, in conscience or honour, or anything in the world—

Sir P. Indeed, if this be made plain, as my lady your mother says, child—

Lady P. Plain! I was informed of it by Mr. Careless, and I assure you Mr. Careless is a person—that has a most extraordinary respect and honour for you, Sir Paul.

Cyn. And for your ladyship too, I believe, or else you had not changed sides so soon. [Aside.] Now I begin to find it.

Sir P. I am much obliged to Mr. Careless, really; he is a person that I have a great value for, not only for that, but because he has a great veneration for your ladyship.

Lady P. Oh, law! no, indeed, Sir Paul; 'tis upon your account.

Sir P. No, I protest and vow I have no title to his esteem, but in having the honour to appoint, in some measure, to your ladyship, that's all.

Lady P. Oh, law! now, I swear and declare, it sha'n't be so; you're too modest, Sir Paul.

Sir P. It becomes me, when there is any comparison made between—

Lady P. Oh, fie, fie! Sir Paul, you'll put me out of countenance. Your very obedient and affectionate wife, that's all, and highly honoured in that title.

Sir P. Gadsbud! I am transported. Give me leave to kiss your ladyship's little finger.

Lady P. My lip, indeed, Sir Paul; I swear you shall. [He kisses her, and bows very low.]

Sir P. I humbly thank your ladyship; I don't know whether I fly on ground, or walk in air. Gadsbud! she was never thus before. Well, I must own myself the most beholden to Mr. Careless; as sure as can be this is all his doing, something that he has said; well, 'tis a rare thing to have an ingenious friend. Well, your ladyship is of opinion that the match may go forward?

Lady P. By all means. Mr. Careless has satisfied me of the matter.

Sir P. Well, why then, lamb, you may keep your oath; but have a care of making rash vows. Come hither to me, and kiss papa.

Lady P. I swear and declare, I am in such a twitter to read Mr. Careless's letter, that I can't forbear any longer; but though I may read all letters first by prerogative, yet I'll be sure to be unsuspected this time. [Aside.] Sir Paul.

Sir P. Did your ladyship call?

Lady P. Nay, not to interrupt you, my dear. Only lend me your letter which you had from your steward to-day; I would look upon the account again, and may be, increase your allowance.

Sir P. There it is, madam. Do you want a pen and ink? [Bows, and gives the letter.]

Lady P. No, no, nothing else, I thank you, Sir Paul. So, now I can read my own letter under the cover of his. [Aside.]

Sir P. Eh! and shall I have a grandson, a brave chopping boy, to perpetuate the line of the Pliants? I'll settle a thousand pounds a year upon the rogue as soon as ever he looks me in the face, I will. Gadsbud! I hope the young cherub will be like me; I would fain have some resemblance of myself in my posterity. Ha, Thy! should'nt you wish he was like his grand-papa?

Cyn. I'm glad to see you so merry, sir.

Sir P. Merry! Gadsbud! I'm serious. I'll give thee five hundred pounds for every feature of him that resembles me. Ah! this eye, this left eye; a thousand pounds for this left eye; this has done execution in its time, girl. Why, thou hast my leer, hussy; just thy father's leer; let it be transmitted to the young rogue by the help of imagination. Why, 'tis the mark of our family, Thy. Our house is distinguished by a languishing eye, as the house of Austria is by a thick lip.

Lady P. Oh, dear, Mr. Careless! I swear he writes charmingly, and he looks charmingly, and he has charmed me as much as I have charmed him; and so I'll tell him in the wardrobe, when 'tis dark. Oh, crime! I hope Sir Paul has not seen both letters. [Aside.—Puts up the wrong letter, and gives him her own.] Sir Paul, here's your letter; to-morrow morning I'll settle accounts to your advantage.

Sir P. I humbly thank your ladyship.

Lady P. So, now I'll retire, and study a complimentary rebuke to Mr. Careless, for the pathetic tender of his regards; but it shall not be too severe neither. [Aside.—Exit.]

Enter BRISK.

Brisk. Sir Paul, gadsbud! you're an unceivil person, let me tell you, and all that; and I did not think it had been in you.

Sir P. Oh, law! what's the matter now? I hope you are not angry, Mr. Brisk?

Brisk. Deuce take me, I believe you intend to marry your daughter yourself; you're always brooding over her like an old hen, as if she were not well batched, egad, eh!

Sir P. Good, strange! Mr. Brisk is such a merry facetious person. Ha, ha, ha! No, no, I have done with her, I have done with her now.

Brisk. The fiddles have stayed this hour in the hall, and my Lord Froth wants a partner; we can never begin without her.

Sir P. Go, go, child; go, get you gone, and dance and be merry; I'll come and look at you by-and-by. [Exit CYNTHIA.] Where's my son Mellefont?

Brisk. I'll send him to them; I know where he is; and, Sir Paul, will you send Careless into the hall, if you meet him?

Sir P. I will, I will; I'll go and look for him on purpose. [Exit.]

Brisk. So, now they are all gone, and I have an opportunity to practise. Ah! my dear Lady Froth! she's a most engaging creature, if she were not so fond of that d—d coxcomby lord of hers; and yet I am forced to allow him wit, too, to keep in with him. No matter, she's a woman of parts, and, egad, parts will carry her. She said she would follow me into the gallery. Now, to make my approaches:—Hem, hem! Ah! ma—[Bows.]—dam! Plague on't, why should I disparage my parts by thinking what to say? None but dull rogues think; witty men, like rich fellows, are always ready for all expenses; while your blockheads, like poor needy scoundrels, are forced to examine their stock, and forecast the charges of the day. Here she comes; I'll seem not to see her, and try to win her with a new airy invention of my own. Hem!

[Sings, walking about.]

Enter Lady FROTH.

I'm sick with love, ha, ha, ha! pr'ythee, come and cure me—I'm sick with—Oh, ye powers! Oh! my Lady Froth, my Lady Froth, my Lady Froth! Heigho, break heart! Gods, I thank you.

[Stands musing with his arms across.]

Lady F. Oh, heavens! Mr. Brisk, what's the matter?

Brisk. My Lady Froth! your ladyship's most humble servant. The matter, madam?—nothing, madam; nothing at all, egad! I was fallen into the most agreeable amusement in the whole province of contemplation, that's all. I'll seem to conceal my passion, and that will look like respect. [Aside.]

Lady F. Bless me, why did you call out upon me so loud?

Brisk. Oh, lord! I, madam? I beseech your ladyship, when?

Lady F. Just now, as I came in. Bless me, why, don't you know it?

Brisk. Not I, let me perish; but did I? Strange! I confess your ladyship was in my thoughts; and I was in a sort of dream, that did, in a manner, represent a very pleasing object to my imagination; but—but did I, indeed? To see how love and murder will out! But did I really name my Lady Froth?

Lady F. Three times aloud, as I love letters. But did you talk of love? Oh, Parnassus! who would have thought Mr. Brisk could have been in love? Ha, ha, ha! Oh, heavens! I thought you could have no mistress but the nine muses.

Brisk. No more I have, egad! for I adore 'em all in your ladyship. Let me perish, I don't know whether to be splenetic or airy upon't; the deuce take me, if I can tell whether I am glad or sorry, that your ladyship has made the discovery.

Lady F. Oh! be merry, by all means. Prince Volscius in love! Ha, ha, ha!

Brisk. Oh, barbarous, to turn me into ridicule! yet—ha, ha, ha! the deuce take me, I can't help laughing myself, ha, ha, ha! yet, by heavens! I have a violent passion for your ladyship, seriously.

Lady F. Seriously! ha, ha, ha!

Brisk. Seriously, ha, ha, ha! 'Gad! I have, for all I laugh.

Lady F. Ha, ha, ha! What d'ye think I laugh at? Ha, ha, ha!

Brisk. Me, egad! Ha, ha!

Lady F. No; the deuce take me if I don't laugh at myself; for, hang me, if I have not a violent passion for Mr. Brisk. Ha, ha, ha!

Brisk. Seriously?

Lady F. Seriously. Ha, ha, ha!

Brisk. That's well enough, let me perish. Ha, ha, ha! Oh! miraculous! what a happy discovery! Ah! my dear charming Lady Froth.

Lady F. Oh, my adored Mr. Brisk.

[They embrace.]

Enter Lord FROTH.

Lord F. The company are all ready. How now?

Brisk. Zoons, madam, there's my lord.

[Apart to Lady F.]

Lady F. Take no notice, but observe me. [Aside.] Now cast off, and meet me at the lower end of the room, and then join hands again. I could teach my lord this dance purely; but I vow, Mr. Brisk, I can't tell how to come so near any other man. Oh! here's my lord; now you shall see me do it with him.

[They pretend to practise part of a country dance. Lord F. Oh! I see there's no harm yet; but I don't like this familiarity.]

[Aside.]

Lady F. Shall you and I do our close dance, to shew Mr. Brisk?

[To Lord F.]

Lord F. No, my dear, do it with him.

Lady F. I'll do it with him, my lord, when you are out of the way.

Brisk. That's good, egad! that's good; deuce take me, I can hardly hold laughing in his face.

[Aside.]

Lord F. Any other time, my dear, or we'll dance it below.

Lady F. With all my heart.

Brisk. Come, my lord, I'll wait on you. My charming witty angel.

[Apart to Lady F.]

Lady F. We shall have whispering time enough, you know, since we are partners.

[Apart to BRISK.—Exeunt.]

Re-enter Lady PLIANT and CARELESS.

Lady P. Oh! Mr. Careless, Mr. Careless! I'm ruined, I'm undone!

Care. What's the matter, madam?

Lady P. Oh, the unluckiest accident! I'm afraid I sha'n't live to tell it you.

Care. Heaven forbid! What is it?

Lady P. I'm in such a fright; the strangest quandary and premonition! I'm all over in an universal agitation. Oh, your letter, your letter! By an unfortunate mistake, I have given Sir Paul your letter instead of his own.

Care. That was unlucky.

Lady P. Oh! yonder he comes reading of it; step in here, and advise me quickly, before he sees.

[Exeunt.]

Re-enter Sir PAUL PLIANT, with the letter.

Sir P. Oh, Providence! what a conspiracy have I discovered; but let me see to make an end on't. Hum! [Reads.] "After supper, in the wardrobe by the gallery. If Sir Paul should surprise us, I have a commission from him, to treat with you about the very matter of fact." Matter of fact! very pretty. It seems, then, I'm conducing to my own dishonour; why, this is the very traitorous position of taking up arms by my authority against my person! Well, let me see [Reads.] "Till then I languish in expectation of my adored charmer.—Dying Ned Careless." Gadsbud! would that were matter of fact, too! Die and be d—d, for a Judas Maccabeus, and Iscariot both. Oh, friendship! what art thou but a name! Henceforward let no man take a friend into the bosom of his family; for if he does, oh! we know not what will follow, from the example of Sir Paul Pliant, and his bosom friend, Ned Careless. Have I, for this, been pinioned, night after night, for three years past? Have I approached the marriage-bed with reverence, as to a sacred shrine, and must I now find it polluted by foreign iniquity? Oh! my Lady Pliant, you were chaste as ice, but you are melted now, and false as water. But Providence has been constant to me in discovering this conspiracy; still I am beholden to Providence; if it were not for Providence, sure, poor Sir Paul, thy heart would break.

Re-enter Lady PLIANT.

Lady P. So, sir, I see you have read the letter. Well, now, Sir Paul, what do you think of your friend Careless? Has he been treacherous? or did you give his insolence a licence to make trial of your wife's suspected virtue? D'ye see here? [Snatches the letter as in anger.] Look, read it! 'Gad's my life! if I thought it were so, I would, this moment, renounce all communication with you. Ungrateful monster! Eh! is it so? Ay, I see it; a plot upon my honour; your guilty cheeks confess it. Oh! where shall wronged virtue fly for reparation? I'll be divorced this instant.

Sir P. Gadsbud! what shall I say? this is the strangest surprise. [Aside.] Why, I don't know anything at all; nor I don't know whether there be anything at all in the world or no.

Lady P. I thought I should try you, false man. I, that never dissembled in my life; yet, to make trial of you, pretended to like that monster of iniquity, Careless; and found out that contrivance to let you see this letter, which now I find was of your own inditing, I do, heathen, I do! See my face no more; I'll be divorced presently.

Sir P. Oh, strange! what will become of me? I'm so amazed, and so overjoyed, so afraid, and so sorry. But did you give me this letter on purpose, eh? Did you?

Lady P. Did I? Do you doubt me, Turk, Saracen? I have a cousin that's a proctor in the Commons; I'll go to him, instantly. [Going.]

Sir P. Hold, stay! I beseech your ladyship! I'm so overjoyed—stay, I'll confess all.

Lady P. What will you confess, Jew?

Sir P. Why now, as I hope to be saved, I had no hand in this letter. Nay, hear me, I beseech your ladyship, the devil take me now, if he did not go beyond my commission. If I desired him to do any more than speak a good word only just for me, gadsbud! only for poor Sir Paul, I'm an Anabaptist, or a Jew, or what you please to call me.

Lady P. Why, is not here matter of fact?

Sir P. Ay, but by your own virtue and continency, that matter of fact is all his own doing. I confess I had a great desire to have some honours conferred upon me, which lay all in your ladyship's breast; and he being a well-spoken man, I desired him to intercede for me.

Lady P. Did you so, presumption? Oh! he comes, he comes; I cannot bear his sight. [Exit.]

Re-enter CARELESS.

Care. Sir Paul, I'm glad I've met with you.

'Gad! I have said all I could, but can't prevail. Then my friendship to you has carried me a little further in this matter—

Sir P. Indeed! Well, sir. I'll dissemble with him a little.

Care. Why, 'faith! I have, in my time, known honest gentlemen abused by a pretended coyness in their wives, and I had a mind to try my lady's virtue; and when I could not prevail for you, 'gad! I pretended to be in love myself; but all in vain, she would not hear a word upon that subject; then I writ a letter to her; I don't know what effect that will have, but I'll be sure to tell you when I do; though, by this light, I believe her virtue is impregnable.

Sir P. Oh, Providence, Providence! what discoveries are here made! Why, this is better, and more miraculous than the rest.

Care. What do you mean?

Sir P. I can't tell you, I'm so overjoyed; come along with me to my lady; I can't contain myself; come, my dear friend.

Care. So, so, so! this difficulty's over.

[Aside.—Exeunt.]

Re-enter MELLEFONT, with MASKWELL.

Mel. Maskwell, I have been looking for you; 'tis within a quarter of eight.

Mask. My lady is just gone into my lord's closet; you had best steal into her chamber before she comes, and lie concealed there; otherwise, she may lock the door when we are together, and you not easily get in to surprise us.

Mel. Eh! you say true.

Mask. You had best make haste; for, after she has made some apology to the company for her own and my lord's absence all this while, she'll retire to her chamber instantly.

Mel. I go this moment. Now, fortune, I defy thee.

[Exit.]

Mask. I confess you may be allowed to be secure in your own opinion; the appearance is very fair; but I have an after-game to play that shall turn the tables; and here comes the man that I must manage.

Enter Lord TOUCHWOOD.

Lord T. Maskwell, you are the man I wished to meet.

Mask. I am happy to be in the way of your lordship's commands.

Lord T. I have always found you prudent and careful in anything that has concerned me, or my family.

Mask. I were a villain else. I am bound by duty and gratitude, and my own inclination, to be ever your lordship's servant.

Lord T. Enough; you are my friend; I know it; yet there has been a thing in your knowledge, which has concerned me nearly, that you have concealed from me.

Mask. My lord!—

Lord T. Nay, I excuse your friendship to my unnatural nephew thus far; but I know you have been privy to his impious designs upon my wife. This evening she has told me all; her good nature concealed it as long as it was possible; but he perseveres so in villany, that she has told me, even you were weary of dissuading him.

Mask. I am sorry, my lord, I can't make you an answer; this is an occasion in which I would not willingly be silent.

Lord T. I know you would excuse him; and I know as well that you can't.

Mask. Indeed I was in hopes it had been a youthful heat, that might have soon boiled over, but—

Lord T. Say on.

Mask. I have nothing more to say, my lord, but to express my concern; for I think his frenzy increases daily.

Lord T. How? Give me but proof of it, ocular proof, that I may justify my dealing with him to the world, and share my fortunes.

Mask. Oh! my lord, consider that is hard; besides, time may work upon him. Then for me to do it! I have professed an everlasting friendship to him.

Lord T. He is your friend—and what am I?

Mask. I am answered.

Lord T. Fear not his displeasure; I will put you out of his, and fortune's power; and, for that thou art scrupulously honest, I will secure thy fidelity to him, and give my honour never to own any discovery that you shall make me. Can you give me a demonstrative proof? speak.

Mask. I wish I could not. To be plain, my lord, I intended this evening to have tried all arguments to dissuade him from a design, which I suspect; and if I had not succeeded, to have informed your lordship of what I knew.

Lord T. I thank you. What is the villain's purpose?

Mask. He has owned nothing to me of late; and what I mean now is only a bare suspicion of my own. If your lordship will meet me a quarter of an hour hence—there—in that lobby by my lady's bed-chamber, I shall be able to tell you more.

Lord T. I will.

Mask. My duty to your lordship makes me do a severe piece of justice.

Lord T. I will be secret, and reward your honesty beyond your hopes.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Lady Touchwood's Bed-chamber.

Enter MELLEFONT.

Mel. Pray heaven, my aunt keep touch with her assignation. Oh! that her lord were but sweating behind this hanging, with the expectation of what I shall see!—Hist! she comes. Little does she think what a mine is just ready to spring under her feet.—But to my post.

[Retires.]

Enter Lady TOUCHWOOD.

Lady T. 'Tis eight o'clock; methinks I should have found him here. Who does not prevent the hour of love, outstays the time; for, to be duly punctual, is too slow.

Enter MASKWELL.

I was accusing you of neglect.

Mask. I confess you do reproach me when I see you here before me; but 'tis fit I should be still behind-hand, still to be more and more indebted to your goodness.

Lady T. You can excuse a fault too well not to have been to blame! a ready answer shews you were prepared.

Mask. Guilt is ever at a loss, and confusion waits upon it; when innocence and bold truth are always ready for expression.

Lady T. Not in love; words are the weak support of cold indifference; love has no language to be heard.

Mask. Excess of joy has made me stupid. Thus—Lady T. Hold! let me lock the door first.

[Goes to the door.]

Mask. That I did suppose. 'Twas well I left the private passage open. [Aside.]

Lady T. So, that's safe.

Mask. And so may all your pleasures be, and secret as this kiss.

Mel. [Leaps out.] And may all treachery be thus discovered.

Lady T. Ah!

[Shrieks.]

Mel. Villain!

[Offers to draw.]

Mask. Nay, then there's but one way. [Runs out.]

Mel. Say you so? Were you provided for an escape? Hold! madam, you have no more holes to your burrow. I'll stand between you and this sally-port.

Lady T. Shame, grief, and ruin haunt thee for this deceit! Oh! I could rack myself, play the vulture to my own heart, and gnaw it piecemeal, for not boding to me this misfortune.

Mel. Be patient.

Lady T. Patient!

Mel. Consider, I have you on the hook; you will but flounder yourself a-weary, and be, nevertheless, my prisoner.

Lady T. I'll hold my breath and die, but I'll be free.

Mel. Oh, madam! have a care of dying unprepared. I doubt you have some unrepented sins that may hang heavy and retard your flight.

Lady T. What shall I do? whither shall I turn? Hold in, my passion, and fall, fall a little, thou swelling heart! Let me have some intermission of this rage, and one minute's coolness to dissemble.

[Aside.—Weeps.]

Mel. You have been to blame. I like those tears, and hope they are of the purest kind—penitential tears.

Lady T. Oh! the scene was shifted quick before me; I had not time to think; I was surprised to see a monster in the glass, and now I find 'tis myself. Can you have mercy to forgive the faults I have imagined, but never put in practice? Oh! consider, consider how fatal you have been to me, you have already killed the quiet of this life. The love of you was the first wandering fire that e'er misled my steps; and while I had only that in view, I was betrayed into unthought-of ways of ruin.

Mel. May I believe this true?

Lady T. Oh! he not cruelly incredulous. How can you doubt these streaming eyes? Keep the severest eye o'er all my future conduct; and if I once relapse, let me not hope forgiveness; 'twill ever be in your power to ruin me. My lord shall sign to your desires; I will myself create your happiness, and Cynthia shall this night be your bride; do but conceal my failings, and forgive. [Kneels.]

Mel. Upon such terms, I will be ever yours in every honest way.

Lady T. Eternal blessings thank you!

Re-enter MASKWELL, with Lord TOUCHWOOD.

Mask. I have kept my word. He's here; but I must not be seen. [Apart to Lord T.—Exit.]

Lady T. Ha! my lord listening; then all's my own. [Aside.]

Mel. Nay, I beseech you, rise.

Lady T. Never, never! I'll grow to the ground, be buried quick beneath it, e'er I'll be consenting to such a sin as incest! unnatural incest! [Aloud.]

Mel. Ha!

Lady T. Oh, cruel man! will you not let me go? I'll forgive all that's past. Oh, heaven? you will not force me!

Lord T. Monster! dog! your life shall answer this.

[Draws, and runs at MELLEFONT; is held by

Lady T.

Lady T. Oh, my lord! hold, hold! for mercy's sake!

Mel. Confusion! my uncle! Oh, the cursed sorceress!

Lady T. Moderate your rage, good my lord; he's mad, alas! he's mad; indeed he is, my lord, and knows not what he does. See how wild he looks!

Mel. By heaven, 'twere senseless not to be mad, and see such witchcraft.

Lady T. My lord, you hear him; he talks idly.

Lord T. Hence from my sight, thou living infamy to my name! When next I see that face, I'll write villain in't with my sword's point.

Mel. Now, by my soul, I will not go till I have made known my wrongs; nay, till I have made known yours, which, if possible, are greater; though she has all the host of hell her servants.

Lady T. Alas! he raves, talks very poetry! For heaven's sake, away, my lord; he'll either tempt you to extravagance, or commit some himself.

Mel. Death and furies! will you not hear me? Why, she laughs, grins, points at you, makes you her mark of insult and derision.

[As Lady T. is going, she turns back and smiles at him.]

Lord T. I fear he's mad, indeed. Let's send Maskwell to him.

Mel. Send him to her.

Lady T. Come, come, good my lord; my heart aches so, I shall faint if I stay.

[Re-ent Lord and Lady T.]

Mel. Oh! I could curse my stars, fate, and chance; all causes and accidents of fortune in this life! But to what purpose? They talk of sending Maskwell to me; I never had more need of him. But what can he do? Imagination cannot form a fairer or more plausible design than this of his, which has miscarried. Oh, my precious aunt! I shall never thrive, without I deal with the devil or another woman.

*Women, like flames, have a destroying power,
 Ne'er to be quenched, till they themselves devour.*

[Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—The Gallery in Lord Touchwood's House.

Enter Lady TOUCHWOOD and MASKWELL.

Lady T. Was't not lucky?

Mask. Lucky! fortune is your own, and 'tis her interest so to be; I believe you can control her power, and she fears it; though chance brought my lord, 'twas your own art that turned it to advantage.

Lady T. 'Tis true, it might have been my ruin; but yonder's my lord; I believe he's coming to find you; I'll not be seen. [Exit.]

Mask. So! I durst not own my introducing my lord, though it succeeded well for her; for she would have suspected a design, which I should have been puzzled to excuse. My lord is thoughtful; I'll be so too; yet he shall know my thoughts, or think he does.

Enter Lord TOUCHWOOD.

What have I done?

Lord T. Talking to himself! [Aside.]

Mask. 'Twas honest; and shall I be rewarded for it? No, 'twas honest, therefore I sha'n't. Nay, rather, therefore I ought not; for it rewards itself.

Lord T. Unequaled virtue! [Aside.]

Mask. But should it be known, then I have lost a friend. He was an ill man, and I have gained; for half myself I lent him, and that I have recalled; so I have served myself; and what is better, I have served a worthy lord, to whom I owe myself.

Lord T. Excellent man! [Aside.]

Mask. Yet I am wretched. Oh! there is a secret burns within this breast, which, should it once blaze forth, would ruin all, consume my honest character, and brand me with the name of villain.

Lord T. Ha! [Aside.]

Mask. Oh! should it once be known I love fair Cynthia, all this that I have done would look like a rival's malice, false friendship to my lord, and base self-interest. Let me perish first, and from this hour avoid all sight and speech; and, if I can, all thought of that pernicious beauty.

[Seems to start at seeing Lord T.]

Lord T. Start not; let guilty and dishonest souls start at the revelation of their thoughts; but be thou fixed, as is thy virtue. Honest Maskwell, thy and my good genius led me hither; mine, in that I have discovered so much manly virtue; thine in that thou shalt have due reward of all thy worth. Give me thy hand; my nephew is the alone remaining branch of all our ancient family; him I thus blow away, and constitute thee in his room, to be my heir.

Mask. Now fate forbid—

Lord T. No more; I have resolved. The writings are ready drawn, and wanted nothing but to be signed, and have his name inserted; yours will fill the blank as well—I will have no reply. Let me command this time, for 'tis the last in which I will assume authority; hereafter, you shall rule where I have power.

Mask. I humbly would petition—

Lord T. Is't for yourself? [MASKWELL pauses.] I'll hear of naught for anybody else.

Mask. Then witness, heaven, for me, this wealth and honour was not of my seeking; nor would I build my fortune on another's ruin; I had but one desire.

Lord T. Thou shalt enjoy it. If all I'm worth in wealth or interest can purchase Cynthia, she is thine. I'm sure Sir Paul's consent will follow fortune; I'll quickly shew him which way that is going.

Mask. You oppress me with bounty.

Lord T. I will confirm it, and rejoice with thee.

[Exit.]

Mask. This is prosperous, indeed! Why, let him find me out a villain; settled in possession of a fair estate, and full fruition of my love, I'll bear the railings of a losing gamster. But should he find me out before! 'tis dangerous to delay. Let me think—Should my lord proceed to treat openly of my marriage with Cynthia, all will be discovered, and Mellefont can be no longer blinded. It must not be. Nay, should my lady know it—ay, then were fine work, indeed! her fury would spare nothing, though she involved herself in ruin. No, it must be by stratagem; I must deceive Mellefont once more, and get my lord to consent to my private management. He comes opportunely. Now will I, in my old way, discover the whole and real truth of the matter to him, that he may not suspect one word on't.

*No mask, like open truth, to cover lies;
As to go naked is the best disguise.*

Enter MELLEFONT.

Mel. Oh! Maskwell, what hopes? I am confounded in a maze of thoughts, each leading into one another, and all ending in perplexity. My uncle will not see nor hear me.

Mask. No matter, sir; don't trouble your head; all's in my power.

Mel. How, for heaven's sake?

Mask. Little do you think that your aunt has kept her word. How she wrought my lord into the dotage I know not; but he's gone to Sir Paul about my marriage with Cynthia, and has appointed me his heir.

Mel. The devil he has! What's to be done?

Mask. I have it: it must be by stratagem; for it's in vain to make application to him. I think I have that in my head that cannot fail. Where's Cynthia?

Mel. In the garden.

Mask. Let us go and consult her. My life for yours I cheat my lord. [Ereunt.]

Re-enter Lord and Lady TOUCHWOOD.

Lady T. Maskwell your heir, and marry Cynthia!

Lord T. I cannot do too much for so much merit.

Lady T. But this is a thing of too great moment to be suddenly resolved. Why, Cynthia? Why must he be married? Is there not reward enough in raising his low fortune, but he must mix his blood with mine, and wed my niece? How know you that my brother will consent, or she? Nay, he himself, perhaps, may have affections elsewhere.

Lord T. No; I am convinced he loves her.

Lady T. Maskwell love Cynthia? Impossible.

Lord T. I tell you he confessed it to me.

Lady T. Confusion! How's this? [Aside.]

Lord T. His humility long stifled his passion, and his love of Mellefont would have made him still conceal it; but, by encouragement, I wrung the secret from him; and know, he's no way to be rewarded but in her. I'll defer my further proceedings in it till you have considered it; but remember how we are both indebted to him. [Exit.]

Lady T. Both indebted to him! Yes, we are both indebted to him, if you knew all. Villain! Oh, I am wild with this surprise of treachery! it is impossible, it cannot be. He love Cynthia! What, have I been dupe to his designs; his property only? Now I see what made him false to Mellefont. What shall I do? How shall I think? I cannot think. All my designs are lost, my love unsated, my revenge unfinished, and fresh cause of fury from unthought-of plagues.

Enter Sir PAUL PLIANT.

Sir P. Madam—sister, my lady, sister! did you see my lady, my wife?

Lady T. Oh, torture!

Sir P. Gadsbud! I can't find her high nor low. Where can she be, think you?

Lady T. Where she's serving you as all your sex ought to be served, making you a beast. Don't you know that you're a fool, brother?

Sir P. A fool! ha, ha, ha! you're merry. No, no, not I; I know no such matter.

Lady T. Why, then, you don't know half your happiness.

Sir P. That's a jest, with all my heart, faith, and troth. But harkye! my lord told me something of things; I don't know what to make on't; gadsbud! I must consult my wife. He talks of disinheriting his nephew, and I don't know what. Look you, sister; I must know what my girl has to trust to, or not a syllable of a wedding, gadsbud! to shew you that I am not a fool.

Lady T. Hear me:—consent to the breaking off this marriage, and the promoting any other, without consulting me, and I'll renounce all blood, all relation, and concern with you for ever; nay, I'll be your enemy, and pursue you to destruction; I'll tear your eyes out, and tread you under my feet.

Sir P. Why, what's the matter now? Good Lord, what's all this for? Pho! here's a joke, indeed. Why, where's my wife?

Lady T. With Careless, fool! most likely.

Sir P. Oh, if she be with Mr. Careless, 'tis well enough.

Lady T. Fool, sot, insensible ox! But remember what I said to you, or you had better see my face no more; by this light, you had. [Exit.]

Sir P. You're a passionate woman, gadsbud! but, to say truth, all our family are choleric; I am the only peaceable person amongst 'em. [Exit.]

Re-enter MELLEFONT and MASKWELL, with CYNTHIA.

Mel. I know no other way but this he has proposed, if you have love enough to run the venture.

Cyn. I don't know whether I have love enough, but I find I have obstinacy enough to pursue whatever I have once resolved, and a true female courage to oppose anything that resists my will, though 'twere reason itself.

Mask. That's right. Well, I'll secure the writings, and run the hazard along with you.

Cyn. But how can the coach be got ready without suspicion?

Mask. Leave it to my care; that shall be so far from being suspected, that it shall be got ready by my lord's own order.

Mel. How?

Mask. Why, I intend to tell my lord the whole matter of our contrivance, that's my way.

Mel. I don't understand you.

Mask. Why, I'll tell my lord I laid this plot with you on purpose to betray you; and that which put me upon it, was the finding it impossible to gain the lady any other way but in the hopes of her marrying you.

Mel. So—

Mask. So! why so: while you're busied in making yourself ready, I'll wheedle her into the coach, and instead of you, borrow my lord's chaplain, and so run away with her myself.

Mel. Oh! I conceive you; you'll tell him so.

Mask. Tell him so! ay. Why, you don't think I mean to do so?

Mel. No, no. Ha, ha! I dare swear thou wilt not.

Mask. Therefore, for our further security, I would have you disguised like a parson, that, if my lord should have curiosity to peep, he may not discover you in the coach, but think the cheat is carried on as he would have it.

Mel. Excellent Maskwell!

Mask. Well, get yourselves ready, and meet me in half an hour, yonder in my lady's dressing-room; I'll send the chaplain to you with his robes; I have made him my own, and ordered him to meet us to-morrow morning at St. Alban's; there we will sum up this account to all our satisfactions.

Mel. Should I begin to thank or praise thee, I should waste the little time we have. [Exit.]

Mask. Madam, you will be ready?

Cyn. I will be punctual to the minute. [Going.]

Mask. Stay, I have a doubt. Upon second thoughts, we had better meet in the chaplain's chamber here; there is a back way into it, so that you need not come through this door, and a pair of private stairs leading down to the stables. It will be more convenient.

Cyn. I am guided by you; but Mellefont will mistake.

Mask. No, no; I'll after him immediately, and tell him. [Exit CYNTHIA.] Why, qui vult decipi decipiatur. 'Tis no fault of mine; I have told 'em in plain terms how easy 'tis for me to cheat 'em; and if they will not hear the serpent's hiss, they must be stung into experience and future caution. Now to prepare my lord to consent to this. But first, I must instruct my little Levite; he promised me 'to be within at this hour. Mr. Saygrace, Mr. Saygrace! [Goes to the chamber-door, and knocks.]

Say. [Within.] Sweet sir, I will but pen the last line of an acrostic, and be with you in the twinkling of an ejaculation, or before you can—

Mask. Nay, good Mr. Saygrace, do not prolong the time, by describing to me the shortness of your stay; rather, if you please, defer the finishing of your wit, and let us talk about our business; it shall be tithes in your way.

Enter SAYGRACE.

Say. You shall prevail; I would break off in the middle of a sermon to do you a pleasure.

Mask. You could not do me a greater, except the business in hand. Have you provided a habit for Mellefont?

Say. I have; it is ready in my chamber, together with clean starched band and cuffs.

Mask. Good. Let them be carried to him. Have you stitched the gown sleeve, that he may be puzzled, and waste time in putting it on?

Say. I have; the gown will not be endued without perplexity.

Mask. Meet me in half an hour, here in your own chamber. When Cynthia comes, let there be no light, and do not speak, that she may not distinguish you from Mellefont. I'll urge haste, to excuse your silence.

Say. You have no more commands?

Mask. None; your text is short.

Say. But pithy; and I will handle it with discretion. [Exit.]

Mask. It will be the first you have so served.

Re-enter Lord TOUCHWOOD.

Lord T. Sure, I was born to be controlled by those I should command! my very slaves will shortly give me rules how I shall govern them!

Mask. I am concerned to see your lordship discompos'd.

Lord T. Have you seen my wife lately, or dis-obliged her?

Mask. No, my lord. What can this mean? [Aside.]

Lord T. Then Mellefont has urged somebody to incense her. Something she has heard of you, which carries her beyond the bounds of patience.

Mask. This I feared. [Aside.] Did not your lordship tell her of the honours you designed me?

Lord T. Yes.

Mask. 'Tis that; you know my lady has a spirit; she thinks I am unworthy.

Lord T. Unworthy! 'tis an ignorant pride in her to think so. Honesty to me is true nobility. However, 'tis my will it shall be so, and that should be convincing to her as much as reason. I'll not be wife-ridden. Were it possible, it should be done this night.

Mask. Ha! he meets my wishes. [Aside.] Few things are impossible to willing minds.

Lord T. Instruct me how this may be done, and you shall see I want no inclination.

Mask. I had laid a small design for to-morrow, (as love will be inventing,) which I thought to communicate to your lordship; but it may be as well done to-night.

Lord T. Here's company; come this way, and tell me. [Exeunt.]

Re-enter CYNTHIA, with CARELESS.

Care. Is not that he, now gone out with my lord?

Cyn. I am convinced there's treachery. The confusion that I saw your father in, my Lady Touchwood's passion, with what imperfectly I overheard between my lord and her, confirm me in my fears. Where's Mellefont?

Care. Here he comes.

Re-enter MELLEFONT.

Cyn. Did Maskwell tell you anything of the chaplain's chamber?

Mel. No, my dear. Will you get ready? The things are all in my chamber; I want nothing but the habit.

Care. You are betrayed, and Maskwell is the villain I always thought him.

Cyn. When you were gone, he said his mind was changed, and bid me meet him in the chaplain's room, pretending immediately to follow you, and give you notice.

Care. There's Saygrace tripping by with a bundle under his arm. He cannot be ignorant that Maskwell means to use his chamber; let's in, and examine him.

Mel. 'Tis loss of time, I cannot think him false.

[Exeunt CARELESS and MELLEFONT.]

Re-enter Lord TOUCHWOOD.

Cyn. My lord musing!

[Aside.]

Lord T. He has a quick invention, if this were suddenly designed. Yet, he says, he had prepared my chaplain already.

Cyn. How's this? Now I fear, indeed. [Aside.]

Lord T. Cynthia here! Alone, fair cousin, and melancholy.

Cyn. Your lordship was thoughtful.

Lord T. My thoughts were on serious business, not worth your hearing.

Cyn. Mine were on treachery concerning you, and may be worth your hearing.

Lord T. Treachery concerning me! Pray be plain. What noise?

Mask. [Within.] Will you not hear me?

Lady T. [Within.] No, monster! traitor. No.

Cyn. My lady and Maskwell! This may be lucky. My lord, let me entreat you to stand behind this screen, and listen; perhaps this chance will give you proof of what you never could have believed from my suspicions.

[They retire behind the screen.]

Re-enter MASKWELL, and Lady TOUCHWOOD with a dagger.

Lady T. You want but leisure to invent fresh falsehood, and sooth me to a fond belief of all your fictions; but I will stab the lie that's forming in your heart, and save a sin in pity to your soul.

Mask. Strike, then, since you will have it so.

Lady T. Ha! a steady villain to the last.

Mask. Come, why do you dally with me thus?

Lady T. Thy stubborn temper shocks me, and you knew it would. This is cunning all; I know thee well; but thou shalt miss thy aim.

Mask. Ha, ha, ha!

Lady T. Ha! do you mock my rage? Then this shall punish your fond rash contempt. Again smile? And such a smile as speaks in ambiguity! Ten thousand meanings lurk in each corner of that various face; oh! that they were written in thy heart, that I with this might lay thee open to my sight. But then 'twill be too late to know—Thou hast, thou hast found the only way to turn my rage; too well thou knowest my jealous soul could never bear uncertainty. Speak, then, and tell me! Yet are you silent? Oh! I am bewildered in all passions! But thus my anger melts. [Weeps.] Here, take this poniard; for my very spirits faint, and I want strength to hold it; thou hast disarmed my soul. [Gives him the dagger.]

Mask. So, 'tis well; let your wild fury have a vent; and when you have temper tell me.

Lady T. Now, now, now I am calm, and can hear you.

Mask. Thanks, my invention; and now I have it for you. [Aside.] First, tell me what urged you to this violence? for your passion broke in such imperfect terms, that yet I am to learn the cause.

Lady T. My lord himself surprised me with the news, you were to marry Cynthia; that you had owned your love to him; and his indulgence would assist you to attain your ends.

Mask. I grant you, in appearance, all is true; I seemed consenting to my lord, nay, transported with the blessing; but could you think that I, who had been happy in your loved embraces, could e'er be fond of an inferior slavery?—No. Yet, though I dote on each last favour more than all the rest, though I would give a limb for every look you cheaply throw away on any other object of your love; yet, so far I prize your pleasures o'er my own, that all this seeming plot that I have laid, has been to gratify your taste, and cheat the world, to prove a faithful rogue to you.

Lady T. If this were true; but how can it be?

Mask. I have so contrived, that Mellefont will presently, in the chaplain's habit, wait for Cynthia in your dressing-room: but I have put the change upon her, that she may be otherwise employed. Do you muffle yourself, and meet him in her stead. You may go privately by the back stairs, and unperceived; there you may propose to reinstate him in his uncle's favour, if he'll comply with your desires. His case is desperate, and I believe he'll yield to any conditions; if not, here, take this; you may employ it better than in the heart of one, who is nothing when not yours. [Gives her the dagger.]

Lady T. Thou canst deceive everybody; nay, thou hast deceived me. But 'tis as I would wish. Trusty villain! I could worship thee.

Mask. No more. It wants but a few minutes of the time; and Mellefont's love will carry him there before his hour.

Lady T. I go, I fly, incomparable Maskwell!

[Erit.

Mask. So! This was a pinch indeed! My invention was upon the rack, and made discovery of her last plot. I hope Cynthia and my chaplain will be ready. I'll prepare for the expedition.

[Erit. CYNTHIA and Lord T. come forward.

Cyn. Now, my lord!

Lord T. Astonishment binds up my rage! Villany upon villany! Heavens! what a long track of dark deceit has this discovered. I am confounded when I look back, and want a clue to guide me through the various mazes of unheard-of treachery. My wife! oh, torture! my shame, my ruin!

Cyn. My lord, have patience; and be sensible how great our happiness is, that this discovery was not made too late.

Lord T. I thank you. Yet it may be still too late, if we don't presently prevent the execution of their plots. She'll think to meet him in that dressing-room; was't not so? And Maskwell will expect you in the chaplain's chamber. For once, I'll add my plot, too. Let us haste to find out, and inform my nephew; and do you, quickly as you can, bring all the company into this gallery. I'll expose the traitress and the villain. [Exeunt.

Re-enter Sir PAUL PLIANT, with Lord FROTH.

Lord F. By heavens! I have slept an age. Sir Paul, what o'clock is it? Past eight, on my conscience! My lady's in the most inviting couch, and a slumber there is the prettiest amusement!—But where's all the company?

Sir P. The company? Gadsbud! I don't know, my lord; but here's the strangest revolution! all turned topsy-turvy, as I hope for Providence!

Lord F. Oh, heavens! what's the matter?—Where's my wife?

Sir P. All turned topsy-turvy, as sure as a gun!

Lord F. How do you mean? My wife?

Sir P. The strangest posture of affairs!

Lord F. What, my wife?

Sir P. No, no; I mean the family.—Your lady! I saw her go into the garden with Mr. Brisk.

Lord F. How, where, when, what to do?

Sir P. I suppose they have been laying their heads together.

Lord F. How?

Sir P. Nay, only about poetry, I suppose, my lord: making couplets.

Lord F. Couplets!

Sir P. Oh! here they come.

Enter Lady FROTH and BRISK.

Brisk. My lord, your humble servant; Sir Paul, yours.—The finest night!

Lady F. My dear, Mr. Brisk and I have been star-gazing I don't know how long.

Sir P. Does it not tire your ladyship? Are you not weary with looking up?

Lady F. Oh! no; I love it violently. My dear, you're melancholy.

Lord F. No, my dear, I'm but just awake.

Lady F. Snuff some of my spirit of hartshorn.

Lord F. I've some of my own, thank you, my dear.

Lady F. Well, I swear, Mr. Brisk, you understand astronomy like an old Egyptian.

Brisk. Not comparable to your ladyship; you are the very Cynthia of the skies, and queen of stars.

Lady F. That's because I have no light, but what's by reflection from you, who are the sun.

Brisk. Madam, you have eclipsed me quite, let me perish! I can't answer that.

Lady F. No matter.—Harkye! shall you and I make an almanac together?

Brisk. With all my soul. Your ladyship has made me the man in't already, I'm so full of the wounds which you have given.

Lady F. Oh! finely taken! I swear now you are even with me. Oh, Parnassus! you have an infinite deal of wit.

Sir P. So he has, gadsbud! and so has your ladyship.

Re-enter CARELESS and CYNTHIA, with Lady PLIANT.

Lady P. You tell me most surprising things.—Bless me! who would ever trust a man? Oh! my heart aches for fear they should be all deceitful alike. Care. You need not fear, madam; you have charms to fix inconstancy itself.

Lady P. Oh, dear! you make me blush.

Lord F. Come, my dear, shall we take leave of my lord and lady?

Cyn. They'll wait upon your lordship presently.

Lady F. Mr. Brisk, my coach shall set you down.

[Lady TOUCHWOOD shrieks from within.

All. What's the matter?

Lady TOUCHWOOD, muffled up, runs in affrighted; followed by Lord TOUCHWOOD, dressed like a parson, with a dagger in his hand.

Lady T. Oh! I'm betrayed.—Save me! help me!

Lord T. Now what evasion, wicked woman?

Lady T. Stand off! let me go! [Erit.

Lord T. Go, and thy own infamy pursue thee! You stare, as you were all amazed. I don't wonder at it; but too soon you will know mine, and that woman's shame. [Throws off his gown.

Re-enter MELLEFONT, disguised in a parson's habit, with two Servants, bringing in MASKWELL.

Mel. Nay, by heaven! you shall be seen. [To MASKWELL.] Careless, your hand. Do you hold down your head? [To MASKWELL.] Yes, I am your chaplain. Look in the face of your injured friend, thou wonder of all falsehood!

[Throws off his disguise.

Lord T. Are you silent, monster?

Mel. Good heavens! how I believed and loved this man! Take him hence, for he's a disease to my sight.

Lord T. Secure the manifold villain.

[Servants take MASKWELL off.

Care. Miracle of ingratitude!

Sir P. Oh! Providence, Providence, what discoveries are here!

Brisk. This is all very surprising, let me perish!

Lady F. You know I told you Saturn looked a little more angry than usual.

Lord T. We'll think of punishment at leisure. But let me hasten to do justice, in rewarding virtue and wronged innocence. Nephew, I hope I have your pardon, and Cynthia's.

Mel. We are your lordship's creatures.

Lord T. And be each other's comfort. Let me join your hands. Uninterrupted bliss attend you both! May circling joys tread round each happy year of your long lives!

*Let secret villany from hence be warn'd,
How'er in private mischiefs are conceiv'd,
Torture and shame attend their open birth.
Like vipers in the breast, base treachery lies,
Still gnawing that whence first it did arise;
No sooner born, but the vile parent dies.*

[Exeunt.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—Valentine's Lodgings.

VALENTINE discovered reading; JEREMY waiting.
Several books upon the table.

Val. Jeremy!

Jer. Sir?

Val. Here, take away; I'll walk a turn, and digest what I have read. [Rises.]

Jer. You'll grow devilish fat upon this paper diet! [Aside, and taking away the books.]

Val. And, d'y'e hear? go you to breakfast: there's a page doubled down in Epictetus, that is a feast for an emperor.

Jer. Was Epictetus a real cook, or did he only write receipts?

Val. Read, read, sirrah, and refine your appetite; learn to live upon instruction; feast your mind, and mortify your flesh. Read, and take your nourishment in at your eyes; shut up your mouth, and chew the cud of understanding: so Epictetus advises.

Jer. Oh, lord! I have heard much of him, when I waited upon a gentleman at Cambridge. Pray, what was that Epictetus?

Val. A very rich man—not worth a groat.

Jer. Humph! and so he has made a very fine feast, where there is nothing to be eaten?

Val. Yes.

Jer. Sir, you're a gentleman, and probably understand this fine feeding; but, if you please, I had rather be at board-wages. Does your Epictetus, or your Seneca here, or any of these poor rich rogues, teach you how to pay your debts without money? will they shut up the mouths of your creditors? will Plato be bail for you? or Diogenes, because he understands confinement, and lived in a tub, go to prison for you? 'Slife! sir, what do you mean, to mew yourself up here with three or four musty books, in commendation of starving and poverty?

Val. Why, sirrah, I have no money, you know it; and therefore resolve to rail at all that have; and in that I but follow the examples of the wisest and wittiest men in all ages—these poets and philosophers, whom you naturally hate, for just such another reason; because they abound in sense, and you are a fool.

Jer. Ay, sir, I am a fool, I know it; and yet, heaven help me! I'm poor enough to be a wit. But I was always a fool, when I told you what your expenses would bring you to; your coaches and your liveries; your treats and your balls; your being in love with a lady, that did not care a farthing for you in your prosperity; and keeping company with wits, that cared for nothing but your prosperity, and now when you are poor, hate you as much as they do one another.

Val. Well! and now I am poor, I have an opportunity to be revenged on them all; I'll pursue Angelica with more love than ever, and appear more notoriously her admirer in this restraint, than when I openly rivalled the rich fops that made court to her. So shall my poverty be a mortification to her pride, and perhaps make her compassionate the love, which has principally reduced me to this lowliness of fortune. And for the wits, I'm sure I am in a condition to be even with them.

Jer. Nay, your condition is pretty even with theirs, that's the truth on't.

Val. I'll take some of their trade out of their hands.

Jer. Now heaven of mercy continue the tax upon paper! You don't mean to write?

Val. Yes, I do; I'll write a play

Jer. Hem! Sir, if you please to give me a small certificate of three lines; only to certify those to whom it may concern, "That the bearer hereof, Jeremy Fetch by name, has, for the space of seven years, truly and faithfully served Valentine Legend, esquire; and that he is not now turned away for any misdemeanor, but does voluntarily dismiss his master from any future authority over him."

Val. No, sirrah! you shall live with me still.

Jer. Sir, it's impossible; I may die with you, starve with you, or be damned with your works: but to live, even three days, the life of a play, I no more expect it, than to be canonized for a muse after my decease.

Val. You are witty, you rogue; I shall want your help. I'll have you learn to make couplets, to tag to the end of acts. D'ye hear? get the maids to crambo in an evening, and learn the knack of rhyming; you may arrive at the height of a song sent by an unknown hand, or a chocolate-house lampoon.

Jer. But, sir, is this the way to recover your father's favour? Why, Sir Sampson will be irreconcilable. If your younger brother should come from sea, he'd never look upon you again. You're undone, sir; you're ruined; you won't have a friend left in the world, if you turn poet: I never think of the trade but the spirit of famine appears to me; sometimes like a decayed porter, worn out with pimping, and carrying billet-doux and songs; not like other porters, for hire, but for the jest's sake: now like a thin chairman, melted down to half his proportion, with carrying a poet upon tick, to visit some great fortune; and his fare to be paid him, like the wages of sin, either at the day of marriage, or the day of death.

Enter SCANDAL.

Scand. What! Jeremy holding forth?

Val. The rogue has (with all the wit he could muster up) been declaiming against wit.

Scand. Ay! Why, then, I'm afraid Jeremy has wit: for wherever it is, it's always contriving its own ruin.

Jer. Why so I have been telling my master, sir. Mr. Scandal, for heaven's sake! sir, try if you can dissuade him from turning poet.

Scand. Poet! he shall turn soldier first, and rather depend upon the outside of his head, than the lining! Why, what the devil! has not your poverty made you enemies enough? must you needs shew your wit to get more?

Jer. Ay, more indeed; for who cares for anybody that has more wit than himself?

Scand. Jeremy speaks like an oracle. Don't you see how worthless great men and dull rich rogues avoid a witty man of small fortune? Why he looks, like a writ of inquiry, into their titles and estates; and seems commissioned by heaven to seize the better half.

Val. Therefore, I would rail in my writings, and be revenged.

Scand. Rail! at whom? the whole world? Impotent and vain! Who would die a martyr to sense, in a country where religion is folly? You may stand at bay for a while; but, when the full cry is against you, you sha'n't have fair play for your life. If you can't be fairly run down by the hounds, you will be treacherously shot by the huntsman. No; turn flatterer, quack, lawyer, anything but a poet: a modern poet is worse, more servile, timorous, and fawning, than any I have named; without you could retrieve the ancient honours of the name, recall the stage of Athens, and be allowed the force of open honest satire.

Val. You are as inveterate against our poets, as if your character had been lately exposed upon the stage. Nay, I am not violently bent upon the trade. [A knock.] Jeremy, see who's there. [Exit JEREMY.] But tell me what you would have me do? What does the world say of me, and my forced confinement?

Scand. The world behaves itself, as it uses to do on such occasions. Some pity you, and condemn your father; others excuse him, and blame you. Only, the ladies are merciful, and wish you well; since love and pleasurable expense have been your greatest faults

Re-enter JEREMY.

Val. How now?

Jer. Nothing new, sir. I have despatched some half a dozen duns with as much dexterity as a hungry judge does causers at dinner-time.

Val. What answer have you given them?

Scand. Patience, I suppose—the old receipt?

Jer. No, faith, sir: I have put them off so long with patience and forbearance, and other fair words, that I was forced to tell them in plain downright English—

Val. What?

Jer. That they should be paid.

Val. When?

Jer. To-morrow.

Val. And how the devil do you mean to keep your word?

Jer. Keep it? not at all: it has been so very much stretched, that I reckon it will break of course by to-morrow, and nobody be surprised at the matter! [Knocking.] Again! Sir, if you don't like my negotiation, will you be pleased to answer these yourself?

Val. See who they are. [Exit JEREMY.] By this, Scandal, you may see what it is to be great. Secretaries of state, presidents of the council, and generals of an army, lead just such a life as I do; have just such crowds of visitants in a morning, all soliciting of past promises; which are but a civil sort of duns, that lay claim to voluntary debts.

Re-enter JEREMY.

Jer. Oh! sir, there's Trapland, the scrivener, with two suspicious fellows, like lawful footpads, that would knock a man down with pocket tipstaves; and there's your father's steward; and the nurse, with one of your children, from Twit'nam.

Val. Plague on her! could she find no other time to fling my sins in my face? Here! give her this, [Gives money.] and bid her trouble me no more: bid Mr. Trapland come in. If I can give that Cerberus a sop, I shall be at rest for one day.

[Exit JEREMY.]

Re-enter JEREMY, with TRAPLAND.

Oh! Mr. Trapland, my old friend, welcome! Jeremy, a chair quickly; a bottle of sack and a toast. Fly—a chair first.

[Exit JEREMY.]

Trap. A good morning to you, Mr. Valentine; and to you, Mr. Scandal.

Scand. The morning's a very good morning, if you don't spoil it.

Val. Come, sit you down: you know his way.

Trap. [Sits.] There is a debt, Mr. Valentine, of fifteen hundred pounds, of pretty long standing—

Val. I cannot talk about business with a thirsty palate. Sirrah! the sack.

Re-enter JEREMY, with wine, &c.

Trap. And I desire to know what course you have taken for the payment.

Val. Faith and troth, I am heartily glad to see you. My service to you! fill, fill, to honest Mr. Trapland—fuller!

Trap. Hold! sweetheart, this is not to our business. My service to you, Mr. Scandal! [Drinks.] I have forborne as long—

Val. T'other glass, and then we'll talk. Fill, Jeremy.

Trap. No more, in truth. I have forborne, I say—

Val. And how does your handsome daughter?—Come, a good husband to her. [Drinks.]

Trap. Thank you—I have been out of this money—

Val. Drink first. Scandal, why do you not drink? [They drink.]

Trap. And, in short, I can be put off no longer.

Val. I was much obliged to you for your supply: it did me signal service in my necessity. But you delight in doing good. Scandal, drink to me my friend Trapland's health. An honest man lives not, nor one more ready to serve his friend in distress; though I say it to his face. Come, fill each man his glass.

Scand. What! I know Trapland has been a wench, and loves a girl still. You never knew a wench, that was not an honest fellow.

Trap. Fie! Mr. Scandal, you never knew—

Scand. What don't I know? I know the buxom black widow in the Poultry—eight hundred pounds a-year jointure, and twenty thousand pounds in money. Ha, ha! old Trap!

Val. Say you so, i'faith? Come, we'll remember the widow; I know whereabouts you are; come, to the widow.

Trap. No more, indeed.

Val. What! the widow's health? off with it. [They drink.] A lovely girl, i'faith, black sparkling eyes, soft pouting ruby lips! Better sealing there, than a bond for a million, eh?

Trap. Ha, ha, ha! Verily, give me a glass. You're a wag; and here's to the widow. [Drinks.]

Scand. He begins to chuckle; ply him close, or he'll relapse into a dun. [Exit JEREMY.]

Enter SNAP.

Snap. By your leave, gentlemen. Mr. Trapland, if we must do our office, tell us. We have half a dozen gentlemen to arrest in Pall-mall and Covent-garden; and if we don't make haste, the chairmen will be abroad, and block up the chocolate-houses; and then our labour's lost.

Re-enter JEREMY.

Trap. Odso! that's true. Mr. Valentine, I love mirth; but business must be done; are you ready to—

Jer. Sir, your father's steward says he comes to make proposals concerning your debts.

[Exit JEREMY.]

Val. Bid him come in: Mr. Trapland, send away your officer; you shall have an answer presently.

Trap. Mr. Snap, stay within call. [Exit SNAP.]

Enter JEREMY and Steward, who whispers VALENTINE.

Scand. Here's a dog now, a traitor in his wine! Sirrah! refund the sack; Jeremy, fetch him some warm water; or I'll rip up his stomach, and go the shortest way to his conscience.

Trap. Mr. Scandal, you are uncivil. I did not value your sack; but you cannot expect it again, when I have drunk it.

Scand. And how do you expect to have your money again, when a gentleman has spent it?

Val. You need say no more. I understand the conditions; they are very hard, but my necessity is very pressing: I agree to them. Take Mr. Trapland with you, and let him draw the writing. Mr. Trapland, you know this man; he shall satisfy you.

Trap. Sincerely, I am loth to be thus pressing; but my necessity—

Val. No apology, Mr. Scrivener; you shall be paid.

Trap. I hope you forgive me: my business requires—

[Exeunt TRAPLAND, Steward, and JEREMY.]

Scand. He begs pardon, like a hangman at an execution.

Val. But I have got a reprieve.

Scand. I am surprised. What! does your father relent?

Val. No; he has sent me the hardest conditions in the world. You have heard of a booby brother of mine, that was sent to sea, three years ago? This brother, my father hears, is landed; whereupon, he very affectionately sends me word, if I will make a deed of conveyance of my right to his estate, after his death, to my younger brother, he will immediately furnish me with four thousand pounds, to pay my debts and make my fortune. This was once proposed before, and I refused it; but the present impatience of my creditors for their money, and my own impatience of confinement, and absence from Angelica, force me to consent.

Scand. A very desperate demonstration of your love to Angelica! and, I think, she has never given you any assurance of hers.

Val. You know her temper; she never gave me any great reason either of hope or despair.

Scand. Women of her airy temper, as they seldom think before they act, so they rarely give us any light to guess at what they mean. But you have little reason to believe that a woman of this age, who has had an indifference for you in your prosperity, will fall in love with your ill fortune. Besides, Angelica has a great fortune of her own; and great fortunes either expect another great fortune, or a fool.

Re-enter JEREMY.

Jer. More misfortunes, sir!

Val. What! another dun?

Jer. No, sir; but Mr. Tattle is come to wait upon you.

Val. Well, I can't help it; you must bring him up; he knows I don't go abroad. [Exit JEREMY.]

Scand. Plague on him, I'll begone.

Val. No, prythee, stay: Tattle and you should never be asunder; you are light and shadow, and shew one another. He is perfectly thy reverse, both in humour and understanding; and as you set up for defamation, he is a member of defamations.

Scand. A mender of reputations! ay, just as he is a keeper of secrets; another virtue that he sets up for in the same manner. For the rogue will speak aloud, in the posture of a whisper; and deny a woman's name, while he gives you the marks of her person: he will forswear receiving a letter from her, and, at the same time, shew you her hand in the superscription; and yet, perhaps, he has counterfeited the hand, too, and sworn to a truth. In short, he is a public professor of secrecy, and makes proclamation that he holds private intelligence. He is here.

Enter TATTLE.

Tat. Valentine, good morrow: Scandal, I am your's—that is, when you speak well of me.

Scand. That is, when I am your's: for while I am my own, or anybody's else, that will never happen.

Tat. How inhuman!

Val. Why, Tattle, you need not be much concerned at anything that he says: for to converse with Scandal, is to play at Losing Loadum; you must lose a good name to him, before you can win it for yourself.

Tat. But how barbarous that is, and how unfortunate for him, that the world should think the better of any person for his calumnation! I thank heaven, it has always been a part of my character to handle the reputations of others very tenderly, indeed.

Scand. Ay, such rotten reputations as you have to deal with, are to be handled tenderly, indeed.

Tat. Nay, why rotten? why should you say rotten, when you know not the persons of whom you speak? How cruel that is!

Scand. Not know them? Why thou never hadst to do with any one that was not common to all the town.

Tat. Ha, ha, ha! nay, now you make a jest of it, indeed. For there is nothing more known, than that nobody knows anything of that nature of me. As I hope to be saved, Valentine, I never exposed a woman, since I knew what woman was.

Val. And yet you have conversed with several?

Tat. To be free with you, I have; I don't care if I own that; nay, more, (I'm going to say a bold word, now,) I never could meddle with a woman, that had to do with anybody else.

Scand. How!

Tat. Nay, faith! I'm apt to believe him; except her husband, Tattle.

Tat. Oh! that—

Scand. What think you of that noble commoner, Mrs. Drab?

Tat. Pooh! I know Madam Drab has made her brags in three or four places, that I said this and that, and writ to her, and did I know not what—but, upon my reputation, she did me wrong. Well, well! that was malice; but I know the bottom of it. She was bribed to that by one we all know—a man, too—only to bring me into disgrace with a certain woman of quality—

Scand. Whom we all know.

Tat. No matter for that. Yes, yes; everybody knows! no doubt on't, everybody knows my secrets! But I soon satisfied the lady of my innocence; for I told her: "Madam, (says I,) there are some persons who make it their business to tell stories, and say this and that of one and the other, and everything in the world; and, (says I,) if your grace—

Scand. Grace!

Tat. Oh, lord! what have I said? My unlucky tongue!

Val. Ha, ha, ha!

Scand. Why, Tattle, thou hast more impudence than one can in reason expect: I shall have an esteem for thee. Well, and—ha, ha, ha! well, go on; and what did you say to her grace?

Val. I confess this is something extraordinary.

Tat. Not a word, as I hope to be saved; an arrant lapis linguae! Come, let us talk of something else.

Val. Well! but how did you acquit yourself?

Tat. Pooh, pooh! nothing at all; I only rallied with you. A woman of ordinary rank was a little jealous of me, and I told her something or other, faith! I know not what. Come, let's talk of something else. [Hums a song.]

Scand. Hang him! let him alone; he has a mind we should inquire.

Tat. Valentine, I supped last night with your mistress, and her uncle, old Foresight: I think your father lies at Foresight's.

Val. Yes.

Tat. Upon my soul, Angelica's a fine woman! And so is Mrs. Foresight, and her sister, Mrs. Frail.

Scand. Yes; Mrs. Frail is a very fine woman; we all know her.

Tat. Oh! that is not fair.

Scand. What?

Tat. To tell—

Scand. To tell what? Why, what do you know of Mrs. Frail?

Tat. Who, I? Upon honour, I don't know whether she be a man or a woman; but by the smoothness of her chin, and roundness of her hips.

Scand. No!

Tat. No.

Scand. She says otherwise.

Tat. Impossible!

Scand. Yes, faith! Ask Valentine else.

Tat. Why, then, as I hope to be saved, I believe a woman only obliges a man to secrecy, that she may have the pleasure of telling herself.

Scand. No doubt on't. Well, but has she done you wrong or no? You have succeeded with her, eh?

Tat. Though I have more honour than to tell first, I have more manners than to contradict what a lady has declared.

Scand. Well, you own it?

Tat. I am strangely surprised! Yes, yes; I cannot deny it, if she taxes me with it.

Scand. She'll be here by-and-by; she sees Valentine every morning.

Tat. How?

Val. She does me the favour—I mean, of a visit sometimes. I did not think she had granted more to anybody.

Scand. Nor I, faith! But Tattle does not use to belie a lady; it is contrary to his character. How one may be deceived in a woman, Valentine!

Tat. Nay, what do you mean, gentlemen?

Scand. I'm resolved I'll ask her.

Tat. Oh, barbarous! Why did you not tell me—

Scand. No; you told us.

Tat. And bid me ask Valentine?

Val. What did I say? I hope you won't bring me to confess an answer, when you never asked me the question.

Tat. But, gentlemen, this is the most inhuman proceeding—

Val. Nay, if you have known Scandal thus long, and cannot avoid such a palpable decoy as this was; the ladies have a fine time, whose reputations are in your keeping.

Re-enter JEREMY

Jer. Sir, Mrs. Frail has sent to know if you are stirring.

Val. Shew her up when she comes. [Exit JEREMY.]

Tat. I'll begone.

Val. You'll meet her.

Tat. Is there not a back way?

Val. If there were, you have more discretion than to give Scandal such an advantage; why, your running away will prove all that he can tell her.

Tat. Scandal, you will not be so ungenerous. Oh! I shall lose my reputation of secrecy for ever. I shall never be received but upon public days; and my visits will never be admitted beyond a drawing-room: I shall never see a bed-chamber again, never be locked in a closet, nor run behind a screen, or under a table; never be distinguished among the waiting-women by the name of trusty Mr. Tattle more. You will not be so cruel?

Val. Scandal, have pity on him; he'll yield to any conditions.

Tat. Any, any terms!

Scand. Come, then, sacrifice half a dozen women of good reputation to me presently. Come, where are you familiar? And see that they are women of quality, too; the first quality.

Tat. 'Tis very hard. Won't a baronet's lady pass?

Scand. No; nothing under a right honourable.

Tat. Oh, inhuman? You don't expect their names?

Scand. No, their titles shall serve.

Tat. Alas! that is the same thing! Pray spare me their titles; I'll describe their persons.

Scand. Well, begin, then. But take notice, if you are so ill a painter, that I cannot know the person by your picture of her, you must be condemned, like other bad painters, to write the name at the bottom.

Tat. Well, first, then—

Mrs. F. [Within.] No, no; bid them wait.

Tat. Oh, unfortunate! she's come already. Will you have patience till another time? I'll double the number.

Scand. Well, on that condition—Take heed you don't fail me.

Enter Mrs. FRAIL.

Mrs. F. I shall get a fine reputation, by coming to see fellows in a morning! Scandal, you devil, are you here, too? Oh! Mr. Tattle, everything is safe with you, we know.

Scand. Tattle!

Tat. Mum—Oh! madam, you do me too much honour.

Val. Well, Lady Galloper, how does Angelica?

Mrs. F. Angelica? Manners!

Val. What, you will allow an absent lover—

Mrs. F. No; I'll allow a lover present with his mistress to be particular; but, otherwise, I think his passion ought to give place to his manners.

Val. But what if he has more passion than manners?

Mrs. F. Then let him marry, and reform.

Val. Marriage, indeed, may qualify the fury of his passion; but it very rarely amends a man's manners.

Mrs. F. You are the most mistaken in the world; there is no creature perfectly civil, but a husband: for in a little time, he grows only rude to his wife; and that is the highest good breeding, for it begets his civility to other people. Well, I'll tell you news; but I suppose you heard your brother Benjamin is landed; and my brother Foresight's daughter is come out of the country: I assure you, there's a match talked of by the old people. Well, if he be but as great a sea beast, as she is a land monster, we shall have a most amphibious breed; the progeny will be all otters: he has been bred at sea; and she has never been out of the country.

Val. Plague take them! their conjunction bodes no good, I'm sure.

Mrs. F. Now you talk of conjunction, my brother Foresight has cast both their nativities, and prognosticates an admiral, and an eminent justice of the peace, to be the issue male of their two bodies. 'Tis the most superstitious old fool! He would have persuaded me that this was an unlucky day, and would not let me come abroad: but I invented a dream, and sent him to Artemidorus for interpretation, and so stole out to see you. Well, and what will you give me now? what will you give me, Mr. Tattle?

Tat. I? My soul, madam.

Mrs. F. Pooh! no, I thank you; I have enough to do to take care of my own. Well; but I'll come and see you one of these mornings: I hear you have a great many pictures.

Tat. I have a pretty good collection at your service; some originals.

Scand. Hang him! he has nothing but the Seasons, and the Twelve Cæsars, paltry copies; and the Five Senses, as ill-represented as they are in himself; and he himself is the only original you will see there.

Mrs. F. Ay, but I hear he has a closet of beauties.

Scand. Yes; all that have done him favours, if you will believe him.

Mrs. F. Ay! let me see those, Mr. Tattle.

Tat. Oh! madam, those are sacred to love and contemplation. No man but the painter and myself was ever blest with the sight.

Mrs. F. Well, but a woman—

Tat. Nor woman, till she consented to have her picture there, too; for then she is obliged to keep the secret.

Scand. No, no! come to me if you'd see pictures.

Mrs. F. You?

Scand. Yes, faith! I can shew you your own picture, and most of your acquaintance, to the life, and as like as at Kneller's.

Mrs. F. Oh! lying creature! Valentine, does not he lie? I can't believe a word he says.

Val. No, indeed; he speaks truth now; for, as Tattle has pictures of all that has granted him favours, he has the pictures of all that has refused him; if satires, characters, and lampoons are pictures.

Scand. Yes; mine are most in black and white; and yet there are some set out in their true colours, both men and women. I can shew you pride, folly, affectation, wantonness, inconstancy, covetousness, dissimulation, malice, and ignorance, all in one piece. Then, I can shew you lying, foppishness, vanity, cowardice, bragging, and ugliness, in another piece: and yet one of these is a celebrated beauty, and t'other a professed beau. I have some hieroglyphics, too.

Mrs. F. Come, let's hear them.

Scand. I have a lawyer with a hundred hands, two heads, and but one face; a divine, with two faces, and one head; and I have a soldier, with his brains in his belly, and his heart where his head should be.

Tat. And no head?

Scand. No head.

Mrs. F. Pooh! this is all invention. Well, I'll come, if it be but to disprove you.

Re-enter JEREMY.

Jer. Sir, here's the steward again from your father.

Nat. I'll come to him. [Exit JEREMY.] Will you give me leave? I'll wait on you again presently.

Mrs. F. No; I'll begone. Come, who squares me to the Exchange? I must call on my sister Foresight there.

Scand. I will: I have a mind to your sister.

Mrs. F. Civil!

Nat. [To Mrs. FRAIL.] I will; because I have a tender for your ladyship.

Mrs. F. That's somewhat the better reason, to my opinion. [Exeunt Mrs. FRAIL and TARTLE.

Nat. Tell Angelica I am about making hard conditions to come abroad, and be at liberty to see her.

Scand. I'll give an account of you and your proceedings. If indiscretion be a sign of love, you are the most a lover of anybody that I know. You fancy that parting with your estate will help you to your mistress; in my mind, he is a thoughtless adventurer.

Who hopes to purchase wealth by selling land;

Or win a mistress with a living hand. [Exeunt.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Room in Foresight's House.

Enter FORESIGHT and JAMES.

For. Heyday! What are all the women of my family abroad? Is not my wife come home? nor my sister, nor my daughter?

James. No, sir.

For. Mercy on us! what can be the meaning of it? Sure, the moon is in all her fortitudes! Is my niece Angelica at home?

James. Yes, sir.

For. I believe you lie, sir.

James. Sir?

For. I say, you lie, sir. It is impossible that anything should be as I would have it; for I was born, sir, when the crab was ascending; and all my affairs go backward.

James. I can't tell, indeed, sir.

For. No, I know you can't, sir; but I can tell, and foretell, sir.

Enter Nurse.

Nurse, where's your young mistress?

Nurse. Wee'st heart! I know not; they're none of them come home yet. Poor child! I warrant she's fond of seeing the town! Marry, pray heaven, they have given her any dinner! Good lack-a-day! ha, ha, ha! Oh, strange! I'll vow and swear now, ha, ha, ha! Marry, and did you ever see the like?

For. Why, how now! what's the matter?

Nurse. Pray heaven send your worship good luck! marry, and amen, with all my heart! for you have put on one stocking with the wrong side outward.

For. Ha! how? Faith and troth, I'm glad of it! and so I have; that may be good luck, in troth; in troth, it may, very good luck! nay, I have had some omens. I got out of bed backwards, too, this morning, without premeditation; pretty good that, too. But, then, I stumbled coming down stairs, and met a weasel; bad omens those! Some bad, some good;

ACT. DRAWA.—NOS. 109 & 110.

our lives are chequered, mirth and sorrow, woe and plenty, night and day, make up our time. But, in troth, I am pleased at my stocking—very well pleased at my stocking! Oh! here's my niece! Sirrah, go tell Sir Sampson Legend I'll wait on him, if he's at leisure. [Exit JAMES.] 'Tis now three o'clock, a very good hour for business; Mercury governs this hour.

Enter ANGELICA.

Ang. Is it not a good hour for pleasure, too, uncle? Pray lend me your coach; mine's gone to be mended.

For. What, would you be gadding now? Sure, all females are mad to-day. It is of evil portent, and bodes mischief to the master of a family. I remember an old prophecy, written by Meschalah, the Arabian, and thus translated by a reverend Buckinghamshire bard:

When housewives all the house furnish,
And leave good men to brew and bake,
Withouther gulls, then he it shall,
That house with wand upon its head;
And when the head is set in ground,
No mar! if it be fruitful found.

Fruitful! the head fruitful! that bodes horns; the fruit of the head is horns! Dear niece, stay at home; for by the head of the house, is meant the husband; the prophecy needs no explanation.

Ang. Well, but I can neither make you a cuckold, uncle, by going abroad, nor secure you from being one, by staying at home.

For. Yes, yes: while there's one woman left, the prophecy is not in full force.

Ang. But my inclinations are in force. I have a mind to go abroad; and if you won't lend me your coach, I'll take a hackney, or a chair. Why don't you keep your wife at home, if you are jealous of her when she's abroad? You know my aunt is a little retrograde (as you call it) in her nature. Uncle, I'm afraid you are not lord of the ascendant! Ha, ha, ha!

For. Well, pill-fitter! you are very pert; and always ridiculing that celestial science.

Ang. Nay, uncle, don't be angry. If you are, I'll reap up all your false prophecies, ridiculous dreams, and idle divinations. I'll swear you are a nuisance to the neighbourhood. What a bustle did you keep against the last invisible eclipse, laying in provision, as it were for a siege! What a world of fire and candle, matches and tinder-boxes, did you purchase! One would have thought we were ever after to live under ground; or, at least, to make a voyage to Greenland, to inhabit there all the dark season. Indeed, uncle, I'll invite you for a wizard.

For. How, hussy! was there ever such a provoking mix?

Nurse. Oh! merciful father, how she talks!

Ang. Yes, I can make oath of your unlawful midnight practices! you and the old nurse there.

Nurse. Marry, heaven defend! I at midnight practices! Oh, lord! what's here to do? I in unlawful doings with my master's worship! Why, did you ever hear the like now? Sir, did ever I do anything but warm your bed, and buck you up, and set the candle and your tobacco-box by you, and now and then rub the soles of your feet? Oh, lord! I—

Ang. Yes, I saw you together, through the key-hole of the closet, one night, like Saul and the witch of Endor, turning the sieve and shears, and pricking your thumbs to write poor innocent servants' names in blood, about a little nutmeg-grater which she had forgot in the caudle-cup.

For. I defy you, hussy! but I'll remember this. I'll be revenged on you, cockatrice! I'll hamper you! You have your fortune in your own hands! But I'll find a way to make your lover, your prodigal spendthrift gallant, Valentine, pay for all, I will. I will have patience, since it is the will of the stars that I should be thus tormented; this is the effect of the malicious conjunctions and oppositions in the third house of my nativity; there the curse of kindred was foretold. But I will have my doors locked up; I'll punish you; not a man shall enter my house.

Ang. Do, uncle; lock them up quickly, before my aunt comes home; you'll have a letter for all-mo-to-morrow morning! But let me begone first; and then let no mankind come near the house: but converse with spirits and the celestial signs; the bull, and the ram, and the goat. Bless me! there are a great many horned beasts among the twelve signs, uncle! But cuckolds go to heaven!

For. But there's but one virgin among the twelve signs, spitfire! but one virgin!

Ang. Nor there had not been that one, if she had had to do with anything but astrologers, uncle! That makes my aunt go abroad.

For. How, how! is that the reason? Come, you know something; tell me, and I'll forgive you; do, good niece. Come, you shall have my coach and horses; faith and troth, you shall. Does my wife complain? Come, I know women tell one another.

Ang. Ha, ha, ha!

For. Do you laugh? Well, gentlewoman, I'll—But, come, be a good girl; don't perplex your poor uncle! Tell me—Won't you speak? Od! I'll—

Enter JAMES.

James. Sir Sampson is coming to wait upon you, sir.

Ang. Good b'ye, uncle. Call me a chair. I'll find out my aunt, and tell her she must not come home.

For. I am so perplexed and vexed, I am not fit to receive him; I shall scarce recover myself before the hour be past. Go, nurse, and bid them tell Sir Sampson I'm ready to wait on him.

Nurse. Yes, sir.

For. Well—why, if I were born to be a cuckold, there's no more to be said! He is here already.

Enter Sir SAMPSON LEGEND, with a paper.

Sir S. Nor no more to be done, old boy; that is plain—here it is, I have it in my hand, old Ptolemy; I'll make the ungracious prodigal know who begat him; I will, old Nostrodamus. What, I warrant, my son thought nothing belonged to a father but forgiveness and affection; no authority, no correction, no arbitrary power; nothing to be done, but for him to offend, and me to pardon! I warrant you, if he danc'd till doomsday, he thought I were to pay the piper. Well, but here it is under black and white, signatum, sigillatum, and deliberatum—that, as soon as my son Benjamin is arrived, he is to make over to him his right of inheritance. Where's my daughter that is to be, eh! old Merlin? Body of me! I'm so glad I'm revenged on this undutiful rogue!

For. Ods! let me see; let me see the paper. Ay, faith and troth, here it is, if it will but hold; I wish things were done, and the conveyance made.

When was this signed? what hour? Ods! you should have consulted me for the time. Well, but we'll make haste.

Sir S. Haste! ay, ay, haste enough; my son Ben will be in town to-night; I have ordered my lawyer to draw up writings of settlement and jointure; all shall be done to-night. No matter for the time; pr'ythee, brother Foresight, leave superstition; there's no time but the time present; there's no more to be said of what's past; and all that is to come will happen. If the sun shine by day, and the stars by night—why, we shall know one another's faces without the help of a candle; and that's all the stars are good for.

For. How, how, Sir Sampson? that all? Give me leave to contradict you, and tell you, you are ignorant.

Sir S. I tell you, I am wise; and sapiens dominabitur astris; there's Latin for you to prove it, and an argument to confound your Ephemeris. Ignorant! I tell you I have travelled, old Percu! and know the globe. I have seen the antipodes, where the sun rises at midnight, and sets at noon-day.

For. But I tell you I have travelled, and travelled in the celestial spheres; know the signs and the planets, and their houses; can judge of motions, direct and retrograde; of sextiles, quadrates, trines, and oppositions; fiery trigons, and aquatical trigons; know whether life shall be long or short, happy or unhappy; whether diseases are curable or incurable; if journeys shall be prosperous, undertakings successful, or goods stolen, recovered: I know—

Sir S. I know the length of the emperor of China's foot; have kissed the great mogul's slipper, and rid a hunting upon an elephant with the cham of Tartary. Body o'me! I have made a cuckold of a king; and the present majesty of Bantam is the issue of these loins.

For. I know when travellers lie, or speak truth, when they don't know it themselves.

Sir S. I have known an astrologer make a cuckold in the twinkling of a star.

For. What! does he twit me with my wife, too? I must be better informed of this. [Aside.] Do you mean my wife, Sir Sampson? Though you made a cuckold of the king of Bantam, yet, by the body of the sun—

Sir S. By the horns of the moon, you would say, brother Capricorn.

For. Capricorn in your teeth, thou modern Mandeville; Ferdinand Mendez Pinto was but a type of thee, thou liar of the first magnitude. Take back your paper of inheritance; send your son to sea again. I'll wed my daughter to an Egyptian mummy, ere she shall incorporate with a contemner of sciences and a defamer of virtue.

Sir S. [Aside.] Body o'me! I have gone too far; I must not provoke honest Albumazer. An Egyptian mummy is an illustrious creature, my trusty hieroglyphic; and may have significations of futurity about him. Odsbud! I would my son were an Egyptian mummy for thy sake. What! thou art not angry for a jest, my good Haly? I reverence the sun, moon, and stars, with all my heart. What! I'll make thee a present of a mummy. Now I think on't, body o'me! I have a shoulder of an Egyptian king, that I purloined from one of the pyramids, powdered with hieroglyphics; thou shalt have it brought home to thy house, and make an entertainment for all the philomaths, and students in physic and astrology, in and about London.

For. But what do you know of my wife, Sir Sampson?

Sir S. Thy wife is a constellation of virtues; she is the moon, and thou art the man in the moon; nay, she is more illustrious than the moon; for she has her chastity, without her incontinency. 'Sbud! I was but in jest.

Enter JEREMY.

How now? who sent for you, eh? what would you have?

For. Nay, if you were but in jest—Who's that fellow? I don't like his physiognomy.

Sir S. [To JEREMY.] My son, sir? what son, sir? my son Benjamin, eh?

Jer. No, sir; Mr. Valentine, my master! it is the first time he has been abroad since his confinement, and he comes to pay his duty to you.

Sir S. Well, sir?

Enter VALENTINE

Jer. He is here, sir.

Val. Your blessing, sir!

Sir S. You've had it already, sir; I think I sent it you to-day, in a bill of four thousand pounds. A great deal of money, brother Foresight!

For. Ay, indeed, Sir Sampson, a great deal of money for a young man; I wonder what he can do with it!

Sir S. Body o' me! so do I. Harkye! Valentine, if there be too much, refund the superfluity; dost hear, boy?

Val. Superfluity, sir! it will scarcely pay my debts. I hope you will have more indulgence than to oblige me to those hard conditions which my necessity signed to.

Sir S. Sir! how, I beseech you, what were you pleased to intimate concerning indulgence?

Val. Why, sir, that you would not go to the extremity of the conditions, but release me at least from some part.

Sir S. Oh! sir, I understand you; that's all, eh?

Val. Yes, sir; all that I presume to ask; but what you, out of fatherly fondness, will be pleased to add, will be doubly welcome.

Sir S. Here's a rogue, brother Foresight, makes a bargain under hand and seal in the morning, and would be released from it in the afternoon! here's a rogue, dog! here's conscience and honesty! This is your wit now, this is the morality of your wit! You are a wit, and have been a beau, and may be a—Why, sirrah! is it not here under hand and seal? Can you deny it?

Val. Sir, I don't deny it!

Sir S. Sirrah, you'll be hanged; I shall live to see you go up Holborn-hill. Has he not a rogue's face? Speak, brother; you understand physiognomy; a hanging look to me; of all my boys the most unlike me. He has a d—d Tyburn face, without the benefit of the clergy.

For. Hum! Truly, I don't care to discourage a young man; he has a violent death in his face; but I hope no danger of hanging.

Val. Sir, is this usage for your son? For that old weather-headed fool, I know how to laugh at him; but you, sir—

Sir S. You, sir! and you, sir! Why, who are you, sir?

Val. Your son, sir.

Sir S. That's more than I know, sir; and I believe not.

Val. Faith! I hope not.

Sir S. What, would you have your mother a whore? Did you ever hear the like? did you ever hear the like? Body o' me—

Val. I would have an excuse for your barbarity and unnatural usage.

Sir S. Excuse! Impudence! Why, sirrah, mayn't I do what I please? are not you my slave? did not I beget you? and might not I have chosen whether I would have begot you or no? Oons! who are you? whence came you? what brought you into the world? how came you here, sir? here, to stand here, upon those two legs, and look erect, with that audacious face, eh? Answer me that. Did you come a volunteer into the world? or did I, with the lawful authority of a parent, press you to the service?

Val. I know no more why I came, than you do why you called me. But here I am; and if you don't mean to provide for me, I desire you would leave me as you found me.

Sir S. With all my heart. Come, uncase, strip, and go naked out of the world as you came into it.

Val. My clothes are soon put off; but you must also divest me of my reason, thought, passions, inclinations, affections, appetites, senses, and the huge train of attendants that you begot along with me.

Sir S. Body o' me! what a many-headed monster have I propagated!

Val. I am of myself, a plain, easy, simple creature; and to be kept at small expense: but the retinue that you gave me are craving and invincible; they are so many devils that you have raised, and will have employment.

Sir S. Oons! what had I to do to get children? Can't a private man be born without all these followers? why, nothing under an emperor should be born with appetites; why, at this rate, a fellow that has but a groat in his pocket may have a stomach capable of a ten shilling ordinary.

Jer. Nay, that's as clear as the sun; I'll make oath of it before any justice in Middlesex.

Sir S. Here's a cormorant, too! 'Sheart! this fellow were not born with you? I did not beget him, did I?

Jer. By the provision that's made for you, you might have begot me, too. Nay, and to tell your worship another truth, I believe you did; for I find I was born with those same whorson appetites, too, that my master speaks of.

Sir S. Why, look you there now! I'll maintain it, that, by the rule of right reason, this fellow ought to have been born without a palate. 'Sheart! what should he do with a distinguishing taste? I warrant, now, he'd rather eat a pheasant than a piece of poor John: and smell, now; why, I warrant, he can smell, and loves perfume above a stink: why, there's it; and music—don't you love music, scoundrel?

Jer. Yes, I have a reasonable good ear, sir, as to jigs and country-dances, and the like. I don't much matter your solos or sonatas; they give me the spleen.

Sir S. The spleen! Ha, ha, ha! A pox confound you! Solos or sonatas! Oons! whose son are you, muckworm?

Jer. I am, by my father, the son of a chairman; my mother sold oysters in winter, and cucumbers in summer: and I came up stairs into the world; for I was born in a cellar.

For. By your looks you shall go up stairs out of the world, too, friend.

Sir S. And if this rogue were anatomized now, and dissected, he has his vessels of digestion and concoction, and so forth, large enough for the inside of a cardinal; this son of a cucumber! These things are unaccountable and unreasonable. Body o' me! why were I not a bear, that my cubs might have lived upon sucking their paws? Nature has been provident only to bears and spiders; the one has its nutriment in its own hands; and the other spins its habitation out of its own entrails.
4 G 2

Val. Fortune was provident enough to supply all the necessities of my nature, if I had my right inheritance.

Sir S. Again! Oons! haven't you four thousand pounds? If I had it again I would not give thee a groat. What, wouldst thou have me turn pelican, and feed thee out of my own vitals. Odsheart! live by your wits; you are always fond of the wits. Now let's see if you have wit enough to keep yourself. Your brother will be in town to-night, or to-morrow morning; and then, look you perform covenants; and so your friend and servant. Come, brother Foresight.

[Exit with FORESIGHT.]

Jer. I told you what your visit would come to.

Val. 'Tis as much as I expected. I did not come to see him; I came to see Angelica; but since she was gone abroad, it was easily turned another way, and at least looked well on my side. What's here? Mrs. Foresight and Mrs. Frail! They are earnest. I'll avoid them. Come this way, and go and inquire when Angelica will return.

[Exit with JEREMY.]

Enter Mrs. FORESIGHT and Mrs. FRAIL.

Mrs. F. What have you to do to watch me? 'Slife! I'll do what I please.

Mrs. For. You will?

Mrs. F. Yes, marry, will I! A great piece of business to go to Covent Garden, to take a turn in a hackney-coach with one's friend!

Mrs. For. Nay, two or three turns, I'll take my oath.

Mrs. F. Well, what if I took twenty? I warrant, if you had been there, it had only been innocent recreation! Lord! where's the comfort of this life, if we can't have the happiness of conversing where we like?

Mrs. For. But can't you converse at home? I own it, I think there's no happiness like conversing with an agreeable man; I don't quarrel at that, nor I don't think but your conversation was very innocent. But the place is public; and to be seen with a man in a hackney-coach is scandalous. What if anybody else should have seen you alight, as I did? How can anybody be happy, while they are in perpetual fear of being seen and censured? Besides, it would not only reflect upon you, sister, but on me.

Mrs. F. Pooh! here's a clutter! Why should it reflect upon you? I don't doubt but you have thought yourself happy in a hackney-coach before now! If I had gone to Knightsbridge, or to Chelsea, or to Spring Gardens, or to Barn Elms, with a man alone, something might have been said.

Mrs. For. Why, was I ever in any of those places? What do you mean, sister?

Mrs. F. Was I? What do you mean?

Mrs. For. You have been at a worse place.

Mrs. F. I at a worse place, and with a man?

Mrs. For. I suppose you would not go alone to the World's-end.

Mrs. F. The World's-end! What, do you mean to banter me?

Mrs. For. Poor innocent! You don't know that there is a place called the World's-end? I'll swear, you can keep your countenance purely! you'd make an admirable player!

Mrs. F. I'll swear you have a great deal of confidence, and, in my mind, too much for the stage.

Mrs. For. Very well; that will appear who has most. You never were at the World's-end?

Mrs. F. No.

Mrs. For. You deny it positively to my face?

Mrs. F. Your face? What's your face?

Mrs. For. No matter for that; it's as good a face as your's.

Mrs. F. Not by a dozen years' wearing. But I do deny it positively to your face, then.

Mrs. For. I'll allow you now to find fault with my face; for, I'll swear your impudence has put me out of countenance. But look you here now, where did you lose this gold bodkin? Oh! sister, sister!

Mrs. F. My bodkin!

Mrs. For. Nay, 'tis your's; look at it.

Mrs. F. Well, if you go to that, where did you find this bodkin? Oh! sister, sister! sister every way!

Mrs. For. Oh! devil on't! that I could not discover her without betraying myself!

[Aside.]

Mrs. F. I have heard gentlemen say, sister, that one should take great care, when one makes a thrust in fencing, not to lay open one's self.

Mrs. For. It is very true, sister. Well, since all's out, and, as you say, since we are both wounded, let us do what is often done in duels, take care of one another, and grow better friends than before.

Mrs. F. With all my heart. Well, give me your hand, in token of sisterly secrecy and affection.

Mrs. For. Here it is, with all my heart.

Mrs. F. Well, to tell truth, and speak openly one to another, I'm afraid the world have observed us more than we have observed one another. You have a rich husband, and are provided for: I am at a loss, and have no great stock either of fortune or reputation, and, therefore, must look sharply about me. Sir Sampson has a son that is expected to-night; and, by the account I have heard of his education, can be no conjurer. The estate, you know, is to be made over to him. Now, if I could wheedle him, sister, eh? you understand me?

Mrs. For. I do; and will help you, to the utmost of my power. And I can tell you one thing that falls out luckily enough; my awkward daughter-in-law, who, you know, is designed to be his wife, is grown fond of Mr. Tattle; now, if we can improve that, and make her have an aversion for the booby, it may go a great way towards his liking you. Here they come together; and let us contrive some way or other to leave them together.

Enter TATTLE and Miss PRUE.

Miss P. Mother, mother, mother, look you here!

Mrs. For. Fie, fie, miss, how you bawl! Besides, I have told you, you must not call me mother.

Miss P. What must I call you, then? are you not my father's wife?

Mrs. For. Madam; you must say madam.

Miss P. Look you here, madam, then, what Mr. Tattle has given me. Look you here, cousin; here's a snuff-box; nay, there's snuff in't: here, will you have any? Oh, good! how sweet it is! Mr. Tattle is all over sweet; his peruke is sweet, and his gloves are sweet, and his handkerchief is sweet, pure sweet, sweeter than roses; smell him, mother—madam, I mean. He gave me this ring for a kiss.

Tat. Oh, fie! miss; you must not kiss and tell.

Miss P. Yes, I may tell my mother. And he says he'll give me something to make me smell so. Oh! pray, lend me your handkerchief. Smell, cousin; is it not pure? It's better than lavender, mun. I'm resolved I won't let nurse put any more lavender among my clothes, eh! cousin?

Mrs. F. Fie, miss!

Tat. Oh! madam, you are too severe upon miss; you must not find fault with her pretty simplicity; it becomes her strangely. Pretty miss, don't let them persuade you out of your innocence.

Mrs. For. I wish you don't persuade her out of her innocence.

Tat. Who, I, madam? Oh, lord! how can your ladyship have such a thought? sure, you don't know me.

Mrs. F. Ah! devil, sly devil! He's as close, sister, as a confessor. He thinks we don't observe him.

Tat. Upon reputation—Oh, lord! I swear I would not for the world.

Mrs. F. Oh, hang you! who'll believe you? You'll be hanged before you'd confess. We know you—she's very pretty! Lord! ne'er stir; I don't know, but I fancy, if I were a man—

Miss P. How you love to jeer one, cousin!

Mrs. For. Harkye! sister, by my soul, the girl is spoiled already: d'ye think she'll ever endure a great lubberly tarpaulin? 'Gad! I warrant you, she won't let him come near her, after Mr. Tattle.

Mrs. F. On my soul, I am afraid not, eh! filthy creature, that smells all of pitch and tar! Devil take you, you confounded toad! you will supplant the sailor.

Mrs. For. My husband will hang us: he'll think we brought them acquainted.

Mrs. F. Come, faith, let us begone. If my brother Foresight should find us with them, he'd think so, sure enough.

Mrs. For. So he would: but then, the leaving them together is as bad; and he's such a sly devil, he'll never miss an opportunity.

Mrs. F. I don't care; I won't be seen in it. [Exit.

Mrs. For. Well, Mr. Tattle, we trust to your discretion. [Exit.

Miss P. What makes them go away, Mr. Tattle? What do they mean, do you know?

Tat. Yes, my dear, I think I can guess; but hang me if I know the reason of it.

Miss P. Come, must not we go too?

Tat. No, no; they don't mean that.

Miss P. No! what then? What shall you and I do together?

Tat. I must make love to you, pretty miss; will you let me make love to you?

Miss P. Yes, if you please.

Tat. Frank, egad! at least. What a plague does Mrs. Foresight mean by this civility? Is it to make a fool of me? or does she leave us together out of good morality, and do as she would be done by. Egad! I'll understand it so. [Aside.

Miss P. Well, and how will you make love to me? Come, I long to have you begin. Must I make love, too? You must tell me how.

Tat. You must let me speak, miss; you must not speak first. I must ask you questions, and you must answer.

Miss P. What, is it like the catechism? Come, then, ask me.

Tat. D'ye think you can love me?

Miss P. Yes.

Tat. Pooh! plague! you must not say yes already. I sha'n't care a farthing for you, then, in a twinkling.

Miss P. What must I say, then?

Tat. Why, you must say no; or, believe not; or, you can't tell.

Miss P. Why, must I tell a lie then?

Tat. Yes, if you'd be well-bred. All well-bred persons lie. Besides, you are a woman; you must never speak what you think: your words must contradict your thoughts; but your actions must contradict your words. So, when I ask you if you can love me, you must say no; but you must love me, too. If I tell you you are handsome, you must deny it, and say, I flatter you; but you must think yourself more charming than I speak you, and like me for the beauty which I say you have, as much as if I had it myself. If I ask you to kiss me, you must be angry; but you must not refuse me. If I ask you for more, you must be more angry but more complying; and as soon as ever I make you say you'll cry out, you must be sure to hold your tongue.

Miss P. Oh, lord! I swear this is pure! I like it better than our old-fashioned country way of speaking one's mind. And must not you lie, too?

Tat. Hum! Yes; but you must believe I speak truth.

Miss P. Oh, gemeni! Well, I always had a great mind to tell lies; but they frightened me, and said it was a sin.

Tat. Well, my pretty creature, will you make me happy by giving me a kiss?

Miss P. No, indeed; I'm angry at you.

[Runs and kisses him.]

Tat. Hold, hold! that's pretty well: but you should not have given it to me, but have suffered me to have taken it.

Miss P. Well, we'll do it again.

Tat. With all my heart. Now, then, my little angel!

[Kisses her.]

Miss P. Pish!

Tat. That's right. Again, my charmer!

[Kisses again.]

Miss P. Oh, fie! nay, now I can't abide you.

Tat. Admirable! That was as well as if you had been born and bred in Covent-garden. And won't you shew me, pretty miss, where your bed-chamber is?

Miss P. No, indeed, won't I: but I'll run there, and hide myself from you, behind the curtains.

Tat. I'll follow you.

Miss P. Ah! but I will hold the door with both hands, and be angry; and you shall push me down before you come in.

Tat. No, I'll come in first.

Miss P. Will you? then I'll be more angry, and more complying.

Tat. Then I'll make you cry out.

Miss P. Oh! but you sha'n't, for I'll hold my tongue.

Tat. Oh! my dear, apt scholar!

Miss P. Well, now I'll run, and make more haste than you. [Exit.]

Tat. You shall not fly so fast as I'll pursue. [Exit.]

Enter Nurse.

Nurse. Miss, miss, Miss Prue! Come to your father, child. Open the door, miss. I hear you cry husht! Oh, lord! who's there? [Peeps.] A man with her! [Knocks.] Won't you open the door? I'll come in the back way. [Exit.]

Re-enter TATTLE and MISS PRUE.

Miss P. Oh, lord! she's coming; and she'll tell my father. What shall I do now?

Tat. Plague take her! if she had staid two minutes longer, I should have wished for her coming.

[Aside.]

Miss P. Oh, dear! what shall I say? Tell me, Mr. Tattle, tell me a lie.

Tat. There's no occasion for a lie; I could never tell a lie to no purpose. But, since we have done nothing, we must say nothing, I think. I hear her. I'll leave you together, and come off as you can.

[Thrusts her in, shuts the door, and exits.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Room in Foresight's House.

Enter VALENTINE, SCANDAL, and ANGELICA.

Ang. You can't accuse me of inconstancy; I never told you that I loved you.

Val. But I can accuse you of uncertainty, for not telling me whether you did or not.

Ang. You mistake indifference for uncertainty; I never had concern enough to ask myself the question.

Scand. Nor good-nature enough to answer him that did ask you: I'll say that for you, madam.

Ang. What are you setting up for good-nature?

Scand. Only for the affectation of it, as the women do for ill-nature.

Ang. Persuade your friend that it is all affectation.

Val. I shall receive no benefit from the opinion, for I know no effectual difference between continued affectation and reality.

Enter Sir SAMPSON LEGEND, Mrs. FRAIL, TATTLE, MISS PRUE, and JAMES.

Sir S. Is Ben come? Odso! my son Ben come? Ods! I'm glad on't. Where is he? I long to see him. Now, Mrs. Frail, you shall see my son Ben. Body o' me! he's the hopes of my family. I haven't seen him these three years: I warrant he's grown! Call him in; bid him make haste. I'm ready to cry for joy.

[Exit JAMES.]

Mrs. F. Now, miss, you shall see your husband.

[Aside to Miss P.]

Miss P. Pish! he shall be none of my husband.

[Aside to Mrs. F.]

Mrs. F. Hush! Well, he sha'n't: leave that to me. I'll beckon Mr. Tattle to us.

Ang. Won't you stay and see your brother?

Val. We are the twin stars, and cannot shine in one sphere; when he rises, I must set. Besides, if I should stay, I don't know but my father, in good-nature, may press me to the immediate signing the deed of conveyance of my estate; and I'll defer it as long as I can. Well, you'll come to a resolution.

Ang. I cannot. Resolution must come to me, or I shall never have one.

Scand. Come, Valentine, I'll go with you: I have something in my head to communicate to you.

[Exit with VALENTINE.]

Sir S. What! is my son Valentine gone? What! is he sneaked off, and would not see his brother? There's an unnatural whelp! there's an ill-natured dog! What! were you here, too, madam, and could not keep him? could neither love, nor duty, nor natural affection, oblige him? Odsbud! madam, have no more to say to him; he is not worth your consideration. The rogue has not a drachm of generous love about him! all interest, all interest! He's an undone scoundrel, and courts your estate. Body o' me! he does not care a doit for your person.

Ang. I am pretty even with him, Sir Sampson; for, if ever I could have liked anything in him, it should have been his estate, too.

Sir S. Odsbud! well spoken! and you are a wiser woman than I thought you were.

Ang. If I marry, Sir Sampson, I am for a good estate with any man, and for any man with a good estate: therefore, if I were obliged to make a choice, I declare I'd rather have you than your son.

Sir S. Faith and troth! you are a wise woman; and I'm glad to hear you say so. I was afraid you were in love with a reprobate. Od! I was sorry for you with all my heart. Hang him, mongrel! cast him off. You shall see the rogue shew himself, and make love to some desponding Cadua of fourscore for sustenance. Od! I love to see a young spend-thrift forced to cling to an old woman for support, like ivy round a dead oak; faith I do. I love to see them hug and cotton together, like down upon a thistle.

Enter BEN and JAMES.

Ben. Where's father?

James. There, sir; his back's towards you. [Exit.]

Sir S. My son Ben! Bless thee, my dear boy! Body o' me! thou art heartily welcome.

Ben. Thank you, father; and I'm glad to see you.

Sir S. Odsbud! and I'm glad to see thee. Kiss me, boy; kiss me again and again, dear Ben.

[Kisses him.]

Ben. Sc, so; enough, father. Mess! I'd rather kiss these gentlewomen.

Sir S. And so thou shalt. Mrs. Angelica, my son Ben.

Ben. Forsooth, if you please! [Salutes ANG.] Nay, mistress, I'm not for dropping anchor here; about ship, i'faith! [Kisses Mrs. F.] Nay, and you, too, my little cock-boat! so. [Kisses Miss P.]

Tat. Sir, you're welcome ashore.

Ben. Thank you, thank you, friend.

Sir S. Thou hast been many a weary league, Ben, since I saw thee.

Ben. Ay, ay! been? been far enough, and that be all. Well, father, and how do all at home? how does brother Dick, and brother Val?

Sir S. Dick! Body o' me! Dick has been dead these two years. I writ you word when you were at Leghorn.

Ben. Mess! that's true: marry, I had forgot. Dick is dead, as you say. Well, and how? I have a many questions to ask you. Well, you ben't married again, father, be you?

Sir S. No; I intend you shall marry, Ben; I would not marry, for thy sake.

Ben. Nay, what does that signify? An' you marry again, why, then, I'll go to sea again; so there's one for t'other, and that be all. Pray, don't let me be your hindrance; e'en marry, a' God's name, and the wind sit that way. As for my part, mayhap, I have no mind to marry.

Mrs. F. That would be pity, such a handsome young gentleman.

Ben. Handsome! he, he, he! Nay, forsooth, an' you be for joking, I'll joke with you; for I love my jest, an' the ship were sinking, as we said at sea. But I'll tell you why I don't much stand towards matrimony. I love to roam about from port to port, and from land to land; I could never abide to be port-bound, as we call it. Now, a man that is married, has, as it were, d'ye see, his feet in the bilboes, and, mayhap, mayn't get them out again when he would.

Sir S. Ben is a wag.

Ben. A man that is married, d'ye see, is no more like another man, than a galley-slave is like one of us free sailors: he is chained to an oar all his life; and, mayhap, forced to tug a crazy vessel into the bargain.

Sir S. A very wag! Ben is a very wag! only a little rough; he wants a little polishing.

Mrs. F. Not at all: I like his humour mightily; it is plain and honest. I should like such a humour in a husband extremely.

Ben. Say'n you so, forsooth? Marry, and I should like such a handsome gentlewoman for a bedfellow hugely. How say you, mistress? would you like going to sea? Mess! you're a tight vessel, and well rigged, an' you were but as well manned.

Mrs. F. I should not doubt that, if you were master of me.

Ben. But I'll tell you one thing, an' you come to sea in a high wind, or that lady, you mayn't carry so much sail o' your head. Top and top-gallant, by the mess!

Mrs. F. No! why so?

Ben. Why, an' you do, you may run the risk to be overset; and then you'll carry your keels above water. He, he, he!

Ang. I swear, Mr. Benjamin is the veriest wag in nature; an absolute sea wit.

Sir S. Nay, Ben has parts; but, as I told you before, they want a little polishing. You must not take anything ill, madam.

Ben. No, I hope the gentlewoman is not angry: I mean all in good part: for, if I give a jest, I'll take a jest: and so, forsooth, you may be as free with me.

Ang. I thank you, sir; I am not at all offended. But, methinks, Sir Sampson, you should leave him alone with his mistress. Mr. Tattle, we must not hinder lovers.

Tat. [Aside to Miss P.] Well, miss, I have your promise. [Exit with ANGELICA.]

Sir S. Body o' me! madam, you say true. Look you, Ben, this is your mistress. Come, miss, you must not be shame-faced; we'll leave you together.

Miss P. I can't abide to be left alone. Mayn't my cousin stay with me?

Sir S. No, no. Come, let's away.

Ben. Look you, father? mayhap, the young woman mayn't take a liking to me.

Sir S. I warrant thee, boy! Come, come; we'll begone. I'll venture that. [Exit with Mrs. F.]

Ben. Come, mistress, will you please to sit down? For, an' you stand a-stern a that'n, we shall never grapple together. Come, I'll haul a chair; there, an' you please you to sit, I'll sit by you.

Miss P. You need not sit so near one; if you have anything to say, I can hear you farther off; I a'n't deaf.

Ben. Why, that's true, as you say, nor I a'n't dumb; I can be heard as far as another. I'll heave off, to please you. [Sits farther off.] An' we were a league asunder, I'd undertake to hold discourse with you, an' 'twere not a main high wind, indeed, and full in my teeth. Look you! forsooth, I am, as it were, bound for the land of matrimony; 'tis a voyage, d'ye see, that was none of my seeking; I was commanded by father. How say you, mistress? The short of the thing is, that, if you like me, and I like you, we may chance to swing in a hammock together.

Miss P. I don't know what to say to you; nor I don't care to speak with you at all.

Ben. No! I'm sorry for that. But, pray, why are you so scornful?

Miss P. As long as one must not speak one's mind, one had better not speak at all, I think; and, truly, I won't tell a lie for the matter.

Ben. Nay, you say true in that; it's but a folly to lie: for to speak one thing, and to think just the contrary way, is, as it were, to look one way, and to row another. Now, for my part, d'ye see, I'm for carrying things above board; I'm not for keeping anything under hatches; so, that, if you ben't as willing as I, say so, a God's name! there's no harm done. Mayhap, you may be shame-faced; some maidens, thof they love a man well enough, yet they don't care to tell'n so to 's face. If that's the case, why silence gives consent.

Miss P. But I'm sure it is not so, for I'll speak sooner than you shall believe that; and I'll speak truth, though one should always tell a lie to a man; and I don't care, let my father do what he will; I'm too big to be whipped; so I'll tell you plainly, I don't like you, nor love you at all; nor never will, that's more. So, there's your answer for you; and don't trouble me no more, you ugly thing!

Ben. Look you! young woman, you may learn to give good words, however. I spoke you fair, d'ye see, and civil. As for your love, or your liking, I don't value it of a rope's-end; and, mayhap, I like you as little as you do me. What I said in obedience to father. 'Gad! I fear a whipping no more than you do. But I tell you one thing, if you should give such language at sea, you'd have a cat-o'-nine-tails laid across your shoulders. Flesh! who are you? You heard t'other handsome young woman speak civilly to me of her own accord. Whatever you think of yourself, 'gad! I don't think you are any more to compare to her, than a can of small beer to a bowl of punch.

Miss P. Well, and there's a handsome gentleman, and a fine gentleman, and a sweet gentleman, that was here, that loves me, and I love him; and if he sees you speak to me any more, he'll thrash your jacket for you, he will, you great sea-calf!

Ben. What! do you mean that fair-weather spark that was here just now? Will he thrash my jacket? Let'n, let'n! But an' he comes near me, mayhap, I may give'n a salt eel for's supper, for all that. What does father mean, to leave me alone, as soon as I come home, with such a dirty dowdy? Sea-calf! I a'n't calf enough to lick your chalked face, you cheese-curd, you! Marry thee! Oons! I'll marry a Lapland witch as soon, and live upon selling contrary winds and wrecked vessels.

Miss P. I won't be called names, nor I won't be abused thus, so I won't! If I were a man [Cries.] you durst not talk at this rate; no, you durst not, you stinking tar-barrel.

Enter Mrs. FORESIGHT and Mrs. FRAIL.

Mrs. For. They have quarrelled, just as we could wish. [Apart to Mrs. F.]

Ben. Tar-barrel! Let your sweetheart there call me so, if he'll take your part—your Tom Essence—and I'll say something to him. 'Gad! I'll lace his musk doublet for him. I'll make him smell more like a weasel than a civet-cat, afore I ha' done with'n.

Mrs. For. Bless me! what's the matter, miss? What, does she cry? Mr. Benjamin, what have you done to her?

Ben. Let her cry: the more she cries the less she'll—she has been gathering foul weather in her mouth, and now it rains out at her eyes.

Mrs. For. Come, miss, come along with me; and tell me, poor child!

Mrs. F. Lord! what shall we do? There's my brother Foresight and Sir Sampson coming. Sister, do you take miss down into the parlour, [Exeunt Mrs. For. and Miss P.] and I'll carry Mr. Benjamin into my chamber; for they must not know that they are fallen out. Come, sir, will you venture yourself with me? [Looking kindly on him.]

Ben. Venture! Mess! and that I will, though it were to sea in a storm. [Exeunt.]

Enter Sir SAMPSON LEGEND and FORESIGHT.

Sir S. I left them together here. What, are they gone? Ben is a brisk boy: he has got her into a corner. Father's own son, faith! he'll toulze her, and mouzle her. The rogue's sharp-set, coming from sea. If he should not stay for saying grace, old Foresight, but fall to without the help of a parson, eh? Od! if he should, I could not be angry with him; 'twould be but like me, a chip of the old block. Ha! thou'rt melancholic, old prognostication! as melancholic as if thou hadst spilt the salt, or pared thy nails on a Sunday. Come, cheer up; look about thee; look up, old star-gazer! Now is he poring upon the ground for a crooked pin, or an old horse-nail, with the head towards him.

For. Sir Sampson, we'll have the wedding to-morrow morning.

Sir S. With all my heart.

For. At ten o'clock; punctually at ten.

Sir S. To a minute, to a second: thou shalt set thy watch, and the bridegroom shall observe its motions; they shall be married to a minute, go to bed to a minute—

Enter JAMES.

James. Sir, Mr. Scandal desires to speak with you upon earnest business, which must be told you, he says, within this hour, or 'twill be too late.

For. I'll wait on him. Sir Sampson, your servant. [Exit.]

Sir S. What is this business, friend?

James. Sir, 'tis about your son Valentine: something has appeared to him in a dream, that makes him prophecy. [Exit.]

Sir S. Hoity-toity! what have I to do with his dreams or his divinations? Body o' me! this is a trick to defer signing the conveyance. I warrant, the devil will tell him, in a dream, that he must not part with his estate. But I'll bring him a parson to tell him that the devil's a liar; or, if that won't do, I'll bring a lawyer that shall out-lie the devil; and so, I'll try whether my blackguard or his shall get the better of the day. [Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—Valentine's Lodgings.

Enter SCANDAL and JEREMY.

Scand. Well, is your master ready? Does he look madly, and talk madly?

Jer. Yes, sir; you need make no great doubt of that: he, that was so near turning poet yesterday morning, can't be much to seek in playing the mad-man to-day.

Scand. Would he have Angelica acquainted with the design?

Jer. No, sir, not yet. He has a mind to try whether his playing the madman won't make her play the fool, and fall in love with him; or, at least, own that she has loved him all this while, and concealed it.

Scand. I saw her take coach just now with her maid; and I think I heard her bid the coachman drive hither.

Jer. Like enough, sir; for I told her maid this morning, my master was run stark mad, only for love of her mistress. [Knock.] I hear a coach stop; if it should be she, sir, I believe he would not see her, till he hears how she takes it.

Scand. Well, I'll try her: 'tis she; here she comes.

Enter ANGELICA and JENNY.

Ang. Mr. Scandal, I suppose you don't think it a novelty to see a woman visit a man at his own lodgings in a morning.

Scand. Not upon a kind occasion, madam. But when a lady comes tyrannically to insult a ruined lover, and make manifest the cruel triumphs of her beauty, the barbarity of it something surprises me.

Ang. I don't like raillery from a serious face. [To JEREMY.] Pray, tell me what is the matter?

Jer. No strange matter, madam; my master's mad, that's all. I suppose your ladyship has thought him so a great while.

Ang. How d'ye mean, mad?

Jer. Why, faith, madam, he's mad for want of his wits, just as he was poor for want of money. His head is e'en as light as his pockets; and anybody that has a mind to a bad bargain, can't do better than to beg him for his estate.

Ang. If you speak truth, your endeavouring at wit is very unseasonable.

Scand. She's concerned, and loves him! [Aside.]

Ang. Mr. Scandal, you can't think me guilty of so much inhumanity as not to be concerned for a man I must own myself obliged to. Pray, tell me the truth.

Scand. Faith! madam, I wish telling a lie would mend the matter. But this is no new effect of an unsuccessful passion.

Ang. [Aside.] I know not what to think: yet I should be vexed to have a trick put upon me. May I not see him?

Scand. I am afraid the physician is not willing you should see him yet. Jeremy, go in and inquire. [Exit JEREMY.]

Ang. Ha! I saw him wink and smile. I fancy a trick. I'll try. [Aside.] I would disguise to all the world, sir, a failing, which I must own to you: I fear my happiness depends upon the recovery of Valentine.

Scand. So, this is pretty plain! [Aside.] Be not too much concerned, madam: I hope his condition is not desperate. An acknowledgment of love from you, perhaps, may work a cure, as the fear of your aversion occasioned his distemper.

Ang. Say you so? nay, then, I'm convinced; and if I don't play trick for trick, may I never taste the pleasure of revenge! [Aside.] Acknowledgment of love! I find you have mistaken my compassion, and think me guilty of a weakness I am a stranger to. Good-nature and humanity oblige me to be concerned for him; but to love, is neither in my power nor inclination.

Scand. Eh! brave woman, i'faith! Won't you see him, then, if he desires it?

Ang. What signifies a madman's desires? Besides, 'twould make me uneasy. If I don't see him, perhaps my concern for him may lessen. If I forget him, 'tis no more than he has done by himself; and now the surprise is over, methinks I am not half so sorry as I was.

Scand. So, faith! good-nature works apace; you were confessing just now an obligation to his love.

Ang. But I have considered that passions are unreasonable and involuntary. If he loves, he can't help it; and if I don't love, I cannot help it, no more than he can help his being a man, or I my being a woman; or no more than I can help my want of inclination to stay longer here.

[Exit with JENNY.]

Scand. Humph! An admirable composition, faith! this same womankind.

Re-enter JEREMY.

Jer. What, is she gone, sir?

Scand. Gone! why, she was never here, nor anywhere else; nor I don't know her if I see her, nor you neither.

Jer. Good lack! what's the matter now? Are any more of us to be mad? Why, sir, my master longs to see her; and is almost mad in good earnest with the joyful news of her being here.

Scand. We are all under a mistake. Ask no questions, for I can't resolve you; but I'll inform your master. In the meantime, if our project succeed no better with his fancy than it does with his mistress, he may descend from his exaltation of madness into the road of common sense, and be content only to be made a fool with other reasonable people. I hear Sir Sampson. You know your cue; I'll to your master. [Exit.]

Enter Sir SAMPSON LEGEND and BUCKRAM.

Sir S. D'ye see, Mr. Buckram, here's the paper signed with his own hand?

Buck. Good, sir! And the conveyance is ready drawn in this bag, if he be ready to sign and seal.

Sir S. Ready! Body o' me! he must be ready: his sham sickness shan't excuse him. Oh! here's his scoundrel. Sirrah, where's your master?

Jer. Ah; sir, he's quite gone.

Sir S. Gone! what, he's not dead?

Jer. No, sir; not dead.

Sir S. What, is he gone out of town? run away, eh? has he tricked me? Speak, varlet!

Jer. No, no, sir; he's safe enough, sir, an' he were but as sound, poor gentleman! He is, indeed, here, sir, and not here, sir.

Sir S. Heyday, rascal! do you banter me, sirrah, d'ye banter me? Speak, sirrah! where is he? for I will find him.

Jer. Would you could, sir! for he has lost himself. Indeed, sir, I have almost broke my heart about him. I can't refrain tears when I think on him, sir. I'm as melancholy for him as a passing-bell, sir; or a horse in a pond.

Sir S. A plague confound your similitudes, sir! Speak to be understood; and tell me in plain terms what is the matter with him, or I'll crack your fool's skull.

Jer. Ah! you've hit, sir; that's the matter with him, sir: his skull's cracked, poor gentleman! he's stark mad, sir.

Sir S. Mad!

Buck. What, is he non compos?

Jer. Quite non compos, sir.

Buck. Why, then, all's obliterated, Sir Sampson. If he be non compos mentis, his act and deed will be of no effect; it is not good in law.

Sir S. Oons! I won't believe it; let me see him, sir. Mad! I'll make him find his senses.

Jer. Mr. Scandal is with him, sir: I'll knock at the door.

[Goes to the scene, which opens and discovers VALENTINE upon a couch, disorderly dressed; SCANDAL near him.]

Sir S. How now! what's here to do?

Val. Ha! who's that?

[Starting.]

Scand. For heaven's sake! softly, sir, and gently: don't provoke him.

Val. Answer me; who's that and that?

Sir S. Gadsbobs! does he not know? is he mischievous? I'll speak gently. Val, Val, dost thou not know me, boy? not know thy own father; Val? I am thy own father; and this, honest Brief Buckram, the lawyer.

Val. It may be so—I did not know you—the world is full. There are people that we do know, and people that we do not know; and yet the sun shines upon all alike. There are fathers that have many children; and there are children that have many fathers—'tis strange! but I am honesty, and come to give the world the lie.

Sir S. Body o' me! I know not what to say to him.

Val. Why does that lawyer wear black? Does he carry his conscience without-side? Lawyer, what art thou? dost thou know me?

Buck. Oh, lord! what must I say? Yes, sir.

Val. Thou liest; for I am honesty. 'Tis hard I cannot get a livelihood amongst you. I have been sworn out of Westminster-hall the first day of every term. Let me see—no matter how long—I am honesty, and can't tell: I have very few acquaintance.

Sir S. Body o' me! he talks sensibly in his madness. Has he no intervals?

Jer. Very short, sir.

Buck. Sir, I can do you no service while he's in this condition. Here's your paper, sir. He may do me a mischief, if I stay. The conveyance is ready, sir, if he recovers his senses. [Exit.]

Sir S. Hold, hold! don't you go yet.

Scand. You'd better let him go, sir; and send for him, if there be occasion; for I fancy his presence provokes him more.

Val. Is the lawyer gone? 'Tis well! then we may drink about without going together by the ears. Heigho! what o'clock is it? My father here! your blessing, sir.

Sir S. He recovers! Bless thee, Val! How dost thou do, boy?

Val. Thank you, sir, pretty well. I have been a little indisposed. Won't you please to sit, sir?

Sir S. Ay, boy! Come, thou shalt sit down by me.

Val. Sir, 'tis my duty to wait.

Sir S. No, no: come, come, sit thee down, honest Val. How dost thee do? Let me feel thy pulse. Oh! pretty well now, Val. Body o' me! I was sorry to see thee indisposed: but I am glad thou art better, honest Val!

Val. I thank you, sir.

Scand. Miracle! the monster grows loving!

[Aside.]

Sir S. Let me feel thy hand again, Val. It does not shake: I believe thou canst write, Val. Eh, boy? thou canst write thy name, Val? Jeremy, step and overtake Mr. Buckram: bid him make haste back with the conveyance; quick!

[Exit JEREMY.]

Scand. [Aside.] That ever I should suspect such a heathen of any remorse!

Sir S. Dost thou know this paper, Val? I know thou'rt honest, and will perform articles.

[Shows him the paper, but holds it out of his reach.]

Val. Pray, let me see it, sir; you hold it so far off, that I can't tell whether I know it or not.

Sir S. See it, boy! Ay, ay; why, thou dost see it: 'tis thy own hand, Vally. Why, let me see, I can read it as plain as can be. Look you here: [reads] "The condition of this obligation"—look you, as plain as can be, so it begins. And, then, at the bottom: "As witness my hand, VALENTINE LEGEND," in great letters. Why, 'tis as plain as the nose on one's face. What, are my eyes better than thine? I believe I can read it farther off yet: let me see. [Stretches his arm as far as he can.]

Val. Will you please to let me hold it, sir?

Sir S. Let thee hold it, say'st thou? Ay, with all my heart. What matter is it who holds it? What need anybody hold it? I'll put it in my pocket, Val, and then nobody need hold it. [Puts the paper in his pocket.] There, Val: it's safe enough, boy. But thou shalt have it as soon as thou hast set thy hand to another paper, little Val.

Enter JEREMY and BUCKRAM.

Val. What, is my bad genius here again? Oh! no; 'tis the lawyer with an itching palm; and he's come to be scratched. My nails are not long enough. Let me have a pair of red-hot tongs, quickly; and you shall see me act St. Dunstan, and lead the devil by the nose.

Buck. Oh, lord! let me be gone. I'll not venture myself with a madman. [Runs out.]

Val. Ha, ha, ha; you need not run so fast. Honesty will not overtake you. Ha, ha, ha! the rogue found me to be in formâ pauperis presently.

Sir S. Oons! what a vexation is here! I know not what to do or say, or which way to go.

Val. Who's that, that's out of his way? I am honesty, and can set him right. Harkye! friend, the straight road is the worst way you can go. But it is wonderful strange, Jeremy!

Jer. What is it, sir?

Val. That grey hairs should cover a green head—and I make a fool of my father.

For. [Without.] Where is he? where is he?

Val. What's here? Erra pater, or a bearded sibyl? If prophecy comes, honesty must give place. [Exit VALENTINE and JEREMY.]

Enter FORESIGHT, Mrs. FORESIGHT, and Mrs. FRAIL.

For. What says he? What did he prophecy? Ah! Sir Sampson! Bless us! how are we?

Sir S. Are we? A plague on your prognostications! Why, we are fools as we used to be. Oons! that you could not foresee that the moon would predominate, and my son be mad! Where are your oppositions, your trines, and your quadrates? Ah! plague on't: that I, who know the world, and men and manners, who don't believe a syllable in the sky and stars, and sun and almanacs, and trash, should be directed by a dreamer, an omen-hunter, and defer business in expectation of a lucky hour! when, body o'me! there never was a lucky hour after the first opportunity. [Exit.]

For. Ah! Sir Sampson, heaven help your head!

This is none of your lucky hour! Nemo omnibus horis sapit! What, is he gone, and in contempt of science? Ill stars and unconvertible ignorance attend him!

Scand. You must excuse his passion, Mr. Foresight, for he has been heartily vexed. His son is non compos mentis; and, thereby, incapable of making any conveyance in law; so, that all his measures are disappointed.

For. Ah! say you so?

Mrs. F. What, has my sea-lover lost his anchor of hope, then? [Aside to Mrs. FORESIGHT.]

Mrs. For. Oh! sister, what will you do with him.

Mrs. F. Do with him! Send him to sea again in the next foul weather. He's used to an inconstant element, and won't be surprised to see the tide turned.

For. Wherein was I mistaken, not to foresee this? [Considers.]

Scand. But would you not talk with Valentine? Perhaps you may understand him; I am apt to believe, there is something mysterious in his discourse; and, sometimes, rather think him inspired than mad.

For. You speak with singular good judgment, Mr. Scandal, truly. I am inclining to your Turkish opinion in this matter, and do reverence a man whom the vulgar think mad. Let us go to him.

[Exit with SCANDAL.]

Mrs. F. Sister, do you go with them; I'll find out my lover, and give him his discharge, and come to you. [Exit Mrs. FORESIGHT.] On my conscience, here he is!

Enter BEN.

Ben. All mad, I think. Flesh! I believe all the calentures of the sea are come ashore, for my part.

Mrs. F. Mr. Benjamin in choler?

Ben. No, I'm pleased well enough, now I have found you. Mess! I have had such a hurricane on your account yonder!

Mrs. F. My account? Pray, what's the matter?

Ben. Why, father came, and found me squabbling with yon chitty-faced thing, as he would have me marry; so he asked what was the matter. He asked in a surly sort of a way. It seems brother Val is gone mad, and so that put'n in a passion; but what did I know of that? what's that to me? So he asked in a surly sort of manner, and, gad! I answered 'em as surly. What tho' he be my father, I a'n't bound prentice to 'em: so, faith, I told'n in plain terms, if I were minded to marry, I'd marry to please myself, not him; and for the young woman that he provided for me, I thought it more fitting for her to learn her sampler, and make dirt-pies, than to look after a husband; for my part, I was none of her man, I had another voyage to make, let him take it as he will.

Mrs. F. So, then, you intend to go to sea again?

Ben. Nay, nay, my mind ran upon you, but I would not tell him so much. So he said, he'd make my heart ache; and if so be that he could get a woman to his mind, he'd marry himself. Gad! says I, an' you play the fool, and marry at these years, there's more danger of your head's aching than my heart. He was wondrous angry when I giv'n that wipe, he hadn't a word to say; and so I left'n; and the green girl together; mayhap, the bee may bite, and he'll marry her himself—with all my heart!

Mrs. F. And were you this undutiful and graceless wretch to your father?

Ben. Then why was he graceless first?

Mrs. F. Oh! impiety, now have I been mistaken. What an inhuman merciless creature have I set my heart upon. Oh! I am happy to have discovered the shelves and quicksands that lurk beneath that faithless smiling face!

Ben. Hey-toss! what's the matter now? Why, you ben't angry, be you?

Mrs. F. Oh! see me no more, for thou wert born among rocks, suckled by whales, cradled in a tempest, and whistled to by winds; and thou art come forth with fins and scales, and three rows of teeth, a most outrageous fish of prey.

Ben. Oh, lord! oh, lord! she's mad, poor young woman. Love has turned her senses; her brain is quite overset. Well-a-day! how shall I do to set her to-rights?

Mrs. F. No, no, I am not mad, monster; I am wise enough to find you out. Hadst thou the impudence to aspire at being a husband, with that stubborn and disobedient temper? You, that know not how to submit to a father, presume to have a sufficient stock of duty to undergo a wife? I should have been finely fobbed indeed, very finely fobbed.

Ben. Harkye! forsooth, if so be that you are in your right senses, d'ye see! for aught as I perceive I'm like to be finely fobbed, if I have got anger here upon your account, and you are tacked about already. What d'ye mean? after all your fair speeches and stroking my cheeks, and kissing and hugging, what, would you sheer off so? would you? and leave me aground?

Mrs. F. No, I'll leave you adrift, and go which way you will.

Ben. What, are you false-hearted then?

Mrs. F. Only the wind's changed.

Ben. More shame for you. The wind's changed? It is an ill-wind blows nobody good. Mayhap I have a good riddance on you, if these be your tricks. What, did you mean all this while to make a fool of me?

Mrs. F. Any fool, but a husband.

Ben. Husband! Gad! I would not be your husband, if you would have me, now I know your mind; thof you had your weight in gold and jewels, and thof I loved you never so well.

Mrs. F. Why, canst thou love, Porpus?

Ben. No matter what I can do; don't call names. I don't love you so well as to bear that, whatever I did. I'm glad you shew yourself, mistress: let them marry you as don't know you. Gad! I know you too well, by sad experience; I believe, he, that marries you, will go to sea in a hen-pecked frigate. I believe that, young woman; and mayhap may come to an anchor at Cuckold's Point; so there's a dash for you, take it as you will; mayhap you may hollow after me when I won't come to you. [Exit.]

Mrs. F. Ha, ha, ha! no doubt on't. [Sings.] "My true love is gone to sea!"

Enter Mrs. FORESIGHT.

Oh! sister, had you come a minute sooner, you would have seen the resolution of a lover. Honest Tar and I are parted; and with the same indifference that we met. On my life, I am half vexed at the insensibility of a brute I despised.

Mrs. For. What, then, he bore it most heroically?

Mrs. F. Most tyrannically; for you see he has got the start of me; and I, the poor forsaken maid, am left complaining on the shore. But I'll tell you a hint that he has given me. Sir Sampson is enraged, and talks desperately of committing matrimony himself. If he has a mind to throw himself away, he can't do it more effectually than upon me, if we could bring it about.

Mrs. For. Oh! hang him, old fox! he's too cunning; besides, he hates both you and me. But I have a project in my head for you, and I have gone a good way towards it. I have almost made a bargain with Jeremy, Valentine's man, to sell his master to us.

Mrs. F. Sell him? how?

Mrs. For. Valentine raves upon Angelica, and took me for her; and Jeremy says will take anybody for her that he imposes on him. Now I have promised him mountains, if in one of his mad fits he will bring you to him in her stead, and get you married. Here they come; stand aside a little, and tell me how you like the design.

Enter SCANDAL and JEREMY

Scand. And have you given your master a hint of their plot upon him? [To JEREMY.]

Jer. Yes, sir; he says he'll favour it, and mistake her for Angelica.

Scand. It may make us sport.

Enter VALENTINE and FORESIGHT.

For. Mercy on us!

Val. Hush! interrupt me not; I'll whisper prediction to thee, and thou shalt prophecy. I have told thee what's past, now I'll tell what's to come. Dost thou know what will happen to-morrow? Answer me not, for I will tell thee. To-morrow, knaves will thrive through craft, and fools through fortune; and honesty will go as it did, frost-nipt in a summer-suit. Ask me questions concerning to-morrow.

Scand. Ask him, Mr. Foresight.

For. Pray, what will be done at court?

Val. Scandal will tell you—I am honest; I never come there.

For. In the city?

Val. Oh! prayers will be said in empty churches, at the usual hours. Yet you will see such zealous faces behind counters, as if religion were to be sold in every shop. Oh! things will go methodically in the city. Husbands and wives will drive distinct trades; and care and pleasure separately occupy the family. But, hold! I must examine you before I go further; you look suspiciously. Are you a husband?

For. I am married.

Val. Poor creature! Is your wife of Covent Garden parish?

For. No; St. Martin in the Fields.

Val. Alas! poor man! his eyes are sunk, and his hands shrivelled; his legs dwindled, and his back bowed. Pray, pray for a metamorphosis. Change thy shape, and shake off age; get thee Medea's kettle, and be boiled anew; come forth, with labouring callous hands, a chine of steel and Atlas' shoulders. Let Taliacotius trim the calves of twenty chairmen, and make thee pedestals to stand erect upon, and look matrimony in the face. Ha, ha, ha! that a man should have a stomach to a wedding-supper, when the pigeons ought rather to be laid to his feet. Ha, ha, ha!

For. His frenzy is very high now, Mr. Scandal.

Scand. I believe it is a spring-tide.

For. Very likely, truly; you understand these matters. Mr. Scandal, I shall be very glad to confer with you about these things which he has uttered. His sayings are very mysterious and hieroglyphical.

Val. Oh! why would Angelica be absent from my eyes so long?

Jer. She's here, sir.

Mrs. For. Now sister.

Mrs. F. Oh, lord! what must I say?

Scand. Humour him, madam, by all means.

Val. Where is she? Oh! I see her. She comes like riches, health, and liberty, at once, to a despairing, starving, and abandoned wretch. Oh! welcome, welcome!

Mrs. F. How d'ye, sir? can I serve you?

Val. Harkye! I have a secret to tell you: Eudymion and the moon shall meet us upon Mount Latmos, and we'll be married in the dead of night. But say not a word. Hymen shall put his torch into a dark lantern, that it may be secret; and Juno shall give her peacock poppy-water, that he may fold his ogling tail; and Argus' hundred eyes be shut, eh? Nobody shall know but Jeremy.

Mrs. F. No, no; we'll keep it secret; it shall be done presently.

Val. The sooner the better; Jeremy, come hither—closer, that none may overhear us. Jeremy, I can tell you news. Angelica is turned nun; and I am turned friar: and yet we'll marry one another in spite of the pope. Get me a cowl and beads, that I may play my part; for she'll meet me two hours hence in black and white, and a long veil to cover the project; and we won't see one another's faces, till we have done something to be ashamed of; and then we'll blush once for all.

Jer. I'll take care and—

Val. Whisper.

Enter ANGELICA and TATTLE.

Ang. Nay, Mr. Tattle, if you make love to me, you spoil my design; for I intend to make you my confidant.

Scand. How's this! Tattle making love to Angelica!

Tat. But, madam, to throw away your person, such a person, and such a fortune, on a madman!

Ang. I never loved him till he was mad; but don't tell anybody so.

Tat. Tell, madam! alas! you don't know me. I have much ado to tell your ladyship how long I have been in love with you; but, encouraged by the impossibility of Valentine's making any more addresses to you, I have ventured to declare the very inmost passion of my heart. Oh! madam, look upon us both. There you see the ruins of a poor decayed creature! Here, a complete lively figure, with youth and health, and all his five senses in perfection, madam; and to all this, the most passionate lover.

Ang. Oh! fie for shame, hold your tongue. A passionate lover, and five senses in perfection! When you are as mad as Valentine, I'll believe you love me; and the maddest shall take me.

Val. It is enough. Ah! who's there?

Mrs. F. Oh, lord! her coming will spoil all.

[To JEREMY.]

Jer. No, no, madam; he won't know her; if he should, I can persuade him.

Val. Scandal, who are these? Foreigners? If they are, I'll tell you what I think. Get away all the company but Angelica, that I may discover my design to her.

[Whispers.]

Scand. I will. I have discovered something of Tattle, that is of a piece with Mrs. Frail. He courts Angelica: if we could contrive to couple them together—Harkye!

[Whispers.]

Mrs. F. He won't know you, cousin; he knows nobody.

For. But he knows more than anybody. Oh! niece, he knows things past and to come, and all the profound secrets of time.

Tat. Look you, Mr. Foresight; it is not my way to make many words of matters, and so I sha'n't say much. But, in short, d'ye see, I will hold you a hundred pounds, now, that I know more secrets than he.

For. How? I cannot read that knowledge in your face, Mr. Tattle. Pray what do you know?

Tat. Why, d'ye think I'll tell you, sir? Read it in my face! No, sir, it is written in my heart; and safer there, sir, than letters written in juice of lemon, for no fire can fetch it out. I'm no blab, sir.

Val. Acquaint Jeremy with it: he may easily bring it about. They are welcome, and I'll tell them so myself. [To SCANDAL.] What, do you look strange upon me? Then I must be plain: [coming up to them] I am honest, and hate an old acquaintance with a new face.

[SCANDAL goes aside with JEREMY.]

Tat. Do you know me, Valentine?

Val. You? Who are you? I hope not.

Tat. I am Jack Tattle, your friend.

Val. My friend! what to do? I'm no married man, and thou canst not lie with my wife. I am very poor, and thou canst not borrow money of me. Then what employment have I for a friend?

Tat. Ha! a good open speaker, and not to be trusted with a secret.

Ang. Do you know me, Valentine?

Val. Oh! very well.

Ang. Who am I?

Val. You're a woman; one to whom nature gave beauty, when it grafted roses on a briar. You are the reflection of heaven in a pond; and he that leaps at you is sunk. You are all white; a sheet of lovely spotless paper, when you were first born; but you are to be scrawled and blotted by every goose's quill. I know you; for I loved a woman, and loved her so long, that I found out a strange thing, I found out what a woman is good for.

Tat. Ay, pr'ythee, what's that?

Val. Why, to keep a secret.

Tat. Oh, lord!

Val. Oh! exceedingly good to keep a secret; for though she should tell, yet she is not believed.

Tat. Ha! good again, faith.

Jer. I'll do't, sir.

Scand. Mr. Foresight, we had best leave him. He may grow outrageous, and do mischief.

For. I will be directed by you. [Exit FORESIGHT.]
Jer. [To Mrs. FRAIL.] You'll meet, madam. I'll take care everything shall be ready.

Mrs. F. Thou shalt do what thou wilt; in short, I will deny thee nothing.

Tat. Madam, shall I wait upon you?

[To ANGELICA.]

Ang. No; I'll stay with him. Mr. Scandal will protect me. Aunt, Mr. Tattle desires you would give him leave to wait upon you.

Tat. Pox on't! there's no coming off, now she has said that—Madam, will you do me the honour?

Mrs. For. Mr. Tattle might have used less ceremony.

[Exeunt Mrs. FRAIL, Mrs. FORESIGHT, and TATTLE.]

Scand. Jeremy, follow Tattle. [Exit JEREMY.]

Ang. Mr. Scandal, I only stay till my maid comes, and because I have a mind to be rid of Mr. Tattle.

Scand. Madam, I am very glad that I overheard a better reason which you gave to Mr. Tattle; for his impertinence forced you to acknowledge a kindness for Valentine, which you denied to all his sufferings and my solicitations. So, I'll leave him to make use of the discovery; and your ladyship to the free confession of your inclinations.

Ang. Oh! heavens, you won't leave me alone with a madman?

Scand. No, madam; I only leave a madman to his remedy. [Exit.

Val. Madam, you need not be very much afraid, for I fancy I begin to come to myself.

Ang. Ay, but if I don't fit you, I'll be hanged. [Aside.

Val. You see what disguises love makes us put on. Gods have been in counterfeited shapes for the same reason; and the divine part of me, my mind, has worn this masque of madness, and this motley livery, only as the slave of love and menial creature of your beauty.

Ang. Mercy on me, how he talks! Poor Valentine!

Val. Nay, faith, now let us understand one another; hypocrisy apart. The comedy draws towards an end; and let us think of leaving acting, and be ourselves; and since you have loved me, you must own, I have at length deserved you should confess it.

Ang. [Sighs.] I would I had loved you; for heaven knows, I pity you; and, could I have foreseen the bad effects, I would have striven; but that's too late.

Val. What bad effects? what's too late? My seeming madness has deceived my father, and procured me time to think of means to reconcile me to him, and preserve the right of my inheritance to his estate; which, otherwise, by articles, I must this morning have resigned. And this I had informed you of to-day, but you were gone before I knew you had been here.

Ang. How! I thought your love of me had caused this transport in your soul; which, it seems, you only counterfeited for mercenary ends and sordid interest.

Val. Nay, now you do me wrong; for, if any interest was considered, it was your's; since I thought I wanted more than love to make me worthy of you.

Ang. Then you thought me mercenary; but how am I deluded by this interval of sense, to reason with a madman!

Val. Oh! 'tis barbarous to misunderstand me longer.

Enter JEREMY.

Ang. Oh! here's a reasonable creature; sure he will not have the impudence to persevere! Come, Jeremy, acknowledge your trick, and confess your master's madness counterfeited.

Jer. Counterfeit, madam! I'll maintain him to be as absolutely and substantially mad as any freeholder in Bedlam. Nay, he's as mad as any projector, fanatic, chemist, lover, or poet, in Europe.

Val. Sirrah! you lie; I'm not mad.

Ang. Ha, ha, ha! you see he denies it.

Jer. Oh, lord! madam, did you ever know any madman mad enough to own it?

Val. So! can't you apprehend?

Ang. Why, he talked very sensibly just now

Jer. Yes, madam; he has intervals: but you see he begins to look wild again now.

Val. Why, you thick-skulled rascal, I tell you the farce is done, and I'll be mad no longer.

[Beats him.

Ang. Ha, ha, ha! is he mad or no, Jeremy?

Jer. Partly, I think; for he does not know his own mind two hours. I'm sure I left him just now in the humour to be mad; and I think I have not found him very quiet at the present. [Knocking without.] Who's there? [Erit.

Val. Go see, you sot! I'm very glad that I can move your mirth, though not your compassion.

Ang. I did not think you had apprehension enough to be exceptionary; but madmen shew themselves most by over-pretending to a sound understanding, as drunken men do by over-acting sobriety. I was half inclining to believe you, till I accidentally touched upon your tender part. But now you have restored me to my former opinion and compassion.

Re-enter JEREMY.

Jer. Sir, your father has sent to know if you are any better yet. Will you please to be mad, sir, or how?

Val. Stupidity! you know the penalty of all I'm worth must pay for the confession of my senses. I'm mad, and will be mad, to everybody but this lady.

Jer. So; just the very reverse of truth. But lying is a figure in speech, that interlards the greatest part of my conversation. Madam, your ladyship's woman. [Erit.

Enter JENNY.

Ang. Well, have you been there? Come hither.

Jenny. Yes, madam; Sir Sampson will wait upon you presently. [Aside to ANGELICA.

Val. You are not leaving me in this uncertainty? Ang. Would anything but a madman complain of uncertainty? Uncertainty and expectation are the joys of life. Security is an insipid thing; and the overtaking and possessing of a wish, discovers the folly of the chase. Never let us know one another better; for the pleasure of a masquerade is done, when we come to shew our faces. But I'll tell you two things before I leave you; I am not the fool you take me for; and you are mad, and don't know it. [Ereunt ANGELICA and JENNY.

Re-enter JEREMY.

Val. From a riddle you can expect nothing but a riddle. There's my instruction, and the moral of my lesson.

Jer. What, is the lady gone again, sir? I hope you understood one another before she went?

Val. Understood! she is harder to be understood than a piece of Egyptian antiquity, or an Irish manuscript; you may pore till you spoil your eyes, and not improve your knowledge.

Jer. I have heard them say, sir, they read hard Hebrew books backwards. May be, you begin to read at the wrong end.

Val. Yet, while she does not seem to hate me, I will pursue her, and know her, if it be possible, in spite of the opinion of my satirical friend, who says,—

*That women are like tricks by sleight of hand;
Which, to admire, we should not understand.*

[Ereunt.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Room in Foresight's House.

Enter ANGELICA and JENNY.

Ang. Where is Sir Sampson? Did you not tell me he would be here before me?

Jenny. He's at the great glass in the dining-room, madam, setting his cravat and wig.

Ang. How! I'm glad on't. If he has a mind I should like him, it's a sign he likes me; and that's more than half my design.

Jenny. I hear him, madam.

Ang. Leave me; and, d'ye hear? if Valentine should come, or send, I am not to be spoken with.

[Exit JENNY.]

Enter Sir SAMPSON LEGEND.

Sir S. I have not been honoured with the commands of a fair lady a great while. Ods! madam, you have revived me—not since I was five and thirty.

Ang. Why, you have no great reason to complain, Sir Sampson; that's not long ago.

Sir S. Zooks! but it is, madam; a very great while to a man that admires a fine woman as much as I do.

Ang. You're an absolute courtier, Sir Sampson.

Sir S. Not at all, madam. Odsbud! you wrong me: I am not so old neither to be a bare courtier, only a man of words. Come, come; let me tell you, you women think a man old too soon; faith and troth, you do. Come, don't despise fifty; ods! fifty, in a hale constitution, is no such contemptible age!

Ang. Fifty a contemptible age! not at all: a very fashionable age, I think; I assure you, I know very considerable beaux, that set a good face upon fifty. Fifty! I have seen fifty in a side-box, by candle-light, out-blossom five and twenty.

Sir S. Outsides, outsides! a pize take them, mere outsides. Hang your side-box beaux; no, I'm none of those, none of your forced trees, that pretend to blossom in the fall, and bud when they should bring forth fruit. I am of a long-lived race, and inherit vigour. None of my ancestors married till fifty; yet they begot sons and daughters till fourscore. I am of your patriarchs; I, a branch of one of your antediluvian families, fellows that the flood could not wash away. Well, madam, what are your commands? Has any young rogue affronted you, and shall I cut his throat; or—

Ang. No, Sir Sampson, I have no quarrel upon my hands; I have more occasion for your conduct than your courage at this time. To tell you the truth, I'm weary of living single, and want a husband.

Sir S. Madam, you deserve a good husband; and 'twere pity you should be thrown away upon any of these young idle rogues about the town. Od! there's ne'er a young fellow worth hanging; that is, a very young fellow.

Ang. Therefore, I ask your advice, Sir Sampson. I have fortune enough to make any man easy that I can like; if there were such a thing as a young agreeable man, with a reasonable stock of good nature and sense; for I would neither have an absolute wit, nor a fool.

Sir S. Od! you are hard to please, madam: to find a young fellow that is neither a wit in his own eye, nor a fool in the eye of the world, is a very hard task. But, faith and troth, you speak very discreetly. I hate a wit; I had a son that was spoiled among them; a good hopeful lad, till he learned to be a wit, and might have risen in the state. But, a plague on't! his wit ran him out of his money, and now his poverty has run him out of his wits.

Ang. Sir Sampson, as your friend, I must tell you, you are very much abused in that matter; he's no more mad than you are.

Sir S. How, madam! would I could prove it.

Ang. I can tell you how that may be done; but it is a thing that would make me appear to be too much concerned in your affairs.

Sir S. Odsbud! I believe she likes me. [Aside.] If I had Peru in one hand, and Mexico in t'other, and the eastern empire under my feet; it would make me only a more glorious victim to be offered at the shrine of your beauty.

Ang. Bless me, Sir Sampson, what's the matter?

Sir S. Od! madam, I love you; and if you would take my advice in a husband—

Ang. Hold, hold! Sir Sampson, I asked your advice for a husband, and you are giving me your consent. I was, indeed, thinking to propose something like it in jest, to satisfy you about Valentine; for if a match were seemingly carried on between you and me, it would oblige him to throw off his disguise of madness, in apprehension of losing me; for, you know, he has long pretended a passion for me.

Sir S. Gadzooks! a most ingenious contrivance, if we were to go through with it. But why must the match only be seemingly carried on? Od! let it be a real contract.

Ang. Oh, fie! Sir Sampson, what would the world say?

Sir S. Say! They would say you were a wise woman, and I a happy man. Od! madam, I'll love you as long as I live, and leave you a good jointure when I die.

Ang. Ay, but that is not in your power, Sir Sampson; for when Valentine confesses himself in his senses, he must make over his inheritance to his younger brother.

Sir S. Od! you're cunning; a wary baggage. Faith and troth, I like you the better. But, I warrant you, I have a proviso in the obligation in favour of myself. Body o'me! I have a trick to turn the settlement upon the issue male of our two bodies begotten. Odsbud! let us find children, and I'll find an estate.

Ang. Will you! Well, do you find the estate, and leave the other to me.

Sir S. Oh! rogue! but I'll trust you. And will you consent? Is it a match, then?

Ang. Let me consult my lawyer concerning this obligation; and if I find what you propose practicable, I'll give you my answer.

Sir S. With all my heart. Come in with me, and I'll lend you the bond. Ods! here's somebody coming. [Exeunt.]

Enter TATTLE and JEREMY.

Tat. Is not that she gone out just now?

Jer. Ay, sir, she's just going to the place of appointment.

Tat. Egad! thou art a pretty fellow. But I hope you are secret in your nature; private, close, eh?

Jer. Oh! sir, for that, sir, 'tis my chief talent; I'm as secret as the head of Nilus.

Tat. Ay! who's he, though? A privy councillor?
Jer. Oh! ignorance! [Aside.] A cunning Egyptian, sir, that with his arms could overrun the country, yet nobody could ever find out his headquarters.

Tat. Close dog! a rare fellow amongst the wenches, I warrant him. The time draws nigh, Jeremy; Angelica will be veiled like a nun, and I must be hooded like a friar, eh, Jeremy?

Jer. Ay, sir; hooded like a hawk, to seize at first sight upon the quarry. It is the whim of my master's madness to be so dressed; and she is so in love with him, she'll comply with anything to please him. Poor lady! I'm sure she'll have reason to pray for me, when she finds what a happy change she has made, between a madman and so accomplished a gentleman.

Tat. Ay, faith, so she will, Jeremy: you're a good friend to her, poor creature! I swear I do it hardly so much in consideration of myself, as compassion to her.

Jer. 'Tis an act of charity, sir, to save a fine woman with sixty thousand pounds, from throwing herself away.

Tat. So 'tis, faith! I might have saved several others in my time; but, egad! I could never find in my heart to marry anybody before.

Jer. Well, sir, I'll go and tell her my master's coming; and meet you in half a quarter of an hour, with your disguise, at your own lodgings. You must talk a little madly; she won't distinguish the tone of your voice.

Tat. No, no; let me alone for a counterfeit. I'll be ready for you. [Exit JEREMY.]

Enter Miss PRUE.

Miss P. Oh! Mr. Tattle, are you here? I am glad I have found you. I have been looking up and down for you like anything, till I am as tired as anything in the world.

Tat. Oh! plague; how shall I get rid of this foolish girl? [Aside.]

Miss P. Oh! I have pure news, I can tell you pure news; I must not marry the seaman now, my father says so. Why won't you be my husband? You say you love me, and you won't be my husband; and I know you may be my husband now, if you please.

Tat. Oh! fie, miss! Who told you so, child?

Miss P. Why, my father; I told him that you loved me.

Tat. Oh! fie, miss! Why did you do so? and who told you so, child?

Miss P. Who! why you did, did not you?

Tat. Oh! plague! that was yesterday, miss; that was a great while ago, child. I have been asleep since; slept a whole night, and did not so much as dream of the matter.

Miss P. Psha! Oh! but I dreamt that it was so, though.

Tat. Ay, but your father will tell you, that dreams come by contraries, child. Oh, fie! what we must not love one another now. Psha! that would be a foolish thing, indeed. Fie, fie! you're a woman now, and must think of a new man every morning, and forget him every night. No, no; to marry is to be a child again, and play with the same rattle always. Oh, fie! marrying is a paw thing.

Miss P. Well, but don't you love me as well as you did last night, then?

Tat. No, no, child; you would not have me.

Miss P. No? Yes, but I would, though.

Tat. Psha! but I tell you, you would not. You forget you are a woman, and don't know your own mind.

Miss P. But here's my father, and he knows my mind.

Enter FORESIGHT.

For. Oh! Mr. Tattle, your servant; you are a close man; but, methinks, your love to my daughter was a secret I might have been trusted with; or had you a mind to try if I could discover it by my art? Hum, ha! I think there is something in your physiognomy that has a resemblance of her; and the girl is like me.

Tat. And so you would infer, that you and I are alike. What does the old prig mean? I'll banter him, and laugh at him, and leave him. [Aside.] I fancy you have a wrong notion of faces.

For. How? what? a wrong notion! How so?

Tat. In the way of art, I have some taking features, not obvious to vulgar eyes, that are indicative of a sudden turn of good fortune in the lottery of wives; and promise a great beauty and great fortune, reserved alone for me, by a private intrigue of destiny, kept secret from the piercing eye of perspicuity, from all astrologers, and the stars themselves.

For. How? I will make it appear that what you say is impossible.

Tat. Sir, I beg your pardon, I am in haste—

For. For what?

Tat. To be married, sir—married!

For. Ay, but pray take me along with you, sir.

Tat. No, sir; it is to be done privately; I never make confidants.

For. Well; but my consent, I mean. You won't marry my daughter without my consent?

Tat. Who, I, sir? I am an absolute stranger to you and your daughter, sir.

For. Heyday! What time of the moon is this?

Tat. Very true, sir; and desire to continue so. I have no more love for your daughter, than I have likeness of you; and I have a secret in my heart, which you would be glad to know, and sha'n't know; and yet you shall know it, too, and be sorry for it afterwards. I'd have you know, sir, that I am as knowing as the stars, and as secret as the night. And I'm going to be married just now, yet did not know of it half an hour ago, and the lady stays for me, and does not know of it yet. There's a mystery for you! I know you love to untie difficulties. Or, if you can't solve this, stay here a quarter of an hour, and I'll come and explain it to you. [Exit.]

Miss P. Oh! father, why will you let him go? Won't you make him to be my husband?

For. Mercy on us! what do these lunacies portend? Alas! he's mad, child, stark wild!

Miss P. What, and must not I have e'er a husband, then? What, must I go to bed to nurse again, and be a child as long as she's an old woman? Indeed, but I won't. For, now my mind is set upon a man, I will have a man some way or other.

For. Oh! fearful! I think the girl's influenced, too. Hussy! you shall have a rod.

Miss P. A fiddle of a rod! I'll have a husband; and if you won't get me one, I'll get one for myself. I'll marry our Robin, the butler; he says he loves me; and he's a handsome man, and shall be my husband: I warrant he'll be my husband, and thank me, too; for he told me so.

Enter Nurse.

For. Did he so? I'll despatch him for it presently! Rogue! Oh! Nurse, come hither.

Nurse. What is your worship's pleasure?

For. Here, take your young mistress, and lock her up presently, till farther orders from me. Not a word, hussy; do what I bid you. No reply: away! and bid Robin make ready to give an account of his plate and linen, d'ye hear? Begone, when I bid you.

[Exeunt Nurse and Miss P.]

Enter Mrs. FORESIGHT and SCANDAL.

Mrs. For. What's the matter, husband?

For. 'Tis not convenient to tell you now. Mr. Scandal, heaven keep us all in our senses! I fear there is a contagious frenzy abroad. How does Valentine?

Scand. Oh! I hope he will do well again. I have a message from him to your niece Angelica.

For. I think she has not returned since she went abroad with Sir Sampson.

Enter BEN.

Here's Mr. Benjamin; he can tell us, if his father be come home.

Ben. Who? Father? Ay, he's come home with a vengeance!

Mrs. For. Why, what's the matter?

Ben. Matter! why, he's mad.

For. Mercy on us! I was afraid of this.

Ben. And there's a handsome young woman, she, as they say, brother Val went mad for; she's mad, too, I think.

For. Oh! my poor niece, my poor niece! is she gone, too? Well, I shall run mad next.

Mrs. For. Well, but how mad? How d'ye mean?

Ben. Nay, I'll give you leave to guess; I'll undertake to make a voyage to Antigua. No; I mayn't say so, neither; but I'll sail as far as Leghorn, and back again, before you shall guess at the matter, and do nothing else. Mess! you may take in all the points of the compass, and not hit the right.

Mrs. For. Your experiment will take up a little too much time.

Ben. Why, then, I'll tell you: there's a new wedding upon the stocks, and they two are a-going to be married to-night.

Scand. Who?

Ben. Why, father, and—the young woman—I can't hit her name.

Scand. Angelica?

Ben. Ay, the same.

Mrs. For. Sir Sampson and Angelica? Impossible.

Ben. That may be; but I'm sure it is as I tell you.

Scand. 'Sdeath! it is a jest. I can't believe it.

Ben. Lookye, friend; it is nothing to me, whether you believe it or no. What I say is true, d'ye see; they are married, or just going to be married, I know not which.

For. Well, but they are not mad; that is, not lunatic?

Ben. I don't know what you may call madness, but she's mad for a husband, and he's horn-mad, I think, or they'd never make a match together. Here they come.

Enter Sir SAMPSON LEGEND, ANGELICA, and BUCKRAM.

Sir S. Where's this old soothsayer? this uncle of mine elect.—Aha! old Foresight! uncle Foresight! wish me joy, uncle Foresight, double joy, both as uncle and astrologer: here's a conjunction that was not foretold in your Ephemeris. The brightest star in the blue firmament is shot from above; and I'm lord of the ascendant. Od! you're an old fellow, Foresight, uncle I mean; a very old fellow, uncle Foresight; and yet you shall live to dance at my wedding; faith and troth, you shall. Od! we'll have the music of the spheres for thee, old Lilly, that we will; and thou shalt lead up a dance in via lactea.

For. I'm thunderstruck! You are not married to my niece?

Sir S. Not absolutely married, uncle; but very near it; within a kiss of the matter, as you see.

[Kisses ANGELICA.]

Ang. 'Tis very true, indeed, uncle; I hope you'll be my father, and give me.

Sir S. That he shall, or I'll burn his globes.

Scand. Death and hell! Where's Valentine?

[Exit.]

Mrs. For. This is so surprising—

Sir S. How! What does my aunt say? surprising, aunt? not at all, for a young couple to make a match in winter. Not at all; it's a plot to undermine cold weather, and destroy that usurper of a bed, called a warming-pan.

Mrs. For. I'm glad to hear you have so much fire in you, Sir Sampson.

Ben. Mess! I fear his fire's little better than tinder.

Sir S. Why, you impudent tarpaulin! sirrah, do you bring your forecastle jests upon your father? But I shall be even with you; I won't give you a groat. Mr. Buckram, is the conveyance so worded, that nothing can possibly descend to this scoundrel? I would not so much as have him have the prospect of an estate, though there were no way to come to it but by the north-east passage.

Buck. Sir, it is drawn according to your directions; there is not the least cranny of the law un-stopped.

Ben. Lawyer, I believe there's many a cranny and leak unstopped in your conscience. If so be that one had a pump to your bosom, I believe we should discover a foul hold. They say a witch will sail in a sieve; but I believe the devil would not venture aboard your conscience. And that's for you.

Sir S. Hold your tongue, sirrah. How now! who's here?

Enter Mrs. FRAIL and TATTLE.

Mrs. F. Oh! sister, the most unlucky accident.

Mrs. For. What's the matter?

Tat. Oh! the two most unfortunate poor creatures in the world we are.

For. Bless us! how so?

Mrs. F. Ah! Mr. Tattle and I, poor Mr. Tattle and I are—I can't speak it out.

Tat. Nor I. But poor Mrs. Frail and I are—

Mrs. F. Married.

For. Married! how?

Tat. Suddenly; before we knew where we were, that villain Jeremy, by the help of disguises, tricked us into one another.

For. Why, you told me just now, you went hence, in haste, to be married.

Ang. But I believe Mr. Tattle meant the favour for me, I thank him.

Tat. I did, as I hope to be saved, madam; my intentions were good. But this is the most cruel thing, to marry, one does not know how, nor why, nor wherefore. The devil take me, if ever I was so much concerned at anything in my life!

Ang. 'Tis very unhappy, if you don't care for one another.

Tat. The least in the world; that is, for my part, I speak for myself. 'Gad! I never had the least thought of serious kindness; I never liked anybody less in my life. Poor woman! 'Gad! I'm sorry for her, too; for I have no reason to hate her, neither; but I believe I shall lead her a d—d sort of a life.

Mrs. For. He's better than no husband at all—though he's a coxcomb. [To Mrs. F.]

Mrs. F. [To Mrs. For.] Ay, ay; it's well it's no worse. Nay, for my part, I always despised Mr. Tattle of all things; nothing but his being my husband could have made me like him less.

Tat. Look you there, I thought as much! Plague on't! I wish we could keep it secret; why, I don't believe any of this company would speak of it.

Ben. If you suspect me, friend, I'll go out of the room.

Mrs. F. But, my dear, that's impossible; the parson and that rogue Jeremy will publish it.

Tat. Ay, my dear, so they will, as you say.

Ang. Oh! you'll agree very well in a little time; custom will make it easy for you.

Tat. Easy! Plague on't! I don't believe I shall sleep to-night.

Sir S. Sleep, quotha! No; why, you would not sleep on your wedding-night? I'm an older fellow than you, and don't mean to sleep.

Ben. Why, there's another match now, as thof a couple of privateers were looking for a prize, and should fall foul of one another. I'm sorry for the young man with all my heart. Look you, friend! if I may advise you, when she's going—for that you must expect; I have experience of her—when she's going, let her go; for no matrimony is tough enough to hold her; and if she can't drag her anchor along with her, she'll break her cable, I can tell you that. Who's here, the madman?

Enter VALENTINE, SCANDAL, and JEREMY.

Val. No; here's the fool; and if occasion be, I'll give it under my hand.

Sir S. How now?

Val. Sir, I am come to acknowledge my errors, and ask your pardon.

Sir S. What, have you found your senses at last, then? In good time, sir.

Val. You were abused, sir; I never was distracted.

For. How? not mad, Mr. Scandal?

Scand. No, really, sir; I am his witness, it was all counterfeit.

Val. I thought I had reasons—but it was a poor contrivance; the effect has shewn it such.

Sir S. Contrivance! what, to cheat me? to cheat your father? Sirrah, could you hope to prosper?

Val. Indeed, I thought, sir, when the father endeavoured to undo the son, it was a reasonable return of nature.

Sir S. Very good, sir. Mr. Buckram, are you ready? Come, sir, will you sign and seal?

Val. If you please, sir; but first, I would ask this lady one question.

Sir S. Sir, you must ask me leave first. That lady! no, sir; you shall ask that lady no questions till you have asked her blessing, sir; that lady is to be my wife.

Val. I have heard as much, sir; but I would have it from her own mouth.

Sir S. That is as much as to say, I lie, sir; and you don't believe what I say.

ACT. DRAMA.—NOS. 111 & 112.

Val. Pardon me, sir. But I reflect that I, very lately, counterfeited madness: I don't know but the frolic may go round.

Sir S. Come, chuck! satisfy him, answer him. Come, Mr. Buckram, the pen and ink.

Buck. Here it is, sir, with the deed; all is ready.

[VALENTINE goes to ANGELICA.]

Ang. 'Tis true, you have a great while pretended love to me; nay, what if you were sincere? Still you must pardon me, if I think my own inclinations have a better right to dispose of my person than your's.

Sir S. Are you answered now, sir?

Val. Yes, sir.

Sir S. Where's your plot, sir? and your contrivance now, sir? Will you sign, sir? Come, will you sign and seal, sir?

Val. With all my heart, sir.

Scand. 'Sdeath! you are not mad, indeed? to ruin yourself?

Val. I have been disappointed of my only hope; and he that loses hope, may part with anything. I never valued fortune but as it was subservient to my pleasure; and my only pleasure was to please this lady: I have made many vain attempts, and find, at last, that nothing but my ruin can effect it; which, for that reason, I will sign to. Give me the paper.

Ang. Generous Valentine!

[Aside.]

Buck. Here is the deed, sir.

Val. But where is the bond by which I am obliged to sign this?

Buck. Sir Sampson, you have it.

Ang. No, I have it; and I'll use it as I would everything that is an enemy to Valentine.

[Tears the paper.]

Sir S. How now?

Val. Ah!

Ang. Had I the world to give you, it could not make me worthy of so generous and faithful a passion. Here's my hand; my heart was always your's, and struggled very hard to make this utmost trial of your virtue.

[To VALENTINE.]

Val. Between pleasure and amazement, I am lost: but on my knees I take the blessing.

Sir S. Oons! what is the meaning of this?

Ben. Mess! here's the wind changed again. Father, you and I may make a voyage together now.

Ang. Well, Sir Sampson, since I have played you a trick, I'll advise you how you may avoid such another. Learn to be a good father, or you'll never get a second wife. I always loved your son, and hated your unforgiving nature; and it is hardly more pleasure to me, that I can make him and myself happy, than that I can punish you.

Sir S. Oons! you're a crocodile!

For. Really, Sir Sampson, this is a sudden eclipse.

Sir S. You're an illiterate old fool; and I'm another. The stars are liars; and if I had breath, I'd curse them and you, myself, and all the world.

Tat. Sir, sir, if you are in all this disorder for want of a wife, I can spare you mine.

Sir S. Confound you and your wife together!

[Exit Sir S. and For.]

Tat. Oh! are you there, sir? I am indebted to you for my happiness.

[To JEREMY.]

Jer. Sir, I ask you ten thousand pardons: it was an arrant mistake. You see, sir, my master was never mad, nor anything like it. Then how can it be otherwise?

Val. Tattle, I thank you: you would have interposed between me and heaven, but Providence laid purgatory in your way. You have but justice.

4 H

Scand. [To ANG.] Well, madam, you have done exemplary justice, in punishing an inhuman father, and rewarding a faithful lover: but there is a third good work, which I, in particular, must thank you for: I was an infidel to your sex, and you have converted me; for now I am convinced that all women are not, like fortune, blind in bestowing favours, either on those who do not merit, or who do not want them.

Ang. It is an unreasonable accusation that you lay upon our sex. You tax us with injustice, only to cover your own want of merit. You would all have the reward of love; but few have the constancy to stay till it becomes your due. How few, like Valentine, would persevere even to martyrdom, and sacrifice their interest to their constancy? In admiring me, you misplace the novelty.

The miracle to-day is, that we find

A lover true; not that a woman's kind. [Exeunt.

DORCAS
PHOEBE ROSINA.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A cottage.

DORCAS, seated on a bench, is spinning; ROSINA and PHOEBE are measuring corn; WILLIAM enters, and they sing the following

TRIO.

*When the rosy morn appearing,
Paints with gold the verdant lawn,
Bees, on banks of thyme disporting,
Sip the sweets, and hail the dawn.
Warbling birds, the day proclaiming,
Carol sweet the lively strain;*

*They forsake their leafy dwelling,
To secure the golden grain.*

*See, content, the humble gleaner
Takes the scatter'd ears that fall;
Nature, all her children viewing,
Kindly bounteous, cares for all.*

[WILLIAM retires with PHOEBE.

Ros. See, my dear Dorcas, what we gleaned yesterday in Mr. Belville's field.

Dor. Lord love thee! but take care of thyself; thou art but tender.

Ros. Indeed, it does not hurt me. Shall I put out the lamp?

Dor. Do, dear; the poor must be sparing.

[ROSINA going to put out the lamp, DORCAS looks after her and sighs; she returns hastily.

Ros. Why do you sigh, Dorcas?

Dor. I cannot bear it: it's nothing to Phoebe and me, but thou wast not born to labour.

Ros. Why should I repine? Heaven, which deprived me of my parents, and my fortune, left me health, content and innocence. Nor is it certain that riches lead to happiness. Do you think the nightingale sings the sweeter for being in a gilded cage?

Dor. Sweeter, I'll maintain it, than the poor little linnet that thou pick'dst up half starved under the hedge yesterday, after its mother had been shot, and brought'st to life in thy bosom. Let me speak to his honour; he's main kind to the poor.

Ros. Not for the world, Dorcas; I want nothing; you have been a mother to me.

Dor. Would I could! Would I, could! I have worked hard and 'arn'd money in my time; but now I am old and feeble, and am pushed about by every body. More's the pity, I say; it was not so in my young time; but the world grows wickeder every day.

Ros. Your age, my good Dorcas, requires rest; go into the cottage, whilst Phœbe and I join the gleaners, who are assembling from every part of the village.

Dor. Many a time have I carried thy dear mother, an infant, in these arms; little did I think a child of her's would live to share my poor pittance. But I won't grieve thee. [DORCAS enters the cottage.

Phœ. What makes you so melancholy, Rosina? Mayhap it's because you have not a sweetheart? But you are so proud, you won't let our young men come a-near you. You may live to repent being so scornful. [ROSINA retires.

AIR.—PHŒBE.

When William at eve meets me down at the stile,

How sweet is the nightingale's song!

Of the day I forget all the labour and toil,

Whilst the moon plays yon branches among.

By her beams, without blushing, I hear him complain,

And believe every word of her song:

You know not how sweet 'tis to love the dear swain,

Whilst the moon plays yon branches among.

[During the last stanza, WILLIAM appears, and makes signs to PHŒBE; who steals softly to him, and they disappear.

Ros. How small a part of my evils is poverty! And how little does Phœbe know the heart she thinks insensible! the heart which nourishes a hopeless passion. I blest, like others, Belville's gentle virtues, and knew not that 'twas love. Unhappy, lost Rosina!

AIR.—ROSINA.

The morn returns, in saffron drest,

But not to sad Rosina rest.

The blushing morn awakes the strain,

Awakes the tuneless choir;

But sad Rosina ne'er again

Shall strike the sprightly lyre.

Rust. [Without.] To work, my hearts of oak, to work; here the sun is half an hour high, and not a stroke struck yet.

Enter RUSTIC, singing, followed by Reapers.

AIR.

Rust. See, ye swains, yon streaks of red

Call you from your slothful bed:

Late you till'd the fruitful soil;

See! where harvest crowns your toil!

Cho. Late you till'd the fruitful soil;

See! where harvest crowns your toil!

Rust. As we reap the golden corn,

Laughing plenty fills her horn:

What would gilded pomp avail,

Should the peasant's labour fail?

Cho. What would gilded pomp avail

Should the peasant's labour fail?

Rust. Ripen'd fields your cares repay;

Sons of labour, haste away;

Bending, see the waving grain

Crown the year, and cheer the swain.

Cho. Bending, see the waving grain

Crown the year, and cheer the swain.

Rush. Hist! there's his honour. Where are all the lazy Irishmen, hired yesterday at market?

Enter BELVILLE, followed by two Irishmen.

1 Irish. Is it us he's talking of, Paddy? Then the devil may thank him for his good commendations.

Bel. You are too severe, Rustic; the poor fellows came three miles this morning; therefore I made them stop at the manor-house to take a little refreshment.

1 Irish. Bless your sweet face, my jewel, and all those who take your part. Bad luck to myself, if I would not, with all the veins of my heart, split the dew before your feet in a morning.

Rust. If I do speak a little cross, it's for your honour's good. [The Reapers cut the corn, and make it into sheaves. ROSINA follows and gleanes.] What a dickens does this girl do here? Keep back; wait till the reapers are off the field; do like the other gleaners.

Ros. If I have done wrong, sir, I will put what I have gleaned down again. [She lets fall the ears.

Bel. How can you be so unfeeling, Rustic? She is lovely, virtuous, and in want. Let fall some ears, that she may glean the more.

Rust. Your honour is too good by half.

Bel. No more: gather up the corn she has let fall. Do as I command you.

Rust. There; take the whole field since his honour chooses it. [Putting the corn into her apron.

[Exit.

Ros. I will not abuse his goodness.

[Retires gleanings.

2 Irish. Upon my soul, now, his honour's no churl of the wheat, whatever he may be of the barley.

[Exeunt.

Bel. [Looking after ROSINA.] What bewitching softness! There is a blushing, bashful gentleness, an almost infantine innocence in that lovely countenance, which it is impossible to behold without emotion. She turns this way: what bloom on that cheek! 'Tis the blushing down of the peach.

AIR.—BELVILLE.

Her mouth, which a smile

Devoid of all guile,

Half opens to view,

Is the bud of the rose,

In the morning that blows,

Impearl'd with the dew.

More fragrant her breath

Than the flow'r-scented heath.

At the dawning of day;

The hawthorn in bloom,

The lily's perfume,

Or the blossoms of May.

Enter CAPTAIN BELVILLE, in a riding-dress.

Capt. B. Good morrow, brother; you are early abroad.

Bel. My dear Charles, I am happy to see you. True, I find, to the first of September.

Capt. B. I meant to have been here last night, but one of my wheels broke, and I was obliged to sleep at a village six miles distant, where I left my chaise, and took a boat down the river at day-break. But your corn is not off the ground.

Bel. You know our harvest is late in the north; but you will find all the lands cleared on the other side of the mountain.

Capt. B. And pray, brother, how are the partridges this season?

Bel. There are twenty coveys within sight of my house, and the dogs are in fine order.

Capt. B. The gamekeeper is this moment leading them round. I am fired at the sight. But where is my little rustic charmer? O! there she is: I am transported. [Aside.] Pray, brother, is not that the little girl, whose dawning beauty we admired so much last year?

Bel. It is, and more lovely than ever. I shall dine in the field with my reapers to-day, brother: will you share our rural repast, or have a dinner prepared at the manor-house?

Capt. B. By no means: pray let me be of your party: your plan is an admirable one, especially if your girls are handsome. I'll walk round the field, and meet you at dinner-time. [Exit BELVILLE.]

AIR.

*By the dawn to the dawns we repair,
With bosoms right jocund and gay,
And gain more than pheasant or hare;
Gain health by the sports of the day.
Mark! mark! to the right hand, prepare!
See Diana! she points: see, they rise:
See, they float on the bosom of air!
Fire away! whilst loud echo replies,
Fire away!*

*Hark! the volley resounds to the skies;
Whilst echo in thunder replies:
In thunder replies,
And resounds to the skies,
Fire away! Fire away! Fire away!*

[ROSINA re-appears, CAPTAIN BELVILLE goes up to her, gleans a few ears, and presents them to her; she refuses them, and runs out; he follows her.]

Enter WILLIAM, speaking as he enters.

Will. Lead the dogs back, James; the Captain won't shoot to-day. [Seeing RUSTIC and PHÆBE behind.] Indeed, so close! I don't half like it.

Enter RUSTIC and PHÆBE.

Rust. That's a good girl! do as I bid you, and you sha'n't want encouragement.

[He goes up to the Reapers, and WILLIAM comes forward.]

Will. O no, I dare say she won't. So, Mrs. Phæbe!

Phæ. And so, Mr. William, if you go to that!

Will. A new sweetheart, I'll be sworn; and a pretty comely lad he is: but he's rich, and that's enough to win a woman.

Phæ. I don't deserve this of you, William; but I'm rightly sayed, for being such an easy fool. You think, mayhap, I'm at my last prayers; but you may find yourself mistaken.

Will. You do right to cry out first; you think, belike, that I did not see you take that posey from Harry.

Phæ. And you, belike, that I did not catch you tying up one, of cornflowers and wild roses, for the miller's maid; but I'll be fool'd no longer; I have done with you, Mr. William.

Will. I sha'n't break my heart, Mrs. Phæbe. The miller's maid loves the ground I walk on.

DUET.—WILLIAM and PHÆBE.

Will. I've kiss'd and I've prattled with fifty fair maids,
And chang'd them as oft d'ye see!

But of all the fair maidens that dance on the green,

The maid of the mill for me.

Phæ. There's fifty young men, who have told me fine tales,

And call'd me the fairest she:

But of all the gay wrestlers that sport on the green,

Young Harry's the lad for me.

Will. Her eyes are as black as a sloe in the hedge,

Her face like the blossoms in May,

*Her teeth are as white as the new-shorn flock,
Her breath like the new-made hay.*

Phæ. He's tall and he's straight as the poplar tree,

His cheeks are as fresh as the rose;

*He looks like a squire of high degree,
When drest in his Sunday clothes.*

Will. I've kiss'd and I've prattled, &c.

Phæ. There's fifty young men. &c.

[Exit PHÆBE and WILLIAM.]

ROSINA runs across the stage, CAPTAIN BELVILLE following her.

Capt. B. Stay and hear me, Rosina. Why will you fatigue yourself thus? Only homely girls are born to work. Your obstinacy is vain; you shall hear me.

Ros. Why do you stop me, sir? My time is precious. When the gleaming season is over, will you make up my loss?

Capt. B. Yes.

Ros. Will it be any advantage to you to make me lose my day's work?

Capt. B. Yes.

Ros. Would it give you pleasure to see me pass all my days in idleness?

Capt. B. Yes.

Ros. We differ greatly then, sir. I only wish for so much leisure as makes me return to my work with fresh spirit. We labour all the week, 'tis true; but then how sweet is our rest on Sunday!

AIR.

*Whilst with village maids I stray,
Sweetly wears the joyous day;
Cheerful glows my artless breast,
Mild content the constant guest.*

Capt. B. Mere prejudice, child; you will know better. I pity you, and will make your fortune.

Ros. Let me call my mother, sir; I am young, and can support myself by my labour; but she is old and helpless, and your charity will be well bestowed. Please to transfer to her the bounty you intended for me.

Capt. B. Why—as to that—

Ros. I understand you, sir; your compassion does not extend to old women.

Capt. B. Really—I believe not.

Enter DORCAS, from the Cottage.

Ros. You are just come in time, mother. I have met with a generous gentleman, whose charity inclines him to succour youth.

Dor. 'Tis very kind. And old age—

Ros. He'll tell you that himself. [Exit]

Dor. I thought so. Sure, sure, 'tis no sin to be old.

Capt. B. You must not judge of me by others, honest Dorcas. I am sorry for your misfortunes, and wish to serve you.

Dor. And to what, your honour, may I owe this kindness?

Capt. B. You have a charming daughter—
Dor. I thought as much. A vile wicked man!

[Aside.]

Capt. B. Beauty like her's might find a thousand resources in London; the moment she appears there, she will turn every head.

Dor. And is your honour sure her own won't turn at the same time?

Capt. B. She shall live in affluence, and take care of you too, Dorcas.

Dor. I guess your honour's meaning; but you are mistaken, sir. If I must be a trouble to the dear child, I had rather owe my bread to her labour than her shame.

[Goes into the Cottage, and shuts the door.]

Capt. B. These women astonish me; but I won't give it up so.

Enter RUSTIC, crossing the stage.

Capt. B. A word with you, Rustic.

Rust. I am in a great hurry, your honour; I am going to hasten dinner.

Capt. B. I sha'n't keep you a minute. Take these five guineas.

Rust. For whom, sir?

Capt. B. For yourself. And this purse.

Rust. For whom, sir?

Capt. B. For Rosina; they say she is in distress, and wants assistance.

Rust. What pleasure it gives me to see you so charitable? But why give me money, sir?

Capt. B. Only to—tell Rosina there is a person who is very much interested in her happiness.

Rust. How much you will please his honour by this! He takes mightily to Rosina, and prefers her to all the young women in the parish.

Capt. B. Prefers her! Ah! you sly rogue!

Rust. Your honour's a wag; but I'm sure I meant no harm.

Capt. B. Give her the money, and tell her she shall never want a friend: but not a word to my brother.

Rust. All's safe, your honour. [Exit CAPTAIN BELVILLE.] I don't vastly like this business. At the Captain's age, this violent charity is a little dubious. I am his honour's servant, and it's my duty to hide nothing from him. I'll go seek his honour; O, here he comes.

Enter BELVILLE.

Bel. Well, Rustic, have you any intelligence to communicate?

Rust. A vast deal, sir. Your brother begins to make good use of his money; he has given me these five guineas for myself, and this purse for Rosina.

Bel. For Rosina! 'Tis plain he loves her. [Aside.] Obey him exactly; but as distress renders the mind haughty, and Rosina's situation requires the utmost delicacy, contrive to execute your commission in such a manner, that she may not even suspect from whence the money comes.

Rust. I understand your honour.

Bel. Have you gained any intelligence in respect to Rosina?

Rust. I endeavoured to get all I could from the old woman's grand-daughter; but all she knew was, that she was no kin to Dorcas, and that she had had a good bringing-up; but here come the reapers.

Enter Captain BELVILLE, followed by the Reapers.

FINALE.

Bel. By this fountain's flow'ry side,
 Drest in nature's blooming pride,

Where the poplar trembles high,
 And the bees in clusters fly,
 Whilst the herdman on the hill
 Listens to the falling rill,
 Pride and cruel scorn away,
 Let us share the festive day.

Ros. Taste our pleasures ye who may,
Bel. This is Nature's holiday.

Cho. Simple Nature ye who prize,
 Life's fantastic for—despise.

Cho. Taste our pleasures ye who may,
 This is Nature's holiday.

Capt. B. Blushing Bell, with downcast eyes,
 Sighs, and knows not why she sighs.
 Tom is near her—we shall know—
 How he eyes her—Is't not so?

Cho. Taste our pleasures ye who may,
 This is Nature's holiday.

Will. He is fond, and she is shy;
 He would kiss her!—fie!—oh, fie!

Cho. Mind thy sickle, let her be;
 By and by she'll follow thee.

Cho. Busy censors, hence! away!
 This is Nature's holiday.

Rust. Now we'll quaff the nut-brown ale,
 Then we'll tell the sportive tale;

Cho. All is jest, and all is glee,
 All is youthful jollity.

Cho. Taste our pleasures ye who may,
 This is Nature's holiday.

Phœ. Lads and lasses, all advance,
 Carol blithe, and form the dance;

Cho. Trip it lightly while you may,
 This is Nature's holiday.

Cho. Trip it lightly while you may,
 This is Nature's holiday.

[Dance.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The same.

Enter RUSTIC.

Rust. This purse is the plague of my life; I hate money when it is not my own. I'll e'en put in the five guineas he gave me for myself; I don't want it, and they do. They certainly must find it there. But I hear the cottage-door open.

[Puts the purse on the bench, and retires.]

Enter DORCAS and ROSINA, from the cottage. DORCAS with a great basket on her arm, filled with skeins of thread.

Dor. I am just going, Rosina, to carry this thread to the weaver's.

Ros. This basket is too heavy for you; pray, let me carry it. [Sets the basket on the bench.]

Dor. No, no. [Peevishly.]

Ros. If you love me, only take half; this evening, or to-morrow morning, I will carry the rest. [Takes part of the skeins out of the basket.] There, be angry with me if you please.

Dor. No, my sweet lamb, I am not angry; but beware of men.

Ros. Have you any doubts of my conduct, Dorcas?

Dor. Indeed I have not, love; and, yet, I am uneasy.

Enter Captain BELVILLE, unperceived.
 Go back to the reapers, whilst I carry this thread.
Ros. I'll go this moment.

Dor. But as I walk but slow, and 'tis a good way, you may chance to be at home, before me; so take the key.

Ros. I will.

Capt. B. [Aside.] Rosina to be at home before Dorcas! How lucky! I'll slip into the house, and wait her coming, if 'tis till midnight. [Exit.]

Dor. Let nobody go into the house.

Ros. I'll take care.

Dor. But first I'll double lock the door. [Locks the door, and going to take up the basket, sees the purse.] Good luck! What is here? A purse, as I live!

Ros. How!

Dor. Come, and see; 'tis a purse, indeed.

Ros. Heavens! 'tis full of gold.

Dor. We must put up a bill at the church-gate, and restore it to the owner. The best way is to carry the money to his honour, and get him to keep it till the owner is found. You shall go with it, love.

Ros. Pray excuse me, I always blush so.

Dor. 'Tis nothing but childishness: but his honour will like your bashfulness better than too much courage. [Exit.]

Ros. I cannot support his presence; my embarrassment—my confusion—a stronger sensation than that of gratitude agitates my heart. Yet, hope, in my situation, were madness.

AIR.—ROSINA.

Sweet transports, gentle wishes, go!

In vain his charms have gain'd my heart:

Since fortune, still to love a foe,

And cruel duty, bid us part,

Ah! why does duty chain the mind,

And part those souls which love has join'd?

Enter WILLIAM.

Pray, William, do you know of anybody that has lost a purse?

Will. I knows nothing about it.

Ros. Dorcas, however, has found one.

Will. So much the better for she.

Ros. You will oblige me very much, if you will carry it to Mr. Belville, and beg him to keep it till the owner is found.

Will. Since you desire it, I'll go: it sha'n't be the lighter for my carrying.

Ros. That I am sure of, William. [Exit.]

Enter PHÆBE.

Phæ. There's William; but I'll pretend not to see him.

AIR.—PHÆBE.

Henry cul'd the flow'ret's bloom,

Marian lov'd the soft perfume,

Had playful kiss'd, but prudence near

Whisper'd timely in her ear,

Simple Marian, ah! beware;

Touch them not, for love is there.

[Throws away her nosegay. While she is singing, WILLIAM turns, looks at her, whistles, and plays with his stick.]

Will. That's Harry's posy; the slut likes me still.

[Aside.]

Phæ. That's a copy of his countenance, I'm sartin; he can no more help following me nor he can be hanged.

[Aside.—WILLIAM crosses again, singing.]

Will. Of all the fair maidens that dance on the green,
The maid of the mill for me.

Phæ. I'm ready to choke wi' madness; but I'll not speak first, an' I die for't.

[WILLIAM sings, throwing up his stick, and catching it.]

Will. Her eyes are as black as the sloe in the hedge,
Her face like the blossoms in May.

Phæ. I can't bear it no longer; you vile, ungrateful, perfidious—but it's no matter. I can't think what I could see in you. Harry loves me, and is a thousand times more handsomer.

[Sings, sobbing at every word.]

*Of all the gay wrestlers that sport on the green,
Young Harry's the lad for me.*

Will. He's yonder a reaping: shall I call him?
[Offers to go.]

Phæ. My grandmother leads me the life of a dog; and it's all along of you.

Will. Well, then she'll be better temper'd now.

Phæ. I did not value her scolding of a brass farthing, when I thought as how you were true to me.

Will. Wasn't I true to you! Look in my face, and say that.

AIR.—WILLIAM.

*When bidden to the wake or fair,
The joy of each free-hearted swain,
Till Phæbe promis'd to be there,
I loiter'd, last of all the train.*

*If chance some fairing caught her eye,
The riband gay, or silken glove,
With eager haste I ran to buy;
For what is gold compar'd to love?*

*My posy on her bosom plac'd,
Could Harry's sweeter scents exhale
Her auburn locks my riband grac'd,
And flutter'd in the wanton gale.*

*With scorn she hears me now complain,
Nor can my rustic presents move:
Her heart prefers a richer swain,
And gold, alas! has banish'd love. [Going.]*

Will. [Returns.] Let's part friendly, howsomever. Bye, Phæbe: I shall always wish you well.

Phæ. Bye, William. [Cries.]

Will. My heart begins to melt a little. [Aside.] I loved you very well once, Phæbe: but you are grown so cross, and have such vagaries.

Phæ. I'm sure I never had no vagaries with you, William. But go; mayhap Kate may be angry.

Will. And who cares for she? I never minded her anger, nor her coaxing neither, till you were cross to me.

Phæ. O the father! I cross to you, William?

Will. Did you not tell me, this very morning, as how you had done wi' me?

Phæ. One word's as good as a thousand. Do you love me, William?

Will. Do I love thee? Do I love dancing on the green better than threshing in a barn? Do I love a wake, or a harvest-home?

Phæ. Then I'll never speak to Harry again the longest day I have to live.

Will. I'll turn my back o'the miller's maid the first time I meet her.

Phæ. Will you, indeed and indeed?

Will. Marry will I; and more nor that, I'll go speak to the parson this moment: I'm happier—Zooks! I'm happier nor a lord or a squire of five hundred a-year.

DUET.—PHOEBE and WILLIAM.

Phoe. In gaudy courts, with aching hearts,
The great at fortune rail:
The hills may higher honours claim,
But peace is in the vale.

Will. See high-born dames, in rooms of state,
With midnight revels pale;
No youth admires their fading charms,
For beauty's in the vale.

Both. Amid the shades the virgin's sighs
Add fragrance to the gale:
So they that will may take the hill,
Since love is in the vale.

[Exeunt.]Enter BELVILLE.

Bel. I tremble at the impression this lovely girl has made on my heart. My cheerfulness has left me, and I am grown insensible even to the delicious pleasure of making those happy who depend on my protection.

AIR.—BELVILLE.

*Ere bright Rosina met my eyes,
How peaceful pass'd the joyous day!
In rural sports I gain'd the prize,
Each virgin listen'd to my lay.
But now no more I touch the lyre,
No more the rustic sport can please;
I live the slave of fond desire,
Lost to myself, to mirth, and ease.
The tree, that in a happier hour,
Its boughs extended o'er the plain,
When blasted by the lightning's power,
Nor charms the eye, nor shades the swain.*

Since the sun rose, I have been in continual exercise; I feel exhausted, and will try to rest a quarter of an hour on this bank. [Lies down on a bank.]

Gleaners cross the stage; enter *ROSINA.*AIR.—ROSINA.

*Light as thistle-down moving, which floats on the air,
Sweet gratitude's debt to this cottage I bear:
Of autumn's rich store I bring home my part,
The weight on my head, but gay joy on my heart.*

What do I see? Mr. Belville asleep? I'll steal softly—at this moment I may gaze on him without blushing. [Lays down the corn, and walks softly up to him.] The sun points full on this spot; let me fasten these branches together with this riband, and shade him from its beams; yes, that will do. But if he should wake—[Takes the riband from her bosom, and ties the branches together.]—how my heart beats! One look more—ah! I have waked him.

[She runs to the door of the cottage.]

Bel. What noise was that? This riband I have seen before, and on the lovely Rosina's bosom.

[Goes towards the cottage.]

Ros. I will hide myself in the house. [ROSINA opening the door, sees Capt. BELVILLE, and starts back.] Heavens! a man in the house!

Capt. B. Now, love assist me!

[Comes out and seizes Rosina; she breaks from him, and runs affrighted across the stage; BELVILLE follows; Capt. BELVILLE, who comes out to pursue her, sees his brother and steals off at the other side. BELVILLE leads ROSINA back.]

Bel. Why do you fly thus, Rosina?Ros. Where is he? A gentleman pursued me.

Bel. Don't be alarmed, 'twas my brother; he could not mean to offend you.

Ros. Your brother! Why then does he not intimate your virtues? Why was he here?

Bel. Forget this; you are safe. But tell me, Rosina, for the question is to me of importance, have I not seen you wear this riband?

Ros. Forgive me, sir; I did not mean to disturb you. I only meant to shade you from the too great heat of the sun.

Bel. To what motive do I owe this tender attention?

Ros. Ah, sir; do not the whole village love you?

Bel. You tremble; why are you alarmed?

DUET.—BELVILLE and ROSINA.

Bel. For you, my sweet maid, nay, be not afraid,
I feel an affection which yet wants a name.

Ros. When first—but in vain—I seek to explain,
What heart but must love you? I blush, fear, and shame—

Bel. Why thus timid, Rosina? still safe by my side,
Let me be your guardian, protector, and guide.

Ros. My timid heart pants—still safe by your side,
Be you my protector, my guardian, my guide.

Bel. Why thus timid, &c.

Ros. My timid heart pants, &c.

Bel. Unveil your mind to me, Rosina. The graces of your form, the native dignity of your mind which breaks through the lovely simplicity of your deportment, a thousand circumstances concur to convince me you were not born a villager.

Ros. To you, sir, I can have no reserve. A pride, I hope an honest one, made me wish to sigh in secret over my misfortunes.

Bel. They are at an end.

Ros. Dorcas approaches, sir; she can best relate my melancholy story.

Enter DORCAS.

Dor. His honour here? Good lack!

Bel. Will you let me speak with you a moment alone, Dorcas?

Dor. Rosina, take this basket.

[Exit ROSINA with the basket.]

Bel. Rosina has referred me to you, Dorcas, for an account of her birth, which I have long suspected to be above her present situation.

Dor. To be sure, your honour, since the dear child gives me leave to speak, she's of as good a family as any in England. Her mother, sweet lady, was my bountiful old master's daughter, 'Squire Welford, of Lincolnshire. His estate was seiz'd for a mortgage of not half its value, just after young madam was married, and she ne'er got a penny of her portion.

Bel. And her father?

Dor. Was a brave gentleman, too, a colonel. His honour went to the Eastern Indies, to better his fortune, and madam would go with him. The ship was lost, and they, with all the little means they had, went to the bottom. Young madam Rosina was their only child; they left her at school; but when this sad news came, the mistress did not care for keeping her, so the dear child has shared my poor morsel.

Bel. But her father's name?

Dor. Martin; Colonel Martin.

Bel. I am too happy; he was the friend of my father's heart; a thousand times have I heard him lament his fate. Rosina's virtues shall not go unrewarded.

Dor. Yes, I know'd it would be so. Heaven never forsakes the good man's children.

Bel. I have another question to ask you, Dorcas. and answer me sincerely; is her heart free?

Dor. To be sure, she never would let any of our young men come a-near her; and yet—

Bel. Speak; I am on the rack.

Dor. I'm afraid, she mopes and she pines. But your honour would be angry; I'm afraid the Captain—

Bel. Then my foreboding heart was right. [Aside.]

Enter RUSTIC.

Rust. Help, for heaven's sake, sir! Rosina's lost; she is carried away

Bel. Rosina!

Enter Captain BELVILLE.

Capt. B. Don't be alarmed; let me go; I'll fly to save her.

Bel. With me, sir; I will not lose sight of you. Rustic hasten instantly with our reapers. Dorcas, you will be our guide.

Rust. Don't be frightened, sir; the Irishmen have rescued her; she is just here. [Exit.]

Enter two Irishmen.

I Irish. Dry your tears, my jewel; we have done for them.

Dor. Have you sav'd her? I owe you more than life.

I Irish. Faith, good woman, you owe me nothing at all. I'll tell your honour how it was. My comrades and I were crossing the meadow, going home, when we saw them first; and hearing a woman cry, I look'd up, and saw them putting her into a skiff against her will. Says I, "Paddy, is not that the clever little crater that was glancing in the field with us this morning?" "'Tis so, sure enough," says he. "By St. Patrick," says I, "there's enough of us to rescue her." With that we ran for the bare life, waded up to the knees, laid about us bravely with our shillelaghs, knock'd them out of the skiff, and brought her back safe; and here she comes, my jewel.

Re-enter RUSTIC, leading ROSINA, who throws herself into DORCAS's arms.

Dor. I cannot speak; art thou safe?

Bel. I dread to find the criminal.

Rust. Your honour need not go far a-field, I believe; it must have been some friend of the Captain's, for his French valet commanded the party.

Capt. B. I confess the crime; my passion for Rosina hurried me out of myself.

Bel. You have dishonoured me, dishonoured the glorious profession you have embraced. But be gone; I renounce you as my brother, and renounce my ill-plac'd friendship.

Capt. B. Your indignation is just; I have offended almost past forgiveness. Will the offer of my hand repair the injury?

Bel. If Rosina accepts it, I am satisfied.

Ros. [To BELVILLE.] Will you, sir, suffer—This, sir, is a second insult. Whoever offends the object of his love, is unworthy of obtaining her.

Bel. This noble refusal paints your character. I know another, Rosina, who loves you with as strong, though purer ardour;—but if allowed to hope—

Ros. Do not, sir, envy me the calm delight of passing my independent days with Dorcas, in whom I have found a mother's tenderness.

Bel. Do you refuse me too, then, Rosina?

Dor. You, sir? You?

Ros. My confusion, my blushes,—

Bel. Then I am happy! My life! my Rosina!

Phæ. Do you speak to his honour, William.

Will. No; do you speak, Phæbe.

Phæ. I am ashamed: William and I, your honour—William prayed me to let him keep me company; so he gained my good will to have him, if so be my grandmother consents.

Will. If your honour would be so good to speak to Dorcas.

Bel. Dorcas, you must not refuse me anything today. I'll give William a farm.

Dor. Your honour is too kind: take her, William, and make her a good husband.

Will. That I will, dame.

[BELVILLE joins their hands; they bow and curtsy.]

Will. and Phæ. Thank your honour.

Will. What must I do with the purse, your honour? Dorcas would not take it.

Bel. I believe my brother has the best right.

Capt. B. 'Tis your's, William; dispose of it as you please.

Will. Then I'll give it to our honest Irishmen, who fought so bravely for Rosina.

[Exeunt Irishmen.]

Bel. You have made good use of it, William; nor shall my gratitude stop here.

Capt. B. Allow me to retire, brother. When I am worthy of your esteem, I will return, and demand my rights in your affection.

Bel. You must not leave us, brother. Resume the race of honour; be indeed a soldier, and be more than my brother; be my friend.

FINALE.

Bel. To bless, and to be blest, be ours,
Whate'er our rank, whate'er our powers;
On some her gifts kind fortune showers,
Who reap, like us, in this rich scene.

Capt. B. Yet those who taste her bounty less,
The sigh malevolent repress,
And loud the feeling bosom bless,
Which something leaves for want to glean.

Ros. How blest am I, supremely blest!
Since Belville all his soul exprest,
And fondly clasp'd me to his breast:
I now may reap—how chang'd the scene!
But ne'er can I forget the day,
When all to want and woe a prey,
Soft pity taught his soul to say,
"Unfeeling Rustic, let her glean!"

Rust. The hearts you glad your own display,
The heav'n's such goodness must repay;
And blest through many a summer's day,
Full crops you'll reap in this rich scene;
Will. And O! when summer's joys are o'er,
Phæ. And autumn yields its fruits no more,
New blessings be there yet in store,
For winter's sober hours to glean.

Cho. And O! when summer's joys are o'er, &c.
[Exeunt.]

THOMAS AND SALLY ;

OR, THE SAILOR'S RETURN :

A MUSICAL ENTERTAINMENT, IN TWO ACTS.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

THE 'SQUIRE
THOMAS.

SALLY DORCAS.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Village at the foot of a hill, with a cottage more advanced than the rest, on one side.

SALLY discovered spinning at the door.

AIR.—SALLY.

*My time how happy once, and gay !
Oh ! blithe I was as blithe could be :
But now I'm sad, ah, well-a-day !
For my true love is gone to sea.
The lads pursue, I strive to shun,
Though all their arts are lost on me
For I can never love but one,
And he, alas ! is gone to sea.
They bid me to the wake, the fair,
To dances on the neighb'ring lea ;
But how can I in pleasure share,
While my true love is out at sea ?
The flowers droop till light's return,
The pigeon mourns its absent she ;
So will I droop, so will I mourn,
Till my true love comes back from sea.*

Enter DORCAS.

Dorcas. What, will you never quit this idle trade ?
Still, still in tears ? Ah ! you're a foolish maid !
In time, have prudence, your own int'rest see ;
Youth lasts not always ; be advis'd by me.

AIR.—DORCAS.

*That May-day of life is for pleasure,
For singing, for dancing, and shew ;
Then why will you waste such a treasure
In sighing, and crying heigho ?
Let's copy the bird in the meadows,
By her's tune your pipe when 'tis low ;
Fly round, and coquet it as she does,
And never sit crying heigho !*

*Though when in the arms of a lover,
It sometimes may happen, I know,
That, e'er all our toying is over,
We cannot help crying heigho !
In age ev'ry one a new part takes,
I find, to my sorrow, 'tis so ;
When old, you may cry till your heart aches,
But no one will mind you—heigho !*

Sally. Leave me.

Dorcas. Go to. I come to make you glad,
Odzooks ! what's here ? this folly sets me mad.
You're grieving, and for whom ? 'tis pretty sport !
For one that gets a wife at ev'ry port.

Sally. Dorcas, for shame ! how can you be so base ?

Or after this, look Thomas in the face ?

His ship's expected—

Dorcas. Tell not me. The 'Squire—
As Tom is your's, you are his heart's desire.
You're grieving, and for whom ? 'tis pretty sport !
Then why so peevish, and so froward still ?
He'll make your fortune, let him have his will.

AIR.—SALLY.

*Were I as poor as wretch can be,
As great as any monarch he,
Ere on such terms I'd mount his throne,
I'd work my fingers to the bone.
Grant me, ye Pow'rs, (I ask not wealth,)
Grant me but innocence and health,
Ah ! what is grandeur link'd to vice ?
'Tis only virtue gives it price. [Exit.*

Dorcas. Well, go your ways. I cannot choose but smile :

Would I were young again ! alas, the while !
But what are wishes ? wishes will not do :
One cannot eat one's cake and have it too.

AIR.—DORCAS.

*When I was a young one, what girl was like me ?
So wanton, so airy, and brisk as a bee :
I tattled, I rambled, I laugh'd, and where'er
A fiddle was heard, to be sure I was there.
To all that came near I had something to say ;
'Twas this, sir, and that, sir, but scarce ever nay ;
And Sundays, dress'd out in my silks and my lace,
I warrant I stood by the best in the place.
At twenty, I got me a husband—poor man !
Well, rest him, we all are as good as we can ;
Yet he was so peevish, he'd quarrel for straws ;
And jealous—though, truly, I gave him some cause.*

*He snubb'd me and luff'd me; but let me alone,
Egad! I've a tongue and I paid him his own.
Ye wives, take the hint, and when spouse is untow'rd,
Stand firm to our charter, and have the last word.
But now I'm quite alter'd, the more to my woe;
I'm not what I was forty summers ago;
This time's a sore foe, there's no shunning his dart;
However, I keep up a pretty good heart.
Grown old, yet I hate to be sitting mumchance;
I still love a tune, though unable to dance;
And books of devotion laid by on my shelf,
I teach that to others I once did myself.* [Exit.]

The 'SQUIRE appears, descending the hill, with Huntsmen.

AIR.—The 'SQUIRE.

*Hark, hark! the shrill horn calls the sportsmen abroad;
To horse, my brave boys, and away;
The morning is up, and the cry of the hounds
Upbraids our too tedious delay.
What pleasure we feel in pursuing the fox!
O'er hill and o'er valley he flies;
Then follow, we'll soon overtake him—Huzza!
The traitor is seiz'd on, and dies.
Triumphant returning at night with the spoil,
Like Bacchanals, shouting and gay;
How sweet with a bottle and lass to refresh,
And lose the fatigues of the day!
With sport, love, and wine, fickle fortune defy;
Dull wisdom all happiness sours:
Since life is no more than a passage at best,
Let's strew the way over with flow'rs.
[Exeunt Huntsmen. The 'SQUIRE knocks at the door of the cottage.*

Enter SALLY.

Sally. Ah! whither have my heedless steps betray'd?

'Squire. Where would you fly? of who are you afraid?

Here's neither spectre, ghost, nor goblin nigh;
Nor any one but Cupid, you, and I.

Sally. Unlucky! [Aside.]

'Squire. 'Sdeath! she sets me all on fire.

Bewitching girl! I languish with desire.
But wherefore do you shrink, and trembling stand,
So coy, so silly?

Sally. Pray, sir, loose my hand.

AIR.—The 'SQUIRE.

*When late I wander'd o'er the plain,
From nymph to nymph I strove in vain
My wild desires to rally;
But now they're of themselves come home,
And, strange, no longer seek to roam:
They centre all in Sally.
Yet she, unkind one, damps my joy;
And cries I court but to destroy:
Can love with ruin tally?
By those dear lips, those eyes, I swear,
I would all deaths, all torments bear,
Rather than injure Sally.
Come, then, oh! come, thou sweeter far
Than jessamine and roses are,
Or lilies of the valley;
Oh! follow love, and quit your fear,
He'll guide you to these arms, my dear,
And make me bless'd in Sally.*

Sally. Sir, you bemean yourself; and, to be free,
Some lady you should choose of fit degree:
I am too low, too vulgar—

'Squire. Rather say,
There's some more favour'd rival in the way:
Some happy sweetheart in your thoughts takes place;
For him you keep your favours; that's the case.
Sally. Well, if it be, 'tis neither shame nor sin;
An honest lad he is, of honest kin:
No higher than my equal I pretend:
You have your answer, sir, and there's an end.

DUET.—The 'SQUIRE and SALLY.

'Squire. Come, come, my dear girl, I must not be deny'd;

Fine clothes you shall flash in, and rant it away.

I'll give you this purse, too; and, hark you! beside,

We'll kiss and we'll toy all the long summer's day.

Sally. Of kissing and toying you soon would be tir'd,

Oh! should hapless Sally consent to be naught.

Besides, sir, believe me, I scorn to be hir'd;
The heart's not worth gaining which is to be bought.

'Squire. Perhaps you're afraid of the world's busy tongue;

But know, above scandal you then shall be put;

And laugh, as you roll in your chariot along,
At draggle-tail chastity walking a-foot.

Sally. If only thro' fear of the world I were shy,
My coyness and modesty were but ill shewn;

Its pardon 'twere easy with money to buy;
But how, tell me how, I should purchase my own?

'Squire. Leave morals to grey beards, those lips were design'd

For better employment—

Sally. I will not endure—

'Squire. Oh fie! child, love bids you be rich, and be kind—

Sally. But virtue commands me be honest and poor. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Sea-side.

Enter THOMAS, with Sailors in a boat, from which they land.

Thomas. Avast! my boys, avast! all hands ashore,
Messmates, what cheer? Old England, eh! once more.

I'm thinking how the wenches will rejoice;
Out with your presents, boys, and take your choice.
I've an old sweetheart—but look, there's the town;
Weigh anchor, tack about, and let's bear down.

AIR and CHORUS.—THOMAS and Sailors.

*How happy is the sailor's life,
From coast to coast to roam;
In every port he finds a wife,
In every land a home.
He loves to range,
He's no where strange:*

*He ne'er will turn his back,
To friend or foe ;
No, masters, no ;
My life for honest Jack.*

Cho. He loves to range, &c.*

*If saucy foes dare make a noise,
And to the sword appeal ;
We out, and quickly larn 'em boys,
With whom they have to deal.
We know no craft,
But 'fore and aft'
Lay on our strokes amain ;
Then, if they're stout,
For t'other bout,
We drub 'em o'er again.*

Cho. We know no craft, &c.

*Or fair or foul, let Fortune blow,
Our hearts are never dull ;
The pocket that to-day ebbs low,
To-morrow shall be full ;
For if so be,
We want, d'ye see ?
A pluck of this here stuff ;
In Indi—a,
And Americ—a,
We're sure to find enough.*

Cho. For if so be, &c.

*Then bless the king and bless the state,
And bless our captains all ;
And ne'er may chance unfortunate,
The British fleet befall.
But prosp'rous gales,
Where'er she sails,
And ever may she ride,
Of sea and shore,
Till time's no more,
The terror and the pride.*

Cho. But prosp'rous gales, &c. [Exeunt.

Enter the 'SQUIRE and DORCAS.

'Squire. In vain I've ev'ry wily art assay'd,
Nor promises can tempt, nor vows persuade ;
No prospect of success is left me now :
How shall I gain her ?

Dorcas. Why, I'll tell you how.
This way she comes ; the wench is full of pride,
Lay oaths, and vows, and promises aside :
Often, when regular approaches fail,
Besiegers storm a place, and so prevail.

AIR.—DORCAS.

*All you would wish to succeed with a lass,
Learn how the affair's to be done ;
For if you stand fooling, and shy, like an ass,
You'll lose her as sure as a gun.
With whining, and sighing, and vows, and all that,
As far as you please you may run ;
She'll hear you, and jeer you, and give you a pat,
But jilt you, as sure as a gun.*

*To worship, and call her bright goddess, is fine ;
But mark you the consequence, mum ;
The baggage will think herself really divine,
And scorn you as sure as a gun.*

*Then be with a maiden, bold, frolic, and stout,
And no opportunity shun ;*

*She'll tell you she hates you, and swear she'll cry out,
But mum—she's as sure as a gun. [Exeunt.*

Enter SALLY, with a milking pail.

Sally. How cruel those who, with ungen'rous aim,
Strive to seduce, and bring poor maids to shame !

That brutish 'squire ! but wherefore should I fear ?
I ne'er can turn false-hearted to my dear.
No, when he came his last farewell to take,
He bid me wear this token for his sake ;
He shall not prove me fickle and unkind ;
Or say, that—out of sight was out of mind.

AIR.—SALLY.

*Auspicious spirits guard my love,
In time of danger near him bide ;
With out-spread wings around him move,
And turn each random ball aside.
And you his foes, though hearts of steel,
Oh ! may you then with me accord ;
A sympathetic passion feel,
Behold his face, and drop the sword.
Ye winds, your blust'ring fury leave ;
Like airs that o'er the garden sweep ;
Breathe soft in sighs, and gently hush
The calm, smooth bosom of the deep.
Till halcyon peace return'd, once more,
From blasts secure, and hostile harms,
My sailor views his native shore,
And harbours safe in these fond arm.*

Enter the 'SQUIRE.

DUET.—The 'SQUIRE and SALLY.

'Squire. Well met, pretty maid ;
Nay, don't be afraid ;
I mean you no mischief, I vow ;
Psha ! what is't you ail ?
Come, give me your pail,
And I'll carry it up to your cow.

Sally. Pray let it alone,
I've hands of my own,
Nor need your's to help me—forbear !
How can you persist ?
I won't, sir, be kiss'd,
Nor teas'd thus—go trifle elsewhere.

'Squire. In yon lonely grove,
I saw an alcove,
All round the sweet violet springs ;
And there was a thrush,
Hard by in a bush,
'Twould charm you to hear how he sing.

Sally. But hark ! pr'ythee, hark !
Look, yonder's a lark,
It warbles and pleases me so ;
To hear the soft tale,
O' th' sweet nightingale,
I would not be tempted to go.

'Squire. Then here we'll sit down ;
Come, come, never frown,
No longer my bliss I'll retard ;
Kind Venus shall spread,
Her veil over head,
And the little rogue, Cupid, keep guard.

Enter THOMAS.

Thomas. What's this I see ? May I believe my eyes ?

A pirate just about to board my prize !
'Tis well I this way chanc'd my course to steer—
Sal, what's the matter ?

Sally. Thomas !

'Squire. 'Sdeath ! who's here ?

Fellow, begone, or—

Thomas. Larn your phrase to mend :
Do you sheer off, or else I'll make you, friend.
Let go the wench, I claim her for my share,
And now lay hands upon her—if you dare.

TRIO.—The 'Squire, THOMAS, and SALLY.

'Squire. Saucy rascal, this intrusion

*You shall answer to your cost :
Bully'd !—scandaliz'd !—confusion !
All my schemes and wishes cross'd.*

Thomas. Hark you, master, keep your distance ;

*'Sblood ! take notice what I say :
There's the channel, no resistance,
Tack about, and bear away.*

Sally. Would you wrest our freedom from us ?

*Now my heart has lost its fear :
Oh ! my best, my dearest Thomas,
Sure some angel brought you here.*

'Squire. *Since her paltry inclination,
Stoops to such a thing as you ;*

*Thus I make a recantation,
Wretched, foolish girl, adieu !* [Exit.

Sally. Oh ! welcome, welcome ! How shall I impart

*The joy this happy meeting gives my heart ?
Now, Tom, in safety stay at home with me,
And never trust again that treach'rous sea.*

Thomas. Excuse me, Sir, while mighty George has foes,

On land and main, their malice I'll oppose.

*But hang this talking, my desires are keen ;
You see yon steeple, and know what I mean.*

DUET.—THOMAS and SALLY.

Thomas. *Let fops pretend in flames to melt,
And talk of pangs they never felt ;
I speak without disguise or art,
And with my hand bestow my heart.*

Sally. *Let ladies prudishly deny,
Look cold, and give their thoughts the lie ;
I own the passion in my breast,
And long to make my lover blest.*

Thomas. *For this the sailor on the mast,
Endures the cold and cutting blast ;
All dripping wet, wears out the night,
And braves the fury of the fight.*

Sally. *For this the virgin pines and sighs,
With throbbing heart, and streaming eyes ;
Till sweet reverse of joy she proves,
And clasps the faithful lad she loves.*

Both. *Ye British youths, be brave, you'll find,
The British virgins will be kind ;
Protect their beauty from alarms,
And they'll repay you with its charms.* [Exeunt.
